This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

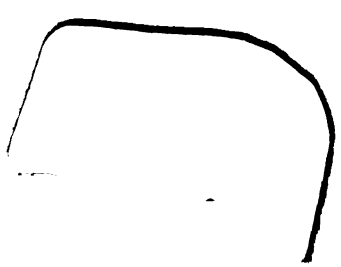
Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`



ZEA
Christi

THE CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY

ASTOR, LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
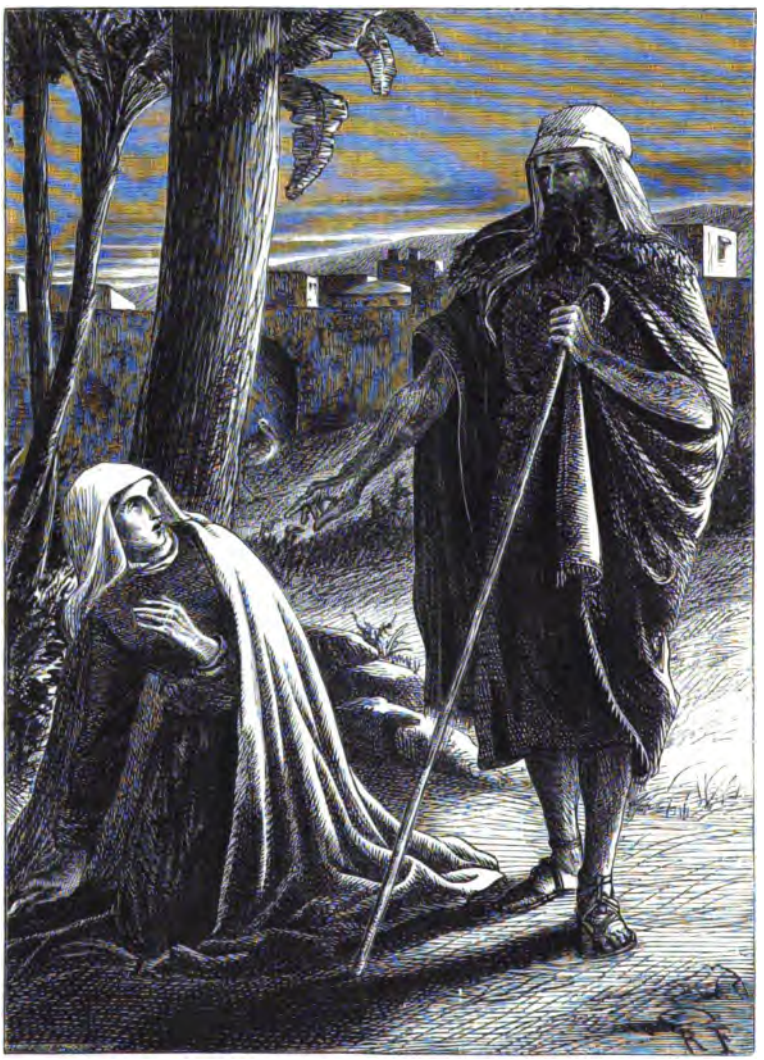
R L



ELIJAH AND THE WIDOW OF ZAREPHATH.

Frontispiece.

The CHRISTIAN TREASURY
CONTAINING
CONTRIBUTIONS FROM MINISTERS AND MEMBERS
OF
VARIOUS EVANGELICAL DENOMINATIONS
1867.
EDINBURGH:
JOHNSTONE, HUNTER, & CO.
LONDON: GROOMBRIDGE & SONS.

THE

CHRISTIAN TREASURY,

CONTAINING

CONTRIBUTIONS FROM MINISTERS AND MEMBERS

OF

VARIOUS EVANGELICAL DENOMINATIONS.

EDINBURGH:
JOHNSTONE, HUNTER, AND CO., MELBOURNE PLACE.
LONDON: GROOMBRIDGE AND SONS.
MDCCCLXVII.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
167640B
ASTOR, LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
R 1942 L

MURRAY AND GIBB, EDINBURGH,
PRINTERS TO HER MAJESTY'S STATIONERY OFFICE.

INDEX.

N.B.—Names of Authors quoted are in Italics.

A

A friend in need . . 424
Aged Christian, an . 207
Akers, Elizabeth . . . 311
Allen Lindsay . . . 496
All flesh is grass . . 527
All fulness . . . . 481
Amateur concerts . . 599
Another gospel . . 517, 541
Apostles . . . . 503
Arnot, Rev. William . . 121
Authors . . . . . 527

B

Ball-room, the . . . 33
Barber, Miss E. G. . . 210
Battle, the, and the victory 261
Battle song of the church . 534
Be careful for nothing . 199
Be consistent . . . 479
Be of a good courage . . 310
Be ye kind one to another . 10
Beautiful deaths . . 107
Believer, the, his condition 457
Believer's portion, the . 553
Beloved's 'little while,' the 185
Berridge . . . . 335
Best classics . . . 263
Bible, the . . . . . 59
Bible, authority of the . 85
Bible thoughts, by the Editor 12, 24, 36, 48, 60, 72, 84, 96, 108, 120, 132, 144, 156, 168, 180, 192, 204, 216, 228, 240, 252, 264, 276, 288, 300, 312, 324, 336, 348, 360, 372, 384, 396, 408, 420, 432, 444, 456, 468, 480, 492, 504, 516, 528, 540, 552, 564, 576, 588, 600, 612, 616.
Bickersteth, E. H. . . 137
Birdie . . . . . 544
Bird's question, the . . 107
Black fly of the woods . 167
Blackwood, S. A. . . 229
Blind postman, the . 53, 76, 128
Bonar, Rev. A. A. 109, 169, 531, 577
Bonar, Rev. Horatius, D.D. 12, 18, 24, 36, 37, 48, 60, 61, 72, 78, 84, 96, 108, 120, 132, 138, 144, 156, 168, 180, 192, 204, 216, 228, 240, 246, 252, 253, 264, 276, 277, 288, 289, 294, 300, 312, 324, 325, 336, 337, 342, 348, 360, 372, 378, 384, 385, 396, 397, 408, 420, 426, 432, 433, 444, 456, 468, 469, 480, 482, 486, 492, 504, 505, 516, 528, 529, 534, 540, 552, 564, 588, 600, 612, 616.
Bonar, Rev. J. J. 193, 589, 601
Book of all ages, the . . 265
Boy's resolve, the . . 502
Broad church cant . . 59
Brown, Robert, a sketch . 243
Bunyan's evangelist . . 117

C

Catching the sunbeams . 502
Charity . . . . . 244
Charlie Wainfleet . . 597
Chastened soul's choice, the 11
Child's journey, the . . 501
Child's thought, a . . 502
Christ the Saviour . 277, 289
Christ, the image of . . 811
Christ's own peace . . 433
Christian consistency . 525
Christian mother, a . . 299
Christian race, the . . 480
Christians, help one another 419
Christians and amusements 309
Christianity and natural science 58
Christmas Evans' poverty . 835
Clergyman, the cracked . 835
Clock of human life . . 179
Columba . . . 183, 367
Colvin, Helen . . . 243
Come . . . . . 178
Come with me . . . 262
Comforter, the . . . 193
Common lodging-houses . 147
Confident claim tested, a . 411
Conscience . . . . 479
Consolation . . . . 503
Continual guidance . . 605
Continual jubilee, a . . 1
Counsels . . . . . 503
Covenant, the . . . 832
Covenanter, diary of a 488, 591
Covenanter's deathbed, a . 95
Cox, Rev. John . . 49, 313, 457
Cumming, Rev. John, D.D. 517, 541
Cross, the . . . . . 832
Curse, the . . . . . 832

D

Dangers of the age . . 419
Dante . . . . . 33
Dark mountains, the . . 455
Dawson, Augusta L. . . 371
Day is gone, the . . 467
Desert journey, the . . 426
Difference, the . . . 263
Divided heart, the . . 503
Divine drawings . . 181
Divine fatherhood . . 141
Division . . . . 263
Dog, the faithful . . 9
Doing his pleasure . . 80
Dolcino . . . . . 88
Doubts and fears . . 81
Douglas, Rev. H. M. . . 178
Duty at home . . . 503

E

Early Protestantism 88, 356, 404, 465
Edgar, Dr. John . . . 375
Electric telegraph, the . 210
Eli, remember . . . 531
Elijah and the widow of Zarephath . . . . 613
Eminent student, an . . 273
Enter ye in at the strait gate 371
Entering into life . 292, 331
Exaggerations . . . 143
Experience . . . . 419
Experience, the cost of . 479

F

Faith, a sublime . . . 491
Farel, William 41, 88, 112, 125, 151, 171, 248, 258
Fashionable amusements . 599
Favoured ones should not fear 5
Feed my lambs . . . 310
Ferguson, Rev. W. . . 185
Finn, Mrs. 230, 267, 316, 363, 411, 461, 507, 536
Finished work, the . . 97
First lie, the . . . 515
Flower fadeth, the . . 527
Footprints of love . . 443
Footsteps of decay, the . 245
Four neglected days . . 307
Fragments . . . . 339
Fragments, odd but useful 454, 503

G

Page

Gales of the Spirit . . 361
Gehenna . . . . 133
Gertrude . . . . 254
'Give us this day our daily bread' . . . . 106
'Go on, sir, go on' . . 427
God of patience, the . . 29
God's thoughts not our thoughts, nor his ways our ways . 197
God's ways of working . 59
God's wisdom and man's . 205
Going home . . . 202
Good news, the . . . 87
Good regent, the . . 143
Good Shepherd, the . . 191
Guizot . . . . . 479
Guthrie, David . . . 58
Great worship, the . . 215

H

Halley, James, a sketch . 273
Hanna, Rev. W., D.D. . 13
Happy Christy . . . 103
Hargrove, Rev. C. . . 69
Harleys of Chelsea Place 344, 388, 440, 450, 473, 499, 519, 557, 584
Have something to say . 263
He is coming . . . 378
He liveth long . . . 582
Heart sinkings . . . 217
Hebden, Rev. A. H. R. 352, 393, 428
Hebrew tradition, supposed 359
Henry Tanner . . . 599
Herder . . . . 359, 392
Hero and the coward, the . 503
Hidden treasure, the 6, 101, 163, 211
Hiding-place, the . . 160
Hiding-place, a nice . . 442
Hill of blessing, the . . 17
Hints to tattlers . . . 419
Home of perfect rest, the . 17
Hope of the church, the . 67
Hopper, Rev. Edward . 377
Hosmer, W. H. C. . . 119
How to return a blow . 275
How to do good . . . 599
Howat, Rev. H. T. . . 613
Hymnal, the Treasury 18, 78, 138, 186, 246, 294, 342, 378, 426, 486, 534, 582.

I

I believe . . . . 305
I hae nae soul . . . 442
I have orders not to go . 202
I sleep, but my heart waketh 234
Idol, a powerful . . . 527
Incarnate love . . . 49
Indian bishop, an . . 63
Indian merchant, the . . 243
Ingelow . . . . 439
Invisible wires, the . . 119
I rise to seek the light . 599
Isthmian race-course, the . 95
It is I . . . . . 142
It is well with the child . 599
Italian caricatures . . 203

J

Jesus, why should we pray to 373, 421
Jesus, have I gone to . 382
Jesus, my Redeemer, liveth 392
Jesus Christ, the face of . 425
Jesus, does it tell about . 501
Jesus, got to . . . 502

K

Keep by the cross . . 71
Kelly, John . . . 533
Killen, W. D., D.D. . . 375
King of Terrors, the . . 599
Krummacher, Rev. F. M., D.D. 493

L

Lanterns, well lighted . 443
Leaning on the Beloved . 539
Life and death . . . 503
Life immortal . . . 503
Life of many, the . . 121
Light for the dark valley . 201
Links . . . . . 342
Little birds, what became of them . . . . 190
Little brown birdie, the . 167
Little child, the . . . 161
Little foxes . . . 236
Littlewood, W. . . . 191
Little yellow throat . . 285
Live . . . . . 294
Looking upward . . 335
Lord liveth, the . . . 527
Luther and Melancthon . 5
Luther, what he loved . 485

M

M. H. . . . 6, 101, 163, 211
Mackenzie, W. . . . 35
Madagascar . . . 311
Madame Elizabeth . . 327
Maggie Morris . . 222, 280
Martyrs' hymn . . . 486
Mary's lesson . . . 545
Matamoros . . . . 57
Maxwell, Mrs. . . . 447
Maxwell, Hon. S. R. . . 142
M'Intosh, Mrs. . . . 555
Memory's records . . 20
Millennial Sabbath, the . 137
Milne, Rev. John 1, 73, 133, 181, 217, 241, 361, 445, 481, 553
Minister, to a young . . 335
Miss Russell's Third Year in Jerusalem 230, 267, 316, 363, 411, 461, 507, 586.
Missions to the heathen . 445
Mistaken idea, a . . . 502
Montgomery . . . 479
Moral greatness . . . 203
Moralists, where are the . 562
Moses, unanswered prayer of 577
Mother's jewels, the . . 341
Mount Zion . . . 73
My mother's hands . . 598
My son, my son! . . . 61

N

Naked come, naked go . 479
Name of God, the . . 263
Nassau, Rev. J. E. . . 453
Nation's true glory, a . 95
Nature . . . . 143
Nelly's prayer . . . 501
Ness Glen, the . . . 563
Newbury, Herbert . . 239
New Jerusalem, the . . 482
New kind of tract . . 311
Newton, B. W. . . 25, 85, 157
Night is far spent, the . 533
Night watchman's song . 227
No condemnation . . 253
Noonday rest . . . 251
Novel reading . . . 69

O

Occhino and his fellows . 3
Official religion . . . 503
Old Age . . . . 604
Old Egypt . . . . 203
Old psalm tune, the . . 407
Old sailor's prayer, the . 439
Old songs, the . . . 178
Old trees of faith . . 176
Opera, the . . . . 479
Orators . . . . 479
Orchards, who rob . . 107
Our aunt . . . . 75
Our High Priest . . 589, 601
Our nation's bulwarks . 214
Over-sanguine, the . . 479

P

Parental discipline . . 479
Parker, George and Hellen 296
Paulin, G. . . . . 563
Paul the saint . . . 409
Petrie, Mrs. . . . 399
Philip and his Bible . . 32
Pleasure seeking . . 263
POETRY:—
A prince's motto . . 503
All flesh is grass . . 527
An hour of trial and conflict 551
Apostles . . . . 503
Catching the sunbeam . 502
Chant of the snowdrops . 131
Come with me from Lebanon 262
Consolation . . . 503
Counsels . . . . 503
Duty at home . . . 503
Enter ye in at the strait gate 371
Footprints of love . . 443
For Saturday night . 83
Going home . . . 202
He is coming . . . 378
He liveth long who liveth well . . . . 582
I rise to seek the light . 599
It is I . . . . . 142
Jesus, my Redeemer, liveth 392
Late snowdrops . . 515
Leaning on the Beloved . 539
Life and death . . 503
Links . . . . 342
Live . . . . 294
Love immortal . . 503
Luther at the sick-bed of Melancthon . . . 5
Martyrs' hymn . . 486
My mother's hands . 598
Official religion . . 503
On sincerity . . . 419
Our aunt . . . . 75
Purer air . . . . 311
Purity . . . . 503
Recompense . . . 503
Reverence . . . 503
Sabbath hymn . . 246
Sand and marble . . 503
Secrets . . . . 503
Silk and gold . . . 503

| POETRY—continued. | Page |
|---|---|
| Smooth every wave | 138 |
| Solitude | 503 |
| Strength by the way | 78 |
| Summer rain | 119 |
| The battle-song of the church | 534 |
| The bird's question | 107 |
| The clock of human life | 179 |
| The day is gone | 467 |
| The death of St. Lorenzo | 395 |
| The desert journey | 426 |
| The divided heart | 503 |
| The electric telegraph | 210 |
| The flower fadeth | 527 |
| The footsteps of decay | 245 |
| The Good Shepherd | 191 |
| The great worship | 215 |
| The hero and the coward | 503 |
| The melody of prayer | 503 |
| The millennial Sabbath | 137 |
| The mother's jewels | 341 |
| The Ness Glen | 563 |
| The night is far spent | 533 |
| The night watchman's song | 227 |
| The noonday rest | 251 |
| The old psalm tune | 407 |
| The old sailor's prayer | 439 |
| The over-sanguine | 479 |
| The prayer of the weary child | 23 |
| The quiet year | 581 |
| The restless heart | 503 |
| The river and the tide | 323 |
| The Sabbath | 455 |
| The Sea of Galilee | 527 |
| The shadow of the cross | 18 |
| The shedder of blood | 503 |
| The skeleton's lament | 94 |
| The sleep of the beloved | 186 |
| The soul | 479 |
| The soul's range | 143 |
| The sweetest word | 239 |
| The wave of life | 479 |
| Thine own | 155 |
| Wasted voices | 503 |
| Why? | 383 |
| Will the world miss you? | 377 |
| Pray much | 419 |
| Pray on | 561 |
| Prayer, the | 479 |
| Prayer, the melody of | 503 |
| Prayer of Milton | 419 |
| Preachers, witty | 245 |
| Preaching, manner of | 419 |
| Preach to the children | 598 |
| Pridham, Arthur | 205 |
| Prince's motto, a | 503 |
| Progressive age, a | 203 |
| Purer air | 311 |
| Puritan worthy, a | 59 |
| Purity | 503 |

Q

| | |
|---|---|
| Queen's vine, the | 381 |
| Quiet year, the | 581 |

R

| | |
|---|---|
| Ragged School, a, how it commenced | 608 |
| Rapids of time, the | 263 |
| Ready to forgive | 313 |
| Recollections of Home Mission Work, by a Lady Visitor | 20, 103, 147, 207, 219, 296, 399, 447, 496, 555. |
| Recompense | 503 |
| Religion, official | 503 |
| Remember Eli | 531 |
| Renée, duchess of Ferrara | 465 |
| Request, the reasonable | 562 |
| Resignation | 359 |
| Responsibility | 263 |
| Restless heart, the | 503 |
| Reverence | 503 |
| Rienzi | 356, 404 |
| Righteousness of God, the | 325, 337 |
| Ritualism | 143, 599 |
| Ritualism, its worldliness | 301 |
| River and the tide, the | 323 |
| Roberts, Dr. | 409 |
| Rochat, A. | 525 |
| Rules for using the tongue | 438 |

S

| | |
|---|---|
| Sabbath, the | 455 |
| Sabbath, a song for the | 35 |
| Sabbath, the millennial | 137 |
| Sabbath hymn | 246 |
| Sabbath bells, the | 235 |
| Sabbath snow-storm, the | 512 |
| Sabbatarianism, genuine | 311 |
| Sacrifice, the one | 37 |
| Safdar Ali | 188 |
| Safety from the storm | 380 |
| St. Lorenzo, the death of | 395 |
| Saints' valleys, the | 169 |
| Salvation as a free gift | 478 |
| Salvation, sure knowledge of | 229 |
| Sand and marble | 503 |
| Saphir, Adolph | 265 |
| Saturday night, for | 83 |
| Saul's melancholy | 493 |
| Saving the little folks | 135 |
| Schiller | 479 |
| SCRIPTURES ILLUSTRATED:— | |
| Gen. i. 3 | 180 |
| iii. 4 | 515 |
| iii. 7 | 216 |
| iv. 10 | 276 |
| v. 28, 29 | 312 |
| xv. 1 | 372 |
| Lev. vi. 13 | 228 |
| ix. 22–24 | 589 |
| Num. vi. 22–27 | 589 |
| Deut. iii. 24–27 | 577 |
| x. 11 | 336 |
| 1 Sam. i. 12–18 | 192 |
| xvi. 14–23 | 300 |
| xvii. 25 | 48 |
| xxiii. 16 | 424 |
| 2 Sam. xviii. 33 | 61 |
| xxiv. 14 | 11 |
| 1 Kings xviii. 8–24 | 613 |
| 2 Kings ii. 9–11 | 168 |
| 1 Chron. ii. 3 | 288 |
| xxi. 1 | 132, 144 |
| Neh. v. 15 | 360 |
| Job xxvii. 8 | 324 |
| xxxvi. 31 | 156 |
| Ps. lxviii. 18 | 96 |
| lxxxix. 15 | 1 |
| cxix. 73 | 562 |
| Song of Solomon iv. 16 | 361 |
| v. 1 | 361 |
| v. 2 | 25, 234 |
| vi. 3 | 25 |
| vi. 10–13 | 85 |
| Isa. i. 6 | 562 |
| vi. 1–13 | 348 |
| xxv. 7. | 17 |
| lxvi. 24 | 133 |
| Jer. xxxi. 3 | 181 |
| Ezek. xxxvii. 8 | 72 |
| Dan. xii. 3 | 505, 529 |
| Hos. x. 13 | 420 |
| Nahum i. 6 | 60 |
| Zeph. iii. 14, 15 | 469 |
| SCRIPTURES ILLUSTRATED—continued. | Page |
| Matt. xii. 43–45 | 385 |
| xiii. 25 | 108 |
| xxv. 3 | 240 |
| Mark vi. 53–56 | 384 |
| Luke i. 30 | 5 |
| vi. 19 | 480 |
| vii. 47 | 49 |
| xv. 20 | 468 |
| xix. 40 | 552 |
| John iv. 12 | 339 |
| vii. 23 | 120 |
| vii. 37 | 612 |
| viii. 1–12 | 120 |
| xii. 23, 24 | 121 |
| xiv. 27 | 438 |
| xvi. 7–11 | 193 |
| xvi. 33 | 444 |
| Acts ii. 36–38 | 84 |
| viii. 39 | 432 |
| xi. 19–26 | 445 |
| xxvii. 18–25 | 217 |
| Rom. i. 14 | 86 |
| iii. 21 | 325 |
| v. 2 | 456 |
| viii. 26, 27 | 241 |
| viii. 33 | 253 |
| xiii. 11, 12 | 533 |
| 1 Cor. i. 7 | 12 |
| i. 9 | 564 |
| iii. 21–23 | 553 |
| vii. 22 | 528 |
| xvi. 13, 14 | 24 |
| 2 Cor. iv. 10, 11 | 408 |
| Phil. iii. 12 | 409 |
| Col. i. 19 | 481 |
| 2 Thess. i. 7 | 17 |
| Heb. i. 3 | 616 |
| iii. 14 | 252 |
| iv. 9 | 533 |
| xi. 7 | 396 |
| xi. 24–26 | 516 |
| xii. 1 | 430 |
| xii. 24 | 276 |
| 1 Pet. ii. 3 | 588 |
| 1 John iv. 1–3 | 540 |
| v. 19 | 404 |
| Rev. iii. 21 | 504 |
| xiv. 1–5 | 73 |
| xix. 10 | 600 |
| xxii. 14 | 254 |
| Sea of Galilee, the | 427 |
| Secrets | 503 |
| Secret power, the | 145 |
| Seed-sowing | 80 |
| Shadow of the cross, the | 18 |
| Shedder of blood, the | 503 |
| Sheep, the, know his voice | 311 |
| Silk and gold | 503 |
| Sincerity, on | 419 |
| Singular incident | 551 |
| Sins less and greater | 431 |
| Sinners, why they do not come | 548 |
| Skeleton's lament, the | 94 |
| Sleep of the beloved, the | 186 |
| Smooth every wave | 138 |
| Snarling | 203 |
| Snowdrops' chant, the | 131 |
| Snowdrops, late | 515 |
| Solitude | 503 |
| Something comes | 202 |
| Song of triumph, the | 469 |
| Sorrowing heart made glad | 47 |
| Soul's range, the | 143 |
| Spanish brigand, the | 57 |
| Special providence, a | 95 |
| Spirit, the, helping our infirmities | 241 |
| Still mouth, the | 239 |

| | Page |
|---|---|
| Story of a hymn, the | 432 |
| Stowe, Mrs. | 407 |
| Strength by the way | 78 |
| Sufferer, the voluntary | 562 |
| Suffering a gift | 159 |
| Summer rain | 119 |
| Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours, by Zaida 29, 80, 159, 197, 254, 303, 339, 380, 435, 471, 544, 604. | |
| Sweetest word, the | 239 |

T

| | |
|---|---|
| Take heed to thyself | 349 |
| Temptations of riches, the | 581 |
| Ten virgins, the | 18 |
| The Lord hath need of thee | 162 |
| There and here | 533 |
| Thine own | 155 |
| Things that last | 407 |
| Three bargeman's daughters of Paddington, the | 286 |
| Todd, Rev. John, D.D. | 167 |
| Trevor, Canon | 203 |
| Trial, an hour of | 551 |
| Troubled Christians, cheer for | 16 |
| Trowbridge, Catherine M. | 119 |
| True catholicity | 95 |
| Trust and distrust | 479 |
| Trust in God | 370 |

U

| | |
|---|---|
| Unable to do anything | 606 |
| Uncertainty | 303 |
| Unclean spirit, the | 385, 397 |
| Universe, the | 59 |
| Unstable | 419 |

V

| | |
|---|---|
| Van Este, Rev. George | 349 |
| Verse-a-day system, the | 106 |
| Victory over sin | 109 |
| Voices, wasted | 503 |

W

| | |
|---|---|
| Wake up! wake up! | 95 |
| Waldenses in 1866, the | 352, 393, 428 |
| Wallace, Rev. Henry | 301 |
| Wallace, Rev. J. A. | 333 |
| War, the cost of | 203 |
| Wasted lives | 219 |
| Wave of life, the | 479 |
| We would see Jesus | 258 |
| Wealth | 479 |
| Weary child's prayer, the | 23 |
| What do I want? | 550 |
| What the Lord Jesus did not reveal and teach | 334 |
| Whether would you die on land or sea? | 143 |
| Whittier, J. G. | 107, 215 |
| Who rob orchards | 107 |
| Why? | 383 |
| Wilderness, the, and the rest | 85, 157 |
| Wilson, Daniel | 68 |
| Wise, the | 505, 529 |
| Wishes | 143 |
| Without me ye can do nothing | 471 |
| Without the gate | 25 |
| Witty preachers | 245 |
| Wonders of creation | 479 |
| Workman in the vineyard, a | 321, 415 |
| World, the, will it miss you | 377 |
| World's friendships | 479 |
| Worldling's end, the | 137 |

Y

| | |
|---|---|
| You can't catch it | 202 |
| Young man's lesson, the | 333 |
| Your children, what do they read? | 238 |

Z

| | |
|---|---|
| Zaida 29, 80, 159, 197, 254, 303, 339, 380, 435, 471, 544, 604 | |
| Zip's vow | 46 |

AUTHORS QUOTED IN THIS VOLUME.

Akers, Elizabeth
Arnot, Rev. William

Barber, Miss E. G.
Berridge
Bickersteth, E. H.
Blackwood, S. A.
Bonar, Rev. A. A.
Bonar, Rev. Horatius, D.D.
Bonar, Rev. J. J.

Colvin, Helen
Cox, Rev. John
Cumming, Rev. John, D.D.

Dawson, Augusta L.
Douglas, Rev. H. M.

Ferguson, Rev. W.
Finn, Mrs.

Guizot
Guthrie, David

Hanna, Rev. W., D.D.
Hargrove, Rev. C.
Hebden, Rev. A. H. R.
Herder
Hopper, Rev. Edward
Hosmer, W. H. C.
Howat, Rev. H. T.

Ingelow

Kelly, John
Killen, W. D., D.D.
Krummacher, Rev. F. M., D.D.

Littlewood, W.

M. H.
Mackenzie, W.
Maxwell, Hon. S. R.
Milne, Rev. John Montgomery

Nassau, Rev. J. E.
Newbury, Herbert
Newton, B. W.

Paulin, G.
Pridham, Arthur

Roberts, Dr.
Rochat, A.

Saphir, Adolph
Schiller
Stowe, Mrs.

Todd, Rev. John, D.D.
Trevor, Canon
Trowbridge, Catherine M.

Van Este, Rev. George

Wallace, Rev. Henry
Wallace, Rev. J. A.
Whittier, J. G.

Zaida

THE CHRISTIAN TREASURY.

CONTAINING

CONTRIBUTIONS FROM MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF VARIOUS EVANGELICAL DENOMINATIONS.

A CONTINUAL JUBILEE.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

'Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound.'—PSALM LXXXIX. 15.

WHAT is the joyful sound? It is just, I think, the gospel. It has been in the world ever since the fall. When sin had reigned unto death, grace began to reign, through the coming righteousness, unto eternal life. It was the grain of mustard seed sown in Eden; and it went on, age after age, opening up and expanding. Paul tells us that it was preached to Israel, even as to us. It was wrapt up in all their types and ceremonies. It was the subject and substance of all their sacrifices and solemn feasts.

There was one of their feasts, however, which more clearly and fully expressed or pictured it than any of the others. It was the jubilee, which occurred every fiftieth year, and was indeed, in a temporal sense, a joyful sound. It came immediately after the day of atonement; and in the kindness and remission which it enjoined towards their fellow-men, was a most fitting exercise for those who had themselves just been receiving forgiveness and clemency from God. We are told how eagerly it was waited for, and how gladly it was welcomed. Persons were stationed on the hill-tops, all over the country, to watch for the first appearance of the new moon, which was the commencement of the year of grace. Whoever first observed it, signalled to the others; and so the good news was circulated all over the land, with a kind of telegraphic celerity. Then the trumpets were blown, and that moment all were free. The prison doors were opened, the chains were broken, the debtor discharged, the captive released, the slave enfranchised, the mortgaged houses and lands restored to their original proprietors; and thus many a scattered family met once more in the old home and inheritance, to thank the Lord for his goodness, and his wonderful works to the children of men. It was a real Christmas season.

Don't you think that Christ must have looked with deep interest upon this? He loved and honoured all the ordinances of his Father's house. Every Sabbath saw Him in the synagogue. He regularly attended the Passover from his youth up. We find Him walking in the temple at the Feast of the Dedication, and taking occasion, from the many lamps which it was the custom then to light, to draw attention to himself as the world's great Light, and to urge them to walk in his light of life, till travelling days were done. At the end of the Feast of Tabernacles, when the people were pouring out, as they were wont to do, the pitchers of water which they had drawn from the pool of Siloam, He again drew attention to himself as the Well of life, the world's great drinking-fountain. He stood and cried, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.' May we not, therefore, conclude that the jubilee would be peculiarly dear to Him? When acknowledged by the Father, anointed by the Spirit, a victor in the wilderness, He returned full of power to Nazareth, and read in the synagogue the words of Isaiah, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me; because He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; He hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised; to preach the acceptable year of the Lord,'—don't you think that, while thus engaged, his mind may have been full of the jubilee, and that very possibly He would say to the wondering assembly, 'I am the true Jubilee; I am the world's great Jubilee. Come unto me, and be free; come unto me, and be forgiven; come unto me, and receive more than your fallen father Adam lost?' Would not the same thought be in his mind, when He said to his disciples, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature?' Yes, the gospel is a joyful sound. It proclaims salvation to the lost, forgiveness to the sinner, health to the sick soul, comfort to the troubled, deliverance to the oppressed. It bids the prodigal come back to his father's love, his father's house, his father's boundless wealth; and all this free, absolutely free, without money and without price. It is simply, Come—come now—come just as you are—come, for all things are now ready. Work is not required, strength is not needed, fruit is not demanded, questions are not asked; it is simply, Come, and receive.

Such is the joyful sound. But it must be known before it can bless. This is very important; it explains what would otherwise be a mystery. The jubilee trumpet has long been sounding in the world, the gospel has been largely preached, and yet the greater part of men are still aliens from God, slaves of the devil, without peace, and without hope. How is this? Here is the explanation: the joyful sound must be known before it can benefit. 'By his knowledge shall my righteous Servant justify many.' Says the Apostle Paul: 'The excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord.' What is this knowledge? It is believing, understanding, welcoming it. Multitudes who read and hear the gospel, never really believe it. They give a lazy, indolent, uninquiring assent to it; but if they were asked, they could give no intelligible reason for their doing so. The subject has, perhaps, never fairly crossed their minds; or, if it has, they have given it the go-by. They say it is too simple, too humbling, too easy; it will lead to licentiousness,—as if they knew better than God what will preserve and conduce to his glory. Many, again, never really understand the gospel. They have not felt their need of it, and so they take little interest in it—never give their minds to it. They are busy with many things, which they think more urgent and important; and thus they have not attained a correct, intelligent knowledge of God's way of peace. They never see its fulness, freeness, suitableness, nearness, and the obligation under which all lie to receive it. They hear it preached and explained from Sabbath to Sabbath for a whole lifetime, and yet, at the end, they are as ignorant of God's way of justifying sinners as they were at the beginning. If we were more in the habit of speaking freely and directly with one another about our most important concerns, we should oftener see how very general this ignorance is. They confuse the way of grace with the way of works, and think that it is by their own righteousness, not by faith in the righteousness of another, that they are to be saved. They cling to their own works, and say they are doing what they can. This, I suppose, is the hell-filling sin of our day. But, once more, there are many who do not welcome the gospel. I suppose there were some who did not welcome the jubilee. The selfish slaveholder's evil heart rose against it. He would say, Here have I been training and educating this servant; and now, must I set him free? The avaricious landholder, adding field to field and house to house, did not welcome it. He said, Must I now part with my accumulated possessions? The slave, enamoured of his bondage, said, I do not wish to be free; I love my master, am pleased with his service, and enjoy the connections which I have here formed. And so there are many who do not welcome the joyful sound. They give it the same reception which He, who is the sum and substance of it, got when He came into the world,—they do not receive it. But, thank God, there are many who do receive it. The poor, awakened, heavy-laden sinner, welcomes it; those who are broken in heart and wounded in spirit, welcome it; those who are weary of sin and its bondage, welcome it; those who feel their need of something better and more enduring than this world can give, welcome it; those who are afraid of judgment and the wrath to come, welcome it. The gospel just suits them; it is like bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty, clothing to the naked, life to the dying. Put these three things together,—believing, understanding, welcoming,—and then you will know the joyful sound, and experience in yourself the blessedness which it brings.

Let us look at this blessedness. There are three ingredients in it which are here mentioned,—the favour of God, the joy of God, and the exaltation of God.

The favour of God: 'They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance.' The light of God's countenance is another way of describing his favour. When He is displeased, He hides his face, or covers it with a cloud; whereas, when He is pleased, He lifts up the light of his countenance, or makes his face to shine. 'Walking' is just the whole conduct. A man's walk is his whole life; and therefore, when it is said, 'They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance,' it is as much as saying, they shall enjoy God's favour in all they do. What a comfort is this,—the Father's smile always resting upon his child,—the master's smile always resting upon his servant! This is a kind of summer life, a continual sunshine. Christ had it. The Father looked down, and said, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;' and the Son looked up, and said, 'The Father heareth me always, for I do always the things that please Him.' God's favour is life. How little the world's frown can trouble a man in whose heart God is whispering, 'I am well pleased!'

The joy of God: 'In thy name shall they rejoice all the day.' God's name is himself; what He is,—his attributes, his perfections, his being. They rejoice in this, and their joy is perennial—all the day. God's gifts change, but He never changes. 'He is the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.' We very commonly err here; we rest in the streams, when we should rise to the fountain. We should turn away from our comforts, works, and fruits, and say, God is mine; 'the Lord is the portion of my soul, therefore will I hope in Him.'

God's exaltation: 'In thy righteousness shall they be exalted.' What righteousness is this? Not God's attribute of righteousness, for that could only condemn us; not our own righteousness, for we have none. It can only mean the righteousness which Christ has wrought out, and in virtue of which He has been exalted, and is now with God upon the throne. When we know the joyful sound, Christ's righteousness is put upon us, and we become partakers of his exaltation; we are justified, accepted, made near and dear to God.

'So near, so very near to God,
Nearer I cannot be;
For, in the person of his Son,
I am as near as He.

So dear, so very dear to God,
Dearer I cannot be;
The love wherewith He loves the Son,
Is the love He bears to me.'

Put these things together,—favour, joy, exaltation,—and think what a blessedness this is. Yet it is open to us all, free to us all. Take in the joyful sound; hold it fast; rest simply, unwaveringly upon it. Give no heed to the suggestions of the devil, the questionings of your own heart, and then you will abide in perfect love, and walk in perpetual sunshine. A good man, who was much blessed and honoured in his day, was once asked, 'How is it that you are always so peaceful and unencumbered amid cares and labours which would crush other men? He answered, 'It is not that I am not tempted. I have many thoughts, and fears, and cares crowding upon me, and seeking to get possession of my heart. But then, hundreds of times a day, I think with myself, Is not God my Father, Christ my Brother, the Holy Ghost my Comforter, Providence my helper, heaven my home? And thus I am upheld, and carried on from day to day, as upon eagles' wings.'

Narrative and Descriptive.

OCCHINO AND HIS FELLOWS:

A FRAGMENT OF ITALIAN CHURCH HISTORY.

AT Sienna, in Italy, in the year 1487, was born a noble witness to the gospel; one who might, in some respects, be called the Italian Luther. His early spiritual conflicts were not unlike those of the German Reformer. His name was Bernardino Occhino.

He began early to seek the way of life; which in his age was so hard to find, because of the darkness which then rested on it, the thorns and briars with which it was blocked up. 'From the very beginning of my life,' he says, 'I had a great longing for the heavenly paradise.' Here was the Spirit of God moving on the face of the deep. His eye was beginning to turn upward, but his sky was cloudy; he saw no sun, nor moon, nor star.

He thus expressed his uncertainties: 'I believe in salvation through works, through fasting, prayer, mortifications, vigils. With the help of God's grace, we can, by these performances, satisfy the justice of God, obtain pardon for our sins, and merit heaven.' He fasted, prayed, kept vigils, tormented his body; but no peace came, no holiness. He became a monk, and courted the sternest rules and the hardest penances; but still there was no peace, no holiness. At times, after going through some sad round of penance and self-torture, he would cry out, as he lay on the ground in his hard cell, 'O Christ, if I am not saved now, I know not what I can do more!' Truly he could do no more. He did not need to have done so much; for the promise is, 'To him that worketh not, but believeth, his faith is counted for righteousness.'

He was called to preach; but he had no good news to tell. Preparation for preaching, however, led him to the Bible. He began to study it; but it only increased his troubles. It contradicted all he had been saying and doing. It was irreconcilable with his great idea of peace by doing and suffering. He continued, however, to study the word; and as he studied, light broke in. Hitherto he had taken his own works and prayers to God, to secure a hearing for him; now he began to see that there were better works and prayers than his which were available for him, nay, placed at his disposal. Hitherto he had tried to soothe his conscience by works and fasts; but his conscience refused to be pacified, either by these works and fasts themselves, or by his thinking of them after they were done. Miserable comforters are a man's own doings, or feelings, or experiences! They heal no wounds; they are not the balm of Gilead.

Soon he came to this conclusion: 'Christ, by his obedience and death, has fully satisfied the law of God, and merited heaven for sinners. This is the true righteousness; this is the true salvation.' Light broke in upon him; peace took up its dwelling in his soul. He was not yet wholly delivered from error, but he had found Him who is the way, and the truth, and the life; and this knowledge of the Son of God had brought him out of the house of bondage. He was now a freeman, and could act and speak as one who knew that he was not under wrath, but under grace.

His zeal waxed more fervent as he drank into the liberty of the gospel. He went from place to place in Italy, on foot, preaching the good news which had given him joy and liberty. He preached because he believed. Whole cities, it is said, went out to hear him; and no church could contain the crowds that flocked to him. He was not old, but his hair was grey, his face pale and thin, his beard falling to his waist, his clothes of the coarsest kind. He was the very image of what men in all ages have supposed the outward person of a saint to be.

The word came from his lips in power, as it ever does when it pours out of a full and fervent heart. At Perugia and at Naples there was what we would now call a mighty revival. The Emperor Charles v., who went to hear him at Naples, remarked, as he left the church, 'That monk would make the very stones weep.' An Italian nobleman, Valdez by name, was led by him into the liberty of Christ; and a young widow, noted in that day for her beauty, and rank, and accomplishments, was stricken to the heart. Valdez and she met, and the teaching of Valdez completed what Occhino's sermons had begun.

'There is war within me,' she said to Valdez; 'that monk's words fill me with fear of hell. He stirs up in me longings after paradise; but I feel also a love for the world and its glory. How can I get free from this conflict?' Valdez showed her that the hand of God was upon her, and that it was the Holy Spirit that was beginning his work in her. He showed her that the law had wounded her, and that only the gospel could heal her; that the law kills, but the gospel makes alive. He pointed out the necessity of being decided, and the sin of a compromise between God and the world. He then spoke of good works as springing out of faith. 'Our works are good,' he said, 'only when they are done by a justified person. As fire is needed to give heat, so faith is needed to produce love. Faith is the tree; love is the fruit. This faith is that which clings with entire confidence to every word of God. When Christ says, "He that believeth shall be saved," he that believeth ought not to doubt his salvation.'

So spoke Valdez. The lady made answer: 'But no one can believe better than I do.'

But the teacher, who saw her deficiency at that very point which she seemed so sure of, made answer: 'Take care,' said he, quite after the manner of Luther; 'if you were asked whether you believed in the articles of the faith, you would reply, Yes; but if you were asked whether you believed in the forgiveness of your own sins, you would only say, You thought you did; you hoped; but you were not quite sure. Ah! madam, if you accept with full faith the words of Christ, then, even while suffering under the pain caused by your sins, you would not hesitate to say assuredly, Yes, God himself has pardoned all my sins.'

The preaching of Occhino struck upon yet another ear—a nobleman of Florence, Carnesecchi by name. The truth entered his soul. With his eye on the Saviour of sinners, he exclaimed, 'Ah! certainly justification proceeds from faith alone, in the word and love of a crucified Saviour. We can be sure of salvation, because it was purchased for us by the Son of God at so great a price.'

Another of this little but noble Italian group was Flaminio, a native of the north of Italy, but brought into contact with the Christians of the south, at Pausiliporo, hard by Naples. There he learned the way of peace through Him who finished the great work upon the cross. Having found forgiveness through the knowledge of a crucified Christ, he spoke out thus: 'God does not call those happy who are clear from every stain, for then there could be none such here; but those whom his mercy pardons, because they believe with all their heart that the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ is the atonement for sin. If our conscience accuses us before God, if death be near, let us still be full of hope, for the mercy of God exceeds all the wickedness of the whole human race.'

This Flaminio, writing a commentary on the Psalms, and dedicating it to the Cardinal Farnese, grandson of Paul III., thus confesses his faith in the one sacrifice, the one cross, the knowledge of which is everlasting life: 'Herein will be found many things about Christ, our Lord and our God,—his bitter death, and his everlasting kingship;—his death, by which, sacrificing himself on the cross, and blotting out all our sins by his most precious blood, He has reconciled us to God;—his kingship, by which He defends us against the eternal enemy of the human race, and, governing us by his Spirit, leads us to a blessed and immortal life.'

From such witnesses we learn what was the old Italian gospel,—the good news of the one great work on Golgotha, which 'finished transgression, and made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness, and made reconciliation for iniquity.' In the belief of God's testimony to that one sacrifice, these men found immediate peace, and were assured of eternal life. This believed gospel did not introduce them into uncertainty, but into certainty. That great work which they believed contained the peace which they needed—'peace with God;' and, in believing it, that peace flowed into their souls. They did not wait, and work, and weary themselves with attempts to qualify themselves for the reception of the peace. They believed, and they entered into rest.

FAVOURED ONES SHOULD NOT FEAR.

'Fear not, Mary, for thou hast found favour with God.'
—LUKE i. 30.

GOD'S favour, even 'good-will towards man,' is proclaimed wherever the gospel comes; and it becomes the portion of every one who receives the glad tidings. Such should not fear; they have no reason to do so, seeing 'God is for them.' They stand in grace, and should seek to have access into it. The farther they travel in this direction, the less will they fear, and the more will they hope. Thus grace saves and supplies: the salvation is complete, the supply suited and sufficient. Among these rich supplies are many 'fear nots;' and the provision shows that there is much need of them. To Abraham, to Jacob, to David, to Jeremiah, and many others, God hath ushered in his sweetest encouragements with 'Fear not;' and the family of faith, throughout all ages, have used them to chase away fear and strengthen faith. 'Behold, God is my salvation; I will trust, and not be afraid,' has been their exulting resolution, and that with good reason.

To find favour with God, sometimes, as in the case of Mary, means to be used by God in some special way, as instruments for his glory,—being set apart from others, as separated ones. Thus Noah and Moses 'found grace in the eyes of the Lord.' Mary, the humble virgin of Nazareth, was distinguished above all others. This favour was as unexpected as it was great. The manner of announcing it was also extraordinary; and no wonder that she was 'troubled at the saying of Gabriel.' But there was no reason to fear. There could be no failure of the word spoken, however wonderful; no injury could come to her in being God's instrument; and it was a high honour that God put upon her. Let us not put from us, by unbelieving fears, any happiness, help, or honour which God pleases to bestow. What should we not, however unworthy, expect from such favour; and what may we not become, however feeble, by its pledged assurance?

LUTHER AT THE SICK-BED OF MELANCTHON.

COME, rouse thee up, Melancthon!
I have wrestled for thee well;
And the prayers are answered that we prayed
To break this deadly spell.
I bear the cup within my hand
Shall call thee back to life;
What, brother! would'st thou leave me here
To bear alone the strife?

There is work for thee, Melancthon—
Brave work for thee to do;
God needs on earth thy loving heart,
Thy words of counsel true.
In heaven He hath good souls enough,
His bidding to pursue.

And what were I, Melancthon,
If thy presence were withdrawn?
I am as bleak as the cold midnight,
Before the frost is gone;
And thou art gentle, and kind, and warm,
As the sun of the summer's dawn.

Thou'rt not the first, Melancthon,
My prayers have held from death:
Our gracious God hath promised grace
To those who pray in faith;
And well He knows a hundred souls
Hang on thy trembling breath.

All night for thee, Melancthon,
My soul in prayer was rent;
I wrestled for thee as of old
Did Jacob in his tent,
With an angel mightier even than that Wherewith his strength was spent.

So rouse thee up, Melancthon!
'Tis not thy time to die:
The Lord, who needs thee on his earth,
Gives life the victory;
And even now the evil one
Hath turned his face to fly!
—Paraphrased from the Life of Luther.

The Hidden Treasure;

HOW IT WAS SOUGHT, AND WHERE IT WAS FOUND.

BY M. H.,

AUTHOR OF 'ROSA LINDESAY,' 'THE STORY OF A RED VELVET BIBLE,' ETC.

CHAPTER I.

'Happiness! thou lovely name,
Where's thy seat?—oh, tell me where!
Learning, pleasure, wealth, and fame
All cry out, It is not here.
Not the wisdom of the wise
Can inform me where it lies;
Not the grandeur of the great
Can the bliss I seek create.'

'I ONLY wish I had been one of the Knights of the Round Table, and wouldn't I have sought for the Sangreal, and found it too! If one could find it, he would obtain true happiness, they say; and surely that would make up for long years perhaps spent in the search. Yes, it is a thousand pities I was not born a Sir Galahad; I'd have been off to-morrow in the quest!'

The speaker was a lad of some sixteen years, with a bright, good-looking face, who sat in the midst of a group of young people, under the shade of some old trees in the lawn of Amberley Park, in Westmoreland. The summer sunshine was bathing with its golden light the whole surrounding scene,—resting caressingly on the brilliant-coloured flowers in the terraced garden, and playing on the waters of the not far distant lakes; and, despite of the thick foliage, forcing its way through the delicate green leaves of the cluster of beech-trees where the youngsters sat.

Shouts of laughter greeted the boy's speech. 'Harry Wilmot turned a Sir Galahad; and in search of happiness too, as if he were dying of misery! Come, Harry, you must pull a longer face ere we believe that!'

But Harry was not to be put down by a laugh. 'All very fine to laugh, Osborne,' he said; 'but, after all, what is the great object in the lives of all men, but just a seeking to find happiness?—only all are not agreed as to what constitutes it, and so seek it in different ways, though they may call it by different names. I have not made up my mind yet how or where I am to seek it; but find it I must, and shall. I believe it is a hidden treasure, to be got for the seeking. What say you, Stewart?'

The person thus addressed was a young man of twenty-one years, with a clever, studious expression of countenance, whose name was already attracting attention, by the honours he had won at Cambridge.

'Suppose we refer the question to Aunt Mary,' he said, rising, as he spoke, to make way for an elderly lady and a young girl, who had come to join them. 'Now, Aunt Mary, a question of great importance has been started; and as some differences of opinion have arisen on the subject, you must be judge, and decide who is right and who is wrong. Is true happiness a hidden treasure, to be found by seeking, as Wilmot declares; or is it something that we all possess, as Osborne says, and therefore need not to be sought for at all, seeing we have it already? We wait for your decision.'

Very kindly did Aunt Mary smile at the youngsters, who had gathered around her; but the smile changed to a more serious look as she answered: 'Harry is right. True happiness is a hidden treasure, only to be found in one place; but surely to be found there by those who seek it aright. The Great Treasurer, who keeps the key, himself hath said, "Seek, and ye shall find."'

All understood Aunt Mary's words. It might be that, in their own hearts, all acknowledged their truth; but, as yet, the paths which they had marked out (though they scarce acknowledged it) as leading to the treasure, lay far away from the only true one.

Stewart was the first to break the silence which had followed Aunt Mary's words. 'I mean to seek for happiness,' said he, 'in books, and in wisdom; and you know, auntie, your Book says, "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding." Does it not?'

'Yes, Robert; but it also says, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments." And again, "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding."'

'Well, Aunt Mary,' was the laughing reply, 'you've got the better of me there; and one thing I do believe—you have found the hidden treasure; one can read it in your face. Can they not, Cousin Lucy?' he said, appealing to the young girl who sat beside his aunt.

Lucy Villiers looked up at the quiet, happy face of the lady (whom, although no relation to her, she had learned to call, as all the young people did, Aunt Mary), and, as she looked, she indeed felt that her cousin was right. She had found true, lasting happiness; the Treasurer had opened to her, and given largely. She smiled assent, but said little; for Lucy, too, had chalked out a way of her own for seeking happiness,—a way which lay right through the world's crowds; and she began to wonder whether it were possible that this path might never, after all, lead to the treasure.

Holiday time was nearly over, and the party of young people were to disperse on the morrow —some to go back to school, others to return to their homes; but all would look back with pleasure to the pleasant days spent at Amberley Park whilst visiting Aunt Mary.

Once that house had echoed back the merry laugh and bounding steps of two children, who spoke of Mrs. Wilmot, not as Aunt Mary, but as 'darling mamma.' Ten years ago a dark cloud had fallen on Amberley Park; the childish voices and the bounding steps were stilled; the kind Shepherd had gathered the lambs into the heavenly fold; and the mother, widowed and childless, unable to catch one gleam of earthly comfort in the cloud, lifted up her eyes, and saw, as she never had seen before, 'Jesus only.'

And now, though her thoughts often turn to the loved ones before the throne,—though every place where they played, every spot they loved, is sacred to their memory,—Mrs. Wilmot's heart and house are ever open to the young; her words of love and help are ever ready for them all; and 'the peace which passeth understanding' fills her heart. The hidden treasure was revealed to her where she least expected to find it,—in the midst of the great and terrible wilderness, a land of the 'shadow of death.' There it was that the Great Treasurer had revealed himself, and given to her abundantly of the pure gold.

The history of Aunt Mary's life was known, at least in part, by the young people who heard her words about the hidden treasure; and Harry Wilmot, as he pondered the subject, was assured that the treasure Aunt Mary had found must be the real one,—the true Sangreal,—since it could give that calm, happy spirit to one who had suffered as she had; and over and over he inwardly repeated the words, 'Seek, and ye shall find.' But how? was a question he left unanswered; though his imagination pictured, far off in the misty distance, a vision of perhaps finding it whilst alleviating the sufferings of his fellow-creatures,—for Harry had already begun his course as a doctor; and so, with many deep-stirring thoughts and purposes in his mind, he bade adieu to Aunt Mary and the others,—laughing merrily as Osborne, dubbing him Sir Galahad, bid him write and tell him as soon as he found the Sangreal.

As it will be some time ere we see him again, we may bid him God-speed; may pray that the heavenly Guide—who, though unseen, is even now by his side—may lead him on, step by step, in the search, making crooked places straight before him, and darkness light, till the appointed moment come, when He will remove the veil which the great enemy of souls has woven over every human eye, to prevent them seeing the only spot where the treasure lies; and, by the glorious light of the Sun of Righteousness, will show him the good he seeks,—hidden no longer, open to him, and to whomsoever will accept of it as a free, undeserved gift.

CHAPTER II.

'Tell me, ye woods, ye smiling plains,
Ye blessed birds around,
In which of nature's wide domains
Can bliss for man be found?
The birds wild carolled over head,
The breeze around me blew,
And nature's awful chorus said—
No bliss for man she knew.'

THE party at Amberley Park was broken up; only Lucy Villiers and Alfred Osborne remained, and they were to leave the next day. The last day at any place where one has spent some happy weeks is always a sad one, more especially if you are, as Lucy was, left almost the last of the visitors.

Certain it is, as Lucy sat alone that night in her own room, she felt more depressed than she could have believed it possible to have done in the prospect of parting with one whom she had known for so short a time as she had known Aunt Mary; for this was her first visit at Amberley Park, and the first time she had seen Mrs. Wilmot.

Lucy Villiers was an orphan. Her father had died while she was still an infant, and the remembrance she retained of her mother was misty and dream-like: soft grey eyes, with the soul looking out of them, full of tenderness and love; gentle words, and loving caresses,—and that was all.

Yet, Lucy, there was more than that left to you of your now angel mother. A mother's prayers are floating round you,—prayers of faith, of trust, of hope, offered in that name which is above every name, and in unfailing trust in the truth of Him who hath said, 'Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, I will do it.' Into the holiest, by the blood of Jesus, she had access even on earth; and there prayers were offered for her only child, which shall one day receive their full answer.

Lucy's thoughts were full of the future before her. Her school-days were over; her home for the future was to be with her Uncle and Aunt Osborne in London; and by them she was to be introduced into the gay world of fashion, in the midst of which they dwelt; and there she hoped to find the hidden treasure of true happiness. Visions of brightly lighted rooms, of rustling silks and satins, of light gossamer-like lace dresses, of flowers and gems, music and dancing, were before her eyes; and, pent up as she had hitherto been in the schoolroom, the very prospect of mingling in such scenes appeared delightful, and she longed for the moment to arrive that she might drink the cup of pleasure.

Such were the feelings with which Lucy came to Amberley Park to visit her mother's friend, Mrs. Wilmot; but now, as she sits thinking over the events of her visit, on the eve of her departure, she wonders how it is that the future before her does not look so dazzling as it did. Will she find the happiness she expects? she asks herself. And what has led her to doubt it she cannot tell. Surely nothing that has been said to her. Aunt Mary has not spoken on the subject; the young people have all envied her the life before her. What can it be? Her cousin Alfred boasts of the number of parties and fêtes his beautiful sister Leila attended last season, and of the number she is to give herself next season, as she is Leila Osborne no longer, but the Hon. Mrs. Dudley; and tells how delighted she is that she can chaperone her cousin, though only two years older than she.

But Lucy, as she thinks of these things to-night, sighs, scarce knowing why; and rising, throws open the window to let in the balmy air, and gazes out at the beautiful scene—beautiful indeed in the soft moonlight. Silver-tipped are the hills and trees; whilst, mirror-like, the quiet lakes reflect the whole, and smile under the gentle toying of the moonbeams. No wonder that Lucy stood enraptured; never before had nature seemed to her so lovely. There was rest there, even such rest as she fancied lay in Aunt Mary's eyes, and in those soft grey ones seen so long ago, so dimly remembered.

Yes, Lucy thought that she had learnt the secret of Aunt Mary's peaceful spirit, the key to her hidden treasure. Amidst the tranquil beauties and wonders of nature she had sought and found it; and the more she gazed and thought, the more fully she became convinced she had guessed aright. As she lay down to rest, she wished she could have spent her life in this quiet abode, in the midst of this glorious scenery, that in the midst of nature she might find the treasure she coveted.

Nay, Lucy, nay; not there the blessing you seek. Nature can give much,—pure joys, simple, soul-elevating pleasures; it can rouse feelings akin to the sublime; but it cannot give true happiness, cannot impart real peace. Only One can do that, and He is hidden from your eyes, though He is ever present with you. Though He has loved you with an everlasting love; though He has died to redeem you from the god of this world; if He is named to you now, you would exclaim, 'I see no beauty in Him.' But yet a while, and, your eyes opened, his glories will flash on your sight, and the language of your heart and lips will be, 'He is chief among ten thousand—altogether lovely.'

Even as she lay asleep, prayers were ascending for her. Aunt Mary's heart yearned over the orphan girl: too well she knew the temptations which lay before her. Fain would the childless widow have kept the child of her dead friend to live with herself, but it might not be. Her natural home was with her mother's brother, Mr Osborne, and all that Aunt Mary could do for her was to pray. All! but was not that enough; better than anything else she could do? Could she not thus draw down on the head of the motherless girl richer blessings, surer protection, than she or any one on earth could bestow? Ye who love the Lord, and delight yourself in Him, pray on; pray for the souls of those around you,—'Lord, let them live before Thee;' and doubt not, though the answer tarry, it will surely come; and He, true to his promise, will give thee the desire of thine heart.

CHAPTER III.

'Oh, who could bear life's stormy doom,
Did not thy wing of love
Come brightly wafting through the gloom,
One peace branch from above!
Then sorrow touched by Thee grows bright,
With more than rapture's ray;
As darkness shows us worlds of light
We never saw by day.'

'AND you really think, Alfred, that Harry Wilmot is determined to find the hidden treasure? Well I do wish, if he does, he'll let me into the secret; for I am beginning to believe that happiness is all a myth, a mere word, found only in a dictionary. I doubt if any one is happy, even those who are well, and able to go where they like, see what they like, and do what they like; not like me, obliged to lie here all day, hardly ever able to move or do one thing I wish to do. Certainly, happiness is a thing unknown in my experience, and yet, could it be got, it is a boon worth the finding. There now, I have horrified Cousin Lucy by my speech. Never mind, dear, Alfred can tell you I don't always speak like that; only my head aches to-night, and it is weary weary work, always to be ill, and know you will never be better—at least never like other people.'

The speaker was a young girl of about fourteen, the Osbornes' youngest child. An invalid almost from her birth (a fall, whilst still an infant, having injured the spine, and laid the seeds of permanent though not fatal disease). All that care, nursing, and the best medical skill could do, had been done, and yet the hopes were small that Netty Osborne would ever rise much from the couch. For long the child was as contented as the circumstances would admit of, and the loving attentions lavished on her went far to soften her lot. But of late it was different: the precocious mind was early developing; the feelings of the child were changing to those of the woman; she was waking up to the bitterness of her lot; cut off from the enjoyments of life, incapacitated from taking her part in the busy world. The cup was a bitter one to drink, and can we wonder if she turned away from it, and rebelled, loudly rebelled, against the draught?

Poor Netty! were there none to tell you of Him who alone could sweeten the bitter cup; of Him who, for your sake, drank to the dregs a still more bitter draught, and murmured not, only saying, 'Father, not my will, but thine be be done?' Were there none to speak to you of Him, whose very name is as 'ointment poured forth;' none to lead you to Him, who is as willing as He is able to cure,—the Great Physician, the kind, loving, sympathizing elder brother, Jesus?

No, not one. Father, mother, brother, sister, gave all they could give, in the shape of fond love, unwearied attentions, kind sympathy—but no more. The treasure was indeed a hidden one to her; months of vanity and wearisome nights were appointed to her, and she knew not that He who appointed them did so in love. She thought of Him (if at all) only in the light of an enemy, and saw not that the very hand that chastened bore the marks of wounds received for her.

Lucy Villiers had scarcely ever seen her Cousin Netty for years, and now as she sat beside her on the day after her arrival in her uncle's London home, her whole heart was filled with compassion for the young girl. She marked the restless, eager, longing eyes, the weary unsatisfied expression, and noticed the bitter tone of irony in which she spoke,—too surely indicative of a heart ill at ease; and Lucy's kind heart longed to comfort the sufferer, and speak words of peace to her.

But how could she speak what she knew not; how lead one to the hidden treasure, when she herself knew not the way? As she sat there, joining Alfred in repeating many of the jokes which had amused them at Amberley Park, in order to cheer up Netty, she felt that they fell pointless on the girl's ears, and she longed to see Aunt Mary sitting by that couch, sure that she would find a way to soothe and cheer. Not till Alfred told the story of Harry Wilmot setting off to search for the Sangreal, did his sister's interest seem roused; then she spoke as we have told.

Yes; happiness was something worth seeking, if one only knew the right way. It was all very well in Alfred to say that happiness was a thing which every one possessed, and therefore did not require to be sought for; but she knew she had it not, nor many others that she could name; not even Leila, bride though she was, and rich in all the world calls good.

Long after the others had retired to rest, Netty lay and thought of the hidden treasure, and wondered if the Great Treasurer, of whom Aunt Mary had spoken, would ever open to her, and give forth the hidden store. Oh, if He only would—if any would tell her where she could find Him! She would beg and pray Him to do so, and surely he would not refuse a poor suffering child like her.

Refuse!—ah, no! He is waiting to be gracious; longing to pour the balm of Gilead into the weary heart; longing to show thee himself, to reveal his glory to thee. Even now, though thou hearest Him not, he is saying, 'Come unto me, ye weary and heavy-laden one, and I will give you rest.'

But as yet Netty heard not that voice, and as she lay she began to mark out a path for herself, by which she hoped to attain the treasure. She was wonderfully attracted to Lucy Villiers; she felt she could love her; her soft eyes seemed to read her thoughts, and feel for her, and her gentle voice sounded as sweet music in her ears. Ere Netty fell asleep, she had determined to search for the treasure in the path of friendship: surely in the interchange of thought and affection with a kindred soul, she would find the good she panted for! She too had joined the seekers, and her path also would end in 'vexation of spirit.'

(To be continued.)

Readings for the Young.

THE FAITHFUL DOG.

THE Silesian vale is in the midst of great high mountains in Germany. There is in the middle of it a village, where very plain peasants live. Not far from the village stands a very old castle, which was occupied by a nobleman and his family. Strangers, in travelling through the country, often went to see the castle, for it was very remarkable in many respects. There were beautiful paintings in the parlours, curious old books in the library, and articles of carved ivory that were very wonderful.

One day a man went to the castle gate and asked admission. He seemed to be old, and was clad in a long cloth robe, which made him look exactly like a priest. A servant came to the gate, and the stranger said to him: 'I am a plain country priest, and have come from a distance to see this castle. I have heard a great deal about it, and the wonderful things that are in it. May I be allowed to enter it? Tell the gentleman who lives here that I am a poor man, and that I will be grateful if I may be allowed to go through it.' The servant replied: 'My master is not at home, but his wife is at home, and she is a very kind lady. I am sure you can gain admission; in fact, it is a standing rule here, that when a preacher asks admission, he is never refused. Come in.'

The great iron gate opened slowly, and the stranger entered. By-and-by he reached the door of the castle, and was admitted into the parlour. He was introduced to the nobleman's wife, who was indeed a good woman, and had a very kind heart.

She showed him the pictures, and the beautiful ivory articles, and the old books, and many other interesting things. She led him through all the chief parts of the castle, and finally conducted him up the high flights of stairs to the top of the tower. Her little boy accompanied her, and she held him by the hand. By-and-by they reached the highest point of the tower, and the good lady said to the stranger, 'Look out now upon this beautiful Silesian valley; did you ever see it surpassed?'

No sooner had she said these words, than the stranger threw off his monk's hood and his long robe, and seized the little boy of the good lady in his arms, and held him over the parapet of the tower.

'Now,' said he, 'give me your jewels, or I will drop your child!'

Horrified at such conduct, the good lady screamed aloud; but, of course, nobody could hear her at that distance.

She then said to the cruel man, 'I now see who you are; you are Kuno, the great robber. Give me my dear child, and you shall have all the jewels in the house.'

'Do you promise me faithfully?' said he.

'I will. I will give you everything you want, if you will save my child,' she answered.

'But will you make no alarm, so that I may get away from here in safety?'

'Give me my child,' said she, 'and you shall go from here in safety.'

Wicked Kuno took the child down, and gave him to his mother. In one half-hour from that time he had taken his departure through the big gate, with the splendid jewels in his possession.

Many weeks passed on, and the nobleman, who had been several months in Paris, returned. The whole event was told to him; and he took his little boy, whose name was Lewis, in his arms, and said, 'Thank God! How thankful I am that his life is spared! He is worth more to me than all our jewels.'

I have said that the nobleman's wife was a kind lady. Now I will prove it.

She was in the habit of taking a long ride every Thursday, with provisions for the poor in her carriage. One day she was told by a humble peasant woman, whom she had assisted many times for several years, that in the next cottage a poor man lay, who had fallen in one of the mountain passes, and had so injured himself that he could not live much longer. 'I have a few loaves of bread left,' said she, 'and I will go in and see him, and perhaps I can help him.'

She was admitted into the dying man's little room. On seeing the strange lady enter, he lifted his weary eyes toward her, and gave a loud groan.

It was Kuno, who had taken her jewels!

'I know you,' said she, 'but I will not harm you. I forgive you all.'

He replied: 'I am a dying man. Your jewels have been like coals of fire in my heart ever since I took them. They now lie in that bag in the corner of the room. Good lady, will you pray with me?'

She did pray with him, and stayed with him several hours. She noticed a beautiful little white dog, which sat on the foot of the bed, and looked at Kuno all the time. It was Kuno's dog, named Flink; and he seemed as if he really thought his master was going to die. He was faithful to the last.

Kuno said: 'There are the jewels, which you must take home with you; and here, on this bed, is my little jewel, Flink. He has been faithful to me in all my crimes, and he will be faithful to you in all your good deeds.'

The kind lady left the house, but not until Kuno died. She provided for his burial. He was laid away in the village graveyard. She took Flink home with her; and though it was some time before he became attached to the family, yet he did become fond of Lewis, and all the rest of the occupants of the castle.

Several years now passed by, and Lewis grew large enough to ride on horseback. Little Flink followed him wherever he went. He was as devoted to him as he had been to his first master. One day Lewis was riding on one of the roads that wind around the neighbouring mountains, and the horse became frightened at a queer-looking rock that stood near the road. He sprang suddenly, and Lewis was so taken by surprise that he fell off, and his foot caught in the stirrup, and he was dragged for some distance on the ground. Flink made a spring at the reins that were hanging loose from the horse's neck. He got one of them in his little mouth, and held it firmly. The horse seemed to be gentle enough on ordinary occasions; but I fear that poor Lewis would have lost his life, if it had not been for little Flink; for that dog held the horse by the rein for some time, until a peasant, who had come from the other side of the mountain, saw the strange scene. The remarkable sagacity of the dog astonished him. Lewis's foot was released; and, after recovering his strength, he was placed upon his horse, and returned home. He told his parents all that had happened, and that Flink had been the instrument of his safety. Gratitude filled the hearts of Lewis's parents, and thanks were offered that his life had been preserved.

The next time that the nobleman went to Breslau, he ordered a little silver collar to be made for little Flink. Now, I will tell you what inscription was put upon it. It may seem to you a very long one; but the words were small, so that they could be engraved very easily around the collar. You will find it in the Bible; and without telling you where it is, I hope you will find the place if I give you the words—

'Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing, but contrariwise, blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that you should inherit a blessing.'

The beautiful bright silver collar was brought home, and Lewis read the strange inscription. He then asked his mother why that verse had been put upon Flink's collar. She then told him, for the first time, all about Kuno's threatening to throw him from the castle tower, and that the only way his life was spared was by giving away her jewels.

'Mother,' said Lewis, 'I hope Kuno was a good man when he died. But your kindness to him on his deathbed will be worth more to me than all the property I may ever possess. I shall be thankful as long as I live for my good mother.'

---

BE YE KIND ONE TO ANOTHER.

We were playing at bricks one afternoon in our old nursery. We had begun to build a castle, and were very anxious to see it finished. So we took all the bricks to build it with, each a heap for herself, and left none for the baby to play with. She did not cry, but came to me and asked, in her sweet childish accent, for one little brick.

It was refused. The bright face clouded, and the blue eyes filled with tears. Generally the sight of my dear little sister's distress would have touched me; but I was too much taken up with play at the time to care.

She went away to another sister, and got a brick from her. So the baby was happy, and soon both she and I had forgotten all about it.

But I was to remember my unkindness again; for, when the trees were getting green, and the flowers springing up, and the earth looking her loveliest, God took our baby-sister to that land where the trees are ever green, and the flowers never fade.

'The baby is dead!' they told me. They took me to see her lying on her little bed. As I looked on her face, now so cold and passionless; on her eyelids, shut fast by the hand of death; the memory came back to me of an earnest pleading face, and blue eyes filled with tears by my unkindness. I lay down on the floor beside her bed, and wept long and sore.

Then they told me that she was happy—quite, perfectly happy; that nothing could ever grieve her any more; that even now, as we looked at the empty body of our baby, her spirit was in heaven,—one of those infant angels whom Jesus keeps so close and near to himself; that in her little hands a harp is placed; on her sorrowless head a crown of gold is set.

They could not comfort me. I believed every word which they told me of her happiness, but that did not comfort me.

They laid her under the green grass, and soon the daisies grew over her head. Not so soon did my sorrow pass away.

God saw that this sad and sore lesson was needed to make me less selfish; and not until it was fully learned, in all its bitterness, did He send me comfort.

And though it is a long, long time ago now since then, and many a winter's snows have lain on her grave, and many a summer's flowers bloomed there, I cannot yet think without pain of the day when I grieved the baby-sister whom God lent us for a season; and have written this for you, dear little ones now reading it, in the hope that, by God's help and blessing, your little hands may be made gentler, and your little hearts kinder, towards those little ones whom your loving Father has given you to love.

'Little children, love one another.'

O. D.

THE CHASTENED SOUL'S CHOICE.

'Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for his mercies are great.'—2 Sam. xxiv. 14.

David had sinned; the pride of his heart, excited by Satan, had led him astray; and the prophet meets him with a message from God, as one who had entered into temptation. But his heart had already smitten him, and he had gone to the throne with his inward sorrow, saying, 'Take away the iniquity of thy servant, for I have done very foolishly.' In this frame the divine proposal—to choose one of three troubles—was laid before him. It is seldom that God allows his people to choose their own troubles; and David wisely casts himself back on God. He had learned what man is, and he had also learned by experience how gracious God is. The event proved that, though God would not pass over the sin of David, and of his people, yet that He could overrule all for good. This was a kind of clearing-up storm in David's eventful life. Then came the tranquil evening, to be followed by the bright day of Solomon's prosperous reign. New discoveries, new blessings, sprang out of this last trial of David's.

The Lord does not present us with three evils, out of which to choose what we think is the best; but He presents us with good in its infinitely varied forms. He spreads out before us his word, the riches of his everlasting covenant, and says, 'Ask what I shall give thee.' Let us 'open our mouths wide, and He will fill them.'

Still, it may be that, in consequence of various trials and sorrows, we may be in a great strait of perplexity. If so, let us adopt David's resolution; and whatever may have brought us into our trouble, 'let us fall into the hands of the Lord.' If we fall penitently and resignedly into the hands of Omnipotence, saying, 'Let Him do as seemeth Him good,' we shall prove that we are under the shadow of his tender mercies.

'Use the rod, and not the sword;
Correct with kind simplicity;
Bring me not to nothing, Lord,
But bring me home to Thee!'

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Cor. i. 7.

At Corinth there was a large and noble church. It was not perfect; there were errors and divisions in it; there was gross sin in it. Yet it was not only a true church, but one of high attainment. The Corinthian saints were enriched in all utterance and all knowledge. They had gifts as well as graces; manifold gifts; all gifts; they came behind or were deficient in no gift; they abounded in them. They were an advancing church; a church of true progress, in knowledge, gifts, and holiness.

Thus there may, in a church, be much evil in the midst of much good. Even when there are divisions and inconsistencies, there may be life and fruit. The remedy for all the evil, and the source of all good, was to be their holding fast Christ and his truth,—Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God.

It is progress at which we are to aim,—each church, each Christian. We must first start—start in the right direction—for the walk or the race. We must begin with believing; we must be rooted and grounded in love. And then progress, true progress begins; not till then. Having begun, we go on unto perfection; we increase and abound in wisdom, truth, holiness, hatred of sin, love to the brethren, pity for the world. Onward, upward, is our motto. Our earnestness after true progress, and our dread of progress falsely so called, should go together.

But, along with these gifts, there was one thing specially noticeable in these Corinthians: they waited for the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. Let us mark here—

I. The Person.—He is not here designated Son of man, or Son of God, King, or Master, or Bridegroom, but 'Lord Jesus Christ,'—his fullest, largest title, and one which the apostle delights to repeat at full length, as if never weary of it. He is—(1.) Lord; nay, He is Lord of lords: He is Lord in the sense of God; He is Jehovah; for this is his Old Testament name. (2.) Jesus; Jah, the Saviour; He who saves us from our sins; a divine Saviour. (3.) Christ; Messiah, the anointed One; filled with the Spirit without measure; the vessel of infinite and divine fulness. These three names declare his glory, and also reveal his grace. In them we read: 'God is love;' 'God so loved the world;' 'Herein is love.'

II. The Event: 'the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ.'—The word is properly 'the Apocalypse,' or 'revelation,' or 'manifestation.' He is now hidden—unseen—within the veil. But this concealment is not always to last. God hath appointed a day for 'revelation.' Then He shall be visible; every eye shall see Him. His first coming is the greatest event in earth's past history; his second coming is the greatest in its future. He shall come! Behold, the Lord cometh. He comes in glory; in majesty; with clouds; with all his saints; to destroy antichrist; to deliver creation; to bind Satan; to convert Israel and the Gentiles; to execute vengeance; to raise his saints; to judge and to reign. For these things He comes. He is only waiting for the time appointed of the Father. Then He shall appear in his glory, no longer the man of sorrows, but the Conqueror, the Bridegroom, the crowned King.

III. The Posture: 'Waiting' (see Rom. viii. 19, 23).—As the servant for the master; the traveller or mariner for the morning; the bride for the bridegroom. In all these there is eager and earnest expectation. The event is infinitely desirable; the person is the object of love. We have heard of Him; we long to see Him, and to hear his voice. His absence is sadness and gloom. As Rutherford says, 'It is like a mountain of iron on our heavy hearts.' All seems to go wrong in that time of absence. In such a case 'waiting' is a necessity; we cannot but wait. (1) We wait in faith; (2) In hope; (3) In patience; (4) In desire; (5) In love; (6) In watchfulness. Such was the church's position before Messiah's first coming; such is it before his second. It is the posture of the church—and of each saint. They are waiters and watchers. There must be no forgetfulness, no indifference, no sloth, no sleep; all wakefulness, eagerness, and longing. Many things tend to hinder this, and to throw us off our guard. Let us beware, and hold fast. Let us not sleep as do others, but watch.

IV. The connection between this posture and the gifts: it is close, vital, and mutual.—The gifts cherish the waiting, and the waiting the gifts: the one helps the other. The more we wait, the more the gifts will grow; and the more they grow, the more will we wait. (1.) The gifts are all from Christ, out of his fulness; and the more we possess of the gifts, the more shall we desire to know the giver; the more copious and pleasant our draughts of the stream, the more shall we long for the fountainhead. (2.) The gifts are the gifts of the Spirit, and He is the Witness of Christ; the more that we are filled with Him, the more shall we wait, and look, and long for Him to whom He testifies, and whom his office is to glorify. Thus the two things are inseparably linked together. We cannot be growing Christians without waiting for Christ; and we cannot wait for Christ without growing.

(1.) Press on.—Stationary saintship is as poor as it is perilous. Advance, advance! Make this your motto. Be progressive Christians; belong to the advanced school of theology and holiness, in the true sense.

(2.) Beware of stumbling and backsliding.—The tendencies, both within and without, are all against us. Snares and stumblingblocks are in our path. Be on your guard. Look to your feet. Dread one retrogressive step. Watch against coldness and prayerlessness.

(3.) Wait for the revelation of Christ.—Be this your posture constantly; not theoretical, but practical. Let nothing come between you and a crucified Christ; a risen Christ; a glorified Christ; a coming Christ. Look for, and hasten to, the coming of the day of God.

THE TEN VIRGINS.*

AMONG the Jews the marriage ceremony was always celebrated at nightfall, and the marriage supper was given in the house of the bridegroom, and not in that of the bride. The bridegroom, accompanied by a select number of companions, his friends, goes to the house of the bride, to conduct her thence to her new home. The bride, with a corresponding attendance of companions, awaits his arrival; and then, the two bands united, the bridal procession moves on to the dwelling where the bridal feast is prepared. The ten virgins spoken of in the parable are friends of the bride, and are waiting, either at her house, or some suitable place by the way, for the announcement of the bridegroom's coming, that they may join the marriage procession, go forward with it, and sit down at the provided feast. All the ten have lamps. This in every event was necessary, as it was only by lamp-light or torch-light that the procession could move on. But these lamps of the ten virgins were not, in all likelihood, their own, nor carried by them only for the light they were to yield. As it was customary to provide wedding garments, so was it to provide wedding lamps,—such lamps of themselves marking out those that bore them as invited guests. Each of the ten virgins of the parable has got such an invitation to appear on this occasion as an attendant on the bride, and has accepted it; and each holds in her hand the symbol of her character and office. Very likely the lamps were all of one material and pattern. Very likely the ten bearers of these were all dressed alike; and that, looking at them as they took up together their appointed post, you might have seen but little if any difference in their outward appearance or equipment. Yet there was a great, and, as it proved, a radical—a vital difference between them. Five of them were wise, and five were foolish. The wise showed their wisdom in this, that they provided beforehand for a contingency which, however unlikely, they foresaw might possibly occur. The lamp furnished to them had quite enough of oil in it to last all the time that it was thought it would be needed. There was more than enough oil in it to carry the bearers from the one house to the other; and had all gone as it was at first arranged,—had the bridegroom come at the usual, the set time,—the marriage lamp, with the ordinary supply of oil that it contained, would have been sufficient. But to the five wise virgins the idea had occurred that it was at least within the bounds of possibility that a delay in the bridegroom's coming might take place. Some unforeseen accident might occur, some unthought-of hindrance be thrown before him on his way. To be prepared for such delay, in case it should occur, they took with them other separate vessels beside their lamps, containing a supply of oil in reserve, upon which they might draw in the event of what was in the lamp itself being all consumed. The foolish virgins showed their folly in this, that they were quite satisfied with the provision of oil made for them by their inviters, and never thought of supplementing it by any additional provision of their own. Perhaps the idea of a delay in the bridegroom's coming never occurred to them. It was a thing that but rarely happened. The idea of it would not naturally or spontaneously arise. It would do so only to those who gave themselves purposely and deliberately to think over beforehand all that might happen, in order to be provided for it. Even if the possibility of some delay had occurred or been suggested to these foolish virgins, they would have satisfied themselves with thinking that it never could be so long as to burn out all the oil which their lamps contained. They were quite sure that all would go right; that the bridegroom would come at the right time. They were all too eager about the meeting, and the march, and the spread-out banquet, to allow their minds to be troubled with calculating all the possible evils that might occur, and how they could be most effectually guarded against. But they were mistaken in their anticipations.

'The bridegroom tarried.' Taking the parable as a prophetical allegory, this is one of the many hints given by our Lord, even to the first disciples, that his second coming might possibly be deferred longer than they thought. He would not tell them how long; He would say nothing that should absolutely and wholly preclude the idea of his speedy advent, his coming at any time, to any generation of the living; but yet He would not have them so count upon his coming being at hand, as to make no preparation for his absence being prolonged, as to commit that species of folly chargeable upon the five foolish virgins.

* From 'The Passion Week.' By Rev. Dr. HANNA.

And 'while the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept,'—the wise and the foolish alike. Perhaps there may be a prophetic glance towards that which shall be the condition of the world at the time of Christ's second coming,—to the general surprise with which that event shall burst upon a slumbering, unexpectant earth. Whatever secondary allusion of this kind it may carry with it, you will notice that this slumbering and sleeping of all is not only what might naturally have been expected under the circumstances, but what is necessary to lead the story on to the contemplated issue. The delay had been longer than any one could have imagined. The bridegroom should have been there soon after the darkness had fallen. At midnight, had the set and common time been kept, not only would the procession have been all over, but the feast nearly finished. It had been with all the virgins a busy day, getting all things ready for so great an occasion. Was it wonderful that, when, hour after hour, there was no signal of the approach, tired nature should claim her due, their excited spirits should fail and flag, their eyes get heavy, and that they should all slumber and sleep? Had there been no such sleeping, had all kept awake throughout, the foolish virgins, by the gradual consumption of the oil within their lamps,—perhaps by noticing also and reflecting on the provision in the separate vessels that their companions had made,—would have become timeously aware of the danger that was at hand, and might have provided against it. On the other hand, had it been the foolish only who slept, and, while they slept, had the wise been watching at their side, we could not well have excused them if, when the foolish awakened, they had charged their companions with great unkindness, in having suffered them to sleep on, when they must have seen the catastrophe that was impending. We are disposed, therefore, to regard this incident as thrown in, rather in order to conduct the story to its proper close, than as having any distinct and peculiar symbolic signification of its own.

At midnight the cry came: 'Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.' This cry rouses all the sleepers. All is haste and bustle now, as if there were an eagerness to make up for the previous delay. As they start up from their sleep, the ten virgins all see that their lamps, which they eagerly grasp, are just dying out. With the wise it is a quick and easy thing to clear and cleanse the wick, and to pour in a fresh supply out of their auxiliary vessels. A minute or two so spent, and their lamps are burning as brilliantly as at the first. Not so with the foolish virgins. They look despairingly at their fading lights. They have no fresh oil to feed their flame. The only resource, in their extremity, is to apply, in all the eagerness and impatience of despair, to their companions: 'Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out.' But the wise had been economic, as they had been foreseeing. They had enough for themselves, but no such superabundance that they could safely and prudently supply their neighbours: 'Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.' It was the only alternative left. But, alas! it failed; for while they were away beating up the oil-sellers, and trying to make a speedy purchase, the bridegroom came. The five that were ready passed on with him in the procession, went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut.

The ten virgins of the parable represent so many of the professed disciples of our Lord. Their common equipment, and their common attitude,—all of them with marriage lamps in their hands, standing waiting the bridegroom's coming,—tell us of that prepared and waiting posture in which all who call themselves by the name of Christ are or ought to be found, as those who are looking for the coming and glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

It would, however, be unjust to this parable, and it would involve us speedily in inextricable difficulties of interpretation, if we either took the ten virgins as representing the whole collective body of the visible church, or took the difference of conduct here displayed, and the difference of destiny to which it led,—the final separation of the five wise and five foolish,—as typical of those two companies which are to stand, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, of their great Judge. Christ's object here is much more limited. He is urging throughout this part of his discourse the duty of watchfulness with regard to his approaching advent; and in this parable it is one form or kind of that watchfulness which He desires to inculcate. He does this by showing, in an illustrative instance, what special benefit it may be to him who practises it, and what painful consequences the absence of it may entail. The kind of watchfulness here so strikingly pressed upon our regards, and emblematically exhibited in the conduct of five of the ten virgins, is prudence,—that reflective forethought, which busies itself in providing beforehand for emergencies that may possibly arise; the same virtue, transferred to spiritual things, which distinguishes the wise and the prudent of this world, who profitably spend many an hour in conjecturing what possible contingencies as to their earthly affairs may arise, and in contriving and arranging how each, if it do happen, should be met.

Among the children of the kingdom, the wise and the prudent are they who, having been called to that marriage supper of the Lamb, and having received the gracious invitation to sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, prize the invitation so highly, and are so anxious that nothing should defraud them of the eternal blessedness to which it points, that they give themselves with all diligence to the consideration of all the possible risks that might come in the way of its finally being made good to them, and to the best methods of guarding against them should they occur. They look beyond the present; they anticipate evil before it comes; they strive to secure themselves against surprise; to stand forearmed to meet each enemy. Opposed to them, and answering to the foolish virgins of this parable, are those thoughtless disciples who, satisfied with having got the invitation, and with being ranked among the number of the invited, foresee no danger, take no precaution, and make no provision against it. . . .

'The bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage.' The future, the everlasting blessedness in store for all true followers of Christ, is spoken of here, as so frequently elsewhere, as a royal banquet or feast: 'Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb.' Scene of unrivalled glory, of exhaustless joy; rich and rare the food provided for the guests in the great banqueting-hall of immortality! Other viands at other feasts soon pall on the sated sense; but for those viands upon which the spirits of the blessed shall for evermore be nourished up into a growing likeness unto God, the appetite shall ever grow quicker the more that is partaken, and the relish be ever the more intense. The companionship at other festivals finally wearies; sooner or later we begin to desire that it should close; but in the hallowed unions and fellowships that shall be there, new sources of interest, new springs of delight, shall be ever opening, each coming to know the other better, and each fresh access of knowledge bringing fresh access of love, and confidence, and joy. Other feasts are broken up; and sad and dreary is the hall where hundreds met in buoyant joy, when, the guests all gone, the lights grow dim, and darkness and loneliness take the place of the bright smile and ringing laugh. But that marriage supper of the Lamb shall know no breaking up; its tables shall never be withdrawn; its companionship shall never end.

'They that were ready went in: and the door was shut.' What a surprise, what a disappointment, the five foolish virgins must have met with when they came and found that already the bridal party had entered, the bridal supper had commenced, and that the door was closed against their entrance! They had been invited to this marriage feast, and they had accepted this invitation, as special friends of the bride. The idea of their being excluded from the banquet had never entered into their minds—no, not even after their lamps had gone out. True, they had not taken the same precaution with their wiser companions; but who could have predicted so tedious a delay? True, they had not been able to join the procession at the first; but now they have got fresh oil, and their lamps are burning as brightly as at first. The door is closed against them—surely by inadvertence; it had not been perceived that they still were wanting to complete the company. They knock—the door opens not; they hear the bridegroom's own voice within—the very voice of their inviter. With an eagerness in which fear begins to mingle, they cry out, 'Lord, Lord, open to us.' The only answer they get is, 'Verily, I know you not,'—an answer which too plainly tells them that within that joyous dwelling they never shall set foot.

The warning here strikes home upon us all. We too have heard the invitation of our Saviour, and outwardly have accepted it. Our Christianity may be such as shall stand well enough the scrutiny of our neighbours, and as may open to us, without any right of challenge, admission to the table of communion. But how many are there, among such professors of Christianity, for whom a surprise as unexpected and as terrible is in reserve as met those foolish virgins! The man who never fears that it may be so with him at the last,—who can hear about the door of heaven being shut against those who, up to the last, expected to get in, and no trembling apprehension come upon his spirit that he himself may be among that number,—is the very man in whose person that terrible catastrophe is most likely to be realized. When we know that there is so great a possibility, nay, we may say, so great a probability of self-deception; when we believe that so many have practised that self-deception on themselves throughout life, and never have awakened from its illusions till they stood before that door of heaven, and found it closed against them for ever,—how diligent in self-scrutiny should each of us now be; how anxious that he possess not the name only, but the disposition, the character, the habits, the conduct of a true follower of Jesus Christ! Let us apply, then, to ourselves those most impressive words of Christ: 'Not every one that saith to me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father that is in heaven. Many shall say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity.'

But that door which Christ himself here tells us will be closed at last against so many, is it not now open unto all? Yes. It stands before us, invitingly near, most easy of access, with this blessed inscription written over it, in characters so large that he who runs may read: 'Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' How different in this respect from those other doors at which you see so many of our race stand knocking,—the doors that lead to wealth or fame, or ease and pleasure! These doors stand so far back, away from where the multitude are naturally standing, that many, in the rush, and throng, and pressure, never get near them, though they toil to do so all their lives. Close in upon and around each of them what crowds are gathered, knocking so eagerly, so impatiently —often with such impetuous violence! They open, however, to but a few of all this number. For one that finds entrance, there are hundreds that are kept without. Why is it that the great multitude will still keep rushing to these doors that remain shut against so many, while so few try that other door that remains closed against none? Is it that this gate to which our Saviour points us is so strait, the way that He would have us walk in is so narrow? True, the gate is strait; but strait, why, and to whom? Strait —indeed, impossible to pass through—to all who come to it environed with the thick wrapping of pride and worldliness, and the spirit of self-trust. But strip yourselves of these,—come naked and bare of them, come in all humility, with a broken and a contrite heart,—and you will not find it strait, but most easy of passage. True, the way is narrow—narrow for each individual traveller; but who that ever tried to tread it would wish it to be broader,—to be so wide as to suffer him unchecked to wander away from God, or lapse into any transgression of that law which is so holy, and just, and good? Narrow as it is to each, that way has breadth enough for all to walk in it, without any of that jostling, and striving, and sore competing toil which mark the broader way that so many take.

Enter ye in at that strait gate. Walk ever humbly, diligently, with careful footstep, with watchful wisdom on that narrow way, and then let the alarm rise when and how it may; let the cry strike the ear, 'Behold, He cometh!' No shut door shall be before you. For you, as for your great Forerunner,—for you, because you follow Him,—the everlasting doors shall be lifted up, and the glad welcome given: 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'

Theological and Practical.

CHEER FOR THE TROUBLED CHRISTIAN.

OFTEN in this world is the child of God sorrowful. There are many things which make it difficult to 'be careful for nothing.' Though the dark and angry waves of trouble have become calm by the spirit's contemplation of the blessed words of our Lord, 'Consider the lilies of the field;' though the soul has rejoiced in the sweetness of that term, 'your heavenly Father;' yet again have the bleak winds of adversity raised the waters, and the Christian cries out in anguish: 'All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.'

How sweet it is to such an one to think of the better land and its occupants! Many are there who have passed through this life; and they were not without trouble.

> 'Once they were mourning here below,
> And wet their couch with tears.'

To them it was not always summer time; the birds did not ceaselessly sing, the land was not always beautiful. The heavens often gathered blackness, heavy tempest-clouds rolled across the sky, wind howled, thunder roared, lightning flashed, and they trembled. But they have no storm now. They have passed through earth's darkness and anguish. Now they enjoy the blessedness of heaven.

Will not the troubled Christian join them? He will. 'Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.' Earth's night will soon be past; heaven's morning will come. Troubled one! thou wilt then rejoice in the unclouded beams of the Sun of Righteousness. Down in the valley thou didst cast thy burden upon the Lord, and so the steep ascent was climbed. Now, on heaven's mountain-top, far above the storms of earth, thou dost rejoice indeed. In the thick darkness thou didst place thy hand in that of thy heavenly Father, and He hath led thee safely through every danger. The morning star of promise, which thy tear-dimmed eyes, gazing upward from earth, sometimes beheld, is lost in the full radiance of eternal day. Oh! thy poor cares, thy pitiful anxieties, which made thee cry, 'My soul cleaveth to the dust,' they are gone for ever. There is no care in heaven.

Leap for joy! Rejoice! rejoice! thou art now on the plains of glory. Eternal blessedness is thine. Hasten, that thy voice may join in the song of the heavenly host. Swell the grand chorus: 'Salvation unto our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb.' 'What are these which are arrayed in white robes, and whence came they? These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. . . . And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.' Join that company. Thou art 'ever with the Lord.' S. J.

THE HILL OF BLESSING.

'And He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people.'—Isa. xxv. 7.

How often, in connection with the prophecies of the glory of the coming age, we have one special mountain referred to,—'the mountain of his holiness' (Ps. xlviii. 1); 'the mountain of the Lord's house' (Isa. ii. 2); 'the mountain of Jehovah' (Micah iv. 2); 'Mount Zion' (Rev. xiv. 1); and many other places. To Mount Zion the prophet here refers; hence we read just before, 'Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously.' Three times in this chapter is this term used; and it stands connected with the overthrow of all enemies (ver. 10), the provision of all blessings (ver. 6), and divine enlightenment of all nations (ver. 7). These blessings will be complete, universal, and permanent. If we look back on the ages past, what do we behold? Nations sitting in darkness and the shadow of death. Deceived by Satan, they think that the veil which is spread over them is an ornament, and that the covering which he provides is a defence, whereas it is in truth 'the death-covering.' When Israel shall be all saved, then their salvation will be life from the dead to the world. The nations which sit in darkness will see a great light, and their language will be, 'O house of Israel, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord.' Then, what discoveries will be made, what delight will be realized, what devotedness will be manifested! In connection with this destruction of the covering of ignorance and the veil of prejudice, this annulling of the death sentence, will be the casting out of him who 'blinds the minds of those who believe not.' Christ, who was manifested to destroy the works of the devil, will bind Satan, that he shall not deceive the nations any more during the millennium. For all this deliverance and blessing let us hope and pray.

But though we are as yet called to labour now in the midst of all this darkness and delusion, let us not be dismayed or discouraged. 'Greater is He who is in us than he who is in the world;' and, aided by Him who is our light and our salvation, we may so hold fast the word of life, and 'shine as lights in the world,' as to save some from darkness and death, and prepare them to stand around the Lamb with us on Mount Zion.

'O hasten, Lord, the glorious day,
When, throned on Zion's brow,
Thy hand shall rend the veil away
Which blinds the nations now.

When earth no more beneath the fear
Of thy rebuke shall lie;
When pain shall cease, and every tear
Be wiped from every eye.

When Judah thus no more shall roam
Beneath the heathen's claim,
Thy days of splendour shall return,
And all be new again.'

THE HOME OF PERFECT REST.

'To you who are troubled rest with us.'—2 Thess. i. 7.

Jesus said to his disciples, and He still says to all his followers, 'Let not your heart be troubled;' and yet his servant here describes them as 'you who are troubled.' But this trouble is outside the ship, not within it. The trouble Jesus forbids is that which arises from guilt, and fear, and care; these weaken the soul and produce cowardice. They are like the rot in a tree, which eats away its strength, and prepares for its fall. But external troubles are permitted and overruled by Jesus; and these are like the winds and storms, which serve to ground and root the tree more securely. They are for discipline and instruction. Thus the Lord prepared the east wind which smote the gourd which for a time sheltered Jonah. It was the prophet's own fault if he did not get more good from the withered plant, than he had got when it was flourishing in leafy glory, and formed a bower over his head.

Paul said, 'We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed.' No more was laid on him than strength was given him to bear. Look where he would on surrounding trouble, he could see no curse, and therefore felt no fear. Though he went down to the deeps, he rose again to the heights; and from the crested top of the wave of trouble he caught a glance of the haven of rest. Then he shouted to his brethren in tribulation, 'Rest with us is at hand.' The Lord, in whom we have rest now, is coming, and then we shall have rest with Him and with one another for ever. Each wave of trouble rolls us nearer to that rest, endears the thought of it, and meetens us for it.

Let us in all trouble rejoice in hope of this perfect and permanent rest. If we would do this, we must recollect the consolations provided for us in trouble in the promises of God; and, above all, that our God is the God of all comfort to his troubled ones, and loves to have them reposing in Him on their way to endless rest.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

THE SHADOW OF THE CROSS.

Words by Horatius Bonar, D.D. Music from M. Haydn.

[The tune 'Salzburg,' in the Scottish Collection, is founded on this melody.]

Not too fast. Met. 100 = ♩

Treble.
Alto.
Tenor.
Bass.
Accomp
Op- press'd with noon-day's scorch - ing heat, To yon - der cross I
Op- press'd with noon-day's scorch - ing heat, To yon - der cross I flee; Be - neath its shel - ter take my seat; No shade like this for flee; No shade like this for

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

me! Be - neath that cross clear wa - ters burst, A foun - tain spark- ling me! Be - neath that cross clear wa - ters burst, free; And there I quench my de - sert thirst; No spring like this for me!
And there I quench my de - sert thirst; No spring like this for me!

A stranger here, I pitch my tent
Beneath this spreading tree;
Here shall my pilgrim life be spent;
No home like this for me!

For burden'd ones a resting-place,
Beside that cross I see;
Here I cast off my weariness;
No rest like this for me!

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XI.—MEMORY'S RECORDS.

WHAT a blessed faculty is memory! How delightfully we can exercise it sometimes in looking back upon the past, and, as we feel inclined, refresh or instruct our spirits with the recollected fellowships and experiences of former days!

'Tis said the soul can live in the past, the present, or the future, as it will. So, one evening lately, my tendencies were so decidedly retrospective, that I gave the reins to memory, and quickly it passed through many a scene of earlier years, living them o'er, but soon stopped short, and mustered up a train of images that long had lain in deep oblivion.

Anon I sat within the dear old church, where oft in early years I worshipped, just on the day that the first appearance of a stranger lady and gentleman, with their numerous family, made some sensation in our midst. I must, however, do them the justice to state, that this was not to be attributed to their fashionable attire—it was extremely modest.

Every one carries an atmosphere about with them, it is said, and, if it be true, theirs was denser or more easily discernible than others; they seemed quite immersed in the element of love, but without the least unseemly manifestation of it.

How devout, too, they all appeared, with a tenderness and unconsciousness in their expression, that was quite beautiful to look upon.

Next, I was walking home with a friend, and though not naturally curious, nor from principle inclined to say much about my neighbours, was yet receiving with considerable relish some information about the new-comers, all the more readily that it quite coincided with the favourable opinion I had formed of them.

One little female prayer-meeting was memory's next resting-place, on the evening that Mrs. A. first came among us; and on being asked to take part in the services, did so in a manner that deepened our former favourable impressions into reverence and love.

One thing that drew us young people so much to her was, if I may so express it, her motherliness. How broad her sympathies were! How genial her spirit!

She was, however, no latitudinarian. But, while maintaining her own principles most rigidly, she had an enlarged experience and richness of soul which gave a peculiar charm to her conversation.

Then memory, in a kind of freak, undid another fastening, and from a secret crevice brought up an image most markedly in contrast with the former, and placed them side by side. 'Twas that of one who, while all but intolerably conscientious about trifles, lacked sadly that enlarged sympathy—that breadth and depth, or rather elasticity of love, which can expand and rise to meet occasions, as well as touch with finest stroke the merest trifles.

Anon I found myself within their home. It was a happy one—a resting-place for mind and heart. Of them it could be said, and truly, that—

> 'With every morn their love grew tenderer;
> With every eve deeper and tenderer still.'

How well also did they succeed in making their children feel that home was the happiest, dearest place on earth! Surely that delicious home feeling is as choice a blessing as parents can bestow.

Here I could not help pausing to reflect how much the salvation of children depends on the character of their parents, and especially of the mother; what a power she possesses of impressing upon the minds of her children her own cherished principles!

That power, too, is ever necessarily exercised, either for good or evil, as the senses of children are ever busily, though unconsciously, taking in impressions from what passes around them. They are also found to be keen observers, and from the circumstances thus observed, to be constantly drawing their own conclusions. And it follows, of course, that in a home where religion is made prominent—pervasive as an atmosphere—God's presence and agency distinctly realized—impressions cannot fail of being made, and the superstructure of pure and noble character raised on right foundations.

My reflections over memory again bounded forward, to view afresh these home-scenes of hallowed joy she oft had witnessed, and often halted and lingered over them, as if in hope to catch some inkling of their spirit.

'Tis difficult sometimes to give form and body—paint in words the beauteous visions that rise before one's mind. But as one or two of them appeared in clearer outline than the others, I will try to sketch them, though but in a very imperfect manner.

'Twas with me a time of sadness. Dark clouds not only lowered around, but also threatened to overwhelm. There is a sorrow which mere words cannot reach. Well Mrs. A. knew that, and also when sympathy would be better manifested by silence than by speech.

One afternoon we sat in a little front parlour, a kind of sanctum sanctorum—I hope I will not be thought very irreverent—where only the privileged were permitted to enter; and just at a time when words of comfort, spoken directly to me, would have been worse than useless, Mrs. A., in her own cheery way, turned to her daughter, who sang beautifully, and said—

'Come, E—, let us have "The Dove."'

And E—, her mother and sisters, taking different parts, sang—

'The dove spread o'er her weary wing
Above the waters dark;
She pluck'd an olive branch, to bring
The lone ones in the ark.

What peace and joy that token gave,
Though all around was dark!
It proved that God had power to save
The lone ones in the ark.

Though waves and storms go o'er my head,
Though all around be dark;
I have an hiding-place above,
In Jesus Christ, my ark.'

Never had I heard anything so beautiful, I thought; and while they sang, the weary heart forgot its smart, and could only wonder at the power possessed by a gracious spirit, of casting oil upon the troubled waters—or rather, of shedding around one of life's rugged paths a charm that smoothed its roughest ills.

Then memory took a backward turn, and stirred another train of images, soon to converge again in Mrs. A.

Distinctly, as at first, I saw the little upper room, where lived an humble Christian; and also the horror and distress with which she showed me a posé of books, infidel books, which her brother had secreted, evidently for special perusal. One of them was extremely virulent in its spirit, written by a woman.

Most of them I had read before—Volney, Voltaire, Paine, etc.: not from choice altogether; but as in visiting I often met with those who not only read but accepted those writings as truth, I felt it necessary to inform myself. But so far was the perusal from shaking my faith, I could only wonder how any one, in whose heart God had revealed his Son, could have a moment's uneasiness through such quibbling.

Perhaps it was because I had not mind enough to see the force of their objections, but they all seemed to rebut from it lightly, as a ball of india-rubber. Now, however, in merely glancing over the pages of this one I had not seen before, it was different.

She advanced nothing new, and differed little from the other writers, except in the animus of her words; for, while she held up prayer to ridicule as a mere myth, and also the poor befooled creatures that could be content to believe that if they prayed and get something, perhaps very different from what they asked, at some time, and in some way, that it was an answer to their prayers, there was a living venom in her words that assailed one's spirit, and but for care, would have fastened upon it like a vampire. An instance, I could not help thinking, of like seeking to like. There must have been some latent doubts existing in my mind on that very point, or there would not have been such readiness to entertain the doubts of others. I should scarcely, however, say entertain, but rather that I was tormented with the vile ideas which she advanced about prayer soliciting entertainment. How protean also in character! How differently they looked at different times! But when examined, proving the same unworthy ideas after all, spectre-like, haunting my spirit with their dark illusions. Ultimately, though adopting such Fabian policy, they had no success. How could they, when we may have with the Eternal One intercourse so close and conscious, that every doubt, however strong and subtile, dissolves into the veriest nothingness?

To me this little tilt with gloomy unbelief was extremely valuable, as by it I was led to meditate more on the subject, made more observant, and thus became acquainted with so many striking facts in the experience of others, as to the direct answering of prayer, as amounted, independently of my own experience, to demonstration.

Many of these facts I culled from the experience of Mr. and Mrs. A. But though memory would gladly open up her teeming treasures, I shall only bring one from the experience of each.

Again Mrs. A. and I are seated, not in the little front parlour, but a much more spacious room, having one of those delightful talks that can only be indulged in, when there is not the slightest shade of mutual distrust, and at the same time enjoying the sight of the children running about on the grass so beautifully fresh and green; and everything did look so soft and lovely in the declining sun, as he poured down floods of his subdued glory through the shady trees.

'Religion is icy without a heart,' it has been truly said; but in this home it had a heart. And the young people were growing up beautiful developments of humour and cheerfulness. With such springing, and romping, and jumping as we now witnessed, there could be no question as to their enjoying all the elasticities of life.

Something in particular having drawn my attention to Esther, the youngest girl, I asked if Esther was a common name in England.

'No,' she replied, 'there was a special reason for her being called by that name. I do not often speak of it, but I think I'd better tell it you.'

And then she began to relate how the Rev. Mr. B., an intimate friend, was in great distress. Its nature, however, she did not reveal, further than to say, that through a strange concurrence of circumstances, over which he had no control, he was brought into such straits, that unless God was pleased to interpose in a particular way, the cause of religion would suffer.

He called on Mrs. A. for the double purpose of taking counsel, and getting the aid of her prayers. In praying with him before he left, she obtained the assurance that he would be helped.

When she told him so, he doubted. But so sure was Mrs. A., that she thus addressed him—

'Mr. B., you will certainly be delivered, and so sure am I that I will neither eat nor drink until help come; you will therefore at once send me a token.'

Two days and two nights had passed away, and the third day was drawing to a close. Mrs. A., faint and weak, was almost beginning to make the complaint of the prophet, 'O Lord, Thou hast deceived, and I was deceived,' when one of Mr. B.'s servants appeared with the token.

At the sight of it, Mrs. A. burst into tears, and for some time could say nothing but 'Glory be to God,' etc. 'And that is the reason,' she added, 'why the dear little girl I had soon after was named Esther.'

Here again I must pause, amid my retrospections, to state a fact. Mr. A., after many years' walking in the light of God's countenance, gave way to doubt on one point—God's love to, and care of him, as an individual. Singular enough, the effect was not what might have been expected. Instead of becoming indifferent, he became more earnest in the discharge of every duty, resolved that if he perished, it would not be for wilful rebellion against the will of God. But his was no longer the happy service of a child rejoicing in the light of its father's smile, but the hard service of bondage and fear, that left him walking in doubt and darkness.

In this state of mind he left Scotland, after a long sojourn there. When several years had passed away, circumstances led me to ——; and it was with no measured feelings of delight that I found myself once more with these dear old friends, and enjoying a delightful tête-a-tête in the spacious drawing-room of their beautiful English home. Every cloud had passed from Mr. A.'s mind; and fresh with the dews of divine grace, it was more clear and vigorous than ever. 'Twas, indeed, the clear shining after rain!

One evening, the conversation having turned somehow upon prayer, I asked if he had ever had any direct answers.

'Hundreds of them,' was the characteristic reply; and began at once relating some of them.

With one of those instances of prayer being directly answered, I was much interested; and having obtained leave to make any use of it I pleased, will here relate it—not circumstantially as he did, for I forget the names of the places, and many of the nautical phrases he used; but the substance was as follows:

After leaving Scotland, his distress increased so much, that he was quite unable to manage his business—that of shipbuilder; his friends, urging that a change would be beneficial, prevailed on him to take the command of one of his own vessels that was about to set out on a long voyage. He did so, and on the passage out they were one night in dangerous proximity to some sunken rocks or sand-banks, etc.; and though perfectly aware of it, an unaccountable drowsiness stole over him, and despite his extreme anxiety about their critical position, he could not possibly keep awake. The more he struggled against this feeling, it grew the more intense; and at length, completely overpowered, after he had given most careful instructions to Tom, the mate of the vessel, went to his cabin, and sank at once into a most profound sleep. While in this state, the man at the helm, through some slight misapprehension of his orders, was steering the vessel right into the danger, without being conscious of it. A few minutes more, and destruction would have been inevitable. Just then Mr. A. was suddenly awakened out of his deep sleep. The intense oppression was gone; he felt instead an extraordinary influence impelling him on deck. He obeyed the impulse, and was just in time to save the vessel. But though the immediate danger was over, their situation was still perilous in the extreme. I do not remember the details, but they were surrounded on all sides by dangers, from which there seemed no egress. At this juncture, a distinct impression was made on the mind of Mr. A., of a passage between some sand-banks, through which they would escape. He called his mate, and asked if ever he heard of such a course being taken.

'Only once,' was the reply, 'and it was extremely foolhardy, even in easy weather.'

Still the impression grew clearer and stronger. 'Run the vessel up in that direction.' Convinced at length that this impression was of supernatural origin, he obeyed, and in a short time they were clear of all impending dangers.

'Ah!' he said, 'that was a great deliverance to me. Not only were we saved from shipwreck, but "my soul was escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowler." Unbelief had long held my soul in its icy fangs, but now its spell was completely broken. These remarkable deliverances were so suited to my spiritual status, as to convince me, beyond the possibility of doubt, that God did indeed watch over me. And, at the same time, He also revealed his love afresh to my heart. I rejoiced, yet there was something in the very joy that humbled me; and the words would keep ever recurring to me —"Ah! wherefore didst thou ever doubt!" Blessed be his name, I have never doubted since.

'That was on our voyage out,' he continued. 'On the passage home I had another deliverance. We were within sight of ——; there was a tremendous gale blowing.' And after describing all that had been done to prevent it, 'We were,' he said, 'perfectly helpless, and driving before it right on the lee-shore. My mind was stayed on God. Thoughts like this were passing through it: "O Lord, Thou knowest that it is not love of gain that has placed me in these circumstances. I am following thy own providential leadings. It is not a path of my own choosing. I give myself up to Thee. If it does not please Thee to prosper my honest endeavours to provide for the family Thou hast given me, Thy will be done. I give myself up to Thee. What Thou willest is best. I cheerfully resign the life Thou hast given into thine own hands."

'While thus engaged, an indescribable peace stole into my heart, and I praised God, and I sang. Yes; I sang and praised God with my whole heart amid that fearful scene. As I was doing so, the mate came up to me and said—

'"Why, Mr. A., you are a strange man, singing like that. Don't you see we are driving on the rocks?"

'"Yes, I see it."

'"Then how can you sing, when in a few minutes we will be in eternity?"

'"Because, Tom, it will be from rocks to heaven, from raging seas to eternal glory. But have we left anything undone that could have prevented this?"

'"No."

'"Is there anything more that we can do?"

'"You know very well, sir, that we can do no more."

'"Then now is the time to prove God; let us pray."

'So we knelt down on the deck, the men kneeling also; and amid the howling of the wind and the roaring of the waters, I poured out my soul to God, and besought Him to manifest his glory, and prove to us a "refuge from the storm, a hiding-place from the tempest," and if it was his will, to save us.

'As we were yet speaking, God heard. The wind, which was driving us on the rocks with such fury, veered completely round, and but a very short time had elapsed when our ship was standing off the rocks, with her head out to sea. We were saved.

'Ah, yes!' continued Mr. A., 'He is the same Jesus still that arose and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, "Peace, be still."'

That night, at worship, we sang Mr. A.'s favourite chant, and never before did it to me seem so full of meaning:—

They who descend to the sea in ships,
Who prosecute business in many waters:
These behold the works of Jehovah,
Even his wonders in the deep.
He speaketh, and raiseth the spirit of the tempest,
And He exalteth the waves thereof.
They climb into the heavens, they sink into the abyss,
Their soul is melted because of trouble;
They reel and stagger like a drunken man,
And all their wisdom is swallowed up.
Then they cry unto Jehovah in their trouble,
And out of their affliction He delivereth them.
He maketh a tempest a calm,
And the waves thereof are still;
Then they rejoice because of the stillness.
When He hath brought them to the haven of their wishes,
Let them praise Jehovah for his mercy,
And his wonders wrought in favour of men.
And let them exalt Him in the assembly of the people,
And in the counsel of the elders let them extol Him.

THE PRAYER OF THE WEARY CHILD.

'Father, I am so tired. . . . It is time; let us rest.'—Last words of Olivia A. P.

'FATHER, I am tired!'
Was there no meaning there?
The lips that moved unconsciously—
The eyes upraised that did not see—
Was it mere motion—empty air?
Or was it prayer?

'Now let us rest!'
Was it an accident?
The unmeant sweep of angel wings
Across abandoned lyre strings,
While she, unheeding, upward went,
On heaven bent?

'Father, I am tired!'
Ah! there was meaning there!
The spirit, waiting, weary spake;
Waiting for cord by cord to break;
Wearied by waiting, still bound here.
It was a prayer.

'Now let us rest!'
Call these mere wanderings?
The first pearls, found by pearly gate,
And dropped to us who weary wait!
The first notes, as she upward wings,
An angel sings!

Through all the earth there sounds a dirge,
Beating, beating like the surge;
A melancholy, changeless rhyme
Against the shores of Time:

Tired, O God! O Father, tired we!
When shall we rest from toil? when find surcease?
When shall we cease to suffer? when find peace?
Tired, O God!

Tired, O God! Tired of seeking Thee
Through heathen myths, to find no FATHER there;
Through reason's maze, to find no place for prayer!
Tired, O God!

Tired, O God! Tired of leaving Thee:
Of finding but to wander from Thee; then
To toil, and weep, and toil to come again!
Tired, O God!

Tired, O God! O FATHER, tired we!
When shall we find Thee, never to remove?
When shall we see Thee, evermore to love?
Tired, O God! waiting to rest in Thee.

'Father, I am tired!'
Was there no meaning then?
'Twas human nature issuing there,
Through lips half-sealed, its last sad prayer,
One sigh of earth—and never then
To sigh again.

'Now let us rest!'
It was the voice of earth—
No, no—the voice of heaven—of each!
Words first—last; living—dying speech;
All hail to heaven!—farewell to earth!
A death—a birth.

W. P. L.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Cor. xvi. 13, 14.

Here are five closing words of warning and counsel to the saints of Corinth. If they, who were 'enriched in all utterance and in all knowledge,' and who 'came behind in no gift,' needed such words, how much more we!

I. Watch ye.—The servant takes up the master's words,—for these are specially Christ's words; and of the twenty-one times that they occur in the New Testament, twelve are in the Gospels. The Lord saw that his church would need such a word as her watchword and motto. Our tendency is to be off our guard, to fall asleep; therefore we are exhorted to watch. We are to watch against things both within and without. We are to watch constantly; one unwatchful hour may work unspeakable evil, to ourselves and to others. Were a pilot to fall asleep at the helm, or the keeper of the lighthouse, or the engine-man on one of our expresses, what would be the consequences? We are to watch—(1.) Against ourselves; our unbelief, our carnality, our indolence, our selfishness, our covetousness, our bad temper, our vanity, our worldliness. (2.) Against the world; its errors, its follies, its gaieties, its temptations, its open sins, its novels, its theatres, its ball-rooms, its parties of pleasure, its idle companionships. (3.) Against Satan; his sophistries, wiles, delusions, arguments, fiery darts. Against all these there must be vigorous, honest, brave, incessant, uncompromising watchfulness. No truce with the enemies of Christ; no friendship with the seed of the serpent; no alliance with this present evil world.

II. Stand fast in the faith.—The word here is simply 'stand,' maintain your position; and the stress is laid on 'the faith,' the things most surely believed. The exhortation takes for granted that we have believed; and it calls on us to adhere to the truths which we have thus received. It is not of the quantity or quality of our own faith that the apostle is speaking, but of the excellency, and fulness, and trueness, and sufficiency of the things believed. For it is out of these, and not out of our own acts of faith, that we extract all the peace, and strength, and holiness to which we are called by the gospel. This 'standing' is not founded on ignorance, but on knowledge. It is intelligent and reasonable. It is not obstinacy, nor crotchety adhesion to one's own notions. It is large-minded, large-hearted cleaving to what is revealed, and so ascertained to be true—divinely true. 'Stand fast' in these days, when so many are falling, or stumbling, or departing from the foundation. 'Stand fast,' but be sure that it is in 'the faith'—the old apostolic faith. The church's creed is not moveable, but fixed; for it is made up of the truth of the unchanging God, not of the opinions of man or the speculations of the age.

III. Quit you like men.—This literally means, 'Be men,' or 'Be manly;' very different from 'muscular' or materialized Christianity. Your creed is the creed of men, not of babes; so let your walk and bearing be,—your whole life, your conversation, your recreations, your literature, your tones and looks. No cant, no whining, no simpering, no effeminacy, no sentimentalism. Let all about you be erect and manly. Be manly, yet calm; be manly, yet gentle; be manly, yet polite and courteous. A true Christian should be the manliest of men. Such was Paul, such was John, such was Peter. Such was Knox, and Calvin, and Luther. Men walking in the footsteps of these should be, in the best sense of the word, 'masculine.' No duplicity, no shuffling, no insincerity. Well wrote the poet: 'There are no tricks in plain and simple faith.' God's design in conversion, and the Holy Spirit's work in indwelling, is to make us thoroughly what God, when creating us, meant us to be,—men, true men, in dignity, in integrity, in nobleness of bearing, whether of soul or body. I remember the remark of one regarding a young man newly converted: he said 'his conversion had improved his very gait, and given him a free and noble bearing, which he had not before.' So let it be with us. Popish saints are all pictured as hanging the head to one side, looking demurely on the ground: so let us not be; but erect, looking upward with joyous, stedfast eye.

IV. Be strong.—The word denotes vigour and power, whether of soul or body. It is the word used of John: 'The child grew, and waxed strong in spirit' (Luke i. 80). It is the word used of Jesus: 'The child grew, and waxed strong in spirit' (Luke ii. 40). We are to be strong in every way and in every sense: strong in mind, strong in will, strong in purpose, strong in faith. Not feeble, cowardly, compromising, yielding, vacillating, changeable, timid, and afraid to face danger, or difficulty, or toil, or loss, or shame. A true saint is no coward; no mere soldier on parade, but ever ready for the field; not turning back in the day of battle. Christian strength is a real thing. Christian vigour is one of those things by which we glorify God. Christian bravery is that in which we are true followers of primitive saints, of martyrs, reformers, covenanters, and confessors. While men deride us as professors of the 'soft theology,' let us show to all what true strength is,—enduring hardness, and fearing no foe.

V. Let all your things be done with charity.—Solomon's exhortation is: 'Whatsoever thine hand findeth to do, do it with thy might;' Paul's is, 'with charity.' Both must be remembered. The love and the might must go together. Let love pervade everything, even your strongest words and most energetic deeds. The one need not exclude the other; nay, they mutually help: the love makes the might the mightier, and the might makes the love more loving. Love one another. Love the brethren. Love all men. Let us go forth each day in love to work the works and speak the words of God. Let all men see that we love, and that the love of God reigneth within. Watch, stand fast, be men, be strong; yet, above all, be loving! This is the best of gifts, the more excellent way. We have been loved, let us love. Let us put away all hatred, strife, variance, malice, envy, wrath, unbrotherliness. Let us be kindly affectioned one to another. Let love make us brave, true, fervent, liberal, noble; yet not soft, timid, effeminate, childish, either in word or deed.

WITHOUT THE GATE.*

SONG OF SOLOMON v. 2–vi. 3.

THE place assigned to her whose varying experiences are the subjects of this Song, was not the city. There, man had collocated his strength, and stamped the impress of his own name; that, therefore, was not the place designed for her, whose distinctive blessing was companionship with her rejected Lord. Like Him, she was called 'to go without the gate, bearing his reproach.' She was to find the place of her rest and her occupation far away from man's city; in the vineyards or at the sheepfolds, or in some 'garden enclosed,' where plants of heavenly fragrance could be trained by her for the Lord.

In the previous chapter, we find her in one of her highest positions of honour and blessing. We see her encompassed by plants of pleasant fragrance that had sprung up under the culture of her hand—herself rejoicing in the presence of her Lord, and acknowledged by Him as one that was ministering to his joy. She had asked Him to come into his garden, and He had come and tasted of its honeycomb, and spices, and pleasant fruits. He had commended her, and they had rejoiced together.

But now, how changed the scene! She had forsaken the sheepfold, and the vineyard, and the garden; she was no longer a sojourner 'without the gate;' she had wandered into the city, and found her way into one of its palaces; she had encompassed herself with its delicacies (for she speaks of her fingers dropping with sweet-smelling myrrh), and there she had lain down to rest. Her pilgrim-garb was laid aside. She was no longer the despised shepherdess, or the keeper of the vineyards, but rather a princess, treading delicately kings' courts. She no longer said, as once she had done, 'Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest, where Thou makest thy flock to rest at noon; for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?' Her companionship with her Lord had ceased, and she sought not to renew it. He still remained unsheltered—'his head filled with dew, and his locks with the drops of the night;' whilst she was resting, or seeking to rest, in the midst of luxuries and refinements which could never have been hers, unless she had abandoned the true place of her service, and had ceased to be a sojourner 'without the gate.'

'I sleep, but my heart waketh.' Such was her apology—such the plea by which she would fain have hidden from herself, as well as excused to others, the truth of her condition. But why this difference between her outward circumstances and her inward feelings? Was it needful? Was it right? And could such discrepancy continue? Would the heart long remain wakeful, if the eye and the ear ceased to watch, and the hand to act? And even if the heart could so watch, what use would there be in such vigilance, if no outward development followed? Who would credit her tale respecting her heart's wakefulness, if all surrounding circumstances contradicted her saying, and proved that her activity had wholly given place to slumber? Yet, false as is the plea, it is one by which believers have not unfrequently deceived themselves; until their slumber has become so deep as to preclude the possibility of arousing them even to a sense of the delusion.

She, however, whose history we are here considering, was not to be allowed to sink into such depth of slumber. Her course was to be arrested. She was speedily to be summoned from her resting-place, and brought back to the side of her Lord; for her heart had not yet so lapsed as to be altogether deaf to his voice, or indifferent to its call. Accordingly, when He drew nigh and knocked at the closed door—the door which herself had closed against Him; as soon as she heard his call, as the call of one who was seeking for himself shelter from the cold and darkness and dew of night, she instantly recognised his well-known voice. 'It is the voice,' said she, 'of my Beloved that knocketh.' Yet she was slow, and even reluctant, to unlock the closed door. 'I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?' Such were the words with which, at first, she responded to his call. Was it that she was really unwilling to reassume, for a brief moment, the garment she had put off? Did she really fear that her feet, which she had washed, would be defiled by crossing, for a moment, the chamber of her luxury? Or, did her heart tell her that if her Lord entered that chamber, He would refuse to share with her the shelter she had chosen, and would surely summon her from it; and that thus, drawn from her resting-place, she too would have to say that her 'head also was filled with dew, and her locks with the drops of the night?' Conscience is quick, under certain circumstances, in anticipating results, though its anticipations are not unfrequently wrong; because though discerning, perhaps, the path of duty and its difficulties, it fails with equal clearness to apprehend the grace and loving-kindness which sustains in that path, and removes or overcomes its difficulties.

* From Mr. B. W. Newton's 'Occasional Papers.'

Doubtless she anticipated that she would be called away from her rest; and hence her reluctance. Yet her folly was not permitted to turn aside the persistency of his grace. He had before knocked; He now sought to open the closed door. Her heart was touched; and she arose to unlock it—her 'hands dropping with myrrh, and her fingers with sweet-smelling myrrh, upon the handles of the lock.' Here was the evidence of the luxuriousness of her rest. It was a condition very unlike that of the shepherdess whom the sun had looked upon and blackened, or that of the outcast in the vineyards, despised and spurned by her own mother's children. She opened the door, however; but it was too late. He was gone. 'I opened to my Beloved; but my Beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone; my soul failed when He spake: I sought Him, but I could not find Him; I called Him, but He gave me no answer.' Indeed, He had never designed to enter that chamber, nor to rest where she rested. He had only come there to arouse her. If she desired to find Him, she must thread her way back through the streets of that city into which she never ought to have wandered. She must again go without the gate, and seek Him there.

And she did seek Him; for her heart was really true to her Lord. She returned not to her forbidden rest; but forsaking that goodly chamber, she went forth even at that midnight hour into the dark city, helpless and alone. No voice of love greeted her, no kindly hand sustained, no friendly voice directed her. She was to be chastened, and to know many sorrows, ere she again found herself by the side of Him from whom she had wandered. 'The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me.' Such is her own narrative of her sorrows. The watchmen of man's city, and the keepers of its walls, can have no sympathy with any one who is unattracted by that city's glories, and refuses to labour for its interests—having an ear deaf to its melodies, an eye closed to its beauties. 'Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I sent? who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the Lord's servant? Seeing many things, but thou observest not; opening the ears, but he heareth not.' Such was the character of the one faithful and true Witness; and such, in measure, is the character of all who remember his example, and follow his steps; for they know that from the days of Cain and of Nimrod to the present hour, unregenerate man under Satan has been lord of the earth, and has stamped upon it the impress of his evil hand. They know, too, that in this there will be no change, except indeed for advance in rebellion, until the Lord shall be revealed in the brightness of his destroying glory. 'Human progress,' therefore, is to them only another name for the advance of unregeneracy to its doom. 'Antichrist,' 'Babylon,' 'Armageddon,' 'the wine-press of the wrath of God,' 'the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone,'—such are the names that indicate to the eye of faith the end and the goal of all present human progress. The more, therefore, the city of man strengthens itself, the more it illumines itself with brightness, the more the instructed heart trembles; for it knows what 'will be in the end thereof.' What place, then, more fearful than that held by those who are the watchmen of man's city — the strengtheners of its greatness—the defenders of its walls?

If that place had been held only by the Nimrods, and Cæsars, and Caiaphases of earth, and their servants; if the world's religiousness had always worn its Pagan or its Jewish garb, and had never assumed the profession of the name of Jesus; if none of Christ's servants had been seduced into the belief that the city of man is being gradually transformed into the city of God, the danger would not be what it at present is. But nominal Christianity has undertaken to sanctify the world's energies. It has encouraged those who give themselves, body and soul, to the advancement and glorification of man's city, and has told them that in so doing they glorify God. It has put the name of Christ upon Christ's enemies; and has striven to identify before the thoughts of men, the city of God and the city of man. And it has wonderfully succeeded. Few recognise that the relation held by the Lord Jesus and his servants the apostles towards Caiaphas and Cæsar, and all that morally characterized Jerusalem or Rome, is still the relation in which truth and its servants stand toward every system, secular or religious, that is formed by the hand or controlled by the will of unregenerate man. Doubtless the acknowledgment of this narrows greatly the path of Christ's servants; but is not the way narrow that leadeth unto life? Is the exhortation to 'go without the camp, bearing his reproach,' limited to any especial time or place? Is it not a commandment addressed to all who own the sanctifying blood of Jesus? 'Jesus, that He might sanctify the people by his own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth therefore unto Him without the camp, bearing his reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come.' Can any words more plainly mark the everlasting difference between the city of God and the city of man? And as the hour of Antichrist draws nigh, this difference becomes, not indeed more real, but more marked, every day.

We cannot wonder that they whose view is bounded by the horizon of earth should greatly glory in man's present progress. The leaders of the world's energies have not laboured in vain. The city of man grows and waxes stronger and stronger every day; and even professed servants of Christ consent to guard it, and to become the watchmen of its walls. We can well conceive how, like Nebuchadnezzar of old, they walk about upon its battlements, and look forth upon its greatness, and say, 'Is not this the city which our hands have formed, and which our skill and wisdom preserve?' Religiously and secularly they glory in it; and woe to the pilgrim stranger that comes across their path, and tells them that her Lord whom she worships, is not only distant from, but AGAINST them and it. We might expect that their wrath would wax hot against her—that they would smite and wound her; for what more hateful in their sight than such thoughts and ways and testimonies as hers? But why did she draw nigh them? Did she indeed expect to find in them sympathy, or to obtain from them direction? Did she imagine that they could tell her where to find her Lord; or that they would be willing to seek Him with her? She may, perhaps, have thought so; for when the people of God with perplexed heart and uneasy conscience find themselves treading a wrong path, surrounded too by the results of their disobedience, it is not often that they view the circumstances around them with calm sobriety of mind. Impulse and excitement for the most part rule their steps; and they earn by their own foolishness, chastisement and sorrow. So was it with her. If, commissioned by her Lord, and coming as from his side, she had met these watchmen and keepers of the city, she might have confronted them and triumphed. At any rate, she would have been sustained by his strength. But it was far otherwise now. She appeared before them not only as an alien (that she must ever have been), but as an alien, weak, sorrowful, deserted, and needing, perhaps claiming, help. Were they to be the helpers of that which they abominated? They helped her not, but they smote her.

In human life, however, they who have power and energy to act upon others, are far fewer than those who are acted on. Men for the most part are the ready subjects of others' influence. Multitudes dwell in man's city who are neither its 'watchmen,' nor 'the keepers of its walls,' but its 'daughters.' Trained under its influences, and unresistingly imbibing from their earliest years its principles, they readily receive from the institutions of society around them an abiding impress. Society prepares the mould, and their characters, like plastic clay, are formed therein. Having little ability, and less desire, to test the principles and practices that prevail around them, they find it far more easy to favour what others favour, than to incur the labour and painfulness of examination. Prosperity, success, numerical increase, popular approbation, and the like, are their tests; and anything that answers thereunto is readily accepted by them as good and true. 'Securus judicat orbis terrarum.' The universal verdict of society is, in their judgment, a sufficient warrant for truth. How can that be wrong which the whole world judges to be right? They know that it is more easy to float with the current than to struggle against it; more pleasant to consort with that which is honoured and dignified, than with that which is outcast and despised. To look too searchingly into anything is in their estimate the part of folly rather than of wisdom. They know that as the foot moves most pleasantly when it lightly skims over the ground's surface, so does the heart know least of sorrow when it thinks and feels superficially. Carelessly, therefore, they bow down before anything that educationally they have learned to reverence. When not swayed by habit, they are guided by expediency. Where the multitude leads, they follow. Such is the character of the 'daughters of Jerusalem.' They are the children of the city of man. It is their parent and their home. They love it—cleave to it—rejoice in it. Nothing is more abhorrent to their hearts than the thought of going without the gate, bearing reproach. If not sensitive to the appeals of truth, they are very sensitive to ignominy, and dread the scorn of men even more than they covet their approbation. Truth, or such portions of it as admit of being established in a place of dignity and honour, they are not unwilling to accept; but the reproach of truth they fear. Is not this the condition of myriads in Christendom now? Floating carelessly on the surface of the stream, they are the sport of every casual influence, and are thus being prepared as a ready prey for that coming hour of delusion, before whose potency none but those who have really the spirit of Christ will stand. In proportion as the bonds which have hitherto bound human society together are dissolved, and as men become more 'like unto fishes of the sea that have no ruler over them,' so will they become a more ready prey to the influence of those who will shape the world's moral course at its closing hour, and be swept into that mighty drag-net which will enclose unto perdition.

Yet, even among the daughters of 'man's city,' grace can, and does, find a remnant. Not unfrequently before had this pilgrim stranger, whom the sun had looked on and blackened, who could speak of the roes and hinds of the field, or of vineyards, or sheepfolds, or of lilies, but knew not the manners of the city, being a stranger to its palaces and its priestly courts —not unfrequently before had this wanderer found herself in the presence of the daughters of Jerusalem. Yet never before had she stood before them as now, in reproach and dishonour, smitten and wounded, and that by the guardians of their city—at a time, too, when she could no longer say that she was with her Lord, or closely following his footsteps. On the contrary, she had to confess that she had wandered from and lost Him; and she even appealed in the excitement of her harassed heart to them, as if they could tell her where to find Him whom her soul loved,—a vain and foolish appeal; for how could they direct her who knew nothing of her Lord or of his ways? Yet such often is the manner of the servants of Christ, when they have wandered from the practical place into which He seeks to separate his people. Impulsiveness and excitement give birth to great activities; but there is a want of reflectiveness—a want of sobriety of mind. There is an absence of the calm guidance of truth; and if this condition of soul continues, if Christ do not quickly bring back to the place where He feeds his separated flock with his own pure truth, the results are unspeakably sorrowful. What more disastrous than unguided or misguided energy! It is as when soldiers, abandoning their banners and their lawful leaders, rush wildly into the battle-field; or as when a torrent, having no channels prepared for its course, spreads desolation where its waters, rightly guided, would have brought fertility and fruitfulness.

It was, however, otherwise with her whose history we are here considering. Her wandering was not to be prolonged. Her Lord had come and effectually roused her from her evil slumber, and her heart was incapable of rest until she again found herself practically by his side. If she had been content with anything short of this, she would probably have linked herself in some way to the daughters of Jerusalem, and abjectly submitted to their control, and made the keepers of their walls her masters. When the people of Christ are content to remain in practical distance from their Lord, this commonly becomes their condition—a condition of degradation and debasement. With her, however, it was far otherwise. A secret hand was quickly guiding her back to her place of holy rest, and she was truly willing to follow as it led. Soon, therefore, she ceased from seeking counsel of the daughters of the city, and became to them a testifier and a guide. The praises of Him whom her heart loved were in her lips, and that not feignedly. There was fervour in her recital of his excellences—vigour in her description. It was the utterance of the heart; and although her position was not yet rectified, yet it was being rectified. She was not settling down into a place of practical distance from her Lord. Every thought, every expression, indicated that her soul was bent on recovering the place which she had lost. Her testimony, therefore, was blessed. It took effect upon the souls of those that heard. And they said at last, 'Whither is thy Beloved gone, O thou fairest among women? whither is thy Beloved turned aside? that we may seek Him with thee.'

These words are indeed notable. If the daughters of Jerusalem had merely said, We will join thee, or help thee in seeking thy Beloved, it might have been nothing more than the expression of a transient feeling which sudden emotion may produce on unstable, fickle hearts. But in that case they would not have used the words, 'O thou fairest among women.' These were indeed strange words to be found in the lips of those who, when they had once before looked on this stranger, had despised her because she had known toil and travail in the vineyard, or at the folds where she had laboured for her Lord, where the sun had scorched her and the storm beaten on her. But now, although she was not only still blackened and worn, but smitten also and wounded, and her heart restless and unhappy, she nevertheless was suddenly addressed, by those who had hitherto contemned her, as the 'fairest among women.' Her blackness had now become comeliness in their sight; her bruises were honourable; her sufferings blessed. The eye of faith was given them. Their estimate of her was changed. They viewed her as she was viewed by Him who had now become their Lord as well as hers; for none but those who have communion of heart with Him can see honour and beauty in those whom man looks on 'as the filth of the world and the offscouring of all things.' Wherever the heart's estimate is so altered as to judge that to be honour and beauty which before it accounted ignominy and vileness, there must have been a change wrought by the Spirit of the living God. And now grace had accomplished its object. She had been aroused, chastened, taught, and made in sorrow to learn the appointed lesson; yet even in the midst of that sorrow had been so favoured, so blessed, that when she returned to her Lord, she returned to Him with increase. Others had been won to discern his excellences, and to seek the place in which He loved to dwell. That place she now descried; that place she again found. 'My beloved,' she said, 'is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies.' These spices and these lilies were not found in the city. They were without the gate. There she had before rejoiced in the presence and favour of Him whom her soul loved, and there she rejoiced in Him again,—with increased apprehension of the contrast between the rest of the city, and the joys of the garden,—with increased consciousness of her need of the mercy and grace of his faithful hand. Once more we find her able to say, 'My beloved is mine, and I am his. He feedeth among the lilies.'

May we learn the lesson. May we fear even to rest in man's city; much more may we dread to be numbered among its 'watchmen.' Let us go without the gate, acting on man's city, if we can, so as to gather out of it; but showing ourselves to be not of it. If the servants of Christ give themselves over to the world, to subserve its purposes and forward its designs, they will find themselves at last like Samson in the hand of the Philistines—his eyes put out—his Nazarite separation lost—his distinctive strength departed, whilst that which yet remained to him was forced into the service of the stranger—the service of the enemies of the God of Israel.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA,

AUTHOR OF 'HELEN DUNDAS; OR, THE PASTOR'S WIFE;' 'SHADOWS OF SUNSHINE, AND OTHER TALES,' ETC. ETC.

No. I.

'THE GOD OF PATIENCE AND CONSOLATION.'

IN the broad outlines of a great trial, there have always been others who have suffered in a similar way. Do we mourn the loss of a husband or a wife, a father, a mother, a sister, or a friend?—so do others. Have we suddenly been cast down from the heights of affluence to the depths of poverty?—so have others. Are we spending our life in weariness and suffering,—lying year after year on the bed of languishing and pain?—so are others also. But if in all great trials there is a measure of similarity, are there not also details of suffering, minute touches of sorrow, which are peculiar to each alone, and which for each, as it were, individualizes the trial? And how much the loneliness these details make us feel, from their being generally so unsuspected by others, adds to the intensity of our grief.

With the outer features of a great sorrow many will sympathize; for the world is not, by any means, so unfeeling or so unkind as some suppose. But when you have tried to tell some of the little things that made the sorrow peculiarly your own, have you never been thrown back into yourself, as it were, by the friend to whom you were speaking interrupting you with words of comfort, which fell powerless on your aching heart, because you felt your friend did not know where the blow was most keenly felt, and therefore the words, which were intended to soothe, did not touch the wound? They took it for granted that they knew all, because they knew what lay near enough to the surface to be easily detected; and because they had not patience to listen to your tale, they utterly failed to comfort.

In thinking over this not long ago, I was greatly struck by the beauty and the comfort of the words, where God is called 'the God of patience and consolation' (Rom. xv. 5). Do we take all the comfort that we might, or rather that we ought, from the thought of God's patience? I never realized the exceeding preciousness of the attribute, as I did when that verse was brought to my remembrance the other day. What matter if others do not know the details of our sorrow,—if they have not time to listen to the weary heart unburdening itself? There is One beside us who will listen; He draws so near that He can hear the faintest whisper. He is so well 'acquainted with grief,' that He can rightly interpret every sigh, and tear, and groan. He does not speak; He only draws nearer still, and looks at you with such deep, such tender compassion, that you cannot resist telling Him everything, till every drop of your cup of sorrow is poured out before Him.

When that has been done,—in broken whispers, it may be, or in voiceless words,—you know, do you not, the blessed rest of having 'the God of patience' for your Friend? The having so fully told your sorrow to One who can so well understand it, has already lightened it; and now that you have nothing more to say, and while still gazing up, with the eye of faith, into that wondrous face of love, He reveals himself to you under another aspect—even as 'the God of consolation.'

With what exquisite tenderness He binds up the broken heart! With what marvellous skill He applies the promises! All images fail to give an idea of what the Lord Jesus is as 'the God of consolation.' 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you' (Isa. xlix. 15).

Wonderful words! yet a mother may forget, but the God of consolation never. A mother has other duties to perform; she must sometimes leave even a sick child; but 'the God of consolation' can be always with you,—can watch over you with an interest as undivided as if you alone required his care. He will 'water you every moment' (Isa. xxvii. 3). Through the long night-watches, when others have lain down to rest, He will be with you; for He 'neither slumbers nor sleeps' (Ps. cxxi. 4). 'Fear thou not' (Isa. xli. 10) is his encouraging command; and what a blessed reason He gives for the injunction! He does not say, 'Fear not, for you are strong;' or, 'Fear not, for sorrow shall not touch you.' Better far, He says, 'Fear not, for I am with thee.' And no matter how high the waves of sorrow may roll, or how hot the furnace of affliction may burn, when 'the God of consolation' is with us, no evil can happen to us; for what would be evil without Him, by a wondrous alchemy becomes changed into good with Him. Well and cheerily, then, may we echo the Psalmist's words: 'I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me' (Ps. xxiii. 4).

But when we have thus learned something of what the Lord Jesus can be as 'the God of patience and consolation,' does He not lead us on a step higher? I think He does; and that we may learn it from Luke x. 34, where we find Him, under the figure of the good Samaritan, pouring oil and wine into the wounds of the man who had fallen amongst thieves. You observe it was oil first,—oil, to soothe, to comfort, to refresh; and then, when that had done its work, wine,—wine, the very emblem of joy and gladness: 'Wine that maketh glad the heart of man' (Ps. civ. 15). Do you feel faint and exhausted from the heavy pressure of your sorrow? then the wine which the Lord will give shall alike cheer and invigorate, for 'the joy of the Lord is your strength' (Neh. viii. 10).

Have you not experienced the truth of this? Have you not felt the tender consideration, the wonderful wisdom, of the way in which the Lord has dealt with you in sorrow?—not giving joy first, and then consolation, and then patience. Oh, no; for 'He knoweth our frame' (Ps. ciii. 14), and is 'acquainted with grief' (Isa. liii. 3); but He gives patience first, and then consolation, and then joy.

But it may be that, to some one who reads these pages, He may have seen it needful, for some wise and loving purpose, which shall be revealed hereafter, to send a sorrow so deep and so lasting, that, though ever making himself known to you as 'the God of patience and consolation,' He rarely holds the cup of joy to your lips. Shall that draught, then, never be yours? Oh, yes, it shall. It shall be yours when all need for patience and consolation has for ever passed away. When the last tear shall have been wiped away by the hand once pierced for you, then you shall drink of the new wine that Jesus has promised, when you sit down with Him in the kingdom of the Father (Matt. xxvi. 29). Then you shall have the fulness of joy, only to be found in the immediate presence of Him, at 'whose right hand there are pleasures for evermore' (Ps. xvi. 11).

'DOING HIS PLEASURE.'

So once again you are laid upon a bed of sickness,—quite shut out, and that for an indefinite time, from the active work you so dearly loved. I well know how keenly you are feeling the trial, and how, as the loved ones around you set out on their several ways day after day, you long to join them; and because you cannot do so, you feel useless, and, as a necessary consequence, depressed; for your heart's desire is to 'bring forth much fruit, to the glory of the Father' (John xv. 8).

Perhaps, if we look somewhat more deeply into the subject, we shall find that, although shut out from what is called active work on your sick-bed, you are not therefore by any means necessarily precluded from 'bringing forth much fruit.' I am sure you will agree with me that all work is not service; but only that work which God has prepared for you, and gives you to do—that, and that only, is service; and it is when doing that, and that only, that you are 'doing his pleasure.' And surely all will agree that the object of all work is, or ought to be, the doing God's pleasure, whatever that pleasure may be. In your own household, for instance, you have chosen a particular person to be cook, because you believed her to be especially qualified for that business. You have chosen another to be housemaid, for the same reason; another to be your own maid; and so on. While each of these keeps to her own business, all goes on well; but if the housemaid thought she could do more for you as cook, and meddled in a business she was unfitted for, I think you would not thank her for interfering in your plans, however hard she might have worked. Would you not tell her that you were the best judge of what each of your servants should do; that mere hard work did not constitute service, but only that particular work you had appointed for her; and that only by doing that, whether it was great or small, could she 'do your pleasure;' or, in other words, either serve or please you? And is it not just so in God's household—the church? He 'divideth to every man severally as He will' (1 Cor. xii. 11), and 'giveth not account of any of his matters' (Job xxxiii. 13). To one He may give the service of being a missionary; to another He may give the power that tells on the masses, as He did to Wesley and Whitfield in olden days; to another, such faith in pleading the promises, that, wherever they go, heaven seems to rain down a blessing. To some, the path on which they are to walk for life seems plainly indicated almost at their first step heavenward; while to others—and they form, I believe, an immense majority—guidance is only given day by day, just as they say, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' And if, in simple, childlike faith, we asked this question, morning by morning, of our heavenly Father, I believe that not only would our hearts be filled with a peace, and joy, and rest, to which they would otherwise be strangers; but also, that if we were all day long watching for the answer, and were given grace to do that, and only that, which God would have us do, we should accomplish an amount of service, and bring forth an amount of fruit, that we could neither accomplish nor bear in any other possible way.

Do not for a moment suppose that, if you were strong and well, you could glorify God far more than you can now that his hand has laid this sickness upon you. Think how precious his own glory must be to Him; how continually it is given as a reason for his mighty acts! (See Isa. xlii. 8, xliii. 7, xlviii. 11.) How often is his name or his glory used as the very strongest and most unanswerable plea in urging a request! As we hear Daniel pleading: 'O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for thine own sake, O my God: for thy city and thy people are called by thy name' (Dan. ix. 19; see also Josh. vii. 8, 9). You may well, then, trust God to take care of his own glory, and believe that, having infinite wisdom and infinite power, as well as infinite love, He has placed you in the very position, and surrounded you with the very circumstances, where you can best promote his glory.

There is most perfect rest in the full realizing of this blessed truth. And a change of work is not idleness. True, you cannot go out and work; but cannot God bring work to you even in your sick-room? If from your heart you are enabled to give up your own will,—to cease saying, 'I want to do this or that,' and simply to say, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?'—you will marvel at the answers that will come; and is not work doubly precious that comes so direct from God, as all such work must do?

But supposing you are too ill, or too suffering, to be able to do anything for others, except pray for them,—or, it may be, not even to do that,—you are not necessarily idle. The tiny child is not idle as she sits on her mother's knee, learning her little verse or hymn, or listening eagerly to 'the sweet story of old.' And you are not idle as you sink down, wearily it may be, but trustfully, on the everlasting arms, and, yielding up your own will for active service, just look up at your Saviour. Ah! is it not thus that you are to grow like Him—thus that you are to be transformed into his image? (2 Cor. iii. 18.) Can any other work so rejoice the heart of God, as that of one of his people growing more and more like Jesus? Does any other work bring Him such glory as this? Can we believe that any fruit is so precious to Him as that which is so emphatically called the fruit of the Spirit, and which is 'love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance?' (Gal. v. 22, 23.) And there is not one ingredient, if we may use the expression, in this fruit that may not be borne in sickness and in sorrow.

Do you say, There is no joy for me? Not earthly joy, it may be; but, as the stars shine brightest when the light of day has faded, so, in the hour of deepest sorrow, may not the Christian say, 'Yet'—notwithstanding all that has happened, all that may happen—'yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation?' (Hab. iii. 18.) There is no sorrow so great, or so deep, in which God cannot mingle cause for rejoicing. We are not wont, it is true, to sing in the night; but God can, and, if we ask Him, He will, 'put a new song into our mouth, even praise unto our God' (Ps. xl. 3). And He himself says, 'Whoso offereth praise, glorifieth me' (Ps. l. 23). But besides joy, think what opportunities of bearing fruit God has placed within your reach, in the exercise of love, peace, gentleness, etc. etc. Oh! seek to bear much of such fruit, that, when you hear the Beloved praying that the north wind and the south may blow upon his garden, that the spices thereof may flow out, you may be able to answer in the words of the Bride, 'Let my Beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits' (Song iv. 16).

But perhaps the greatest comfort a child of God can have, when set apart from active work by sickness, or by other circumstances, is the contemplation of our blessed Saviour's own life on earth. He was only thirty-three years old when He died on the cross; and for thirty years out of the thirty-three, He was what many, in these busy days, would probably call idle. Though his power was as great, and his love as tender as afterwards, yet, during those thirty years, He did not perform one single miracle. He must surely have met many a widow as sorrowful as her of Nain; yet He never laid his hand on the bier, and bade the dead arise. He must have known many a home left desolate, like that at Bethany; but He never put forth his power, and restored the loved one to his home again. Nay, more, souls were perishing around Him, and He did not proclaim himself to be the Saviour of sinners. He could not have loved Jerusalem less dearly then than when He wept over its coming ruin; and yet, for thirty years, He gave no invitation to its inhabitants to repent. How are we to account for this? How, but by the fact that He came from heaven, not to do his own will, but the will of Him that sent Him (John vi. 38); and to do that will, whatever it might be, was his 'meat and drink' (John iv. 34).

Think for a moment what those long years of waiting must have been to Jesus,—conscious of his power, yet so patiently waiting till his hour was come to manifest it! And then, when the hour came, how unremittingly He did work! The very interruptions, as we would call them, which occurred in his day's work, were not counted as interruptions by Him, but as indications of the Father's will, and therefore as the very best thing He could do at that particular moment.

Dear sufferer, will not the remembrance of those thirty years of our blessed Saviour's life, in which He waited to begin his work, cheer and encourage you, while you too are kept waiting? Think of Him, and follow in his steps. Look at that wonderful promise in Isa. xl. 31: 'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint.' Turn back to the 20th verse, and you will find that the very same words are applied to God himself (not, of course, as a promise, but as a fact): 'The Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not, neither is weary.' Oh, if you do but wait patiently upon God, with what renewed strength will you return to active work when your hour has come, and you hear the joyful summons, 'Go work in my vineyard to-day!' (Matt. xxi. 28.)

But perhaps it may never be the Father's will to call you to active service here. If so, do not fold your hands in despair. Say with Jesus in the garden: 'O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me;' but when you do, fail not to add, as He did, that wonderful 'nevertheless:' 'Nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done' (Luke xxii. 42). And whatever the answer to that prayer may be, remember that you can never be placed in any position, or in any circumstances, where you may not serve God by 'doing his pleasure.' Oh! see to it that you are bearing in abundance the fruit of the Spirit,—the fruit that God loves best,—the fruit that thrives and flourishes as well in the night of adversity as in the day of prosperity.

Remember also that this life is only, as it were, our school-time,—the time in which the Great Teacher is training us for the life to come. He trains each child differently; but with all, everything He does has reference to eternity. By this prolonged suffering He may be training you in the only way He could train you for your work in heaven. There is no idleness there: 'They rest not day and night' (Rev. iv. 8). And again, 'His servants shall serve Him,'—serve Him without let or hindrance from sickness or from sorrow,—serve Him by doing his pleasure, and his pleasure only, without flaw or imperfection. Yes; there they 'shall serve Him day and night in his temple' (Rev. vii. 15).

PHILIP AND HIS BIBLE.

You wonder why it is that, when you ask God for a strictly spiritual blessing,—for something that you are quite sure He would wish you to have,—for something, in fact, that He has promised to give to those that ask for it,—that He so often delays a long time before He actually gives it.

May it not be, that though the blessing you ask for is in itself good, yet that for you, and in your particular circumstances, something better still may be gained by the delay? God may wait to give you what is good, till, by something being added to it, it becomes better, or the best. Perhaps the following parable will explain my meaning more clearly.

'Mother,' said little Philip one morning, 'this day month you promised to give me half-a-crown to buy a Bible. I know you never forget anything,' he added, as if half ashamed of what he had said; 'but you told me that I might remind you of it in a month, and it is a month this very day.'

'I thought of it this morning as I was dressing, dear,' replied Mrs. Somerville; 'I hoped you would remember it. Do you know why I kept you waiting a whole month, and desired you to remind me of my promise at the end of it?'

'No, mother,' said Philip, 'I do not know; but I am quite sure you had a good reason for it, and that you were not afraid you would forget.'

His mother smiled as she said, 'No, I was not afraid I should forget; and I am very glad you trusted my love enough to be sure I had a good reason for making you wait. A month is a long time for a little boy like you to wait for anything; and I wanted to find out if you were really anxious for the Bible, or that it was only a passing fancy. I knew that, if you really wished for it, you would think of it so often that you would not fail to remember it when the day came round.'

'I am sure I thought of it nearly a hundred times a day,' said Philip energetically. 'I used even to dream about it sometimes; and when I used to get tired of waiting, and wonder why you did not give it to me at once, I used just to think how wise you were, and how much you loved me, and then it did not seem hard. And now I am very glad I had such a long wait, for I am sure I shall enjoy my Bible twice as much as I would have done if you had given it to me at once.'

'I am sure you will,' replied his mother; 'and besides, if I had given it to you the very first moment that you asked for it, you would have missed the lessons of trust and patience that I hope you have learned; and, my boy, you do not know how I rejoice with my whole heart to see you learn such lessons. God grant you may never forget them! Now,' she continued, taking half-a-crown out of her purse, 'here is the half-crown that I promised. I will shut it up in my hand, and try if you can get it out.'

A shade of disappointment passed over Philip's face, but it faded away in a moment; for no matter what Mrs. Somerville did, Philip was always sure that it was right; so, kneeling down beside her, he made a violent effort to open her hand.

'Gently, gently, darling,' said his mother; 'you will never open it that way. Go quietly about it, and you will have a much better chance of success.'

Again he tried, and again he failed. Somewhat disheartened, he glanced up at his mother's face. She was looking so lovingly and encouragingly at him, that he felt she wished him to succeed. This gave him fresh courage. Though so much stronger than he was, he knew she would not use that strength against him, but would only use it to teach him a lesson of perseverance, as she had already taught him one of trust and patience.

Once more he looked up at the loving face, and then tried again to open her hand. Very gently he went to work, trying to squeeze one of his little fingers between hers. She saw that the lesson had been learned. One by one her fingers relaxed, her hand opened, and in joyful triumph Philip held up the half-crown.

Was the mother less happy than the child?

THE BALL-ROOM.

LET us inquire now if it is consistent for Christians to teach their children that which is so inconsistent for themselves. The precepts of the gospel are here also to be our guide. They are binding, not only in some relations, but in every relation you sustain. And not in a part merely, but in all these relations you are connected with the church of Christ. As a Christian parent you are bound to Christ. In this very relation you are in covenant with Christian brethren. And not only is the church deeply interested in the spiritual welfare of your children, but the dearest interests of other Christian families will be vitally affected by the manner in which you train your own. It is clear, then,

1. That what has the 'appearance of evil' in yourself, will have the same appearance when allowed to your children. Although the indulgence be not your own, the approval of it is. If there is evil in the one case, there is in the other. For approval of sin, is sin. So it appears to Christian brethren. So it appears to their children. So it appears to other parents, who profess to be bound by no such holy precepts as you acknowledge. Some of them fear to follow with their children where you lead yours. They cannot believe that dancing is any part of 'the nurture and admonition of the Lord.' Oh think, Christian parent. Pause, and pray long and earnestly, and you will never consent that a child of yours shall be seen in a ball-room. 'Their children dance,' is a characteristic, not of Christian families, but of those asking, 'What is the Almighty, that we should serve Him?'

2. Brethren are grieved when you teach your children that which grieves them when done by yourself. It may affect them even more deeply. Their families may be influenced more by the example of your children than by your own. What can inflict a deeper wound upon a Christian father's heart, than your allowance of sinful amusements to your family? His children point to it in their importunity. They tell him that you are a church-member. He must yield, or, by refusing, be compelled to seem severe and bigoted. He must be silent, or reply that your example is unworthy a Christian parent. This is the torturing dilemma into which you bring other parents. Some have yielded, and fallen into sin. Others have stood firm, while their children have broken away from parental control to follow yours, and been ruined.

Oh, could all the sorrows of a single mother's heart be whispered in your ear,—or could you follow a single youth, led thus into temptation, entering this outer edge of the whirlpool, to be borne in narrower and swifter circles, until he plunges down the boiling centre, and disappears for ever,—you would understand why a parent's heart so pleads with you now.

3. That which prevents the light of a Christian life from so shining in you as to glorify God, will do the same when taught to your children. Your example is to be not only that of a Christian, but that of a Christian parent. Training your household in the fear of God, should be one of the brightest rays of that light which is to 'shine before men.' In nothing does the grace of God more distinctly appear. In nothing can it be more easily obscured. Through you it is to shine for the guidance of other parents and households. But is dancing any part of the 'nurture and admonition' the grace of God teacheth? Does not the most thoughtless trifler with things divine know the ball-room to be a place pre-eminently 'without God'? Do not its scenes glare out upon the world as destitute of anything Christian as the most godless could wish?

But, when all this is admitted, one plea remains. It is said that, when more privately done, the evils of dancing are avoided. Were this true, can it be so done? However privately begun, can it be kept so? Are not its outward tendencies sure? The flame may be concealed when first kindled, but it will burst forth unless speedily extinguished. Set up a theatre in your own dwelling, and will not your children, true to the vitiated taste you have nourished, seek more public gratification? Indulge them in the social glass at home, and will they not seek it elsewhere? So the social dancing-party is the private entrance to all the dissipation of the ball-room. How often, by this deceptive process, do parents draw forth a passion they cannot control, and which, 'when it is finished, bringeth forth death.' When will they learn, that the end over which they mourn is but the natural consequence of the beginning they approved. It is like giving your children poison, and then weeping in bitterness over them as they are seen sick and dying.

How many are pained that their children are so thoughtless of God! But why should they not be thoughtless? What are the influences thrown around the youthful heart, just when there is most hope of its being drawn to Christ, and yet most danger of its being hopelessly hardened? How are all the thoughts engrossed in preparation for the gay assembly! What feverish excitement while in it! When it is passed, how is the heart sealed against serious reflection! By a succession of these scenes, though separated by long intervals, the choicest years of youth are wasted. The soul is ruined; for how often their probation and dances end together! By parental but cruel indulgence, the process was commenced. The entrance was flowery, the end shrouded in eternal darkness. A parent who does this, seems like the heathen mother—pleasing her infant with flowers, that she may drop it a smiling, and therefore a more acceptable sacrifice, into the arms of the monster opening a fiery furnace within to consume it.

Christian parent, you know not what you do when you draw out the latent passion of your child for this amusement. It may soon spurn all control or persuasion. That of the gambler is not more insatiate.

'I was once called,' says an aged pastor, 'to visit a young lady who was said to be in despair.

She had at some time previous been serious, and had, it was hoped, resolutely set her face Zionward. In an evil hour some of her former associates called on her to accompany them to a ball. She refused to go. The occasion, the company, the parade and gaiety, were all utterly dissonant from her present feelings. With characteristic levity and thoughtlessness, they employed persuasion and ridicule; and finally so far prevailed, that, with a desperate effort to shake off her convictions and regain her former security, she exclaimed, "Well, I will go, if I am damned for it!" God took her at her word. The blessed Spirit immediately withdrew his influences; and instead of the anxious sigh, and longing desire to be freed from the body of sin and death, succeeded, by turns, the calmness and the horrors of despair.

'The wretched victim knew that the Spirit had taken his final leave: no compunctions for sin, no tears of penitence, no inquiries after God, no eager seeking of the "place where Christians love to meet," now occupied the tedious hours. Instead of the bloom and freshness of health, there came the paleness and haggardness of decay. The wan and sunken cheek, the ghastly, glaring eye, the emaciated limb—the sure precursors of approaching dissolution—were there. The caresses of friends, the suggestions of affection, were all unheeded. The consolations of piety—the last resource of the miserable—were to her but the bitterness of death. In this state of mind, I was called to visit her. When I entered the room, and beheld her pale and emaciated, and reflected that the ravages of her form without but faintly shadowed forth the wreck and desolation within, I was almost overpowered. Never had I conceived so vivid an idea of the woe and misery of those who have "quenched the Spirit."

'I proposed prayer. The word threw her into an agony. She utterly refused. No entreaties of friends, no arguments drawn from the love of God, or from the fulness and freeness of atoning blood, could prevail to shake her resolution. I left her without being able to find a single avenue to her heart, or to dart one ray of comfort into the dark bosom, which, to all human view, was soon to be enveloped in the blackness of darkness for ever. Never shall I forget the dreadful expression of that ghastly countenance—the tones of that despairing voice. The impression is as vivid as though it had been but yesterday. Oh that all the young, gay, thoughtless ones, who stifle the convictions of conscience, and repress the rising sigh, and dance along the brink of utter reprobation and despair, would read, and lay to heart the warning!' Oh that every parent would ponder the awful results of cherishing a passion in the youthful bosom, which may be used by Satan and wicked associates so fearfully to ruin the soul!

An eminent divine, of great experience in the work of God's grace, was accustomed to regard the use of ardent spirits, and dancing, as two of the influences most hostile to the soul. With great solemnity he used to allude to the case of a young man, a leader in the ball-room. To shield himself from the influence of a revival, at the time in progress, he sought to multiply dancing-assemblies, and to draw others into them. But he could not escape God's judgments, if he could his mercies. He was suddenly laid upon a bed of sickness. Death seemed near. In awful distress, he begged for the mercy he had before despised. When thus borne down, hopeless of recovery, he seemed penitent, became exceeding joyful, and earnestly and solemnly warned his associates; and it was thought by pious friends a most remarkable case of death-bed conversion.

But unexpectedly he recovered. With returning health, his religion so rapidly disappeared, that the first thing he did was to persuade his associates to make arrangements for another ball. Godless as they were, they were shocked at the proposal. But his persuasion overcame their scruples. The evening came, and in the midst of the glare and revelry of its scenes he fell to the floor, as if touched by the finger of an offended God; was borne a raving maniac to his home, which he had scarcely reached, when death sealed up his history for the final judgment. The passion for dancing held firm yet concealed possession of his soul, even when death stood by, and friends supposed he had forsaken all. It had been cherished in early youth, had grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength. Oh with what agony would parental hearts have answered our inquiry, bleeding at that hour over a ruined child! Reader, may God in infinite mercy spare you from such experience; but will He, if you allow your children in that which produced it?

Had that youth died when joyful in a false hope, his passion would have been developed in eternity, beyond our sight. But God spared him, that it might be done here—a solemn warning to parents who cruelly allow a passion to be cherished in their children, which first deceives, and then throws its chains of darkness around the soul for ever.

Now, professed disciples of Jesus, our appeal is to you. The religion you profess has, for its distinctive feature, a tender regard for the good of others. As such, you are to exhibit it to the world by abstaining from the 'appearance of evil,' by giving 'no offence' to Christian brethren, and by the light of a holy example, so shining that God may be glorified. This you can never do by mingling with the world in an amusement which you must confess has the 'appearance of evil,' which your brethren assure you, with tears, most deeply grieves them, and which so certainly is not done 'to the glory of God.' It cannot be among things indifferent. If not a positive duty, the neglect of which would be sin, then the indulgence must be guilty, deeply and dreadfully so.

Beloved brethren, 'be not deceived.' Review the considerations which have been suggested in your closet. Pray that God will direct you. If dancing be a duty, implore his grace to aid you in its faithful performance. Do you hesitate? Why? Is conscience in conflict with your desires? Are there misgivings in your heart? Oh pause, reflect! Will you deliberately do that in which you cannot ask God to bless you? Wait not until the temptation comes. But now, alone with God, before you turn your eye from this appeal, decide. Let it be now fixed, changeless —a decision which will give present peace, and which shall come up in joyful remembrance at a dying hour.

Christian parent, let the heart of a parent plead with you. All the reasons for abandoning the sinful indulgence yourself, are equally clear in showing that you cannot allow it to your children and be blameless. There is a higher and holier than natural affection. What more dear to us than the souls of our children? What responsibility like this? The soul of your beloved child seems laid upon your own. With what sacred, guardian care, should it be protected from every poisonous influence! The young know not the danger of slight beginnings. We do. And shall we cruelly leave them to wind around themselves the soft and silken web, which may harden into bonds of iron upon the soul?

But you hope it will not end thus with your children. So have others hoped, who are now bowed down beneath parental sorrows. Will you, then, lead your children into temptation, in the presumptuous hope that God will save them from it? Oh plant not thus your dying pillow with thorns! Will you, as you are dying, regret that your children have been no more faithfully trained to the dance or ball-room? Or, as you close the eyes of a beloved child in death, will you have bitter reflection in the remembrance that he has been guarded from all these ruinous influences? Oh say, will not all your sorrows have a different source, and your sweetest consolation come from this? Oh then be wise—wise for yourself, and wise for your children. Let your authority and affection as a parent encircle them. Herein is a saving influence God has entrusted to your hands. Be faithful to your children now. They will hereafter rise up and call you blessed for it; and your decision to-day may be among your most precious remembrances, when Christ shall present them, with you, 'faultless before the presence of his glory, with exceeding joy.'

---

AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE.

THE mother of a family was married to an infidel, who made jest of religion in the presence of his own children; yet she succeeded in bringing them all up in the fear of the Lord. I asked her one day how she preserved them from the influence of a father whose sentiments were so opposed to her own. This was her answer: 'Because to the authority of a father I do not oppose the authority of a mother, but that of God. From their earliest years, my children have always seen the Bible upon my table. This holy book has constituted the whole of their religious instruction. I was silent, that I might allow it to speak. Did they propose a question, did they commit a fault, did they perform a good action, I opened the Bible; and the Bible answered, reproved, or encouraged them. The constant reading of the Scriptures has wrought the prodigy which surprises you.'—Rev. Adolph Monod.

A SONG FOR THE SABBATH.*

THEE will we sing, Almighty God;
This hallowed day a song doth claim.
Our souls aspire to thine abode,—
To Thee, whence life and being came.
Accept our praise, and bid it rise,
As mounts the evening sacrifice.

Thou art Jehovah—Thou alone;
Thy glory shines beyond compare.
Bright seraphim around thy throne,
Thy kingdom and thy power declare,
And 'Holy, holy, holy,' cry,
'Is God's eternal majesty!'

Ah! who can in thy presence stand?
What mortal man, by sin defiled?
Yet here we come at thy command,
For Thou art merciful and mild.
Our sins efface, our souls refine,
That we may laud thy name divine.

Thine are the heavens, with all their hosts;
Sun, moon, and stars thy name repeat:
The earth is thine, with all its coasts;
The mountains quake beneath thy feet.
The thunder is thine awful voice;
Thou smilest, and our fields rejoice.

To Thee the nations are but dust,
Like drops that from the bucket fall;
The might of kings is empty trust,
Thy frown lays low those cedars tall.
Greatness and might belong to Thee;
Let every creature bend the knee.

Eternity's thy dwelling-place.
What mortal eye such depths can scan?
Thy presence fills the realms of space;
The same ere heaven and earth began.
Our daily walk, our inmost thought,
Is marked by Thee, and ne'er forgot.

Great God, confounded we adore
Thy fathomless eternity,
And feel our nothingness still more,
When sounding thine immensity.
Thine eye so pure, what soul can flee?
We tremble, trust, and bow the knee.

Holy and just are all thy ways!
Thy works unbounded wisdom show;
Thy goodness shines, surpassing praise;
Thy mercy paints the radiant bow;
And truth eternal dwells with Thee.
Let every creature bend the knee.

Thou glorious King of Israel's seed,
Whose promises for ever stand,
From Egypt's iron bondage freed,
And planted in this goodly land;
Thy ransomed people, saved and blessed,
Thy love and faithfulness attest.

---

* From 'Ruth, an Historical Poem, by W. MACKENZIE,' etc. A volume replete with Scripture truth, and lighted up with not a few passages indicating the descriptive power of the writer.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

ROM. I. 14.

PAUL has many names for himself; none of them lofty, all of them lowly; the highest simply 'an apostle.' Sometimes it is Paul 'the servant of Jesus Christ;' sometimes Paul 'the aged;' sometimes Paul 'the prisoner;' sometimes it is 'less than the least of all saints;' sometimes 'the chief of sinners.' Here it is another—'a debtor.' It is, then, of Paul the debtor that we are to speak. It is himself that takes the name; he proclaims his debts; no man lays them to his charge; God does not accuse him. It is some profound, irrepressible feeling that leads him to cry out, 'I am debtor.'

I. To whom is he a debtor?—Not to self; not to the flesh; not to the law. He owes nothing to these. We might say he is a debtor to God, to Christ, to the cross. But these are not now in his mind. It is to Greek and Jew, wise and unwise; men of all nations; the whole fallen world,—that he feels himself a debtor. He seems to stand on some high eminence, and, looking round on all kingdoms, and nations, and tongues, with all their uncounted millions, he says, 'To all these I am debtor,' and I must pay the debt. They have done nothing for him, indeed; they have persecuted, stoned, condemned, reviled him; yet that does not alter his position or cancel his debt. Do to him what they like,—hate him, imprison him, scourge him, bind him,—he is their debtor still. His debt to them is founded on something which all this ill-usage, this malice, cannot alter. He loves them still; pities them; pleads with them; beseeches them to be reconciled to God; confesses himself to be their debtor in spite of all. We speak of the world being a debtor to Paul,—so, in one sense, it was; but, in another, Paul is a debtor to the world. Yes, a Christian is debtor to the world; not to his family only, or his nation, but to the whole world. Let this thought dwell in us, and work in us; expanding and enlarging us; elevating our vision; throwing back our horizon; delivering us from all narrow-heartedness on the one hand, and all false liberality on the other. We speak of the world being debtors to the church; let us never forget that, according to Paul's way of thinking, and to the mind of the Holy Spirit, the church is debtor to the world. Though taken out of the world, she is not to forget or despise it; but to love it, plead for it, work for it.

II. When and how he became a debtor.—Even as a Jew he was a debtor, for he possessed something which the world did not; and the moment I come into possession of something which my neighbour or my fellow-man has not, I become debtor to that fellow-man. This is God's way of reckoning, though it is not man's; for God's thoughts are not our thoughts; and it is love only that can teach us to feel and reason thus. Yet it is true reasoning; it is divine logic. It was when Paul became possessed of the unsearchable riches of Christ, that he felt himself a debtor to the world. He had found a treasure, and he could not conceal it; he must speak out; he must tell abroad what he felt. He was surrounded by needy fellow-men, in a poor, empty world: should he keep the treasure to himself? No. As the lepers of Samaria felt themselves debtors to the starving city, so did Paul to a famishing world. But there is much more than this,—a higher 'when' and 'how.' Who had done all this for him, and made him to differ? It was God—Christ Jesus. It is to God, then, that, in the first place, he feels himself an infinite debtor, in the fullest sense. To God himself he cannot pay this debt directly; but he can indirectly, by pouring out the God-given treasure upon others. His debt directly is to God; but then indirectly it is to the world. Thus the Christian man feels his debt,—his obligation to the world, because of his obligation to God. But then, a man must know that he has the treasure himself, before he can be quickened into a feeling of his responsibility to others. The love of Christ must constrain us; a sense of what we owe to Him must impel and stimulate us. Do you know yourself to be the possessor of this infinite treasure, and, under the expanding pressure of this, are you roused to feel your infinite debt to all?

III. How he pays the debt.—By carrying to them that gospel which he had received. That gospel, or the gift which that gospel reveals, has enriched himself infinitely: he takes these riches to others; and so he endeavours to pay his debt to God by enriching the world. He goes to Corinth,—doing what? Paying there part of his infinite debt. He goes to Athens, to Thessalonica, to Rome,—doing what? Paying in each place part of the infinite debt which he owes to God for his love, his pardon, and the hope of the glory. He is a rich man, and can afford to give!

We pay our debt—

(1.) By making known the gospel to others.—Speak out the glad tidings wherever you go. You are debtors; thus pay the debt.

(2.) By prayer for others.—We can reach millions by prayer, otherwise inaccessible to us. Pray for others; not your own circle only, but the world. Go round the world. Embrace all nations in your intercessions.

(3.) By our givings.—In giving, let us remember what we are doing—paying our debt to God. Show your sense of his love, his gifts, by your generosity.

(4.) By our consistent life.—This, at least, is expected of us. Do not misrepresent the gospel.

Yes, you are debtors to all. Show that you feel this. Be constrained by a loving sense of your infinite obligations and responsibilities to Him that loved you. Pity the poor world around you. Cherish love to every soul you meet with, even in passing hastily along. Try to do something for the worst. Say in reference to such an one, 'I am that man's debtor; and I am so because Christ loved me, and gave himself for me!'

THE GOOD NEWS CONCERNING THE ONE SACRIFICE.

BY THE EDITOR.

IT is blood whose shedding has provided a propitiation for sin; and whosoever will consent to take this as his propitiation, becomes partaker of the blessings which it contains. It was the high priest's laying of his hand upon the goat that established the connection between it and the people, so that Israel's sins passed over to the substitute; and so it is our believing that connects us with the Divine Substitute, and brings to us all the benefits of the divine blood-shedding.

It is our unbelief that intercepts the communication; it is faith that establishes it. Faith may seem a slight thing to some; and they may wonder how salvation can flow from believing. Hence they try to magnify it, to adorn it, to add to it, in order that it may appear some great thing, something worthy of having salvation as its reward. In so doing, they are actually transforming faith into a work, and introducing salvation by works, under the name of faith. They show that they understand neither the nature nor the office of faith. It saves, simply by handing us over to the Saviour. It saves, not on account of the good works which flow from it, not on account of the love which it kindles, not on account of the repentance which it produces, but solely because it connects us with the Saving One. Its saving efficacy does not lie in its connection with righteousness and holiness, but entirely in its connection with the Righteous and Holy One.

Thus it is that unbelief ruins, because it cuts off all communication with the source of life; and thus faith blesses, because it establishes that communication.

See these electric wires that are shooting their mysterious threads throughout our land, communicating between city and city, between man and man, however distant; dead, yet instinct with life; silent, yet vocal with hidden sound; carrying, as with a lightning burst, the tidings of good or evil from shore to shore. Separate their terminating points by one hair's breadth from the index, or interpose some non-conducting substance,—in a moment intercourse is broken. No tidings come and go. The stoppage is as entire as if you had cut every wire in pieces, and cast these pieces to the winds. But refasten the severed points, or link them to the index with some conducting material, and instantaneously the intercourse is renewed. Joy and sorrow flow again along the line. Men's thoughts, men's feelings, men's deeds, rumours of war or assurances of peace, news of victory or defeat, the sound of falling thrones, the shouts of frantic nations,—all hurrying on after each other to convey to ten thousand throbbing hearts the evil or the good which they contain!

That non-conductor is unbelief. It interposes between the soul and all heavenly blessing, all divine intercourse. It may seem a thing too slight to effect so great a result; yet it does so inevitably. It shuts off the communication with the source of all glad tidings. It isolates the man, and forbids the approach of blessing.

That conductor is faith. In itself it is nothing, but in its connection everything. It restores in a moment the broken communication; and this, not from any virtue in itself, but simply as the conducting link between the soul and the fountain of all blessing above.

The blood of the cross is that which has 'made peace;' and to share this peace God freely calls us. This blood of the cross is that by which we are justified; and to this justification we are invited. This blood of the cross is that by which we are brought nigh to God; and to this blessed nearness we are invited. This blood of the cross is that by which we have redemption, even the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace; and this redemption, this forgiveness, is freely set before us. It is by this blood that we have liberty of entrance into the holiest; and God's voice to each sinner is, 'Enter in.' It is by this blood that we are cleansed and washed; and this fountain is free, free as any of earth's flowing streams, free as the mighty ocean itself, in which all may wash and be clean.

These are good news concerning the blood,—news which should make every sinner feel that it is just what he stands in need of. Nothing less than this; yet nothing more.

And these good news of the blood are no less good news of Him whose blood is shed. For it is by this blood-shedding that He is the Saviour. Without this He could not have been a Redeemer; but, with it, He is altogether such a Redeemer as suits the sinner's case. In Him there is salvation, —salvation without a price,—salvation for the most totally and thoroughly lost that this fallen earth contains. Go and receive it.

Do you ask, How am I to find salvation, and how am I to go to that God, on the blood of whose Son I have trampled so long? I answer, Go to Him in your proper and present character —that of a sinner. Go with no lie upon your lips, professing to be what you are not, or to feel what you do not. Tell Him honestly what you are, and what you feel, and what you do not feel. 'Take with you words;' but let them be honest words, not the words of hypocrisy and deceit. Tell Him that your sin is piercing you; or tell Him that you have no sense of sin, no repentance, no relish for divine things, no right knowledge of your own worthlessness and guilt. Present yourself before Him just as you are, and not as you wish to be, or think you ought to be, or suppose He desires you to be. Recount your necessities; make mention of the multitude of his mercies; point to the work of the blessed Son; remind Him how entirely righteous it would be for Him to receive and bless you. Appear before Him, taking for granted just that you are what you are, a sinner; and that Christ is what He is, a Saviour; deal honestly with God, and be assured that it is most thoroughly impossible that you can miss your errand. 'Seek the Lord while He may be found;' and you will see that He is found of you. 'Call upon Him while He is near;' and you will find how near He is.

But tarry not, for the day is fast closing, and the thick gloom of evening is at hand. The last 'woes' are preparing, and the gates of the kingdom shall ere long be shut. The acceptable year of the Lord is running out, and the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Trifle not with your brief remaining span or inch of hasty time.

This earth shall soon shake beneath the footsteps of its coming Judge. Its hills and rocks must soon echo with the sound of the final trumpet. And therefore it concerns men, without delay, to be securing the shelter ere the storm be up. When once the wrath of the Lamb is kindled, who shall escape, save those who are sprinkled with his blood? It is an eternal doom that is preparing for the ungodly, and the time that remaineth is short in which the sinner may escape. He has no moments to fling away; for that which he flings away may be his last.

Fool! when wilt thou be wise? Thou art wise for time, and not for eternity. Dost thou not see these thunder-clouds? Dost thou not hear the wild tumult of earth, the cry of nations, the shock of falling empires, the crumbling sound throughout the earth that speaks of universal dissolution and ruin? What are these things? The work of chance? A passing earthquake? The burst of frenzy for an hour? No. They are signs of gathering wrath. It is God coming down to smite the guilty earth,—that earth upon whose surface your feet are treading.

Are you ready for his arrival? Are all matters of variance between you and Him adjusted? And has your reconciliation been sealed by the blood of the Lamb?

If not, how shall you meet his eye? How shall you abide his awful scrutiny? That scrutiny will comprise much. Nay, it will omit nothing; its minuteness and exactness will overwhelm you. But the most solemn part of it will be that touching the blood of the Son of God, and the good news respecting it which have been so long proclaimed to you. These good news have found no entrance, and the messenger who brought them has been denied all access day by day. Instead of prizing this blood, and making use of it for your cleansing, you have slighted it; and in slighting it, you have slighted Him whose blood it is—Him through whose death there is life for you. And shall not the Lord visit you for such deliberate rejection of his grace? shall not his soul be avenged for such neglect of his 'great salvation?'

EARLY PROTESTANTISM.

I.—DOLCINO—DANTE.

ITALIAN unity, so long regarded by modern diplomacy as a dream impossible of realization, was for ages the aspiration of Italian patriots; and it was almost invariably associated by them with a reform of the church, and the abolition of the Pope's temporal power. Centuries before the light of the Reformation dawned upon Europe, the ideas which a Passaglia and a Reali have promulgated in our own day were struggled for and suffered for by priests and monks, boldly maintained by scholar and by poet, and valiantly fought for by the Italian people. Civil liberty and the purification of the church were the great objects of Arnold of Brescia in the middle of the twelfth century, and of Jerome Savonarola at the close of the fifteenth. Both of these reformers strove for the emancipation of their countrymen from a twofold slavery—the bondage of civil and religious tyranny. The efforts of each were in one sense local, but their influence was widely felt; and ever and anon these opinions found expression,—not unmingled, it is true, with gross and dangerous delusions, but always more or less effective as a protest against the pride, the rapacity, and the uncleanness of the Papal hierarchy.

It would seem to have been a natural consequence of the means by which the temporal power of the Papacy was supported and extended, that almost all the revolutions which threatened it were preceded by formidable revolutionary movements within the spiritual pale of the church. The Roman Republic which arose from the teachings of Arnold of Brescia was heralded, so to speak, by the revived monastic spirit on the one hand, and the bold scepticism of Abélard on the other. The more brilliant attempt made by Rienzi, in the fourteenth century, to revive the independence of Rome, to re-establish her ancient republican institutions, and place her at the head of a united Italy, was also preceded by violent tumults within the church, determined resistance to its authority, and loud denunciations of its misused temporal power. Those years, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, which saw the persecution of the Templars, and the extinction of their chivalric order by the rapacious Philip the Fair, and the voluptuous Pope Clement V., saw also the rise of a powerful sect of religious enthusiasts, whose fanaticism took the form, not only of discontent with the avarice of the prelates, but of doctrines hostile to the entire hierarchical system. These formidable sectaries, connected with the mendicant orders, and best known, perhaps, by the name of Spiritual Franciscans, held opinions of more than a merely negative character. The wealth and luxury of the priesthood were their utter abomination. They promulgated the doctrine that absolute poverty was essential to holiness; and in the wild regions of Northern Italy, to which many of them retired, they saw visions and dreamed dreams of a new effusion of the Holy Spirit. Prophets and prophetesses rose among them, to delude the superstitious with alleged revelations; and one of the latter went so far as to declare herself the Holy Ghost incarnate. Distinguished among these fanatics were Sagarelli of Parma, and his follower Fra Dolcino of Novara,—the one the preacher of doctrines even more extreme than those of the poverty-loving Spiritualists and Fraticelli, and the other the promulgator of a new gospel, which taught the utter subversion of the sacerdotal system, and the approach of a golden age under the auspices of the seven angels of the churches. Dolcino and his disciples seem, moreover, to have entertained, or at least professed to entertain, hopes of the revolution they anticipated being brought about by the instrumentality of an earthly monarch. Frederick of Arragon, king of Sicily, was to be the head of a new empire, in which the Papacy had no place; for the church, deprived of the Pope, was to be reduced to its primitive poverty, and convert the world by the agency of humble believers.

Dolcino and his spiritual sister, Margarita, a rich and beautiful Tyrolese maiden, first organized a peculiar community in the Val Sesia in Piedmont. Here they were joined by multitudes from other parts of Italy, who professed a desire to live at peace with all the world, and to wait for the golden age. But bulls had already been issued against them; and the Inquisition forthwith proceeded to the work of suppressing a community holding doctrines subversive of the church. An ill-devised attack made upon them by the podesta of Varallo, served only to give courage to Dolcino and his followers, the number of whom increased with amazing rapidity. The Guelphic nobles, headed by the bishop of Vercelli, resolved to combine for the complete extermination of the heretics; but even these formidable antagonists were baffled. Thrice the bishop was defeated; his diocese was laid waste; and Dolcino, issuing from a strong position he had taken up among the mountains, sacked the surrounding towns, rifled the churches, and carried off many prisoners. But in their wild, inhospitable retreat, the resolute enthusiasts were soon reduced to fearful straits. Famine compelled them to feed upon the dry grass of the mountains, and even, it is said, upon the dead bodies of their companions. Yet they continued their hopeless resistance with desperate determination, until, worn out with suffering, they nearly all perished in a last effort to beat back their assailants. Dolcino and the beautiful Margarita were put to death with horrible barbarity; both remaining calm and undaunted while the flesh was torn from their bodies with red-hot pincers, and the flames of the burning pile kept down to increase their tortures. Margarita indignantly repelled all the attempts made to induce her to recant; and, by her extraordinary fortitude, drew forth the admiration even of her executioners.

While the doctrines of Dolcino and the Spiritualists spread rapidly throughout Italy, and even extended into France, Germany, Poland, and other parts of Europe, greater minds than those from which they emanated were deeply deploring the miseries of their country, and ardently longing for the peace which national unity and a reformation of the church alone could bring. 'The world-worn Dante,' driven from his native Florence by the intrigues of Pope Boniface VIII., the violence of Charles of Valois, and the tumultuous strife of the Bianchi and Neri, had lost all faith in the Papacy. The only hope which cheered his lonely wanderings, was that of an Italian monarchy centred in Rome, founded on the will of the people; and, while extending its sway over Italy, leaving all her cities free, and in the enjoyment of their municipal institutions. The ancient Roman Republic was, in the great poet's eyes, the noblest, purest, and strongest of earthly governments; and if he desired to see the establishment of a monarchy, it was one animated by the spirit of republicanism, deriving its power from God and the people. With temporal affairs the Pope, he believed, ought to have no concern; the functions of the head of the church he held to be strictly spiritual.

More than a century and a half before the birth of Luther, the forlorn and weary exile proclaimed, in his immortal poem, the doctrine of justification by faith; denounced the sale of indulgences originated by the cupidity of Pope Boniface; and scathed, with the lightnings of sublime and terrible scorn, the fabric of the Papacy. The Divina Commedia abounds with such powerful condemnations of Romish corruptions, that some of its great author's commentators have concluded that its chief object was the overthrow of the Papal power. Dante felt and saw that over the political and religious life of his country the Church of Rome exercised either a degrading and polluting or a deadening influence. He clung to many of its dogmas, and was a firm believer in the spiritual supremacy of Peter, and those whom he deemed the apostle's worthy successors; but in the Paradiso he makes Peter himself declare the place of his representative to be vacant:

'He who on earth my place,
My place usurps,—my place, which in the eyes
Of God's own Son is vacant, hath long space
Rendered my burial-ground a sink abhorred
Of blood and filth, which to the inveterate foe
Who fell from heaven, doth high delight afford.'

It is from the apostle's lips, too, that we have this denunciation of Papal intolerance and falsehood:

'Ne'er was it meant that Christians should be placed
By our successors, part on the right hand,
The other part upon the left, disgraced;
Or that the keys entrusted to my care
Should be a sign for warriors to unfold,
And as a standard against Christians borne;
Or that my image on a shield should show,
Attached to lying privileges sold.
Rapacious wolves, in shepherds' clothing dressed,
Are hence beheld through all the pastures fair:
O arm of God, why art thou still at rest?'

In the most dreadful circles of the Inferno, the visionary poet placed popes, cardinals, and priests; and the forms of those who had worn the tiara are fixed in the horror of its outer darkness. Dante, in short, believed that Rome was indeed Antichrist—the Babylon of the Apocalypse:

'For she, who sits on many waters, hath
Been seen with kings her person to defile.
. . . . . .
Ah, Constantine! what evils caused to flow,
Not thy conversation, but those fair domains
Thou on the first rich Father did'st bestow!'

Nor was it only against the avarice and licentiousness of the priesthood that the poet hurled his shafts; he anticipated the awakening of a later generation to the truths of the gospel, and the exposure of those cunningly devised fables, by which so many souls had been beguiled.

Much misconception of the purpose and spirit of the Divina Commedia has arisen, from its being regarded either as merely an allegory of the poet's experiences, or as founded, in so far at least as its outline is concerned, on the Romish ideas of punishment, penance, and reward. Looked at only from one or other of these points of view, much of its severe beauty, much of its symmetry is lost; and many of its most powerful truths become little else than invectives or murmurings, expressive of a sense of personal wrong. But Dante had far other and nobler objects before him. His great poem was designed to shadow forth, in its first part, 'the Inferno,'—the miseries of sin; in its second, 'the Purgatorio,'—the struggles by which those who really desire to reach the region of sacred truth may do so; and in its third, 'Paradiso,'—the supernal glory of divine light, the ineffable beauty of divine love. That the work abounds with political allusions, and, as we have said, proceeds upon a belief in several of the doctrines of the church, does not detract from its value as a testimony against the Papacy. Dante aspired after the unity of Italy under one powerful monarch, able to deprive the Pope of temporal authority, and by this means to free the church, and lead to its reformation.

Great as the influence of Dante's poetry must have been in directing the thoughts of his countrymen—or the more learned among them at least—to the errors and crimes of the Papacy, it was, perhaps, equally powerful in preparing the way for the translation of the Scriptures into the language which it did so much to form, elevate, and adorn. The poet had himself declared that the light of sacred truth, which had been so long obscured by the foul vapours arising from the church's corruption, was alone capable of guiding men through the worse than heathen darkness of his time; and, ere long, that light broke in upon the minds of many of his countrymen, enabling them to flee for refuge to the hope set before them, and cheering them to fight the great fight of faith.

WILLIAM FAREL,

THE SWISS REFORMER.

CHAPTER I.

IN the dark days which preceded the Reformation of the sixteenth century, French Switzerland was pre-eminent for ignorance and superstition; and it is a remarkable fact, that while German Switzerland sent forth many eminent men to further the Reformation in other countries as well as in their own, French Switzerland is, with one exception (Peter Viret, of Orbe), indebted to foreigners for its emancipation from papal bondage.

William Farel, a native of Dauphiné, was the principal reformer of French Switzerland. He was born in 1489, in the little village of Farel, or Fareau, near Gap, the chief town of the High Alps. His home was one of a group of houses, lying at the foot of the Mont de l'Aiguille near the Col de Glaize. Being the manor-house of the village, it stood somewhat apart from the rest, surrounded by orchards and vineyards. This hamlet is still an object of interest to the passing traveller.

Farel had three brothers—Daniel, Walter, and Claude, and, at least, one sister. Their parents were wealthy, and firmly attached to the Church of Rome, believing implicitly whatever she presented to them as truth. As might be expected, their children imbibed their spirit of blind devotion; and as they grew up, their zeal attracted the attention of their neighbours. William, in particular, whose earnest, ardent character, and vivid imagination, led him to throw his whole soul into whatever enlisted his sympathies, was, even in childhood, regarded with something of reverence, as, with unaffected piety, he knelt before the image of the Virgin and implored her blessing. 'I am horror-struck,' he said, at a later period, 'when I think of the hours, the prayers, the divine honours, which I have offered myself, and caused others to offer, to the cross, and such-like vanities.'

When only seven or eight years old, his parents took him on pilgrimage to La Sainte Croix, a place in high esteem on the top of a hill, about four leagues from Gap. As they drew near the place, his father, anxious to impress his mind with the solemnity of the occasion, said to William: 'The cross you will soon see, is made of the wood of the very cross on which Jesus was crucified.' Having reached the holy spot, the pilgrims prostrated themselves before the cross, and a copper basin in which, as the priest told them, 'our Saviour washed his disciples' feet.' As William gazed in wonder at these relics, the priest, pointing to a little crucifix attached to the cross, said, 'When the devils send us hail and thunder, this crucifix moves so violently, that one would think it wanted to get loose from the cross and put the devils to flight, and all the while it keeps throwing out sparks of fire against the storm. Were it not for this, the whole country would be swept bare.' The pilgrims listened with devout attention, and the priest continued: 'Nobody knows or sees anything of these wonders but myself and this man here,'—a strange-looking man, who at that moment appeared, and readily assented to all the priest said. 'It would have frightened you to look at him,' said Farel, when relating the anecdote; the people called him 'the priest-wizard.'

Farel, among the mountains of Dauphiné, like Zwingle in the Tockenburg, felt the power of Alpine scenery to raise the thoughts upwards, and fill them with desires which life, as he saw it around him, could not satisfy. An ardent thirst for knowledge took possession of his mind, and he asked his father's permission to study. At this time another young man, also a native of Dauphiné (Du Terrail, generally known by the name of Bayard), was astonishing his countrymen by his valour in battle on the other side of the Alps. 'Such sons,' it was said, 'are like arrows in the hand of a mighty man: blessed is the man who has his quiver full of them.' Farel's father, longing to see his son following the steps of Bayard, refused to allow him to study; but William was not disheartened, and with steady perseverance pressed his demand until it was granted.

Louis XII., a prince in many respects in advance of the bigoted spirit of his age, now reigned in France, to which empire Dauphiné had recently been added. Justly styled the 'father of his country,' it was the wish of Louis that his nobility should cultivate an acquaintance with literature and science, instead of directing their attention almost exclusively to field sports. This royal desire afforded great encouragement to young Farel, and he began to study with all the energy of his character, and with so much success, that his brothers were induced to follow his example. But difficulties met, though they did not discourage him. Dauphiné did not provide one good teacher in any department of learning; so, with his father's permission, William left home for Paris, where he arrived at the close of 1510, and immediately entered the Sorbonne.*

Among the remarkable men in Paris at that time, was one to whose influence Farel owed much; a man of humble birth, whose appearance was not calculated to prejudice in his favour, and whose education had been but indifferent, yet one whose society was eagerly sought by all who could appreciate genuine piety, deep learning, and true greatness of mind. This man was Lefèvre, of whom Beza says, 'That good old man was the first who courageously began the revival of the pure religion of Jesus Christ.' Born in

* The University of Paris, founded by Charlemagne, believed to be the first ever established in Europe.

1455, Lefèvre was advanced in years at this time. In early life he had travelled much, even into Asia and Africa, in pursuit of knowledge; and in 1493, being then doctor of theology, he became professor in the University of Paris, and, in the estimation of Erasmus, was superior to all the doctors around him. Though sincerely attached to the Romish Church, he saw the need of reform, and laboured to promote it. His first step was to revive the study of languages and the classics, hoping thus to raise the moral character of the Sorbonne. But he soon found that, in the work of reformation, philosophy and literature are weak instruments; and laying aside the scholastic theology of the day, which served only to confirm its disciples in error, he brought forth the long-neglected 'dusty Bible.' While Lefèvre recommended the Scriptures to others, he diligently studied them himself; and his sermons, earnest and fervent, were listened to with marked attention, while his affability towards his pupils won their hearts. 'He loves me exceedingly,' said one of them to his friend; 'he is all frankness and kindness; he sings, he plays, he disputes, and then laughs with me.' The ordinances of the church occupied much of his time. Indeed, in these and in private devotion, many hours each day were passed.

Such a character was well suited to attract Farel, and soon the tutor and pupil were united in the close bond of sympathy. Each understood the other as few around them did; and while Farel remarked with admiration, that he, whose fame for learning was unrivalled, bowed with childlike simplicity before the image of the Virgin—remaining prostrate long after others had risen, Lefèvre was no less delighted to observe the readiness with which Farel left his books to spend hours in adoration of the Virgin, and in adorning with flowers the images of the saints, which both regarded with superstitious reverence.

The attachment of Lefèvre and his pupil to the popish system was firm and sincere. They believed that the Pope was ordained by God as the visible head of the church, and was, in fact, a God upon earth, possessed of universal monarchy. Hence they regarded obedience to his commands as essential to salvation. Indeed, however great and impious the demands of the Pope might be, the devotion of Farel exceeded them. 'Satan,' he afterwards said, 'had lodged the Pope and Popery, and all that is of himself, so deeply in my heart, that even in the Pope's own heart they could have sunk no deeper.' Great, then, was his surprise to learn, upon reaching Paris, that at a recent meeting of the French clergy at Tours, it was decided that the king had a right to go to war with the Pope. 'How I shudder at myself,' Farel afterwards said, in allusion to this period, 'when I think on it all, and how great and wonderful a work of God it is that a man should ever be delivered from such an abyss!'

All the time which Farel could spare from the observances of religion he devoted to study; but while he seemed to be in search of truth, he sunk deeper and deeper into error. 'The light which is in him was darkness;' no peace entered his heart, nor did his outward life attain to that holiness for which he toiled.

Finding no satisfaction from the study of Aristotle, and the other books recommended by the university, he turned to the lives of the saints, and found them equally unprofitable, as 'broken cisterns.' When almost in despair, he remembered that the church acknowledged the Old and New Testaments to be the 'Holy Bible,' and at once determined to read them. But he had scarcely begun, when, he tells us, 'Satan started up in haste, that he might not lose his possession, and wrought in me as he is wont.' His heart became the battle-field upon which the word of God and the authority of the church carried on a desperate conflict. Having been taught from infancy that the church could not err, he feared to interpret any passage of Scripture otherwise than according to her teaching. 'Oh,' he often exclaimed in his perplexity, 'I do not understand these things. I must put a different construction on those passages from that which they seem to bear. I must hold to the interpretation of the church, or rather of the Pope.'

While in this perplexity, a doctor of the Sorbonne rebuked him for reading the Scriptures 'before he had taken his degree in arts.' In blind submission Farel closed the book, and 'turning away his ears from the truth,' he was indeed 'turned unto fables.' Once more the legends of the saints so filled his imagination, that he almost daily inflicted upon himself the austerities enforced by the Carthusian monks. But the hour of greatest darkness precedes the dawn of day: the true light was now about to shine into Farel's soul.

Shortly before this, while Lefèvre was compiling the lives of the saints and martyrs, he was horrified by the impiety of the prayers addressed to them. Closing the book, he opened the Scriptures, and, as he read, the merits of the saints lost their value before the glory of the cross of Christ. They appeared to him 'as brimstone, fit only to kindle the fire of idolatry.' 'We will now,' said he to his pupils, 'follow what is certain, and abandon what is doubtful; we will cleave to Christ alone, and to the doctrine of the apostles, which points out the way of salvation. There is only one religion; it has one foundation and object, one Head, even Christ, who alone is to be worshipped and honoured.'

Full of these thoughts, Lefèvre imparted them to Farel, saying, with solemn earnestness, 'My dear William, God will change the face of the world, and you will be a witness of it.' These mysterious words at first only bewildered the mind of Farel; nevertheless, they made an impression, and were 'found after many days.'

St. Paul's epistles now especially engaged Lefèvre's attention, and in 1512 he published a commentary upon parts of them, in which he thus expressed his hopes: 'God will soon in his great mercy revive the expiring spark in the hearts of men, so that faith and love and a pure worship may return again.' Lefèvre himself, as he gradually emerged from error, contributed to bring about this change for which he longed, and chiefly by his influence over Farel, whom (though unconsciously) he helped to prepare for the great work for which God designed him, though, at first, Farel wavered between the ancient faith and the present views of his tutor, and passed through great mental suffering before he was 'fully persuaded in his own mind.' Alluding to these conflicts, he says: 'When the corruptions of the Romish Church are unveiled to the soul which has been drawn aside by them, its sense of their enormity is so overwhelming, that only the clear exhibition of the welcome doctrine of salvation by Christ can preserve a man from either despair or losing his reason.'

The study of ecclesiastical history helped much to remove erroneous impressions from Farel's mind. In the ancient liturgies of the church, he found that prayers were always addressed, not to the saints, but to God, while in the confessions of the early Christians he could discover no mention whatever of purgatory, the mass, or the worship of images. These omissions greatly perplexed him, especially the latter. As the idea of worshipping God, without the intercession of the Virgin, was abhorrent to his soul, he felt the need of a mediator, a days-man to stand between his guilty soul and a holy God, and knew not that the 'one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus,' supplied that want.

While in this unsettled state, tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine, 'justification by faith' was distinctly proclaimed in the Sorbonne. 'It is God alone,' said Lefèvre (for he was the preacher), 'who, by his grace, justifies unto eternal life. There is a righteousness which is of works, and there is a righteousness of grace: the one, a thing of man's invention, the other from God: the one, earthly and passing away; the other, divine and everlasting: the one, the shadow and semblance; the other, the light and the truth: the one, discovering sin and bringing the fear of death; the other, revealing grace for the attainment of life. Oh,' he exclaimed, 'the unspeakable greatness of that exchange: the sinless One is condemned, and he who is guilty goes free! The blessing bears the curse, and the curse is brought into blessing; the Life dies, and the dead live; the Glory is whelmed in darkness, and he who knew nothing but confusion of face is clothed with glory.' At these words many thought the preacher 'beside himself, that much learning had made him mad;' but to Farel they were as life from the dead. With joy he heard that salvation by grace is freely bestowed upon all who believe; and from that moment he accepted it. 'Lefèvre,' he said, 'extricated me from the delusive thought of human deservings, and taught me that all is of grace, which I believed as soon as spoken.'

From the doctrine of justification by faith, Lefèvre went on to declare that they who are saved, are saved by the electing grace of God, not by their own will. 'When we are converted,' said he, 'it is not our conversion which makes us the elect of God, but it is the grace, will, and election of God, which work our conversion.' Having laid the foundation deep in these doctrines of the electing grace of God and justification by faith, Lefèvre pressed upon his hearers the necessity of holiness of life, saying, 'If thou art a member of Christ, thou art a member of his body. Oh, if man would but enter into the understanding of this privilege, how pure, how holy, would be his life!'

To become better instructed in the Scriptures, Farel now devoted himself to the study of Greek and Hebrew, and his labour was not in vain. 'Now,' he says, 'prophecy is opened to me, and the epistles carry wonderful light into my soul. A voice before unknown—the voice of Christ my Shepherd and Teacher—speaks to me with power.' Though he continued to attend public worship, the ordinances yielded him no enjoyment; 'the expulsive power of a new affection cast them into the shade.' And, when standing before a once venerated image, he would exclaim, as he thought of Him who was 'the brightness of his Father's glory, the express image of his person, "Thou alone art God. Thou alone art pure. Thou alone art to be worshipped."' Henceforth Farel called no man master, not even Lefèvre; though, while life lasted, he revered and loved him; and now especially, as he watched him suffering persecution for the truth's sake from the doctors of the Sorbonne.

CHAPTER II.

FAREL'S progress in study was rapid; and having taken the degree of Master of Arts, he was, at Lefèvre's request, appointed Regent of the College, founded by Cardinal Lemoine,—an office which had always been held by distinguished men. His high character won the esteem of many in high places, who entrusted him with money for the support of the poor—a trust he faithfully discharged while he remained in office. But he soon left Paris, being summoned by Briçonnet to preach in the city of Meaux.

Briçonnet, bishop of Meaux, one of the most distinguished lords of the court of Francis I., favoured the Reformed doctrines. He had entered the church at an early age, and became bishop, first at Lodeve, afterwards at Meaux.

During the reign of Louis XII. he was twice sent on an embassy to Rome, and had now just returned from his second visit, undazzled by the splendour of the Vatican, to labour with increased diligence in his diocese. He delighted to welcome to his abbey men like-minded with himself; among whom Lefèvre and Farel were special favourites. 'I am all dark,' he used to say, 'waiting for the grace of the divine favour from which my sins have banished me.' God 'giveth grace to the humble;' and soon Briçonnet found joy and peace in believing. As he read the Scriptures, he found them 'sweeter than honey and the honey-comb.' 'And yet,' said he, 'that heavenly manna never cloys: the more we take of it, the more we long for it.' It grieved him to the heart to see 'this gift of God, so worthy of acceptation,' neglected by the court and the nation in general.

'Francis loved learning; and thinking,' as Erasmus says, 'that he should adorn his court more by inviting scholars to it than by erecting pyramids or buildings. He even welcomed many who were suspected of favouring the doctrines of Luther. Among these were Cop, the court physician; Parr, the king's confessor; and others who, with Berquin, enjoyed the king's confidence. He called them his "children," and lamented to them the imprisonments of Heirese and Cousin at Paris, and thus helped forward the progress of evangelical knowledge. For this and from the patronage of Francis I. among those of the Reformers regarding that time as the one who, through a persecution, contributed to promote the Reformation by "banishing learning from the world."

Margaret of Valois, Duchess of Alençon, the king's sister, is one of the most interesting characters of that period. Possessing a remarkable love for learning, and great talents, she had been supported by the learned men in Paris as their patroness even in the reign of her cousin Louis XII., at whose court she had been educated. When her brother Francis ascended the throne, she, with her mother, Louisa of Savoy, obtained at court, being a great favourite with her brother, who called her his "daisy." As Margaret accompanied the court through France, she had frequent opportunity to observe the manners and customs of the priests and monks. "Oh, many occasions," says the historian Brantôme, "I often went to hear her recount stories to my grandmother, who accompanied her as dame d'honneur, and had charge of her writing-desk." The observations the princess then made, helped in a great degree to open her eyes to the corruptions of the Church of Rome: and she abhorred the profligacy of her brother's court, while she loved to pass hours in her own room in study and meditation. Through the centre of observation, the object of admiration and love to all who knew her much, Margaret experienced the many joys of anything earthly to satisfy the desires of her soul. She felt a want within; she knew not what caused it, still less how it could be supplied: but the gospel had already found its way into the court of Francis—"waters had broken out in the wilderness, and streams in the desert." Margaret drank of these waters, and they were to her "as a well of water springing up into everlasting life." She read with intense pleasure the tracts lent to her by some ladies of her court, who had adopted the reformed doctrines; and in the latter part of 1521 we find her searching the Scriptures with Lefèvre, Farel, and Roussel. Thus she was helped on step by step; but the immediate means of her conversion was the bishop of Meaux. She could not bear to enjoy her newly-found happiness alone, and longing to see her brother a partaker of her joy, she entreated him to come to her private meetings for Scripture reading, at which Michael D'Arande, who had been sent to her by Briçonnet, presided. Even Louisa of Savoy appeared at that time well disposed towards the evangelical doctrines, and

"ng the whole of 1522 Margaret's hopes of version of her brother gathered strength, wrote to tell Briçonnet that he and the queen-mother inclined towards the Reformation; but the world had no strong a hold upon their hearts—the seed, falling among thorns, brought forth no fruit.

From Margaret's writings she seems to have had a deep sense of indwelling sin, which at first led Christ from her view, but before long she could say—

"Then, I my God, hast in thy grace come down
To me, a worm of earth, who strength had none."

During the reign of Louis XII. an Italian custom with persons of rank—that of selecting for themselves suitable emblems and devices—had been introduced into France. Margaret chose as her emblem the sunflower: "because," says Brantôme, "her heart was devoted to God, and this flower most resembles the sun in form, and turning, follows him in his course." To this emblem she added the motto, in Latin, "I seek not the things of this world:" "because," continued Brantôme, "she directed all her actions, thoughts, will, and affections towards that great sun, which is God." Rumours concerning Margaret's change in religion now reached the king; but he pretended not to credit them. Every one loved her, for she was kind and gentle, condescending and charitable to all, and no one liked to believe news which, if true, might subject her to reproach.

Margaret herself trembled at the thought of displeasing her brother, and never openly confessed Christ, though her life spoke of one who had been washed in Christ's blood, and who loved Him, because He had first loved her. Her influence at court gained admission for the evangelical doctrines, and many were attracted to them by the loveliness of her character.

Thus, in 1518, as we have seen, the gospel had many converts in France—in Paris: Lefèvre, Briçonnet, Farel, the Duchess of Alençon; who joyfully expected the time when it should spread through the length and breadth of the land. But their hopes were soon crushed. Louisa of Savoy, the king's mother, who naturally hated God's holy word, which condemned her life, violently opposed its introduction into the kingdom; while her favourite, Anthony Duplat, the chancellor, added his influence to hers to urge Francis to persecute those who professed the gospel.

It was during this period of persecution (1521) that Farel, as already mentioned, was invited to Meaux by the bishop. The two Roussels accompanied him, and together they in public and private instructed the people of Meaux out of the Scriptures. The youth of the city particularly engaged their attention; and among those whom they then trained for future usefulness was Jean, Compte de la Croix, a nobleman of Paris. They also laboured with much success among the common people, and many souls were given them for their hire.

The Franciscans speedily took alarm at these proceedings, and wrote to Paris, saying that their city was infested with heresy, of which the bishop was the promoter. Called to Paris to answer this charge, Briçonnet, with a heavy heart, left his diocese. The Sunday before his departure he ascended the pulpit in the cathedral, and, as if foreseeing coming evil, solemnly warned his hearers against false teachers, who would deprive them of the word of God, adding, 'Even though I, your bishop, your teacher, and your guide, were to change my language and my doctrine, beware you of changing with me.' Briçonnet with difficulty escaped condemnation; but he could not defend his friends, and, being naturally weak, and not prepared to renounce all for Christ, he deprived the preachers of liberty to proclaim that gospel which he knew to be 'the power of God unto salvation to every one that believes.' This unfortunate step was taken April 12, 1523, and made way for others not less so.

Having so far succeeded with Briçonnet, the Romish party openly attacked Lefèvre and his writings. 'Has he not said,' they asked, 'that the word of God is sufficient of itself to lead to eternal life? and is not this enough to condemn him?' Lefèvre, however, was acquitted. The spirit of persecution continuing unabated, Farel left Meaux for Paris, where he attacked the errors of Popery, and was, in consequence, obliged to leave that city too. He then went to Dauphiné, his native country, and was the means of leading his three brothers, and many others, to the knowledge of Christ.

While at Meaux, Lefèvre published (October 1524) his French translation of the four Gospels. On the 6th November following, the remainder of the New Testament appeared, and on the 12th the entire in one volume. In the following year, he brought out a French version of the Psalms. Many received the Scriptures in their own tongue with joy, as that of which they had long felt the need. Peasants read the precious volume in the fields—artisans in the workshop.

The departure of Farel from Meaux drew the Lord's people closer to each other. Among those who thus encouraged each other in the faith was a wool-comber, John Leclerc, who, with his mother and his brother, Peter, had embraced the truth, while his father continued a stern Romanist. Though often subjected to harsh treatment by his persecutors, John, as a good soldier of the cross, continued to visit his brethren, exhorting the weak and comforting the desponding; and, not content with these private efforts, he wrote a proclamation, in which he declared Rome to be Antichrist, and posted it on the cathedral doors. Crowds gathered to read it, marvelling at the writer's boldness; and while the rage of the priests was unbounded, the friends of the gospel dreaded lest the imprudent zeal of the wool-comber should hinder its progress.

The Franciscans loudly insisted that Leclerc should be publicly whipped through the city, branded on the forehead, and then cast into prison, all which shame and suffering he bore, as one who had counted the cost before he enlisted himself under Christ's banner. His mother stood by, encouraging him by her words and gestures, to endure to the end rather than deny his Lord; but at last a piercing shriek was heard, and she left the dreadful place exclaiming, 'Glory be to Jesus and his witnesses!' Awe-struck, the crowd let her pass through to her home. 'Not one of her enemies,' says the historian, 'dared to put forth his hand against her.' Shortly after, Leclerc was set at liberty, and went to Metz, in Lorraine, at the close of 1523, 'where he followed,' says Beza, 'the example of St. Paul, who, while labouring at Corinth as a tentmaker, preached the gospel to all within his reach.' Several conversions were the fruit of his labours, and from that humble beginning arose a church which afterwards was highly honoured of God.

Unfortunately, Leclerc's prudence did not equal his zeal. Believing the images of the Virgin and saints to be idols, and their worshippers idolaters, he considered himself bound to assert the honour of God, who has said, 'Thou shalt have none other god but me.' Determined to act with vigour, he watched his opportunity, and had not long to wait. A high festival was approaching, when multitudes from the surrounding country would repair to a chapel a short distance from the city, to pay the honour to senseless images due to God alone, and to ask from them the pardon of their sins. The evening previous to this festival, Leclerc entered the chapel, and sitting down before one of the images, became wrapt in thought. 'They have eyes, and see not; ears have they, and yet they hear not,' thought he, as he gazed upon the lifeless blocks before him. Suddenly it seemed to him as if God were saying, 'Thou shalt not bow down to their gods; but thou shalt utterly overthrow them, and quite break down their images;' and believing that a divine impulse guided him, he started up, broke the images, and cast the fragments on the altar. No one witnessed the act, and Leclerc, in safety, reached Metz before dawn of day.

Early that morning the bells began to ring, and from all parts of the city and neighbourhood crowds gathered, until a long procession, headed by priests and monks, began to march to the chapel. As it moved along, prayers were chanted and hymns sung in honour of the saints about to be worshipped. But suddenly all was hushed. As the foremost reached the chapel, a thrill of horror ran through them, and, like an electric shock, communicated itself to those behind; their 'Dagon' was fallen to the ground, and one long shout, 'Death, death, to the sacrilegious wretch,' was heard on all sides.

It was soon known that Leclerc was the daring offender, and when brought before his judges he confessed the act, and exhorted the people to worship God alone. He was sentenced to be burnt alive, which terrible death, aggravated by unheard-of cruelties, he bore with a calm composure, which struck his enemies with silent awe, and wrung the hearts of his friends. In the midst of the most excruciating torments he cried aloud, 'Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. O Israel, trust in the Lord; He is their help and their shield.' Thus perished, in 1524, the first martyr of the Reformation in France. Many followed in his train; but the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church. Lutheranism, before long, spread throughout the district of Metz.

(To be continued.)

Readings for the Young.

ZIP'S VOW.

'TAKE me out, fader, under the big pine-trees; I'se so hot, so tired!'

The big, brawny man bent down and took up tenderly the little thin figure, so helpless but so patient. He bore her out from the small, close shed they called their home, to the grand church of God, whose doors were never closed to them. He laid her at the foot of one of its noblest pillars, a stately pine, where had been gathered a bed of soft grey moss, which formed an easy couch for the sufferer. The fever which was consuming her life forces burned even through her swarthy skin; the lips were parched, and the eyes quivered with an intense fire. The father gazed at her, as the clear light of day showed more distinctly to him the ravages the disease had made.

'Fader, dear fader!'

'What does my Clar want?'

'To say someting, fader; but my lips are so dry.'

He hastened into the hut, and soon returned with a luscious orange, the juice of which he squeezed into her hot mouth, and then wiped the parched lips with the cool, fresh pulp.

'Now, what has my little picaninny to say to her old fader?'

He sat down, and drew her head upon his stalwart breast, and with his great hands tenderly caressed it, and played with the close rings of black hair.

'Fader, you know little Clar is not goin' to stay wid you; she's goin' to be "an angel."' She half sprang up, and sang, with a soft, clear voice, which rang through the woods:

> 'I want to be an angel,
> And with the angels stand,
> A crown upon my forehead,
> A harp within my hand.'

The tears rained down the cheeks of the father, as he listened, in awe-struck wonder, to the song of the dying child. He feared her spirit would leave her body singing, her voice seemed to have such power and fulness,—more like a woman's than the child she was. But she seemed to gain strength with every word, and was less exhausted at the close than when she began. When she paused, she looked up in her father's face and said:

'Miss Clarice told me that, fader, when moder and I lived up at the house. She was so good: all my hymns, and eberyting that comforts me, she teached me. Them was happy times, fader; Miss Clarice was so good!'

'Good as any slaveholder can be, Clar.'

'She's brung up to it, fader, and didn't know better then; but she won't do it no more. And now, fader, I want to say someting; and you wunstn't be angry with your little Clar, 'cause she is "goin' to be an angel." Last time I went meetin', fader, the minister read about one of the parables Massa Jesus gave to the poor people there where He lived. It was jus' as if Massa Jesus saw men standin' idle, doin' noting, fader, jus' like you, and He say, "Why stand you here idle all the day?" And dey say, "Because no man has hired us." And I couldn't help cryin', fader; 'cause, if Massa Jesus should ask you why you don't work, you couldn't give Him any reason, 'cause Miss Clarice wanted to hire you.'

'This old chile worked for her all his life for noting, and nobody ought to spect him to work no more, Clar.'

'How are you goin' to live, fader? What's you goin' to eat? Do you spect oder people to work for you?'

'De gubernment mus' do dat, Clar.'

'Why for, fader?'

''Cause I'se been a slave allays.'

'They've gin you freedom, fader, and dat's better dan all de rice and corn in de world.'

'What do I owe 'em, Clar, and whar did you git all dese tings?'

'I hear Massa May talk about 'em up to meetin', and 'pears he knows jus' what we ought to do. He says, gubernment make us free, but gubernment can't make us real men, to stand straight in the world, and be like white folks, if we bracks don't work for it. And, fader, one more ting Massa May read from the good book: "Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were drowned in the depths of the sea;" and he said that meant anybody who tried to lead any one to do wrong when they wanted to do right, was just as wicked as they could be; and I thought—I'se couldn't help it, fader—how I heard you talkin' to old Mose, and tellin' him he oughtn't to work for Miss Clarice,—he was a fool to do anyting more, he'd worked nuff in his life; and you mocked him for goin' to larn, and preachin'. Oh, fader,' she burst out with a great sob, 'I couldn't go 'cross Jordan widout tellin' you dese tings.'

The man's strong frame shook with emotion.

'I neber seed it so afore. But, Clar, I can't let you go; I'se got nobody now. He took your moder; and now, if He takes you, I can't lib. If He let's you lib, I'll be so 'dustrious and larn, and be as 'spectable as a white man.'

'Don't ask me to stay here. I'se almost done gone. I can see moder and all the shining ones.' The voice was very low, and there was a pause; then the little figure bounded up as agilely as if in health. 'Promise, fader; moder hears you; promise to do your duty as a free brack man, and not to be idle, and to larn, and to pray to God, and He will bress you.'

Kneeling, but with an upward look, as if following an irresistible impulse, Zip said, with an awed tone: 'I promise to God, and Nan, and our Clar, to try and do right; but oh, please, God, leave me my chile!'

It was too late. Her arms were thrown about his neck with a clasp of love; but in a moment their grasp was relaxed, and the freed spirit was borne upward.

THE SORROWING HEART MADE GLAD.

It was a lovely evening in summer. The sun, which had shone so powerfully during the day, was sinking quietly to rest, and a soft refreshing breeze murmured through the leafy foliage of Beechen Grove, as though inviting the weary mind to lay aside the day's duties, and enjoy the evening calm.

In the spacious pleasure-grounds belonging to B—— Seminary might be seen groups of merry, laughing girls. One or two were walking up and down the wide gravel paths; whilst others were occupying the various class-rooms, with nothing better to do than to talk of the new pupil, who had joined their circle a few days before.

But apart from all these sat a pale young girl. Her head was bent over her book, as though in deep thought; and when, attracted by a merry peal of laughter, she raised it for a moment, it needed not a very close observer to notice the look of sadness which overspread her intelligent countenance. The deep mourning dress that she wore seemed to tell all the sad tale; and yet not all: surely not even the loss of the dearest friend could cause that look of deep-seated despondency; for the hope of meeting again would have exerted a sweet, soothing influence, which it was but too evident she did not possess.

Alas! no. Annie Lee was sorrowing as those who are without hope. Her parents, to whom she had clung with all the affectionate fondness of an only child, had been taken from her by fever,—leaving her alone in the world, without an earthly protector, without a heavenly guide. She could not look forward to meeting them again in the better land, for her hopes and wishes were all bounded by this present world. She had no share in the Saviour's love—that love which alone was able to prove all-sufficient strength for the time of trial; and now, in the deep anguish of her heart, earth seemed to offer no object, heaven no charm. Of what use was all her wearisome study? No eye would beam more brightly, no heart be made more glad, at her success. There might be kind words and smiles for others, but there were none for her. She was alone in the world; and the bitter tears would come as she thus thought.

Many of her companions passed and repassed the window where she was sitting, but no one noticed the motherless girl; and it was a relief when they all left the room, and she was able to indulge her grief unrestrained.

Not long, however, did she enjoy her solitude. The door opened again, and footsteps approached her; but so violently was she sobbing, that she did not even raise her eyes to see who was the intruder. There was a moment's silence, then a hand was laid softly on her shoulder; and on looking up, she encountered such a glance of sympathy, as she had not seen for many a long month.

It was Annie Lee's first introduction to the new pupil. 'You are in sorrow, Miss Lee. As a stranger, I suppose I cannot be permitted to share it; yet it may even be a stranger's privilege to point to One who knows every grief, every sorrow of our hearts.' And, as she spoke, she drew the weeping girl towards her with all the fondness of a sister.

Encouraged by her gentle tone, Annie spoke, without reserve, of the cause of her grief. She told her that both her beloved parents had been taken from her, in one short week, by the hand of death; and that, ever since, her heart had ached sadly and wearily for some one to love her—some one whom she could love. 'Life seems nothing without them!' she exclaimed passionately. 'I do not care for anything, now they are gone; and I am sure no one cares for me.'

Again the same sympathizing tones greeted her ear. 'Do not talk thus, dear Miss Lee. I love you already; and many more would love you, but perhaps they think you do not care for their affection. And, after all, it is not their love that can make you happy, or satisfy your soul's immortal cravings; it is the love of Jesus that you want. Till you possess that, your search for happiness will be all in vain. God, in his mercy, has taken away those who were dearest to your heart. Perhaps He saw that they were filling the place which He had reserved for himself; and so, by a gentle stroke of his chastening rod, would bid you set your affections on those things which are above. But though they are gone, and no other friends seem left, you need not tread the path of life alone. He will go with you; He will direct your wandering footsteps, if you will only take Him for your guide. In Him your restless, weary heart will find the rest it has so long been seeking; and living to his glory, the noblest, truest end of your existence will be answered.'

The bell rang for evening prayer, and then they separated for the night,—the one to pray for a blessing on the words which she had spoken, that they might be the means of leading the wandering one to Christ; the other, in the silence of her chamber, to indulge such thoughts as before had seemed to savour of melancholy and sadness.

The right chord had been touched, and, in its vibrations, there seemed to come o'er her soul a peaceful calm, hitherto unknown. At last she was understood; she was loved; a new life seemed to dawn upon her; and even her deep sorrow was tinged with gladness. Day after day, at that calm sunset, how would she sit and listen to the sweet tale of pardoning love, till she was enabled to rest all her hopes of happiness on a crucified Redeemer, and in simple trust to say, 'Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides Thee!' No longer did she sorrow as those who are without hope. The oil of joy had been given in exchange for mourning; whilst in faith she could look forward to meeting again those whom she loved, in that land where there is no sin, no sorrow, and where partings are unknown. Till then, she felt that there was a work for her to do on earth; and, with a simple-minded consecration of herself to the service of her Lord and Master, she determined that henceforward she would live for Him,—her one aim to lead other sorrowing ones to the same Saviour.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 SAM. XVII. 45.

HERE are two men, and in these men two nations, two religions: two bodies or companies,—the seed of the woman, and the seed of the serpent. Israel and Philistia are now brought face to face. There must be war, not peace: not even an alliance, not even a truce. The world's table is not spread for the church, nor the church's table for the world. The 'earth' may sometimes help the woman, and swallow up the floods which would overwhelm her: but friendship with the earth is not to be cultivated or sought after. The friendship of the world is enmity with God.

Here are two men,—the one the personification of power, the other of weakness; the one of self-reliance, the other of confidence in God. We see man, nothing but man, in the one: God, nothing but God, in the other. In the Philistine we see man fighting against God, in David man fighting for God. What the world admires and prizes is to be found in the one, what it despises in the other.

One thing marks them both: they are full of courage and of confidence; both equally sure of success, though the one boasts, and the other boasts not. The sources and grounds of their confidence are very different; but their confidence itself seems in both very much alike.

The object of each is, in one respect, different; in another, the same. They meet for battle,—each bent on the overthrow of the other. But Israel has not provoked nor challenged the conflict; nor is Israel desirous of seizing Philistia. She has Jerusalem: why should she seek Gaza? But Philistia would fain have Israel and her land in her power, and makes continual inroads for this end. She is not content with Gaza and Ashkelon; she must have Jerusalem and Bethlehem.

But it is not the Gentile giant that I ask you specially to notice, but the Jewish boy, the stripling of Bethlehem. In him we have—

I. The rejection of human weapons.—He was fully aware (1) of the greatness of the issue depending on this combat; (2) of the strength of the adversary; (3) of his own weakness; (4) of the great things to which he had pledged himself. Yet he declines to avail himself of any of those things, which would have helped to make up his deficiency, and made him, as man would say, adequate for the struggle. He takes only that which is expressive of feebleness,—which would make him incur the imputation of being a fool, like the apostle in after years. He had to become 'weak,' as well as a 'fool,' that he might be both wise and strong. His taking unlikely and unsuitable human weapons was more expressive of his faith than if he had taken none; for, through such, God got the opportunity of showing his power,—his power, not as directly coming down from heaven, but as coming through the feeble instrumentality of a shepherd, and a shepherd's sling. It was God identifying himself with David, and using the sling as his own two-edged sword. Thus the true beginning of all strength is weakness; the starting-point for success is the abnegation of self-power and human appliances. How often is it true, of individuals, and of churches, and of societies, that they are too strong for God to work by or with; too well equipped, or too well organised; too rich, or too numerous, or too great, for God to get glory from! He must have his work done by hands, regarding which there will be no mistake as to who is the doer of the whole work, and the author of all the success. David did not reject these weapons because they were sinful. He often used the sword, and the spear, and the shield in fighting the battles of the Lord. He had builded a house for an armoury, wherein there hung a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men. But, in certain cases, that which is lawful is not expedient. Lawful instruments sometimes become, if not unlawful, at least inexpedient and useless, when they give God no room to make bare his arm. We are, generally speaking, far too solicitous about our strength, and forget that it is always by this weakness that God works. We are too solicitous about intellect, learning, numbers, money, as if we could have no hope of success without these. No one is too weak to work the work of God; many are too strong. We are slow to believe this, slow to act on it. Yet it is one of the great truths on which God has set his seal during the ages past.

II. The adoption of divine weapons.—David leaves the human weapons to the Philistine; he prefers the divine. The sight of human weapons in his adversary had not made him afraid to do battle with him, nor made him say, Oh that I had a sword like his! And as he drew nearer, and saw his whole strength and array, his confidence does not sink; it rises. He sees in the giant an enemy of the living God, and his weapons as, therefore, directed against Him. That sword, that spear, that shield, are used against Jehovah, God of Israel. David is not dismayed, but goes forward triumphantly, assured of being more than conqueror. He has a weapon,—only one,—forged on no human anvil, brought out of no human armoury. It is called 'the name of the Lord.' With this he can face not only Goliath and the Philistian armies, but Satan and the hosts of hell. This 'name' is our weapon still. It is sword, and shield, and spear. Armed with it, we can do any work, fight any battle, engage any foe. Only let us be sure that we are on God's side, and our enemy against Him, we can go forward with confidence. 'If God be for us, who can be against us?' is one side of the maxim. 'If we be for God, who can be against us?' is the other. In using this name as a weapon, or as a plea, I come as if God and I were one; as if God, and not I, were on the battle-field. We stand in God's stead, and He in ours. We fight in God's stead, and He in ours. It is not so much we that work as He. Using his name, is simply confiding in his revealed character and sure word, and in nothing of ourselves,—making use of no arm of flesh, no power of man's arm or man's intellect, but Jehovah's alone, the Lord God of Israel. Have faith in God! Not in man, nor in the flesh, nor in genius, nor in science, nor in numbers, nor in rank, nor in influential names, nor in great schemes, but in the living God—David's God and ours.

INCARNATE LOVE DELIGHTING IN A SINNER'S LOVE.

BY THE REV. JOHN COX, IPSWICH.

'She loved much.'—LUKE VII. 47.

WHAT the name of this person was, where she lived, and what her after history was, we know not; but this we know, that 'she loved much.' Nor have we on record a single word uttered by her. No confessions indicating deep penitence—no hymns of wondering rapturous praise are preserved and handed down to posterity. She says nothing; but the Lord speaks for her, and says that 'she loved much.' How brief, how wonderful, how blessed the history of 'this woman who was a sinner!' She just flits before us for a little while; her whole history does not take five minutes to read; and yet what an impress has she left on all time—what a beneficial influence has she put forth on tens of thousands! When Elisha had restored the dead child to life, and called in the waiting, longing mother to receive her son, it is beautifully added, 'that she came in, fell at his feet, and bowed herself to the ground, took up her child, and went out.' With what a burden in her arms, and what a blessing in her heart, did this mother go out! So this woman, who was a sinner,—bereft, as she had been, of character, of joy, of hope, of all human sympathy,—having found pardon and blessing in Jesus, took up her great load of peace, a burden which should ever after 'unburden all other burdens,' be as wings to her soul, and strength to her heart,—she took it up at Christ's bidding, and went out. It is true she was hissed at as she went out, by the scornful murmurers at the feast; but she heeds them not, for the Lord says of her, 'She loved much;' and He also says to her, 'Go in peace.'

Yes, this woman that was a sinner, this woman without a name, without a home, without a character, without a single word to say on her own behalf, without any recorded after-history,—this sinning, silent, weeping, ministering, adoring woman, LOVED MUCH. Ah! how many who think themselves righteous, who have a name among men, who possess a home full of earthly joy, and by whom words have been uttered that are recorded and praised—how many of earth's favoured ones lack such a love as calls forth the Saviour's approval!

She came to Jesus at his call, and was welcomed. She was owned by Him, delighted in by Him; she is, and ever will be, used by Him for his own glory and the good of others. This path to safety, happiness, honour, and usefulness is still open. Jesus still stands and cries, 'Come, ye weary, and find rest; come, ye thirsty, and drink the living water; come to me, loose your burdens, and find rest; come to me, quench the thirst of sin, and be made a fountain of blessing!' Few give heed to Him. Concerning most He has to say, 'Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life.' Over many He uttered this lament when on earth; but not over all. There were glorious exceptions, and this is one.

There is some reason to conclude that this beautiful incident related by Luke, occurred immediately after the Lord's discourse, recorded in Matt. xi. There the Lord speaks of himself as 'the Son of man, who came eating and drinking;' that is, He spake of himself as a social person, as indeed He ever manifested himself to be. On that occasion He also uttered the ever memorable words: 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' As usual, there were scribes and Pharisees, publicans and sinners, among his auditors. A Pharisee invited Him to his house to meat, and Jesus went. 'A woman in the city, who was a sinner,' came also to that feast, quite unbidden, and very unwelcome, as regards the Pharisee and his friends. It may be that she had heard the 'woe' of Jesus against the impenitent, and trembled; and the 'Come unto me' of Jesus to the weary, and had trusted; and, behold, she is soon at his feet weeping. Blessed station for the worst of sinners; thither the vilest may still go!

In contemplating the path of Jesus, and tracing his history, we see Him having to do with many slow-of-heart followers, and some of the very worst of sinners. Who could be slower of heart and weaker of purpose than some of those who were constantly with Him, such as Thomas, Philip, and Peter? Who could be in a worse condition physically, than the raving maniac, whom a legion of devils once inhabited? Who nearer to hell than the dying thief? Who more vile and repulsive than this town-sinner? Yet we behold all these, and many more like them, brought to his feet, and into his kingdom, and bound around his brow for a diadem of glory.

But Jesus says, 'Seest thou this woman?' Let us look at her. She has gained her much-desired station. She is at his feet. Let who will frown, she is there. She touches the Lord. He must know it; yet she is not frowned on or repulsed. Oh! read the simple narrative again and again; there is melody and mercy in every syllable. The description of the woman, and the loving testimony of Jesus to her, are full of tenderness. Behold the wondrous processes of grace, and hearken to the words of incarnate love! What an unveiling of the human heart! What a discovery of the Saviour's heart, and through Him of the very heart of God! But we must again turn to the words so oft repeated: 'SHE LOVED MUCH.'

These are words full of deep meaning. In one sense they are common enough, and in another and higher sense very uncommon. Fulfilled in one way they are most evil, and in another way most blessed. It is indeed no uncommon thing for persons to love, and even to love much; too much a great deal. Over how many graves in every cemetery might these three words be placed as a true epitaph?—He, or she, loved much! Yes; but what, and who? Over the grave of the drunkard, the fornicator, the covetous, the selfish, these words might be truly written; and how terrible they look! Fearful facts are embodied in the words, 'lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God;' 'lovers of their own selves.' We may advance some steps further, and think of the love of wives, husbands, mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, friends, philanthropists; all good in their places, all well as far as they go, but all ruinous, if not surmounted by, and subordinated to a higher, nobler love. For if any man (however amiable in the relationships of life, however charitable and kind towards the poor—1 Cor. xiii. 1-3)—'If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maranatha.'

'Seest thou this woman,' immortal soul? Pass her not by in scorn. Jesus bids you come and learn the great lesson, not from her merely, but from HIM, sitting alongside of her. You must learn of Him, if ever you learn to love. But come and take your station with her; there is plenty of room and a hearty welcome. You require healing, and here is the great Physician; you need salvation, and here is an infinite Saviour; you want instructing, and a school is before you. Be a docile scholar at the feet of the great Teacher. It may be profitable to propose a few questions, and to endeavour to answer them.

I. Who was the loved one?—The Lord does not mention himself; He does not say, 'She loved me much.' He might have said so, and have added to this great fact, that she now loved her own soul, who before was its worst enemy; that she now loved holiness, who so lately lived, and moved, and had her being in sin; that she now loved God, to whom she had so long said, 'Depart!' that she now loved her fellow-creatures, even those whom she had laboured to lead down to the chambers of death (Prov. v.). All this, and much beside, came through loving Him. Until Christ is loved, nothing else sublime or spiritual is really loved. Till then the soul grovels in the mire; but, loving Jesus, it soars into the heavens in communion, and spreads itself over the earth in compassion. And He is worthy to be loved; He is altogether lovely; He is infinitely loving; and He is 'THE BELOVED.' He is the Beloved of God, of angels, and of saints; they all testify of his excellency, and invite us to love Him. 'There must be something somewhere I cannot love too much,' says one. 'Behold,' says God, 'my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' He is not merely something, but everything—the 'ALL.' Not words, things, systems, doctrines, precepts merely, have we to love; but a PERSON—One who sustains all saving offices; fills up all tender relations; is set forth by all beautiful resemblances. Oh, love Him! He has done everything to win your love; He calls for it, He prizes it, He will return it, He will account it his heart's treasure, part of his fulness, an element of gladness in which He will dwell. Love Him much. You cannot think how much He hath loved you. This woman loved much; Jesus loved more. Do you think that when this saved soul went in peace, she went out of the room thinking on her own 'much love?' No, no! Christ could trust her for that. She (no doubt) realized his love so deeply, and thought of it so highly, that she did not reflect with complacency on her own love at all. Besides, the Lord had told her that it was not her 'much love,' but her simple faith, that had saved her. The Lord's testimony concerning her, that she had much forgiven, even before she came to his feet with her tears and precious ointment, must be carefully kept in mind. Somewhere or somehow she had heard about Him—believed on Him; God had put away her sin, and she had realized it was so. Now she comes to Christ's feet to express her gratitude, and there she received the gracious recognition of Christ, and a further realization of the joys of pardon, as she hears from his own lips, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee; thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace.' It may be that at first her faith was not much, but little;

but this we know, that whether weak or strong, it led her to Christ, it saved her from sin, and it received salvation. We must believe the words of Jesus, trust his salvation, meditate on his love and loveliness, if we would love much, do much, and then think very little about it all. Oh! how true is it, as regards the deepest love to the Saviour,—

'Fainter than the pale star's ray,
Before the noontide blaze of day;
And lighter than the viewless sand,
Beneath the wave that sweeps the strand,
Is all the love that angels know,
Or in redeemed hearts can glow,
Compared, O Saviour, with thine—
Eternal, fathomless, divine!'

II. Let us next ask, Who was the loving one?—'She loved much.' She was, as we have seen, a sinner, and a notorious one; she was a hearer, and an attentive one; she was a believer, and a simple one. She just took the Lord Jesus at his word. Faith had 'come by hearing.' Christ said 'Come,' and she went. She believed that He meant what He said, and acted on it. Christ spake of burdens and rest. She was weighed down with an intolerable burden; she wanted rest. Her going to Christ was the proof that she believed Him, and believed or trusted in Him. And her faith worked love. The worst of sinners may become the greatest of saints. Yea, not only may, but actually have. Paul was 'the chief of sinners;' but where do we find a more holy, happy, honoured believer? Of all preachers, Peter was the most successful (Acts ii., xiv.). Yet how forward, how fickle and foolish had he been! The most triumphant words of burning devotion came from his lips, whose burdened bleeding soul had cried, 'Have mercy upon me, O God!' 'Heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee!' Let not those who have a deep sense of personal unworthiness think that it is true humility for them to take a lower position as regards joy, peace, hope, and nearness than others; if you get this thought in your minds, you will not love much. This suggests a third question.

III. Why did she love much?—Because 'she had much forgiven.' The Lord puts the question, concerning the two debtors, 'Which of them will love him most?' And when Simon answered, 'I suppose that he to whom he forgave most,' the Lord said, 'Thou hast rightly judged;' and adds, 'Seest thou this woman? she hath much forgiven, and therefore she loveth much.' She had sins, and they were many; but mercy was above them. God multiplied pardons (Isa. lv. 8). And then she 'loved much.' God's 'much more' is beyond the sinner's many. Oh, do not reverse the order, and magnify your sin above his mercy! Our sins are 'more in number than the hairs of our heads;' but God's mercies are 'more than the sands of the sea;' and who can count all those particles that girdle round the million leagues of ocean? This fact should awaken confidence towards God, and produce complacence in Him. 'I have blotted out,' He says, 'as a thick cloud thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins; return unto me, for I have redeemed thee.' Oh, there is a mighty power in a realized pardon, to produce love to Him who pardons and pronounces the pardon; to Him who procured it, and for whose sake it is granted; and also love to Him who reveals the Saviour, and by Him brings the soul to God, thus establishing the sweetest friendship where there was the darkest enmity. Thus there is true love, and deep undying gratitude to a triune God of love.

If then we would love much, we must study pardoning love. The loving heart of God—the bleeding heart of Christ—the yearning heart of the Spirit of grace, when believingly thought upon, will draw out our love. 'Be ye therefore imitators of God, as dear children, and walk in love.' What does the 'therefore' refer to? Where does this lever rest which alone can move the soul in the way of love? It rests on the Rock of forgiveness. 'God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you, therefore walk in love.' 'The joy of the Lord is our strength;' we joy in God through Jesus Christ when we receive the atonement; and there is a mighty motive-power in the joy of being forgiven.

'I can assure you,' says M'Cheyne, 'from all that ever I have felt of it, the pleasures of being forgiven are as superior to the pleasures of an unforgiven man, as heaven is higher than hell. The peace of being forgiven reminds me of the calm blue sky, which no earthly clamours can disturb. It lightens all labour, sweetens every morsel of bread, and makes a sick-bed soft and downy. Yea, it takes away the scowl of death.'

A little girl of five years old once said to her mother, 'Do you know when I feel the happiest?' Her mother answered, 'I suppose when you are good.' 'No,' said she, 'but when I feel very sorry for having been naughty, and God has forgiven me.'

How sweet is it to be forgiven! Yes, it is sweet, and it is strength also. The soul grateful for pardoning mercy will boldly confess the Saviour, and be truly consecrated to Him.

IV. What came of this love?—'She loved much.' What resulted from it? What came from her, and what came to her? She loved much, and she did much, she gave much. She gave her best. 'She brought an alabaster box of ointment, and stood at his feet behind Him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment.' She gave herself, her tears, her property, her service, and that in the face of all opposition. She gave all directly and spontaneously to Him whom she loved. As we before saw the power of pardon to produce love, so now we see the power of love to produce consecration. Those who love will be devoted and diligent, and that in proportion to their love. They will also be humble and penitent when presenting their best to the Lord. Those surely do not love much who give grudgingly, and who do little. 'O Lord,' says good Bishop Hall, 'in vain shall we profess to love Thee if we do nothing for Thee.' 'He,' says Jesus, 'that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me.' Not mere feeling, but doing the will of God, is the criterion of love. 'Not the child that is often hanging round the mother's neck gives the strongest proof of affection, but the child that obeys the mother's commands.' We cannot now minister to Jesus personally; but we may serve Him in his gospel, and do good to his members. In this sense we may still reach down to his feet, and He will say, 'Whatsoever ye did unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me.' Let us thus study the deep humility, lowly penitence, and grateful service of this woman, all flowing from ardent affection, and seek grace to go and do likewise.

Then we too shall have the commendation of the Lord. Notice what came to her, as the result of these manifestations of much love. For a time she seemed not to be noticed. She was observed; but nothing was said to her. Indeed, there seems to have been a silence pervading the company, during what was counted her intrusive act. Simon 'thought within himself.' The Lord Jesus heard every tick of his proud heart. The woman, too, had her thoughts and feelings; and the Lord had his as He observed both parties, but had delightful fellowship only with one, and that the despised one. At length He broke the silence. Oh! how wise, how wondrously merciful, are his words! He had 'somewhat to say,' and He delivered the beautiful and well-known parable of 'the two debtors.' Ah! there was a heart just below Him, and very near and dear to Him, that made the application as fast as the words came from his loving lips. 'I am that five hundred pence debtor.' The Lord went on, 'Nothing to pay; all forgiven; frankly, frankly!' Oh, how did her faith feed on that word 'frankly!' Surely, thought she, this is enough. Mercy itself can go no further than this. Pardoned sinner, it can and it will go much further; you as yet know not the tenderness and extent of mercy, and how gloriously it will triumph. Open thy heart wide, weeping one; prepare for greater wonders! Behold, He turns to thee! Hark! He takes up thy case, describes thy character, recites thy every act, contrasts it with the conduct of the proud Pharisee, whose glance thou wast so afraid to meet; He acknowledges thy tears, thine ointment, thy kisses—yes, thy kisses; the holy Jesus says, thou hadst 'not ceased to kiss my feet;' and then He mentions thy sins: He says, they are many. Weeping sinner, you know that well, but He knows it better; and next (now open thine ear wide, open thy heart too) He says, THEY ARE ALL FORGIVEN. No penance to perform, no price to pay, no time to wait,—ALL forgiven now; at once and for ever forgiven! The guilty load is gone, the heavy curse is annihilated. Thou art free; great sinner, 'go in peace.' Ah! how it was all to be done thou didst not know then, nor how much it would cost Him who spake that delightful word 'forgiven,' and bade thee 'go in peace,' to procure this pardon. But we know somewhat of this, and so didst thou afterwards, and now we join together to sing—

> 'We see the blood of Jesus shed,
> Whence all our pardons rise;
> The sinner views the atonement made,
> And loves the sacrifice.'

Thus we learn that there comes to this much loving one from the Lord words of consolation, commendation, and counsel. 'Her sins are forgiven.' 'She loved much.' 'Go in peace.'

V. One closing question: Does Christ speak thus of us?—He said so of one; it must have been true. If it is true of us, Christ will say so; but He will not say so if it is not true. Do we love Christ at all? What say our thoughts; do they dwell on Him? What say our wishes; do they desire Him? What say our affections; do they delight in Him? What says our course; do we diligently aim to serve Him? If you love sin,—if you are the slave of any lust,—you do not love Him. If your chief aim is to get the world, you do not love Him. If you are prayerless, selfish, envious, proud, passionate, you do not love Him. But though you may be all this, and may have lived for years without any love to Christ, all can be pardoned, and you begin to love; and all shall be pardoned, if you go as this woman did, taking Christ at his word, and depending simply on his atoning blood. 'God is in Christ reconciling,' and you may know it, —may have your enmity slain, and begin a life of love; and this will be heaven begun. The very worst and most depraved of sinners may thus be saved. The very outcasts of earth may here find a full forgiveness, a complete salvation, and prove the feet of Jesus to be the very gate of heaven. And while we would despair of none, let none despair. Here is the birthplace of a deathless hope for the most desponding soul; for here is the grave of sin, even the fathomless ocean of redeeming mercy. 'Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea,' even the sins of all who are willing to be saved in God's own way.

And thou, poor miserable soul, toiling and wandering, seeking rest and finding none, then thou wilt find the true secret of happiness. Jesus will 'take thee, and heal thee, and let thee go.' He will say, 'Go in peace,' and He will go with thee till life shall end; and thou shalt be with Him in the palace of glory, even in his Father's house for ever. Oh, you who know these things by experience, you who have much forgiven, 'love much!' See how all who are at Jesus' feet ministering are observed by Him. He notices what you are, and what you do. Your thoughts, feelings, and actions are registered, and will be revealed. The day is coming when the fire will burn up every religion but the religion of love. Will ours stand the test? The day is coming when nothing but what has been done in love, and from love, will obtain the plaudits of the righteous Judge. Are we likely to hear Him say, 'Well done?' Will there be cups of cold water, and boxes of ointment, kisses of affection, and tears of sympathy, set down to our account, for the Lord to acknowledge in that day? What are we doing for the Lord and for his people? What sacrifices are we making? what services are we rendering?

In that day, even as now, the life and death, the person and work of Jesus, will be the only foundation of hope and the only reason for the bestowment of salvation; but the evidences of faith must then be forthcoming, and the degree of the Lord's approbation, and the measure of the reward, will be in proportion to our 'abounding in the work of the Lord,' and our own self-abasement for the glory of the Lord. Love much, if you would be happy here and honoured hereafter; and if you would love much, live on Jesus, abide in Jesus, be rooted and grounded in Jesus; so shall your life and lip say, 'We love Him, because He first loved us.'

THE BLIND POSTMAN.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY.

BLINDNESS is undoubtedly one of the greatest of earthly calamities; for by the loss of sight a man is at once deprived of all the enjoyment which is directly derived from viewing the glories of the physical creation. He can no longer admire the beauties of the rosy-fingered morn, or the gorgeous splendours of a summer sunset.

To him the verdant freshness of the early spring, the luxuriant flowers of summer, and the many-tinted foliage of autumn, are all as nothing, or are things which live only in the memory and imagination.

Life, too, in its more serious and practical aspects, becomes a far more arduous struggle when its battle has to be fought in darkness. And although those who suffer from this dire calamity commonly excite much commiseration, and not a little true sympathy, it is to be feared that many of the efforts made on their behalf only aggravate and complicate the sufferings they were intended to alleviate. Notwithstanding all this, we propose showing in the following simple story, that even without sight much real enjoyment may be had in life, and that by frugality and well-directed industry, comfort and independence may be achieved.

William Roberts, the subject of our story, was a cabinetmaker, and resided in a small village, about two or three miles from the market town of S——. He had married early in life a thrifty, comely lass; and as years rolled smoothly on, their happy home was made still more joyful by the presence of prattling little ones. But many a bright day ends in a dark and stormy night, and such it seemed would be the case with William Roberts' day of life.

It was a lovely evening in August, the sky was clear, the sun shone brightly, and the trees were still green and fresh; while the ripened grain, some waiting for the reaper's sickle, and some standing in shocks ready to be garnered, told of coming joy and plenty. As Roberts walked from the town towards his cottage, at the conclusion of his day's work, he was much struck with the prospect around him, and feelings of gratitude to the great Father of all arose within him, when he thought of the many providential mercies he enjoyed. When within about half a mile of the village, and as he was crossing a small bridge, his attention was attracted to a child, about six or seven years of age, who was playing on the bank of the stream below. He stood watching the child for some minutes, when, to his horror, the little one, in attempting to pick a water-lily at some distance from the bank, lost his balance and fell into the stream. Roberts, who was an active man and a good swimmer, immediately ran down the bank, and throwing off his hat and coat quickly, plunged into the stream. But the current was rapid, and several minutes elapsed before he was able to overtake the floating child; but at length he did so, and soon bore it safely to land. But in climbing up the bank, which was rather precipitous, and covered with small bushes and underwood, his foot slipped, and as he fell forward with his senseless load, a small twig pierced his left eye, and produced such excruciating agony, that for some minutes he lost all consciousness. Some labourers, who happened to be passing near the spot, ran to the assistance of the man and child, and soon succeeded in restoring animation to the latter; but what to do with Roberts they scarcely knew. At length, however, one of them was despatched to the town to procure medical assistance, while the others assisted him to walk, or rather carried him to his home. Mrs. Roberts, who had prepared her husband's tea, and was every minute expecting his return, was of course thrown into a state of great excitement and alarm when she saw him borne towards the cottage in the arms of the labourers. But she did what she could to restrain her feelings, and tried as well as she was able to alleviate her husband's racking pains. After what appeared a terribly long time, though it was in reality little more than half an hour, the doctor arrived. But he could do very little; for the twig had pierced the ball of the eye, and he at once saw that there was little or no hope of saving the sight. He, however, did what he could to allay the sufferings of the agonized patient, and, after some time, left him for the night. That was indeed a terribly long and dark night for poor Roberts. The inflammation in his eye was so strong that his head seemed literally on fire, and he could do nothing but groan and turn from side to side in his bed.

After some days the violence of the pain somewhat abated, and he was enabled to leave his bed; but in less than a week a relapse took place, and the inflammation becoming more violent than ever, spread to the other eye, and when he again left his bed he had lost all perception of light.

And then followed weeks and months of forced inactivity during the day-time, and of consequent restlessness during the night, when there seemed to be nothing to do but to get up in the morning and long for bed-time, and then to go to bed and long for morning. Occasionally some friend or neighbour would drop in; and then, if their conversation happened to be lively, Roberts forgot his troubles, at least for the time; but when they had gone, the old feeling of depression and despondency soon returned. Sometimes the clergyman would pay him a visit, and read some words of consolation from the good old Book, and then talk, not always very judiciously or reasonably, about resignation; and Roberts, as a Christian, tried to be resigned. But the struggle was a hard one; and if he did not murmur, he certainly desponded. With regard to a man's being resigned under affliction, it should be borne in mind that there is a great difference between one who is simply deprived of sight, and another whose whole frame is utterly prostrated. In the latter case, resignation is natural and proper, and therefore comparatively easy; but in the former case, while the other faculties of the body remain unimpaired, resignation to a life of indolent dependence, if not a sin, is certainly a grave error. At other times, Farmer Wilson, a hearty, jovial old fellow, who had never had a day's illness, or serious disappointment in his life, and who consequently knew very little about how people feel when they are ill, or have had all their hopes blighted at one stroke, would call in, and tell Roberts to keep up his spirits and not give way too much. Mrs. Collins, the landlady of the village inn, occasionally looked in, and by way of cheering the sufferer, would recount all the horrible accidents, painful illnesses, or sudden deaths she had ever seen or heard of during her life. But it never occurred to any one to suggest any rational amusement or employment by which a subsistence could be gained, or the time could be made to pass more pleasantly.

Roberts had been a prudent, saving man, and had joined a club, besides saving sufficient money to purchase the cottage he lived in, and to have a few pounds still in the savings bank. But the time during which he could receive allowance from the club had nearly expired: his savings were not great, and when they were gone what was he to do? What was he to do? This question he asked himself a thousand times a day, but could find no answer to it. He shrank from the thought of receiving parish relief; but what was he to do? The poor man whose child he had saved from drowning was only a day labourer, and had a wife and seven young children to support; so that it was out of his power to render any material assistance to the deliverer of his child. But of an evening he would sometimes come in and do a little work in the garden, and would generally bring a few eggs in his pocket, as a 'little bit of a relish' for Roberts' breakfast. The other neighbours, too, were very thoughtful, and would assist in various little ways; but still the old question returned, What was to be done for a living?

CHAPTER II.

SHOWING THE POSSIBILITY OF DOING SOMETHING.

When matters had gone on as we have related for some months, it happened that Dr. S——, an eminent oculist from London, was staying on a visit with Mr. Jones, the surgeon who had attended Roberts from the commencement of his troubles. Mr. Jones told his friend of Roberts' case, and the two gentlemen drove out one day to see him. After carefully examining Roberts' eyes, Dr. S—— gave it as his opinion that everything which offered any chance of success had already been tried, and that there was now no hope of recovering the sight.

'And what shall I do?' exclaimed Roberts, in a state of despair. 'My wife and children will starve, for I can't work, and we shall all have to go to the parish.'

'Have you tried any kind of work?' inquired Dr. S——. 'There are a good many things that some blind people manage to do. Some learn to make mats, others baskets, and others brushes.'

'But I am sure I couldn't do anything of that sort. I can hardly find my way about the house!'

After a good deal of conversation, the thoughtful physician, on ascertaining that Roberts had formerly been a cabinetmaker, observing that one of the bolts of the door was out of order for want of a few screws, suggested that while he and Mr. Jones made another call a little farther on, Roberts should endeavour to put in the screws and re-adjust the bolt. The poor man smiled incredulously, and shook his head mournfully; but the doctor urged the matter playfully, and at length left to make his visit. Roberts sat still for a good while, and then said to his wife, 'I suppose I must try.'

'I am sure, William, you had better not. You can't do it; and you will only cut your fingers.'

'As for cutting my fingers, Mary, that doesn't matter much; and I know that Dr. S—— will expect me to try. Go to my tool-box and find me a gimlet, a screw-driver, and two or three small screws, and I'll just make a try.'

He did make a try, and succeeded too, though his wife, poor soul, was trembling all the time, and expected to see him lose every finger-tip he had. His success made him suddenly remember that a piece of one of the boards in the floor had given way; and he now conceived the bold design of attempting to repair it, by way of further proving 'what could be done!'—which was now said in a somewhat more cheerful tone. His wife was now sent for a chisel, and she brought him the bluntest one she could find, still trembling for his poor fingers. He soon discovered that the chisel would not do its work, and so his wife with great reluctance had to find him a sharper one. With this he speedily cleared away what remained of the old board; and happening to have some new board which just matched the old one, he set about cutting off the length he required. But here his trouble began; for when he had cut it off, he found he had not kept in a straight line, and that the board was nearly two inches too short at one end. This completely dispirited him, and he thought it was no use trying any more; and his wife felt half glad, though she was too kind and considerate to say so.

Just at this juncture the two medical men returned, and warmly congratulated Roberts upon his success so far. A consultation of all three was then held, as to the best means of keeping a straight line whilst sawing. After a good deal of talk, it was decided that Roberts should mark off the required length by a notch on each side of the board; and then, by laying another piece of board across, he managed to cut it tolerably straight. The nailing was a comparatively easy part; and when the job was done, all agreed that it was a complete success.

'And now,' said Dr. S——, shaking Roberts warmly by the hand, 'go on and try what you can do in this way. It is a rougher and easier kind of the same sort of work that you have been accustomed to, and I think you will be able to manage it very well. If I can discover that there are any tools invented which will be of use to you, I will write to my friend Mr. Jones, and he will let you know.'

These exploits of Roberts' were soon noised through the village; and before the day was out, all the children, most of the women, and a good many of the men, had been in to see the work. All agreed that it was capitally done; but some looked wisely sceptical, and thought that Roberts couldn't have done it all himself. But while others only wondered and were stupidly astonished, Roberts thought seriously of the matter, and almost began to hope that he could do something.

Next morning, long before his usual getting-up time, Roberts, who had scarcely slept all night for thinking of what he might perhaps be able to do, was up, and groping all round the kitchen and parlour, to see if anything was out of order. He was astonished that he could find his way about so well; he actually knew the dresser from the table, and could find out all the doors and windows in such a manner as he had never been able to do since the terrible darkness had fallen upon him. He discovered that one or two brackets wanted fixing, that the window fastening was a little out of order, and that one of the legs of the table was rather shaky. This, he thought, would give him another day's work; and not wishing to make a noise to disturb his wife, he sat down to enjoy the labour in prospect. Suddenly it occurred to him that he would try to light the fire, just as he used to do every morning before he went to work; and after spending a good deal of time in finding wood, coals, and matches, and after many unsuccessful attempts to light the paper, as the matches would go out before he could find the part of the stove where he had put it, he at length succeeded, to his great satisfaction. When his wife came down stairs, she was greatly astonished to find a good fire and the kettle singing, and wondered how in the world it had all come about. When Roberts told her, she thought that he was really getting too venturesome. She was sure that if he did so again he would burn his fingers, or set fire to the house.

This new achievement excited no less wonder than the former ones had done; and during the day, several of the women slipped in to ask Mrs. Roberts 'whether her good man had lit the fire that morning; for Mrs. Saunders or Mrs. Thomson had told her so, but she didn't think it could be true.' Meanwhile, Roberts was busying himself in doing the little repairs that he found were wanting; and things went on very well, until he came to put a screw or two in the window fastenings, when the screw-driver ill-naturedly slipped off the head of the screw, and went through the next pane of glass.

'My dear William,' exclaimed his wife, running to him in a state of great excitement, 'I know you will hurt yourself. I wish you wouldn't try, for I am sure it is no good.'

'I am afraid so too, Mary,' said her husband; and he sat down despondingly. Still he had to a great extent succeeded; so, after dinner, when his wife had gone out to take home a dress she had been making for Farmer Wilson's wife, he thought he would have another try at the window; and when he had got in all the screws, he managed with an old pocket-knife to cut away the putty, and remove the fragments of broken glass, ready for a new pane to be put in. And when Will Harris, who was a good hand at putting in windows, came in the evening, he declared 'that he couldn't have cleared away the old glass and putty better himself.'

By degrees Roberts went on in his carpentering work, until he had mended or re-made all the doors, shelves, etc., about the house that wanted anything done to them, and some that didn't particularly want any repairs, in order to get his hand accustomed to the work.

About this time, the rector's eldest daughter, a blooming clever girl of about eighteen, came home from school, and thinking that Roberts must be very dull, she used to come in and read to him for an hour or so, two or three times a week. Sometimes she would bring down a volume of Longfellow's or Tennyson's poems, and sometimes Lord Macaulay's History, or Essays, and very often Roberts would enliven the reading, by giving his fair young visitor the benefit of what he had formerly read on the same or any similar subject; for he was an intelligent, thoughtful man, and had, when he could see, been a constant reader; so that these visits became every time more interesting and instructive, both to reader and hearer.

As a consequence of this increased mental and manual occupation, Roberts' health and spirits rapidly improved; but still the old difficulty, as to what was to be done for a living, seemed as far from a satisfactory solution as ever. Their little stock of savings was becoming smaller and smaller every week; and although Mary worked very hard at the dressmaking,—a great deal too hard, indeed, for her cheeks grew paler, and she began to look old and careworn, as William gathered from the remarks of the neighbours who came in to see her,—she could earn but little.

Some friends suggested that he should apply to one of the pension funds for the blind, in London; and although he did not much like the idea of receiving alms in any shape, he submitted, as there seemed to be no alternative at the present. But the replies he received from the first three or four that he tried, were in effect, that his was just such a case as the charity was intended to relieve; but that he would not be eligible for a pension until he was sixty years of age. From one society he found that he could receive a pension when forty years of age; but as he was only about thirty, this seemed to be as useless as the other; for how was he to live during the intervening ten years, even supposing he was successful in gaining the pension when he had become old enough? After a good many fruitless inquiries, he discovered that a large sum of money had been left by the late Charles Day, Esq., and that any one above twenty-one was eligible to receive the pensions distributed by the trustees. But on making an application, he found that, while only 270 could receive pensions, there were already more than 2500 applicants, whose cases had been approved of, but who could not receive assistance from want of funds.

Although these attempts were quite unsuccessful, as far as gaining a pension was concerned, they were not without good results; for, in answer to one of Roberts' applications, he received a report containing some account of teaching the blind to read by means of embossed books. The thing seemed to him very difficult, if not incredible: still he felt interested, and very anxious to make an attempt to learn; and he and Mary would often talk the matter over with Miss Thornton, the rector's daughter, all wondering how ever it could be done. A month or two after, to Roberts' great joy, a blind gentleman came on a visit to the Manor House, and on hearing of Roberts' case he immediately offered to teach him to read. At first the letters seemed very difficult to feel; but in the course of two or three lessons they became easier, and in less than a fortnight Roberts was able to read, very slowly to be sure, two or three verses in the Bible. At this new accomplishment, the wonder of the villagers knew no bounds; and they all declared that Roberts was getting as clever as the parson, and indeed more so, for he always wanted candles on a winter's afternoon, when it got very dark in the church; and it was confidently asserted that Roberts had been overheard reading to himself without any candle or even firelight. Indeed, it seemed probable that if Roberts had lived in the good old time, when witches and their husbands were believed in, he would have been in some danger of being roughly treated for improper connection with the master of black arts. But, after a while, the wonderment passed off; and one or two of the children began to think that they could almost make out some of the large dots themselves.

Roberts soon gained great facility in reading. But then came the difficulty of getting books; for he found, to his dismay, that the New Testament, printed in the system of reading which he had learnt, would cost fifty shillings, and the whole Bible about ten pounds; while in another system the whole Bible would cost more than twenty pounds. The gentleman who had taught him to read, on leaving the village, made him a present of the Gospel according to Matthew; and Roberts afterwards found that the British and Foreign Bible Society had very generously resolved to supply blind persons in needy circumstances with portions of the Bible, in some cases free, and others at cost price; and on making application through the rector, he obtained another of the Gospels, and a volume containing two or three of St. Paul's epistles; so that his wants, only to a limited extent, it is true, were for the present supplied.

(To be continued.)

THE SPANISH BRIGAND:

AN INCIDENT IN THE PRISON LIFE OF MATAMOROS.

MY health (wrote Matamoros) began rapidly to decline from the commencement of the third year of my captivity. I became so weak that I was unable even to walk across my room. I thought, as well as my friends, that the time of my departure was at hand; and I rejoiced in the near prospect of being with my Saviour.

The director of the prison was so struck by my excessive weakness, that he offered me, in the governor's name, the services of any one of the other prisoners whom I might select, to act as my servant. I gladly accepted the proposal.

'Well,' said the jailor, 'whom do you choose?'

'Send me the greatest criminal you have,' I replied.

There was then in the prison a young man of about twenty-eight years of age, who lay under the weight of many accusations, for two of which he was condemned to thirty-eight years of hard labour. He had been a brigand chief. Possessed of savage energy and intrepid courage, he had several times effectually beaten back the officers of justice sent to seize him. Such he had been, and such he still was in the prison. Every one feared him. Often had the jailors, as well as his companions in captivity, suffered from the effects of his brutal strength.

Well, this was the man they gave me for a servant! No doubt the governor was glad to have him separated from the other prisoners. Whatever he was, I received him with joy, and felt moved with deep compassion towards him, when his history was related to me by the jailor.

It was with pleasure on his side that he entered into my service, for in many ways his position was ameliorated. He enjoyed more liberty than heretofore, and also the privilege of receiving in my room the visits of his old father. Formerly he could only see him at a certain distance, and in presence of the jailor.

Little by little, the respect which this unfortunate man had for me was changed into the warmest affection. Several times he said to my mother: 'Ah! madam, if I could set your son at liberty, by shutting up all the jailors in the dungeon, I would do it in a moment;' and I am persuaded he would have made the attempt, if I had not dissuaded him.

When I better understood his character and disposition, I came to the conclusion that, notwithstanding his criminal and depraved life, his heart was still capable of certain noble and generous feelings.

One day he said to me: 'If I had not had bad companions, I never would have robbed; but, urged on by cowards, who dared not act alone, I entered on this wicked path, and soon stealing became habitual to me. At the same time,' he added, with an expression of contentment, 'I have never robbed the poor, and neither my gun nor my poignard have ever shed blood. I was a brigand, certainly, but a brigand who can boast of having been so with honour.' Poor ignorant man!

To me he communicated certain episodes of his history, which, had they come to the knowledge of the authorities, would undoubtedly have brought him to capital punishment. Thus by degrees I got thoroughly acquainted with the previous life of this man, and with the workings of his mind.

One day, seeing me about to begin my customary morning services, he prepared to leave the room. I asked him to remain; he came and sat down beside me. I opened the Bible at the third chapter of St. John. Whilst I read, his face shone with a joy which went on increasing every moment. When I came to the 16th, 17th, and 18th verses, which I read slowly and emphatically, he became very much moved. Such a moment was not to be lost; so I read also the eighth chapter of Romans. We knelt down; and it was given me to pray with fervour and confidence for this man, for whom I already felt a warm affection. On rising from our knees, my companion was shedding tears abundantly.

I do not think I ever spent a happier moment in my life, than that in which I saw this soul enter on the path of eternal life. I left him under this blessed impression. Later I asked him, 'What did you think of what we read this morning? of what God himself says to us?'

'Ah! Don Manuel,' he replied, 'if I had been able to read, I would have known all these things, and I would not have been a criminal. It is very beautiful; I will never forget it. Oh, if I only knew how to read, I would not be so miserable!'

'Well,' I asked, 'how would you like me to teach you to read? would you like to begin?'

'Yes, yes!' he said, with an expression of the most lively joy, and with the energy which characterized him. 'Oh yes; you are truly a father to me. Oh, teach me, and God will reward you!'

'Well,' I replied, 'the reality of your desire will be proved by your application.'

I gave him money to purchase a first spelling-book, and the same day he had the book in his pocket. We began immediately; and from that moment he seized every opportunity for learning, often applying for assistance to those among the prisoners who were able to read. Thus he spent the greater part of the day.

His progress was very rapid; and in about six weeks he could read tolerably. He continued to join me in reading the word of God every morning; and he experienced great joy in being permitted to be present at several religious meetings which took place in my cell during my imprisonment.

From day to day his peace became more complete. He troubled himself no more with planning means of escape, for now he was entirely submissive to the will of God.

Our intercourse became more and more brotherly and Christian. I felt happy in the society of this man. His love extended also to all the other prisoners. He spoke to me with interest of them all. He knew their wants; and his greatest joy was to be able to render them some little service.

Often I saw him reading portions of the New Testament to his companions. He distributed also all the tracts which I possessed; and I am sure that his conduct, in which prudence and firmness were equally blended, must have had a beneficial effect on those around him.

I was most rigorously forbidden to speak to any of the other prisoners; but he was very happy when he could act as the messenger between them and me, carrying them some little comfort or tract, which he gave saying, 'This is what Don Manuel sends you in the name of the Lord.'

Thus every day he made progress in the path which leads to eternal life; and the increasing peace which he enjoyed shone brightly on his face.

One day Mr. Green, an English gentleman who has long taken a deep interest in the evangelization of Spain, came to visit me. He is one of the best friends Spanish prisoners ever had; and he came to my cell to offer me the comfort of his brotherly love. During the day he spent with me, he had a good opportunity of observing the behaviour of my servant, whose life and circumstances I had related to him. Much interested by what I told him, Mr. Green asked him, 'How do you like the prospect of spending thirty-five years in hard labour in the galleys?' 'Ah! sir,' my poor friend answered, 'what are thirty-five years to a man who was condemned to an eternity of woe? Before I became acquainted with Don Manuel, I only thought of how I could escape from prison; and to attain my object, I would even have shed blood. I lived in despair. But all this is changed now. I know that Jesus Christ has come to save sinners; that by his merits my sins are forgiven; that my past life can no longer condemn me, since Jesus is my Advocate. Therefore I go to the galleys peacefully and happily, for I feel assured of the salvation which Jesus has purchased for me; and I shall rejoice when He calls me to leave this world.'

It is impossible for me to express the joy and the emotion of my dear friend Mr. Green on hearing my companion thus speak. From that time he took a deep interest in him, and recommended him to God in his prayers.

The time at last came for my companion to leave the prison and go to the galleys. He shed abundant tears on leaving me, and said, 'I regret very much to be separated from you; but let us comfort ourselves in thinking of Jesus. He never leaves us; and the love of God towards us is unchangeable. We will meet again in his presence.' 'Yes,' I replied, 'let us be faithful unto death, and He will give us the crown of life.'

This is the friend which the Lord gave me in my captivity,—one of the many consolations which He has granted me. The remembrance of this man, who was, when he entered my prison, only a vile criminal, is now dear and precious to me. Oh, how touching is this manifestation of the great love of God towards sinners! Of every soul, where sin still reigns, He can make a temple of the Holy Ghost; and the criminal, even the most degraded, can thus be transformed into the image of our God and Saviour.

CHRISTIANITY AND NATURAL SCIENCE.*

RELIGION, wounded too often in the house of its friends, nauseates, it would sometimes seem, the men of broadest sympathies and of delicate tastes! We acknowledge the stumbling-block, but still throw back the responsibility on the objector, too often himself a worse transgressor. If Christianity shares this reproach,—and we do not deny it,—it shares it rather through the nature it seeks to purify; while, with the mystery and the weakness which attach to man's moral condition here, it provides alone the remedy. But are there what can be fairly regarded as remedial results—a process of recovery—issues of practical value, and a reasonable confidence for the future? I had intended going at some length into this, a most interesting part of the inquiry. I know no argument more assuring to faith than the fruit of Christian truth in the regeneration of fallen man; and if the argument fails to impress the world, it is because the nature of the triumph is above its perception. There is too great a tendency in our day to accommodate the proof to the genius of sceptical inquiry; and instead of man being brought into direct contact with the power of grace, as revealed in the gospel of Christ, we are fascinated with some pleasing description of the general effects of Christian truth on society around us! We reject this evidence as a fatal compromise. It is a result of Christian truth, but not the result which stamps its divinity. It touches a remote point,—if the expression is allowable, it is a diluted manifestation which will not offend certain sensibilities, or reprove the world's Christian profession. The gospel of Christ is thus brought to the whole, who have no need of a physician. We do not accept the evidence; but in those fallen specimens of humanity restored, in those sin-sick souls recovered, we claim the legitimate, the true evidence of the gospel of Christ: 'I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance;' and as it fulfils this end, it confirms the truth of his mission, and meets the wants of humanity.

* From Mr. Guthrie's useful, pointed, and well-timed Lecture, 'Christianity and Natural Science.'

Miscellaneous.

The Bible.—The following is a calculation of the number of books, verses, letters, etc., contained in the Old and New Testaments. They are worth reading and preserving:—

Old Testament.—Number of books, 39; chapters, 929; verses, 33,214; words, 592,439; letters, 2,728,100.

The middle book is Proverbs.

The middle chapter is Job xxix.

The middle verse would be 2 Chronicles xx. 17, if there were a verse more, and verse 18 if there were a verse less.

The word and occurs 35,543 times.

The word Jehovah occurs 6855 times.

The shortest verse is 1 Chronicles i. 25.

The 21st verse of the 7th chapter of Ezra contains all the letters of the alphabet.

The 19th chapter of 2 Kings and the 37th chapter of Isaiah are alike.

New Testament.—Number of books, 27; chapters, 260; verses, 7050; words, 181,258; letters, 828,580.

The middle book is 2 Thessalonians.

The middle chapter is Romans xiii., if there were a chapter less, and xiv. if there were a chapter more.

The middle and least verse is John xi. 35.

Old and New Testaments.—Number of books, 66; chapters, 1189; verses, 40,264; words, 773,697; letters, 3,556,680.

The middle chapter, and least in the Bible, is the 117th Psalm.

The middle verse is Psalm cxviii. 8.

The Universe.—I believe you will find in all histories that that has been at the head and foundation of them all, and that no nation that did not contemplate this wonderful universe with an awe-stricken and reverential feeling that there was a great unknown, omnipotent, and all-wise and all-virtuous Being, superintending all men in it, and all interests in it,—no nation ever came to very much, nor did any man either, who forgot that. If a man did forget that, he forgot the most important part of his mission in this world.—Carlyle.

A Puritan Worthy.—There is the remarkable conversion of worthy Mr. Bolton, a choice minister in the Church of England, in whose life this is recorded, that being eminently profane, a horrid swearer, and much accustomed to mock at holiness, and those who most shined therein, and particularly that excellent man of God, Mr. Perkins, then preacher in Cambridge, whom he much undervalued for his plainness in preaching the truths of God, yea, was near the length of Popery. But on the Lord's gracious appearance to him, he was put to have other thoughts, with a very remarkable change upon him, though with that terror, that, as he said himself, the Lord seemed to run upon him like a giant, throwing him to the ground; and with such a terrifying discovery of sin, caused him roar in anguish, and oft rise in the night on that account—which continued for divers months. Yea, these assaults in the pangs of the new birth were such, that it might have been said, Ut nec color, nec sensus, nec sanguis superesset (that neither complexion, sensation, nor blood remained to him); but at last a blessed sunshine brake up, and shining light.—Fleming's Fulfilling of Scripture.

Broad Church Cant.—'Idolatry to a book,' 'Enslavement to a book,'—these have become cant terms, which it is high time men of 'large and liberal ideas' should discard and toss to the kennels. The people are sick of them. They are used as decoys from the true question respecting the true method of studying the Bible, and the value of its contents. 'Reason enslaved to the Bible hand and foot,' if its contents are true! Is one 'enslaved' to Euclid's Elements because they are true? We thought obedience to truth was perfect freedom, not slavery. Is one an idolater of Newton's Principia, because he appeals to it as an authority on that subject, of which he knows little himself—one track of which he never saw? We are accustomed to call such men sensible, reasonable. Reason is just as much 'enslaved' to any book that is true, as it is to the Bible, granting that to be true,—most 'enslaved' of all to the multiplication-table! Away with such cant! We are told we must be 'scientific' in our investigations. So be it. Here is the Bible, a book—just as much a book as Plato's Republic. What are you going to do with it? Science investigates facts, books as well as others. The Gospels contain sketches of the life and teachings of Christ. His teachings are Christianity; nothing else is. If you are not sure, for all historical purposes, of what He taught, then it is simple nonsense to talk about Christianity. We may talk about religion—about what the Gospels say is religion; but we have no more right to speak of Christianity—that is, of what Christ taught—than we have to call any other system of religion or philosophy after a man, all reports of whose doings and sayings are unreliable. Christianity means the teachings of Christ, as much as Aristotelianism, or Platonism, or Hegelianism, means the teaching of these philosophers; and to say that you have a right to 'wholly set aside' the sayings of Christ, and call your guess of what He said, Christianity, is just as honest as to say that you will set aside what Plato has said, and call your ideas Platonism. We have nothing to say against this system now. Let us understand what 'the scientific' method is, to which we are commended.

God's Ways of Working.—That excellent man Junius, whose life we have in some measure set down by himself, with many notable remarks of providences, and who therein shows the Lord's engaging him at first; how being very loose, and carried away with evil company, yea, tempted to atheism, he was one day moved to go and read the Scripture, and, at the first opening, was trysted with that of the first of John; which, whilst he read, as he says, did suddenly astonish him, and leave a marvellous conviction on his soul of the divinity of the subject, the majesty and authority of the writings, that all day he knew not where and what he was, but thus turns himself with these words to the Lord: 'Thou wast mindful of me, O my God, according to the multitude of thy tender mercies.' Yea, he gives this account, that he then had a sight of the Scripture, which made him see it did exceed all human eloquence; and this was followed with such power, that his body trembled, and his mind became astonished at such a surprising and marvellous light, and from that day he began to be serious in the way of the Lord.—Fleming's Fulfilling of Scripture.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

NAHUM 1. 6. 7.

THROUGHOUT this chapter, and especially in these verses, let us note these two things: 1st, Jehovah's anger; 2d, Jehovah's goodness. They stand out very strongly in this 'burden.'

I. Jehovah's anger.—(1.) It is real. There is such a thing as anger in God. Many are the expressions used concerning it, both in this chapter and elsewhere,—jealousy, vengeance, fury, wrath: all to indicate its existence, and to show us that the human theories of divine universal benevolence are not true,—being got up for a purpose, and that purpose to persuade the sinner's own conscience that he need not be alarmed because of his guilt: and that no one need dread the infliction of punishment, except, perhaps, a few of the most wicked of our race. But God's words are not exaggerations, nor words of course. There is a terrible truth contained in these oft-repeated words of Scripture, 'His anger was kindled.' Loving and gracious as Jehovah is, his anger is real. When Jesus comes the second time, He comes to 'take vengeance.'

(2.) It is righteous.—It is not the rage of selfishness, or passion, or affront. It is judicial anger,—the anger of the righteous Judge. It is anger against sin, against the sinner; anger because of insulted law and dishonoured righteousness,—nothing in it unjust, or cruel, or arbitrary. Then the condemned soul will be compelled herself to say, 'It was all right and just; it shall be right and just to all eternity.'

3.) It is terrible.—Though calm, it is unutterably awful: nay, overwhelming. No power and no numbers shall be able to stand before it. It shall sweep everything before it like a whirlwind. The expulsion from paradise, the deluge, the ruin of Sodom, are specimens of its terribleness. The last one shall be utterly overwhelming.

4.) It is unrestrainable.—Nothing shall turn it aside or soften it when once it is kindled. 'The vengeance of eternal fire,' the 'everlasting burnings,' 'the worm that dieth not,'—these are awful words! No history, no argument, no influence shall prevail, nor pray to the poor soul. God will forget to be gracious; repentance shall be hid from his eyes.

Oh, anger of Jehovah, how real, how righteous, how terrible, how inexorable! Yet let me say one thing. Should you be one of the eternally lost, and should you, in the course of your weary and tormented eternity, say to yourself, 'Oh that God were not so just!' then think what a wish that would be for yourself. Your security against unjust and over-severe punishments is that very justice against which you murmur. Bad as your case may be as the hands of a just God, it would be unspeakably worse at the hands of an unjust God. The anger of a righteous God is, no doubt, terrible; but the unbridled fury of an unrighteous God is something too horrible even to think upon.

II. Jehovah's goodness.—He is good, and He does good. He is kind to the unthankful and the unworthy. God is love. God loves the sinner.

(1.) His goodness is sincere.—He does not utter words of course, nor pretend to feelings which are not in Him. His words mean just what they say; his deeds mean just what they indicate: the works of his hands have a most substantial and authentic expression of goodness. God is not a man, that He should lie, either in his words of goodness or of anger.

(2.) It is powerful.—It is almighty goodness. He is able to deliver those whom He loves. Their interests are safe in his hands. 'He is slow to anger, and great in power.' Who can withstand his love? 'It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth?'

3.) It is watchful.—His eye is on us at all times: specially in the day of trouble. His is watchful goodness. His is the unsleeping eye and the untiring hand. He is not weary of blessing. He delights in opportunities for pouring out his love; and our extremities are his opportunities.

4.) It is unchanging.—Like himself, his goodness is without variableness: not ebbing and flowing, but always flowing. His heart is the heart of the unchangeable One. Not like the tides, or the seasons: but like the sky above us, ever one calm and genial, loving azure, embracing this earth of ours.

Such is the God with whom we have to do. He is righteous, and cannot allow sin to go unpunished and unpunished. Yet is He good and gracious, not willing to destroy or to take vengeance: a God before whom the sinner may tremble; a God in whom the chief of sinners may find forgiveness. I remind you of two passages, which will form the practical improvement of all I have said.

1.) 'The great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?'—It is not yet come, but it is coming. Judgment lingereth not, damnation slumbereth not. It will be a day of terror for the sinner, when the penalties of God shall pour itself out, not in seven vials, or seventy times seven, but in an eternity of vials without number.

2.) 'He is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.'—Such is his goodness now. He is rich in mercy. His patience is beyond all conception or measure. And in his long-suffering there is salvation—salvation to the uttermost. He pities, yearns, pleads, beseeches, spares: prolongs the day of grace; presents pardon, salvation, life, to the ungodliest, freely,—yes, freely to the last! Let this long-suffering goodness draw us, melt us, awaken confidence, and win us to love.

MY SON, MY SON!

BY THE EDITOR.

2 Sam. xviii. 33.

ONCE, walking through one of the narrow streets of Cairo, we heard the voice of wailing and loud lamentation coming from one of the tall houses on our left. The sounds were strong and passionate; to us quite unintelligible, partly from their rapidity, and partly from their unknown Arabic. We asked a missionary who was with us what they were and what they meant. The words, he said, were just 'Ya, walladi, walladi,' repeated, or rather vociferated, violently and rapidly. Their meaning was, 'Alas! my son, my son!' The house was one of mourning. One of the family had died that forenoon; and the wailers were uttering their lamentations over the newly dead. We were at once reminded of David's tears, and cries, and words. Our thoughts went back to the scene at Mahanaim in the land of Gilead. We remembered the well-known description: 'The king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept; and, as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son! . . . . The king covered his face, and the king cried with a loud voice, O my son Absalom! O Absalom, my son, my son!'

We may learn something from David's tears; for they are the tears of him who said, 'I am weary with my groaning; all the night make I my bed to swim; I water my couch with my tears.' And they are tears like his who said, 'Oh that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears!' They are tears like his who said, 'I tell them, even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ.' Nay, they are tears like the tears of Him who wept over Jerusalem in the day of her impenitence and doom.

David wept as a man,—a parent,—who had lost a child, and that child a favourite one. Absalom was slain! The son on whom, in spite of unworthiness, he had lavished so much love, had perished. He should see him no more. Could he but weep?

David wept as a man of God; as one who was fully alive to Absalom's guilt, and who had the fullest conviction of Absalom's certain doom. His best-beloved son had perished in his rebellion; his sin had found him out; his wickedness had overtaken him; he died as he had lived, a rebel against his king, a hater of his father, an enemy to his God. What hope was there for him? David had elsewhere spoken of the wicked going quick to hell; and was not this now realized in his own son? Absalom had gone to his own place; and David knew too well what that place was; for he had said, 'The wicked shall be turned into hell.' What a thought to a father regarding a favourite child! Cut off in his headlong wickedness and proud rebellion, what hope was there for him, or what comfortable thought respecting his undying soul? From the battle-field of his rebellion; from the oak in the wood of Ephraim, he had gone down to hell; and David knew it, saw it, realized it all! How could he but weep? A soul had been lost; and it was the soul of a beloved son! What anguish, what unutterable bitterness in the thought! His Absalom was now gone from him for ever; he should see his face no more, either in this life or in that which is to come. Truly he sorrowed as one who had no hope.

Thus Jeremiah wept for Israel in the day of their wickedness and desolation. 'His soul wept in secret places' for them. Thus Paul wept over the enemies of the cross of Christ; he told them 'weeping' that their end was destruction.

Thus it was that the Son of God wept over Jerusalem. He saw its wickedness, its impenitence, its overthrow, its eternal sorrow. He understood, far beyond what David could do, or Jeremiah, or Paul, what is the doom of a lost soul. He had spoken of his Father's joy over the saved, and of his own like joy in the recovery of the lost. He realized the errand on which He had come to earth. He knew the value of a soul. He could measure its infinite capacity for joy or grief. He knew what the wrath of God was against sin. He knew the certainty and horror of the sinner's doom. He knew that that doom was irreversible. He looked into the eternal future, and saw the everlasting sadness.

He comprehended all that vast reality wrapt up in the words SAVED and LOST. He knew both the light of heaven and the darkness of hell. And with all this before Him, how could He but weep over lost Jerusalem? 'When He beheld the city, He wept over it, saying, If thou' (or, 'Oh that thou') 'hadst known, even thou, in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace!' And again, we read his words: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, which killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not!'

This sorrow was honest and true; these tears were sincere—infinitely sincere. Whether we can comprehend the mystery or not, here is the wondrous fact,—divine grief over lost souls, and divine grief giving vent to itself in human tears. Here was the true David, the Son of God, not only yearning, but weeping over his offspring, his rebellious Absalom,—over those who sought his throne and his life; who not only said, 'We will not have this man to reign over us,' but, 'This is the heir; come, let us kill him.' As no amount of evil in Absalom could quench David's love, or forbid his grief; so no amount of sin and unloveableness can destroy the love of Christ, or turn his grief into indifference, or alienate his tender, gracious heart. The very things which make the sinner unmeet for his complacent love, are the things which make him the object of his compassionate love. It was not because Absalom was a 'pleasant child' that David loved him, and mourned over his untimely death; so it is not because the sinner is pleasant, and obedient, and loveable, that the Son of David yearns, in pitying love, over the sinner. He is his property, as was the sheep the shepherd's; therefore He cares for him. He is his offspring, as was the prodigal the father's; therefore He loves him, and longs after his return. The link between Christ and Jerusalem was something indescribably strong and tender; even such is the link between Him and every sinner upon earth. 'How shall I give thee up?' is still his utterance of bitter grief. 'I do earnestly remember him still,' is to the last the expression of wistful longing after the wanderer, as he goes further and further off. And as he drops into hell, and disappears from this earthly scene within the fiery gate, back from which none return, may we not hear the great David's voice giving utterance to his latest yearning, in the words once uttered so piercingly and pathetically in the tower above the gate of Mahanaim, 'O Absalom, my son, my son?'

It is not for us to attempt to penetrate divine mysteries, or to ascribe to God the feelings, and tears, and sorrows of men. Nothing, we know, can in the very least mar the light of heaven, or interfere with the perfection of the divine blessedness; but if there be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth; if the good Shepherd calls together his happy angels to rejoice with Him over the lost sheep found: can we suppose that there is nothing on the other side, corresponding to the tears of Jesus over Jerusalem, when the long-suffering of God is exhausted, and the sinner, having resisted all love and all entreaty, is abandoned by the God that made him, and perishes, like Absalom, in the midst of his rebellion and ungodliness? Does the infinitely compassionate Jehovah, who has no pleasure in the death of a sinner, contemplate with cold indifference the loss of a soul, and the consignment of the lost one to endless and irretrievable woe?

We need not speculate on so profound a theme, nor attempt to be wise above what is written; but we cannot read of the grief of David over Absalom, without asking what must, in such a case, be in the heart of Him, after the model of whose fatherly heart an earthly parent's heart is moulded; and still less can we read of the tears of Jesus over Jerusalem without feeling that we are at the very gate of an infinite mystery; that a little of the curtain has been drawn aside for a moment, to show us what is the heart of Him who made us towards the most worthless and unloveable of all his offspring. Let us listen, and wonder, and adore. Let us learn also to comprehend something more than we have ever done of the mercy of the Lord our God.

AN INDIAN BISHOP;

OR, SKETCHES FROM THE LIFE OF DANIEL WILSON.

THE estimate formed by two great men of one another, is generally free from those paltry jealousies which mark inferior minds. Of this we have an instance in the tribute to Daniel Wilson's memory, paid by Alexander Duff: 'When he arrived here a quarter of a century ago, he was in the very zenith of his powers of active usefulness; and certainly few men have toiled more, or to more good purpose. Naturally endowed with great energies of mind and body,—energies in his case happily sanctified, and consecrated exclusively to the promotion of God's glory,—he kept all around him in a constant state of friction and glow.' While of Duff we find Wilson writing: 'He is indeed a marked man in his generation—like Dr. Chalmers. But he has worn himself out at the age of forty-eight.'

In presenting our readers with a few sketches from the long and eventful life of Bishop Wilson, we propose to view him under four different aspects:—I. His Business Clerkship. II. His Student and College Life. III. His Pastorate in England. IV. His Episcopate in India.

I. His Business Clerkship.—Born in London on 2d July 1778, he was in infancy remarkably delicate; though, as he passed into boyhood, he became much stronger, having 'a firm step, buoyant spirits, and a handsome intellectual countenance.' Even when at school the boy proved the father of the man, as he used frequently to 'get upon a chair, select a text, and preach sermons to his school-fellows.' Sent to a school under charge of Rev. Mr. Eyre, he was soon appreciated by his master, who said of him, 'There is no milk-and-water in that boy; he will be something either very bad or very good.' Under this master's care he remained till he was nearly fourteen, when he was apprenticed to his maternal uncle, 'an extensive silk manufacturer and merchant.' Here his work was not 'laborious,' but 'constant.' Fourteen hours a day in summer, and thirteen in winter, formed the term of his occupation. Even then, however, he prosecuted his studies diligently—taking two hours, before retiring to rest at night, to extend his knowledge of Latin and French; while notebooks of that period show how he also practised English composition on religious and moral subjects.

Yet at this time, he himself tells us, he was a stranger to the power of vital godliness: 'I could criticise a sermon, and talk and dispute about particular notions; but I loved my sins, and could not bear to part with them. I never had gone so far as to deny any one doctrine of the gospel. I acknowledged them to be true; but for want of that necessary attendant, self-application, I could hear whole sermons, but not a word belonged to me!'

Awakened to serious thought on the importance of prayer, by the passing remark of a young man in the same warehouse, he was soon plunged into a state of deep solicitude about his soul's welfare. A severe mental conflict ensued. He unburdened himself fully to his former master, Mr. Eyre; while, in answer to a query from his mother, 'How is it between God and your soul?' he entered frankly into the particulars of the spiritual crisis through which he was now passing; concluding his letter with the following remark—a sufficient index to the change of sentiment he had undergone:

'It is not the pleasures of this life, nor the possession of its vain riches or honours, which I seek after. No; but it is the happiness of my immortal soul, which must exist for ever and ever. Oh, may the word ETERNITY never enter my ears without impressing my heart!'

It was when in this state of mind that he was introduced to John Newton—so eminently fitted to guide an anxious inquirer to the true source of peace, and to direct him to right views of divine truth and religious experience. Deeply did the Lord wound and exercise the soul of the young clerk; but through all this training he was made to pass with a view to his fitness for future work. Amid the depths through which he had to go, the Divine Physician himself at times drew near,—giving him such glimpses of himself, as tended to revive his drooping and doubting heart. Such expressions as these are cheering, when viewed in connection with the gloom which had overwhelmed his soul:

'All I can do is to look unto Jesus as my only helper, and cry unto Him for mercy; and but for that blessed word UTTERMOST, my case would be hopeless.'

The Lord, who had taken a saving dealing with the soul of Daniel Wilson, at length brought him to repose in quietness and assurance at the foot of the cross; but, at the same time, gave him earnest longings after an enlarged opportunity of spreading the knowledge of Jesus to heathen lands. Speaking of his emotions as he encompassed the Lord's table, he says: 'I have even wished, if it were the Lord's will, to go as a missionary to heathen lands,'—a desire which was accomplished thirty-five years after it had been excited within his bosom. The first uprisings of this desire he had checked, as the offspring of pride; but again and again it returned, till the question of its real origin was forced on his inquiring mind. Satisfied at length that it was from the Lord, he made it known to his friend Mr. Eyre. On a similar communication being made to his father, he at once opposed it; but the young aspirant to the work of the ministry was not to be repressed. And in writing to his mother a full statement of his reasons for desiring a change, he concludes by saying: 'I feel sure it is of the Lord; and I humbly believe that He, in his good time, will work, and then none can let it. When He is pleased to "lay to his hand," mountains will sink into plains, rough places become smooth, crooked things be made straight, and an open door set before me.'

A delay of a twelvemonth had been urged by some of his friends; but the restless spirit of the future metropolitan grew weary of such a postponement. He resolved to take the opinion of the celebrated Rowland Hill, of Surrey Chapel. On stating his views fully to him, he expressed a deep interest in his case; but, on the question being put to Mr Hill, 'Do you think it my duty to wait till I am out of my time, before I give myself up to the work?' the aged minister, somewhat to the youth's astonishment, replied: 'Yes, certainly; your time is not your own. By a mutual agreement, you have bound yourself for a certain number of years, and that obligation is superior to any other. I hope that, during this time, you will manifest, by your walk and conversation, that the grace of God is in your heart, and that may be instrumental in altering your father's mind more than anything else. Humility is a sweet and guardian grace. If I saw you pert and proud, and wanting to go "without the Lord," I would not give a farthing for you or your preaching either. But if you are humble and child-like, afraid of taking a single step unless the Lord point out the way, then you will be owned and blessed.'

'A word spoken in due season, how good is it!' From the visit to Mr. Hill the young apprentice anticipated a very different result, as he fancied that a man of his burning zeal would have counselled an immediate entrance on the work of preparation for the ministry. But the counsel he received from him was the very message which his case required, and resulted in his now calmly acquiescing in the advice given by other friends,—discharging with fresh alacrity the duties of his secular calling, watching for opportunities of doing good which presented themselves in his present sphere, and waiting patiently till God might himself open before him the wished-for door.

Sooner than he anticipated that door was opened. His father's scruples were overcome before the expiry of the dreaded twelvemonth. He is emancipated from the shackles of attendance at the warehouse; and we have now to introduce our readers to

II. His Student and College Life.—Mr. Pratt, curate to Richard Cecil, was his first tutor, with a view to his at length entering Oxford; and when, in later days, he was reviewing his early life, and mentioning the names of several, from intercourse with whom he derived much benefit, he says, 'To no one was I more attached than to him who was spared to me and to the church the longest—the Rev. Josiah Pratt, my honoured brother.' Diligence in study marked him from the outset; while he endeavoured to guard against the snares incident to 'constant application to human learning.' Writing to his mother, he says, 'I had rather be as illiterate as a plough-boy, with a warm impression of Christ's dying love upon my heart, and a single aim to enthrone Him in the souls of my fellow-sinners, than a cold-hearted worldling, with all the learning in the universe. Never shun to tell all that is in your heart, as soon as you perceive, or think that you perceive, that I am going back into the world—that I am losing my spirituality, or falling into a bigoted, narrow spirit.'

Resolved to come behind in no gift, he diligently applied himself to every branch of prescribed study; and after six months' preparation, under Mr. Pratt's superintendence, he entered the university. Here he met many young men of a kindred spirit,—being fortunate enough to enjoy the instructions of the Rev. Isaac Crouch, the pious and accomplished Vice-Principal and Tutor of St Edmund's Hall, 'who retired, as his health declined, after nearly thirty years' service, with the universal benedictions of the young and the respect of the aged resting on him.' Of Wilson's appearance at Oxford, a fellow-student wrote:

'It was obvious that he was no common person; and though he entered under great disadvantages as to classical learning, his determined and extraordinary diligence, aided by robust health, afforded a sufficient pledge of future eminence and success.'

While attending the university, he carried on a most extensive correspondence; many of his letters having been preserved by those to whom they were addressed,—relations, 'school-fellows, college friends, fellow-tutors, brother-ministers,'—which of itself 'proves that there must always have been some powerful influence attaching to his character, and some shadowing out of future distinction.' His conscience was sensitively awake during his college career. We find him making mention of the inward distress he experienced from having one day failed to speak faithfully to a fellow-collegian who, he feared, was deceiving himself, and for not 'having introduced spiritual discourse in a party where he sat for above an hour at tea.' The calmness of his mind at this period may be seen from a remark to his mother: 'It is our mercy, as well as our privilege, that, in our journey to the heavenly Canaan, we have but one thing to trouble ourselves about as to spiritual things, viz. to live near to God; and one as to outward things, viz. to keep in the path of duty. Whilst we are going on humbly, leaving the direction in the hands of God, nothing can be eventually unsuccessful; and should the most adverse circumstances be for a time permitted to crowd around us, while we live near to God, neither our peace nor our safety can be disturbed.' That he had an enlarged mind, and could look at all things through the medium of the gospel, is manifested in the following sentences, to one to whom he had afterwards the happiness of being united in the closest of all earthly relationships:

'Are we not encouraged to see in the beauties of nature representations of the mysteries of grace? We cannot help remembering who is said to be the Sun of righteousness; what is intended by the dew which descends upon Israel; and by the river whose streams make glad the city of God. We may call to mind, likewise, those plants which are planted in the house of the Lord, and flourish in the courts of our God; that tree, under whose shadow we sit with great delight; and those fruits of the Spirit, which are joy and peace.'

So thoroughly satisfied was he of the necessity of a stated plan of study during the vacation, that, having judiciously laid out all the hours of each day, he resolutely adhered to the arrangement, in spite of all interruptions. 'Surely,' says his biographer, 'the secret of his success in after life is involved in this resolute purpose, resolutely carried out.'

But at length his college course is ended, his degree is taken, and he is prepared to enter on his ministerial work; which brings us to notice

III. His Pastorate in England.—The first scene of his labours as a minister was as curate to the Rev. Richard Cecil, at Chobham and Bisley, in Surrey. No ordinary privilege was Wilson's to serve under such a rector, from whose personal intercourse and public ministrations so many practical lessons could be learned by a young man. Most ready was he to profit by the hints of his spiritual father. 'I clearly perceive,' he writes, after a suggestion to avoid excessive loudness of voice and vehemence of action in the pulpit, 'that my preaching is very bad. It is all vi et armis. I make clamour and shouting and noise my helpers,—as if sound without sense ever did any good. I must spare no pains to correct these faults, now I know them.'

From this curacy he was removed to that of Worton, in Oxfordshire,—discharging, in conjunction with his labours there, the duties of a tutorship in Oxford. At Worton he entered a field of labour which had been grievously neglected by a sporting predecessor; and the effect of his ministry was to awaken the enmity of some, while, by God's blessing, it guided others to the cross of Christ.

'Pray, do not let Mr. Wilson preach here again,' said a lady to her minister, in an adjoining parish; 'he alarms me so.' This case was a type of several others, who preferred to be let alone in their carnal security. But there were others of a different stamp. Let one or two instances, given by his biographer, suffice. 'I thank God,' said a labouring man, 'that I have been able to come the whole distance of seven miles to Worton church for eight years, without missing more than two Sundays.' 'But surely the long walk must sadly weary you?' 'Nay,' he replied, 'the walk appears short and easy, when I have listened to those simple truths of the gospel which nourish my soul.'

Again: 'An old woman, named Betty Frewin, remembered the text of his second sermon, "Fear not, little flock." Attention, she said, was soon aroused. One told another, and at last they crowded from all parts. There was a great outpouring of the Spirit. Many of the congregation were in tears. Many of the people used to assemble, in fine weather, between services for singing and prayer. Gigs and carts were put into the court-yard at Lower Worton, and horses into the stables.'

Even fifty years after he had laboured here, his memory was fragrant; for, when tidings of his death in India reached our shores, the parishioners of Worton showed their affection for him by erecting 'a marble tablet over the entrance of the church, as a memorial that he once was curate there; while a piece of plate purchased with the small free-will offerings of the poor, and presented to the communion-table of the Lord, tells, in its graven lines, of a love and gratitude which half a century could not efface.'

From the Oxfordshire villages, his sphere of labour was next transferred to London. He became pastor of St. John's Chapel, Bedford Row, which had for many years been the scene of Mr. Cecil's ministry. Here great crowds attended his ministrations. He stood as God's minister to do God's work. He was an earnest man, when earnest men were comparatively rare; he fully preached the gospel, when preachers of the gospel were comparatively few. Mr. Simeon used to say that the congregation were at his feet. All felt his power. The preaching of Christ crucified, and the salvation of the souls of men, were his great objects,—never forgotten, never out of sight. He was anxious and willing to gather hints, which might prove useful to him, from every quarter. He was one day visited by a humble French pastor, who narrated the blessings with which God had visited his flock. On his mentioning a sermon which he had preached, which the Lord had been pleased to own, Mr. Wilson immediately produced his note-book, jotting down the text and general outline, 'avowedly for future use, in the hope that a similarly good effect might be again produced.' In his appeals he was plain and pointed. One day, when pleading the cause of some missionary society, he closed by saying, 'Some will, I fear, notwithstanding what I have urged, pass the plate, and give nothing, thinking nobody sees. I tell you, I tell such an one, GOD SEES.'

When about forty-five years of age, while yet labouring in St. John's, his strength gave way, and many wearisome days and nights were measured out to him. Change was again and again tried. A continental tour was undertaken, but without the favourable results anticipated. All hope of recovery he himself abandoned, and for upwards of two years life seemed to be trembling in the balance. The Lord, however, had much more work to accomplish through his servant, and his health was gradually restored. On his recovery, he was appointed to the parochial charge of Islington, embracing 30,000 souls. Though still feeble in body, he entered on his new work in the strength of the Lord. He anticipated that this would be 'his last scene of duty,' and gave himself to his work with all the zeal and ardour which had characterized him during his previous career. Very soon the effects of his ministry were visible. 'There is no such thing as getting a comfortable game at cards now,' was the remark of many. One old gentleman was so full of anger at the change, that he could scarcely speak on the subject. He threatened to leave the parish altogether. But whilst he lingered, the angel of the Lord laid hold upon his hand, and all was changed. 'No,' he replied to an application about his pew, 'I shall not leave, I shall remain. I find now that religion is heart work.' His time was fully occupied in the preaching of the gospel, the visitation of his parishioners, the building of new churches, the establishment of local Sabbath schools, the issuing of pastoral addresses, and the formation of societies for the temporal relief of the poor; not to speak of his active labours in connection with the Church Missionary Society, and other public schemes of Christian usefulness. In the midst of all these busy engagements, he was visited with a heavy stroke of domestic affliction, in the somewhat sudden death of his wife. God's ways are wonderful—often far past our finding out. 'But,' says his biographer, 'this affliction looks like the loosening of a tie, which might have held him in England, and prevented twenty-five years' service to the church in India.' His own feelings are thus expressed: 'My sorrows flow deeply, and must flow so long as I remain behind. But I hope I do not murmur. I hope I desire to say, "Not my will, but thine be done." I hope I am grateful for four-and-twenty years of peace, and union, and comfort. I bless God for the delightful testimony to her Saviour which she bore in life and death.'

The numerous and varied occupations in which he was so fully engaged as vicar of Islington, were not allowed to eat out his spiritual life. He was jealous over his own vineyard, while carefully tending that of others. Such entries in his journal as the following prove this:

'I have myself to guard against (1) pride, (2) the lusts of the flesh, (3) vain and worldly reading. Give me, O God, the needful grace.' . . . . 'In the coming year, may I pray more fervently, study the Bible more diligently, watch over my heart, and repose more entirely on the operations of grace. God help me! God prepare me for death and eternity!' . . . . 'I am cast down, desolate, and afflicted, by reason of my sins.' 'Break my hard heart, O God! Soften it by thy grace. Open it by thy Spirit. If my heart is but right with God, all other things are nothing.' . . . . 'March 9th.—I never would pass this day without thanksgiving to God. It was on this day that I first listened to the heavenly voice. The day, then, to me is precious. I call on the name of the Lord; I magnify Him. To Him be the glory!' . . . . 'My Saviour, how odious must I appear before Thee! Pardon me. Cover me with thy perfect righteousness. Surround me with thy merits, thy obedience, thy death. Let thy Spirit, O Saviour, fill me, purify me, console me, strengthen me.' It was such a man who, in 1832, received the appointment to the bishopric of India. And this brings us to the closing chapter of our sketch.

IV. His Episcopate in India.—He left home with this as his motto,—as given forth by him in a familiar exposition at family worship: 'I go to India under somewhat similar circumstances with the apostle, in that I know not the things that shall befall me there. But his God will be my God, and his Father my Father; and therefore none of these things move me.' During his voyage in the James Sibbald, he studied hard, and was very helpful in conducting service on board daily and on Sabbaths. Yet he longed for his landing on the shores of India; and was frequently propounding such questions as these to the captain: 'How fast are we going? Is the wind in our favour? What do you say now about the day of our arrival?' On 5th November 1832 he landed at Calcutta; and at his installation into his new office, he begged the prayers of all who were assembled, assuring them of his wish to be regarded as a brother to the elder clergy, and a father to the younger. Such was the spirit in which he entered on a work which he was privileged to carry on for a quarter of a century; having during that time once returned, for eighteen months, for change of air, to Britain, and retiring from service in the church only when, at the advanced age of eighty, the Lord removed him from the church militant to the church triumphant. During his abode in India, he made frequent visitations of his vast diocese. The record of his voyages and journeys on these occasions is intensely interesting. But our limits forbid our entering on details.

On one occasion he was in imminent danger, while sailing to Madras. The steamer began to leak seriously; the tops of her high paddle-boxes were often buried in the sea; sails were blown away, spars split; and at length the boiler burst, and let sixty tons of water, in a moment, into the hold. The fires were now extinguished; the engine deck was a foot deep in water; the vessel became nearly unmanageable; and all hands were ordered to the pumps. 'I can do no more,' said the captain; 'tell the bishop he had better go to prayers.' . . .

Dr. Wilson joined with the passengers in fervent supplication; and, retiring to his cabin, penned a few reflections, which showed how thoroughly his soul was resting on the Lord: . . . . 'This is the moment to glorify Jesus, by faith in his power and love; to lie in his hands, as clay in the hands of the potter; to be assured that all is well; to look with more scrutiny into the heart, and to put away every sin.' . . . 'It is on thy mercy only I rely. I renounce every other refuge, to fly to thy death and passion. Save me, as the chief of sinners!' The Lord interposed for the deliverance of that ship's crew. Ere long the wind abated, and the sun shone forth; the water in the vessel was got under, and the boiler repaired; the fires were lit; and once more the vessel's head was pointed in the right course. During a voyage on another visitation he also made a narrow escape, having been precipitated down an open hatchway, as he walked after the captain on the lower deck. 'Had he fallen on his head, the shock must have been fatal. But he fell on his feet, and merely bruised his thigh.' He might indeed, as a missionary, say of himself, as Paul did, 'I have been in perils in the sea.'

As he lived, so he died in harness,—busy to the last in his Master's work; giving, in his closing weeks, the sweetest evidence that, like good Simeon of old, 'he was waiting for the consolation of Israel.'

When he died, not only did devout men carry him to the grave, but they made great lamentation over him; while giving due prominence to the services he had rendered to the cause of Christ in general, and that of missions in particular. The testimony of an eminent missionary was: 'The evangelization of the world at large, and of India in particular, was ever uppermost in his heart, as a subject of prayer and exhortation. Under this head, his most notable achievement was the authoritative repudiation and ejection of the caste system from the native churches of Southern India. Having fairly mastered the subject, and satisfied himself of its utterly antichristian character, he proposed no half measures,—no merely modifying, limitary regulations. No; his firm and resolute decree was, that the system must be extirpated, root and branch, from the membership of the native churches, or the members of the native churches must be ejected from their bosom, until they heartily abjured and flung out the evil thing from among them. The future sons and daughters of India's expurgated churches will rise up to bless the memory of BISHOP WILSON.'

THE HOPE OF THE CHURCH.

IN reading the third chapter of the second Epistle of Peter, we naturally arrive at the conclusion that the Spirit is here leading us to look for the coming and kingdom of our Lord; and this, as it appears to me, is the uniform teaching of the New Testament. The words of our blessed Lord, in his great prophecy (Matt. xxiv.), are just to this effect: 'Watch, therefore, for ye know not in what hour your Lord doth come;' and again, 'Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh.' And when He would comfort his disciples on his being about to leave them (John xiv.), what does He say? 'I go to prepare a place for you; and I will come again, and receive you unto myself,' etc. And on the occasion of his ascension, while the poor bereaved disciples were gazing after Him towards heaven, how do the angels comfort and assure them? 'This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven.' Again, the Apostle Paul, in writing to the Philippians (iii. 20), says to them, 'Our conversation is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ;' and in describing the hope of the Thessalonian converts, it is as waiting for his Son from heaven. In the Epistle to the Hebrews, we find, in the close of the ninth chapter: 'Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many: and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation;' and at the close of the tenth chapter, when he would comfort those under persecution, he says to them, 'Yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry.' While the Bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept; but yet a little while, and He will no longer tarry. The coming of the Lord was the encouragement to them under their trial. And so in James v.: 'Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord: stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.' And John, in his epistle, directs us to the same hope: 'The world knoweth us not; . . . but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is' (1 John iii. 12).

Now, here we have the testimony of our Lord, and of his angels; also the testimony of Paul, Peter, James, and John,—and to what do they all testify? Why, to his appearing as the hope of the church. We are directed to watch, to be ready for his coming, to wait for Him, to look for Him; but what is the meaning of this language, if something is necessarily put between us and his coming? Why should I be watching, waiting, looking for Him, if I know that a thousand years of spiritual blessedness are necessarily interposed between me and his coming, or that the great enemy of the latter day must necessarily first appear? One would suppose that it is for these events I should be looking, and not for his coming.

'What, then?' one may say; 'is nothing to happen previously?' I reply, that I know not what may happen: a thousand things may come to pass. We may all die before the coming of the Lord: I confess I do not think that we shall. The great enemy of the latter day may be revealed, Israel may be restored, and there may be many and great changes in the world—in the face of Christendom. As to this, I neither assert nor deny. I do not see my way in the details of unfulfilled prophecy. I have been long reading the prophetic word; but I am unable to commit myself to any system, and I believe that those who do will find, by the event, that God's system and theirs may differ not a little. I would not willingly close my eyes to the teaching of any Scripture. I cannot close them to the great fact that the coming of the Lord is the burden of prophecy, the mighty event held out to our expectation; and while we are looking for his appearing, we are prepared for whatever may come. If I am thrown off this, I am cast off my true waiting position.

Some may call the consideration of this subject mere speculation; but I know not the doctrine that is more sanctifying in its influence, or more directly practical, as taught in the New Testament: 'Every one that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as He is pure' (1 John iii. 3). I could easily adduce manifold passages connected with the Lord's coming, did my time allow of it, to show its holy and practical tendency; indeed, it would be difficult to adduce a Scripture on the subject that is not practical in its bearing. What sin can get dominion over me while my soul is waiting for Him? The world is just where it should be—under my feet; and I have the victory over Satan through Him who loved me, and in love to whom I am waiting his appearing, to take me to be for ever with himself.

We have somewhat of an illustration as to how it should be with his people, in the eighth chapter of Luke's Gospel. The Lord had been in the country of the Gadarenes, dealing with the devil there: 'For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil;' but the people there loved their swine—the unclean thing—better than they loved the Lord, and so He left them, and crossed over again into Galilee; and in the 40th verse we read: 'When Jesus was returned, the people received Him gladly, for they were all waiting for Him.' Now, observe, they were waiting and watching; and, moreover, they were wishing for Him. The virgins (Matt. xxv.) were waiting and wishing, but not watching, and so they slumbered and slept. Alas! how often is this the case while He tarrieth! Those believers assembled in the house of Mary (Acts xii.) were wishing much for Peter, but they were not waiting or watching; and so, when Rhoda told them that he was come, they would not believe her. They had been praying for him; but they would not believe that their prayers were answered—anything but that—'it is his angel.' Oh, the unbelief of believers!

So here, I think, we have the true position of believers,—waiting, watching, wishing, for the return of their Lord from heaven—for Him who loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood, that they might be for ever with Him, and like Him, in the mansions of the Father's house. Who would not say, 'Even so, come, Lord Jesus?' And there is power in this, as we realize it. Anything may be held as a mere opinion, without one being anything the better of it. But when the hope becomes a reality, it is positive power to the soul; it cheers, it comforts, it strengthens to endure. I can have neither strength nor comfort in looking for him 'whose coming is after the working of Satan;' but in looking for Jesus, my loins are girt, and I am prepared for anything. How little do our trials and difficulties appear in the light of his coming! Oh, there is great support in the hope!

And let me affectionately press upon you the necessity of being ready to meet Him. Suddenly He will come, according to his promise, as the lightning flash, and there will be no time to get ready then. There will be no time then to repent of anything that may be on your conscience—no time to put away from you the evil you feel, or to settle the matter that may trouble you; and if you indulge such thoughts, I fear that, when He cometh, you will be found among the foolish virgins. How soon that coming may be, no one can say; but I believe that it draweth nigh.

While lately in Ireland, having had some leisure, my attention was directed to the chronology of the Bible; and let me say that it is not a subject so clothed with difficulty as some represent it. For the most part it is easy enough, and the numbers give us a distinct and satisfactory conclusion. There are some and considerable difficulties, through which one may not readily see his way; but not to expect difficulties, would be to expect a continued miracle. I may say in passing, that I believe we shall find, in patient waiting on the word, and prayer, difficulties greatly to disappear.

While in Ireland, I met with the writings of one of our latest and one of our ablest chronologists—Fynes Clinton. He seems to have been a scholar of extensive reading, and, what is better, a pious man. I was much pleased, in one of his letters, to find the sentiment expressed, that in all his studies his object should be to please God. In investigating ancient chronology, he had to take up the chronology of the Bible; and in his study of the subject, unlike many of the moderns, specially they of Germany,—in whose track many of our own are following,—he took our Bible for his standard, so far as its numbers carry us, not forsaking it for any other source. And I know not why the numbers of our Bible are not to be accredited equally with any other statements it contains, subject, of course, to the same revision. But what was the conclusion at which he arrived? Why, that this world would complete its six thousandth year somewhere about 1867.

But, it may be said, what has this to do with our present subject? Well, some of you know that there is an interpretation of the creation days in the first chapter of Genesis, held by many of the ancients as well as moderns, that each day was typical of a millennium, or a thousand years,—based, probably, on that word of Peter which I read to you, 'One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.' Now, if this interpretation be true, we are very near to the seventh-thousand year, or the millennium of Rev. xx. And it is remarkable, as helping out this view of the subject, that the 'rest' which is spoken of in Heb. iv., as remaining for the people of God, is in the original a Sabbatism, or the keeping of a Sabbath. Now, observe, I do not ask you to ground your faith on this. I could not do so myself, on the interpretation of any man, or set of men; I must have God's own word for my faith to rest on. I believe, as one says, that there is nothing between infallibility and infidelity. Infallibility I thoroughly believe in; but I look not for it in the opinions of fallible men, but in the infallible word of the living God. Yet I do not think that it is a sign of wisdom to reject the judgment of wise and holy men of God, instructed in the word. It may considerably help me in forming my judgment on a subject, while still it must be in subjection to God's word; but I doubt if any one will make light of such help, but the one against whose opinion it tells.

This chronological argument throws its weight into the scale on the side of readiness and preparedness to meet the Lord. It is also observable how the difficulties in chronology, which altogether prevent us from any exact dating of the time, while we may generally apprehend its nearness, seem overruled of God to give effect to his own word, 'That day and that hour knoweth no man' (Matt. xxiv. 36).

Another argument, which also has its weight, —though on which also I could not build my faith, as being of man's interpretation,—is the consent of prophetic students as to the times of the end. Many, both ancient and modern, while starting from different points, and differing widely in detail, approach very near to each other as to the consummation; and somewhere in the sixth decade of this century, through half of which we have now nearly found our way, is the period they arrive at—I think, mostly from 1866 to 1868. So it is; and let it be taken for what it is worth, and nothing more. It is not God's word; but it may awaken our minds, and lead us to review our opinions, and help us in the formation of our judgments in the interpretation of the word.

The signs of the times also are remarkable. How unsettled everything seems,—the nations of the Continent apparently ready for an explosion,—wars carried on with a magnitude and utter indifference to human life unknown before, —man's power taxed to the utmost in the invention of engines of destruction,—the advancement of revolutionary principles, and treading down alike the institutions of God and man,— the open progress of infidelity,—the march of mind, in utter forgetfulness of God, rashly intruding into things beyond human ken,—and men, calling themselves ministers of Christ, and endowed as such, unblushingly denying some of the leading truths of revelation, and the very essentials of Christianity; while, on the other hand, revival work has proceeded in a way that previously we have not witnessed. Doubtless there has been much of excitement in it, and much that will come to nought, as probably is the case in all revivals; but few, I believe, who know anything of it, will doubt that there has been much also of blessed reality, by various instrumentalities,—the Lord, it may be, gathering in his people before the great day.

It is said, too, that among Jews and Mohammedans, and some heathen nations, there are expectations connected with this decade of years in which we live.

For more than twenty years I have held that the 'sixties' will not run out without some mighty event occurring, altogether out of the common order. What that event will be, I am unable to say. It may be the appearing of the Lord, or it may be the manifestation of the great enemy of the latter day, or it may be the awakening and restoration of God's ancient people. God grant that it be the appearing of his Son from heaven,—the Bridegroom coming for his bride! I believe that He has a greater longing for that day than we have. He loves his bride, and is waiting for the day when she shall 'have made herself ready,' when He shall come to take her to himself, to the mansions of his Father's house, to be for ever with Him in his own never-ending glory. But He is long-suffering, not willing that any should perish; and this grace and long-suffering of the Lord is turned by his enemies as an argument against his truth. It gives its point to the infidel's scoff, 'Where is the promise of his coming?' But, beloved, we know whom we have believed; and let us 'be diligent, that we be found of Him in peace, without spot, and blameless;' and if you feel that there is but a speck on your soul, come and wash away that speck 'in the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness;' and if you feel that anything is bringing defilement on you, cast it away, at whatever cost, that you may be ready, and have nothing to do when He appears, but to go forth with joy to meet Him, and so to be for ever with the Lord. God grant that it may be so!—Rev. C. Hargrove.

NOVEL-READING.

THERE is a vast amount of fictitious literature or novels issued from the press in the form of newspapers, pamphlets, and bound volumes. This is extensively circulated and read, and must consequently be exerting a mighty influence for good or evil. Such writings I firmly believe to be evil, and only evil. There are powerful arguments that may be urged against this kind of literature, some of which I shall offer, hoping that they may increase in some minds a deeper conviction of the evil of novel-reading.

Novel-reading leads to crime. Facts go to show that this is one great cause of crime at the present day. A few years since the chaplain of the Auburn State Prison remonstrated against supplying the inmates with novels, as it was ascertained, on investigation, that the cause which led to the ruin of a large number of them was novel-reading. The heroes of many, if not most novels, whose characters are portrayed, are criminals, and the scenes brought to view are of a corresponding nature. It is impossible to familiarize the mind with such characters, and to revel in such scenes, without becoming contaminated, and better prepared to pursue a course of wickedness and crime. Take, for example, Bulwer's novels. His earliest work, called Falkland, is the history of an adulterer, the most noble and kind of his race, by force of circumstances. Paul Clifford, the hero of another of his novels, is the commander of a band of robbers. He is conducted safely through his career of villany, and escapes the hand of justice! In Devereux, an amiable gentleman murders his brother's wife, and afterwards becomes an interesting philanthropist in Italy! The Disowned, professing the noblest creed, boasting the purest philanthropy, becomes the murderer of his benefactor! 'Bulwer's novels,' says an able critic, 'show us the virtues caricatured, vices seductively garnished, generous qualities disgraced by paltry motives, petty objects magnified, vulgarities glossed by passion, and manners tinged for her happiness. Thus the hours which ought to have been spent in taking care of her children and superintending household affairs, were worse than wasted in sympathies thrown away on imaginary persons and suffering; making the heart wholly unfit for sharing in the common duties and cares of life. As she lay on her miserable couch, surrounded by all the marks of poverty, her body emaciated by protracted ill-health, she raised her long arm and said: "See, sir, what a wretch I have made myself by novel-reading. I have ruined my health, and I have ruined my mind, by indulging in that miserable trash. I have no peace. Satan is continually tempting me to believe that there is no God, no heaven, no hell, and that I had better put an end to my life. Then Satan holds up some of the heroines for my examples, who first murdered their souls, and then their bodies." As I stood by her bedside, I wished that all the young ladies of our land, who spend so much precious time in pouring over those Gems of Literature, and shedding tears at imaginary sorrow, could have witnessed this, the natural end of their own course of folly.'

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

Since novel-reading is so great an evil, the duty of all the friends of good morals and true religion is evident respecting it. The ministers of the gospel should speak out frequently and forcibly against it. Parents should not allow their children to read such works, any more than they would allow them to associate with persons of vile character. Booksellers should not keep such productions for sale. If it is wrong to use a thing, it is wrong to sell it; on this principle we condemn rumsellers. Publishers should not issue such; they are to a great extent accountable for the evil done by them. I cannot see how any book publisher can have a clear conscience, and have confidence enough to make any pretensions to piety, while sending out books that are poisoning the morals of society, and ruining multitudes of immortal souls, for time and eternity. The greatest care and judgment should be exercised in selecting books for Sabbath-school libraries. I fear that many such libraries need a large sifting.

I believe that it is time for the community to become more fully aroused to the enormity and magnitude of this evil. I trust that the time is not far distant when it shall receive the degree of attention it deserves.

KEEP BY THE CROSS.

I WAS travelling in Switzerland during the summer of 1857, and determined to ascend Mount Joli, a mountain not far from St. Gervais.

As I made the ascent, unaccompanied by a guide, it was with some difficulty I found the right track. Having at length, however, reached the foot of the mountain, I inquired of a peasant how I should find the way to the summit. He answered, in French, to this effect: 'You cannot mistake the way, but be sure you keep by the cross!' A large wooden cross had been erected as a guide-post about half-way to the summit, and the path led immediately past it. The words of the Swiss peasant struck me very forcibly, as the true direction to those who are seeking to find their way from this present evil world to the heights of the heavenly Zion.

Reader, are you anxious to be saved? Are you asking your way to heaven with your face thitherward? Do you long for peace with God—the full forgiveness of all sin—a good hope for eternity—a crown of glory—an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away! Then listen to these words, 'Be sure you keep by the cross!'

Remember this is the only way of pardon of sin. Christ crucified is our only way of pardon; for the Scriptures say, that 'we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our sins, according to the riches of his grace;' and again, 'The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.' 'Be sure you keep by the cross,' and there is no fear of sin rising up to condemn you, either here or at the judgment-seat!

Remember, again, this is the only way of holiness. Christ is made of God unto us 'sanctification,' and a sight of the cross of Calvary will be the death of sin. Calvary is the only spot in the world where sin cannot live. When Captain Hedley Vicars found it true to him that 'the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin,' he immediately exclaimed, 'The past is blotted out; what I have to do is to go forward; I cannot live in those sins for which my Saviour shed his precious blood.' Thus the design of his death on Calvary is accomplished; for Jesus Christ gave himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. It is not by resolutions, or from fear of punishment, that you will ever become holy or do good works; but the moment you get your eye on the cross of Christ you will 'loathe sin and leave it.'

Remember, also, it is the only way to happiness, usefulness, and glory. Reader, do you wish to have your sins pardoned, your heart purified, your life ennobled and rendered happy and useful, and at last to gain the crown of glory?—'Be sure you keep by the cross!'

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

"...are they in wrath a lion.—EZEK. XXXVII. 9.

Two more [illegible] contains an event and a truth: the prophetical, which specially points to Israel's restoration in the latter day; the spiritual pointing to the case of individual souls, or churches, or congregations.

Three [illegible] presented to us: 1 The valley was in the valley, very dry: 2 The gathering and reconstruction of these bones: 3 The clothing with flesh, sinews, and skin: 4 The infusion of breath, or life. It is through the last of these that the living man is constituted: and without it there is but the picture or statue of a man.

The 'breath' is manifestly the 'life,' communicated by the Spirit of life. This life may have different stages: but wherever it is, there is a true and complete man. The disciples had life before our Lord breathed on them, but then they obtained more. They had life before Pentecost, but then they obtained more. It was life that God communicated when He created man: it is life (of a higher kind) that the Spirit of God communicates to the soul at conversion. The last Adam, as the possessor of the Holy Ghost, is thus a quickening Spirit.

Thus a man may be very like a Christian, and yet not be one. A church or congregation may be very like a Christian one, with a fair appearance, organization, all in excellent bustling order, numerous, liberal, united, earnest after a sort; and yet lack one thing, which neutralizes and paralyzes all the rest—the breath of life.

1. Our creed may be sound, and yet we may not be Christians.—Balaam's creed seems to have been sound; also that of Judas and Demas. It may be the creed of apostles and reformers, the creed of the Synod of Dort, or the Assembly of Westminster; yet all may be spiritually wrong. It will form part of the bones, or the sinews, or the flesh; but that is all. Nay, its soundness may be the occasion of serious self-deception: we may mistake orthodoxy for life; the correctness of our confession of faith for the 'breath.' An inanimate, unproductive creed, what will it do for you in the day of the Lord? What will it do for you now? Does it give you real peace, real liberty, real fellowship with God?

2. Our religion may be externally complete, and yet we may not be Christians.—By religion I mean all that pertains to the worship and service of God, private or public; our prayers, our praises, our prayers, our sanctuary service, our family worship. What are all these without the inward breath? What is routine without life? Mechanical religion may do for the gods of Greece and Rome, but not for the living and true God. Mechanical religion may do for those who fancy that religious performances are work done or money paid in order to ward off divine anger, and persuade God to keep them out of hell: but not for those who know that they are the channels of fellowship with God. Your sanctuary attendance may be regular and reverent; but what if there be no breath in it? Your prayers and praises may be punctual and unexceptionable; but what if there be no breath in them? Will God accept them? Will they satisfy you? Will they make you happy? Will they not be irksome and intolerable? And the more you multiply them, the more intolerable?

3. Our good works may be numerous and praiseworthy, yet we may not be Christians.—It is not the work that makes the Christian, but the Christian that makes the work. This is a day of good works, of benevolent schemes, of societies, great and small, of organizations for the relief of the poor and the reformation of the wicked. They who conduct them may be earnest and self-denying men. But is the breath there? They often wonder why so much should be done, with so little fruit. But is there not a cause? Is there breath—life—in all this? Can statues, or machines, or steam-engines, do the work of the living God? No; it is life that does real work; it is life that is successful; it is life that God honours, and by which He works. Let us see that, in doing Christian work, we ourselves are Christians, else we shall be but Noah's carpenters after all. We may do many good works, and yet not be Christians. 'Many shall come in that day, saying, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works?' But the answer is, 'I never knew you.'

4. Our life may be exemplary, and yet we may not be Christians.—There may be bones, and sinews, and flesh, and yet no breath, no life. There are many who mistake a fair external deportment for Christian life. A man may be so like a Christian, that another could not suppose that there was anything wrong; and yet there might be no breath.

A life with 'no breath' must be—

(1.) A very imperfect life.—Many features awanting.—even outward ones, much more inward.

(2.) A very unhappy life.—There is the secret feeling that all is wrong. Everything is irksome for want of life.

(3.) A very unsuccessful life.—It is not mere bustle, or earnestness, or zeal, that does the true work for God. If there be no breath, what are these? All will be labour in vain.

There is breath for you, O sinner, in Him who has the Spirit—who is our breath. You will not be able to say, I perished, or, I was unhappy, or useless, because God would not give me this breath. The ascended Christ has the Spirit for you.

MOUNT SION; OR, THE PLACE OF THE SAVED.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

REV. XIV. 1-5.

THIS is the other side; this is Emmanuel's land; it is the place of the blessed. Jesus is here at home; and, as He looks around, He exclaims, in the gladness of his heart, 'Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?' On earth He was either a lonely wanderer, or had only a few despised followers; but now He is encompassed by all the good, and worthy, and righteous, and pure among the children of men. On earth He went about ministering to many, while few ministered to Him; but now He is in the midst of the throne, and all the hosts of heaven worship and adore Him. On earth He was a man of sorrows—the world's chief mourner: He often sighed, and groaned, and wept; but now He is made glad with everlasting joy; He drinks of the pleasures at God's right hand; and, best of all, the friends He loves are sharing his delight. It is a pleasant, sunny place; there is no winter there,—no dark, dreary days, no wearisome nights. It is a continual festival of holy, happy joy. 'We are come,' says the Apostle Paul, 'to Mount Sion, and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem.' This is the honour and privilege of all believers. Justified with Christ, and quickened together with Him, they have at all times the entrèe into the King's presence. Let us avail ourselves of this filial freedom, and, on the wings of faith, go up and mingle with the joyous, jubilant multitude. While our hearts are ravished and uplifted by the blessed scene, let us consider who these singers are, where they are, and what they are doing.

Who they are. We have them fully and variously described here, and yet all that is said of them is very blessed. They are redeemed from among men—redeemed from all iniquity; they are first-fruits unto God and the Lamb; there is no guile in their mouth; there is no spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing about them; they follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth; his Father's name is on their forehead; and they are many. Such they now are; but they were not always so. Once they were men of like passions with us. They were foolish, deceived. They served divers lusts and pleasures. Some of God's worst enemies are there; some of Satan's greatest helpers. They lay in their blood, festering and rotting in their corruptions. Even after they were changed, much of the old man remained. They were brands plucked out of the fire, and their appearance bewrayed their origin. They were black, and smoky, and smelt of the burning, and they were ever ready to blaze up again. They were lepers—healed, indeed; but the taint of the disease was still in them, and was ever ready to break forth afresh. They were lost sheep brought back from their wanderings, but ever prone to go astray again. Satan often thought he would get them yet. Friends often wondered if they would ever reach heaven. And they themselves sometimes cried, 'I shall one day perish!' Many a time they thought they were solitary in the world, and said, like Elijah, 'The good man is perished out of the earth, and I only am left to serve God.' What a world-large volume their stories would make, if they were all put together! There are the Abels, and Enochs, and Noahs, and Abrahams, and Joshuas, and Josiahs, and Hannahs, and Marys, and Elisabeths. There also is Jacob; but he no longer limps, he no longer lies; he is really Jeshurun. There is David; but his eye no more wanders, his heart is no more unclean. Manasseh is there; but his hands are not now bedabbled in the blood of the saints. The woman that was a sinner is there; but she is now a King's daughter and a King's bride, all fair both without and within. Zaccheus is there; but he is now upright and full of love. There are those there who once were like the devil for wickedness; but they are now bright and glorious as the morning star. What a transformation is here! Earth's greatest changes are nothing to this. The black, dead coal, dug out of the pit, enkindled, sending forth light and heat, and diffusing comfort all around; the rough diamond, cut and polished, and glittering, in its manifold beauty, amid the galaxy of some royal diadem; the rude, unsightly nugget, purified and fashioned into a vessel of honour, and now shining in all the splendour of burnished gold,—what are any of these, or all of these, compared with the 'poor taken out of the dust, and the beggar lifted from the dunghill, that they may be set among princes, and made to inherit the throne of glory?' Take courage, ye who are labouring to upraise the outcast, degraded wreck and debris of society. Your hearts are large and liberal; you stretch out your hands to the poor and needy; and God gives you the high honour of repairing the breach, and building again the waste places. It often seems hard, hopeless, thankless work. When you have succeeded in laboriously rolling the stone a good way up the hill, sometimes it suddenly, waywardly, inexplicably breaks loose, and a single hour undoes the work of months or years. But look at those bright stars in the third firmament of heaven. Some of them were once among the lowest, vilest, most despicable on earth; and now they are there, and there for ever.

Where they are. They are on Mount Sion; they are with the Lamb; they are in heaven; they are before the throne. But they were not always here; they were once in the fearful pit and the miry clay. Some of them were in the deepest, darkest parts of the pit; some of them had sunk very far in the miry clay. They were once far off, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise. Many of them dwelt in lands of heathen darkness, amid the habitations of horrid cruelty. You look up at the white fleecy clouds, which float lightly in the heavens on a summer day, and seem as if they were the down of the birds of paradise hovering over our lower sphere. They seem all too pure and ethereal ever to have belonged to earth. But if you ask them, 'Whence come ye?' they will answer, 'From stagnant pool, and briny marsh, and festering heap; but we have been purified and spiritualized.' And so, 'Who are these in white robes, and whence come they?' and the answer is, 'From every country, every clime, every rank and condition of life,—the Hottentot, the Esquimaux, the subtle Bengalee, the simple Karen, the haughty Burman, the Arab ranger of the desert, and the still more degraded Arab of the streets; but they have been washed, and justified, and sanctified, and now they are before the throne, and are for ever with the Lord.' Take courage, ye whose hearts are in unison with his, who 'so loved the world, that He gave his only-begotten Son.' Take courage, ye whose hearts mourn when you think of the little-heeded command, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.' The progress seems slow—very slow. Many a place that once was flushed with the water of life, and green and fragrant with the fruitage of righteousness, is now parched and desolate; many a candlestick that once shone bright, is now extinguished and removed. You cry, 'Arise, O Lord, plead thine own cause.' 'Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty, and ride forth prosperously.' You are right; this is what the world needs. We, to whom He has deputed the work, have not his love for the souls of men; we have not his zeal for the glory of God; we have not his practical, ceaseless self-denial,—his single, constant, unwavering purpose. We are slothful, selfish, unenterprising in the things of God; and so the world perishes, and our Gentile church is covered with blood-guiltiness. But take courage, ye who love souls, and seek to gather them. 'They shall come; they all shall come.' This was what cheered the Master amid all his trials and disappointments. On the cross He would not taste man's spiced draught; but He drank joyfully the Father's cup of promise: 'All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before Thee.'

What they are doing. They are singing and harping with all their might. They are singing in unison, and they are singing universally. No hands without a harp, no lips without a song; and no harp is unstrung, no lips are silent here. Could you approach the gate, you would hear sweetest music. They are feasting, they are rejoicing. The work is done, the fight is over, their wanderings are ended, they are all at home. Not one is lost, not one is wanting. There never was joy like this. As they look back, and think what they were; look down, and think what, but for grace, they must have been; look around, and see where they are; look forward, and think what they shall for ever be,—it is joy, joy, joy! Each kindles and stirs up the other. 'Oh, that will be joyful, joyful, joyful, when we meet to part no more!' A poor ragged boy used to sing so sweetly and blithely after his conversion, that the neighbours said he made the place like a lower heaven, so full of joy. It is natural to God's redeemed to sing. 'Praise waits for God in Sion.' 'Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness!' Every deliverance on earth has led to singing. We have Moses' song, and Deborah's song, and David's song, and Jehoshaphat's song. The angels sing at Bethlehem, and Mary and Elisabeth stir one another up to holy spiritual psalmody. If thus it is on earth, where many things depress, and burden, and unhinge, what must be the continual flow of joyous praise, when there is nothing to hinder, and everything to quicken and encourage!

But think of their song. It is a new song; it is new in many respects. It is new to those who sing it. Once they did not, could not sing it.

Their tongue was not an instrument to glorify God; it was used to praise themselves, or to murmur and complain against the Lord and his ways. It was God who taught them to sing. He took them from the miry clay, and set them on the rock, and put a new song in their mouth; and they have been singing ever since, and so they will for ever and ever. It is a song unknown to all but them. There are many on earth who have never learned it. There are myriads gone down to silence, who will never, never learn it. It is new in heaven. Angels cannot sing it. They will never need the blessings which form its theme and up-spring; while those of them who are lost, are lost for ever. It is new in its subject. There were songs in heaven before. There have been songs since the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. But these have been songs of creation, songs of providence: 'Worthy art Thou, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power; for Thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created.' But now, in the midst of these older songs, breaks in the louder, sweeter new song: 'Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and people, and tongue, and nation, and hast made us to our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth.'

In a great orchestra on earth, there are multitudes of different sounds and voices, all blended into one; and yet an exercised, experienced ear, can separate and analyze, can untwist and untwine the mingled chords, and discern and enjoy each in its peculiar beauty and expression. As the light is white, and yet composed of many different-coloured rays; so the new song is one, and yet it is made up of many different strains. I have noticed our little bird, when the moulting season is passing away, beginning to try its vocal powers. At first it chirps softly, trills very shortly, as if distrustful of itself, and anxious to know what it can do. But, after a while, in a kind of confident, joyous self-abandonment, it breaks forth in full volume and sweetness. Just so heaven's choristers are moulting here. They are putting off the old man, and putting on the new; they are lying among the pots; but soon they will appear as the wings of a dove, covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold. Meanwhile they are trying their little songs: 'I will bless the Lord at all times.' 'What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits?' 'He sent from above, He took me, He drew me out of many waters.' 'He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon my high places.' Their songs are new even here. The words are old; they have been in use in the family for untold generations; but they are living words; they are ever young. And besides, there are constantly occurring new deliverances, new benefits, new Ebenezers; so that they are ever sung with a new joy, and love, and thankfulness. Sometimes they get upon their high places, and see the enemy under their feet, and sing by anticipation: 'O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?'

This is a solemn testing subject. Are you praising God on earth? Is your heart made new, and your spirit so glad that you cannot help crying, 'I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live; I will sing praise to my God while I have my being?' You cannot praise by proxy, any more than you can pray by proxy. Your heart must praise, if your lips cannot. And if the heart praise, though the lips can only make a joyful noise, it will be accepted by Him, who seeks only what a man hath, and not what he hath not. Take heed of being like her whose last words were: 'I never praised the Lord on earth, and now I shall never praise Him in heaven.'

OUR AUNT.

We called her aunt, though she was none of ours,
And might have given her even a mother's name,
Who seemed, like summer-air, or light, or flowers,
Still to belong to all where'er she came.

Dwelling with us, we deemed her more than kin,
For kindness made her so; and when she sighed
Her last farewell, we felt as she had been Only called home, and that ourselves had died.

So much of life she took from us, that all,
When she departed, felt the bitter blight,
As when we take a picture from the wall,
Where it long was, and see but dust and white.

But in this blank we'll hang an ocean wreath,
Made by fond hands of many-coloured moss,
And write her name, and when she died, beneath,
Think of her gain, and speak no more of loss.

T. W. P.

THE BLIND POSTMAN.

CHAPTER III.

FURTHER SUCCESSES, AND NEW HOPES.

HIS inability to go about in the village alone had long been a source of great trouble and annoyance to Roberts; for his wife was always busy, and their eldest boy, who was the only one old enough to act as a guide, was at school all day; so that he was often compelled to sit still in the house, or mope about round the garden when he wanted to take a walk, or to make a call on a neighbour. He remembered reading, when he could see, of a blind man who travelled, unattended, through nearly the whole of Europe and several parts of Asia. He had also read of another blind man who sometimes acted as a guide and sometimes as a postilion, and who afterwards became a road-surveyor and contractor. The gentleman who had taught him to read had likewise told him that in London many blind persons went about alone even through some of the busiest thoroughfares; and that several in London, Edinburgh, and other large cities, gained a livelihood by selling newspapers and periodicals in the streets, and by leaving them at the houses of their regular customers. These things seemed too wonderful to be true; yet he had no sufficient reason to doubt them, and often, as he got stiff and tired from sitting, because he could not go out, he turned them over and over again in his mind. 'If other people found their way about London, where the people must be as thick as bees, surely he could find his way about that quiet little village;' and so he resolved to try.

He began by taking short walks up and down the road in front of his cottage, and was delighted to find that, after a few rather unsteady attempts, he could guide himself tolerably well with a stick; and was surprised at the precision with which he could tell in what part of the road he was, by means of particular rises or falls, or by a post or large tree. At one particular turn in the road he always knew exactly in what direction to go, on account of a large projecting stone which he generally managed to strike with his stick; while, in another direction, he had no difficulty in finding out the exact spot at which a narrow lane turned off from the main road, by the noise of a small stream which flowed over a few pebbles close by. Gradually he extended his rambles until he could find his way to any house in the village, or within half a mile of it, in any direction. Several times during the winter, when the weather was so bad that he thought Miss Thornton would not venture to come down to his cottage, he went up to the Rectory, and they had their reading there instead.

One day, in the spring time, he thought that he would try to find his way into the town. He had already several times been about a mile along the road, but never the whole of the distance into the town. On this day, it happened that he wanted a fresh stock of nails and screws; for he had now begun to do a few odd jobs of rough carpentering, such as mending pig-styes, or boarding sheds for some of his neighbours; so he resolved to set out without saying anything to his wife as to where he was going, for he knew that if he did so she would be very anxious, as she always was when he attempted anything fresh. He reached the town in safety, and had no difficulty in finding out the ironmonger's shop; and he afterwards ventured a little farther, to the grocer's, for some tea, of which he knew his wife was in want. As he returned home, he was pleased to find that he could recognise many of the old landmarks—trees, gates, bye-roads, stiles, etc., which had been so familiar to him in days of yore. He began to feel quite like himself again, and really thought that, after all, he should be able to do something.

As he crossed the fatal bridge, he was sensible of a strange tumult of feelings within him; but was soon enabled to overcome the strong temptation he felt to indulge in rebellious murmurings, and to thank God that he had been the means of saving the poor child's life. As to his own condition, he took comfort from the thought that God, who appoints some work for each of his creatures, would not allow him to lead a life of uselessness.

When he laid the packet of tea on the table before his wife, she was greatly astonished, and couldn't think how he had obtained it; and when he told her that he had been to the town for it by himself, she declared that if she had known it, she could never have sat still in the house, she should have been so afraid of his meeting with some accident. 'I knew that, my dear,' said he, laughing, 'so I wouldn't tell you.'

Soon after this occurrence, and when Roberts had made several successful journeys into the town, as well as several longer ones into the country in different directions, it happened that the old postman, who had for many years brought letters to the village in which Roberts lived, and to two or three others which lay at short distances from it, fell sick, and as he was now getting quite infirm, he resolved to apply for the pension to which he was entitled. As soon as Roberts heard of this, he made an application to the local postmaster for the vacant situation, thinking that by a little care and arrangement he could very well manage to deliver the letters. The postmaster at first hesitated a good deal, as he did not think it possible for a blind man to do the work. Roberts pleaded earnestly, feeling certain of his ability to do what was required; and, as his application was supported by the recommendation of several gentlemen in the neighbourhood, the postmaster agreed that he should at any rate do the work for the present, until the place was disposed of by his superiors.

Accordingly, on the next morning after this decision, Roberts rose betimes and made his way into the town, where he received his bundle of letters and papers; and, after arranging them by the help of one of the postmaster's children in the order in which he would have to deliver them, he set out with a light heart on his first round. He got through his work very well on the whole; and although he lost some time in finding out a few of the houses, he made up for it by walking fast in the easy straightforward parts of the road, so that the people got their letters rather sooner than they used to do when the former postman, who had long been too old for the work, delivered them. And all agreed in feeling very well satisfied, and in wondering a great deal at what a blind man could do. Of course Roberts did not always get along smoothly. One morning, in getting over a stile, he made a stumble as he jumped down on the other side, and one leg slipped into a ditch where the water happened to be knee deep. He, however, picked himself up as well as he could, and after wiping off the worst of the mud and water from his boot and trousers, went on his way without feeling much discouraged. Another time, as he was going up to Squire Higgins' house, which lay a little out of the main road, one of the boys had carelessly left a barrow right across the footpath; and Roberts, who was going at a pretty smart pace, fell head foremost over it, scattering letters, stick, and hat in all directions. The Squire himself happened to see the accident; and after assisting Roberts to rearrange his letters and to make a fresh start, he went in search of the boy who had been the cause of the mischief, and gave him such a sound thrashing with his riding whip, that he wasn't likely to be guilty of the same carelessness again.

When Roberts had been delivering the letters two or three weeks, and he was hoping that he would soon be confirmed in his place, a somewhat serious mishap occurred, which he feared would prove fatal to all his hopes. He had returned from his round, and was taking his breakfast very contentedly,—for he used only to take a cup of coffee and a small roll in the town before doing his work, and used always to return home to have what he called his 'regular breakfast,'—when Mr. Lucas, a retired solicitor, and rather a testy old gentleman, came to his cottage in a great rage, complaining that a foreign letter of great importance, which he was sure must have been for him at the post-office, had not been delivered. Roberts was rather confused for a few minutes; for he remembered that the postmaster's child had told him that there were two or three foreign letters that morning, and began to think that he might possibly have left one of them at the wrong house, or might even have lost it. He, however, soon recovered his composure, and recollected perfectly well that he had given the letter into the hands of Mr. Hill, the butler. But Mr. Lucas did not seem satisfied, and muttered something about people having no right to undertake work that they couldn't do properly, and that he always knew how it would be. Roberts repeated that he was sure he had given the letter into the hands of the butler; and Mr. Lucas said he was sure that Hill would never have mislaid anything so valuable as he knew that letter to be. As there seemed to be no other way of clearing up the mystery, Roberts offered to accompany Mr. Lucas back to the house in order to make inquiries of the butler himself. Mrs. Roberts was, as usual, a good deal excited, and began to think that this occurrence would certainly prevent her husband from getting the place, as it was generally understood that Mr. Lucas had a good deal of influence with the post-office authorities, and he had not as yet promised to support Roberts' application.

As they went back to the house, Mr. Lucas was much surprised at the ease with which Roberts could walk alone; he kept asking him every now and then where they were, and was so surprised at the exactness of his answers that he began to get in a better temper, and became quite chatty. He told Roberts that he reminded him of a solicitor whom he had known in London, who was quite blind, but was a very clever fellow, and managed to carry on his business just as well after he had lost his sight as he did before. 'Indeed,' said Mr. Lucas, 'I think he got on rather better; for he used to pay such great attention in order to make up for his infirmity, that he managed to get a great many very difficult and good paying cases.'

When they arrived at the house the butler had gone out; so Mr. Lucas began to look through all the rooms he had been into that morning, in the library, dining-room, breakfast parlour, and drawing-room, but could find the letter nowhere. This again ruffled his temper, and Roberts began to think that the letter must certainly be lost, and that on that account Mr. Lucas would oppose him in trying for the place. But the butler soon returned, and stated positively that he had received the letter from Roberts; and that he was quite sure he had taken it to his master in the breakfast parlour. Mr. Lucas, however, was confident that he had never seen the letter, and began to get in a rage with the butler. Renewed search was made for the missing letter, but all in vain, until the butler happened to say that he remembered quite well laying it on the copy of the Law Times that was lying beside his master on the breakfast table. This made Mr. Lucas feel in his pocket, where he found the Law Times, and, to his great surprise, the letter rolled up inside it; and he then remembered that as soon as the butler had left the room, and before he had noticed the letter that had been laid beside him, he had rolled up the paper and put it in his pocket, intending to read it as he took his morning's stroll through the park. He now apologized very handsomely to Roberts, and made him a present of a sovereign for his trouble, assuring him at the same time that he would do all in his power to obtain him the appointment.

(To be continued.)

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

STRENGTH BY THE WAY.

Words by HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. Music from WEBER

Met. 80 = ♩
TREBLE.
ALTO.
TENOR.
BASS.
ACCOMP.
Je - sus, while this rough de - sert - soil I tread, be Je - sus, while this rough de - sert - soil I tread, be Thou my guide and stay; Nerve me for con - flict and for Thou my guide and stay;

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

toil; Up - hold me on my stran - ger - way: Nerve me for Up - hold me on my stran - ger - way: Nerve me for con - flict and for toil; Up - hold me on my stran- ger - way.
con - flict and for toil; Up - hold me on my stran- ger - way.

Jesus, in heaviness and fear,
'Mid cloud, and shade, and gloom I stray,
For earth's last night is drawing near;
O cheer me on my stranger-way.

Jesus, in solitude and grief,
When sun and stars withhold their ray,
Make haste, make haste to my relief;
O light me on my stranger-way.

Jesus, in weakness of this flesh,
When Satan grasps me for his prey;
O give me victory afresh;
And speed me on my stranger-way.

Jesus, my righteousness and strength,
My more than life, my more than day;
Bring, bring deliverance at length;
O come and end my stranger-way.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA,

AUTHOR OF 'HELEN DUNDAS, OR THE PASTOR'S WIFE;' 'SHADOWS AND SUNSHINE, AND OTHER TALES,' ETC. ETC.

No. II.

SEED-SOWING.

'BLESSED are they that sow beside all waters' (Isa. xxxii. 20). Blessed indeed, you say with a sigh; but that is a blessing that can never be mine. Oh, how gladly would I go forth to sow! but He who appointeth the bounds of our habitations (Acts xvii. 26), hath appointed mine within the narrow bounds of my sick-room, from whence I am never able to go forth to sow.

And if so, it surely can only be because that, in his almighty wisdom, God sees that for the present, at all events, you can better glorify Him in your sick-room, than you could do were you able to 'sow beside all waters.' And although debarred from this, would it not be possible for you to stay at home, and still to be a seed-sower? And if the first verse I have quoted does not suit your circumstances, here is another, and one quite as precious, which you may certainly make your own: 'They that sow in tears, shall reap in joy' (Ps. cxxvi. 5).

Have you never seen a pot of earth brought to the bed-side of a sick child in the gladsome springtide, when he could not go forth with his merry band of brothers and sisters, to sow his mignonette seed in the garden? It was a great sorrow to him, not only, or even chiefly, because it would have been so pleasant to join the happy party, but because his mother was so fond of mignonette; it was her favourite flower, and the first that blossomed was always made into a bouquet for her. But this year he would not have any to give her, though he loved her as much as the others did; and as he thought of this, the tears fell fast, and he was so absorbed in his sorrow, that he did not see his mother coming in with a pot of earth in one hand, and a paper of seed in the other, till she laid both beside him, and said, 'Now, my child, you can sow seed too.'

Oh! how lovingly he thanked her!—how eagerly, though with weak and trembling hands, he planted the seed in that pot of earth, which was then placed on a table beside him! How anxiously the little fellow watched for the first tiny leaves to make their appearance! How often he was tempted to push away the earth to see if the seeds were really growing, and in fact was only dissuaded from doing so, by his mother's telling him that even if they were growing, they would certainly die if too soon exposed to the light and air.

Many a long day he had to wait. At last, one morning he thought he saw a green leaf just above the earth; he could hardly believe it for very joy, but it was true; and now, day after day, others came up, till you could hardly see the earth, so luxuriantly was it covered with its mantle of green. More anxiously than ever did the sick child watch now; the buds and blossoms would be so much more beautiful than were the pretty green leaves. He was continually wanting to do something to 'hurry the blossoms,' as he used to say. But again his mother's wisdom saved him from injuring his plant; for she told him that if he interfered too much it would certainly die, and that all it wanted was plenty of air, and light, and water.

Gradually the buds formed, and then the blossoms; and when the whole room was filled with the sweet perfume, the patient watcher gathered a bouquet for his mother, and sang in the gladness of his heart.

Nor did his joy end then. No; for after the blossoms came the seeds; and the seeds fell down into the earth, and after lying there through the long winter months, when the warm spring came again, they sprang up, and in their turn bore leaves and buds and blossoms, and cheered many a one besides the sick boy who planted the original seed, whence all the others sprang.

And what that mother did for her sick child, will not your God do for you? Will He not bring even to your sick-room some heart prepared by the power of the Holy Spirit for the reception of the seed? Oh! sow it then; sow it in weakness, it may be, but in faith; and water it with tears—with earnest, trustful prayer—prayer that will take no denial, but yet that can wait God's own time for the answer. Only take care that you do not sow tares; not the wisdom of this world; not 'a beautiful idea;' but 'good seed'—the seed of 'the word of God' (Luke viii. 11), or, as it is called elsewhere, 'precious seed' (Ps. cxxvi. 6).

There is one very dear to you—one for whose soul you long with an intensity no words could describe; but you know not how to win it. He may be one who possibly would not bear many words. Never mind—pray and watch. Pray that the Lord may open his heart as He did that of Lydia of old (Acts xvi. 14), and then watch for the opportunity. Watch, and do not let it pass; watch, for you may never have another; watch, for God may be saying that 'now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation' (2 Cor. vi. 2); watch, and sow the precious seed in his heart. That done, water it with your tears, and cry unto the Lord of the harvest that it may take root, and by and by spring up and bear fruit.

But do not be in too great a hurry. Remember that in the parable of the sower, the seed that sprang up 'immediately,' soon withered and died (Mark iv. 5, 6). The seed cast into the earth lives and grows before it appears above the soil. Do not forget that the husbandman who waiteth 'for the precious fruit of the earth hath long patience for it, until it receive the early and the latter rain' (James v. 7). Will you not follow his example, staying your anxious heart on the words of Him who 'cannot lie' (Titus i. 2), and who has said, 'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy,' or, as it is in the margin, 'shall reap in singing?'

I once heard of a little boy who spent most of his early life with an aged and invalid aunt, who loved him dearly. All her own children were much older than he was; so he was less like a nephew to her than the child of her old age. But it did not satisfy her that he should be her child; she longed that he should be also a child of God. Day by day she talked to him of Jesus, and sowed in his young heart the 'precious seed of the word.' We may be very sure that it was often watered with her tears, as, day after day, she looked, and longed, and prayed that it might spring up, and there still was no sign of the fair green leaves,—no sign even, so far as she could see, that the seed had taken root. And so it was when she died. But the boy grew up, and went to India; and there, far away from all the outward means of grace, where there was not any godly pastor or Christian friend to sow the seed in his heart, there, and then, the seed sown so many years before by his aunt, sprang up and bore fruit unto life eternal.

But, do you say, though his aunt sowed the seed, yet she did not reap in joy?

No, not yet; but sooner shall heaven and earth pass away, than one promise of our God remain unfulfilled. Ere long the Lord Jesus shall say to his church, 'The time of the singing is come' (Song ii. 12); and then that faithful aunt, together with all others who have sown in tears, 'shall doubtless (without fail) come again with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them' (Ps. cxxvi. 6).

Sow then the good seed, wherever and whenever you have the opportunity. Sow it with tears of earnestness; and be not perplexed or troubled although it may be long before it springs up. Your reward is certain; for it is written, 'In due season' (or, as the Germans translate it, 'in God's season'), 'ye shall reap, if ye faint not' (Gal. vi. 9). And on that blessed harvest day, the joyful reapers, remembering that though a Paul may plant, and an Apollos water, yet that it is God who giveth the increase (1 Cor. iii. 6), shall sing aloud, as the wheat is gathered into his barn (Matt. xiii. 30): 'Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake' (Ps. cxv. 1).

DOUBTS AND FEARS.

How sadly, and how strangely often with some Christians, doubts and fears as to their state before God return! You yourself, for instance, are so often troubled with them, that most of your time you have only a kind of faint, vague hope that your sins are forgiven, and a desire, rather than an assurance, that you have a right to call Jesus your Saviour.

Surely this is not the way in which that God who 'delighteth in mercy' (Micah vii. 18) wishes or intends his children to pass through life. Is it not this very thing that brings religion into disrepute, and causes its enemies to say, 'The most gloomy and melancholy people in the world are Christians; we do not wish to be gloomy and melancholy, therefore we will not be religious?' It grieves you to hear this, and you say, 'I am very sorry; but I cannot help it. I do continually try to pray; but God does not seem to hear me.' But why, instead of trying to pray, do you not pray? 'I suppose I have not faith,' you answer. Do you mean by this that you ask God to remove your doubts and fears, and yet at the same time do not expect that He will answer you? If this be so, He could not answer you, because He has said, 'Without faith it is impossible to please God; for he that cometh (that is, cometh in prayer to ask for anything) to God, must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him' (Heb. xi. 6). And I think you will acknowledge that although you do believe that 'God is,' yet that you do not believe in your heart that 'He is a rewarder of them (yourself included) that diligently seek Him.' And, if I am not much mistaken, this weight of unbelief prevents, and most naturally prevents, your 'diligently' seeking that your doubts and fears may be removed, for I do not think that any one could seek diligently for anything, unless they were encouraged by a good hope of success.

Diligence implies a great deal. We get a good idea of its meaning from the early verses of the second chapter of Proverbs, where those who are seeking for wisdom are told that if they seek her as silver, and search for her as for hid treasure, that then they shall understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God. Such is, indeed, diligent seeking; and I cannot believe that any one ever sought thus, 'that it might be with them as in months past' (Job xxix. 2), without soon being able to add, 'Verily God hath heard me, He hath attended to the voice of my prayer' (Ps. lxvi. 19).

Suppose you leave off your so-called prayers, seeing that they are really not prayers at all, and turning to the only infallible guide (the word of God), seek for wisdom there. And, oh! may God the Holy Spirit, whose especial office it is to comfort his troubled people, and lead them into all truth (John xvi. 13), give us light to see the cause of your doubts and fears, and how they may be removed.

We have already found that 'without faith it is impossible to please God' (Heb. xi. 6). And in the first verse of the same chapter we shall find what faith is: 'Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen;' and surely this definition is not difficult to understand. 'How did you enjoy your holiday?' says a father to his little boy. 'It was just delightful,' answered the child. 'I think it was as good as two; for almost all the day before yesterday I was thinking about it, and how delightful the croquet would be, and our dinner in the wood, and then all the games in the evening! Then yesterday I had the holiday itself, and all the fun; so that I really hardly know which day was the happiest. I am so glad,' he added, 'that you always tell me about the treats you are going to give me; for then I can enjoy them twice over.' Now, did not that little boy know something of faith being 'the substance of things hoped for?' When it is said to be 'the evidence of things not seen,' it means exactly what we do when we believe that there is such a place as China or New Zealand; we have confidence in the truth of such and such a person who tells us, either in person, or by a letter, or book, that they have been there, and that the houses are built in such a manner, and that the inhabitants have such a custom, etc. etc. Much that relates to the salvation of our souls must be believed on the word of another, if believed at all. But, oh! thank God, we are not asked to believe it on the word of fallible man, but on the word of Him who 'cannot lie' (Tit. i. 2), even of Him who is emphatically the 'faithful and true Witness' (Rev. iii. 14).

Now, having found out what faith is, we must find out how it is to be obtained. 'By prayer, of course,' you say. Ah! this is the mistake that is so often made. True, when you have faith—faith that even tremblingly believes that God is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him, you must, indeed, pray that that faith may be increased and strengthened. But until you have some degree of faith, prayer is useless, or rather it is impossible—real prayer, of course, I mean. For it is quite easy to say prayers, but this is not praying; for, as we saw just now, 'he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him;' and as you do not, now that you are encompassed with doubts and fears, realize the truth of the second clause of the verse, it is quite evident that you cannot pray in faith, and therefore evident that such efforts to pray are not the way to get faith.

How, then, is it to be obtained? Let us find what God himself says about it, and then we shall not fail to find the truth. Let us turn to Romans x. 13, where we find this wonderful promise, 'Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.' But what a long list of difficulties appear to be put in the way of receiving the promise! First, 'How shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed?' Here is the very same difficulty that met us in the eleventh of Hebrews. Then comes another, 'How shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard?' Then another, 'How shall they hear without a preacher?' and yet again, 'How shall they preach except they be sent?' How, indeed? How shall they who have not been sent by God himself—by the call of the Holy Spirit—preach the gospel of peace, and bring tidings of good things?' How can teach others that which they have not first learned themselves? 'So then,' adds the apostle, 'faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.'

Yes, the climax is the word of God. And we must remember that, highly as our God honours and blesses the preaching of the gospel now, it is not, as it was in the days of the apostle, the almost exclusive way in which men could learn the glad tidings of salvation. At that time there were not any printed books, and written ones were so rare and so expensive, that thousands in the days of St. Paul had never read a word of the gospels, while to others the possession of even one single book was counted to be a treasure worth more than its weight in gold. Now, however, an entire Bible may be obtained for a few pence; so that even if we are debarred by outward circumstances from the privilege of hearing the word of God preached, we can read it for ourselves; and therefore the way in which faith may be obtained is open to you as well, nay, far better, than it was to the Romans to whom St. Paul wrote, 'Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.'

You have that word in your hand, and you not only believe that 'God is,' but also that He is a 'God of truth' (Deut. xxxii. 4). So, then, the promise we have before alluded to must be true, seeing that He made it, 'Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.' Do not these words exactly meet your difficulty? I believe you to be a child of God, notwithstanding your doubts, which, I am sure, have arisen from your not having, through sufficient use of the word of God, 'had your senses exercised to discern both good and evil' (Heb. v. 14), and therefore you have thought that these doubts may have been God's voice of warning, speaking through your conscience to tell you that you are not his child; whereas I think that they have been Satan's voice speaking to your heart, to keep you from that blessed heritage of 'joy and peace in believing' (Rom. xv. 13), which it is God's desire that every one of his children should possess. But even if I am mistaken, and if all your past experience of the joy of believing that the Lord Jesus loved you, and gave himself for you (Gal. ii. 20), was a delusion, even that would not exclude you from the promise. There is not one human being, whoever and whatever he may have been, standing outside the reach of that 'whosoever,' who is willing to call upon God. You are willing, nay longing, to call upon Him for salvation; but, oh! you are not half so willing to ask for it as He is to give it. He 'loved you with an everlasting love' (Jer. xxxi. 3). He chose you before the foundation of the world (Eph. i. 4); and having 'loved you from the beginning, He will love you unto the end' (John xiii. 1). Hide these precious words deep down in your heart, and then turn to John vi. 37: 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out.' Look at Isaiah i. 18: 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool;' and now at 1 John i. 8: 'The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.' Once I begin this blessed subject I know not how to stop; but I will only add one promise more: 'God so loved the world that He gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life' (John iii. 16).

You do believe now. You do believe that God sent his Son to die for you, and that that Son died. It is written, 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends' (John xv. 13). Yes, it is true that greater love hath no man; but, oh! well it is for us, greater love hath God; 'for while we were yet sinners (that is, enemies), Christ died for us' (Rom. v. 8).

Now, have you not reached the second point of faith, if I may so call it? Even amidst your most gloomy doubts you believed that God existed, and you now believe that 'He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.' But what! does the word 'diligently' frighten you, and appear to bring you back to your own works again? A little child cannot find her mother, and she wants her greatly; off she sets to seek for her, upstairs and down-stairs, in every room she looks for her, crying out all the time, 'Oh! mother, mother, where are you? I do want you so very much!' 'Just wait a little, Miss Mary,' says the nurse; 'you will tire yourself if you run about so much. Sit down, and wait a little, and you will be sure to find the mistress soon.' 'Ah, but nurse, I have not seen her for so long, and I cannot be happy without her, and if I find her I shall not mind being tired!' Away she ran to the arbour in the garden, and there she found her mother sitting reading; with one bound she sprang on her knee, and throwing her arms round her neck, exclaimed, 'Oh! mother, I am so happy.'

Did not that little child seek her mother diligently? 'I think she sought her lovingly,' you say; 'but that is not my idea of the word "diligently;" I always thought it meant being desperately busy.'

Let us find out what Archbishop Trench says about it in his valuable little book on The Study of Words. In page 201 we read as follows: 'What a lesson the word "diligent" contains! How profitable it is for every one to be reminded, as we are reminded when we make ourselves aware of its derivation from the word "diligo," "to love," that the only secret of true industry in our work is love of that work.' Was not love the secret of that little child's diligence in seeking for her mother? St. Paul says that it was 'the love of Christ which constrained him,' or, as it might be rendered, 'bore him down as a torrent, carrying all before it' (2 Cor. v. 14). And shall not that same love constrain you, sweeping away, as with a torrent, every doubt and every fear, to say of the blessed Saviour, 'who loved me, and gave himself for me' (Gal. ii. 20); and again, with the disciple of old, 'My Lord and my God?' (John xx. 28.)

I shall only quote one more invitation, the last in the whole Bible: 'The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst say, Come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely' (Rev. xxii. 17).

You have obeyed the invitation of the Spirit and the bride, and have yourself come to Jesus. But surely you will not, you cannot come alone; but rather, having first come yourself and drunk of the water of life, you will delight in obeying the command contained in the conclusion of the verse, and saying to those around you, 'Come, let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.

FOR SATURDAY NIGHT.

CHAFED and worn with worldly care,
Sweetly, Lord, my heart prepare;
Bid this inward tempest cease;
Jesus, come, and whisper peace!
Hush the whirlwind of my will,
With thyself my spirit fill;
End in calm this busy week,
Let the Sabbath gently break!

Sever, Lord, these earthly ties;
Fain my soul to Thee would rise.
Disentangle me from time,
Lift me to a purer clime.

Let me cast away my load,
Let me now draw nigh to God.
Gently, loving Jesus, speak;
End in calm this busy week.

Draw the curtain of repose
While my weary eyelids close;
Steal my spirit while I rest,
Give me dreamings pure and blest!
Raise me with a cheerful heart;
Holy Ghost, thyself impart;
Then the Sabbath-day will be Heaven brought down to earth and me.

—Anon.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

ACTS II. 36–38.

THIS is part of the first sermon preached under the Christian dispensation. It was preached by Peter, who, some seven weeks before, had thrice denied the Lord; not by John, the beloved disciple. It was preached in Jerusalem, not far from the spot where the Lord was crucified. It was preached to those who had slain Him. It was preached immediately after a remarkable outpouring of the Spirit, and by one full of the Spirit. It is strangely calm and unimpassioned; no exaggerated description, no strong language, no sensation. It is a simple narrative about Jesus. He who spoke it manifestly trusted to some power beyond his own to give effect to it; to something in the simple facts themselves to work the end desired. He spoke as a witness and a reprover, not as an orator or a logician. Yet, as for its simplicity, so for its effects, it is one of the most marvellous sermons ever preached. A child could understand it; yet three thousand men were overwhelmed by it. It is a true specimen of preaching or speaking in the Holy Ghost. Such should our preaching be. This would keep us 'abreast of the age;' this would meet the infidel, and confound him; this would be better than eloquence, or science, or the enticing words of man's wisdom. This would do the work of God. It would not merely improve, or elevate, or refine; it would SAVE. And then all these other things would follow. The 'breath of society' would be truly 'sweetened.' The ruggednesses of earth would be smoothed. Such is God's plan for the 'elevation of the masses.' Such is the way in which He preserves the world from corruption,—by creating this divine salt in it, through the almighty energy of the Holy Ghost. God elevates by saving. He refines by regenerating. Let us ever keep his plan in mind; nor be led away into devices of our own, as if in despair, or as if the gospel had failed.

The three verses which we have read bring before us—(1) The crucified One; (2) The crucifiers; (3) The connection between the latter and the former both for evil and good.

I. The crucified One.—Let us note concerning this—

(1.) Who He was.—'That same Jesus;' yes, Jesus of Nazareth; He who was born at Bethlehem; who went about doing and speaking only good.

(2.) What was done to Him.—He was betrayed, tried, condemned, crucified, slain. All hatred was displayed to Him; all shame poured upon Him; the vilest and most terrible of deaths was inflicted on Him.

(3.) By whom was this done?—By 'his own;' by 'Israel,' the house of Israel—the Jews of Jerusalem. Not by Romans or Gentiles, but Jews,—by them who ought to have been foremost to welcome Him.

(4.) What God has made Him.—'Both Lord and Christ.' The stone which the builders rejected has been made the head of the corner. 'Both Lord and Christ!' All that the prophets predicted concerning the Seed of the woman; all that Israel was expecting; all that could be comprehended, of power, and dignity, and authority, and glory, and excellency, in these two names, are given by God to this same Jesus. Whatever man may think of Him, God's thoughts of Him are of the highest kind. Whatever Israel may do to Him, to show hatred and contempt, God treats Him as infinitely worthy of all honour in earth and heaven.

II. The crucifiers.—They were, as we have seen, 'the house of Israel;' but this is not the point to which I ask your attention here. They are accused of an awful crime. They had deliberately united to crucify—

(1.) An innocent man.—One who had done nothing amiss; One against whom no charge was substantiated; One whom their own law would have acquitted of having done anything worthy of death.

(2.) A good man.—A bad man may be, in respect of certain charges, quite innocent; but this man was more. He was righteous, and He was good; He had said and done nothing but what was good all his life. His had been a life of pure and holy love.

(3.) A prophet.—One of their own rulers had confessed Him as a teacher sent from God; and his whole life proclaimed Him a prophet, greater in word and deed than any of their ancient ones.

(4.) The Lord of glory.—The Son of God, in the truest sense of the expression; Son of the Highest; equal with God; truly divine.

(5.) Their own Messiah.—The very Christ whom their prophets predicted; whom they and their fathers had been expecting; their King and Lord.

They were thus not merely murderers, but no ordinary ones,—criminals, in the highest and darkest sense; their hands red with innocent blood—the blood of their own Messiah—the blood of God!

III. The connection between the Crucified and the crucifiers for evil and for good.

(1.) For evil.—For condemnation. It was this that they felt so awfully when the apostle had stated the simple facts. (1) They were pricked in their hearts; (2) They cried out, What shall we do? A full sense of their awful criminality flashed through them. They were murderers; the worst murderers the world ever saw; the murderers of Him who is Lord and Christ. Then, indeed, condemnation, infinite condemnation, was theirs. They had, perhaps, not been those who actually nailed Him to the tree; but they had concurred in the deed. They were guilty of his blood, and they did not seek to deny it. So is every sinner a concurrent in this infinite murder. This is God's charge against us: 'Ye slew my Son.'

(2.) For good.—This connection for evil might be disannulled, and a new one formed. An opportunity was to be given for disavowing their deed; and that disavowal was not only to disconnect them with all the evil they had incurred, but was to connect them with all the good which Messiah came to bring. They would then be treated by God as if they had welcomed Him from the first. Not only would they receive remission of sins, but also the gift of the Holy Ghost. 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' Believe in Him, and thou shalt receive the Spirit, and, with Him, all present and eternal blessing.

THE WILDERNESS AND THE REST.*

SONG OF SOLOMON VI. 10–13.

THE great object of this Song is, as I have before observed, to mark the place (or rather that which should be the place) of the church, in the midst of the earth's present darkness, whilst her Lord is absent, and herself a pilgrim. The proud city of man, and the guardians thereof, had no knowledge of her who ventured without the gate, trusting to the guidance of a voice that they knew not. If they thought of her at all, they thought of her only to despise. They understood neither her sorrows nor her joys. Her comeliness—that is to say, her comeliness in the eyes of her heavenly Lord—was in their sight 'blackness.' What honour, in the estimate of the keepers of man's city, could attach to one whose blackened visage was scorched by the sun and beaten by the storm; whose home and occupation was at the sheepfold, or in the vineyards, or in the distant valley, where flowers and fruits of heavenly preciousness might bloom or ripen, but where nothing was found that was great, or elevated, or ennobling in the estimate of those who desired rather to reign as kings than to go without the camp bearing the reproach of truth? Yet that was the only place in which she, whose joys and sorrows are the subjects of this 'Song,' could find communion with her Lord. There she could rejoice in Him, and He in her; but if from that place she wandered, she found not peace, not happiness, but chastisement and sorrow.

But although this 'Song' belongs to this present night of suffering, and not to that future hour when truth shall prosper and be exalted, yet there are in it, interspersed here and there, many allusions to that coming morning of brightness, when 'the day shall break, and the shadows flee away.' Of this the passage before us is an example.

The words, 'Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?' are words incapable of being applied to the church during the present period of its humiliation. The words, 'looketh forth,' imply manifestation; and to the church, in the present dispensation, no such manifestation pertains. Whatever the church, or any in it, may be in the eyes of Christ, or in the estimate of faith, the time for the declaration of their excellency and preciousness is not yet come. 'The world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not.' But the moment the day of the coming dispensation dawns, and converted Israel becomes God's witness in the earth, the scene changes. The day of truth's honour will have come, and Israel, as being truth's witness, will of necessity share its exaltation and triumph. 'For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name. Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God' (Isa. lxii. 1-3). Blessed words, which shall be fulfilled in their season. But they belong not to the present condition of the servants of truth. To them a far different path has been appointed. It was never intended that they should reign as kings. On the contrary, they were set forth by God as persons appointed to death,—who were to be, for Christ's sake, 'despised,' 'reviled,' 'persecuted,' 'defamed,' 'made as the filth of the world and the off-scouring of all things' (1 Cor. iv. 9, etc.). Such was the path trodden by the apostles. It was no self-chosen course. Their sufferings were not earned by haughtiness, or self-will, or fanatical peculiarities. They resulted from simple, straightforward, humble adherence to Christ and to his truth; and therefore their sufferings were blessed. But with the apostles, we may almost say that such sufferings ceased. St. Paul intimated that it would be so, when he said, 'I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as persons appointed to death.' St. Paul marked with sorrow the disposition that prevailed in those around him, to reign rather than to suffer; to be within rather than without the camp. Throughout the last eighteen hundred years, few have even desired the place which the pilgrim-stranger in this Song is described as holding. They have sought after the throne far more than 'the valley;' influence has been purchased by the sacrifice of truth; and the practical power of Christianity has in proportion waned.

* From Mr. B. W. Newton's 'Occasional Papers.'

Yet, however Christ would have rejoiced in seeing his people treading patiently the path of holy separation, it is not, and cannot be, pleasing in his sight that falsehood and iniquity should prevail, or that his people should be despised, and his truth rejected. His wisdom and grace may cause Him for a season to acquiesce in this; but it is his purpose finally that righteousness and truth, and the servants thereof, should flourish in the earth, and triumph. Even then, if his church throughout this dispensation had kept her proper place of faithful separateness, He still would have looked forward to and welcomed the approach of that hour, when the place of suffering will be exchanged for one of honour, and when she who is appointed to be his new witness in the earth shall 'look forth in brightness, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners.'

But, seeing that the people of God have greatly failed in keeping their proper place of separateness, and have become weak in the day of conflict, we find in this an added reason why the coming day of Israel's return unto the Lord should be looked forward to as a relief against the oppressive sense of the earth's present fruitlessness. Fruitfulness, if found anywhere, would be found in 'the valley;' the place, that is, of retired humble separateness, where alone fruits ripen meet for the Lord—where alone 'the vines flourish and the pomegranates bud.' Such 'valleys' cannot be found everywhere; nor can we create them for ourselves when and where we please. Many, indeed, have sought to do this. We love to choose for ourselves the spots we cultivate, and to determine for ourselves the character and limits of our separation. But 'the valley' of true fruitfulness cannot thus be gained. It is a place unto which the wisdom, and truth, and Spirit of Christ can alone guide. In seeking it, the understanding and conscience must be exercised as well as the heart. There must be ability to discern truth, and grace to follow it when discerned, otherwise the true 'valley' of blessing, at the foot of the mountains of Bether (separation), will not be reached. It would be too much to say that it has been reached by none; for it is spoken of as a place not unknown to her whose history is set before us in this 'Song.' Yet her companions were few. She is evidently spoken of as one singularly isolated and alone. Few accompanied her to 'the valley;' few joined her in watching over the vines and pomegranates that were there; and the consequence was paucity of fruit. I do not, indeed, say that this paucity was caused solely by the fewness of those that shared her labours. There might also have been languor in her own discouraged hand; or the blighting noxious influences of earth might have been permitted to destroy. All these causes may have concurrently operated to produce the result plainly indicated in the words that follow: 'I went down into the garden of nuts to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded. Or ever I was aware' (i.e. suddenly), 'my soul set me on the chariots of my willing people.' The Lord visited the valley. He does not, indeed, say that He found no fruit; but evidently He found not that which satisfied his desires, and therefore his heart turned to the future: 'Suddenly my soul set me on the chariots of my willing people.' His soul looked onward to the day of Israel's strength, when they shall be willing in the day of his power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning,—the first birth, that is, of the millennial day, when they 'shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit.'

And can we (feeble and limited as our apprehensions are), can even we contemplate the present condition of Christianity, and not feel a certain comfort and relief in turning from it to that future hour when truth shall no longer be successfully resisted by its enemies, or find its interests betrayed by the weakness and unfaithfulness of its friends? The history of Christendom throughout, from the day the apostles died on to the present hour, has been a sorrowful and evil history. The professing Gentile church has not continued in God's goodness, and therefore, like a diseased and cankered branch, it is to be cut off from the olive-tree of blessing. The reaction against the ritualistic abominations of Christendom that took place at the time of the Reformation, was an intervention of God's goodness, for which his true people praise Him, and will praise Him for ever and ever; yet Protestantism, even in the days of its early vigour, was content to spare not a few of the fetters which ritualism and superstition had forged, and was tempted to forge other bonds, which have fatally bound those who wear them to the thrones and potentates of earth, and not unfrequently made the true saints of God like so many Jehoshaphats following in the train of Ahab. There is, indeed, still some true Protestantism, and we thank God for it; but for the most part the Protestantism of the present hour is nominal merely. Some so-called Protestants, deceiving and deceived, are rushing back to the vile idolatries and superstitions of Rome; others are plunging into the black darkness of Neologian infidelity; whilst another part look calmly on with Gallio-like indifference, careless about everything save that which bears upon their interests in earth,—being worshippers of 'human-progress,' and not unfrequently of mammon.

At various periods in the history of Protestantism, attempts have been made by many to emancipate themselves from restraints that have borne injuriously on their consciences; nor have such efforts been unprospered when the word of God has been really adhered to as the guide. Liberty is precious; but true holy liberty can only be gained by close subjection to the revealed will of God, as declared in Holy Scripture.

None but the servants of truth are really free. If not cleaving to the truth, we are sure to be in servitude to some form of delusive error that human selfishness, under Satan, has constructed for the advancement of its own ends; and thus man, not God, will be our master. The present is a moment of great activity among many Christians who have set themselves free, as they say, from the restraint of human systems, that they may serve the Lord with unfettered hand. But what is more dangerous than a hand that has struck off former fetters, but refuses to submit itself to the restraining guidance of truth? Nor is subjection to truth the work of a moment. It is not easy for such as we, with all our ignorance and all our prejudices, to read and interpret the word of God with calm sobriety of mind; nor is it easy, in such a day as this, to cleave to the faith once delivered to the saints. It is far easier to talk smooth things about love, 'large-heartedness,' and the like, and to join in the prevailing cry against creeds, and confessions, and 'old orthodox theology,' and all 'stereotyped' form of doctrine,—as if the Holy Spirit disowned precision, and clearness, and fixedness, and delighted in vagueness, mystification, and change. The apostle thought otherwise when he said, 'We use great plainness of speech;' and when he exhorted Timothy to remember 'the form of sound words,' and to keep, through the Holy Ghost, that precious deposit of truth which had been committed to him. Order, surely, and not confusion, should characterize the assemblies and arrangements of God's people; but this cannot be unless the word of God be rigorously applied as the test of all doctrine and all practice, and unless teachers qualified by God's own Spirit be recognised as the appointed means by which his people are to be fed with the food that is needful to their growth. If such teachers, sent of God, be not sought after and owned; if all the Lord's people are supposed to be occasionally, if not abidingly, 'prophets;' if circumstances connected with wealth, birth, or worldly standing, are deemed to give fitness for control, or presidency, or prominence in the church of God,—what then can be expected except confusion, error, and finally, heretical departure from the faith? In Cromwell's camp it was said that there were none to be taught, because all were teachers. 'It was said of Athens that you might walk through her streets, and more readily find gods than men; it might be said of the latter years of the Commonwealth that there were almost as many sects as worshippers.' This description is true; and we well know the terribleness of the reaction that followed. An hour of liberty after bondage is the very time when the closest guidance of God's truth is needed; and that cannot be received by his people collectively except through his word, unfolded by persons whom He has, by his Spirit, qualified. If the saints of God individually were instructed in Holy Scripture, and loved it, they would soon be able to discern who were, and who were not, fitted to be guides. They would be able to discern the ruin of the walls of truth, and might be perhaps privileged to aid in their restoration. But, in default of such knowledge, their condition must be as that of the blind or the deaf, whose wisdom, while they so continue, is to be quiet and sit still. Nehemiah welcomed the co-operation of all who were able to labour with him for the restoration of the walls of Jerusalem. But a necessary qualification in those who so laboured was, that they should be capable of distinguishing between 'rubbish' and 'stones;' or, at any rate, that they should be willing to submit to the guidance of those who were able to make the needed distinction. Of this we may be very sure, that truth alone can guide to the true 'valley' of separation, or give vigour and fruitfulness to that which is planted there.

(To be continued.)

[illegible]

[illegible]

CHAPTER II.

[illegible] Basle. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

tality,' he exclaimed; 'we are a people like unto Sodom.'

Farel left Bâle, accompanied by his friend the knight, D'Esch. As they intended to travel by Strasburg as far as Wittemburg, they were provided by Œcolampadius with letters for Capito and Luther, to whom Farel was introduced as 'that same William who has laboured so abundantly in the work of God.' If Farel reached Wittemburg, his stay there must have been very short; there is no mention of his having done so, and we soon hear of him at Strasburg, where he formed a close and lasting friendship with Bucer and Capito.

When God removed Farel from Meaux, it was not to lay him aside, but rather to prepare him for further work. Before he visited Bâle he had not entered on the ministry of the word, thinking himself unworthy of so high and holy a calling; but, strongly urged by Œcolampadius, his scruples were overcome, and he waited to see in what part of the vineyard his Master would call him to labour as an ordained minister of the gospel. In obedience to a call which he felt to be from God, he now became pastor of Montbeliard. Œcolampadius ordained him, and gave him this advice: 'The more you find yourself inclined to vehemence, the more you must exercise yourself to maintain a gentle bearing: temper your lion heart with the softness of the dove.'

In July he began his ministry at Montbeliard. The duke treated him kindly, and the people gladly listened to the Scriptures. With joy Farel wrote to tell the good news to his friends at Bâle, and Œcolampadius congratulated him, saying, 'I rejoice to hear that the cause of Christ advances so much by your means. I pray that He who plants by your hand may also water and protect his vineyard, both from the mischief of the little foxes and the devastation of the wild boar. Be it your desire to become the parent of many spiritual children, who shall be not so much knowing as good, that is truly learned—taught of God. It is easy to instil notions into the minds of our hearers; but to change the heart is a divine work. Above all things, therefore, it is necessary to pray for the Holy Spirit, and, by improving one talent, gain another. But in order to this there will be need of gentleness, patience, charity, and, above all, faith. Prudence also will be requisite,—not carnal prudence, but that holy wisdom which descendeth from above, and which teaches us, after the example of Christ, to adapt ourselves to all our hearers. But why should I admonish you who have the Spirit of God for your monitor, and follow his guidance? I have need rather to bewail myself, who for so long time together speak into the air. Pray to the Lord that He suffer not his word to be despised through my inertness or sinfulness. My household salute you.' Then after mentioning some of his employments, Œcolampadius adds, 'Pray the Lord that I may not toil all the night and take nothing. Farewell in Christ.'

Opposition soon put Farel's faith to the test. De Coct, the bearer of the above letter, found Montbeliard all in commotion; the nobles were angrily inquiring, 'What can this poor wretch want among us? Would that he had never come!'

Erasmus was the cause of all this tumult. He had written to inform his friends that a Frenchman, escaped out of France, was making a great noise at Montbeliard, that 'the faction was every day spreading, and had penetrated into Savoy, Lorraine, and France.' One Sunday, while Farel was preaching, he was suddenly interrupted by the guardian of the Franciscans, who called him a heretic and a liar, and denounced his doctrines as 'unchristian.' The duke took his part so far as to protect him against open violence.

Farel's zeal was rather increased by this opposition, and believing that the chief offenders were to be found among the clergy, he attacked them with great vehemence, and, forgetting the advice of Œcolampadius to endeavour 'first to banish Antichrist from the hearts of his hearers,' he began to preach against the Mass. When intelligence of these disturbances reached Œcolampadius, he inquired 'How it fared with Farel.' The friend to whom he spoke replied that 'his untiring zeal, faithfulness, and activity could not be too highly commended.' 'Ah!' said Œcolampadius; 'but how is it with his meekness?' And, alarmed lest Farel should be hurried by imprudent zeal into some act of indiscretion, he wrote to remind him that 'men may be led, but will not be driven.' 'We must,' he added, 'keep one object in view—to win souls for Christ, and consider how we ourselves should wish to be taught if we were still enveloped in darkness, bound in the fetters of Antichrist. Endeavour,' he continued, 'to exhibit the very image of Christ in your life,—I mean, now especially, by copying Him as Teacher. He was, indeed, severe towards the Pharisees—a race of men deaf to reproof; but He conveyed some things through the medium of lamentation over sinners, some in the way of warning, some in an attractive and even entertaining form; so that scarcely ever was his kindness more apparent than when He was surrounded by malignant and insidious enemies. A word to the wise is sufficient. I know that you would wish to be a skilful surgeon—not a butcher. Farewell in Christ.'

Just at this time the controversy about the Lord's Supper between Luther and Zwingle commenced. Deeply did the French Christians lament this falling out among brethren. Most of them, including Anemond, agreed with Zwingle's views, while some, and among them Francis Lambert, followed Luther. 'Would to God,' said Toussaint, 'that by my worthless blood I could purchase peace, concord, and union in Christ Jesus! Think of the confusion that will arise if these differences are employed to make the world believe that Strasburg has one creed, and Nuremburg another.' Strasburg laboured to make peace, and advised that 'Bucer or some other man of learning should be sent to confer with Luther;' adding, 'the longer we delay, the wider will our differences become.' But the breach was too wide to be healed at that time, and, disheartened, Anemond and his friends turned their thoughts in another direction.

Earnestly desiring that 'France should be so supplied with gospel writings, that in cottages and palaces, in cloisters and presbyteries, and in the inner sanctuary of all hearts, a powerful witness might be borne for the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ,' they soon put their desires into practice; they undertook to establish a printing press at Bâle, and translated into French some of the German Reformers' tracts. One of the first published was Luther's Exposition of the Lord's Prayer. It soon became popular; but the word of God was the book most eagerly demanded, and widely circulated.

Although much blessing attended Farel's ministry at Montbeliard, the mass of the people continued to worship images; and often, as he witnessed their idolatrous processions, a struggle within, lest he should err by silence on the one hand, or by over zeal on the other, deeply agitated him. While thus harassed, he was one day walking along the banks of a river, when he met a procession headed by two priests, carrying the image of St. Anthony, in honour of whom they repeated prayers as they passed along. Farel's indignation being thoroughly roused, he rushed forwards, snatched the image from the priest who bore it, and threw it into the river, crying out: 'Ye miserable idolaters, cannot ye cease from your idolatries?' In a moment the priests and the people rushed in fury upon him; but fortunately the cry, 'The image is sinking,' diverted their attention, and Farel escaped while they hastened to the rescue of their idol.

Hitherto Farel had not published any book of his own. He now drew up 'A Summary of what a Christian ought to know, in order to trust God, and serve his Neighbour.' The book was much valued, and passed through several editions; some smaller works followed with similar success. His friend Anemond assisted him in all his undertakings—a friend he was soon to lose.

After attacking the priests, and throwing their image into the river, Farel was obliged to leave Montbeliard (1526), and take shelter at Bâle with Œcolampadius. Scarcely had he arrived there, when he heard of the dangerous illness of his friend Anemond. He at once started for Schaffhausen to see him, but was too late. Anemond was gone to God, to whose service he had devoted his life. 'I doubt not,' wrote Myconius to his sorrowing friend, 'that he will receive the reward of his faith, and of the sacrifices he has made for the advancement of the truth. Let us so live, that when our earthly tabernacle shall be dissolved, we may arrive where, we trust, Anemond has entered before us.'

Soon after Anemond's death, Farel, feeling that he could no longer remain at Bâle, went to Strasburg, to his friends Bucer and Capito.

Various reasons, besides the tumult at the bridge, led to his leaving Montbeliard; among others, the removal of the duke and his court. But he always felt the deepest interest in that place, in which he first laboured as an ordained minister of the gospel.

---

CHAPTER IV.

FAREL is now at Strasburg, preaching to a small congregation of his countrymen, who, like himself, had been banished from France on account of their religion. To his great joy, he there met his old friend and tutor, Lefèvre, whom he had not seen for three years. Once more they took sweet counsel together, and walked to the house of God as friends. 'Do you recollect,' said Farel to Lefèvre, 'your once saying to me, when we were both as yet in darkness, "William, God will renew the world, and you will live to see it?" See here the beginning of what you foretold.' 'Yes,' answered the old man, 'God is renewing the world. Oh, my son, continue to preach boldly the holy gospel of Jesus Christ.'

While Farel and Lefèvre continued 'stedfast in the apostles' doctrine, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers,' it is painful to think of Briçonnet, so lately of their company, but who, terrified by the officers of the Inquisition, had shortly before this recanted.

The first step downwards was taken in 1523, when Briçonnet, on the 12th of April, as we have seen, deprived Farel and Lefèvre of liberty to preach the gospel at Meaux; yet he was justly considered a friend of the Reformation, and, as such, was obnoxious to the court, though he never contemplated a separation from the Church of Rome, but rather expected that Rome would reform herself. Many in those days, who felt the power of the truth put forth by the Reformers, shared in this hope,—a hope never realized.

The battle of Pavia left Francis a prisoner in the hands of the Emperor Charles V., and the Regent, the queen-mother, attributing that calamity to the progress of heresy in France and acknowledging her share in the transgression, in that she had read some reformed tracts, and Luther's translation of the New Testament, was anxious to show her zeal for the Pope; and, notwithstanding her daughter's tears, wrote to learn his wishes regarding the heretics. She also inquired of the Sorbonne, 'By what means the damnable doctrine of Luther could be extirpated?'

It was an humbling thought to the Pontiff, Clement VII., that he had failed to crush the Reformation in Germany and Switzerland, and with joy he hailed the prospect of taking vengeance on his enemy in France, and gave immediate orders for the establishment of the Inquisition, upon which the Regent issued letters-patent requiring obedience to his orders.

On May 20, 1525, the commissioners were named and approved by his Holiness. The question, who should be the first victim of its power, was then discussed. To strike terror into the heart of the Reformed party, it was necessary that the choice should fall upon a man of eminence; and the Count de Montbrun, Briçonnet, Bishop of Meaux, the old friend of Louis XII., the guide and spiritual father of Margaret of Valois, received orders to stand his trial. There was abundant evidence to convict him. In 1523, though a witness of the sufferings of Leclerc, he continued with Lefèvre, openly to protest against popish superstitions. It also appeared that he had shielded the teachers of the 'new doctrines' from the fury of their enemies; and that upon one occasion, after a sermon at Meaux, preached by the superior of the Cordeliers against Lutheran doctrine, Briçonnet, from the same pulpit, denounced the Cordeliers as 'impostors, false prophets, and hypocrites.' Further still, it was stated that, in 1525, the bishop, attended by Lefèvre, had gone through his diocese, and ordered all images, except the crucifix, to be burnt.

On October 3, 1525, Parliament met and issued an order for the arrest of all those who had been informed against, and for the examination of the bishop, 'touching the things whereof he was accused by the Sorbonne.'

When advocating evangelical doctrines, it seems never to have occurred to Briçonnet that he might be called to maintain them at the cost of his life, and he was not now prepared to choose between the scaffold and recantation. Great was his terror; in vain he looked to the court for protection. In reply to his earnest entreaty for mercy, the regent and the chancellor exhorted him to renounce heresy, and those who advocated it.

In silent sorrow Margaret stood by, knowing all, but unable to help. Anticipating the coming storm, and persuaded that the Reformers would look to her for shelter, she had written to entreat them 'not to run into unnecessary danger.' Believing her words to have been suggested by a regard for their safety, Toussaint wrote to Farel, saying, 'God gives her grace to say and to write only what is necessary for poor souls.'

In his extremity, Briçonnet implored to be allowed to appear in general assembly before Parliament, an indulgence to which his high rank entitled him; but it was denied.

The priests and monks, rejoicing in their triumph, and knowing that the recantation of the bishop would serve the Papal cause far more than his death, constantly visited him, and urged every possible consideration to induce him to return to the 'true church.' Among his tempters was one Martial Mazurier, who, having himself apostatized, longed to rejoice over a brother's fall. To deny Christ, Briçonnet was not required. No, that proposal would have startled him; he was rather entreated to consider the good which his remaining at court would effect, and the evil consequences likely to follow his departure from it to the progress of the Reformation, which was going on by insensible steps, at the court, in the city, and in the provinces. 'In the name of religion, country, and friends —nay, even the Reformation itself, consent,' exclaimed the priests, and left him to deliberate.

The snare thus skilfully laid entrapped its victim: to listen to the tempter was to yield to his power. There was no safety for the bishop but in the firm decision of Luther: 'Recant I cannot—here I stand—may God help me;' but this firmness the bishop had not. The cross he was called to take up that he might follow Christ was too heavy for him. He forgot that 'Christ bears the heavy end of every cross He lays upon his people;'* and, forgetting this, he fell, and great was the fall.

When the examination was over, the judges declared Briçonnet vindicated from the charges laid against him. Penance was then appointed him; after which he publicly condemned the writings of Luther, retracted all he had said against the worship of images, and gave orders for processions, in which he personally bore a part. The trial over, the Sorbonne permitted the bishop to return to his diocese; but the remaining few years of his life were passed in obscurity, bitter repentance of the past, and vain attempts to clear himself. Notwithstanding this abject submission, this cowardly escape, the Romish party did not place much confidence in Briçonnet; and we cannot but hope that, under so much dross, there yet remained the fine gold of the sanctuary—faith in Christ, who saves to the uttermost; for 'the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.'

Lefèvre came next. His trial was short; Parliament sentenced his works, including his translation of the Scriptures, to be placed in the list of prohibited books; and expecting that this step would be followed by others of a similar character, Lefèvre left Meaux for Strasburg, exclaiming in bitterness of spirit, 'As the dust is shaken off from our feet, so are our persecutors cast off from the presence of the Lord.'

We now return to Farel, whom we left with Lefèvre at Strasburg. He remained in that city fifteen months, during which time he was much tried by dejection of spirit. Writing to Zwingle, he said: 'How deceived and destitute of piety are those who refuse to bear the cross of Christ! We know some, whom every one believed to possess the Spirit of God, who have ended in the flesh, and drawn many along with them into destruction.'

In the midst of these reflections, the Reformer encouraged himself by remembering, that 'he who is truly pious is never utterly cast down by his adversaries.' 'Our persecutors,' he wrote to Zwingle, 'teach us to supplicate with earnest aspirations our Father in heaven, whose wonderful goodness and grace are manifested to his children, in constraining them, by the cross, to pursue their course with circumspection, remembering how precious a treasure they bear in earthen vessels.' This letter greatly cheered Zwingle, who, like Farel, was endeavouring to maintain a holy Christian stedfastness, in the midst of harassing opposition.

In October 1526, Farel left Strasburg for Bâle. Upon arriving there, he found the plague raging violently, which, added to the hostility of the Senate, prevented his appearing much in public. In private he had many consultations with Œcolampadius, the venerated pastor of Bâle, respecting the best means by which to provide faithful pastors for the church.

Leaving Bâle, he proceeded to Neuchatel in the garb of a priest, that he might gain access to preach the gospel; however, he was at once recognised, and obliged to leave the town. He then visited Berne, where the Reformed doctrines had already gained access, through the faithful ministry of Berthold Haller. Aware of Farel's strong desire to advance the kingdom of Christ in those places in which the French language was spoken, Haller advised him to go to Aigle, a small town in the valley of the same name, in the south of Switzerland. He consented; and, under the name of Ursinus, he reached Aigle in the winter of 1526. Willing to make himself of no reputation in order to win souls for Christ, he appeared as a humble schoolmaster, and while teaching his pupils, quietly introduced the gospel.

* Rutherford.

The people now entrusted to his care had long been neglected. The superior clergy, having the charge of two or more parishes, left their duties to be indifferently performed by their curates, which state of things made the Reformer's task one of great difficulty.

When free from his work as schoolmaster, his recreation was the study of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. At that time, too, he read Zwingle's first publication, addressed to Luther. 'What learning,' he cried, 'does Zwingle display in this work! How he scatters the darkness; with what holy ingenuity he gains over the wise; and what captivating meekness he unites with a forcible erudition! Oh that, by the grace of God, this work may win over Luther, so that the church of Christ, trembling from such violent storms, may at length find peace!'

The subject of this book was the controversy between Luther and Zwingle upon the Lord's Supper. Farel's views of the ordinance agreed with those of the Swiss Reformer.

Shortly after Farel's arrival at Aigle, Œcolampadius wrote, urging him to be firm and prudent, to arm himself with Christian knowledge and apostolic vigour; and for some time we find him chiefly engaged in communicating the truth, without making any open attack upon error. However, when the good effects of his teaching had become apparent, the Senate of Berne granted him permission to preach publicly at Aigle. This was great joy to Farel; and believing that the moment had arrived when he might declare himself and his mission, he exclaimed, 'I am William Farel, minister of the word of God.' He then attacked the doctrine of purgatory and the invocation of saints, and was heard to say, 'As for the Pope, he is nothing, or almost nothing, in these parts.'

The priests and magistrates, horror-struck at finding that they had been harbouring so obnoxious a character, endeavoured to silence him; but the Senate declared that no just ground of complaint had been brought against him, and commanded that he should be permitted to preach without molestation. Thus, in the spring of 1527, in the beautiful valley of Aigle, the reformation of French Switzerland took its rise. It soon encountered severe opposition. 'If that man,' said the ignorant curates, 'continues to preach, it is all over with us and our benefices.' 'The father of lies,' wrote Farel, 'counterworks us through his agents, and daily tempts us to be ashamed of the gospel, and to desert that Sovereign whose kingdom is not of this world; but Christ my King, Lord, and Redeemer, to whose service I have devoted myself, is far more powerful than Satan. Trusting in Him, I shall be prepared to tread my foe under foot, to assail his kingdom, and, rescuing from his tyranny those whom the Father is pleased to draw, bring them to Christ.'

The bailiff and governor of Aigle, instead of supporting Farel, as the minister elected by the Senate of Berne, took part with the priests, in which course they were encouraged by the expectation that the Emperor was 'about to declare war against all innovators, in which holy enterprise he would be assisted by the Archduke Ferdinand.'

As Farel remained unmoved, the bailiff and governor were encouraged to go a step farther, and prohibited his giving any kind of instruction to the people, either as minister or schoolmaster. Then Berne, in great indignation at this 'interdiction of the very learned Farel from the propagation of the divine word,' ordered all the officers of the state to allow him to 'preach publicly the doctrines of the Lord.'

Scarcely had this proclamation been published, when crowds assembled at Aigle, Bex, Olon, and in the Ormonts, and, led by the syndic, hastened to the churches, and tore down the edict, calling out, 'No submission to Berne! Down with Farel!' The presence of the Reformer's friends protected him from personal injury, and he left Aigle for a few days to preach in the neighbouring district.

He first went to Lausanne. High above the lovely Leman, Lausanne occupies a commanding position, and being then under the protection of the Dukes of Savoy, firm allies of the Pope, she materially helped to keep the surrounding country in subjection to his Holiness. Every effort was made to shut out the light; but while long processions of pilgrims met at Lausanne to worship the image of the Virgin, and purchase indulgences at her annual fair, the iniquitous lives of the clergy who led those devotions, helped to open the eyes of many to the real condition of the Church of Rome.

One of the bishop's chaplains, Natalis Galeotto, a man of high rank, who was more enlightened than any of his brethren, but, nevertheless, a slave to Romish superstition, denounced Farel's zeal against the worship of the Virgin as 'absolutely immoral.' Nevertheless, the Reformer indulged the hope of gaining him over to the gospel, and justly thought that his example would assert a powerful influence upon Lausanne, and Lausanne upon the surrounding country. He therefore wrote to Natalis, and, after some introductory remarks, related his own history,—his former blindness and ignorance, and how he had been brought into the light and knowledge of the gospel. He then alluded to the interested, worldly motives which induced many to enter the ministry, and unsparingly opposed the corruption of the clergy, solemnly adding: 'Surely we ought to lay to heart the dishonoured glory of God, and the ruined state of the church, its broken walls and profaned sanctuary. If we are not lost to all sense of our obligations—if we really believe that Christ died for us—if our hearts are at all affected by the shedding of his blood—if the Holy Spirit has taught us anything of the goodness of God,—if the gifts which God has so richly bestowed upon us have attracted us to himself—if we have the hope of eternal life—if we must give an account to God of the talents committed to us—if we believe that if we neglect to warn the wicked, God will require their souls at our hands—we ought to lose no time in making known the praises of God among the people. Let us preach Christ as our great aim and pattern, both in speaking and acting.'

As Natalis made no reply to this letter, Farel, thinking his silence might proceed from want of courage to avow his convictions, wrote again, but to no purpose. To a third letter he received an insulting reply, in which Natalis reproved him for undervaluing fasting and the worshiping of saints, and openly asserted the doctrine of transubstantiation. Farel returned to Aigle.

The mendicant friars in the neighbourhood were his bitterest enemies. Fearing to attack him openly, they made every effort to injure his character, by circulating false reports concerning him among the people. Just at this time one of these friars visited the village of Noville, in the valley of the Rhone, and ascending the pulpit, exclaimed: 'It is the devil himself who preaches by the mouth of the minister, and all who listen to him will be damned.' Having sown the bad seed, the preacher left it to grow and bring forth fruit of itself, and proceeded to Aigle 'to beg a few barrels of the precious wine of Yonne for his convent.' He had, however, scarcely entered the village, when, raising his eyes from the ground, he saw Farel standing before him. There was no way of escape for the trembling monk, and Farel, with the 'voice of a lion' (as Beza describes it), asked, 'Why did you preach in such a manner at Noville?'

'I have heard,' replied the monk, 'that you are a heretic and a misleader of the people.'

'Can the devil preach the gospel?' asked Farel.

'Certainly not,' answered the friar.

'Then, why call me the devil?' demanded Farel. 'Prove what you said at Noville.'

But the monk, having no desire to enter upon controversy with one whose powers in argument were acknowledged, even by his opponents, made every effort to free himself from so uncomfortable a position, 'turning now this way, now that, like one with a troubled conscience,' but without success. A crowd soon gathered, and Farel, who desired, above all things, an opportunity to preach the gospel, said, pointing to the friar: 'You see this fine father; he has said from the pulpit that I speak nothing but lies; let him prove it.'

The monk now lost all self-command; threw his cap on the ground, and trampled it under his feet, exclaiming, 'What have I said? Who heard me? Where are the witnesses?'

Farel solemnly reminded him of the Omniscient Witness, and again called on him 'to prove his assertions.' The cries of the monk, 'bawling like one out of his wits,' brought crowds to the scene of action. The tumult increased, Farel could not make his voice heard, and one of the bystanders, pulling the friar by the sleeve, said, 'Listen to the minister as he is listening to you.'

'Thou art under excommunication, and durst thou lay hands upon me?' roared the monk.

Every moment the excitement increased; but at length a magistrate appeared, who, ordering the monk and Farel to follow him, lodged them both in the prison of the castle, 'one in one tower, and one in another.'

On Saturday they were brought before the court. Then Farel, turning to his judges, reminded them that they sat in God's stead, and had received power from Him in order to punish the wicked and protect the good. He then stated his complaint, and demanded that the monk should be required to prove what he had asserted respecting his character and preaching, and, in conclusion, entreated the judges to make a suitable provision for the religious instruction of the people.

As Farel ceased speaking, all eyes turned towards the monk. Had he nothing to say in his defence? Nothing; his courage was gone, and, falling upon his knees, he implored Farel's forgiveness, and confessed that the charges he had brought against him were false. 'I have found you a good man,' he said, 'and your doctrine good, and I am ready to recall my words.'

'My friend,' said Farel, 'do not ask forgiveness of me. Before I saw you I had forgiven you, as well as others who have spoken against me, and I have prayed to God both for them and for you. I am only a poor sinner, like other men, and trust not in any work or righteousness of my own, but in the death of Jesus.' He then requested that the monk might not be further punished.

Just at that moment a citizen of Berne entered the court, and the monk, thinking his doom sealed, wrung his hands in anguish, crying out, 'Pardon! pardon!' 'Ask pardon of Christ,' exclaimed Farel. 'And,' added the senator, 'come to-morrow and hear the minister's sermon. If he appears to you to preach the truth, you shall confess it openly before all; if not, you shall have liberty to declare your opinion.' To this the friar assented; 'but,' says the chronicler, 'he was no more seen at Aigle.'

As these mendicant friars frequently visited the nunnery of St. Clara, at Vevey, Farel wrote an account of this tumult, as a warning to the nuns, and accompanied it by a letter, in which he exhorted them to follow the holy evangelists and apostles, to regulate their lives by the example and precept of the Saviour, and to do all things conscientiously. It does not appear, however, that his advice was followed; and, when the Reformation extended to Vevey, the nunnery of St. Clara was removed to Savoy.

Through evil report and good report the gospel made progress, of which the increased opposition it encountered was an unmistakeable evidence. At St. Maurice, at the extremity of the valley of Aigle, Romish agents from the Valais and Savoy so excited the people, that they tore down the government proclamation from the church doors, and committed many other acts of violence. Farel had been absent from his post for a short time, but on February 16th he again appeared in his pulpit, when suddenly savage cries from without obliged him to cease speaking. Upon inquiry, it appeared that crowds had assembled outside the church, for the express purpose of interrupting the sermon. The council of Berne being appealed to, to interfere and restore order, summoned a meeting of the district judges. Those of Bex and Aigle then declared (with somewhat of indecision) for reform; but, in the mountains above Olon, so great was the hostility of the peasants, that even the women attacked Farel with their 'fulling clubs.'

All these things seemed to be 'against' the pastor of Aigle; but, having expected opposition, when it came it did not discourage him; being forewarned, he was forearmed. The great desire of his heart was to promote Christian unity; to see that established, he was willing to lay down his life if needful. 'Let there not be,' said he, 'in Christ's body, either fingers, or hands, or feet, or eyes, or ears, or arms, existing separately, and working each for itself; but let there be only one heart that nothing can divide. Let not variety in secondary things divide into many separate members that vital principle which is one and simple. Alas! the pastures of the church are trodden under foot, and its waters are troubled. Let us set our minds to concord and peace. When the Lord shall have opened heaven, there will not be so many disputes about bread and water. A fervent charity!—that is the powerful battering-ram with which we shall beat down those proud walls, those material elements, with which men would confine us.'

(To be continued.)

THE SKELETON'S LAMENT.

At the sullen gate of Death,
Amid the accursèd crew,
A skeleton form sits chained and cold,
Of a ghastly pallid hue;
With folded arms and staring face,
And ever noiseless breath,
Unheeded, unheeding, the skeleton sits
'Mid the damps of the gates of Death.

Oh, ghastly form! what work was thine
(I pray thee make it known),
That poured the death-damp on thy brow,
And changed thy form to stone?
What fearful crime possessed thy soul?
What deed of black despair
Hath dragged thee down from heaven to hell,
And fixed thy portion there?

Then came there forth a voice—
A chill, sepulchral groan—
And the damp vaults round gave back the sound
With heavy and solemn tone:
'Not for a crime to God or man
Am I sitting here alone;
I suffer that talents have not been used,
And duties have not been done.

I saw the child of want
Pass down the stony street,
And I gave no heed, as I onward urged
My pleasure-seeking feet;
The widow's bitter sounding wail,
The hapless orphan's sigh
Like blessing gained. The door was closed
Where I hugged me in luxury.

I heard abroad the cry
Of fraud, and force, and wrong,
And how the poor lay crushed beneath
The heel of the proud and strong.
My ears were closed, and I would not hear;
My eyes, and I would not see;
What to me were the poor or slaves,
Or his haughty oppressor to me?

I saw the erring soul
Pass on the downward road,
And I spake no word, though I knew the end
Was Satan's dark abode.
The drunkard sipped the bowl; I knew
Its dregs were misery;
I stretched no hand, I felt no dread:
What was it all to me?

What was it all to me!
Ay, therefore I sit alone,
And thrilling whispers are in my ears,
And chill my heart of stone.
They chill, they sicken, but wake no throb
Nor tear of penitence;
And I know, by the ice in my heart of hearts,
I never shall pass from hence.' —Anon.

Miscellaneous.

Wake up! Wake up!—Not a very courteous summons, perhaps, but a very timely one. It is high time to awake; and the most of us are asleep, and soundly.

God calls us to awake. He speaks in his word loudly and clearly. He speaks by his Spirit—gently, but with power. He speaks by his providence: solemn and fearful are the calls. Awake, thou that sleepest!

The church calls us to awake. She needs our aid. We help her not at all when we are asleep. But she needs us now. Her foes are many; her danger is great. She is beset without and within, and every man who loves her interests should be up and doing.

The world implores us to awake. The world is perishing! There are hundreds of millions abroad, there are hundreds at our own door, perishing in misery and sin, for whose salvation we should be concerned.

Wake up to labour! There is much to be done. A city in flames would not require half the work that is demanded of us now for the world in danger of eternal fire. We ought to be at work—all hands and all hearts.

Wake up to give! God requires it. We must deny ourselves, and take up the cross; give our property, give our children, give ourselves to the work which the church and the world demand.

Wake up to pray! He who can bless and save, will be inquired of to do this thing. The church is in danger; the country is in danger; the world is in danger. God alone can help. Let us wake up and pray.

True Catholicity.—He is not a sectarian, but a true catholic Christian, who hath submitted himself as a child to the teaching of Christ Jesus, being born again of the Holy Spirit; and hath and doth desire the sincere milk of the word, that he may grow thereby into the full stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus; and who, the more he attains, the more he desireth to attain; growing more convinced of his own natural sinfulness and alienation from the love of God; more meek and gentle before the Lord and all men; more patient of the sins and infirmities of his brethren, and more set against sin itself, whether present in his own members or the members of the church.—Irving.

A Covenanter's Deathbed.—He called out to some of the ministers in the room, 'You passengers for glory, how near think ye I am to the New Jerusalem?' Some answered, 'Not far, sir.' He answered, 'I'll wait and climb, until I be up amongst that innumerable company of angels, and the spirits of just men.' They removed his wife out of the room from him; but when he was just expiring, she would come in again, who came running to his bed-side; but he turned her away with his hand, saying, 'No more converse with the creature; I never, never will look back again!' so he fell asleep in Christ. It need not be a surprisal to me; for near a year before his death, he preached upon these words, 'Remember, Lord, how short my time is.' And when he was at home in his family in Ayr, in prayer he would be so transported with the joys of heaven, as if he would have flown away; and his young wife would often say to him, It was a terror to her to hear him so much upon death; but he said it was none to him: so he lived desired, and died lamented.—Veitch's Memoirs.

The Isthmian Race-course.—The stadium occupies a dell between two spurs of a hill south of the Hierum. The cheimarrous, or winter-torrent, which had formed the dell, was diverted, or else carried underground, to the outlets just mentioned. It has now resumed its natural course, and broken through the semicircular end of the stadium. Not a vestige remains of the seats of white marble which Pausanius mentions as 'worth seeing.' Its area is filled with fragments of pottery, and overgrown with tufts of wild thyme, lentisk, and sage. The unbroken stillness of the desert now prevails from day to day, from year to year, in the spot which for so many ages, at each recurring festival, rang to the shouts of the eager crowd that thronged its marble steps. This stadium, however, has an especial claim upon our regard, more than the sentimental interest which attaches to all such sites. It was in the mind of St Paul when he wrote to the Corinthians: 'Know ye not that they which run in a stadium, run all, but one receiveth the prize?' and, continuing the allusion, he assumes their familiarity with the careful and laborious training of the athletes: 'Now he that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. They do it to obtain a corruptible crown,'—the crown of pine, taken doubtless from the sacred trees within the Hierum,—'but we an incorruptible. So run that ye may obtain.'—Travels in Peloponnesus.

A Nation's True Glory.—The wisest prince that ever sat upon a throne hath told us that 'righteousness exalts a nation' (Prov. xiv. 34). It is not valour in war, but righteousness; it is not policy in government, but righteousness; it is not wittiness of invention, but righteousness; it is not civility in behaviour, but righteousness; it is not antiquity of forms, but righteousness; it is not largeness of dominion, but righteousness; nor it is not greatness of command, but RIGHTEOUSNESS, that is the honour and the safety, that is the renown and security of a nation. That nation that exalts righteousness, that nation shall be certainly exalted by righteousness. It is not Ahithophel's policy; it is not Jeroboam's calves in Dan and Bethel; it is not Jehu's pompous zeal; it is not Goliath's sword; it is not rich mines of gold and silver, nor magazines, nor armies, nor counsels, nor fleets, nor forts; but justice and righteousness that exalts a nation, and that will make a mean people to become a great, a glorious, and a famous people in the world. The world is a ring, and righteousness is the diamond in that ring; the world is a body, and righteousness and justice is the soul of that body. Ah, England! England! so long as judgment runs down as waters in the midst of thee, and righteousness as a mighty stream, thou shalt not die, but live, and bear up bravely against all gainsayers and opposers.—T. Brooks, 1662.

A Special Providence.—A German journal recounts the following episode of one of the late battles: 'A young soldier, in the midst of the tumult of battle, thought he saw on the grass a four-leaved shamrock growing. As such a plant is rare, and is considered to bring good luck, he stooped to take it. At that very instant a cannon ball passed over his head, so near that he must have been killed if he had not been bending down. The man so miraculously saved has sent the plant to his betrothed at Königsberg.'

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

PSALM LXVIII. 18.

THIS Psalm is of and for Messiah. It is He whose name is Jah,—the Lord God of Israel; He is addressed throughout this Psalm as God. It is this Psalm which the apostle quotes in Ephesians (iv. 8), and interprets of Christ and his ascension. It is Christ that David here addresses: 'Thou hast ascended on high.'

I. The ascension.—This is the last point of Messiah's earthly history, and sums up the whole. But according to the interpretation of Paul, it includes all that went before: 'What is it but that He also descended?' The ascent reminds us of a descent. He descended to Bethlehem, and then He descended to Joseph's tomb. After that all was ascension; and the expression of our text includes, or rather expresses, resurrection. He went down into the lower parts of the earth; He came up again; and then He went on high. This ascending was the completion of his work, the carrying out of his love, the Father's testimony of personal acceptance and delight, and his seal set to the absolute perfection of the work for which He descended. It was a real ascension, a glorious one, a very exalted one,—far above all principalities and powers,—to the Father's throne. 'We see Jesus crowned with glory and honour.' All heaven is his; and He has entered into possession of his heavenly inheritance. All power is given to Him in heaven and in earth. He filleth all things. The universe now is his. He reigns now above; He will come to reign below.

II. The triumph.—'Thou hast led captivity captive.' Whether this refers to his leading forth his redeemed out of their captivity, or leading into captivity those who held them bound, the triumph is the same, and the words point to the same event, the same enemies, the same battle, the same victory. It is Messiah's triumph over his enemies—the Father's and ours. The warfare is that predicted in Paradise between the Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. That warfare concerns us; it is for us. He who fights is the Captain of our salvation. The battle went on during the ages before He came; it came to a head on the cross; it is not yet finished; and the full consummation of the triumph is reserved for his second coming, when He binds Satan, and casts him into the bottomless pit. Then shall He complete his triumph, and show that He is more than conqueror. Meanwhile his victory upon the cross is ours. He has fought our battle, and won our victory. 'Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world.' What enemy can prevail? No weakness of ours can dismay us. We glory in our infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon us. Let us, then, fight the good fight. The foe is already routed by our Captain; it is only with his broken and scattered troops that we have to do.

III. The recompense.—'Thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also.' Thus the Father rewards his faithful service. Not only does He receive the Spirit without measure for himself, but the gifts of the Spirit for others. This is the apt recompense of his self-emptying. He emptied himself, therefore hath the Father filled Him,—filled Him with the Spirit,—filled Him with the Spirit's mighty and manifold gifts. Much of the Spirit was given before He came. We read of the Spirit filling holy men; but much was reserved for his glorification, that the connection between Him and the gift of the Spirit might be manifested. When He was glorified, the pentecostal shower came down; the residue of the Spirit was given. This fulness of the Spirit was—

(1.) For men.—Not for angels, but men; not for heaven, but for earth. It was as the ascended God-man that He received the Spirit, for those whose nature He took. 'I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh;' not on the unfallen, but fallen sons of Adam.

(2.) For the rebellious.—For those who stand farthest off, full of enmity and resistance. Not for the good, but the evil. As of the Son of man, so of the Spirit we may say: 'He came to seek that which was lost; not to call the righteous, but sinners.'

Thus Christ has received the Spirit for sinners—as Egypt's corn was entrusted to Joseph for the hungry. Go to Him who has the seven spirits of God; deal with Him who freely dispenses this Spirit. Come to the waters. 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.'

IV. The final result.—'That the Lord God might dwell among them.' God had been driven from earth—from among men. His object is to return; and all that He has done, in and through Christ, is to secure that return. He does this—

(1.) By incarnation.—'The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.' God thus tabernacled with men. Because of this He gets the name Immanuel.

(2.) By the cross.—It is the propitiation that makes it a righteous thing for God thus to dwell. It is the blood that brings it about. No blood, no indwelling. For without the blood it would have been unrighteous in God to have come near to us or dwelt with us.

(3.) By the Holy Ghost.—It is this that is referred to in our text. The Spirit, purchased by the blood, comes down, and comes in.

He has been doing this in individual souls. They are the habitation of the Spirit—temples of the Holy Ghost. He is yet to do so more conspicuously, when Jesus comes the second time. Then shall this prophecy be fulfilled. The tabernacle of God shall be with men; God shall be with them—their God. Then all shall be holy here. The curse shall vanish away. Satan shall be bound. Creation shall be delivered and purged. There shall be no night, no crying, no sickness, no death. There shall be the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. With men, and in men, God shall dwell. Earth shall then be what heaven is now. For when He comes again, and sits upon the throne, He says, 'Behold, I make all things new.'

GLIMPSES OF THE FINISHED WORK.*

AS we gaze at Him, and think of his wondrous future, we glance through the temple door at yonder distant hill, and there is recalled to our memory and presented to our imagination another scene. It is that scene when this same Saviour will one day leave it for ever, and sit on the Mount of Olives, over against it, weeping; his awe-struck disciples sitting around, melted by his tears and trembling at his words. Yes, there will be many visits to this temple; but there will come a final visit of no ordinary character, and the circumstances of that visit are thus recalled to mind. Let us ponder them, now that this temple of Herod, in all its splendour, strength, and grandeur, is standing, as it were, before our very eyes, that we may learn and feel how intimately its final doom is dependent upon its rejection of that Saviour who now stands within its walls.

The dramatic force of that portion of the text which relates to this subject is generally lost sight of, from confounding together two distinct passages that bear upon the destruction of the temple and Jerusalem. Most people imagine that the words beginning, 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem,' etc., were uttered on the Mount of Olives, when Jesus beheld the city, and wept over it. But it was not so. Other words of a similar purport were uttered there, and on that occasion; but the tender and solemn address, beginning with those words, was uttered within the walls of the temple itself. It was on the Wednesday in Passion Week that our Lord delivered therein all those discourses that are found in St. Matthew, from chap. xxi. 23, to the end of chap. xxiii. And almost his last words in the temple were those eight fearful woes which He uttered against these scribes, and Pharisees, and lawyers. As his first words in the temple were, as we now see, addressed to these men, so also, be it observed, were his last. His first words in the temple were addressed not to the people, but to the temple authorities; so also were his last; and these were words of solemn and wrathful denunciation, that seem to scathe and burn as fiercely and ruthlessly as the flames that Titus kindled—which flames fulfilled them. Having finished these woes, and the shadows of this Wednesday evening having begun to creep around,—just, perhaps, as the lamps were being lighted, as they are on the present evening,—the rejected One prepares to leave the temple for ever. Solemnly gathering up his robe, with a countenance both stern and very sad, He moves towards the outer court for his final exit from the place which He loved more ardently, perhaps, than any other spot on earth—his Father's house. Of all that bare rule here, none knew Him but that Father himself. Yet this single circumstance had greatly endeared that house to Him. Here He had communed with Him—how sweetly and how refreshingly! To go to the temple was to go home—his only home on earth; was to go to the house of his Father. But yet, what were the trials of that home to Him! His foes were they of his own household! As the husbandmen of his Father's vineyard cast Him out and slew Him, so is it with 'the rulers' of his Father's house; and now from his Father's house He departs—an exile! The one circumstance accounts for his sadness, the other for his sternness.

He arrives at length at its threshold; but, ere He crosses it, He utters these melting words—the last sounds of his voice with which the temple echoed: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house,'—observe that significant word, your house! No longer 'my Father's house;' no longer my house;—'your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth' (this 'for' implying most strongly that He was the Lord of the temple, and that the being without Him was that which rendered it desolate)—'For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth until ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord,'—that is, until the Jewish rulers and people shall welcome as their true Messiah me whom they now reject. And then, the next chapter goes on in the same breath (and there should be no break between the two): 'And Jesus'—suiting the action to the word—'went out, and departed from the temple.' And never did He set foot within it again; never again did his shadow lighten its doors.

* From The Finding of the Saviour in the Temple,—a volume of much thought and great beauty. London: Hunt and Co. 1866.

And now, having thus left it 'desolate,'—the true Shekinah having vanished from it,—He proceeds along its outer buildings, and along under its massive walls. 'And his disciples came to Him for to show Him the buildings of the temple'—how massive and grand its outworks were. And Jesus, answering, said, 'Seest thou these great buildings? there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.' They then descend the slope of Moriah, cross the brook Kedron, and, skirting the garden of Gethsemane, ascend the Mount of Olives. And now, at a certain point of the ascent, Jesus turns round, sits down, gazes fixedly at the temple and the city, and, after a few moments' solemn pause, opens out upon both that wonderful prophecy on the Mount, recorded in chaps. xxiv. and xxv. of St. Matthew, and in chap. xxi. of St. Luke, in the midst of which He prophetically pronounces the doom of both: foretelling the setting up of the abomination of desolation in the holy place; the compassing of Jerusalem with armies; the unparalleled woes and sufferings of its wretched inhabitants; the world-wide dispersion of the survivors of its awful siege; and its down-trodden condition, under the feet of the Gentiles, during a long succession of centuries, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Oh! to our eye, at any rate, who live in so late an age that we can see the accurate accomplishment of almost all these bold, minute, and circumstantial predictions, delivered when Jerusalem stood in its strength, and when its massive and splendid temple rested securely on foundation-stones whose size and magnificence were the pride of the Jewish nation and the wonder of the Gentile world,—to our eye, who have lived to see what we now see, where Omar's mosque stands, and Judah's exiles wail,—who have lived to see

> 'Israel's sons, like glowing brands,
> Tost wildly o'er a thousand lands,
> For twice a thousand year,'—

what does this Son of Mary appear? What think we of Christ? Whose Son is He? These Rabbis may say, 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' But we say, 'Is not this the Son of God?' Nay, with such demonstrations before our eyes as our meditations have accumulated, we cannot put it in the doubtful form of a question; we unhesitatingly put it in the confident language of positive and adoring affirmation: 'Rabbi, Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel!' . . . .

From yonder summit of Olivet, after his crucifixion and resurrection, He shall ascend from above the forsaken temple of shadows into the true temple, of which it was the earthly type,—'a worldly sanctuary,'—to the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. The rejected High Priest will find another mercy-seat before which to minister; the rejected Prophet will find another pulpit from which to preach; the rejected King will find another throne on which to reign; and that will be at the right hand of God, beyond that veil of blue, in the very heaven of heavens, where He will become 'a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man.' Rejected as the King of the Jews, He shall become the King of the world; nay, the Omniarch of the universe. Rejected as the Teacher of Israel, He shall thus become the Teacher of 'all nations.' Rejected as the High Priest of the holy of holies, He shall become the High Priest of the heaven of heavens! Oh, well for Him, then, and well for us, that when He came to his own, his own received Him not! Well for Him; for see how, after all, all things worked together for his good, and how the things that happened unto Him turned out rather to the furtherance of his gospel, to the advancement of his glory, and to the extension of his kingdom and dominion! Oh, it was good for Him, as well as for his people, that He was afflicted, for now He sees of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied! Had He not been rejected, He never would have been thus exalted; had He not sunk so low, He would never have been raised so high; had his name not been a byword and a reproach among men, He would never (we are speaking of Him, of course, as a man, and in relation to his mediatorial office) have had given to Him a name which is above every name, at which every knee shall bow. It was to Jewish rejection—to Israel's blindness, malignity, and cruelty—that He owed (speaking after the manner of men) his episcopate of all souls, his priesthood of the world's cathedral, and his sceptre of the entire universe. . . .

Glance into that outer court, and what do you see? The builders are busily employed in carrying on and completing the restoration of Herod's temple. That court is the court of the Gentiles; but the temple itself is a Jewish temple, and these are Jewish workmen. Nevertheless, do you observe that, in adorning this magnificent temple of Herod, they have been rearing some many-coloured columns in the Corinthian order of architecture, and that these are built into, and added on to, the Hebrew structure? There was an architectural fitness in all this, seeing this was the court of the Gentiles; and it is a fact, according to Josephus, that Herod's temple was actually so adorned, and was thus undesignedly converted into a petrified prophecy of the spiritual union of the Greek and the Jew,—when He should come who should be their link or bond, the chief corner-stone. That distant glimpse is a beautiful hint of what is yet to take place spiritually, when this Child shall have finished the work on which He is now entering, and when He shall have converted his Jewish apostles, and sent them forth to preach his gospel to the Gentile world. Thus this Child, by his apostles, 'shall build the temple of the Lord,' as was prophesied of Him (Zech. vi. 12),—a new and spiritual temple, made up of a blessed composite of Jew and Gentile, but still one temple in the Lord, enshrining the same Saviour, and inhabited by the same Spirit. And, spiritually, has not this really been done? Did not the Jewish apostles 'add to the church daily,' from among the Greeks, 'such as should be saved?' Did not the Greeks wish to see Jesus, and, seeing Him, believe? Did not Roman centurions see and believe? Did not such say to the converted Jew: 'We will go with you, for we perceive that God is with you?' In the luxurious heathen city from which the name is taken, were not many Corinthian pillars 'joined to the Lord,' and to the people of the God of Abraham, when they believed in the preaching of Paul? And the different colours of these Grecian columns which we here discern, remind us how that many nations and people of the Gentile world, differing from each other in complexion, and character, and language, were thus built into, and united with, God's ancient and peculiar people. Bound together by a common love, cemented together by a common faith, enjoying the communion of the same Spirit, they were thus made one in Him, 'in whom there is neither Greek nor Jew, barbarian, Scythian, bond or free, but Christ is all, and in all.' Now, therefore, we 'who were once afar off, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world, . . . . are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit' (Eph. ii. 11–22). And thus the Shekinah, that forsook the old temple, is now in the midst of the composite Christian church; for 'ye are the temple of God.' . . . .

This Jerusalem, as we have seen, is to be soon destroyed; but is there to be no real, no lasting one in its place? There is. Just as this Child is to rear up a spiritual and eternal temple after this one is destroyed, so will He build 'a city that hath foundations,' in the place of this one,—in the midst of which his new temple is to stand, and in which we are to have our citizenship. And, speaking of this, the apostle says, 'Our citizenship is in heaven,' where our King now reigns. You will find a description of this city in the two last chapters of the book of Revelation: 'And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God.' Yes, this is to be the eternal temple (not made with hands, not to be destroyed by hands),—a temple of 'living stones,'—a temple consisting of redeemed humanity, in which God will take up his habitation for ever. In this city there will be no visible and local temple, like this before our eyes; for John says of it, 'I saw no temple therein,'—none like that in the old Jerusalem. The only temple here is that living and spiritual one which we have already described, the stones of which are now being silently quarried and prepared by the Spirit of God in every land, and so 'made ready before they are brought thither' (1 Kings vi. 7); but which shall then be collected together in one place, and into the midst of whom, when the top-stone shall be brought forth with shoutings, and the number of the elect shall be accomplished, the divine Shekinah shall descend, and the glorious great voice shall be heard out of heaven: 'Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men!' This descent of the Shekinah shall be in manifested glory. He has once descended to this world of ours, as we see Him here: 'The Word was made flesh, and tabernacled among us;' but then his glory was shrouded and veiled. Only those beheld his glory whose spiritual eye could pierce the veil of his lowly humanity, and discern beneath it, by the help of faith, 'his glory—the glory of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.' But at his next coming down from above to tabernacle among us, it will not be in humiliation, but in all the splendour of manifested divinity: 'The Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with Him, and then shall He sit on the throne of his glory,'—no longer above the mercy-seat, but upon the judgment-seat. Then 'every eye shall see Him' (not simply the eye of faith, but the eye of sight), 'and they also that pierced Him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him.' Nor only so; He shall come in his glory to precisely the same place where He came in his humiliation, that so He may be glorified on the very spot where He was rejected, —may triumph in the very scene of his sufferings,—be elevated to the throne, where He was raised to the cross,—and be welcomed with hosannas, where He was assailed with anathemas. Look now, for the last time, through that open door, and you see the very spot where this lowly Saviour shall come again in his glory. It is the same spot from which He ascended. 'This same Jesus' (said the angel on that occasion), 'whom ye have seen go into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven.' Glance at yonder mount, and, as you do so, hearken to the words of the prophet: 'His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east . . . and the Lord my God shall come, and all his saints with thee, and He shall make the place of his feet glorious' (Zech. xiv. 4, 5). And did not He himself intimate that this should be the locality of his return, when He left the temple for the last time? 'Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till' [till] 'ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord.' Clearly implying that, when Jerusalem should turn to Him, He would return to her; that when Israel, that now rejected Him, should wish to welcome Him, He would come to her to receive her welcome; and, planting his returning feet once more upon the Mount of Olives, He would look down on yon city once again,—no longer to weep over her as before, but to rejoice over her with singing,—no longer stretching over her the finger of malediction, but, like her own high priest, extending over her penitent form his hands of absolution and benediction,—no longer saying, 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!' but—'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that hast been in bitterness for me, and hast mourned for me as an only son; thou that now welcomest thy Saviour-King, come and rest under the wings of his forgiving, sheltering, and fostering love; come and dwell in the secret place of the Most High, and abide under the shadow of the Almighty!'

And now, in taking farewell of this temple, in which, as it were, we have enjoyed so many holy musings, let us take a parting glance at these two groups, and solemnly ask ourselves, to which of the two do we belong? Jesus is in the midst: in which of the two companies around Him is our place found? To one of the two we must belong. We must be either, like Joseph and Mary, with Christ, or we must be, like this other company, against Him. There is no middle position for any man. We may be, like some of these rabbis and onlookers, respectable, moral, and outwardly religious; but if we believe not on Him,—if we have not sought and found Him, —if we are not united to Him by the bonds of faith and love,—if we do not, like these (at once his parents and his disciples), own Him as ours before opposers and scorners,—if we do not go into the world with Him,—then we are against Him. For what are his own words? 'He that is not with me, is against me.' How is it, then, with ourselves? Are we thus 'one with Christ, and Christ with us,' so that we are not ashamed to own Him, and to go through a despising world in his company? Oh! solemnly let us face the question; for, if not with Him in his humiliation, we shall never be with Him in his glory, nor shall we ever know that blessed rest under the eternal shadow of his wings. Do we fear that we are not so with Him? Are we apprehensive that we have not passed the invisible line that separates one of these companies from the other? Still, it is a blessed thought that there is nothing to prevent our doing so, if we will only do it now. He himself invites us to make the great change, and come over to Him, and He promises us a ready welcome when we do come. There is no need of any waiting for fitness or preparation, other than we have—which is our sinnership and need. We may be to-day as blind, as dark, and as wicked as any of these men; but if, convinced that Jesus is the Christ, we only pass over to Him, He 'will in no wise cast us out.' 'Come unto me,'—'tis all He asks, —'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' He asks not what your burden is, or how heavy. It may be a burden made up of the sins of many years; it may fold a thousand secret sins that you may well feel ashamed to bring to Him; it may be a very heavy burden, too heavy for you to bear, but it is not too heavy for Him. Like some of these men, you may have grown grey and white under its accumulating weight; but only bring it to Him, believing his word, that to keep it to yourself is to keep that which must crush you, and believing his free and gracious promise to bear it for you, and there is forgiveness for you, there is rest for you! Only bring it to Him,— all to Him, just as it is,—and there is for you, notwithstanding that burden, the love of his whole heart, the very love that He gave to these his parents: 'For whosoever shall do the will of God' (and to come to Him is to do it), 'the same is my mother, and sister, and brother.'

The Hidden Treasure;

HOW IT WAS SOUGHT, AND WHERE IT WAS FOUND.

BY M. H.,

AUTHOR OF 'ROSA LINDESAY,' 'THE STORY OF A RED VELVET BIBLE,' ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

'Where are we happiest? In the crowded hall,
Where fortune smiles and flatterers bend the knee?
How soon, how very soon, such pleasures pall!
How fast must falsehood's rainbow-colouring flee,
Its poison flowerets leave the sting of care!
We are not happy there!'

THREE years have passed away since Lucy Villiers became an inmate of her uncle's house; and now, so loved is she there, so regarded as a daughter, that even her absence for a week or two is deplored, and her return eagerly looked for. Mr. Osborne, of late somewhat of an invalid, maintains that no one reads the newspapers to him half so well as Lucy; Mrs. Osborne sighs over the temporary resumption of household duties, which had completely devolved on Lucy; and Netty wearies far more than any of them for the return of her 'kindred soul,' as she terms her cousin.

And Lucy, what of her? Loving and beloved; surrounded with luxury; blessed with health; leading the gay life she had once longed for; one of the acknowledged belles of the last two seasons; surely she has found the happiness she craved. Is it so?

Look at her, as she stands in her ball-dress, bending over Netty's couch. How well the pink crape, over rich white satin, suits her! How simple, yet how becoming, the pale blush roses, mingled with their delicate green leaves, look amidst her dark, wavy hair; her only ornament a necklace of costly pearls! A very queen for beauty Netty thinks her.

'Lucy,' she said, 'how beautiful you are to-night! I half grudge to let you away. Let me see: you go first to dinner at the Seymours, then the ball at the Duchess of D——'s, making, if I mistake not, the eighth party this week; and this is only Thursday! 'Pon my word, now I look closer at you, I believe 'tis too much gaiety even for you; for you seem wearied, tired of the pursuit of pleasure, dear. Surely, Lucy, you have found the Sangreal?'

'I, Netty? oh no.' But further conversation was cut short by the entry of Mrs. Dudley, also in evening dress. She held an open letter in her hand.

'Here, Netty,' she said, going up to her sister and kissing her, 'a letter from Alf. I received it this morning. It is from Hong-Kong. He gets on famously; but the last part of the letter is quite a riddle to me, and he refers me to you girls for its solution: "I heard from Harry Wilmot last mail. He is hard at work; busy, both studying and also walking the hospitals. He likes this sort of thing, he writes; and though he can't say he has found the Sangreal, he fancies he is on the way to do so, and at times can almost believe he has caught a sight of the spot where lies the Hidden Treasure; but as yet, when he tries to grasp it, it eludes him. As for me, having abandoned the idea of the Treasure being within myself (since I came to this outlandish part of the world, and have occasional fits of home-sickness, and so forth), I also have set out in the search, and in the accumulation of riches am determined to seek, sure of finding the true Sangreal. If all this reads Greek and Hebrew to you, Leila, ask Cousin Lucy or dear Netty for an explanation." Now, girls, can you enlighten me?'

Laughingly, Netty told the story. But Mrs. Dudley interrupted her, by reminding Lucy that the carriage was at the door. And so wishing the invalid good night, they set off. Only one idea is in Lucy's mind; Harry Wilmot had caught sight of the spot where lay the Hidden Treasure; and she was just awaking to the consciousness that her path, gay and brilliant as it had been, dazzling and attractive as she had found it, was yet only so in appearance, leading far away from true peace, happiness, or rest.

Half dreamily she moved through the dance that night. In the midst of the dancers she seemed to see Aunt Mary's peaceful face; louder than the music she heard the rustling of the trees at Amberley Park. In imagination she gazed out once more on the beautiful landscape of hill and lake, as she had seen it by the calm moonlight. Everywhere gentle soft grey eyes seemed to look reprovingly on her; and in her ears she heard the words, mingling with the flow of talk and laughter, 'Seek, and ye shall find.'

Wearied in body and spirit, she came home; but not till the summer sun was already up; and then not to sleep, only to throw herself on her bed, and confess that the Hidden Treasure was far, far away from her. The path of pleasure had failed; she had drunk at the fountain of this world's waters, and they had not quenched her thirst.

No, nor have they ever quenched the thirst of one immortal soul. They may drown convictions, may stifle remorse, but they can do no more; and even that power will one day be taken from them, and those who refuse to drink of other waters will perish.

Lucy now resolved to turn away from this gay, frivolous life. It no longer satisfied. She would cast off the world's yoke; give up this pleasure-seeking life, these late hours and idle amusements, and enter on other pursuits—try another path. Then, perhaps, she would find the Sangreal,—'the Hidden Treasure.'

Ah! Lucy, you think you are thus turning away from the waters of this life, but it is only to 'hew out for yourself other cisterns, broken cisterns which can hold no water;' which, when you apply your parched lips to them, will suddenly dry up and leave you thirsting still. There is One who can quench—is longing to quench—your thirsty soul; One who even now says to you, and to all such as you, as He said to the Samaritan woman of old, 'If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of Him, and He would have given thee living water.' 'Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life.'

---

CHAPTER V.

'I see a spirit by thy side,
Purple-winged and eagle-eyed,
Looking like a heavenly guide.
If he bid thee bow before
Crowned mind, and nothing more,
The great idol men adore,
Though his words seem true and wise,
Soul, I say to thee, arise,
He is a demon in disguise!'

'Lucy,' said Mr. Osborne one day, as he sat reading the Times at the breakfast table, 'here is a most favourable critique of your Cousin Stewart's new book on the Greek Poets. It speaks of it as a most masterly production, the work of a mind cast in no common mould; and says that the writer, though young in years, is one already well known in literary circles, and regarded as an authority on all classical subjects. He is a clever fellow, no doubt of that; we must ask him to dine some day, now he has settled in London. Have you met him at any of the conversaziones you have taken to go to, instead of the balls and fêtes of last season, Miss Blue-stocking?'

Lucy smiled at her uncle's designation of her; but disclaimed having met Robert Stewart, although she had heard him spoken of several times, as one who was fast gaining reputation as a man of letters. But people regretted he was such a book-worm, so absorbed in study that he was becoming quite unsociable. And, as Lucy spoke, her thoughts went back to the last time she had seen her cousin at Amberley Park. Four years had passed since then, and she wondered if, in the study of the writings of the most cultivated minds in ancient and modern days, he had found, as he expected, the true Sangreal. She thought, perhaps he had; for certainly, in cultivating one's mind, and reading noble thoughts, there was pleasure to be found; if not the Hidden Treasure, at least something far nearer it than that yielded by the frivolous pursuits of the world. She knew that by experience; for, since she had given up her gay life, she had been seeking the Hidden Treasure in mental improvement, heedless about her Cousin Leila's sneers, and her uncle's jokes about her blue propensities. But although she had found a certain degree of happiness in these more rational pursuits, the Hidden Treasure, as far as she was concerned, remained hidden still.

And what of Robert Stewart? Is he finding in his books all the happiness he expected?

College days are over now, the real work of his life has begun. No poor scribbler is he, writing anxiously to obtain some small niche in the temple of Literature, on the obtaining of which his very existence depends. Stewart has no such need; he is the possessor of an independent fortune; the only child of wealthy parents; but they who know him well declare, that no mere writer for bread toils half so hard as he. Books are at once his pleasure and his companions. In constant communion with the minds of the 'mighty of old' he seeks his happiness, and the idol he worships is literary fame. Let him once gain that, let him once stand on the highest pinnacle of its lofty pedestal, and his end will be accomplished—he will have found the Sangreal.

Hint to him now that he is mistaken,—even should he gain all he desires, should he obtain a world-wide name, should Fame trumpet forth his praise, and England be proud to claim him as her own,—and he will not believe it. True happiness will still be far from him; yea, further from him, with all his learning, than from many an unlettered peasant, who knows, what as yet he knows not, 'the Bible true.' Learning is much to be desired. Knowledge concerning all things cannot be too zealously sought after. Scientific pursuits and researches are calculated to raise the minds of those who pursue them, and effect many wonderful improvements in the world; but there is one thing which by themselves they cannot do,—they cannot speak peace to an immortal soul,—they cannot give a sure hope in death. Never yet by wisdom has the world learned to know God; and not at the feet of Plato or Aristotle will Robert Stewart find rest or peace. He can only find it at the feet of the meek and lowly Jesus, the rightful yet rejected King of earth. Now he would scorn to throw himself there; for, with all his wisdom, the hidden wisdom ordained of God is a mystery to him, the deep things of the Spirit are foolishness to him; he knows them not, neither can he, for they are spiritually discerned; revealed, not to those who seek them in their own strength, but to those only, who, casting away every vain imagination and self-righteous thought, fall at the feet of Jesus, and, with the simple faith of little children, seek to learn of Him.

But now Stewart cares for none of these things. The fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom, of which Aunt Mary had spoken, is nothing to him. But Aunt Mary herself is not forgotten; and at times, when jaded with overwork, her peaceful face rises to his memory; he looks back to the happy days spent at Amberley Park as among the pleasantest he has known.

With the remembrance came thoughts of his gentle, pretty cousin, Lucy Villiers; and now that he was fairly settled in London, he resolved to renew acquaintance with her. With such a desire, he hailed with pleasure an invitation from Mr. Osborne to dinner, and, ere long, found himself an almost daily visitor at Sussex Gardens. When some friend rallied him on neglecting his books, he denied the charge, declaring that a little recreation only sent him back to them with keener zest; and in part this was true, for his hours of study were only changed, not lessened. The night-lamp burned longer than usual; the only change was, that between his words and his eyes there constantly floated a fair face, and the face was that of Lucy Villiers. Talk to him of hidden treasures, of joy-giving Sangreals! Was he not in the fair way of obtaining both? The love of a pure-minded girl, such as Lucy, was a treasure in itself; and then the grand aim, the great idol, was still before him, and to that all things must be subservient. Lucy would not hold him back in the pursuit, rather would she urge him forward; and fame would now be doubly dear to him, with Lucy for a wife; for then in his honours she would be honoured too.

For some time Stewart's oft-repeated visits at the Osbornes were, by some members of the family, regarded in the light of cousinly attention; but Netty, ere long, divined the truth. Lucy's friendship has done much for her: the discontent of former days has passed; her almost passionate love for her cousin has drawn her attention from herself, has made her far less selfish and morbid. But the love is becoming almost worship now; the affections meant for God are being centred in the creature of his workmanship; and the God of love, who hath said, 'My glory I will not give unto another,' is preparing to show her that even the dearest of friends—the closest tie of earth—if not in the bonds of Christian love, must disappoint at last.

The eye of love is keen; and so it was, that while Mr. and Mrs. Osborne thought of Robert Stewart only as Lucy's cousin, Netty soon gave him another name, soon noticed Lucy's colour heighten and her eye sparkle as she heard his step. And poor Netty—can we blame her if a pang of jealousy entered her heart as she saw another gaining the place in Lucy's affections which she had hitherto filled, and she contemplated the possibility of her cousin leaving her?

Quietly she watched all. Not for worlds would she by a word or look damp Lucy's happiness. But a shadow had fallen on her heart; she was waking from the dream in which she had passed the last few years—waking to find that the treasure she had grasped and rejoiced in was turning to dust in her hands, and, after all, had never been anything but the shadow of the real one. The true Sangreal—the lasting treasure—was hidden still.

(To be continued.)

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XII.—HAPPY CHRISTY.

IN an article on Town Missions in the Church of Scotland Home and Foreign Missionary Record, 1865, there was a very lively description given of the fearful prevalence of deceit among the lower classes. The description is not at all an exaggerated one, nor the case by any means overstated. Deceit in all its phases is indeed the rule among them. But it has its exceptions. There are a few found, even among those otherwise deeply sunk as human beings can well be, who yet retain a regard for truth, and will not knowingly be deceivers or deceived.

While conversing lately with a gentleman who has done much good among these classes, he made a statement somewhat to this effect, that he had often got men raised from the lowest stages of drunkenness, etc., to be respectable members of society, and consistent members of the church; but women, when sunk equally low, never. In all his experience—a large one—he could not point out one such case where the reformation was permanent. Alas for our degraded sisters, if this be true! Happily it can at least be said that it is not universally so.

Assertions are worth little without proof. So I think a short sketch of one who has already been introduced to you under her self-imposed appellation of 'Happy Christy,' will go far to establish this not very untenable position.

The first thing I will tell you about Christy is, that she was a truth-loving being, and that solitary relic of moral grandeur she had retained amid all the ruin and devastation of thirty-seven years' drunkenness.

Instead of wading through the horrid details of these years, I will give you an outline which you may fill up with colours of as dark a hue as you please. First, drink in one of its very seductive social phases; evil habits formed; character lost; the husband and wife go out from their own land wanderers; Christy becomes a widow and childless—drink the procuring cause—and sinks at length into a hard-ale drinker. Perhaps some may be at a loss, as I once was, to know the nature of this pernicious mixture. From inquiry I found it to be composed of returned porter, ale, and the dregs of wine, whisky, rum—in short, of any or all spirituous liquors. It is generally procured in halfpenny worths, and serves the double purpose of meat and drink. It is only those who have reached the lowest stages of drinking who patronize it, and multitudes of these poor devotees contrive to keep themselves stupefied from morning to night at the cost of a few pence.

Such was Christy, when, a goodly number of years ago, I saw her for the first time in the house of one of her neighbours. Her personal appearance was uncouth. She was somewhat above the middle height, with a most unpoetic-looking figure, and her hard rugged features wore an expression suggesting the idea that she cared for nobody, and was utterly indifferent whether others cared for her or not. Her manners led to the conclusion that she was completely ignorant of all conventialisms; but a shrewd, quick glance, shooting at times from her twinkling grey eyes, showed that she could, in her own way, take pretty correct estimates of persons and things.

I remember being present, some time ago, at one of the great annual sacramental gatherings in Inverness, and hearing there a most excellent discourse on the words, 'He that winneth souls is wise.' During the discourse the preacher admirably showed the comparative ease of sowing the truth broadcast over the minds of men, to that other method of breaking it down and applying it in the needed quality and proportion to individual souls, so as to win them. This is precisely the difficulty in missionary operations, but somehow the difficulty lessens as the effort is persisted in; and so, when I first met Christy, I was able to take in at a glance her mental peculiarities, and adopt my measures accordingly. These measures would be thought sufficiently amusing if described, but that is unnecessary.

The result was, as I expected, Christy loudly complained that I had favourites; she also took care that the complaints should be conveyed to me. I at once admitted the truth of the charge. 'Without doubt I have favourites,' I said to the person who gave me the complaints; 'and you will tell Christy from me that I will be very glad to admit her among the number, provided she be willing to comply with the condition, which is, giving up entirely the use of strong drink.'

I also explained my reasons for requiring this; for finding, as I did, in my intercourse with the people, that drink was ruining them physically and morally, I had taken my stand on that point; those who would honestly give it up I sought to benefit to the utmost of my power, both in their spiritual and temporal interests, and had generally the satisfaction of knowing that my labour was not lost; while, on the contrary, if I helped a drunkard out of his difficulties to-day, it was in reality only giving him increased facility to plunge into greater ones perhaps to-morrow.

'I am sure,' I also added, 'that Christy has good sense enough to see the reasonableness of my principles, and that she has no just cause of complaint, when it thus remains entirely with herself, whether she is to be one of my favourites or not.'

Christy was in high dudgeon. 'Her give up the drink to please any one!—not she. She could please herself with that, and she would,' etc. etc.

Thus it remained for a considerable time. I often saw her in a neighbour's house, who, by the way, had become one of the favourites; but I never made the least attempt to coerce her.

In the altered circumstances of her neighbour, Christy began to have an ocular demonstration of the utility of my plan, and tardily but with great honesty of purpose her resolution was taken. She gave up drinking, and was admitted among the number of my friends. And the readiness with which she adopted the phrase, 'Our lady,' and others akin, showed how her poor old heart had been yearning for a share in the sympathy which she had professed to reject.

Unconsciously also did Christy afford a remarkable example of the wondrous power possessed by the mind, of recalling its old impressions of truths which had, through the lapse of many years, been seemingly quite obliterated from her memory.

Her parents belonged to the Church of England, and were evangelical in their views. There were also many Methodists about the place where she spent her early years; and no sooner had the furious passions, which drink kept perpetually raging, been hushed, than rich old memories of many a precious truth came stealing across her spirit, like rays of sunshine lighting up a landscape after a storm. In particular, her mind pondered over the efficacy of the atoning blood with singular delight; and as she did so,

> 'Its vital touch diffused
> New vigour through the poisoned streams of life,
> That nigh had settled into dead stagnation.'

Her manner of speaking of it was often striking. 'Jesus has atoned,' she would say; 'the blood has been shed, and it cannot be unshed; and but for that, what hope could a wicked worthless creature like me have?' Then she would shut her eyes, and clasp her hands round her knees, and keep rocking backwards and forwards on her little stool, reiterating, 'What hope, what hope!' etc.

One day I found her engrossed in the ninth and tenth chapters of Hebrews. Having a little time to spare, I took some pains in explaining them. Never had I a more interested listener. What a look of superb satisfaction overspread the rugged features! The small grey eyes looked nearly double their ordinary size, as they gleamed out from beneath the overhanging eyebrows; and though she said little, their occasional twinklings seemed so many luminous escapes of thought.

I left her that day amid a perfect shower of blessings, and shortly after she went down to her neighbour, and said in her own peculiarly energetic way, 'Well, I never thought our lady could speak like that,' etc. etc., and then repeated almost verbatim what I had been saying.

Such was the very favourable beginning made by Christy. This course, however, did not long go on smoothly. In consequence of breaking up so completely her long confirmed drinking habits, she became very ill—so ill, indeed, that life appeared to tremble in the balance.

I was standing by her bedside one day while she was in that state, revolving in my mind the expediency of suggesting to her that she should take something of spirit-kind to preserve her life. I had not, so far as I was aware, given her the least clue to what was passing in my mind. How great then was my astonishment when, looking me broad in the face, she said with an air of determination not to be forgotten!—

'I'll die first.'

'What do you mean, Christy?' I inquired.

'I mean that I'll die rather than take drink again,—that I will. Does not God say that no drunkard can inherit the kingdom of heaven? and if I were to take it, might I not become just as great a one as ever I was? And if I should die now, I have some hope that God for Christ's sake would tak' me to himsel'; so I'll rather die than tak' it.'

But she did not die. The crisis once passed, her health became more robust every day. Her spirits also rose proportionably, while her quaint humour found new outlets in relating the changes in her experience. And it was about that period that she first applied to herself the very appropriate epithet, 'Happy Christy.'

'Our actions,' a poet says, 'take their hue from the complexion of our heart.' Judging according to this standard, Christy's heart-complexion must at times have been a near approach to brilliant. That you may judge of this for yourself, a few of her actions are worth relating.

Her occupation was sufficiently humble—that of gathering the various contents of the dust-heaps. Going her rounds one New Year's morning, some six months after she became an abstainer, she came upon a bottle lying near a heap in a quiet suburban lane. Having ascertained that its contents were whisky, she next held it up between her and the grey morning light to see the quantity.

'My, my,' she soliloquized, on discovering that it was more than two-thirds full; 'but this would have been a glorious chance for Christy! Wouldn't she have had a roaring spree had this been last New Year? but she kens better noo than ha'e onything to do wi' ye. Na, na, there's nae whisky for Christy this New Year,' she continued, as she swung the bottle vigorously round her head, and brought it down with a tremendous crash upon the curb-stone. 'Ay,' she said, as she gave a most complacent look at the little rivulets trickling into the sewer, 'that's the richt place for ye.'

On another occasion one of her neighbours tried all her powers of persuasion to get Christy to have a 'jine.' She had threepence, 'and if Christy would jist pit the ither threepence, they would have a gill raal cozy.'

Christy decidedly refused, and was very much annoyed at her persistence. She was as patient as she could; but unable to contain herself longer, she went to the bandbox where she kept her treasures, and taking out her temperance card, she said to the woman: 'I'm sick tired of what you're saying; but hear ye what God says to me,' and so saying, she read the motto round the card, 'My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.'

'She needed no more,' said Christy; 'but ran away just as if her nose had bled.'

One day a lady called on Christy, and asked her to come to a meeting that she was to begin shortly.

'Why do you come to me?' asked Christy, grimly.

'Well, I wanted a few to begin with, and I thought you were a very likely person to come now.'

'Ay,' retorted Christy, 'ye'll come to me noo, an' seek me to yer meetin' when ye think to get some credit by me; but when I was on the road to destruction ye let me alane. And well did ye ken that I was far doon the black road; but you never bade me stop, nor tried to help me up. Syne when anither's deen baith, ye'll come an' try to wile me awa' fra her! Na, na, if ye want to dae gueed, there's hundreds round about here living just as I was living; gang to them, an' maybe ye'll ha'e the honour o' deeing for them what ye suld ha'e tried to dee for me. Work for yersel', an' ye'll get a' the credit o't, and dinna come an' try to tak' the name o' ither fouk's.'

You will not, I'm sure, admire this specimen of her plain dealing; neither did I. But when I spoke to her of the wrong she had done the lady, in attributing her conduct to such motives, her reply was—

'It looks verra like it; an' whether or no, it's only richt that she suld gang to them that's sairest needin' her, and that's nae here as lang as we've you.'

'Crosses,' it has been said, 'are not formed after one pattern, but fitted to the idiosyncrasy of the individual Christian.' In the difficulties above related, Christy did not find her cross, nor in resisting such temptations was the real struggle between grace and nature displayed. With such a turbulent hasty nature as she possessed, her great difficulty was to learn of Christ to be meek; and that I considered the true test of her Christian character. Conformity to Christ in that particular she honestly aimed at; but while doing so, many an escapade did the fiery spirit make, especially at the beginning of its course. One example of this may be interesting.

A very trifling offence on the part of her neighbour,—so trifling indeed that, so far as intention went, it was no offence at all,—set Christy's spirit on fire. She brooded over the imaginary wrong until it became a real one in her estimation. All friendly intercourse was quite broken up; Christy would neither speak to nor visit them.

This continued for about a fortnight. I felt the necessity of bringing this to a close; for although there had been no scolding and no open rupture, still the alienation was observed, and of course the effect upon the other neighbours would be anything but good. So I called on Christy one day, and contrived matters so that our conversation naturally enough drifted, as it were, to the subject of injuries.

By and by Christy began to comprehend the object of my visit, and took up her position. She would not yield—not she. 'Had they not done so and so, and so and so? No, no, she could do well enough without them, and she was not going down.'

I set her duty before her as a Christian; but still she maintained her point.

I was grieved, and told her so, not only on her account, but because I knew what a stumbling-block this quarrel would be in the way of others, and if she was still determined to keep aloof, it must be with the consciousness that she was grieving me exceedingly. I saw some symptoms of relenting, and made the most of my advantage. She had evidently a great struggle. At length she said abruptly—

'There isn't another living creature I would do it for. I'll go down an' make it up with them.'

'That's singular, Christy. What have I done that you would do it to please me?'

'Done! Why, haven't ye— and then followed a long list of benefits, wound up with, 'That's what ye've done for me, and it's little aneuch that I do that for you.'

'These certainly are claims on your gratitude, Christy, and I'm glad that you feel the force of them. But there is another who has claims on you far superior to mine, and yet you seem to have lost sight of them altogether. Now, suppose we go over them.' Step by step I then went over what Christ has done and suffered, ending with his intercessory work at the right hand of the Father. 'Now, Christy,' I asked, 'which are strongest?—mine or his?'

By this time she was rocking in her peculiar way, with her hands clasped round her knees as usual, and the only answer I got was a prolonged Oh! at the end of every swing. Her eyes were shut; but despite all her efforts, the tears were squeezing themselves from beneath the firmly compressed eyelids. I knew my point was gained, so I rose to come away. Without opening her eyes, or stopping her sewing, she said—

'I'll do it.'

'For whose sake, Christy?'

'For Christ's sake,' she replied most emphatically.

She did do it; but the mode was decidedly her own. About half an hour after I left her, Mrs. —— heard a knock at the door. On opening it there stood Christy with a lot of old clothes hanging over her arm. When making a most profound curtsey, she asked, in the quaintest manner possible, if they would buy any old clothes. The whole affair was so ludicrous, that Christy made her entrance amid peals of laughter; and from that day the amicable relations between them have never been disturbed.

I need not pursue Christy's history farther; but simply tell you that her course is nearly run. She is just, to use her own words, 'Waiting.'

'Extreme age sits with decent grace upon her visage,
And worthily becomes her silver locks.'

She has never been poetical in her tendencies, yet she has got hold of two lines which she sometimes repeats with touching pathos—

'Thou art very dear to me,
Lonesome, dark Gethsemane.'

And amidst its sacred mysteries and those of Calvary she loves to linger. And no wonder; for through them she has found springs of immortal refreshment unsealed within her soul.

I think her history, too, is a proof that a woman, however deeply sunk in the social, moral, or spiritual scale of life, may yet be raised, and washed, and sanctified, and made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light.

(To be continued.)

Readings for the Young.

THE VERSE-A-DAY SYSTEM—THE LITTLE ONES AT IT.

'GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD.'

'Bread of our souls! whereon we feed;
True manna from on high.'

LITTLE folks, do you commit a verse from the Holy Book daily; repeat it likewise at the table spread with Heaven's bounties? How many verses will this be in one year? Three hundred and sixty-five? Yes, young friends, three hundred and sixty-five precious texts from the sacred volume, worth more to you, if hid in the heart, than so many gold guineas. Parents, what think you of this system? The responsibility of its success rests on you.

Says the Psalmist: 'Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I sin not against Thee.'

The Bible is full of injunctions to parents to teach their children the word of God: 'Thou shall teach them to thy children, lying down and rising up, in the house and on the way; line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little.'

How important that the parent or teacher remember the injunction, 'Search the Scriptures!'

'The commandment is a lamp, and the law is a light.' Imprint, then, upon the young mind Bible truths to be hid in the heart, ready to be applied by the Divine Spirit whenever temptation assails.

Infinite Wisdom could devise no better protection for the morals of the young, no better means for the right formation of character, than the early knowledge of his will.

This most important part of education every parent in a Christian land may so control as to be able to say, when his offspring arrive at maturity: 'From childhood they have known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make them wise unto salvation.'

We love to think how many a child there is in our country who gets a verse by heart every day. We have seen all the children of a large family busy before breakfast. Every one had a Bible, a Heavenly Manna, or the attractive little Dew-Drops, each of which have a verse for every day in the year.

When we went to the table, after their father had asked a blessing, all were quiet. The father said a verse; then the large boy at his right hand; then the tall girl that sat next to him; then the noble-looking lady at the corner; then the lady that sat at the head of the table; then the two little ones on our side of the table.

Little folks, is not this beautiful? Will you try the verse-a-day system?

'Blessed Bible, how we love it!
How it doth our bosom cheer!
What hath earth like this to covet?
Oh, what stores of wealth are here!'

WHO ROB ORCHARDS.

In a certain village of the far west was an atheist. He was a great admirer of Dale Owen and Fanny Wright; but he could see no beauty in the Sun of Righteousness. This man, of course, never entered any place of worship. Indeed, in fruit season, he was specially busy on the Sabbath in defending his orchard from his great enemies, the wood-pecker, and the idle, profligate persons of the village, who on that day usually made sad havoc among his apples and peaches.

One day, while at work with his son-in-law,—an atheist like himself, although a more kind and courteous gentleman,—as a pastor of a congregation was passing, he very rudely thus accosted the minister:

'Sir, what is the use of your preaching? What good do you do by it? Why don't you teach these fellows better morals? Why don't you tell them something about stealing in your sermons, and keep them from robbing my orchard?'

To this the minister pleasantly replied:

'My dear sir, I am sorry that you are so annoyed, and I would most willingly read the fellows who rob your orchard a lecture on thieving; but the truth is, they are so like you and the Major here, that I never get a chance.'

'Good, good!' replied the Major, laughing; on which the elder atheist blushed a little, and, in an apologetical tone, said:

'Well, well, I believe it is true enough; it is not the church-going people that steal my apples.'

BEAUTIFUL DEATHS.

A girl, thirteen years old, was dying. Lifting her eyes towards the ceiling, she said softly, 'Lift me higher, lift me higher!' Her parents raised her up with pillows; but she faintly said, 'No, not that, but there!' again looking earnestly toward heaven, whither her happy soul flew a few moments later. On her grave-stone these words are now carved:

'Jane B., aged 13. Lifted higher.'

A beautiful idea of dying, was it not?—Lifted higher!

Another little girl, gasping for her last mortal breath, said, 'Father, take me!' Her father, who sat dissolved in tears by her bedside, lifted her into his lap. She smiled, thanked him, and said, 'I spoke to my heavenly Father,' and died.

THE BIRD'S QUESTION.

Behind us, at our evening meal,
The grey bird ate his fill;
Swung downward by a single claw,
And wiped his hooked bill.

He shook his wings and crimson tail,
And set his head aslant,
And in his sharp, impatient way,
Asked, 'What does Charlie want?'

'Fie, silly bird!' I answered; 'tuck
Your head beneath your wing,
And go to sleep;' but o'er and o'er
He asked the self-same thing.

Then, smiling, to myself I said,
'How like are men and birds!
We all are saying what he says,
In action or in words.

The boy with whip, and top, and drum,
The girl with hoop and doll,
And men with lands and houses, ask
The question of Poor Pol.

However full, with something more
We fain the bag would cram;
We sigh above our crowded nets,
For fish that never swam.

No bounty of indulgent Heaven
The vague desire can stay;
Self-love is still a Tartar mill
For grinding prayers alway.

The dear God hears and pities all;
He knoweth all our wants;
And what we blindly ask of Him,
His love withholds or grants.'

And so I sometimes think our prayers
Might well be merged in one;
And nest, and perch, and hearth, and church
Repeat, 'Thy will be done.'

—John G. Whittier.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'And went his way.'—MATT. XIII. 25.

THERE are two sowers in this parable, yet but one field; two kinds of seed, yet but one field. The one field is this world—called, in verse 41, 'his kingdom;' the sowers are the devil and the Son of man; the two seeds are the wheat and the tares. The field belongs to the Son of man: the enemy has no part in its proprietorship; he does his mischief by stealth and cunning; he climbs over the wall in the night, while men sleep. He is the enemy of the Son of man; and his desire is twofold,—(1) to choke the good seed, and (2) to fill the field with tares. He is the same enemy that stole into Paradise, and wrought ruin there. The parable exhibits him as full of (1) enmity, (2) cunning, (3) determination, (4) patience, (5) confidence. All these we find brought out in this simple and apparently very useless expression, 'He went his way,' or 'left the place,'—ἀπῆλθεν. Why did he thus go his way?

I. He did not wish to be seen.—He came by night, and he went by night. He came while men slept, and he went ere they awoke. He did not wish it to be known that he was there. He did not care for the fame of doing the thing; all he cared for was that it should be done. How different from us! We care more about the honour of doing a thing than the work itself. How single-eyed is Satan in his evil! He does his work unknown. He steals quietly to his work, and from his work, without sound of trumpet. Besides, he does not want to excite men's fears, or to alarm the servants of the master, by his visible presence. That would defeat his object. Ah! it is with an invisible devil that we have to do,—mighty, but unseen; the ruler of the darkness of this world; himself loving the darkness—dwelling and working in it. Surely we need to watch, whether in keeping our own vineyard or that of others!

II. He had done his work.—It might be on a greater or a lesser scale—that mattered not. He had done his work. It did not require repetition or re-sowing. The sower had done all that, as a sower, he could do. Sowing is not a process repeated daily; it is done once. He did not come night after night to sow and re-sow. He needed but one sowing-time; and so he 'went his way.'

III. He had confidence in the seed.—He knew of what kind it was—its vitality, its indestructibility. It could lie long in the ground before it sprang. It would not fail. It was the true seed of hell. It was sure to spring sooner or later. So he 'went his way.' Ah! what confidence does this exhibit in the vigour and vitality of error! Have we like confidence in the life and power of truth? Do we speak it as those who trusted it?

IV. He had confidence in the soil.—The soil had not been meant for error, but the curse was on it; and its fruitfulness had become fruitfulness in evil. In a cursed soil, his seed was sure to be nourished and grow. The seed was evil, and the soil was evil. No one knew this better than this enemy, this sower of the tares. It was, then, with confidence in the soil that, having done his work, he 'went his way.' The soil would not fail him; it would do its work.

V. He had confidence in the atmosphere.—He is the prince of the power of the air,—the ruler of the darkness of this world. It is on the air as much as on the soil that the harvest depends. He knows the peculiar elements with which this atmosphere is filled; how it is charged with all that fosters evil; how it will nourish the tares, so that they shall grow without fail, even though the wheat should die. And, accordingly, having done his work, he goes his way; he trusts to the evil air and the evil seed suiting each other.

VI. He had other work to do.—He is not omnipresent nor omniscient. He goes up and down in the earth,—walking to and fro in it,—doing his work here and there. He does not abide in one place; he goes about to do work elsewhere. He visits place after place in succession. He never folds his hands, nor shuts his eyes; he knows no night, and he needs no slumber. Incessant work,—all round and round the globe; in every kingdom, in every church, in every soul. He has always something on hand: some new error; some new departure from the faith; some new snare; some new vanity; some new delusion,—to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect! Sometimes the prince of darkness, sometimes the angel of light; always the god of this world, the prince of the power of the air.

His first seed sown was in the ear and heart of our first parents; and what fruit of evil has it borne, what tares has it produced! Since that, he has been sowing constantly the tare-producing seed. So will he continue to do till the Lord comes to bind him.

Oh, what an enemy have we to fight with! What strength, what subtlety, what wiles, what perseverance! How he works! how he sows! Error upon error,—a little seed at first, yet producing a vast harvest of error and sin,—a race of evil doers, evil thinkers, evil speakers, perverters of the truth, enemies of God,—fields of tares, so like the wheat that man cannot discern the difference. Resist the devil. Watch against him, for we are not ignorant of his devices. He is not dead; nor has he learned to love now, instead of to hate. He hates still. He hates God. He hates the creatures of God. He hates the church of God. He hates the truth of God. He is not yet bound. He will soon be bound (Rev. xx. 1). But meanwhile he roams the earth, seeking to destroy. Be sober, then; be vigilant.

VICTORY OVER SIN.

BY THE REV. A. A. BONAR, GLASGOW.

THERE is a plant called samphire, which grows only on cliffs near the sea. But though it grows near the salt waves, yet it is never found on any part of a cliff which is not above the reach of the tide. On one occasion, a party of shipwrecked sailors, flung ashore, were struggling up the face of precipitous rocks, afraid of the advancing tide overtaking them, when one of their number lighted upon a plant of samphire, growing luxuriantly. Instantly he raised a shout of joy, assuring his companions, by this token, that they were now in safety. The sea might come near this spot, and perhaps cast up its spray, but would never be found reaching it. Such is the position of a soul in Christ: justified and united to Him, the person may be in full sight still of the world's threatening and angry waves; but he is perfectly safe, and he cannot be overwhelmed. Paul says of all Christians: 'Ye are risen with Christ' (Col. iii. 1). We are not only at peace with God; but besides, 'He hath raised us up together with Christ, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus' (Eph. ii. 6).

Any one who understands this union to Christ will see at once what a blessed plan it is, formed by the God of holiness, for giving a sinner victory over sin. If Lazarus be raised out of his tomb, he shall certainly be found no longer lying amid worms and rottenness, and the cold damps of the sepulchre, but walking in Bethany, in converse with living men. And so, says Paul: 'If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory. MORTIFY THEREFORE YOUR MEMBERS WHICH ARE UPON THE EARTH; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and coveteousness, which is idolatry.' What resolutions cannot do, what vows and prayers have failed to accomplish, what self-denial and mortification and crosses have never succeeded in giving you, this plan of God at once attains,—this union to Christ. The sinner is led by the Holy Spirit to know and believe in the Lord Jesus, and in the very moment of believing on Him, becomes one with Him. Forthwith begins a heavenly partnership: Christ and the soul share together; Christ giving to the soul out of his fulness all manner of grace, as occasion requires.

But, fellow-sinner, you must not suppose that the mere assenting to this truth as a doctrine will give you the results. You must have real experience in regard to believing in Jesus. Come and try the personal application of it to your soul. Lean on Christ for yourself, and thus be you yourself united to Him. Doctrine must be turned into experience. Have you read of the process by which iron is turned into steel? You will see a great crucible, with its enormous mass of iron, subjected to intense heat, till it seems a mass of glowing fire. But all that might cool down, and would be only iron after all, if there were not poured into it a small quantity of a liquid that alters every particle of its chemical constitution, and then it becomes steel. Has such a change taken place in your case: the turning the iron into steel?—doctrine into experience?

We speak much of Christianity and Christians; but union to Christ by faith is the root of all; and faith is as much Christ's hold of us, as ours of Him. It implies our hold of the truth; but it also implies that the spirit of truth for Christ has taken hold of us. Baptism speaks, in a figure, of souls being saved in this way of union to the Lord; for the baptized one is represented as 'baptized into Him,' or 'into his death,'—handed over to the Godhead. The Lord's Supper proclaims in another form this great truth of union to the Lord. And thus we are brought to ask all, who profess to be Christ's, such questions as the following:

I. To what does union to Christ call you?

It calls you to make heavenly things your business. 'If ye be risen with Christ, seek the things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God' (Col. iii. 1). Seek such things, pursue after them, make a business of them. It implies the soul's fixed aim and employment, even as, Matt. vi. 33, 'Seek the kingdom of God.' 'The moment Christ rose,' says

Bengel, 'He was thinking of going upward' (John xx. 17); and so it should be with us who have risen with Him. The rising believer now carries on traffic with Him, seeking spiritual gains. He trades for an absent Lord as eagerly as ever he once traded for worldly gain. He is grieved at spiritual losses as deeply as he once was at losses in his business, when a ship was lost at sea, or a bank failed, or some speculation proved ruinous. On the other hand, he rejoices in spiritual gains: when, for example, the mist is cleared away from a truth, or when the excellency of some Scripture doctrine shines into his soul, or when he gets some fresh view of Christ, and some increase of faith, love, hope. More specially still, he fixes his attention habitually upon Christ sitting at the right hand; for his being there tells so much about acceptance. His 'sitting' declares that He has finished all his undertakings, and has no more toil to undergo. His sitting 'at the right hand' declares the Father's high approval, and delight, and honour. And so to this point he ever turns his eye,—to this mountain of myrrh; for in truth he finds yet more there: he finds by virtue of union to Christ he is himself, in a sense, there also, 'sitting in heavenly places,' his toil done, his trials over, his victory won, himself altogether well-pleasing to the Father, and loved by the Father. The realization of this privilege has mighty power upon his soul; giving him wondrous liberty, helping his near communion, sending him forth to ever new and grateful service for One who so loves him.

It calls on you to disentangle your affection from earth. 'Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth' (Col. iii. 2). Make the things above your care; they are to be 'the things which you mind,' in opposition to such as those spoken of (Phil. iii. 19), who mind earthly things. You will not be content with making these things your business; you will have a taste and relish for them, a real delight in them. Many men pursue business with little liking for the thing itself, and are glad when it is over. Many an industrious and eager trader longs for rest and retirement. But the believer risen with Christ loves his business, his whole heart is in it. He 'minds'—cares for, has affection for —'not things on earth,' such as to be rich, great, noble, enjoy pleasure, nor even domestic comfort and personal ease. His chief end is not earthly prosperity, nor is his highest bliss a few more acres than other men; but it is 'things above' he relishes so heartily and unfeignedly. He is at home among 'things above,' like the patriarchs, who left all they had in their native land, seeking 'a better, that is, a heavenly country.' They mind God's favour, God's glory, God's love. And hence, their children's salvation is more to them than their aggrandisement in the world, and the conversion of souls than the news of mines of gold discovered and secured.

Do you bear the name of Christian? Is this, then, a fair account of you? Speak not of difficulties; for of course there are such in all pursuits; and here all alleged hindrances are swept out of the way by that word: 'If ye be risen with Christ.' This cuts the string, and the balloon ascends.

II. What does union to Christ ensure to you?

It ensures many things; but here are some. It ensures your getting life from Christ. 'For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God' (Col. iii. 3). You who are Christ's died with Him, and in that hour your former life passed away. You had lived it out; it was for ever over, and you were loosed from all former things. You died. It was as if you had been carried to the new earth at once, to live evermore there amidst its holy scenes; as if to you that day had come in which Christ says, 'Behold, I make all things new.' You became a 'new creature,' part of a new creation, one with Christ, so that you lost your former separateness. And you found that, as you had lost your old life, there was new life laid up for you. 'Life was hid for you with Christ in God.' You got the beginnings of a far better life than even unfallen Adam had, for you got life from Christ. Christ's very life is yours; the very sap of the vine-tree for you, the branch; the same resurrection-life which the Spirit poured into the man Christ Jesus, was now yours also.

That holy power to love God and man, which was in Christ, you began to receive. That holy joy and full energy of delight in God's favour, which was Christ's endowment, and ever is, became your portion. And you go on claiming every day a share in his stores of grace, a share in his holiness, a share in the Spirit's manifold blessings,—light, life, likeness, all are yours, by gift.

The moment you believed, you were united to Christ; and that moment the stone was rolled off the mouth of the well, you began to get the new life, and you had it more or less ever since. But you have as yet only the beginnings of it. As when a father leaves for his son, while yet a minor, only a portion of the property, which is given out by some trustee; so you at present receive only in measure. 'The life,' in all its fulness, 'is hid with Christ;' that is, Christ has it, and Christ who has it is 'hid,' or concealed like a hid treasure; but 'hid in God,' in the bosom of the Father, so that all is safe and sure. It is hid, like the manna in the golden pot, within the holy of holies. It is there for safety,

'as men lay up jewels in a place where the short arms of children cannot reach them,' says Samuel Rutherford; 'for if it was in our keeping, it would soon be lost.' But all is kept for us, as 1 Pet. i. 4 declares. It is 'our life' (Col. iii. 4) which we have a claim to, stored up for us, intended for us. Yes, Christ is 'our Life;' Christ is, so to speak, keeping himself for us, and keeping for us the life abundantly which He purchased for us.

But again, this union to Christ ensures your appearing with Christ in glory. 'When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with Him in glory' (Col. iii. 4). At present the believer, though one with Christ, lives outwardly as other men do: eating, drinking, sleeping, trading; he sows, he sails, he travels on railways, he goes to buy and sell, he reads news, he talks with his friends and children,—all as other men. But all the while he has an interior life; he has a strong taste for spiritual things; he has desires toward God which other men know not of; he yearns after God in Christ amid earth's fairest scenes; he loves God in Christ beyond wife, or children, or parents, or possessions. 'None of us liveth to himself.' And this life is preparing to bud forth fully into flower and fruit; but the present winter of earth must pass, and the Sun of righteousness arise.

On the day when God's time arrives for giving the fulness of the larger life to all who are members of Christ's body—on that day 'Christ, our life, shall appear.' The golden pot of manna, hidden long, shall be brought out of the holy place. He shall be fully in us, and we fully in Him. He shall appear who is 'our Life'—who is He on whom we nourish our souls—who has life for us—who is himself the substance of it; for (as one said) 'Christ is a Christian's life.' He shall appear, bringing his life to us; and this life which He brings shall be the secret cause of 'glory' to us; or, his life shall manifest its presence in us by our being forthwith invested with glory. As, when a fountain gushes over, its waters make all round the margin green and flourishing; so, when our Life gushes into us, our very bodies shall beam with glory. It was thus on the transfiguration-hill with Christ himself. The life in Him that evening—the secret well of life—suddenly overflowed, rising up to the brim; and see! what a body! yea, what garments even! But who could tell the joy of his soul in that hour, though He knew that sorrow was to return again to its channel, and fill up all its banks? Now, thus it shall be with us,—ay, thus it shall be with us, without any after return to sorrow, without any risk of the waters abating. Some weary day draws to its evening; we have wiped the sweat from our brow, and sighed over earth; we have groaned within ourselves, 'Oh, who shall deliver me from the body of this death!' when lo! the sudden flash! It is the coming of the Son of man.

You may at times have envied Moses and Elias their blessed position, on either side of Jesus, 'appearing in glory' (Luke ix. 31). But you yourself shall be as they: 'Then shall ye also appear with Him in glory.' Yes, as truly 'with Him' as they were; as bright as they 'in glory;' seeing Christ, talking with Christ, hearing the voice that proclaims, 'This is my beloved Son!' O Master, O King of glory, O our Life, appear! Come forth from that light inaccessible, to be ever with us! No need of three tabernacles; for thy tabernacle shall be there, and all shall ever say, as the ages roll, 'It is good to be here.' That will be the day which accomplishes what many in the church of God have often sung:

'One look of Jesus as He is,
Shall strike all sin for ever dead.'

III. What does union to Christ enable you to accomplish even now?

It enables us to overcome the world, and to renounce all sin; for the Spirit dwells in every believer. 'MORTIFY THEREFORE your members which are upon the earth' (Col. iii. 5). We do not yet and now overcome self, and the world, and Satan, as we shall do when Christ appears, when (as old Sibbes triumphantly exclaims) 'we shall trample down foes in glorious confusion!' But we, nevertheless, do overcome; for that strain is a true one:

'Neither passion nor pride thy cross can abide,
But melt in the fountain that flows from thy side.'

'MORTIFY therefore,'—that is, make dead, reduce to a state of death, as regards your practice of them, and care for them,—'members which are on the earth;' your hands, eyes, feet, are not to meddle with 'fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness.' Whatever is yours belongs now to Christ, and is instinct with Christ's Spirit; not merely ought to be, but really is so. Therefore, as men who are possessed of the power so to do—as men who have the life within you, ready to be used—control your members which are still on the earth, and in the presence of its objects. The fire is around you; but you have the supply of water by you: make it play upon these flames, that they may not even singe a hair of your head. With your eye on things above, with your heart realizing your union to Christ, trample down the world and sin. In the power of your union to Christ, reckoning yourselves as one with Him, go forth and conquer. It is He that conquers. You go forth appealing to Him: 'Lord, I am one with Thee: canst Thou be overcome?' In so doing, believers find lust sinks away, and passions grow cool, and covetousness relaxes its grasp; all tempting sin gives up its struggle for victory.

We might bring forward thousands of witnesses. Let us give the experience of one as a sample,—the experience of one man who had yielded himself to sin and lust freely, and for long years. This man was led to listen to the gospel plan, under the preaching of Joseph Milner, the writer of Church History. The text was 2 Cor. v. 20, 21,—reconciliation to God over Him who 'was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him.' John Howard heard it—was overcome; all the bliss he ever enjoyed before, was felt by him to be no more like it than midnight darkness to the noonday sun. From that moment all his strong passions died away. The man who used to be shunned by all who cared for chastity and purity, felt himself suddenly delivered from the power of his lusts, so that, from that hour, he was no more—not even once—overcome; nay, from that hour all was soberness and calmness of spirit. He used to say, that his enjoyment of God dried up the streams of sinful concupiscence, as it did long ago in the case of Augustine. And this is God's way of holiness. Legalists, and moralists, and philosophers, all fail in reaching the seat of the evil—the will and the desire; they lop the branches, but do not reach the root; they imprison the felon, but do not change his nature. To overcome evil within, St. Benedict rolled himself on thorns; St. Martin burnt his flesh with hot irons; St. Francis trembled in snow; St. Bernard plunged himself in pools of freezing water. Even the great Pascal wore an iron girdle, full of sharp points, next his skin. All these overlooked, or understood not, the apostle's inspired words, 'Mortify THEREFORE;' that is, conscious of your union to Christ, set about the mortifying of your members in the strength of this union, and in no other way. Think of union to Christ, and how it involves partnership with Him in his grace. Believing thus in Him is our victory: doing, resolving, suffering, give us no victory at all. The fear of hell and wrath will scarcely keep back a man from one sin, and will never touch the heart.

Who of you then have, in time past, failed to triumph over your corruptions and evil propensities? Who of you has never been able to master covetousness? Take the way of believing in Christ, and being thus in partnership with Him. Understand the blessed mystery of 'rising with Christ,' and being seated with Him above; be graft into the vine, and get its sap. You have tried other means of health and strength; but now use his inspired direction, which has never failed. As Daniel and his fellows asked to be proved whether the water and the pulse they were nourished on would not turn out far more strengthening than all the king's finest food and rarest wines, so we say to you, Prove it now for yourselves. And do not say, 'I will wait for the Spirit;' for by that you mean, 'I will wait on till I feel the Spirit at work.' This is a real device of Satan to get you to go on in sin, and die in sin; for no man ever felt the Spirit at work directly. The soul learns the gospel way, and ponders it; muses on Christ, who died, and rose, and who calls on sinners, every one, to come and use his death and resurrection. And it is while the sinner is thus engaged before the cross, that the Holy Spirit works effectually,—uniting him to Christ in the same moment that He leads him to Christ. And so the believing man becomes at once a conqueror!

WILLIAM FAREL,

THE SWISS REFORMER.

CHAPTER V.

EARLY in January 1528, a meeting assembled at Berne to consider some points of controversy between the friends and opponents of the Reformed faith, and to institute a scriptural form of worship. Four theologians from Paris, and about 350 priests, were present.

Not being familiar with the German language, Farel did not take any part in the discussion; but at its close he offered to maintain ten propositions against a doctor of the Sorbonne, of whose unsuitability to dispute we may judge from the following anecdote related by Bullinger. It appears that in the course of discussion the doctor said, 'Christians are enjoined to obey the devil; how much more, then, should we submit to the church?' and being called on to prove his assertion, he quoted Matt. v. 25, 'Agree with thine adversary quickly;' adding, 'Now, our adversary is the devil.' This novel kind of reasoning was received with shouts of laughter from the assembly.

Farel was the only preacher from the Valais who signed the theses. The rest of the clergy of Aigle protested against them.

The meeting had scarcely closed, when both councils of Berne decreed that the mass should be abolished; that the free use of the Scriptures was a right which belonged to the people; and that those who had placed ornaments in the chapels might, if they pleased, remove them. They further decreed that nuns and friars were at liberty either to marry or remain in their convents. Several married; Catherine de Bonstetten, treasurer of her convent, married William de Diesbach. The ceremony was performed in the cathedral, to the great astonishment of the citizens. By another order, the councils decided that in future the churches were to be used in common by the Romish and Reformed parties.

The clergy throughout the canton were now commanded to follow the example of the capital. No sooner was this known, than messengers from Noville and Chesse appeared before the Senate, to request permission to retain the mass and other Romish ordinances. In reply, the Senate decreed that the churches of Aigle, Olon, and Bex, which had received the Reformation, should carry it out fully; while the people of Ormont, who still adhered to the old faith, were given until Whitsuntide for deliberation, on condition that in the interval they would 'hear the word of God, and not permit any one to preach against the orders they had received.'

This decided leaning towards the Reformed doctrines so alarmed the Romish party, that six of the cantons—Lucerne, Uri, Schweitz, Unterwalden, Zug, and Friburg—formed a league in defence of their faith, in which they were joined by the Valaisans. The seven Reformed cantons likewise formed a league, which they called the 'Christian Co-burghership.'

It was from the inferior clergy, who were 'corrupt in their morals, rude in manners, and extremely ignorant,' that opposition chiefly arose. Adrian von Riedmattan, the aged bishop of Sitten, acknowledged that many abuses contrary to the word of God existed which called for reform, and there was no doubt that evangelical doctrines were spreading among the people. Great merriment was excited by some satirical verses, in which the mass was described as 'stretched on her deathbed, calling loudly to her physicians for help, and finding their advice useless, dictating, with feeble voice, her last will and testament.'

Whitsuntide, the period allotted for deliberation, having arrived, the people were desired to receive the Reformed doctrines; they refused; and in one village, mass was again openly celebrated.

It was evident that a strong arm was necessary to crush this spirit of rebellion, and the Senate appointed Hans Rudolph Nageli for the difficult work, who appears to have been 'the right man in the right place.' He first visited Ormont, where he directed the altars to be overthrown, the images burnt, and the paintings defaced. This being done, order was restored; so that, though the Romish faith still held a firm hold of the hearts of many of the people, the orders of government were strictly enforced, and by degrees the inhabitants of the Pays de Vaud became convinced that the teaching they had so violently opposed was the 'gospel of Christ divested of all human tradition.'

While labouring in a foreign land, the thoughts of Farel often turned to his native country. Ardently did he love her, and sigh for the miseries of her people. 'I know not,' said he, 'how any good can come to my countrymen under an infatuated king, who suffers the people to be prohibited from reading the New Testament, so that no way is open for them to obtain a knowledge of the truth, either by means of religious books or personal instruction.' The reflection, however, that 'the Father had reserved the times and seasons in his own power, and would interpose when He saw fit,' comforted him.

The peace concluded in June 1529, at Cappel, between Zurich and the five central cantons, provided for the free admission of the word of God into any district in which the majority of the people desired it. Encouraged by this decision, Farel having provided suitable ministers to carry on at Aigle the work which he had commenced, set out, towards the close of the year, to visit some places in which the gospel had not yet been preached.

The council of Berne gave him full authority 'to preach throughout their territories,' and 'recommended him to all such of their neighbours and allies as were willing to receive him.'

The canton of Berne, possessing jointly with Friburg the bailiwicks of Morat, Orbe, and Granson, and being partially allied with Lausanne, Avenches, Payerne, Neuchatel, and Geneva, afforded a wide field for missionary labour. Early in November 1529, Farel started on his tour, and first visited Morat, where he met many friends of the Reformation; but the majority being against it, he proceeded to Lausanne, accompanied by a Bernese friend. Scarcely had he entered the town, when the bishop and clergy ordered him to depart. He complied; but returned in a few days, protected by a letter from 'the lords of Berne to the authorities of Lausanne.' 'We send him to you,' they said, 'to defend his cause and our own. Allow him to preach the word of God, and beware that you touch not a hair of his head.' Having received this letter, the council met to deliberate which should be obeyed—Berne, or the bishop. The inhabitants of Lausanne openly declared for Popery, even while protesting against the unholy lives of the clergy, which brought disgrace upon their religion. Farel again left Lausanne, and returned to Morat, where the seed he had sown was beginning to bear fruit, and promised an abundant harvest. On feast days the roads were crowded by men and women hurrying to Morat to hear the 'new preacher;' and though many jestingly said, 'Let us not fall into his net,' it was not seldom that 'they who came to scoff remained to pray.'

From Morat he went to Neuchatel, which belonged to Joan of Hochberg (widow of Louis of Orleans, Duke of Longueville), who had inherited it from her ancestors. Residing at the court of Francis I., the princess cared little for Neuchatel, except so far as it yielded her a considerable revenue. Her devotion to Popery was great, and she encouraged the monks and abbots to uphold it to the uttermost of their power. Under these circumstances it did not appear likely that the Reformation would gain entrance into Neuchatel, but it was nevertheless at the very gates. Some soldiers who, early in the year, had fought with the Bernese army, heard from their comrades strange things, which made them desire to know more, and they returned to their homes to talk over the 'new doctrines' at the fireside, and relate to their astonished listeners how the soldiers of Berne had, when cold, taken the images from the church of the Dominicans at Geneva, and burned them, saying, 'Idols of wood are of no use but to make a fire with in winter.'

Just at this time, when the people were asking, 'Who will show us any good?' Farel, at Morat, on the other side of the lake, heard that Emer Beynon, priest of Serrieres, a small town close to Neuchatel, had a 'liking for the gospel;' and it is interesting to think that this 'liking' may have been, though indirectly, the fruit of the labours of Thomas Wittembach of Bienne, he from whom Zwingle first learned the gospel. This is more than probable, as, before the Reformation, Wittembach preached the gospel in two churches in the neighbourhood of Serrieres.

When this intelligence reached Farel, he, hastening to the shore, hired a boat, and shortly after landed at Serrieres, and was joyfully welcomed by Emer. But then arose a difficulty. Farel was forbidden to preach in any church in the district. What was to be done? 'Hunger will break through stone walls,' and they who desire the bread of life will get it. The ingenious priest solved the difficulty. Leading Farel out of the town into a neighbouring cemetery, he told him to 'mount a tombstone, turn his back on the church, and preach the gospel.' Crowds gathered to listen, while priests and canons cried, 'Heresy.' But some of the inhabitants of Neuchatel, who had received the truth in the love of it, said to Farel, 'Come, preach to us in the town.' He consented, and, entering by the castle gate, passed through to the market-cross, where, ascending a platform, 'he,' we are told, 'preached a sermon of such great efficacy, that he gained over much people.' His hearers chiefly consisted of weavers, vine-dressers, and husbandmen; thus 'to the poor the gospel was preached.' Some priests among the crowd were heard to mutter, as they passed among the people, 'Let us dash out his brains.' 'Duck him,' cried others; 'throw him into a well.' The Reformer, unmoved, continued his sermon, though his voice, which, the chronicler says, was 'like thunder,' was almost silenced by the tumult. Soon the whole town became his pulpit. The 'shorn crowns' made a vigorous resistance; but all to no purpose. Neither their anathemas, nor the frost and snow of December, could keep the people within doors, while Farel preached without. 'The word was with power.' 'Oh! wonderful work of God,' he exclaimed. 'This multitude believes as if it had one soul.' Full of gratitude, he wrote to his friends at Aigle, saying, 'Unite with me in thanking the Father of mercies for so graciously enlightening those who were oppressed with the severest tyranny. God is my witness, that I did not leave you, with whom I would gladly live and die, to escape bearing the cross. The glory of Christ, and the attachment shown to his word by his disciples, enable me to bear great and inexpressible sufferings; for by the power of Christ all my burdens are rendered light.'

Close to Neuchatel was the Abbey of Fontaine-André, built in the twelfth century, whose monks—'powerful lords'—had long been at war with the canons of Neuchatel. 'If Satan be divided against himself, how can his kingdom stand?' But 'the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light;' and so the monks and canons made peace, a determination to put down the Reformation being their bond of union. 'We must save religion,' they exclaimed. Not being able to refute the evangelical doctrines, they resorted to the more sure method of open violence; and one day, while the Reformer was preaching near the abbey, some monks, with the prior at their head, fell upon him, and he escaped with difficulty. It is said that one of the monks had a dagger in his hand. Still feeling their weakness, they had recourse to the civil power, and prayed George de Rive, the governor, to assist them. Farel for a time held his ground, but was soon obliged to yield. He returned to Aigle late in December, not sorry to be permitted to spend Christmas with his own flock.

On the 7th of January, the question, Popery or the Gospel, was put to the vote at Morat. The majority declared for the gospel; but the priests, supported by Friburg, endeavoured to intimidate the evangelical party, and the cry, 'Farel, Farel, come over and help us!' was wafted across the mountains. The Reformer hastened to answer it: accompanied by a Bernese, he crossed the mountain range above Vevey, and entered the hostile territory of Count John de Gruyère, who had said, 'We must burn this French Luther.' But just then it would not have been convenient to the Count to incur the displeasure of Berne, so he remained quietly in his castle. Scarcely, however, had Farel ascended the heights of Martin de Vaud, when he was met by the vicar and two priests, who, rushing towards him, exclaimed, 'Heretic! devil!' Their wrath spent itself in words. Farel continued his journey.

While at Morat, and in its neighbourhood, Farel made several missionary tours among the mountains, between the lakes Morat and Neuchatel, which occupied him from the 15th of February to the end of April 1530. God prospered his work. In a few weeks most of the towns in the bishopric of Bâle (which, though subject to the bishop as their temporal prince, were dependent on Berne in matters of religion) were gained over to the Reformation.

In August we find him once more at Neuchatel, where the governor, alarmed at the 'innovations' in the surrounding district, desired the clergy not to admit Farel into their churches, and the people not to listen to him should he preach in the streets. But, strengthened by the success which had attended his ministry, he thought to carry the town by storm, and, assisted by young men, lion-hearted like himself, Farel posted placards through the streets, on which the astonished inhabitants read these words: 'All those who say mass are robbers, murderers, and seducers of the people.' Filled with horror, the mob, headed by the canons and priests, tore down the placards, and trampled them under their feet, while the governor summoned the daring offender to answer for himself; and then, without waiting to hear what he had to say, demanded ten thousand crowns damages.

Both parties appeared in court. Farel at once confessed what he had done, and proceeded to justify it, saying, 'Where are there to be found more horrible murderers than those seducers who sell paradise, and thus nullify the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ? I will prove my assertion by the gospel.' Scarcely had these words been uttered, when the canons cried out, 'The common law of Neuchatel and not the gospel is in question here. Where are the witnesses?' Farel, not heeding the tumult, proved what he had said from the Scriptures, and the court of Neuchatel, not accustomed to such matters, referred the case to the council of Besançon, which, declining to decide, handed it over to the emperor or a general council.

Left at liberty, Farel continued to preach in the streets, and in the houses which were open to him. One day a voice was heard among the crowd, demanding, 'Why should not the word of God be proclaimed in a church?' At these words several of the people rushed forward, carried Farel to the hospital chapel, and placed him in the pulpit. As he stood there and thought of the sick and dying around him, he said, 'In like manner as Jesus Christ, appearing in a state of poverty and humility, was born in a stable at Bethlehem, so this hospital, this abode of the sick and the poor, is to-day become his birthplace in the town of Neuchatel.' Then, observing the images which adorned the chapel, he broke some, removed others, and continued his sermon.

Terrified by these proceedings, George de Rive, the governor, sent to Berne to request the council to recall Farel and his friends. But no sooner had the messengers departed, than a deputation from the towns-people set out for Berne to implore protection for the Reformer, saying, 'Did not these hands bear arms at Interlachen, and at Bremgarten, to support your Reformation? and will you abandon us in ours?'

This touching appeal reached Berne at a solemn moment. The Banneret of Weingarten, one of the most influential men of Berne, was dying of the plague. Hearing of the arrival of the deputies from Neuchatel, he raised himself in bed, and, exerting all his strength, said, 'Go, and beg the Senate from me to ask for a general assembly of the people of Neuchatel for Sabbath next.'

The deputies departed, and on the 7th of August reached Neuchatel; and Farel, not thinking his presence necessary at the approaching debate, left the city to carry the gospel message into the adjoining district.

On the 15th of August (the Romish festival of our Lady of August, or, the Assumption), Farel, accompanied by Anthony Boyne, his countryman,—a fearless, ardent spirit like himself,—climbed the mountain beyond Neuchatel, and descending into the Val de Ruz, stopped at the village of Bondevilliers, just as the people from the neighbouring hamlets were gathering to the chapel door. The travellers joined the crowd, and Farel was at once recognised by some who had heard him preach at Neuchatel. To their astonishment, he mounted the pulpit, and while the priests chanted the mass, he preached, 'Jesus Christ and Him crucified.' Great was the excitement and confusion, as first one voice, and then another, succeeded in making itself heard.

At length the priest approached the altar: the people rushed forward to catch those mysterious words, as they fell from his lips, by which the bread and wine were to be changed into the body, soul, and divinity of our Lord; but scarcely had they been uttered, when Boyne snatched the consecrated host from the priest, and, holding it up before the people, exclaimed, 'This is not the God whom you should worship. He is above in heaven, in the majesty of the Father, and not, as you believe, in the hands of a priest.' This hasty, imprudent act naturally shocked the people and infuriated the priests. In a moment the air resounded with the shrill tones of the tocsin and the alarm bell. A crowd was soon gathered, and Farel and Boyne would probably have been torn to pieces, had they not, unobserved, slipped away in the tumult. 'God,' says the chronicler, 'delivered them.' In their flight they passed the castle of Valengin, in the Val de Ruz, the abode of a widow, Guillemette de Vergy, dowager countess of Valengin. Noiselessly they crept along the walls, well knowing the character of the countess, the ruling passion of whose life was hatred against the Reformation. They were soon perceived, and assailed by a shower of stones, while men and women, and not a few priests, armed with clubs, rushed upon them. 'Assuredly,' observes an old chronicler, 'the priests had not the gout, either in their feet or arms. The ministers were so beaten that they nearly lost their lives.' The countess herself stood on the terrace and encouraged the mob, calling aloud, 'Drown them, drown them, throw them into the river—those Lutheran dogs who have despised the Host!'

There seemed but a step between them and death, when suddenly 'certain good persons' of the Val de Ruz, coming from Neuchatel, appeared, and thinking thereby to save Farel and Boyne, asked the priests, 'Would it not be better to imprison the Reformers, that they might answer for their conduct?' The priests took the hint, and conducted them to the castle dungeon.

On the way they passed an image of the Virgin. 'Kneel down and prostrate yourselves before our Lady,' cried the priests. 'Worship one God alone in spirit and in truth,' replied Farel, 'and not dumb images.' These words so exasperated the priests, that they beat Farel until he was covered with wounds and blood, which even stained the chapel walls, and was discernible for many years afterwards.

As the prisoners toiled up the ascent to the castle, Guillemette de Vergy and her attendants

...ation from the pulpit. All seemed to ...hem: a small ... They were then ...ir usual hours, and the business of the ...ation. Then the town council ...tated ... to them ... The ministers ... to ... them, and even ... to ... them ... nevertheless. Nevertheless, ... the ministers, the people who had ... them, were taken to ... and ... to ... Neuchatel.

But a remarkable fact was had not been performed in the cathedral church of St. Pierre. On the 21st of October Farel was preaching in the temple, and knowing that the magistrates thought of summoning to Berne to the synodical council, said: 'What will you say to such conduct on the part of the nine pastors of the town?' And if this superstition is condemned in the Holy Church, shall not the people be permitted there also?' As he uttered these words, the magistrates rose in a body, and went him to the ministers, regardless of the cause, who made every effort to stop them. Then Farel, ascending the pulpit, preached with great earnestness, and proved with so much power that the ministers be permitted were assembling to overcome, that many among his hearers, deeply affected, called out: 'We will obey the evangelical doctrines: we and our children will live and die in them.'

In the meantime the commissioners from Berne, whose arrival had been delayed, and many acts of violence were committed, as if they thought to intimidate Farel by a single blow, and by striking the shepherd from the flock, scatter the sheep from the fold. Many images were thrown down, others from one of the Virgin, a gift of Queen Clotilda.

In vain the citizens had pressed entreaties to entreat the magistrates to wait for the arrival of the commissioners from Berne. All they could do was to demand the most favourable guarantee that might be given. The next day some workmen, just returned from the war in Savoy, having armed themselves with hatchets, threw down the altars and destroyed any images and pictures which had escaped the violence of the preceding day. The figures carved in the front of the church, representing the triumph of Count Louis over the Swiss, were also destroyed.

When the governor, after the work of destruction, entered the church, and his eyes and his hands were raised to heaven, and returning home, he wrote to inform the Princess of Longueville of what he had done. He sent to the princess of Vendôme and even the marchioness de Vergy, whose pious zeal was 'in behalf of the Christian religion.' 'Many have come,' added the terrified governor, 'I mean to say, images of our Lady of Mercy, whom you, my royal lady, your mother, had caused to be made.'

The solemnities with which had been done, the Reformed party threw the pieces containing the 'pain divine into the river; they then ate the unleavened wafer, to prove to the people that it was not God.'

In the meantime, as it may be well imagined, the council was thrilled with the event. The rumour, it will easily be believed, spread abroad. Blows were given to be made, when, intimidated by the parties, these members of the privy council, who had hitherto remained silent, ordered all the supporters of the evangelical cause to appear before the governor, to receive the injunction of the deputy of the council. 'I am replied,' 'that the governor, and in the absence of his and his sons he has no command over us.' To yield to a superior power without acting it appear that he was overawed, was all that De Give could now do. He therefore once more entered the assembled council to receive to a place of safety the images that remained unburnt, if, indeed, such could be found. As he entered them away to the castle, the town-people, mocking, exclaimed, 'Save your gods, preserve them, under strong bars, lest perchance a robber should deprive you of the jewels of your adoration.'

As may a small number of the citizens took part in these proceedings, the governor persuaded himself that the majority were in favour of the Romish rites, and proposed to prove it by calling a meeting of the possessors. To this the friends of the Reformation, in the absence of the Bernese commissioners, objected. A messenger was therefore sent to Berne for these officers, who were immediately sent. Then the Romish party asked for delay. A discussion arose, the commissioners having heard both sides of the question, decided to put it to the vote. For a long time the Popish party resisted to this, and called vehemently for their determination to take up arms in defence of their faith, and die as martyrs in the cause. The governor, however, fearing the consequences which might result from further opposition, yielded. His example was followed by others, who satisfied themselves by an expression of firm allegiance to the princess. With this the evangelical party declared themselves satisfied, so long as their religious principles were not compromised. The votes were then taken, when a majority of eighteen declared in favour of the Reformation.

In commemoration of this eventful day, these words were inscribed on a pillar of the church of Neuchatel: 'On the 23d of October 1530, the worship of images was abolished by the citizens.' At the close of the discussion the governor declared: 'I give my promise to undertake nothing against the vote of this day, for I am myself a witness that it has been honest, upright, without danger, and without coercion.'

The freedom with which both parties expressed themselves during the dispute had the effect of moderating the excitement and irritation of the contending parties, confirming the truth of a remark made by one of the disputants: 'It is better to touch one another, even if it be collision, than to avoid each other continually.'

On the 4th of November, the return to apostolic doctrine in the church of Neuchatel was finally decreed. On that day two marble tables, upon which were placed the bread and wine, were substituted for the high altar, while from a pulpit, without any decoration, the gospel was proclaimed, to the sincere joy of many among the congregation.

Alluding to these events, Farel thus wrote to a friend: 'It is well that the deceptions of Antichrist are apparent to many, and that Christ can now be preached with perfect liberty. But when I consider how much still remains to be accomplished,—how far the people are from Christian purity, innocence, and love,—I am obliged to confess that the state of things is very lamentable. How many weeds must yet be rooted up before the soil can receive the seed! How many trials are to be endured! how many efforts to be made! how many dangerous foes to be overcome! Truly, hardy labourers are necessary, who will sow even without the hope of an abundant harvest.'

(To be continued.)

BUNYAN'S 'EVANGELIST.'

MACAULAY in his history informs us that the Pilgrim's Progress was for more than a century the delight of pious cottagers and artisans, before it took its place, as a classical work, in libraries. But critics, he adds, were at length compelled to own that the ignorant multitude had judged more correctly than the learned, and that the despised little book was really a masterpiece. Such, accordingly, has long since been the settled verdict in the case, and being so, I do not now, of course, feel specially called upon to endorse, any more than to dispute it. What I wish to remark is, that in no respect, perhaps, is this 'first of allegories' more of a 'masterpiece' than in its fidelity to nature, and the exceeding truthfulness, if I may so say, of its delineations of human character, whether met with in the church or the world. This must have been both observed and felt by all who have ever perused the book, and no doubt it constitutes one of its great charms, alike with old and young. The secret of it seems to be that the dramatis personæ of the various scenes in the tale are so entirely life-like and human, that instead of being imaginary characters, conjured up by the 'ingenious dreamer' for the occasion, they must have been genuine portraitures, drawn direct from the life. And such is generally believed to have been the case. Indeed, had it been otherwise, it may not be too much to aver that the work would not only never have attained to its present world-wide popularity, but it may even be questioned whether it would have floated down the tide of time beyond the century in which it first appeared.

There seems, then, to be little doubt that the great outstanding figures in the allegory, such as 'Christian' himself, and 'Faithful,' and 'Hopeful,' 'Great-heart,' and 'Valiant-for-truth,' were real portraits, the originals of which must have been familiar to Bunyan in that age in which his lot was cast,—an age, as is well known, of great and good men, as it was also of base and wicked men; when, like the prophet's figs, 'the good were very good, and the evil very evil.' And as the main and more prominent characters in the work had their living counterparts at the time, so likewise had the others, such as 'Pliable,' 'Talkative,' 'Ignorance,' 'By-ends,' 'Save-all,' 'Hold-the-world,' etc. Moreover, they were each of them the specific type of so many separate classes then existing in the world; nor have these classes yet disappeared from among men, but may occasionally still be seen, the bad and the good, represented with more or less distinctness, I suppose, in every community in Christendom.

But the character to whom for the present I wish more particularly to direct attention, is that one distinguished in the allegory as 'Good Evangelist.' It is he who first comes so opportunely to Christian, when sorely distressed in mind, and utterly perplexed as to whither or in what direction to run. At subsequent stages of the eventful journey, the same benignant personage appears from time to time, when most needed, and imparts such counsel or rebuke, direction or encouragement, as the pilgrim's particular exigency happens to require. His portrait is thus described, as seen in the house of the 'Interpreter.' It was 'the picture of a very grave person hung up against the wall, and this was the fashion of it: It had eyes lifted up to heaven, the best of books in its hand, the law of truth was written upon its lips, the world was behind its back, it stood as if it pleaded with men, and a crown of gold did hang over its head.' This loving friend, and faithful guide of the pilgrims, is allowed to have been a living impersonation of Bunyan's own pastor. In his spiritual autobiography, known as Grace Abounding, he refers to him as 'holy Mr. Gifford.' That good man, then, is believed on all hands to have been the original 'Evangelist;' and so we give the following particulars of his personal history, believing they may be new to many, and may lend, if possible, an additional interest to those passages of the Pilgrim's Progress in which he comes upon the stage.

When Bunyan first became acquainted with Mr. Gifford, the latter was pastor of a small Baptist congregation in Bedford. It was the period of Bunyan's great troubles, either immediately previous to, or at the time of his conversion, and when apparently in the twenty-fifth year of his age. He seems to have been introduced to the Baptist minister by some godly women there, who had known of his sore spiritual conflicts, and were but too glad to conduct him to one so much abler to instruct him than themselves. And hence it has been suggested, as well as from other considerations, which need not be here specified, that these same happy, holy women, were afterwards personified in the allegory as 'Prudence,' 'Piety,' and 'Charity,' the three heavenly maidens who entertained Christian in 'the palace Beautiful.'

His introduction to 'holy Mr. Gifford' would seem to have been the commencement of a new life to Bunyan. 'This man,' he says, 'made it much his business to deliver the people of God from all hard and unsound tests that by nature we are prone to. He would bid us take special heed that we took not up any truth upon trust, as from this or that, or any other man or men; but cry mightily to God that He would convince us of the reality thereof, and set us down therein, by his Spirit in the holy word; for,' said he, 'if you do otherwise, when temptation comes, if strongly, upon you, you, not having received them with evidence from heaven, will find you want that help and strength now to resist, which you once thought you had.'

These and other similar admonitions, as sound as they were seasonable, were greatly blessed to Bunyan for his confirmation and establishment in the faith of Christ, and were partly no doubt instrumental in rendering him what he afterwards became, a master in the Scriptures, such as but few have been, either before or since his time. But although latterly the beloved and honoured pastor, as we have seen, of the Baptist congregation of Bedford, Mr. Gifford had originally been an officer in the army of Charles the First. And as he continued true to his party, even after that unhappy monarch had been dethroned and beheaded, he engaged in an insurrection against the new government, for which he and eleven others were condemned to death.

Gifford's sister paid him a visit in the prison on the night previous to his intended execution; and finding the sentinels asleep, she persuaded him to effect his escape. In this his fellow-prisoners were unable to join him, having stupefied themselves with drink. He passed through the guard in safety, betook himself to the fields, and lay concealed for three days in a ditch. Instant search was of course made for him, but he was not discovered. By the help of some friends he was conveyed to London in disguise, and afterwards to the county of Bedford, where he was protected by some Royalists of influence, until the pursuit was dropt, and the danger passed away.

Major Gifford (for such had been his rank) set up now in Bedford as a physician, and was known to lead a very wicked and profligate life, as many others of his party did at that time. He was a great drinker and gambler, and much addicted to the vices which usually accompany such base habits. Indeed, he was said to have betrayed unusual depravity of heart and disposition, and bore a very special ill-will to the Puritans, who, he thought, were the parties to blame for all the calamities he had endured. And so far did he carry his feelings of animosity against them, that he resolved on taking the life of a worthy man in Bedford, for no other reason than that he was a leading man among the Puritans of the town.

While in this unhappy state of mind, he was engaged one day, according to custom, in his favourite practice of gambling, when he lost the sum of fifteen pounds,—too large a sum for one in his circumstances to lose,—and, as may easily be supposed, it made him well-nigh frantic with rage. 'Many desperate thoughts against God,' he afterwards said, arose in his mind, when, scarce knowing what he did, he chanced to take up a book, by the Puritan divine, Robert Bolton, —probably his Treatise on Happiness,—and in that book his eye alighted on some startling word or sentence, which arrested his attention, and, through the grace and Spirit of God, was made the means of leading him to a deep and affecting sense of the misery of his condition as a sinner against God.

For some weeks thereafter he continued in deep distress of conscience on account of his sins, and the depraved, wicked life he had led. But as the most violent thunderstorm is not unfrequently succeeded by delightful calm and sunshine, so, by and by, those tumultuous feelings in the soul of Gifford were made to pass away; when peace and joy, such as, till then, he had never conceived of, flowed in upon and pervaded his whole man. He now felt as if in a new world, and so he entered on a new course. He forthwith began to court the society and frequent the meetings of those very persons whom, up to that period, he had despised and persecuted. At first, indeed, as might have been expected, those good people were suspicious as to the reality of the change which he professed to have undergone. But it was not long till their fears were dissipated; for soon, like Saul of Tarsus, he began 'to preach the faith which once he destroyed.' So, after having had due trial of his gifts, both public and private, they formed themselves into a Christian congregation, with Gifford as their pastor; and, singular enough, the same pious individual whose death he was fervently plotting, was one of eleven persons who chose him to that important office. He enjoyed much happiness and success in his ministry, and is said to have declared a short time before the close of his life, which seems to have been a long one, that from the day of his conversion, he 'lost not the light of God's countenance, no, not for an hour.' 'I sat,' said Bunyan, 'under the ministry of holy Mr. Gifford, whose doctrine, by God's grace, was much for my stability.'

THE INVISIBLE WIRES.

NATURAL objects have been teachers of spiritual lessons ever since time began. Mountain, valley, wood, stream, cloud, and sunshine, has each had its appropriate lessons for man, and inspiration has given to each a voice of utterance, clear and distinct. Inventions of art and discoveries of science, too, have their lessons, so that new teachers are continually coming upon the stage, and speaking to those who have ears to hear.

An example of this we find in the electric telegraph, that wonderful discovery of the age. Great thoughts of the invisible communication between heaven and earth have been suggested by it; and still, as we view it, we may gather fresh lessons from its teachings. Prayer has been called the telegraph line from earth to heaven. Is not the invisible fitly typified by the visible—which seems itself only in part a thing of sense, an object occupying the boundary line between the visible and the invisible? Should not every sceptic stand rebuked when he receives a message over these wires? He believes in the message just received from a distant city; but he does not believe in messages sent from the heavenly world. He does not understand the mode of communication in the latter case; does he understand it in the former? He does not believe in mysteries; is there no mystery here? He trembles when the visible wires signal to him of disaster or death; but needs not the solemn notes of warning that speed along the invisible wires. How absurd and inconsistent is unbelief! How rational and reasonable is faith!

Telegraph lines are now very numerous; so are those of which these are a type. The latter, however numerous, have one common terminus. A new line is completed every time a soul is born into the kingdom of grace. In heaven the completion of each new line of communication is celebrated with songs of joy and shouts of triumph. Over one just completed passes the message: 'God be merciful to me, a sinner;' and, quick as the lightning's flash, the message is returned: 'Be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven thee.'

At the end of another line is a sick-bed, on which lies a weary sufferer. Again and again the message passes over the line: 'O Lord, heal me! If it be thy will, let this cup pass from me.' The message returned is similar to the one received by the great apostle: 'My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness.' Strengthened and comforted, the sufferer feels that he has received a message from heaven.

Again, a mother, whose little ones are crying for bread which she has not to give, sends speeding over the wires a cry for help, and, quick as thought, another message speeds away to the heart of a Christian neighbour, and he feels a sudden impulse to go to the lonely widow, and see if she is in need.

Sometimes in the same instant the message is sent and the answer is returned. Again, the answer is long delayed. Once a Christian mother sent over these invisible wires messages of prayerful entreaty for her son. That son grew up wilful, reckless, obstinate. After years of sin, he sickened, and was carried to an hospital, in a country far from the land of his birth. A faithful minister came to his bedside, to bring the gospel of glad tidings. He would not listen, but turned his face to the wall. Ah! where were those messages which passed from earth to heaven so many years before? They have not been forgotten. The answer is speeding. The man of God determines to make one more effort. He sits down by that bed, and sings a song his mother taught him in his childhood. The man's heart is reached now. He turns, and, with a tear in his eye, asks—

'Where did you learn that?'

'My mother taught it to me.'

'And my mother taught it to me!' he responds, now melted and subdued, ready to listen to the message of love which the gospel minister is yearning to impart.

Believe it, trembling Christian, no message travelling over these wires is ever lost. If no answer has been received, it is waiting for you somewhere in the future. Employ, then, without ceasing, this line of communication between heaven and earth.—Catherine M. Trowbridge.

SUMMER RAIN.

WHAT sound so sweet,
After a day of fiery heat,
And sun-strokes in the dusty street,
As the pleasant voice of the singing rain
Dashing against the window pane?

The queenly rose
And vassal flowers their eyes unclose,
While God his benison bestows;
And the sick man dreams of health again,
Cheered by the dance of the dropping rain.

The bubbles break,
While showers descend on the breezy lake,
And the water-nymphs from slumber wake;
Homeward driving his harvest wain,
The farmer dreads the cooling rain.

The Plague fiend stops
In his dread career to hear the drops.
Then, farmer, why mourn o'er your crops?
True faith sublime ne'er leaned in vain
On the Power that sends us the healing rain.

It bringeth cure
To the blistered feet of the starving poor,
And their hearts are strengthened to endure;
While Woe, in love with life again,
His hot brow bares to the welcome rain.

Of murmuring shells,
And the silver chime of fairy bells,
Were never born such music spells,
To cheer the visionary brain
Of listening bard, as the summer rain.

Earth looks more fair
When drops that banish the sun's hot glare
Fall from the cisterns of upper air;
And her breast is cleansed of many a stain
By the gentle bath of summer rain.

It caught its chime,
Not in this fading realm of time,
But above—above in a holier clime;
And I ever hear an angel's strain
Blend with the dash of a summer rain.

—W. H. C. Hosmer.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

JOHN VII. 53–VIII. 1–12.

IF we group together the scenes of this and the succeeding chapter, we might head them thus: A day with Jesus, in which we have not merely his answers to the disputing Jews, but his proclamation of love: a night with Jesus on the Mount of Olives: dawn with Jesus in the temple, listening to his early teaching: sunrise with Jesus, as, pointing to the east, He says, 'I am the Light of the world.'

Let us follow, however, another division, which will, perhaps, bring out the truths of the passage more fully, in connection both with man and the Lord. (1.) Man at home; Jesus not at home. (2.) Man the listener; Jesus the teacher. (3.) Man the sinner; Jesus the forgiver. (4.) Man the child of darkness; Jesus the light of life.

I. Man at home; Jesus not at home.—'Every man went to his own house; Jesus went unto the Mount of Olives.' The crowd which had surrounded Him all the day, gradually drops off, one by one, as the evening draws on, and Jesus is left alone. Each one has a home to go to, a roof to shelter him, and retires to rest with his family; Jesus has nowhere to lay his head. They go one way, He goes another; they keep within the city walls, He goes without the gate to Olivet, there to spend the night in prayer. He is not at home; even in the temple, which is his Father's house. He must not stay; its gates are closing; and He is shut out. The temple shuts Him out, the city shuts Him out. He can only go to the places where man is not,—to the solitudes where, outside of Jerusalem, outside even of Bethany, He can meet with God. This homelessness of the Son of God was for us. He became homeless that we might have a home—a home in his Father's house. He went without the gate that we might enter in. He became an exile, taking our place and life of banishment, that we might have an entrance ministered to us into the celestial city, the paradise of God. Hast thou, O man, availed thyself of this great work, and returned to thy Father's house? or art thou still an exile from God, though at home on earth?

II. Man the listener; Jesus the teacher.—That to which God calleth us is 'listening.' 'Hear, and your soul shall live;' 'Faith cometh by hearing.' Christ came to us as the Word, to speak to us. His very coming was God saying to us, 'Now, listen to me.' Seldom do we find man in this attitude, and hence so little faith; and when Christ comes the second time, He will find little faith, because few listening. But here we have a group of listeners, and that in the early dawn, gathered round the eternal Word. And He teaches! How willing to teach! How glad to get a listener, an open ear! How eager is He to pour in all his wisdom,—to teach the ignorant,—to unteach them the evil and error,—to teach them the good and the true! Are our ears ever open? Are we eager listeners,—as ready to hear as He is to speak? Oh, how much we lose of happy wisdom, simply from not listening! Jesus himself knew what it was to hear the Father: 'He wakeneth morning by morning; He wakeneth mine ear to hear, as one who is taught.' And having thus learned, He comes to teach. 'Learn of me,' He says. The Lord make us willing learners! The Lord give us open ears!

III. Man the sinner; Christ the forgiver.—In the midst of the teaching and the listening a scene occurs,—an interruption,—yet not truly so; an interruption which only illustrates the character of the Teacher. Vile sin has just been discovered, and the culprit is brought in. It is flagrant transgression. How will He deal with it? Will He palliate it, or will He say, Go and stone her? If He does the former, what becomes of his holiness and professed veneration for the law? if the latter, what becomes of his kindness to publicans and sinners? He does neither; and yet He pardons the guilty! How marvellous the grace! How wonderfully He deals with sin and the sinner! He condemns,—nay, He makes his hearers condemn it, and not only the woman's, but their own; yet He forgives! He shows them sin in a worse, a wider, a more universal aspect than they dreamed of; yet He also shows that nothing can obstruct his forgiving love. His is pardon to the uttermost. He came to save sinners. Who is there that He is not willing and able to save?

IV. Man the child of darkness; Christ the Light of the world.—These are awful words: 'Children of night,' 'Children of darkness,'—worse than the world's phrase, 'Children of the mist!' The world is dark—darkness itself. Each soul is dark. Man's efforts to enlighten himself have only left him darker. But the Light has come; the true Light now shineth. The Christ has come; and He is the Light of the world, the Light of the soul, the Light of life. In the present, He is pointing to the rising sun (as it was appearing over the Mount of Olives), and says, 'I' (not yon sun) 'am the Light of the world.' Till I appear, all is night. Then, all is day. Christ as the revealer of the Father—of his grace and righteousness; Christ, as the possessor and dispenser of the Holy Ghost, is the Light of the world.

1. Light cheers and gladdens. Thus Jesus gives joy and peace. In that city where Jesus is all, there shall be no night nor darkness. The Lamb is the light thereof.

2. Light purifies. Jesus renews, sanctifies, assimilates.

3. Light quickens. Jesus removes death, imparts life.

4. Light heals. Jesus heals wounds, diseases; He cures.

5. Light liberates. Jesus sets us free. There is no bondage where the true light is shining.

6. Light penetrates. Jesus, with his happy radiance, pervades the whole man. He leaves no part unoccupied. His is all-piercing light. Blessed the soul to whom that glory has come, on whom that light has risen!

Oh, the difference between night and noon, darkness and sunshine! Have you made the exchange? Will you make it now? 'He that believeth in me, shall not abide in darkness.'

THE LIFE OF MANY FROM THE DEATH OF ONE.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM ARNOT, EDINBURGH.

'And Jesus answered them, saying, The hour is come, that the Son of man should be glorified. Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.'—JOHN XII. 23, 24.

THE kingdom of heaven is at hand. The typical sacrifices have served their purpose, and are ready to vanish away. Jesus, in his personal ministry, stood within the limits of the Old Testament system; but He stood on its outmost edge. He entered it not to destroy, but to fulfil. Standing on the border of the preparatory dispensation, limited necessarily by the purpose of God, and still farther contracted by the prejudices of the Jews, He looked forth with longing to the enlargement, long promised, surely provided, and now very near. He was straitened until, in his own baptism of blood, the bonds should be broken, and deliverance proclaimed.

When the disciples were approaching Jerusalem, immediately before the last passover, Jesus walked before them. The bent of his spirit, hastening to the sacrifice, insensibly quickened his pace, and the twelve hardy labouring men of Galilee were left behind on the way. He had assumed our nature within the circle of the Jewish economy, that He, the life of men, might in dying burst the integument of local ordinances, and come forth into contact with a dead world. He longed to be the life of the great world that lay dead in sin beyond the narrow borders of Israel. On one occasion this desire to enjoy the delight of giving life to the Gentiles, which burned in his breast like fire, led Him out to the utmost borders of the land on the side where Tyre and Sidon lay (Matt. xv. 21); the power of his presence, secretly felt beyond the line, drew over a poor Phœnician woman, and kept her following Him, until she obtained all her desire. In like manner here, these words of the Lord Jesus were drawn from his lips by the request of some Greek strangers who came over the boundary, and sought the Light of the world.

As needles shake and move tremulously towards a near but unseen magnet, the souls of these Gentiles, touched by a power which themselves did not understand, stirred, and quivered, and pointed to Jesus. As the magnet, on the other hand, if free to move, and as far as it is free to move, turns mysteriously in the direction of the needles, so the Lord, though kept by the fixtures of his own covenant personally within the land of Israel, trembles with irrepressible love and longing toward the place where the Gentiles lie.

A secret presentiment already began to circulate beyond the borders of Judea that the Light of the world had come: and He, knowing that all things were now ready, permitted indications of his yearning for the outside world frequently to escape from his lips. While the purpose, 'I will arise and go to my Father,' is secretly springing in the bosom of the desolate prodigal afar, a corresponding yearning to be reconciled is already turning the Father's eyes, and stretching out his arms in the direction whence the penitent may be expected to appear.

Upon his disciples, too, in the first instance, He laid an absolute prohibition against exercising their ministry beyond the borders of Israel (Matt. x. 5). His will was that they should wait till the veil should be rent in his flesh, that through the opening the glorious mercy which shone between the cherubim might flow into the outer courts where the Gentiles worshipped; that the Gentiles, no longer excluded, might enter within the veil, and through the intercession of the one High Priest become themselves kings and priests unto God. With his own lips, after his death, but before his ascension, He removed that prohibition, and gave the missionaries permission—gave them command—to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature.

Those Greeks who had come up to worship at the feast were by birth heathen. Though not in form, they were in fact, the ambassadors or deputies of the nations to Christ their common King. It was fit that the Greek should stand forward as spokesman both for himself and for the barbarian. It was fit that the politically free should in the first instance approach to tender homage both for themselves and for the bond. Greek and barbarian, bond and free, are all in equal need; and when all their wants are satisfied out of Christ's fulness, all traces of former distinctions will be for ever lost. In Christ they shall all be one. Here Ethiopia is already stretching out her hands to God. In the request of these Greeks, presented through Philip and Andrew, symptoms appear, more or less intelligent and articulate, that the earnest expectation of the creature is waiting and longing for the manifestation of the Son of God.

These Greeks, coming to Jesus before the time, seem the world's first-fruits offered to God. A few ears early ripened are laid on the altar as earnest of a world-wide harvest that will follow in due time. A similar embassy came to the King at his birth in Bethlehem. From the east came first-fruits of the world to join in the jubilee at the birth of Christ; and from the west came first-fruits of the world to wait the opening into life which the death of Christ secured. 'Look unto me all ye ends of the earth, and be ye saved.'

In the persons of these proselytized worshipping Greeks, the Gentiles, weary of their dumb idols, are instinctively putting forth a feeler to ascertain whether there be a way open to the living God. Their dead idols are failing them, and here they are feeling after an unknown God, if haply they may find Him through Jesus of Nazareth, before Paul had learned to preach Him. On his part He feels these Greeks touching Him, and delights in the symptom of strangers coming from east, and west, and south, and north, to sit down with Abraham in the kingdom of heaven. Other sheep He has already in his heart that are not of the Jewish fold; them also He will bring back, but the time is not yet. He must finish his work. He strives to reach these Gentiles who are blindly groping for Him; but He will strive lawfully. The good Shepherd must give his life for the sheep. As the revilers said at the foot of the cross, knowing not the mysterious truth which their lips proclaimed, 'He saved others, himself He cannot save.' He cannot give life, except through his own dying.

The twelve did not yet understand the manner of their Master's kingdom; they walked by sight more than by faith. When the Greeks had communicated their desire privately to Philip, he, distrusting his own judgment, took Andrew, his fellow-citizen, into his confidence, and the two together break the matter to the Lord. The petition of the strangers evidently contemplated a personal interview in private. Those proselytes had evidently both seen and heard Jesus. It was because He spake as never man spake, that they desired an opportunity of conversing with Him. In undertaking to intercede for such an interview, Philip and Andrew acted with kindness, according to their light; but they were ignorant of those deep things of God which lay between Christ bestowing life and the world needing it. The deepest of all—the dying of the Lord Jesus—they could not understand, and would not accept. Even after the sacrifice had been offered, and the Lord had risen from the grave, He found it necessary to address to them the reproof: 'O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have said! Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?' At this time they fondly expected to reach the crown, without bearing the cross. They even presumed to rebuke the Master, when He taught them the necessity of his own sacrifice: 'Far be this from Thee, Lord.'

Then Jesus answered them. His words are meant as a specific reply to the request which Andrew and Philip had presented. He declines to grant the request; but He explains the reason of his refusal. And, blessed paradox, the reason of his refusal is his intense desire to give. He intimates that their desire will be more fully accomplished in another way. 'The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified.' True, the Gentiles were shut out from the old dispensation; but that wall of partition will soon be broken down. These doves that are flying to the windows, will not need to wait long now. The hour is come. The Son of God will in a few days accomplish an exodus at Jerusalem, which will open a way for the world into the holiest. Christ rejoiced in spirit that day over the request which the Greeks had made, although He did not grant it. He had prepared, within the closed doors of the old dispensation, a feast of fat things for all the world; and He was glad to feel a pressure on the gates before the set time for opening them; for this assured Him that, when they should be opened, his table would be furnished with guests. For this 'joy that was set before Him, He endured the cross.' I think the memory of these Gentiles pressing into the kingdom before the time, would sustain the spirit of Emmanuel in his agony more than legions of angels. He feels already that his dying will not be in vain. 'The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence,' and the King is well pleased when the violent press hard on its gate. As soon as the gate is opened, the Gentiles, already clustering round, will agonize through its sharp, flesh-crucifying sides. The Lord sees in this incident of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied.

In his wonted manner, He gives now a tender and vivid representation of the great mystery of grace. As He is the water of life to the thirsty, the bread of life to the hungry, and the parent vine to the dependent branch, He is the corn of wheat, from which, when it falls into the ground and dies, a harvest of ransomed men shall spring, waving like Lebanon on the field of the world for a time, and gathered, as God's chief treasure, into the granaries of heaven at last. 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.'

These parables that Jesus spake, are not merely similitudes taken from nature to explain some of the mysteries of grace. He who employed these analogies is the Designer and Ruler of both hemispheres—the physical and the spiritual. Although, in the development of redemption after the fall, that was not first which was spiritual, but that which was carnal; although, from our view-point, Ishmael, the son of the bond, was in point of time before Isaac, the son of the free,—yet, in the omniscient Designer's plan, the spiritual took precedence, and the material followed. The outer world was framed on models already existing in the spiritual. When the Lord Jesus, author of both departments, lifted a feature of nature to explain a doctrine of grace, He was not discovering or instituting a new comparison. He only brought back the vessel to the mould in which it had originally been framed, and showed, by its fitting, what it had been formed upon. This springing of wheat, in an abundant harvest, from a seed that fell into the ground and died, is indeed a law of external nature; but it was framed on a pre-existing law of sovereign, eternal grace. And when the springing of the harvest in nature is brought back to the type on which at first it was formed, the fitting reveals its origin.

Christ, in the eternal covenant, for the display of the divine glory, is the corn of wheat that, by his own dying, shall give birth to an innumerable progeny, growing in his image, that shall beautify earth throughout the generations of time, and people heaven for ever.

The seed in this pregnant parable drops into the ground and dies; thereafter, and thereby, it bears fruit after its kind. Christ is the seed from which new life comes to a dead world. The seed is the Word; and the Word was with God, was God, and in due time dwelt among us. From his death springs a great harvest of saved men. The first Adam replenished the earth with a progeny corrupt and condemned; the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, will see a numerous offspring, after his own likeness, regenerate, ripening on earth, and gathered when ripe into heaven.

As a corn of wheat kept above the ground is itself precious, but produces nothing; the Lord intimates that if He die not, whatever He may be as the delight of the Father and the Lord of all unfallen creatures, He will work no deliverance for a lost world—will bring no sons and daughters from this dark earth to glory. Living, He may be supremely happy in the homage of all the holy; but if He die not, He will, as far as the fallen human race is concerned, sit upon his throne in solitude. No human voice could ever mingle in the chorus of his praise. This He cannot bear. He loved us, and therefore He gave himself for us. These that are lost in sin,—these that were made in God's image as the crown of creation, but have fallen by their iniquity,—these God our Saviour will not cast out. He will redeem from among them a people unto himself. Of our flesh and blood He will have a multitude that no man can number, as his kindred and his company on the throne of the kingdom. He who sits upon the throne will count himself lonely, while all the angels of God worship Him, unless ten thousand times ten thousand ransomed sinners stand round in white robes, to sing, 'Worthy is the Lamb that was slain.' Abideth alone! This He cannot bear. Tempt Him not, Peter, to spare himself. The corn of wheat must fall into the ground and die, for it is determined, in the council of eternal love, that it shall not abide alone.

'Oh, how He loves!'

LESSONS.

1. Without shedding of blood there is no remission of sin. The dying of the Lord Jesus is the great fundamental fact, on which the redemption of sinners absolutely depends. The corn of wheat must fall into the ground and die, ere it can produce fruit. The Just One must suffer, that sinners believing may be saved. The cross is at once the foundation on which the humble lean, and the stone over which the proud stumble. Jews and Gentiles alike were offended at the cross, and sought to escape it. The people at one time attempted to take Jesus by force and make him a king. Jesus, the healer of the sick, the raiser of the dead, the prophet who spake as never man spake, was in many cases favoured by the multitude; it was Christ crucified that became to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness.

In those days there were Gentiles who desired to come to Jesus, but not to the cross; and there were disciples who consented to lead the strangers by that smooth road to an easy heaven. Both classes have their representatives in the world to-day. There are both learners and teachers now-a-days, who make much of the morality that Jesus taught, but who are blind to the sacrifice by which He takes away sin. None of these scriptures is of any private interpretation. These lessons of the Lord have a meaning for all places and all times. These things were written for our learning, on whom the ends of the world have come. Never was this doctrine more needed than now. It is eminently a characteristic of those who seek after wisdom in our day to come to Christ not crucified. They will have Christianity, but not the atonement. They will sit at Jesus' feet, for they confess with one accord that He is a teacher come from God; but to be bought by his blood—to be cleansed from sin, by the dying of the Sinless One in their room and stead,—this grates harshly upon their tastes.

To know ourselves, and to know our Saviour, are two parts of one thing—they cannot be separated. If you do not know yourself dead in sin, you cannot learn Christ as life from the dead to the sinful; and conversely, if you do not know Christ crucified, as your Redeemer, you have not rightly learned yet your own lost estate. The depth of the heaven seen in the lake, corresponds to the height of the heaven seen above your head. If these clouds to which you look down are not deep, the clouds to which you look up are not high; and conversely, if the clouds to which you look up are high, those to which you look down are deep. It is thus that the depth of the stain seen by a sinner on himself, corresponds to the depth of the fountain in which it may be washed away. If the sin seem light, its pardon will seem easy; and conversely, if pardon seem to come easy, the sin will seem light.

He who, taught by the Spirit, has learned something of his own guilt, must have the blood of the cross, otherwise he has no hope of mercy. And he who, taught of the Spirit, gets some insight into the dying of the Lord Jesus, gathers thence a new conception of his own sin.

Those who see the depth of their own condemnation, and yet know that there is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, are still in the world a peculiar people. There is a wide difference between one who merely admires the beautiful doctrines that Jesus taught, and one who was cast into despair by his own sin, and raised into blessed hope again by beholding the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world.

2. The Redeemer yearns with an unspeakable tenderness for the salvation of lost sinners. Bought with a price!—there must be two at this bargain, as at all other bargains, otherwise there is no transaction. The two who must unite here, are the Redeemer and the captive. One is ready—is ready always. The buyer is ready with the ransom price;—is the captive willing to be redeemed? Alas! how many trample the blood of the covenant under foot.

But, in the meantime, let us read clearly in the Scriptures that there is willingness—eagerness on one side; and oh! perhaps the sight of willingness in Christ may become the power that makes a people willing, and brings them to his bosom, like the dew of the morning. As a student of the Bible, there is nothing of which I have a fuller conviction; and as a preacher of the word, there is nothing that I long and labour more to print into the very souls of my brethren, than this—that Christ, the Son of God, the risen Redeemer, is ready, willing, weary with waiting to receive sinners. This conviction, if it were thoroughly lodged in the heart, would surely prevail to win a soul. The conviction that the Son of God stands at the door and knocks—stands at the door and weeps—may fail to arouse and renew the worldly; but sure it is, if this do not arouse, nothing else will. Come, then, brother; hear ye Him. He will not put away the cup. All the agony that belongs to the bearer of sin, He will endure. All that sin deserves, the Sinless One will undergo. Why? He was not callous to suffering; He was not indifferent to the hiding of his Father's face. His heart was not of iron; for it broke, when pressed between the wrath of God for sin, and the disregard of the sinners whom He sought to save. He was tender to all this endurance, precisely in proportion to his holiness; and yet He will endure! When one of his own disciples endeavoured to dissuade Him, He attributed the advice to the inspiration of the devil, and drove the tempter away. He will go through that agony, till it is finished in his death. Why—oh why? Because He desires fruit; because He is unwilling to reign in heaven if none of us were there.

'O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?' It is a sad sight,—a sight which, I suppose, angels will be amazed and grieved to see,—when a sinful soul is awakened and alarmed, and yet afraid to come to Christ, lest Christ should shut the door in his face, and upbraid him with his sins. A thought grows secretly, like an instinct of nature, in a guilty conscience, that the Sinless One will meet sinners according to their deserving. Instead of that wise conditional of the Psalmist, 'If Thou shouldst mark iniquity,' they come forward with an absolute sentence, 'Thou wilt mark my iniquity to me.' Thus perversely does a soul throw back Christ's love in his face, and will not trust his word—will not trust his dying, as evidence of his love.

It is a mania of that kind, which is sometimes seen among the diseases that afflict humanity, in which the patient conceives a deadly distrust of his best friends. Such is the malady, that the poor deceived brain sets up in imagination a hierarchy of those who hate him; and his apprehension of injury is greatest from the one who loves him most. This world of his will be turned upside down when the mania is cured. Oh that the spiritual madness were removed from deceived hearts, and that those who stood at a distance in slavish terror, might be seen sitting at the feet of Jesus!

It ought to touch our hearts tenderly to mark, in Scripture, the longing of the man Christ Jesus for the company of his kind. 'He took not on Him the nature of angels.' He took ours. He became 'bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh.' Angels serve Him, like flames of fire in their ardour, and like stormy winds in their power and speed. Angels serve Him; but it is a man whom He will choose to lie in his bosom. They are men whom He calls his friends. They are of human flesh and blood, whom He solemnly declares to be his mother, and sister, and brother. Reigning over all, He bends now from his throne, in longing for the ingathering of the nations. On his throne to-day He laments that, while the door is open, few there be that find it. And while He longs for the entrance of ransomed men into the kingdom, as his company for ever, He presses himself as their company to-day in the house of their pilgrimage: 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.'

Let this word abide in your memory. Let it be ready, ever at hand, to rebuke your unbelief and chase away your fears. Remember, when a false view of your own sins is by the evil one employed to keep you back from the sinner's Saviour,—remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, as a reason why He gave himself to die for sin, that, if He died not, He would be left alone; none of the sinful whom He sought coming to Him in the day of grace, sitting with Him on the throne of glory.

WILLIAM FAREL,

THE SWISS REFORMER.

CHAPTER VI.

THE blessing which descended on the church at Neuchatel, by the decree of the 1st of November 1530, did not extend to the surrounding district. On the contrary, that decree expressly stipulated that no innovation should be made in the neighbouring Abbey of Fontaine, or in any other convent or parish in the country. But, on the other hand, those who desired to adopt the reformed doctrines were given liberty to do so. Nevertheless, so decided was the governor's wish to root out the Reformation, that, notwithstanding his recent liberal assertion, he sent for the churchwardens of the country parishes, to extort from them an assurance of their attachment to the 'old faith.'

Feeling deeply for those from whom the light was excluded, Farel, accompanied by some Neuchatelans, set out to visit them; and, in great alarm, the governor again entreated the Princess de Longueville to come and rescue her people from heresy.

The Romish party, determined to 'build again that which had been thrown down,' fixed upon Christmas day to restore Popery to Neuchatel. The plan was carefully laid, and steady friends of Rome appointed to execute it. Their orders were to rush into church while the reformed service was being carried on, overthrow the pulpit, and restore the images and the mass. 'Man proposes, but God disposes.' On Christmas eve, deputies from Berne waited on the governor,—informed him that they were aware of the plot, and added, 'You must see to this. If the reformed party are attacked, we will defend them with all our power.' There was no disturbance in Neuchatel that Christmas day.

The many promising fields in which to proclaim the gospel which were now open to Farel, at Aigle, Morat, Neuchatel, and other places, obliged him to look for fellow-helpers in the ministry. Just at this time, he heard that a young Frenchman, Eustace André, surnamed Fortunatus, who had been driven out of France by persecution, had 'a strong desire to labour in the Lord's vineyard.' Farel immediately wrote to him, saying, 'If you are truly acquainted with Christ, so as to preach Him in simplicity, without vain disputes about baptism and the Lord's Supper, tribute and tithe, in which the religion of many consists; if you have no desire to bring forward anything else than that all men should deny ungodliness and unrighteousness, and, full of faith, lay up treasures in heaven, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God,—if it be your chief desire to implant that faith which works by love, then come courageously, and take up the cross which stands ready for you. Look for labour, not for leisure; expect no rest till the day's work is done. Truly a wide field lies open, but only for those who wish to feed the flock, not to live on it. Besides this, much reproach is to be endured; for you must expect to meet with ingratitude in return for kindness, and evil for good. But do not suppose I mention these things to deter you. I would rather inflame you with the courage of a hero, who, though the foe he is about to meet be strong and well armed, is ready to enter the hottest of the fight, trusting in that God whose is the conflict, and the victory, for the battle is not ours, but the Lord's.' To this letter André replied, that being a married man, he would prefer a quieter post than that which Farel described. The Reformer therefore wrote again, saying, 'If you have received grace to preach the gospel, do not bury your talent, for you will have to answer for the souls of those who are the slaves of spiritual tyranny, whom you might have enlightened and led to Christ. The labourer must live at his own charge while he is waiting for the harvest, and this I confess is difficult in a time of scarcity, when money goes but a little way; but I know that our heavenly Father will never desert his children.' Thus André's objections were overcome, and, with his wife, he soon joined Farel, and long and zealously laboured with him in the gospel.

We now return to follow Farel on his missionary tour. At Avenche, where the Bishop of Lausanne possessed both temporal and spiritual power, he met fierce opposition, though there were many anxious to hear him. Protected by the authority of Berne and Friburg, he escaped open violence, and soon went on to Morat, two leagues distant. While there, he received orders from Berne to go to Orbe, a small town at the foot of the Jura, remarkable as the place in which the three sons of Charlemagne met to divide their father's vast empire upon his death. The reformed doctrines had gained entrance into Orbe the previous year, and had many zealous friends within its walls, who met with much hostile treatment, especially from a Franciscan, Michael Juliani. When Farel began to preach he was assailed on all sides by cries of 'dog, heretic, devil;' but, being accustomed to such disturbances, he continued his sermon, and even returned to the public square to finish it the following morning. The evening of that day, he, with the deputies of Berne, attended a meeting of the council, and, returning home, was waylaid by the women of Orbe, who seized, and were about to beat him, when Pierre de Glaresse, a nobleman in the town, rescued him, saying, 'Ladies, pray forgive me, I have him in charge.' The most violent of these women was Elizabeth Reiff, wife of Hugonin D'Arnay, who shortly after, with her husband, embraced the Reformation.

The Bernese government, upon hearing of this tumult, expressed their displeasure, and issued an order that Farel should be left at liberty to preach wherever he pleased. Notwithstanding this, even little children contrived to interrupt him, and, upon one occasion, several men drew their swords, thinking to terrify the preacher into silence; but, nothing daunted, he held on his way preaching, while at Orbe, twice a day for six successive days.

It was at Orbe that he for the first time met Peter Viret, a native of the town, who had been studying in Paris, but was driven from that city by persecution. At Farel's entreaty he entered the ministry, and preached his first sermon at Orbe immediately after the Reformer's departure from it. Faithful and earnest, he soon became a burning and shining light in the home of his childhood, guiding many into the way of peace. His father and mother were the first-fruits of his ministry.

Granson is not far from Orbe, and there fresh disturbances awaited him. While a Franciscan friar from Lausanne was preaching on the festival of John the Baptist, Farel, with more zeal than prudence, interrupted him, and offered to prove that his assertions were false. Upon this the mayor, who was standing near Farel, struck him, and immediately the town's people, the friars, and many who had come armed from Yverden, violently beat and kicked him. The next day a commissioner from Berne arrived on behalf of Farel and his associates, and upon inquiry being made into the cause of the uproar of the previous day, the Romish party excused themselves upon the plea that they were only protecting a crucifix which Farel was going to throw down. After a good deal of discussion order was restored, and it is interesting to learn that two of the monks, who had been foremost in the uproar, shortly after renounced Popery, and became preachers of the gospel they had so violently opposed.

Farel met with more success in the neighbourhood than in the town of Granson, and, before he left the district, the majority of the inhabitants declared themselves in favour of the Reformation, which was in consequence publicly recognised. The laws made by the Reformers to prevent blasphemy were rigidly enforced. For the first offence the penalty was to kiss the ground; for the second, a fine of three sous; for the third, the pillory. Relics were at the same time commanded to be put away, with the exception of one, held in peculiar veneration, 'la sainte ratte' (the holy rat)—regarded holy because it had eaten part of a consecrated wafer!

Farel's remaining at Granson was a source of continued altercation between the governments of Berne and Friburg, in consequence of which he was recalled, and the two cantons entered into an agreement relative to the Reformation in districts jointly in alliance with them, which were, on the whole, favourable to liberty of conscience.

In 1532, John le Compte was appointed pastor of Granson by the council of Berne, and four newly formed evangelical churches in the bailiwick of Granson were supplied by ministers, who had, like Le Compte, fled from France to escape persecution. Le Compte continued minister of Granson until his death in 1572. He left three sons, who were all ministers; and 'his posterity,' says Ruchet, 'have furnished ministers to the church from father to son, without interruption, to this day.'

In another town in the Pays de Vaud, the magistrates finding it impossible to maintain peace while discussions upon the controverted points were permitted, resorted to the expedient of forbidding all mention of God within their jurisdiction. 'Soit en bien, soit en mal.'

Very different was the course pursued by Farel, who, with unabated energy, continued to oppose whatever he believed to be error, either in doctrine or practice. The senate of Berne, alarmed at his zeal, complained of his impetuosity, while he charged them with being lukewarm. 'There are persons,' he wrote, 'who profess a desire for the establishment of Christianity; but whether they are in earnest or not, God knows. The Bernese do not labour as zealously for the doctrine of Christ, as the Friburgers do for Popery.'

Having sown the good seed along the southern shores of the lake of Neuchatel, Farel turned northwards, and stopped at St. Blaise, where he entered into a dispute with the curate, respecting the mass. A magistrate in the crowd having said, 'Farel deserved to be hung,' the people became so excited that they rushed forwards and almost beat him to death. His friends with difficulty rescued him, and brought him, more dead than alive, in a boat to Morat, where the sight of his wounds so affected the reformed party, that they marched to St. Blaise and destroyed the altar and images, after which they proceeded to Fontaine André, and there executed a similar act of vengeance.

In March 1531, Francis, Marquis of Rothelin, son of the Duchess of Longueville, arrived at Neuchatel. The hopes of the Romish party beat high, as they heard it was his intention to make Francis the First of France his model in dealing with the heretics. He soon, however, found public opinion strong against him, and being obliged to go with the stream, proclaimed liberty of conscience throughout his territories; and the governor, following his example, prudently declared himself a member of the reformed party.

These multiplied labours of Farel necessarily interrupted his correspondence. 'Even were my father alive,' he used to say to those who blamed his silence, 'I could not find time to write to him.'

The government of Berne exercised either sole jurisdiction, or, at the least, considerable influence in all the places visited by Farel at this time, and they gave him their hearty support in carrying out his views. Indeed, it may be thought that Berne went too far in compelling the reception of the gospel. Against this undue exertion of power, the Papal party frequently complained; and it must be confessed, that in some districts in which the Romish party were outvoted, less indulgence was shown to them with respect to the rites of their religion than the reformed party demanded, and by the successful interference of Berne obtained, for a minority professing their faith. And though, in every instance of disorder, such as breaking images, or overturning altars, Berne did her utmost to check such misguided zeal, yet, that such instances of violence did occur, can neither be denied nor justified. Upon this subject, Ruchet says, 'It pains us to report instances of this kind, but truth and impartiality require me not to suppress them. It is fitting also to show our adversaries that we attempt not to excuse misconduct in the members of our own communion, and that our religion is far from authorizing tumult, violence, or disorder. No doubt the persons who were guilty of offences of this kind thought they did God service, grounding their proceedings on the laws given to the Israelites. But there were special laws delivered to that people, and they were to be executed by the nation as such, and through its magistrates, not by private individuals. It is not to be wondered at if such proceedings prejudiced the Popish party against the Reformation. Men cannot be induced at once to lay aside the sentiments and habits in which they have been brought up, and passively see that treated with insult which from childhood they have been taught to revere. Violently to break images is not to root out idolatry, it only irritates those who revere them. Their minds should first be enlightened; and thus they may be led to destroy their idols with their own hands.'

In October 1531, Zuingle wrote thus to Farel: 'Be prudent, and do not rashly expose yourself to danger; be careful for the Lord's further service.' Farel replied: 'Take care of yourself also; for far greater danger threatens you than me.' Before this letter reached Zurich, he to whom it was addressed had fallen on the fatal field of Cappel.

The Reformation in Berne was very imperfect. Many disorders had crept in, partly owing to want of discipline, and partly to the late unfortunate war. In order to check them, the clergy of the canton were summoned to a general synod at Berne, in January 1532. Farel attended, and Capito came, being specially invited, from Strasbourg. In all, 230 members were present, who, from the 9th to the 14th of January, discussed together the best means by which to promote the Reformation. The result was the adoption of regulations relative to doctrine, discipline, public worship, the conduct of pastors, and other important matters. These rules being sanctioned by the council, Capito wrote them out in German, after which they were printed in Latin. His services on this occasion were considered so valuable, that Haller, the Bernese Reformer, called him the 'Father of the Bernese church;' and it was very much owing to his meekness and gentleness that a spirit of Christian love pervaded the assembly.

About this time accounts of the persecution of the Lord's people in France, and of the intention of some of their leaders to apply to the state for redress, reached Farel. In great anxiety he wrote to entreat them not to be cast down, saying, 'If God be for us, who can be against us? The Lord is our helper, of whom shall we be afraid? If all the powers of earth set themselves against us, we will not despair if the Lord is with us. Look not at the host of the Assyrians, but at the power of God, who fighteth for us. Profit by the fear which has seized you, take courage and enter into that holy covenant which God has made with us through the Son. Say to yourselves, How will it be with us if the Almighty King, the Lord of heaven and earth, should refuse to acknowledge us, and should say respecting us, "Whosoever is ashamed of me before men, of him will I be ashamed before my heavenly Father."' In conclusion he exhorted them to 'seek the blessings of eternity, to have the truth so inwrought into their souls, as to convince their adversaries by the force of Scripture, justice, and reason.'

Scarcely had Farel written this letter, when he and his friend and countryman, Anthony Saunier, were called to visit the Waldenses in their native valleys.

Some time previous to this, tidings of the Reformation had penetrated those valleys. One of their pastors had visited Germany. He brought back with him some of Luther's writing, and, with astonishment, the Vaudois learned that doctrines, in defence of which their fathers had died, and of which they had considered themselves the sole depositaries, had found protectors among the great and noble in France, Switzerland, and Germany. Upon Farel's arrival, a synod was held for the purpose of comparing the Vaudois doctrines and form of worship with the Scriptures. Farel then urged the necessity ('to prevent the people from being led astray by false teachers') for the establishment of schools and the free circulation of the Scriptures, to provide for which he undertook to edit, for the Vaudois, Lefèvre's translation of the Old and New Testaments. And, on his return home, he sent four faithful men back to the valleys to establish the requisite schools, and arrange for translating and printing the Bible, of which the Vaudois had but a few manuscript copies.

These good men started on their mission in October 1532, and, after a journey of much hardship and peril, they reached the valleys, to the great joy of the Vaudois; but the severe persecution which recommenced the following year, prevented many of their plans being carried into effect.

(To be continued.)

THE BLIND POSTMAN.

CHAPTER IV.

EMPLOYMENT OBTAINED, AND A FELLOW-SUFFERER ASSISTED.

IN a very short time Roberts received the much-desired intelligence that he had been regularly appointed letter-carrier to the district. The salary, to be sure, was only a few shillings a week; but then the work only occupied him for two or three hours in the morning, and left him free during the rest of the day for any other employment he might succeed in obtaining. His prospects now seemed much brighter than they had ever done since his loss of sight; and his heart rose in fervent gratitude to the Giver of all good for this marked improvement in his circumstances. Other work quickly followed; for, happening to hear that one or two of his neighbours were in want of large chests, he purchased some wood suitable for the purpose, and, after surmounting many difficulties, he succeeded in making some very strong chests. These he at once disposed of, and they gave such great satisfaction, that orders for similar ones came in from all quarters, so that his time was fully occupied for some weeks.

As he had now become quite noted as a box-maker, Squire Higgins, who was just sending some furniture up to his town house, gave him an order for five or six large packing-cases, which also gave perfect satisfaction.

Each fresh attempt developed powers within him of which Roberts had previously been unconscious, and every new success increased his feeling of manly self-reliance; so that, in a short time after this, he ventured to apply to his old master and to other tradesmen about the town for employment in making packing-cases. Some hesitated, and avoided giving a direct answer, saying that they would consider the matter, as they did not like to refuse him, and were afraid that he would only spoil the wood. Others said they did not want any at present. But his former employer, who highly respected him, and had already seen some of his work, agreed to let him have some cases to make; and it was arranged that Roberts should work at home, as that would, on the whole, be more convenient.

When Farmer Wilson heard of this new arrangement, he at once said that his men could very well bring out the wood for Roberts when they were returning with the market-carts, and that as some of his waggons often went into the town without a load, they could then take back the cases after they were made. This thoughtful kindness of the farmer saved Roberts a good deal of trouble and expense.

As soon as it became known that his cases were well and strongly made, he obtained employment from several other tradesmen to whom he had previously applied, so that he had now as much work as he could do, and was, in consequence, to use his own expression, 'as happy as the day was long.' For, being fully employed, he had now little or no time for brooding over his severe privation, and he soon found, to his great delight, that his earnings, if managed with the strictest economy, were sufficient to maintain his wife and family in comfort. And very often of an evening, when he sat down after his work, with one of his little ones on his knee, while his eldest boy read aloud, he used to say to his wife that he didn't think he had ever been happier in his life. Not that he never felt painfully his loss of sight, or longed again to see the faces of those he loved; for it is scarcely in human nature, even when assisted by the higher influences of religion, not to long, occasionally at least, for so great a boon as that of sight. But these feelings of regret were only temporary, and were not very bitter even while they lasted. For although the loss was great, he found by experience that there is in the human constitution a system of compensation, by which, if one sense be injured or destroyed, the others will, to a great extent, by means of their increased exercise, make up the deficiency. Thus, those who are deaf depend so much upon the sight, that that sense becomes exceptionally acute, so that many are able to understand what is said by the form of the lips and the expression of the countenance. While, in the case of the blind, so much extra work has to be done by the hearing and touch, and these faculties are thereby so greatly developed, that many things which at first seem incredible can easily be accomplished by their help.

Previous to Roberts' own loss of sight, he had scarcely ever seen a blind person, and even after that occurrence he for a long time regarded his own case as very exceptional. He was therefore considerably surprised to hear that there was another blind man living in the town, quite close to his old place of employment. As he heard that this person was in very needy circumstances, he resolved to call upon him, in order to see if anything could be done to better his position. He found that blind George, as he was usually called, was a man of about thirty-five; but although he was apparently in good health, and possessed of a well-made frame, he had sunk into such a state of apathetic despondency, that he passed nearly the whole of his time sitting by the fireside, or in the porch of the cottage. His chief means of subsistence consisted of a trifling allowance of money, and two or three loaves of bread, which he received weekly from the parish. He had, when a youth, passed six or seven years in an institution for the blind in a neighbouring county town, and had been taught the trade of mat-making, but so imperfectly, that he found it impossible to compete with sighted workmen. He told Roberts that for some time after his return from the institution he endeavoured to support himself by making mats; but although every one praised them very much, he found that very few purchased. Some ladies, he said, took them for a little while; but as they were not so neatly made as those that were sold in the shops, they soon got tired of buying them for mere charity. The shopkeepers generally declined having anything to do with them. One kind-hearted dealer, however, agreed to take two or three and expose them in his shop, ticketed in large letters, 'Made by the Blind.' But he found that, although his customers looked and wondered very much, they all seemed to have an undefined impression that they must be dearer or worse made than those manufactured by other workmen. The mats, therefore, became dead stock, and, as a matter of course, George could obtain no more orders. He therefore abandoned the whole thing in despair, and soon gave himself up to a life of listless inactivity.

As Roberts had never visited an institution for the blind, he naturally asked his new acquaintance many questions respecting the management of such establishments. From all he could learn, he came to the conclusion that the life of their inmates must be excessively monotonous, and that the education which was supplied, as well as the instruction in trades, was extremely shallow and imperfect, although the cost of maintaining and educating each pupil amounted to nearly £50 a year.

Roberts was also very much grieved at what George told him respecting the treatment he had received from his relatives. He said that, when a child, his mother used to treat him very kindly (for he had lost his sight soon after his birth), although she never sent him to school, or attempted to teach him anything herself. But after he had been in the institution for two or three years, he found that he was not treated at home during the holidays with the same kindness as he had been formerly; and after his mother's death his father took little or no interest in his welfare, and when he married again, he arranged that George should spend his holidays with some distant relatives, with whom he had now been living ever since he had left the institution. It was also but too evident to Roberts that these relatives took little or no interest in promoting his comfort or advancement.

Roberts endeavoured, but without any great success, to arouse the dormant energies of George, by telling him what he had been able to accomplish himself, and by suggesting one or two kinds of work which he thought George was capable of doing. To all these accounts and proposals George invariably replied, that he was sure he couldn't do it, and that there was no use in trying. After a great deal of trouble, Roberts succeeded in persuading George to allow him to come once a week, in order that they might read together, thinking that this might probably give him the opportunity of benefiting him in some other way.

The next week, when Roberts went to George's cottage, according to arrangement, he found him somewhat more bright and hopeful than he had been before, though he still seemed to think that there was very little use in trying anything. He had been so long without attempting to read, that he had almost forgotten the letters; but, by dint of a good deal of encouragement on Roberts' part, he got on rather better than at first seemed probable, and the allotted time passed very pleasantly. Before their next time of meeting, Roberts resolved that he would, if possible, obtain some employment for George, and with this view called upon several benevolent people in the neighbourhood, who very willingly assisted him. In this way he obtained sufficient money to purchase a small stock of materials and a new set of tools, as he found that most of his former ones had been disposed of at the pawnbroker's by George's relatives.

By a singular coincidence, it happened that just at that time a young man, a native of the town, who had been for some years working as a mat-maker in London, having injured one of his hands, was spending some time with his parents until he was perfectly recovered. When Roberts, who had known him as a boy, called and told him what he was trying to do for his friend George, he at once offered to put him into the London way of doing the work. George thus made a fresh start, and, by way of encouragement, Roberts undertook to dispose of all the mats he could make in the first two months. By the end of that time the mats were so well made, that the dealer, who had formerly tried to assist George, declared that he could not tell them from those he had purchased from London. He therefore agreed to take a few on trial, and Roberts prudently suggested that, unless inquiries were made, nothing should be said as to their being manufactured by the blind. By adopting this plan, the mats sold just as well as any others, and George thus obtained regular, though by no means full employment. But after a while he began to obtain other customers, and so his trade gradually increased.

It must not be thought, because the townsfolk of S—— were more willing to purchase George's mats when they did not know by whom they were made than when they did, that they were more uncharitable than others; for few people can afford to pay high prices for goods when they can get them lower, and there is a general impression, for which charitable institutions are chiefly responsible, that goods manufactured by the blind are dearer than those manufactured by others. The intelligent blind tradesman, however, who tries to obtain employment for himself, soon finds that he stands little or no chance of doing so unless his goods are quite as cheap as those offered in the market by others. Indeed, he is often obliged to offer them at a cheaper rate.

CHAPTER V.

THE GOOD WORK CARRIED ON AND EXTENDED.

At about three miles from the town, in the opposite direction from that in which Roberts lived, there lay a small village, consisting of not more than twenty or thirty houses. As he was passing through it one day while engaged on business, he was surprised to learn that there was a blind man living there. On inquiry, he found that this man was the son of a very small farmer, and that he partially gained his livelihood by basket-making.

On calling at the house, he found that Thomas Stephens was a young man about four-and-twenty, and that he had been blind for the last eight years. He seemed to be cheerful, intelligent, and, for his station, very well educated, and it was clear that all around him felt it a pleasure to minister to his necessities and enjoyments. When Farmer Stephens came in, it was with evident pride and satisfaction that he showed Roberts a good many specimens of his son's work, which would certainly have done credit to any workman blessed with sight. He told Roberts that when they found that the doctors could do nothing to restore the sight, many of his friends urged him to send his son to some institution for the blind. But he said he didn't like the idea of sending the poor boy, as he called him, away from home just when he wanted its comforts most; so he arranged with a basket-maker, who then lived in the neighbourhood, to teach him his trade. From further conversation with the farmer and his son, Roberts discovered that, although the worthy man and his family were very industrious, they had great difficulty in making a living out of the farm, as they had to pay a high rent. He was therefore grieved to learn that young Stephens could not get enough work to employ more than a third of his time, though he assured Roberts that he had tried almost every one living in the neighbourhood. Roberts promised to do what he could to obtain additional work for him, and then left, much pleased with his visit.

As he walked home, he naturally thought upon the striking difference, as to the enjoyment of life, which existed between Thomas Stephens and Blind George when he first met with him. Stephens was as entirely blind as George, and, as far as Roberts could make out, was very little richer; yet he was evidently thoroughly happy, while George, when he first saw him, was as miserable as any one could well be. From these facts, Roberts came to the conclusion, that although loss of sight is in itself a very sad privation, the suffering caused by it depends very much upon the character and position of the individual, being greatly increased or alleviated by adverse or favourable circumstances.

Roberts soon succeeded in getting a few orders; and when, some days after, young Stephens and his father came over to spend a few hours with him, he took care to introduce them to all those about the village whom he thought at all likely to want baskets. In this way he gained many fresh orders, and young Stephens returned home with his heart even lighter than usual. His father, too, was equally well pleased; for although, as he used to say, it was a pleasure to him to be able to support his son, yet, for his present comfort, as well as his future prospects, he felt extremely thankful that he seemed likely to obtain increased employment.

As Roberts went on from time to time discovering other blind persons living in the neighbourhood, many of whom could not read for themselves, and had very few opportunities of getting others to read for them, it occurred to him that it would be a good plan to organize a small weekly meeting for their instruction and amusement. For this purpose, he obtained the use of a convenient room in the town, and resolved to make a commencement. He arranged that the meeting should begin early in the afternoon, and that about an hour and a half should be devoted to learning embossed reading. After this a comfortable tea was provided, the expense of which was defrayed by some of Roberts' more wealthy friends. When the tea was over, there was a reading from some work of general interest, fact or fiction, grave or gay. These readings were taken in turn by three or four gentlemen living in the town, and they proved a source of real enjoyment to those who attended the meeting.

At the close of the first meeting, an old man of nearly eighty years of age, who had served in the Peninsular war, and had afterwards lost his sight while serving in India, rose and said that he was very much obliged to Master Roberts for asking him to the meeting, as he hadn't spent so pleasant an afternoon for the last five-and-thirty years, and he prayed God to bless him, and all who had assisted in arranging the meeting.

Although this old man had seen so much service, and had lost his sight in that service, the only recompense he could obtain was a pension of a shilling a day, out of which he had partially to support three grandchildren, who were orphans.

All the others were equally warm in their thanks to Roberts, and he felt that evening that it was a pleasant thing to do good.

After a few weeks, it was thought advisable to vary the first part of the meeting by a short lesson on English grammar, which young Stephens undertook to give. Subsequently, Roberts commenced a series of short lessons on geography; and both men found that, by endeavouring to instruct others, they were most efficiently instructing themselves. The number of those attending the meeting gradually increased, until it rose to twelve or fourteen. Roberts was at first a good deal surprised that there were so many blind persons living within an easy walking distance of the town; but he afterwards found that there are in the United Kingdom about thirty thousand persons, or, on an average, one to every thousand of the population. So that, as the town and its neighbourhood contained about fourteen or fifteen thousand inhabitants, he found that that district was not more heavily afflicted than others.

In addition to the instruction and amusement supplied by means of these meetings, they were indirectly productive of benefit in other ways to those who attended them. The inhabitants of the town and its vicinity became aware of the fact that there were so many living among them who had a special claim upon their sympathies and assistance. Those who, from age or other causes, were unable to work for their living, were assisted by small allowances of money, while those who were healthy and capable of working, who formed the majority, obtained more work than they had formerly done. In some instances, however, especially among the blind women, it was found that, even when they had full employment, they could not earn sufficient for their own maintenance. In such cases Roberts and his friends did all in their power to make up the deficiency by pecuniary assistance. Thus, chiefly by the instrumentality of one man, himself deprived of sight, and in a very humble station of life, a great amount of good was effected.

One of the most pleasing cases of usefulness was the following: When the class had been in existence about twelve months, an active intelligent lad of about sixteen, who had attended from the commencement, applied to Roberts to know if he could assist him in learning a trade. He had heard that some blind persons in London learned to make brushes, and thought that he should like to do the same. By way of experiment, he had pulled to pieces one of his mother's worn-out scrubbing brushes, and had re-filled the holes with hair taken from an old broom. This, though only a clumsy attempt, convinced Roberts that the lad had some capability for such work, and he promised to do all in his power to assist him. He mentioned the case to Miss Thornton, who was still one of his most willing helpers, and to five or six other ladies and gentlemen. They agreed that, for the next year at least, they would raise a weekly subscription between them sufficient to support the lad, and defray his expenses while learning the brush-making. As there was no working brushmaker in the town of S——, it was resolved to take lodgings for him with a poor but respectable family in a town ten or twelve miles off, where he would obtain the instruction he required. At the end of the first year he had made such progress in his trade, that he could materially contribute to his own support, and the same friends agreed to make up the deficiency by a smaller weekly allowance for another year. At the end of the second year a similar arrangement was made for the third year, and at the close of that period he was considered to have mastered his trade. He therefore returned to S——, where he soon gained the respect and support of all who knew him.

By the blessing of God on his unremitting industry and perseverance, Roberts' own circumstances still continue prosperous. Every morning he rises early, and walks into the town to fetch his parcel of letters, which he afterwards distributes; he then returns home, and works hard all day in making packing-cases, or at any other work which happens to turn up, while he devotes his spare hours to mental culture or to doing good. His children, who have considerably increased in number since our first acquaintance with him, are now growing up around him, and he is one of the proudest and happiest of fathers. He is esteemed and respected by all the villagers, and, as was to be expected, by no one more so than by the little one (now grown to be a fine young man) whom he saved from a watery grave at the expense of his own sight. On the whole, it may be safely asserted that Roberts, notwithstanding his blindness, is one of the busiest, happiest, and most intelligent men to be found within many miles of the village in which he resides. And he has fully experienced the truth of the text, that 'he who watereth others shall himself be watered,' and of the motto, 'Help yourself, and Heaven will help you.'

THE CHANT OF THE SNOWDROPS.

Bend down thine ear! Soft o'er thy senses stealing,
Hear'st thou the music of each silver bell?
Listen! our chime speaks to the heart of feeling,
Hymning his praise who hath made all things well.

Praise be to Him who called us forth to blossom,
Cheering the chill breast of the wintry earth;
Praise be to Him who thus, in mourner's bosom,
Gives to meek hopes and consolations birth.

See! 'mid wild winds we wave, and are not broken;
Nor doth the dark rain sully our fair hue:
Who doth protect us? He of whom 'tis spoken,
'His love is to man as unto grass the dew.'

Praise be to Him who sent us here, foretelling
Winter's reign is passing, spring-tide draweth nigh;
Fair flowers we herald—flowers ourselves excelling—
Sweeter in their fragrance, brighter in their dye.

Praise be to Him for types and emblems cheering;
Praise for the eye that learns to read them right;
Praise for the ear pure Nature's anthems hearing;
Praise for the voice that can with them unite.

—Dublin University Magazine.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Chron. xxi. 1.

There is something very peculiar about this fragment or episode of Israel's history. It is abrupt, and in a manner isolated, though not wholly so. It has also some very remarkable points about it. It is the introduction to the history of the temple. It shows the way in which David was led to Moriah as the temple site, and to Ornan's thrashing-floor as the place for the altar of burnt-offering. It was through David's sin and punishment that God pointed out the 'rest' which He had chosen, and the spot where He had purposed to place his name (2 Chron. iii. 1). Thus God overrules human sin; nay, takes occasion from it to display his grace. It was their king's sin that was the link between Israel and Moriah, between Israel and the temple, between Israel and the place of burnt-offering. Strange this, but suitable and striking. It is sin that is, in one sense, the link, or at least the point, of contact between us and Jesus.

There is this peculiarity also about the spot: it was the place of division between death and life, between condemnation and pardon, between pestilence and health. All up to this point was judgment; but here the sword stayed. This hill, this thrashing-floor, stood between the living and the dead. Such is really the character of the temple and the altar. Here life begins, and death is stayed. All up to this is death and vengeance; that temple was the shield of the world.

There is also this peculiarity. The spot where the plague stayed was Gentile, not Jewish ground. It was the property of a Jebusite—the last heir of the Jebusite kings (2 Sam. xxiv. 23, 'Araunah the king'); perhaps of Melchizedek; so that thus Moriah passes from Melchizedek to David. It was on Jebusite or Gentile ground that the angel of judgment sheathed his sword, and Israel's temple was erected. How much of that temple was Gentile, not Jewish! The ground, the cedars, the gold, and silver, and brass (1 Chron. xviii. 7, 11), the workmen; all but the stones, which were Jewish. Israel was thus to learn that the Gentile had an interest in these courts. The Gentile could say, That rock is mine, that gold is mine, that cedar-wood is mine, that workmanship is mine. Yes; in that temple all nations meet with one another, and meet with God. One in Christ, was the teaching of the temple, as well as of the cross.

Let us further notice, that it was in connection with the numbering of Israel that the temple-site came to be fixed. God's special promise to Abraham was, that his seed should be as the sand of the sea and the stars of heaven; and now, when this promise is abused, and made a minister of pride, the judgment comes because of it; and yet, out of the judgment comes the voice which says, 'This is my rest.' The point of the destroying sword (not a voice from the glory) marks the temple; its flash reveals the long-appointed spot. That temple was to be a seal and pledge of Israel's numbers without number—'the fountain of Israel.'

Let us further notice, that it was in connection with the common occupations of life that this revelation of the temple-site was made. 'Ornan and his sons were thrashing wheat' at the time when the angel came, and his sword stayed at the thrashing-floor. They had no share in David's sin and Israel's punishment, and they were not alarmed at the pestilence. They were not clad in sackcloth, like David and the elders. They were not on their knees, but engaged in the common duties of the day. God finds them at the thrashing-floor, and blames them not. Nay, He honours them and their employment; He honours that piece of ground where they were working, by turning it from a thrashing-floor into an altar. Let no man be ashamed of his honest trade, or think that God will not meet with him in the midst of it. Ornan's flail was not a mean thing in the eyes of God.

Let us notice again, that this ground was bought at its price by David for Israel. There are only two spots which thus passed by purchase into Jewish hands, Machpelah and Moriah,—the one for a burial-place, the other for a temple; the one bought by Abraham, the other by David. Of all the rest of the land Israel took possession, as God's gift, without money and without price. Strange that, for a spot on which to fix the symbols of resurrection and reconciliation, Israel (in the persons of Abraham and David) must pay the full price!—as if to remind them that, in both cases, it was by ransom that the blessing is reached—'a ransom for the sins of many:' 'I will ransom them from the grave.'

One thing more we notice: this fixing of the temple-site had nothing to do with the tabernacle, or the ark, or the priesthood, or the Urim and Thummim. There was a break between them. The ark was on Zion, and the tabernacle (at this time) was at Gibeon; and it was not to the high priest that God made this new revelation, but to David, and Gad, and the elders of Israel. There was much in the temple that was a repetition or fuller development of the tabernacle; there was much in it that was new. The tabernacle was linked with Levi; the temple, in great measure, with Judah. It is the king, not the priest, that builds the house. God asks the help of David, and Solomon, and Nehemiah, and Zerubbabel, and such civil governors in the maintenance of his worship. Their giving it honours them, and defiles not the temple of God. God, in his sovereignty, led the ark about to Gilgal, Shiloh, Kirjath-jearim, Zion; and now that his purpose is served, He sets it aside, and chooses a new site for his place of worship; and that place no longer a tent, but a temple; no longer connected with priesthood only, but with royalty as well; no longer frail and moveable (like a pilgrim), but fixed and unchanging,—type of the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Such is the end of the tabernacle-age. It began with Moses, and ended with David. It began with Sinai, and ended with Zion. It began with the thunder of the burning mountain, and ended with the pestilence and the devouring sword. A wondrous mixture all throughout of mercy and of judgment!

The temple-age ended in more awful judgment,—the desolation of temple, and city, and people. For man is always treasuring up wrath against himself, and ripening for the final stroke. 'The end of all things is at hand; be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer.'

GEHENNA; OR, THE PLACE OF THE LOST.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

ISAIAH LXVI. 24.

IN the earthly Jerusalem, there was on one side a deep gorge or valley, called the valley of Hinnom—probably from the name of one of its possessors. It was originally a pleasant green spot, for a stream of water ran through the midst of it, and fell into the Kedron. But sin had changed all this, and made it a place of shame and everlasting contempt. During the reigns of the idolatrous kings, it became the scene of many obscene and cruel rites. Human sacrifices were here offered, especially infants; and in order to drown their cries, the toph, or drum, was beaten; and so it came to be called Tophet, or the place of beating the drum. Good King Josiah, during his reformation, in his abhorrence of the place, defiled and polluted it in every possible way, in order that it might never again be used for the purpose of worship. When the Jews returned from their captivity, weaned completely from idolatry, they shared the sentiments of their pious king; and so, imitating the example he had left them, they treated the place with all kinds of indignity. It was made the receptacle of all the filth and offal of the city; and fires were kept continually burning, night and day, to consume its pestiferous contents. I remember a similar place in Calcutta, called the Burning Ghat. It was naturally a pleasant spot on the bank of the wide, deep Hoogly; but the bodies of the dead were here burned,—often very imperfectly,—and so there was always the smouldering flame, the heavy black smoke, the noisome smell of burning, corrupting flesh; while crowds of lazy bloated vultures were constantly at work, or lounging about, oppressed with their heavy meal. It was a painful, humbling, disgusting sight; but it put me in mind of the valley of Hinnom at Jerusalem, and showed me how it came to be regarded by the Jews as an image of the place of the lost,—Gehenna, or the valley of Hinnom, as hell is called in the New Testament.

It is evident that this fearful subject must have been very much in the mind of Christ, for allusion to it was frequent on his lips. As He looked forward to the place preparing for the saved, and gathered strength and uplifting for his work and way, so He kept his eye also fixed on the place that awaits the lost, and was thus nerved and braced to drink the bitter cup, which would deliver many from going down into it. Look at the end of the ninth chapter of Mark's Gospel, and you will see that this last verse of Isaiah must have been in his thoughts, when, using its very words, with earnest, vehement urgency and entreaty, He beseeches his disciples, and through them us all, to sacrifice and cast from us everything that would hinder or defer our escape from Gehenna, the place of woe. Are we right in being so reserved and reticent on this fearful subject? Is it that we do not realize it, scarce believe it, seldom think of it? Or is it that we are withheld from referring to it by deference to the rules of what is called polite society? But who made these rules? who keeps them up? Is it not the old liar, the god of this world, who at the beginning said, 'Ye shall not die,' and the virus of whose falsehood still poisons all our souls? Let us not give way to his devices, but, like Him who came to destroy the works of the devil, and this among the rest, let us give this sorrowful but salutary subject a place—at least occasionally—in our thoughts, and also in our communications one with another. Remember what the Psalmist says: 'I will praise Thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart, and I will glorify thy name for evermore; for great is thy mercy towards me, and Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell.'

Think what we learn from Isaiah regarding the place of the lost. Like the valley of Hinnom at Jerusalem, it is without, it is outside the heavenly city. The inhabitants of the New Jerusalem, in order to look on it, have to go forth: 'They shall go forth and look.' Here, in this world, heaven and hell, as it were, meet and intermingle. Here the prince of darkness and the Lord of glory contend hand to hand. Here the emissaries of the pit, and ministering spirits from on high, meet, and strive to counterwork one another. Here there are earnests or beginnings of hell, and earnests or beginnings of heaven. Here the heirs of both meet, and are intermixed in the same families, churches, places of business, and intercourse of life. Here the ways that lead to both places run side by side. This is a blessed truth. As long as God spares the travellers on the broad way, they are within the reach of those who are walking in the narrow way; and we can call them, beseech them to come with us; we can stretch forth our hand, and try to pluck them as brands from the burning; we can implore the God of all grace to shine into their hearts, and turn them from darkness to light.

But there and then all this is changed. Heaven and hell are now totally and finally separated. Yonder is the New Jerusalem, but it is walled in with salvation, shut in by its gates of praise; and there, deep deep down,—where there is the smoke of their torment, and the sound of their ceaseless wailing,—there is the place of the lost; but there is no ladder, no way of communication between them. Yonder is the balmy light of God and of the Lamb, so that they need no sun to shine, or moon to enlighten them; and there, down there, is thick, utter, unchanging darkness, but no ray from the upper glory penetrates and illumines the overhanging cloud. Yonder is the river of the water of life, pure as crystal, and the children of immortality drinking their fill, and eating the fruit of its trees of life; and down there are thirsty, parched multitudes, ceaselessly crying, Water, water! but no stream, no drop of the blessed river ever reaches to them. Yonder is the Saviour of the lost, who was ever employed in washing, and healing, and setting sinners free; and there, down there, are multitudes of guilty, unrighteous, filthy captives, the iron entering into their souls, and making them cry out for deliverance; yet He never goes to their help; for He has said, 'He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still.' Yonder are faithful, earnest ministers, and gracious, loving saints, who lived and laboured, when on earth, to gather souls for glory; and there, down there, are the very persons they used to warn and entreat; but they are silent now. They no longer say, 'Turn ye, turn ye; why will ye die?' for He who sent them with the glad tidings, has now recalled their commission, and has said, 'They are joined to their idols; let them alone.' O wretched inmates of the pit, ye have got your wish! We entreated, urged you to come in: we told you of the open door, the prepared feast, the certain, loving welcome; we told you that yet there was room, though it was late, very late, but ye would not come; and now ye have got your wish, for you are become Anathema—totally and eternally separated from all that is good, and righteous, and holy! O blessed dwellers in Zion, the world thrust you out, counted you unworthy; and now the world is thrust out, and counted unworthy.

The sufferings of the lost in their own place. You see it here. They are without—wholly and for ever separated from all that is good, and glorious, and happy, and pure. This, if there were nothing more, would be an eternal woe. But it is not only a place of loss, it is also a place of suffering; and such suffering!—the worm corrupting and devouring, the fire consuming and destroying! Mark the universality of the suffering,—the worm of remorse gnawing the soul,—the fierce fire consuming, but never annihilating the body! Mark the duration of the suffering,—the worm never dieth, the fire never is quenched! 'Who can dwell with the devouring fire? who can lie down with everlasting burnings?' Sufferings here, however varied and severe, are no preparation for this, and they give no exemption. Our trials on earth are but empty shadows, the feeble beginnings of evil. There has been nothing comparable to this, but the sufferings of Christ upon the cross; and nothing can save us from it, but faith in his wounds, and bruises, and chastisement. We are redeemed with his precious blood. He loved us, and washed us with his blood. This is the burthen of the songs of the saved, this is the spring of their everlasting love:

> 'Yes, I love Him, who for me
> Died upon the fatal tree;
> Died to save my soul from hell:
> Yes, I love my Saviour well!'

The use God makes of the place of the lost. This may seem to some a harsh expression, but it is a right and true one. God expects and requires a revenue of glory from all his works, and He cannot be baulked of his purpose. He has made all things for himself—even the wicked for the day of evil. Paul says in Romans: 'What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured, with much long-suffering, the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction?' His work of grace shows the exceeding riches of his mercy; his work of glory shows the exceeding riches of his love. But his work of vengeance will have its lessons and teachings too. In this place the prophet describes the eternal Sabbath of the saints, and some of their employments in it: 'They shall go forth, and look upon the lost.' How willingly would these unhappy ones avoid this aggravation of their woe! The Lord indicates this, when He says, 'There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, and you yourselves thrust out.' I wonder not that they cry, 'Rocks fall on us, hills cover us!' But this cannot be; they also must minister to the glory of God. The redeemed shall look on them; shall turn over this page of divine manifestation. They will here see the truth of God. He had said at the beginning, 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die.' Satan said, 'This shall not be,' and foolish men believed his lie; but now, lo! it is all true. They see the righteousness of God. He said that He would render to every one according to his works; but men did not believe this; they thought there was no marking of iniquity, no retribution for sin. But now, lo! it is all true: and there are degrees of punishment in the place of the lost; for some are suffering a doom more intolerable than others. They look, and they get fresh fuel for their thankfulness. 'Oh, to grace how great a debtor!' They look, and see the holiness of God, and they join with new earnestness in the old song: 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord.' They look, and their hatred of sin is intensified, when they see it ripe and run to fruit; and they wonder that they could have been so long fascinated and enslaved by it.

'Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men.' Our words are poor and feeble; but oh, the reality, the dread reality! Ye who are taken up with the present, and in whose minds these things have neither place nor power, will you not begin to think, believe, fear, and flee? May the Holy Ghost convince you of judgment! You who do sometimes think of these things, but have never broken loose from the entanglements of the world and the flesh—you are still cleaving to Sodom, and lingering in it. O foolish and deceived, will a little longer enjoyment of the right hand and the right eye compensate for an eternity of the undying worm and unquenchable fire? You who, through grace, have fled for refuge, and been plucked as brands from the burning, will you not be growingly earnest in glorifying your God, and in trying to save your fellow-men? Be faithful, diligent; be ready, in season, out of season, to speak for Christ; improve opportunities, watch for them—they are constantly occurring. The thousand eddies and swirls of daily life are ever throwing them before us, if we had only the quick eye, the willing heart, and the cleaving to the Master. Let this be your daily prayer: 'Waken morning by morning; waken mine ear to hear as the learned, that I may speak a word in season to every weary soul.'

SAVING THE LITTLE FOLKS:

A CONVERSATION BETWEEN A MOTHER AND HER PASTOR.

MOTHER.—Good morning, reverend sir. Please walk in and be seated.

Pastor.—In my visitations from house to house among my parishioners, I make no long or formal prefaces or introductions. My first inquiry is, How is your soul? and I usually begin with the 'lambs of the flock.' Where is little Ella, your angel daughter? Is she safe in the ark on the way to glory, mounting up as on eagles' wings?

Mother.—You surprise me, my dear pastor; Ella, you are aware, is only four years of age.

Pastor.—True. Yet, notwithstanding, is she saved in Jesus? Does she love prayer, praise, things heavenly and divine? Is her soul alive in God spiritually? Has the atoning sacrifice been savingly applied to her young heart?

Mother.—Am I to understand you to mean regeneration—the passing from death unto life?

Pastor.—Certainly, sister, a change from nature to grace, the setting apart exclusively Godward,—sealed unto the day of redemption.

Mother.—You astonish me! What! this daughter of mine, so early in life, know God experimentally?

Pastor.—Does not this little one of yours know good from evil? Has she not arrived at an age of moral accountability? Has she not the power to choose the good and refuse the evil? When she sins, does she not sin voluntarily against light and knowledge? If so, she holds the truth in unrighteousness,—is brought under condemnation,—exposed to wrath every moment.

Mother.—Do you mean, beloved pastor, by what you say, this daughter of mine is in danger of eternal punishment, where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched?

Pastor.—What saith the Scripture? 'Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish.' 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die.' 'Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire' (Matt. vii. 19). 'There is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law, shall also perish without law' (Rom. ii. 11, 12).

Mother.—What does this child of mine know of repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ—of living a holy life?

Pastor.—She ought to know, and does know, very much of God's requirements, if your duty has been discharged faithfully in family discipline. See Deut. vi. 6, 7, 8, 9. Does not little Ella know how to sin,—disobey her parents? When she disobeys you, manifests deceit, falsehood, and ill-temper, does not her conscience bear witness of the same, and her thoughts meanwhile accuse her? Does it require more intellect to repent of sin than to commit sin? When your little girl comes to you penitently for a wrong-doing, saying, 'Mamma, I have been disobedient—I am sorry—will you forgive me? I will do so no more,'—you clasp the penitent one to your bosom, saying, 'Forgive you, dear Ella? Certainly, with all my heart.' Does not the child feel and know she is restored to your favour? You see it in every look, thought, word, and action. Her young heart leaps joyfully.

Mother.—Very well, what is the inference?

Pastor.—If Ella knows how to confess her sins to you, and put them away, and how to believe that she is accepted of you meanwhile, what greater reasoning powers are required to confess her sins to God, and to believe that He, for Jesus' sake, washes her little soul white in the blood of the Lamb?

Mother.—This is a new idea. Is it possible that such a little creature of a thing can become a true follower of Jesus—walk in his footsteps, brightly, shiningly, gloriously?

Pastor.—It is glorious, and not less true than glorious, that children should be placed in the arms of the Saviour at the first dawning of infantile life.

Mother.—Sir, am I to understand you to mean by these expressions, that all children can be so indoctrinated in truth and love as little Samuel was, or as John the Baptist, who grew up in the Lord, without permitting Satan to find any permanent lodgment in their hearts?

Pastor.—Exactly so. What absurdity is there in supposing that children are to grow up in Christ? Why should the enemy of all good, the old serpent, the devil, the father of lies, be permitted to enter into the hearts of our sweet little angel babes, and dwell there with his hellish crew of evil passions, till the whole being is saturated with 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life?'

Mother.—It is commonly assumed (if I mistake not) that children are to grow up in sin, to be converted to God in after life.

Pastor.—I know it, sister; but is this of God? What system of education more baneful, soul-ruinous than this, that a child is to reject God and all holy principles till he arrives at a mature age,—than the doctrine that children must first give their hearts to work wickedness with greediness, 'sin as with a cart rope,' drink in iniquity as the ox drinketh in water, some four, six, eight or ten years, before bowing to King Jesus,—form habits of evil-doing that are more difficult to eradicate than for the Ethiopian to change his skin or the leopard his spots?

Mother.—You remember when parents brought their 'little ones' to Jesus, that He should take them to his bosom, lay his hands on them, and pray, that his own disciples rebuked these same parents for so doing, and the blessed Saviour replied, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'

Pastor.—I do; and the same cruel unbelief is abroad in all the land. Tell parents it is their duty and privilege to train their offspring unreservedly Godward from the first dawning of moral accountability, what will be the answer? 'If the Lord would make windows in heaven, this thing might be' (2 Kings vii. 2).

Mother.—I begin to see wherein I have erred, and why it is we are so often deficient in Christian character, or outward beauty. It is this: Our religion begins so late in life, we are compelled to maintain a perpetual and unequal warfare with previous habit. To make a graceful and complete Christian character, it needs itself to be the habit of existence, not a grape grafted on a bramble; and this requires a Christian childhood in the subject.

Pastor.—You have hit the nail, sister! What authority have you from the Scriptures to tell your child, or by any sign to show him, that you do not expect him truly to love and obey God till after he has spent whole years in hatred and wrong? What authority is there to make him feel that he is the most privileged of all human beings,—capable of sin, but incapable of repentance; old enough to resist all good, but too young to receive any good whatever? Wherein would it be less incongruous for you to teach your child that he is to lie and steal, go the whole round of vices, and then, after he comes to mature age, reform his conduct by the rules of virtue?

Mother.—Pastor beloved, another query arises. It is this: Suppose our 'little ones' do grow up uniformly in the Lord, through our obedience in training, and the holy atmosphere in which they are surrounded; not knowing the precise time when the spiritual change takes place from nature to grace, is it not almost certain they will relapse, lose the holy unction, fall into temptation, sip of the muddy streams of sensuality, do things utterly subversive of gospel purity and simplicity?

Pastor.—'Happy is the man that feareth always.' Danger is on every side. There is no safety or security for any little folks or great folks, save on the wing of love and mercy; following on to know the Lord, rising higher and higher, shining brighter and brighter to the perfect day. It is faith now, prayer for ever. It is doing good now, it is doing good for ever. What I say to one, I say to all—Watch—WATCH! Meanwhile, let me assure you, beloved sister, there is far less danger of departing from the living God in the cases referred to, than of those who are converted in after life, and whose habits of sin are deeply rooted. Let the lambs of Jesus be carried in the bosom of nursing fathers and nursing mothers, they grow in grace constantly, add to their faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, godliness, brotherly kindness, charity—all that is true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report. One such 'will chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight.'

THE WORLDLING'S END.

THERE is something almost startling in that parable concerning the rich man suddenly called to die, while felicitating himself on the extent of his possessions. You seem to see the lost soul, worn and wasted with evil getting and evil keeping, rush past the gate of heaven down to eternal beggary and shame. I never read the story but memory brings up one in whose case, living and dying, a parallel is found.

The wife of one of the wealthiest business men in our land, the mistress of an establishment where grandeur found its very incarnation, and towards which many enviously looked; a Christian servant one day ventured to call the fashionable woman's attention to those better things which God hath prepared for such as love Him. Glancing around her magnificent apartments, and the beautiful grounds without, she impatiently exclaimed: 'That is all the heaven I care about, or want!'

A few years passed; and amid the same scenes, haggard and worn, beauty all gone from the face, joy all faded from the eye, she lay winding up her earthly days. Racked with pain of body, pierced with deeper agony of mind, the dying woman lifted her hands and shrieked in an attendant's ear: 'Oh! had I but the hope of heaven, I would welcome death this very hour!'

Poor, wasted, wretched, hopeless soul, the taper lights of this world all gone out, and ahead the blackness of darkness for ever!

THE MILLENNIAL SABBATH.*

PEACE reigned. Antipathies of kind were now
Things of the past. The wolf and yearling lamb
Were playmates; and the leopard and the kid
Gamboll'd together on one knoll; the steer
And lion grazed one herbage, and the ox
Couch'd with the bear on one luxurious sward.
Nor of the advent of the Prince of Peace
Lack'd the calm sea its symbols, nor the sky.
Dolphins and sharks in many a sunny creek
Together bask'd at noon; and glittering shoals
Made mirth around the huge leviathan.
Nor less, as I have seen, the king of birds,
Would bear the cushat dove upon its wings
Into the morning sunlight; while beneath
The swallow and the vulture only vied
In speed, disporting o'er the woods and waves.
And now in air and ocean, as on earth,
A holy fear of man, Nature's true priest,
Subdued all creatures to his will. His word
Was law. Even the infant stretch'd its hand,
Its tiny hand, towards the cockatrice,
Now seen, now hidden in its den; and children
Play'd with the innocent asp, wreathing a coil
Of burnish'd gold and opal round the neck,
Or as a bracelet round the dimpled arm.
Freed from the curse, the grateful garden gave Its fruits in goodly revenue. Nor frost,
Nor blight, nor mildew fell; nor canker-worm
Nor caterpillar marr'd one ripening hope.
The clouds dropp'd fatness. The very elements
Were subject to the prayerful will of those Whose pleasure was in unison with God's.
There winter was as summer: summer there,
Attemper'd with soft dews and cooling winds,
Appear'd in sevenfold glory; for the moon
Was as the sun in that pellucid air—
The sun as seven days' light in one condensed.
And when the sun had set, nor moon had risen,
The lesser glories of the stars shone forth,
As flames fair Venus in the eastern heavens,
Or lordly Jupiter.

War was unknown;
The brotherhood of nations unrelax'd:
Swords now were ploughshares, spears were pruning-hooks,
And all the enginery of battle shown
As trophies of the victory of love.
Babel's confusion was unlearn'd. And one
Melodious language, wherein every thought
Found utterance, overspread the circling globe,
A language worthy of the sons of God.
No labour now was lost. Commerce diffused
From pole to pole the gifts of every clime,
And spread her sails to every wind that blew,
Though love, not greed of lucre, held the helm.
But chiefly to Jerusalem and fro
The drift of ceaseless traffic set; for there
David, vicegerent, sate on David's throne;
And on their thrones of judgment round about,
Judging the tribes of Israel, the twelve,
Who sometime suffer'd with a suffering Lord,
Reign'd in his glorious reign. Mercy and truth
Met in his presence: righteousness and peace
Kiss'd each the other underneath his eye.
His people were a royalty of priests,
And offer'd in his temple ceaseless prayer
And incense of uninterrupted praise.
Thither the nations flock'd. There every doubt
Was solved: there perfect equity held sway.
No wrong, but there was instantly redress'd;
No right, but there was gloriously confirm'd:
For Zion was the mercy-seat of earth,
The footstool of the throne of God; where faith
Had clearest evidence of things unseen,
And hope climb'd easiest up the golden stairs
Scaling the heavens, and love, pure passionate love,
Saw the Beloved One, and was at rest.

* From a volume entitled, 'Yesterday, To-day, and for Ever:' A poem, in twelve books, by E. H. BICKERSTETH. A book full of scriptural truth and striking description.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

SMOOTH EVERY WAVE.

Words by HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. Music from HERING.

Met. 96 = ♩

TREBLE.
Smooth ev' - ry wave this heart with - in; Let ALTO.
TENOR.
Smooth ev' - ry wave this heart with - in; Let BASS.
ACCOMP.
no - - - - - dark tem - pest ga - - ther there;
no - - - - - dark tem - pest ga - - ther there;

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

Calm ev' - ry rip - ple, till my sea Be,
Be,
like - - - - the po - lish'd sil - ver, fair. Calm like - - - - the po - lish'd sil - ver, fair.

One word of old still'd raging wind,
And "Peace, be still," subdued the wave;
Let that dear word again be heard,
And let the tempest cease to rave.

Jesu! thy word is mighty still,
Creation knows it; let this heart
Know it in all its grace and power,
Till every tumult thence depart.

DIVINE FATHERHOOD.

LET us only 'perceive the love' which has been the handmaid of infinite wisdom, in effectuating its mighty plan, that 'mercy and truth' should 'meet together,' and 'righteousness and peace kiss each other;' that there should be an harmonious blending of all the attributes of God, in the adoption into his family of guilty, polluted, hell-deserving sinners, 'by nature the children of wrath, even as others;' let us but realize to ourselves that there is blessed truth in the statement of Scripture, that by simple faith in the incarnate embodiment of his love, we become the children of God; let the Holy Spirit, whose objective witness we have in the word, that, 'To as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe in his name,' bring us subjectively under his new creating influences, begetting within us the faith which believes this truth, and which appropriates the Christ presented in it; then is it witnessed to our spirits that 'we are the children of God,' enabling us to address Him as 'Abba Father.'

'If God were your Father,' says Jesus, 'ye would love me.' And wherefore? Because the lips which spake these words could also proclaim: 'I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me.' 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest,' is an invitation often quoted, without its immediately following or preceding context; and thus the teaching character of the gracious Inviter, and the great lesson to be taught, as set forth in the passage, are lost sight of. 'Learn of me,' are words which bring us to the feet of Jesus, like Mary, to hear his word; and that word is the weighty and blessed truth under consideration: 'No man knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him . . . Come unto me . . . Learn of me.' This was the very essence of the Messiah's mission. 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him.' Here is the resting-place of faith. Here it finds the promised 'rest' of the passage just quoted—in the bosom of the Father's love.

After the transactions of Calvary (to which attention has been so fully directed) had terminated, and the Lord Jesus could stand forth as the representative Son in resurrection, 'the first-begotten of the dead,' 'the first-born among many brethren,' we find that, though all his disciples had been ashamed of Him in his hour of need, He is not ashamed of his brethren; and as the closing act of his life had been one of characteristic homage to all that was 'written concerning Him,' when, knowing that all things 'were accomplished,' in order that one remaining scripture might be fulfilled, He saith, 'I thirst,' so in the risen Saviour we may see the same reverence for, and devout reference to, the written word. 'I will declare thy name unto my brethren,' was a prophecy concerning Him, which his loving heart hastens to fulfil the very moment that He leaves behind Him the grave-clothes and the tomb. 'Go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father:' his Father in resurrection, our Father as 'begotten again by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.' Thus, as the lips of a woman, into whom Satan had entered, first brought sin and death to her husband, so a woman, out of whom 'seven devils had been cast,' bears from the lips of the risen Bridegroom, for the comfort of his church—his bride—in all ages, the announcement of the blessed fact, that the fatherhood of God was for ever established in the brotherhood of Jesus. Self-evident, then, must be the proposition of our blessed Lord alluded to: 'If God were your Father, ye would love me.'

If we thus love Jesus, let Him tell, in his own wondrous language, the glorious issues of such love: 'If ye love me, keep my commandments: and I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, and He shall abide with you for ever . . . He shall be in you.' Again: 'He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father; and I will love him, and manifest myself to him.' And again, on a question as to this manifestation: 'If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.'

The realized influential inabiding of the Father, Son, and Spirit in the heart is thus made to result from the entwining of its loyal affections around Him, whom we have traced into eternity as, by anticipation, having his 'delights with the sons of men;' whom, loving his own unto the end, we have followed through all the stages of his abode on earth, from the cradle onward,—persevering on the pathway of obedience until, on Calvary, that obedience was consummated, and the Father's ultimate end, as concerned himself, and his church in Him, had been attained, when He could say of all that He was to do and suffer, 'It is finished.'

Now, and not till now, was there opened a channel of holiness and righteousness, through which mercy, in the yearnings of pitying love, could reach us, so as to meet our need and remedy our ruin.

On turning to our Lord's concluding intercessory prayer, as likely to minister appropriate thought on the subject in hand, it would appear that the variations in the three titles given to Him whom He addresses may throw light thereupon. When speaking more immediately of his own glory, and the result of his personal ministry to his chosen ones, and when formally presenting them as the objects of his prayer, the appellation is simply that of 'Father;' but when the marvels of his grace, in his thoughts of love towards them, are to be unfolded in such full and blessed detail, when the sanctification of his people is to be brought out through the previous sanctification of himself, the mystery of union propounded—the Father in Him, and He in the Father, that his people might be one in them. He in them, and the Father in Him, that they might be made perfect in one; and again, by a necessary law of grace, the glory appertaining to Him as the Head, belonging to them as the members; and all this made traceable to the fact, that the Father had loved them as He had loved Him—with all this 'travail of his soul' and resulting satisfaction, as 'the joy which was set before Him,' the endurance of the cross must needs object itself to his view; the cup of Gethsemane and the averted countenance of his God on Calvary—the pleasure of the Lord 'to bruise Him'—must be realized, as to be encountered by Him, ere 'the pleasure of the Lord,' in securing for his people such glorious privileges, could 'prosper in his hand.' The language of the men of Bethshemeah may well express the feelings of 'the Man of sorrows,' when thus about to take the realized 'chastisement' of his people's 'peace upon Him:' 'Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?'

This long concatenation of privilege and blessing is, in a marked manner, it would appear, purposely linked with the holiness and righteousness of God. 'Holy Father' ushers in, from the Lord's lips, this wondrous passage, as 'Righteous Father' concludes it. 'How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? How shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me; my repentings are kindled together.' One is tempted here to exclaim, Behold the perplexity of Love! Where and how is it to be resolved? Look to Calvary, and there contemplate what may be termed the ingenuity of Love, in that combined harmonious action thereof with Justice, which we have been contemplating, as there displayed. The 'heart' mentioned here is that of Him who could say, with the cross fully in view, 'I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!' The heart turned inwards, with its kindled repentings, must find vent outwards. Love, as a burning fire, shut up in the bones, is weary with forbearing, and cannot stay; it must speak; and when it does, in language of grace and mercy, to cheer the heart of sinners, let us note, in the answer to the pathetic queries of this passage, how great a prominence is given to the holiness of God. 'I, the Holy One in the midst of thee, will not execute the fierceness of mine anger; I will not return to destroy Ephraim: for I am God, and not man.' 'I am God and man' might also be added, as the glorious fact, which we have seen to be the warrant of Love to act in a world of sin, while Justice sits by, endorsing all with the smile of its entire approval! Thus 'Israel was not forsaken, nor Judah, of his God, of the Lord of hosts; though their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel.'

The covenant of mercy and truth with David, or rather with the Son of David, was verified on the oath of God's holiness; and it has been well remarked on the words, 'I have sworn in my holiness,' that this attribute is engaged in every promise. We may now, in this view, understand how, in Psalm ciii., the removal of 'our transgressions from us,' 'as far as the east is from the west,' is in immediate context with mercy extended toward us, great as is the height of heaven above us; yea, the experience of continuously forgiving, healing, redeeming, crowning, satisfying mercy, and the yearning pity of paternal love. The attributes of holiness and righteousness are made to form an integral part in the melody of this incomparable song of praise: 'Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me bless the name of his holiness.' 'His righteousness is unto children's children.'—Hon. S. R. Maxwell.

'IT IS I.'*

In sorrow's dark and dreary hour,
Be Thou, O Jesus, nigh,
To dry the eye bedimmed with tears,
To whisper, 'It is I.'

When all life's cherished hopes are fled,
When loved ones fade and die,
Be near to soothe our bleeding heart,
To whisper, 'It is I.'

When laid upon a bed of pain,
Oh! listen to our cry;
Bid all our anxious fears depart,
And whisper, 'It is I.'

When all around is gloomy night,
When clouds obscure our sky,
Oh! may we hear thy gentle voice,
Fond whisp'ring, 'It is I.'

Then, though the winds and billows rage,
We will the storm defy;
For still we'll hear thy voice of love,
Soft whisp'ring, 'It is I.'

When those we love do faithless prove,
Do Thou their place supply;
Oh! bid us trust thy deathless love,
And whisper, 'It is I.'

When passing through the vale of death,
We'll on thy love rely;
Thou wilt sustain our trembling heart,
And whisper, 'It is I.'

And when we see Thee face to face,
In our loved home on high,
Then shall we praise our Saviour-God,
Who whispered, 'It is I.'

* From a volume of very soothing and scriptural pieces, entitled, 'Under a Cloud, by one who knows what Shadows are.'

Miscellaneous.

The Soul's Range.

HIGH walls and huge the body may confine,
And iron grates obstruct the prisoner's gaze;
And massive bolts may baffle his design,
And watchful keepers eye his devious ways;
Yet scorns the immortal mind this base control!
No chain can bind it, and no cell enclose,
Swifter than light it flies from pole to pole,
And in a flash from earth to heaven it goes.
It leaps from mount to mount. From vale to vale
It wanders, plucking honeyed fruits and flowers.
It visits home to hear the fireside tale,
Or in sweet converse pass the joyous hours.
'Tis up before the sun, roaming afar,
And, in its watches, wearies every star.

The Good Regent of Scotland.—His lot had been cast in the midst of convulsions, when, at any moment, had he cared for personal advantages, a safe and prosperous career lay open to him; but, so far as his conduct can be traced, his interests were divided between duty to his country, duty, as he understood it, to God, and affection to his unfortunate sister. France tried in vain to bribe him, for he knew that the true good of Scotland lay in alliance and eventual union with its ancient enemy; and he prepared to be used, trifled with, or trampled on by Elizabeth, to being the trusted and valued friend of Catherine de Medici. In all Europe there was not a man more profoundly true to the principles of the Reformation, or more consistently—in the best sense of the word—a servant of God. His house was compared to a 'holy temple,' where no foul word was spoken.—Froude.

Exaggerations.—I dislike exaggerations. They are positive falsehoods, and ought to be shunned as such. They are generally made use of to make an impression and to carry a point. But an impression made in such a way must be untrue; and a point carried in such a way can bring no blessing. I dislike the exaggeration of statistics. They have been greatly in use of late years; but in many cases they are so one-sided, not to say incorrect, that they cannot be of any weight with calm and candid men.

Ritualism.—We have no longer any right to speak of our national Protestant church; it is not Protestant; it tolerates barefaced Popery, and swarms with worshippers of the God whom the baker bakes in the oven, and whom they bite with their teeth. Not many streets from the house in which we are assembled, you may have your candles, and your incense, and your copes, and your albs, with all the other pomps and vanities of the detestable idolatry of Rome. That Romanism against which Latimer bore testimony at the stake, has been suffered to hold its mummeries, and practise its fantastic tricks, in the name of this nation, until it counts its deluded admirers by tens of thousands. That monster, which stained Smithfield with gore, and made it an ash-heap for the martyrs of God, has come back to you. The old wolf that rent your fathers, and tore their palpitating hearts out of their bosoms, you have suffered to come back into your house, and you are cherishing it, and feeding it with your children's meat. Once again the harlot of Babylon flaunts her finery in our faces almost without rebuke. Do not tell me it is not Popery; it is the self-same Antichrist with which your fathers wrestled—and a man with but half his wits about him may see it to be so; and yet this land bears it, and rejoices in it, and crouches at the foot of a priest once more. Our great ones, our delicate women, and dainty lords, are once again the willing vassals of priestcraft and superstition; and amid all this, if any one speaks out, he is assailed as uncharitable, and abhorred as a troubler in Israel. Is it for nothing that God has favoured this land with the gospel? Must all her light be turned to darkness? Must all the gains of the valiant men of old be lost by the sloth and cowardice of this thoughtless generation? In days of yore, men like Knox and Welch in Scotland, and Hugh Latimer and John Bradford, fought like lions for the truth; and are we to yield like coward curs? Are the men of oak succeeded by the men of willow? The men who cried, 'No Popery here!' now sleep within their sepulchres, and their descendants wear the yoke which their fathers scorned. Shall not God visit us for this? I would that a voice of thunder could arouse this slumbering generation!—Spurgeon.

Whether would you Die on Land or Sea?—There was once a great storm, and the ship was in much danger. Many of the passengers were terribly frightened; but one sailor was as calm as if the sun were shining above, and the sea undisturbed below. 'Are you not afraid?' said one of the passengers. 'No,' replied the sailor; 'why should I be afraid?' 'We may all be drowned,' said the passenger. 'All of us have once to die,' calmly returned the sailor. The passenger was surprised to see the man's composure. 'Have you followed the sea long?' he asked. 'Ever since I was a boy; and my father followed it before me.' 'Indeed! and where did your father die?' 'He was drowned at sea,' replied the sailor. 'And your grandfather, where did he die?' 'He was also drowned at sea,' said the sailor. 'Father and grandfather drowned at sea!' exclaimed the passenger in astonishment; 'and you not afraid to go to sea!' 'No; God is everywhere,' said the sailor reverently. 'And now,' he added, after pausing a moment, 'may I ask you where your father died?' 'In his bed,' replied the passenger. 'And where did his father die?' 'In his bed,' was again answered. 'Are you not, then, afraid to go to bed,' said the sailor, 'if your father and grandfather both died there?'

Wishes.—At a brilliant literary party in England, a number of years ago, the conversation turned on 'persons one would wish to have seen.' After many great or eccentric names had been mentioned, and duly celebrated, one of the company startled them all by proposing the name of Judas Iscariot; assigning as his reason for so doing, 'I would fain see the face of him who, having dipped his hands in the same dish with the Son of man, could afterwards betray Him. I have no conception of such a thing; nor have I seen any picture (not even Leonardi's very fine one) that gave me the least idea of it.' 'You have said enough, Mr. Lamb, to justify your choice.'

Nature.—Nature preaches cheerfulness in her saddest moods; she covers even forgotten graves with flowers.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Chron. xxi. 1.

We have taken up some general aspects of this narrative, chiefly in connection with the temple and Moriah; let us look at it from another point of view. Let us see the different characters or persons in it. Each comes out in a peculiar way.

I. Satan.—He is very explicitly spoken of here, as in Job and elsewhere, as a person, a true being, not an influence. He is connected with earth; not with its heathen kingdoms only, but with Judea. He is not only in Babylon, but in Jerusalem; he has access not only to Nebuchadnezzar, or Herod, or Nero, but to David. He is watchful; he lies in wait for opportunities. He hated man at first in Paradise. He hates David; he hates Israel; he hates God. 'Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.' Be sober, be vigilant, for your adversary the devil walketh about. He is powerful, cunning, subtle. He is that old serpent, the dragon, the devil, Satan. He will go on with his wiles and malice till the Lord comes to bind him.

II. David.—He is a man of God, yet of like passions with others; exposed to Satan. Mark—(1.) His sin: pride, ambition, self-aggrandizing,—like Nebuchadnezzar, 'Is not this great Babylon?' (2.) His repentance (ver. 8): his conscience is touched; he cries out of his 'iniquity' and 'foolishness,' even before the message of judgment came. (3.) His chastisement and humiliation: he is smitten in the very point of his pride—Israel's numbers; he clothes himself with sackcloth, and falls down before God. (4.) His alarm (ver. 30): he knows not what to do,—the tabernacle is in Gibeon, with the altar of burnt-offering; what is he to do? The sword is between him and it; and besides, it is busy at work, he has no time to go to Gibeon. (5.) His forgiveness (ver. 26): he cannot go to God, but God comes to him—to the spot where he is. He answers his sacrifice by fire; this is forgiveness and acceptance. All is well; the light of God's countenance has returned; the blood of the burnt-offering has done its reconciling work; and on that spot where the blood was shed and the fire came down, Israel's daily propitiation was to be offered up in all days to come.

III. Joab.—He is a rough warrior, often rude in speech and stern in deed. But he is a man of faith. He knows the law of the Lord, and he trembles at his word. He knows that, for certain ends, it was a right thing to number Israel; but here he sees this turned into evil, and used to cherish pride. He remonstrates. His conscience is sensitive in this matter. He sees the sin and the danger. He is bold also, not fearing the wrath of the king; but he is obedient also. We have here the bright side of Joab's character, and learn to think well of him, not only as one of David's mighty men, but as a man of faith and conscience.

IV. Gad.—He and Nathan were David's seers,—his divine counsellors,—two of his statesmen. It does not appear that David consulted Gad about this numbering; or, if he did, he heeded not his advice any more than that of Joab. But now Gad is sent from God to the king. He was, no doubt, a man in communion with God, and was waiting to know the divine will in secret. God comes to him, and gives him his message. It is a twofold one. (1.) Judgment (ver. 10): offering the king his choice of woes. (2.) Of mercy (ver. 18): commanding the altar to be built, a symbol of divine pacification,—forgiveness for David and for Israel through the blood.

V. The elders (ver. 16).—They acknowledge the stroke and the sin: 'It is the Lord.' They clothe themselves in sackcloth, they fall upon their faces. So far as we know, they had not shared David's sin, yet they at once place themselves by his side in confession and humiliation. David had sinned (ver. 8), Israel had sinned (2 Sam. xxiv. 1). They identify themselves with both. It is thus that we should take up a ruler's sin, or a brother's sin, or a nation's sin; not blazoning it abroad in private gossip, or in the newspapers, but taking it on ourselves, and carrying it to God.

VI. Ornan.—A Gentile, a Jebusite, a king (2 Sam. xxiv. 23), owner of Moriah. He is quietly working with his sons, apparently ignorant of what was going on, till he is alarmed by the angel (ver. 20), and astonished by David's visit. He was a believing man—acknowledging not the gods of the Jebusites, but the Lord God of Israel; a generous man—handing over to David freely his own ancestral possessions. He is honoured by God; his land is honoured. He loses his property in the land, but for a marvellous honour. The history of his thrashing-floor—the likelihood that it is the great rock, to this day, under the great mosque. In the temple, in the altar, in the rock, Ornan is held in everlasting remembrance.

VII. The angel.—There are specially three destroying angels mentioned in the Old Testament: he who was sent to Egypt to inflict the plagues; he who was sent to the Assyrian host to slay its myriads; he who was sent to Israel to slay the 70,000. He is the messenger of wrath and vengeance; he comes directly from God; he is like one of those seven, spoken of in the Revelation, that sound the trumpets, or of those who pour out the vials; or like him who launched the symbolic millstone against Babylon the great. Yet, in the case before us, he utters mercy as well as inflicts judgment. He is terrible in his might; yet he bears the message of forgiveness—the forgiveness of Him who is able to save and to destroy.

VIII. Jehovah himself.—He shows himself as the hater of sin, and its avenger, even in his saints. He has a watchful eye over all his people, to bless and to chasten. He has Satan in control, and uses him at pleasure. He has angels in command, and sends them on errands of judgment and mercy. He is holy and righteous, yet pitiful and gracious, not only to Jerusalem, but even to Nineveh. He smites, yet He spares. He chastises, yet He blesses. His tender mercies are over all his works. He has no pleasure in the death of the sinner. He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

THE SECRET POWER;

OR,

MISSIONARY ZEAL FOR ISRAEL.

ONE of the races of the world has been called a fossil; and if to be deeply scored with the traces of a long distant past is fossil-like, the comparison holds good. This race, even to-day, forms the most real picture that could be drawn of the earliest of human ages. Its language, customs, beliefs, and everything about it, takes us back to times when neither Roman nor Greek had come upon the scene, and man was in his infancy.

But a fossil is dead, whereas this nation lives, and seems always to have had more life in it than any other. It has survived all the ancient empires, and is now abreast with the foremost of the modern peoples. In energy, skill, courage, and all those qualities which betoken national life, it is second to none.

Some one has compared it to a ruin, speaking, by indestructible outlines, of a once majestic form, and preserving, in the midst of change and decay, the image of a magnificent history. But a ruin has no juvenescence. It crumbles to dust, and leaves no sign that it ever was. Three or four thousand years sweep the works of man utterly away, and make the grandest city a solitude. In such a sense, this nation is no ruin. Though bearing the evidences of an antiquity which out-dates all other national existence, it is amongst the most progressive of the civilised communities; and, confined to no country, it marks every inch of the earth with its foot-prints. There can be no doubt, therefore, that it is destined to exert immense influence in all human affairs; and it is well that every Christian philanthropist should consider what that influence is likely to be.

No one who knows the Jew will hesitate to say that, wherever he goes, trade is stimulated, intellectual activity is promoted, and social life improves. All his tendencies are in favour at once of order and of freedom.

But how is he likely to act on the moral history of the men he meets? He cannot pass about among them without affecting the hidden springs of their conduct, either for good or for evil, in a degree proportioned to the living force that seems to be a part of his very constitution.

The outward morality of the Jew is, on the whole, such as to justify the best anticipations, as far as that is concerned. It rests upon divine authority as its basis, and hence its power of resistance and continuance.

But the strongest power in man is his religion. This is the vital, formative element in all human history. It is this that decides what each man and each nation really is; and upon this, too, the Jew is evidently destined to exert a conspicuous influence. Religion is mixed up with the very existence of the Jews. In spite of all the sceptical habits into which many of them have fallen, they do not and cannot shake it off; while hundreds of thousands of them are the very type of religious firmness and fidelity. Not to say a word about their past, leaving out of view the fact that all the biblical religion in the world traces its human parentage to them, and that among the witnesses who have offered their blood in defence of the heavenly light, Jewish names stand out as the very embodiment of the martyr spirit,—it must be admitted that the Jews, so far as learning is concerned, are better qualified than any other class of men to interpret a large portion of the divine word. Who are the masters of the Hebrew tongue? Where do Christian colleges look for the best guides in the study of the first sacred language? Gamaliel has the students of the Old Testament still at his feet; and modern Christians must either limit themselves to the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, or else acknowledge their obligation to the Jew as their interpreter.

We see our Jewish brethren, then, pervading all countries, and everywhere carrying with them potent means of usefulness, the greatest of all being their qualification to act on the religious history of mankind. But there is one thing they lack. That one thing is the spiritual life communicated from God through Jesus Christ. So long as they have not this, their own personal relations to God are unsound; and while they must come short of real happiness here and hereafter, they cannot but fail to carry out the high vocation for which in other respects they are so well prepared. Intimate with all the nations, and having in their hands a large portion of the Bible, with a heroic attachment to it as their supreme authority, what might they not do, if they possessed the all-essential condition of true service to man—fervent faith in Christ? Without this, they are like the unwise virgins in the Saviour's parable, who took their lamps, but no oil in them, and could not shed a single ray upon the darkness around.

Why should this be? Is there any reason in the government of God? That pure and beneficent rule offers no excuse for any evil, or even for any deficiency of good. No purpose of God keeps back any of human kind from the full benefits of the kingdom of Christ. David prophesied that all nations should call Him blessed, and the Jews are no exception. All men are under one divine plan, and to all of them the conditions of the highest well-being are the same. The Jew must find this where other men are to find it—in Christ; and by the same means—faith in Christ.

But how is this to come about? Will the ignorance, prejudice, doubt, or unconcern of the Jew be removed by a special interposition of Heaven? If such were the method, it would be at variance with the divine procedure hitherto, as regards the kingdom of Christ; and it would prevent that very interchange of spiritual help which St. Paul refers to as the prescribed means for the conversion of the Jews: 'Even so have these also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy' (Rom. xi. 31).

Perhaps the most sudden and far-reaching conquest over human hearts ever recorded, was that which took place in Jerusalem during the feast of Pentecost, soon after the Saviour's ascension. And this was achieved by preaching. The only miraculous feature of it was what the preachers of this day do not need—the instantaneous familiarity with various languages, so far as that was required for the delivery of the universal message of love. The Jews of this age know all the languages in which Christians can speak to them of Christ, and therefore no miracle of that kind is wanted. Indeed, the divine plan is unique. In all times and in every land, the preaching of the gospel to individuals or to assemblies, by the spoken or the written word, has been the agency approved of God. It has succeeded wherever tried; and not more so among Pagans, or in professedly Christian congregations, than among the Jews. Thousands of those who, like Paul, were once 'in unbelief,' have, like him, 'obtained mercy,' and 'counted all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus;' and though the process may seem slow, there is no other by which conversions are to be accomplished.

With any future working which the Divine Providence may inaugurate on some transcendent scale, we have nothing to do. Ours is the work of to-day, and that work is with the souls of to-day.

If this work were done, and well done, the power of the gospel being fairly tested,—preached earnestly and sensibly, in the life as well as on the lips, to every Jew that a Christian meets,—a few years of such evangelism would overleap ages of expectation. If the gospel is 'the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek,' as St. Paul says it is, then the paucity of conversions proves that the gospel is withheld.

Is it possible that the Christian church withholds the gospel from the descendants of the very men who first gave it to the world? Would that every Christian could answer, No! The gospel is withheld when there is not a true exhibition of it in every part of the Christian's daily life. It is withheld when it is not preached in its own humble and loving spirit. It is withheld when mixed with human crotchets. It is withheld when confined to some favourite sphere, or kept within any limit whatever. It is withheld by every individual who knows it, and does not do something to spread it.

This unfaithfulness on the part of Christian people assumes a variety of shapes; and with reference to the Jew, it often takes shelter under special prejudice. But the cause is always the same, and so is the sin. The root of the evil is the want of the missionary spirit. Let any one test his own customary reasons for not helping in this field of Christian enterprise, and he will find that the theories offered in defence of neglect, and the instances of disappointment often quoted as its apology, are nothing but excuses for what a single true missionary impulse would put to the blush.

It is not requisite that any peculiar theory should be held as to the future of the Jews, or that any extravagant interest in that one people should be entertained, in order to feed Christian zeal on their behalf. All that is wanted is what every other department of evangelistic work demands, and what the whole church at this moment needs for its own inward health. The missionary fire is kindled and kept in flame by love to Christ. The stronger and the tenderer that love, the more generous and all-embracing will be its missions. We can do nothing without it—everything with it. If we are to preach to the Jew as his forefathers preached to the Gentiles, and with like effect, we must first drink love from love's fountain. We must come nearer to Christ, and open the heart, each day anew, for fresh inspiration from Him. No one asks a planet to shine. It shines because its path is amidst the radiance of the sun. Are we living in the element of Christ's love? Then we shall never want asking and urging to make his love known. Till this love has the sway, all activity and self-denial for Christ is ungenial, and the attempt at it is a poor, laboured pretence. But as it deepens its kingdom in the soul, missionary effort follows, as flowers and fruits follow the buds of spring. Nay, the figure breaks down, because flowers fade, and fruits pass away. But missionary zeal is not necessarily subject to seasons of decay. As piety ripens, zeal for souls gains fervour and force. All spiritual growth is growth in qualification for Christian work; and growth is the very law of the spiritual life. Wherever signs appear of inertness, indifference, or lack of generosity towards any true Christian mission, the true remedy is the revival of love to Christ. This revival must be sought importunately at the feet of Christ himself. To get the love of Christ enlarged, intensified, and firmly rooted in the hearts of his followers, should now be the object constantly in view in preaching, in united prayer, and in private devotion. Nothing but this will make the church faithful in its duty to Jew and Gentile. This is the secret power.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XIII. — COMMON LODGING-HOUSES.

WHILE reading lately Mission Life in the Islands of the Pacific, I found it there stated, that during the heathen state of Raratonga, each tribe herded and slept in one large shed, the length of which was in proportion to their numbers. Also, that the practice of a whole clan thus herding together led to the most reckless and licentious habits among them.

It was further stated, that the extraordinary improvement which took place in the social habits and moral life of the Raratongans, was due in a great measure to the laborious and successful efforts put forth by one of the missionaries to improve the dwellings of the people, and separate them into families, each having a cottage to itself.

It was not, however, until the gospel had quickened their moral natures, that the natives could be induced to build separate houses,—not till then were they able to understand and long for the comforts of a home.

As I read these and other statements, I could not help thinking how far this isle, which so lately emerged from heathen darkness, had got in advance of our own, which has so long been basking in the full blaze of gospel day; for this promiscuous herding together of men, women, and children, though no longer obtaining in Raratonga, is yet to be found, with amazing frequency, in Scotland.

Not only in its large towns, but also in many of its smaller ones, numbers of people, young and old, married and single, are crowded together, not always, indeed, in a large room, but what is far worse, a small one. The results are similar. Much of the same recklessness and licentiousness prevails which once characterized Raratonga.

I remember well my first visit to one of these 'common lodgings,' as it happened to be on rather a grand scale.

The partitions between three or four rooms, on the first floor of a large tenement, had been removed; and beams, I forget how many, put in here and there, to support the roof, gave it quite the appearance of a large hall. The fireplace and two windows occupied one end, while, all round the rest of the room, beds were ranged so closely, that the foot-board of one formed the head of another. Down the centre two rows were arranged in the same manner. Except a space of seven or eight feet, fronting the fire, it was literally full of beds, without screen or covering of any kind. And in that room, night after night, were assembled people of both sexes and of all ages, while the only rule enforced was, payment for these beds before taking possession.

'Common lodgings' on this gigantic scale are not so often met with as smaller rooms, with from ten to twenty occupants. But even when on this small scale, most of them are hotbeds of iniquity, where moral diseases are developed in their most aggravated forms.

The following account of Mrs. ——, a brief outline of whose history appeared in a former paper, will tend to illustrate this in some measure.

In a district where I visited for some time, there was one house which had for me an attraction peculiar to itself. Its only apparent occupant was a woman of middle age. In personal appearance, language, and manners, she was many degrees above her neighbours. Very industrious also she seemed. I do not remember ever finding her otherwise than busily engaged in some useful occupation, and, what was equally rare in that locality, never once detected the least trace of drink about her.

And yet, I know not how it was, from the first time I talked with her I had the fullest conviction that all this sobriety, industry, etc., were mere appearances, and that her real character did not appear. It was not anything in her conversation that produced this conviction, as I could not say that she was either loquacious or reserved.

As I continued to visit her, she became communicative to a considerable extent, and, without inducement on my part, told me some of her history, and about the piety of her relatives, etc. But localities and names—anything, in short, that would have given definiteness to her statements, were carefully withheld. That her relatives were pious I could readily believe, as it fitted exactly into one of my previously formed notions respecting her.

She had during our intercourse displayed considerable acquaintance with scriptural subjects, but it always occurred to me that she had not acquired this knowledge by personal application, but involuntarily, by mingling with those by whom the truth was both known and loved.

During my earlier visits she frequently expressed a desire to know the truth experimentally, and at times it appeared as if her spirit was stirred. But if there was movement, there certainly was no progress. The door on its hinges seemed to me a most lively emblem of her state.

Month after month I visited and observed, but the mystery remained unravelled. Her character was an enigma which I could not solve. Often I thought of the quaint lines of Quarles:

> 'Tis not an easy trade
> To read or write on hearts:
> They that are skilful in all other arts,
> When they take this in hand
> Are at a stand.'

One day, however, while I sat talking to her as usual, a smallish door, not at all like that leading into another apartment, opened, and a tall woman, exceedingly tipsy, made her appearance.

Baptista Porta, an early physiognomist, says, that he had detected certain facial characteristics possessed by men in common with the lower animals, and that most human faces have a striking resemblance to some particular animal. I was surprised and pleased on first reading these statements, as it had been a favourite amusement in childhood to trace out these resemblances, though quite ignorant at the time that any one else made the same kind of observations.

But without any such tendencies or knowledge of others' opinions, the face of this woman, who had unexpectedly presented herself, was so suggestive of the lamb, that I could not have failed to be struck with it; a strange blending of the demon with that peculiar type of face making it all the more remarkable.

The effect was so far from being agreeable, that I contemplated my proximity to the door with considerable satisfaction, as the gaunt figure advanced a few steps, in rather a menacing attitude.

'I know my Bible as well as you do,' she said, coming to a stand.

'Possibly you may,' I replied, 'perhaps better; but I am afraid your knowledge has done you little good.'

'That I do,' she continued, without heeding the last part of my remark. 'I could repeat it from beginning to end to ye,' and immediately she began to repeat with surprising facility.

Whenever I attempted to speak, she repeated louder and faster, as if determined to give full proof that her statement was true.

'Twas painful to hear parts of Scripture, that to me were associated with most precious memories, so glibly repeated by this drunken creature. So I cut short the unpleasant interview by saying, 'Poor woman, your condition is truly a pitiable one,' and without waiting for a rejoinder, opened the door and left them.

I called soon after to have some explanation of this strange occurrence. It was then that Mrs. Black, the mistress of the house, for the first time told me that she kept lodgers, and that Mrs. ——, whose sudden appearance so startled me, was one of them.

It surprised me also not a little to learn that she had been expressing great anxiety to see me again, being sure, she said, that I would do her good, and wished to know if she might come and speak to me.

I arranged for her to come that evening, and exactly at the time appointed she made her appearance.

I was struck with her subdued demeanour, so unlike that of our previous interview, and the facial resemblance, relieved from its vile combination of the demon, was now complete. I never saw a more lamb-like face.

Poor creature, how different my feelings toward her from those elicited by my visits to Mrs. Black! No mystery hung over her. With all her sins, and they were many, there was a transparency of character which I have rarely found equalled, and this was retained by her even to the end of her sad career.

She began to apologize by saying, that she was quite ashamed to see me again after behaving in such a manner. 'But I needn't say that,' she continued, 'I ought to be more ashamed of being what I am than for anybody knowing it.'

After a while she told me that it was not with the intention of being rude that she came into the room so abruptly, but that she had been listening for some time while I talked with Mrs. Black, 'and it just seemed to take me back,' she said, 'to the time when my godly mother used to speak like that to me.'

'Then you had a godly mother?'

'Oh, yes; my home was a hallowed one. Ah! it is well, well,' she said, weeping, 'that my mother's head was beneath the sod before I came to this.'

Then she spoke of a brother, a godly man, who still had the same farm which her parents occupied, and how much he had done for her. How, after her husband's death, he had set her up in a smallware business, and how well she succeeded for a time, until some of her customers found out her weakness,—drink made her extremely liberal,—and got her to take a glass with them, then made the most of her. This continued until ruin a second time stared her in the face, and she failed.

'And now here I am,' she said, 'going about with a basket, and my good brother knows nothing about me. Ah! if he only knew the heart yearnings I sometimes have to revisit the home of our childhood; but that can never be while I am like this. I hope you will not think that I am expecting to get anything from you. I do not need it. I make a good living, if I could only make a better use of it. But you said that day, when you went away, that mine was a pitiable condition, and you looked as if you did pity me; and oh! if you would do that, and try to help me, it would be more to me than all the money that I could get.'

Who could but pity this hapless victim of strong drink, looking back so wistfully to the purer scenes of her earlier years, and longing so earnestly for help to break the sinful habits that held her back!

Before leaving that evening, she formally pledged herself to take no more drink. This was at my suggestion, as half measures in her case would have been of little service, as will appear from one of her statements.

'I just take one glass, thinking it will do me good; but when I get the first, then I need a second, and when I get the second, I must have the third, and then I'm fit for anything the devil bids me do.'

'How long have you been with Mrs. Black?' I inquired.

'More than a twelvemonth.'

'It's well you are in such a quiet place; you will not have so much opposition as if you were in one of those common lodgings.'

A curious expression passed over her face as she replied, 'It's a quiet place through the day.'

I did not choose to ask any questions, so the matter dropped.

I called several times afterwards, but found her always out; and, on inquiring how she was getting on, was informed that she was doing remarkably well.

After several weeks had elapsed, I met her on the street. 'Will you mind standing here a little?' she inquired; 'I do so wish to speak to you.'

'I must tell you the truth,' she then said; 'I've been taking drink again. I was advised not to tell you, but just to begin again, and you would never know. But I said, No, I cannot be a hypocrite; I will tell her the truth like a woman; and if she will try me again, I trust, the Lord helping me, that no one shall ever see me the worse of drink again.'

There was no attempt made to excuse herself by telling me, as she might have done, how much she was tempted in that iniquitous place where she lodged.

Fully six weeks had elapsed, when she came back saying that she had again fallen. She gave a harrowing account of her state of mind.

'It is just,' she said, 'as if the fires that will burn throughout eternity were already kindled within my soul.'

This agony of mind continued for weeks. What a lively sense she had of her diseased spiritual condition! of her utter helplessness! She was also tormented with the fear that God would not have mercy on her.

She called one evening; and on asking how she was getting on, she replied—

'I was in such distress last night, that the sweat was just hailing off me. I could not sleep, but kept praying the whole night for mercy.'

About a week after this there was a great fall of snow. All day long it had fallen continuously, and gradually, and noiselessly; everything was enveloped in its soft white folds. But, towards evening, the wind blew tempestuously; and ever and anon, its fitful gusts drove the rattling hail with great fury against the windows. Just such a night as makes one feel thankful for a home, or even a place of shelter.

'I shall have no visitors to-night, I'm sure,' I soliloquized, as I arranged my plans for the evening.

Scarcely had the word escaped my lips, when the bell rang. A minute or two more, and Mrs. —— appeared.

'What has brought you out in a night like this?' I inquired, as I looked at the storm-battered figure before me.

An expression of quiet gladness lit up her face, as she said—

'I'm so happy, I could not but come to tell you.'

Then she described the agony she had endured; how completely she was prostrated physically by it; and how, when, at the very worst, a sudden calm crept over her spirit; and then, how the words were spoken to her heart with such power, 'I, even I, am He who blotteth out thy transgressions.'

'I cannot be deceiving myself,' she said, some time after; 'I couldn't make myself feel like this, or I would have done it long ago. And as for the drink, I have no crave for it now, I loathe it instead; I do not think I could taste it, even to save my life. It was not so before; I tried to keep from it, because I knew it was ruining me, but the love of it was still in my heart; but I could not take it now to grieve Him who has had mercy on me.'

A well-known writer speaks of 'the expulsive power of a new affection.' This seemed to me a very good specimen of it.

This sense of spiritual restoration and change proved to be no mere passing feeling. Her spiritual life became more fully developed, while the sweetness and tenderness of her natural disposition, blended with the fragrance of her grateful love, made her a most loveable character.

By some means she became possessed of an old hymn-book, and despite its cinnamon-coloured leaves and dilapidated binding, it became a source of exquisite enjoyment. With what pathos she would repeat her favourite stanzas, such as—

'Here I'll sit for ever viewing
Mercy's streams in streams of blood,
Precious drops my soul bedewing,
Plead and claim my peace with God.

Here it is I find my heaven,
While upon the cross I gaze;
Love I much? I'm much forgiven;
I'm a miracle of grace.'

Then it would be—

'Let me dwell on Golgotha,
Weep and love my life away,
While I see Him on the tree,
Weep, and bleed, and die for me!

How that blood for sinners spilt,
Shows my sin in all its guilt!
Ah! my soul, He bore thy load,
Thou hast slain the Lamb of God.

While I hear this grace revealed,
And obtain a pardon sealed,
All my best affections move,
Wakened by the force of love.'

Or perhaps—

'There is a sacred, hallowed spot,
Oft present to my eye,
Never by me can be forgot—
The place called Calvary.

When fainting under guilt's dread load,
Unto the cross I fly,
And trust the merit of the blood
Which flowed at Calvary.'

One evening she came to tell me that she was about to change her lodgings.

On inquiring the reason, she told me for the first time what Mrs. Black's real character was; how she had successfully tempted her with liquor at the beginning; how she systematically robbed her while under its influence; how gladly she would have left her sooner, but could not, as she seldom had money to pay her lodgings, and so got deeper and deeper into debt. But during these months of sobriety she had been able to clear it all up, and was very glad to get away, as Mrs. Black had used her very cruelly since she could not get her induced to drink.

Another of the lodgers, who had also renounced drink, corroborated this statement, and told me how the poor creature had been tempted to drink in every possible way by Mrs. Black, who most cruelly used her when she would not yield.

Only this morning, she said, after cruel gibing, there was a pailful of cold water thrown over her in bed, with the taunt—

'There, ye water-drinker, there's water to ye.'

'How did she bear it?' I inquired.

'All that she said was "Lord help me," and then rose and put on dry clothes, and went out to get other lodgings.'

The next lodging she went to was kept by one much superior in character to Mrs. Black. But the lodgers were of the same low type, and, with almost diabolical persistency, they set themselves to ensnare her. They did not succeed, however, and were, in no small degree, chagrined thereat.

Month after month she went on in the most satisfactory manner; she acquired a richness and depth of experience; and, owing to her complete command of scriptural language, she had unusual facility in expressing it.

She came to me one evening with the old hymn-book, a leaf being turned down at a particular hymn—one of a deeply experimental nature. Having read it, she told me that it exactly expressed her present experience; then went on talking in such a heavenly strain, but so fully in the spirit of lowliness and love, that I could not but wonder at the grace in her. I am sure, at that time, I entered more fully than ever before into the spirit of the apostle's words, when he said, 'I have no greater joy than to see my children walking in the truth.'

But a sad change was in reversion. The stair of the house in which she lodged, besides being quite dark, was also extremely awkward; one of the lodgers fell down it, and was seriously hurt.

To this woman Mrs. —— devoted herself with great assiduity. How anxious she was that the poor sufferer might be led to the Saviour!

I was unable to visit at the time, so she generally related their conversations to me, that I might suggest anything which might be useful.

Her efforts in this instance were successful; and though death-bed repentances are not the most satisfactory, the old woman appeared to die in peace, resting on the Saviour.

Not long after, a man fell down the same stair while in drink, and had his neck broken. When his dead body was brought upstairs, Mrs. —— fainted. The other lodgers, glad of the opportunity, got whisky, and poured it over her throat; and, before she was so far recovered as to be aware of what they were doing, she had taken such a quantity, as to bring her completely under its influence.

Next day her place in church was vacant. It had been a pleasant thing to see her, Sabbath after Sabbath, in God's house, listening eagerly, and often apparently with deep feeling, to the message of mercy; and, not knowing what had happened, I went to see what was the matter.

Her distress of mind was something awful, as she gave me the above account, the landlady and others confirming her statements.

I told her that I did not consider that she had incurred guilt by taking it under such circumstances, or that her position, spiritually or morally, would be in the least altered, unless she took more voluntarily.

'Oh yes,' she said, with an uncontrollable burst of weeping; 'my state is altered, the crave is come back; I feel as if I cannot keep from taking more of it.' She did take more; and for nearly a fortnight was scarcely ever sober.

While taking a walk in the suburbs one day, I came upon her, wandering about like one demented. How truly it could be said of her, that her 'face was foul with weeping!'

When I spoke, her grief burst out afresh, and all that she seemed able to say was, 'Oh! pray for me, that I may keep my senses.'

She took no more drink while I remained in the town where she lived, but she never recovered her confidence and joy. After I left the place, she kept steady for some time, and then gradually began to fall back into her old habits. Having reached her former level, she went back to lodge with Mrs. Black, who had not meantime been improving in character. For, in addition to the former nightly carousals, Sabbath drinking was added; her house had become a regular shebeen.

In a way which I need not particularise, I became acquainted with some curious facts in regard to the whisky used in those houses on the Sabbath. That there is a difference between it and that procured from the public-house on week-days, is well known to the drinkers themselves; and it is emphatically called by them 'Sunday whisky,' to distinguish it from the other. I need not here state more than is necessary, so I merely say of Mrs. Black's, that a very large proportion of it was vitriol.

One day Mrs. —— had a bottle of pure vitriol served out to her by mistake. She put the bottle to her head, and took a mouthful of it; and although she did not swallow it, her mouth and throat were dreadfully burnt.

On recovering, she left, and went to other lodgings, but the same temptations beset her; and indeed, she seemed now more than ever to lie open to temptation, as she could scarcely endure the painful thoughts which crowded upon her in intervals of soberness.

But in vain she trusted that the flowing bowl 'would banish sorrow.'

Thus completely now within the vortex of the drunkard, Mrs. —— was taking the last turns in the terrible whirlpool. Her new lodging-mistress seemed just the person to finish the work of desolation. When she came home only partially intoxicated, this woman did not rest until she got her to take more; then she could rob her with impunity, both of money and goods. The poor creature had no help then but borrow back her own money, and pay interest of twopence on every shilling, for however short a period it was borrowed.

One Saturday she met a neighbour on the stair, and began pouring out her grievous complaints; told her, also, how much she longed to have a little place of her own, as that was her last hope, etc. But next day she drank no less than 3s. 6d. worth of the vitriolized 'Sunday whisky;' and, before Monday dawned, she was a corpse.

A fitting sequel to this sad story will be found in the tragical death of a vendor of the 'Sunday whisky,'—one from whom Mrs. —— had often procured it, though I am not sure that he supplied the last fatal draught.

His wife left him one evening preparing for the Sunday sale. It was his practice, when so employed, to drink so freely, not of the adulterated, but of the pure material, as to get into that state which the initiated call 'dead drunk.' But being much longer than usual, she got alarmed, and went to try and rouse him, and get him to bed.

What her feelings would be, can be better imagined than described, when she found him lying with his face on the fire! He had fallen forward, and being unable to raise himself, was literally roasted to death.

The preceding narrative, like its predecessors, is simply a relation of facts, differing only in having more than ordinary care bestowed in ascertaining the correctness of such parts of it as did not come under my own immediate observation.

The facts are not such, however, as lie patent to every eye; but whoever will descend low enough to reach the deep under-current of human life, whose dark turbid waters sweep with such velocity through these dead levels of society, to the dread abyss beyond, will find, amid its whirling eddies and terrible quicksands, kindred facts or wrecks, scattered in great profusion.

Perhaps, from the glimpse which is afforded of the difficulties associated with the pursuit of righteousness to those who have recklessly, or otherwise, come under such conditions of life, their sad position will be more vividly realized. Then, as a consequence, the duty ought to be accepted, of using every possible means of making the way easier for these floating wrecks to escape from impending destruction.

In the present overcrowded state of our cities and towns, these 'common lodgings' are perhaps a necessity. But could nothing be done to preserve or inculcate moral purity, to prevent human beings sporting like demons with the horrid fires of passion, which burn and glow in the thick obscurities of such places?

If a few earnest spirits in a heathen land could, in a comparatively short time, accomplish so much; surely if authority were exercised, and influence brought to bear upon this evil, Herculean as it is, it would ultimately disappear.

WILLIAM FAREL,

THE SWISS REFORMER.

CHAPTER VII.

WE now join Farel and Anthony Saunier, who, at the desire of the Bernese government, and protected by a letter from the senate, visited Geneva on their way home from the Vaudois valleys. That there were secret friends of the Reformation in Geneva, Farel was aware; for on October 1, 1531, Zwingle, ten days before his death, wrote to him, saying, 'I learn that Geneva has thoughts of embracing Jesus Christ; were they not restrained by the fear of the Friburgers, they would receive the gospel without delay. The Papists of Geneva, reckoning upon the protection of their allies, imprison the faithful without a hearing, and do them many injuries, no one forbidding it.'

For a long course of years the dukes of Savoy exercised a tyrannical authority over Geneva, until at last, on the 12th of March 1526, at the request of the citizens, sanctioned by their bishop, who was on bad terms with the duke, they were admitted co-burghers of Berne and Friburg. This alliance was productive of much temporal good to Geneva, as by it many improvements in their courts of justice were effected; and, more important still, it was to the Bernese auxiliaries then received within their walls, that the Genevese were indebted for their first knowledge of the reformed doctrines; at least from them they learned to despise Popish ceremonies and images.

Upon their arrival at Geneva, Farel and his companion, Anthony Saunier, held frequent conferences with the reformed party, in consequence of which the canons summoned them before the council, as disturbers of the peace. However, upon showing the Bernese letters, they were shielded from open insult, though commanded not to unsettle the minds of the people further. Forbidden to preach in public, Farel taught those who came to his lodgings. 'The scourge of the priests,' as he was called, was soon ordered to leave the town; but again the letter from Berne, requiring that he and Saunier should be protected, prevailed, the tone of the syndics gradually softened, and they contented themselves by requesting the Reformers to return to their lodgings. Scarcely had they reached them when they were ordered to appear before the grand vicar and the episcopal council. It being evident to the senate that the design of this order was to attack the Reformers when unprotected, they sent two of their members to defend them, accompanied by the bishop's secretary and Robert Olivetan.

Free discussion between the two parties being proposed, the Romish judge objected, saying, 'That would not answer our purpose;' then, turning to the clergy, he added in Latin, 'If we enter into dispute, our whole mystery will be subverted.' To the most insulting remarks, Farel replied, 'I deserve them not. I preach Christ Jesus as crucified for our sins, and raised again for our justification; and declare that whosoever believeth on Him shall have eternal life, but that he that believeth not shall perish everlastingly. As Christ came to preach to all who would hear Him, so I am ready to give account of my faith and my doctrine, and to maintain them unto death, relying on the sole power of God, who hath sent me.' As he uttered these words, one of the judges exclaimed, 'He has spoken blasphemy; we have no need of witnesses: he is guilty of death.' 'Speak in the words of God, not Caiaphas,' replied Farel; while the multitude called out, 'To the Rhone, to the Rhone with him! kill him, kill him!' 'Kill this new Luther. It is better he should die than that all the people should be disturbed.' 'It is not I that troubleth Israel, but thou, said Elijah to King Ahab,' replied Farel; 'and I say, in like manner, it is not I that cause such commotions, but you and your adherents, who would throw the city, and the whole world, into confusion by human traditions and ordinances, and by your corrupt conduct.' Then the canons gnashed their teeth, and desired him to leave the council chamber. As he was going, a servant of the grand vicar levelled a gun at him, but it burst in his hands. Farel was untouched, and, turning round, said, 'Thy shots do not terrify me.' He and Saunier were then ordered to leave the city within three hours, under pain of death, and to consider so gracious a favour as being extended to them from regard to the senate of Berne. On hearing this, Farel exclaimed, 'You condemn us unheard.' He was then hurried away, and would probably have been murdered, had not his friends defended him, while they threatened to report the council's verdict to the civil authorities. Early the following day the Reformers crossed the lake, accompanied by their friends, who, having heard of a plot to arrest them and send them to Savoy, remained with them during the first day's journey. They landed near Lausanne, and passing through towns in which there was least danger to be apprehended, reached Orbe in safety.

But Geneva was not left without a pastor. Anthony Fromont, a young man, about twenty-three years of age, the disciple and friend of Farel, accepted the post, and on November 3, 1532, began his ministry there.

Opposition had so weakened the energy of the evangelical party, that, upon Fromont's arrival, he found scarcely any ready to confess Christ openly; 'because iniquity abounded, the love of many had waxed cold,' while the hatred of the Romanists had gathered strength. Thinking his life in danger, Fromont was about to leave the city, when the thought of thus cowardly deserting his charge pressed so heavily on his conscience, that he determined to follow the example of Farel, and remain as a teacher of the French language, and also give medical advice to those who desired it. God blessed these humble efforts in his service. Many found a blessing in the lonely lodging of Fromont, and not a few brought their friends to share it with them, saying, 'Come with us and we will do thee good.'

Fromont's success roused the wrath of the priests to a fearful height; nevertheless, his room could not contain the numbers who came seeking instruction. Many, day after day, crowded around the house, hoping for admittance, but in vain. At length, patience being exhausted, some one called out, 'To the molard' (the market-place), 'to the molard!' and in a moment Fromont was hurried away, set on a fishmonger's stall, and told to preach to the people the word of God. He did so, and, notwithstanding the interference of a police officer, who eventually silenced him, Fromont preached the gospel of Christ that day to many who had never before heard it. By degrees the light dispelled the darkness; many returned to their homes to discuss together the subjects brought before them. Short tracts upon controversy were eagerly read, which led to a careful searching of Scripture, to discover whether these things were so. 'Therefore many of them believed,' among whom was, at least, one 'honourable woman,' Madame Glaudine. Her conversion was remarkable. Having heard from the priests that Fromont was an arch-sorcerer, who had hosts of spirits at his command, this Genevese lady resisted every entreaty to hear him, and judge for herself. However, after a time, curiosity overcame fear, and having armed herself with relics for security against the enchanter's power, she entered his room, and seating herself in front of him, so as to observe his machinations, reverently crossed herself, and, commending her body and soul to the care of God and all the saints, prepared to listen. To her surprise, no sound of incantation reached her ear. By degrees her fears subsided, she became interested in Fromont's sermon, and before it was closed the heart of Madame Glaudine was touched by the finger of God. 'Are these things true?' she inquired, as he rose to depart. 'Can you prove them from the gospel?' 'Yes,' replied Fromont, 'I am ready to maintain the truth of all I have asserted.' She then inquired concerning the mass, whether it were not to be found in Scripture. On being assured that 'neither the name nor the thing' was to be found in the New Testament, she asked if the book from which Fromont had taken his text was the New Testament, and when told that it was, begged permission to read it. Fromont gladly lent it to her; and for three days Madame Glaudine shut herself up in her room, and, scarcely allowing herself refreshment of any kind, spent hours in meditating on God's holy word. As she read the 'sweet story of peace,' tears of sorrow for sin, tears of joy for pardoned sin, fell upon her book. After three days she asked to see Fromont, and having again heard the gospel from him, she declared herself a follower of Christ, thanking God for his great goodness in turning her 'from darkness to light.'

As the progress of the Reformation became more manifest, the indignation of its opponents increased; tumult followed tumult, until Fromont was commanded to leave the city. He obeyed and went to Yvonan.

We left Farel at Orbe, and now rejoin him there.

Feeling deeply the importance of training the younger clergy for their holy calling, he at this time established weekly 'clerical meetings,' to be held alternately at Morat and Neuchatel. At these meetings matters of interest connected with the church were discussed, and advice upon practical matters asked and received. After a time they assumed the office of synods, ordained and appointed ministers for particular churches; but this the Senate of Berne, regarding it as an infringement of their rights, refused to sanction.

About this time Farel, urged by some, to whom his ministry had been blessed, returned to Geneva; but ill treatment from the Romish party soon obliged him to depart again, and thus, once more, Geneva was left without a pastor. The absence of their ministers drew the Lord's people more closely together, and sheltered by the darkness of night, they met for prayer and the study of Scripture. At one of those meetings, the Lord's Supper, according to the reformed ritual, was, for the first time, celebrated in Geneva, when John Guerin, a tradesman, of deep piety, and mighty in the Scriptures, acting as pastor, distributed the bread and wine. For this breach of order, as the council regarded it, Guerin was banished from Geneva. Two influential citizens of Geneva, seeing the deplorable state of things, that no one could preach the gospel without running the risk of banishment, went to Berne to entreat the state to interfere in behalf of religious toleration. The deputation succeeded. The Bernese wrote a strong letter to the government of Geneva, telling them, that 'If they wished to keep on good terms with their ally, they must allow the free preaching of the gospel.' Terrible commotion followed the receipt of this letter. Led by the priests, a large body of Roman Catholics demanded that those who had asked the interference of Berne should be given up to justice. As the magistrates took no notice of this request, the most furious of the Romish party bound themselves under an oath to massacre 'the Lutherans,' and closing the city gates, planted artillery outside the house, in which the leading men of the reformed party were assembled. Seeing how matters stood, and that their lives were in danger, the Reformers armed themselves in self-defence, by which act the enemy were awed, peace was restored, and, after some time, when the excitement had subsided, the people came to the conclusion, that it would be 'extreme folly in them to cut one another's throats to please the clergy, and that, as the latter had differences with the reformed, the two parties should be left to settle them between themselves; the proper way of which would be to dispute from the Scriptures, and not to fight with the sword.'

A treaty of peace was now made between Geneva and her allies, the terms of which, though published, were not long observed. Fresh tumults arose, in one of which the most violent of the party, a canon of the cathedral, was killed. Upon this, Friburg, the canton to which he had belonged, demanded vengeance, and tried to make this a stepping-stone by which to banish the Reformers from Geneva; while, on the other hand, the Bernese made every effort to quiet the people, recommending toleration and liberty of conscience as the only means by which to appease the discord which existed, to which advice they added these solemn words: 'Remember that, in the day of judgment, each individual shall answer for his own faith alone, and not for that of another.'

The Bernése deputies in Geneva, though reproached for favouring 'conventicles,' permitted Farel, Viret, and Fromont to preach in their lodgings, and strongly urged upon the council the justice of providing a suitable church, in which they might preach without fear of disturbance. The council replied that they had no authority to grant the privilege, that the power belonged exclusively to the bishop, or his vicar; but they promised not to interfere to prevent the desire of their allies being granted.

A few hours after this debate had ended, some of the citizens, to Farel's great surprise, hurried him into the hall of the Franciscan convent; and after the bell had tolled to announce that the word of God was about to be preached, Farel ascended the pulpit, and delivered the first evangelical sermon ever heard, without interruption, in Geneva. This was on Sunday, March 1, 1534.

The Romish party, powerless to prevent this innovation, now inquired by whose authority Farel was permitted to preach, and requested that he might be silenced in future. They also prayed the Bernese deputies to take him back with them to Berne. They were refused, and the deputies left the city.

Encouraged by these events, the naturally excitable temperament of Farel led him to attack the priests with too much warmth and asperity. Œcolampadius might again ask, 'How it fared with Farel's meekness?' The senate, in alarm, entreated him to consider the critical state of the city, and give them a written statement of the errors of which he complained, promising not to allow the honour of God and of their allies to be disregarded.

For some time it had been evident that the difference between the religious views of Berne and Friburg rendered it impossible for Geneva to continue in alliance with both cantons,—that she must therefore choose one and reject the other. It was natural that Berne should be preferred, because of the greater power of that state, and of the increasing tendency of the Genevese to accept the reformed doctrines. Perceiving this, the Friburgers themselves renounced the alliance which had subsisted for eight years between them and Geneva. At the same time many of the Romish party left the city, and thus peace was in a great degree restored, though the reformed party often provoked hostility by destroying altars and images.

But while peace reigned within the city, open violence threatened it from without. The Duke of Savoy, determined to extirpate the Lutherans at Geneva and elsewhere, saying, 'there are heads in Geneva which I purpose to set flying,' united his efforts with those of the bishop and the Romish party, who had recently left the city, to destroy the Reformation, being joined, too, by many from Savoy and the Pays de Vaud.

Fearing they might have to stand a siege, the Genevese, with noble heroism, voluntarily destroyed all the suburbs of their town (except St. Gervais), two parish churches, out of seven, and three monasteries, out of five. In their extremity Berne wrote to advise them to avoid, if possible, having recourse to arms whenever self-defence did not require the contrary. The Genevese replied, that they were 'resolved to sacrifice their property, their distinctions, their very children, and their own lives, for the word of God, and that they would rather set fire, with their own hands, to the four corners of the city, than part with so sacred and precious a treasure for themselves and their families.' They further declared, that the bishop might return to the town, provided that, remembering his title, he would discharge the duties of his office according to the word of God. But that as for images and other implements of superstition, they neither could nor ought to restore them, so long as Geneva was free and consecrated to God alone. This bold reply was a striking proof that the Reformation had taken firm hold of the people. Day by day its friends increased in numbers and strength, while its opponents decreased. Three of the four syndics professed the reformed faith. Farel, Viret, and Fromont (who returned to Geneva at the same time that Farel did), preached alternately in the church of the Franciscans, and in that of St. Germain.

While these three friends were living together in the house of Claude Bernard, a servant girl, influenced by the priests, mixed poison in the soup prepared for their dinner. Viret alone took any of it, from the effects of which he never recovered. On being charged with the crime, the servant threw the blame on the priests, and a canon named Dorsieres. There was not, however, sufficient evidence to condemn them, and they escaped, while the girl suffered death for the crime. In consequence of this, the council ordered the Reformers to be henceforth lodged in the Franciscan convent; the result of which was, that the greater number of its inmates, attracted by their holy lives, at least outwardly embraced their doctrines.

The following June, a public discussion took place, which, as a means of promoting the Reformation, far surpassed the most sanguine expectations of its friends; and on August 27, 1535, the council issued an edict, enjoining public worship to be conducted according to the rules of the gospel, and prohibiting Popish ceremonies.

From this time Geneva may be considered as being legally and avowedly of the reformed faith; but it was yet very far from being so, according to Farel's acceptation of the word. The fall of Romanism had put an end to many evils; but, at the same time, it had been the beginning of some, the aggravation of others. Though the immorality of the clergy was a byeword, they yet exercised a certain moral restraint upon the people; and when their authority was cast off, those who had not come 'under the law to Christ' acknowledged no restraint whatever. Thus immorality was, at this time, decidedly on the increase. Infidelity, too, in many instances took the place of former superstitious reverence for Romish ceremonies and relics, with those who, while they renounced Popery, had but a name to live, and were ignorant of the gospel.

The religious establishments now underwent a great change. The monastery of the Franciscans de Rive became a school, that of St. Claire, an hospital, while their revenues were appropriated to the support of the clergy, the schools, and the poor. Permission was given to the priests, monks, and nuns, to leave the city or remain in it as they pleased.

Berne heard of these events with gratitude and joy, and wrote to exhort the Genevese, thus favoured with the light of truth, to live as it became those who had been delivered 'from the yoke of bondage' and superstition.

The proclamation of the reformed faith at Geneva was followed by renewed hostilities against that city. On September 24, 1535, an attack by night almost succeeded in leaving it in the hands of the duke and the bishop. Besieged by land and by sea, with 6000 within her walls, famine was added to the miseries of war. Still, in spite of cold and hunger, even the women and children worked upon the fortifications, determined to die rather than yield to those under whose yoke their fathers had long groaned. France offered assistance, on condition that the expelled bishop should be restored, and temporal jurisdiction again placed in his hands. Her offer was rejected, and Geneva looked to Berne for help.

The Bernese, unwilling to go to war with the duke, for a long time resisted all entreaties to take a decisive step for the relief of their oppressed ally. At length, however, they were roused, and from that moment energy characterized their movements. On January 13, 1536, they resolved to declare war; on the 16th they published that resolution; on the 22d they informed the Swiss cantons of their decision, 'to prevent jealousy on their part;' that same day they sent forth their army, 6000 strong, which, having met with no opposition on the road, reached Geneva on February the 2d. Their welcome was joyful. The Savoyards fled before them, and, after a day's rest, the Bernese started in pursuit of the enemy.

The duke, who had exasperated the Swiss on all sides, now suffered for his faithless cruelty. The Valaisans recovered the towns he had taken from them; and the king of France, who wanted Savoy, to assist his purposes against Milan, rushed, sword in hand, into his territories. Driven from his dominions, the duke took refuge in Verceli, where he died in 1553.

Having freed their ally, the Bernese demanded that the civil authority, which had belonged to the bishop and duke, might be placed in their hands. To this the Genevese could not consent; and after gratefully acknowledging the aid which Berne had afforded them in their distress, they entreated her not to tarnish the lustre of such noble conduct, by a demand which tended to defeat the great object for which they had toiled, but to crown their own glory by placing their ally in the unfettered enjoyment of liberty and independence.

The justice of this remonstrance being acknowledged, the Bernese army finally withdrew from Geneva (February 18th), and soon after its departure friendly relations between the states were established.

To commemorate the happy day which restored to Geneva that independence which God has ever since continued to her, the government erected a monument with a suitable inscription; while the old motto of Geneva, 'After darkness I hope for light,' was changed to 'Light after darkness,' in commemoration of her being translated from the bondage of Popery into the light and liberty of the gospel.

(To be continued.)

THINE OWN.

CALL me no more thine own: the summer hours,
So loved by me, shall never come again;
I scarce shall look upon the spring's pale flowers,
And in this life of weariness and pain
Shall be no more thine own.

The spring shall wake fresh verdure in the vale;
Freed from grey winter, blue shall glow the sky;
But, ere the sweet-breathed violets grow pale,
This fading form low in the dust shall lie,
And be no more thine own.

The shadow of the parting hour is nigh;
It falls, dear one, upon my heart and thine:
Alas! to leave thee when life's morning hour
Is goldened o'er by love almost divine—
To be no more thine own!

I soon shall leave thee: thou, belov'd, will feel
A gloomy shadow o'er thy pathway thrown;
And all too soon the truth will o'er thee steal,
That in this dreary world thou art alone,
And I no more thine own.

No more thine own! To wake for thee, at eve,
The chords of music sweetest to thine ear;
To love thee still, alike through joy or grief,
To be thy truest friend, of all most dear,
But not on earth thine own.

On these near hills, whose beauty never fades,
My lingering feet shall rest. Oh, do not weep!
Thou too shalt dwell, where sorrow ne'er invades,
With Him who giveth his beloved sleep—
And I shall be thine own.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'By them judgeth He the people.'—Job xxxvi. 31.

This verse suggests Acts xiv. 17: 'He left not himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons.' Both passages call on us to listen to the voice of God speaking to us through what are called 'natural phenomena.' By judging, we understand more than inflicting judgment—more than sitting as judge. It means 'ruling' as well. Two things are here declared: first, that God judgeth the nations; secondly, that He does so by the changes and occurrences of nature.

I. He judgeth the peoples (or nations).—This judging is not a thing of the past, or of the future merely, but of the present. He has been, and He is now 'judging.' Creation is past, the new creation is future, but governing is now. Each of these is equally sure and true; and they who deny the present governing, or the future interposition in the great day, might as well deny creation. God's connection with earth is as close and as direct now as ever. Not so obvious or so visible, but quite as real. A thing does not need to be visible, or audible, or palpable, in order to be direct and real. Many things are the latter which are not the former,—the power of the moon over the sea and its motion, of the atmosphere over all life, of the soul over the body in every movement. These are instances in point: only God's connection with earth is more real and direct than these; for in Him we live, and move, and have our being. His purpose comes in contact with earth and its dwellers; not generally and by means of laws, but directly and minutely. His will, his voice, his hand, his arm, all come into contact with this world, as well as with all other worlds, the creations of his power. He has not left them alone. He sustains and rules as truly as He creates. Not for a moment does He let go his hand. He is the Governor among the nations. 'He ruleth by his power for ever.' 'He doeth according to his will among the inhabitants of the earth.' It is with no distant, unheeding God that we have to do; but with that God who fixes the bounds of our habitation, who counts our hairs, who feeds the ravens, notes a sparrow's death, clothes the lilies of the field. He is nearer to us than the nearest earthly object or being; more closely in contact with us than we are with one another. All other links are as nothing compared with this: they are threads; this is an adamantine chain.

II. He judges the people by means of the changes of nature.—We use 'nature' for want of a better word: we mean earth and sky, with all their motions, and alternations, and transformations, great and small; all 'natural phenomena,' as they are called. These phenomena, or appearances, appear to us common things; by some ascribed to chance, by others to 'laws of nature.' Here they are ascribed directly to God. They are his voice, by which He speaks to us; his finger, by which He touches us; his rod, by which He corrects us; his sword, by which He smites us. It seems to be the thought of many that in none of these can we or ought we to recognise, directly and specially, the interposition of God; that it is fanaticism to interpret these so as to make them special messengers of God to us. But the words before us are very explicit: 'By them judgeth He the people.' The things by which He is here said to judge the people, are the common things of the day and year,—the rain, the clouds, the lightning, and such like. He uses these as his voice in warning, or commanding, or chastising, or comforting. These common things do not come by chance, or at random, or by dead law, but go out from God as his messengers. Thus everything has a divine meaning and a divine voice. Let us listen, and interpret, and understand. Summer speaks to us, with its green fields and fragrant gardens; winter speaks to us, with its ice, and snow, and frost. By these God judges the people. The pestilence, the famine, the earthquake, the lightning, the storm, the shipwreck, the overthrow of kingdoms and kings,—each of these has a special message to the nations, and to each of us. Let us see God drawing near to us in them,—showing his care and love,—manifesting an unwearied concern for our welfare. Woe to us if we either misinterpret them, or refuse to interpret them at all! The common daily changes of personal or family life, all speak in the same way. Not only the sweeping calamity that carries off its hundreds, but the sickness, the pain, or gentle indisposition—these have a voice!

We disjoin God from creation, and so see nothing in it of divine life and power. We disjoin God from the changes of creation, and so find no meaning in these. We disjoin God from the beautiful or the terrible, and so realize nothing in them that overawes, or attracts, or purifies, or comforts. We have so learned to separate between God and the works of God, that we seem to imagine that they contradict each other. The fair sky, and the clear stream, and the green hills, all speak of divine goodness, and bring to us a gospel which can hardly be mistaken; but we have learned to deny that gracious meaning, and to say that all this beauty means nothing, and contains no message from God, and embodies no glad tidings.

This separation of God from his works is one of the awful features of human unbelief. How much more of Him should we know were we to interpret his works aright, and hear his voice in each, whether in love or discipline! These skies of his are not bent over us in beauty without a meaning. These seas of his do not roll for nothing. These flowers of his are not fragrant and fair for nothing. They do not say to us, 'God is your enemy, He hates you;' but, 'God is your friend, He pities you, yearns over you, wishes to make you happy.' How full a gospel does creation preach to us, according to its kind and measure!

The separation of the works of God from his word is another sad feature of human unbelief. Creation and inspiration are in harmony. The Bible does not contradict the works of Jehovah. It means what they mean, and they mean what it means. Each little part of both speaks out most intelligibly. God wishes to be understood in both. Men would misinterpret both. They try to discover as little of God as they can in both. Yet both preach the same gospel. In both we see the goodness of God leading to repentance; in both we discern the loving-kindness of the Lord. The fact that we sinners are out of hell, is one gospel; that we who should have been in hell are dwellers in a fair and fruitful earth, is another,—God in these ways showing that He has no pleasure in our death and misery, but in our life and joy.

THE WILDERNESS AND THE REST.

(Continued from p. 87.)

THE relations, past, present, and to come, of the earth, and all things in it,—whether of men individually, or of nations corporately, or of rulers, or of Israel, or of the church, both professing and true,—the relations in which all these stand to God, and God to them, are abundantly revealed in Scripture; and the right knowledge of these relations is the knowledge of truth. Yet how little is the apprehension of these things either possessed or sought after! The various lessons taught by the different dispensations that have been, or are yet to be, are not learned. Even the difference between a paradisaical earth that did not groan, and a fallen earth that does groan, is feebly recognised; and Christians (even true Christians) marvel when they are told that they are as branches or twigs, few and little, that grow on a cankered bough—a bough destined to be broken off in judgment, although in them (the twigs) God's grace has preserved life, and sap, and fruitfulness, which He will not fail to acknowledge both now and in the day of glory. Few, however, understand the lesson. They know not what the branch is, nor the canker, nor the coming excision, nor that which is to follow thereon. 'Ah, Lord God! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?' were the words of the prophet of old. The prophets and apostles would still say so if they could visit earth, and witness the manner in which their testimonies respecting the future are received.

But how altered the scene when the veil shall at last be rent from the heart of Israel! Not only shall the light of truth break upon their souls with a fulness and power which we Gentiles have not known, but their hearts shall be prepared not only to welcome the light, but to retain and to use it with a faithfulness and vigour that will not languish, but be maintained continuously. 'The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord; my Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever' (Isa. lix. 20).

'I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies. I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness: and thou shalt know the Lord' (Hosea ii. 19). 'The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies; neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth: for they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid' (Zeph. iii. 13). Their soul shall be as the soul of a weaned child (Ps. cxxxi.). They shall lean wholly on the Lord their God, and therefore shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever (Ps. cxxv.). It shall be said of them, 'Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!' (Ps. cxxxiii.). Thus shall they be indeed a prepared people, fitted to have communion with the thoughts and intentions of the Lord,—fitted, under Him, as priests to instruct, and as kings to govern all nations. They shall be 'a kingdom of priests.' 'Men shall call them priests of our Lord, and ministers of our God. All that see them shall acknowledge then that they are the seed that the Lord has blessed.'

Well, therefore, can we understand the reason of the call to the Shulamite (i.e. to the bride of Solomon) to return: 'Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may look upon thee.' Not till the true Solomon shall appear, and establish his glory in the earth, and call the daughter of Zion back to his love, and teach her to call Him Ishi (my husband), and betroth her unto Him for ever in faithfulness, and loving-kindness, and in mercy,—not till then shall the darkness that now broods over the nations depart, nor truth have in the earth any better witness to its power than such as is supplied by the checked and hindered fruitfulness of that valley, which, even if it were rightly fruitful, would still find its fruitfulness despised. However faithfully and successfully the pilgrim-stranger might have laboured, she and her labours would still have been by men contemned.

But it shall be otherwise with the Shulamite. In her shall be seen grace and glory. The standing that she will take in earth will be one of manifested strength and glorious power. In her shall be seen Mahanaim—two hosts.

'Mahanaim' was a word used by Jacob when, on his return with his little band from the land of his exile, the angels of God met him. And when Jacob saw them, he said: 'This is God's host: and he called the name of that place Mahanaim'—i.e. 'two hosts.' Jacob was ever wont to magnify his own strength, and to exalt it into virtual co-equality with the strength of God. We might, indeed, have supposed that, in beholding the might and majesty of the host of God, Jacob would have forgotten his own little company: but he did not; for it was not the habit of Jacob to forget himself, nor anything connected with himself. He could not forget the band which he for so many years had laboured to gather, nor consent that it should stand in any other place than one of acknowledged association with the host of heaven. Hence the word 'Mahanaim.'

Yet expressions which God may permit or cause his servants to use, may conceal beneath them a meaning which they who use them apprehend not. So was it with the word 'Mahanaim.' It embodies a truth, for which heaven and earth, in ages yet to come, will praise and magnify the God of Jacob for ever. For an hour is coming when Israel, after having been 'brought very low,' shall suddenly be strengthened by the Lord of hosts, their God, 'when I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and made thee as the sword of a mighty man. And the Lord shall be seen over them, and his arrow shall go forth as the lightning: and the Lord God shall blow the trumpet, and shall go with whirlwinds of the south' (Zech. ix. 13). 'And thou, O tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem; . . . for I will make thine horn iron and thy hoofs brass: and thou shalt beat in pieces many people: and I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth' (Micah iv. 8, 13; see also Micah vii. 16). These, and many other like passages, supply abundant evidence as to Israel being made the host of the Lord in the earth; yet not in dissociation from the hosts that are above. 'Thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord,' are words used in relation to the time of Israel's deliverance. 'The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee.' 'The house of David shall be as God, as the angel of the Lord before them.' 'The Lord shall be seen over them.' The strength and glory of the host of heaven shall thus be connected with the strength of Israel in the earth; so that duplication of might, heavenly and earthly, shall mark the condition of the bride of Solomon in the day of her espousals—a condition well answering to the expression which Jacob ignorantly, yet prophetically used, when he uttered the word 'Mahanaim.'

From the prominence given in this passage to the Shulamite and her glory, it might almost seem as if the pilgrim-stranger, who up to that moment had been the peculiar object of the Lord's solicitude and love, were forgotten; but it was far otherwise. A glory was to be hers greater and more perfect than that which the Shulamite was then to inherit: I speak not now of her final destiny. She who had so long sojourned in the earth as an outcast-wanderer, was now to share her Lord's unearthly glory above the heavens. Many times, during the course of her pilgrimage, she had been addressed as one to whom honour and glory pertained. Although never said to 'look forth' as the morning (for that would have implied manifestation), yet she is described as being, in her Lord's estimate, comparable to one who moved in solemn state and majesty in the train of a triumphant monarch (see chap. i.). And again: 'Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners,'—anticipative words descriptive of a glory that she deserved, and which in due time she would receive. And now that time had come. She was to be numbered with that heavenly host, whose presence was to give to the Shulamite one of the chief and most distinctive characteristics of her glory. She was to constitute part of that heavenly host that was appointed to watch over the Shulamite from above, and to minister to her from that heavenly city into which flesh and blood cannot enter. She was now to join her Lord on those mountains of Bether (separation), to which on former occasions she had bid Him return, until the morning should break, and the shadows flee away, and the time be come for her to share his heavenly separation. And now that time had drawn nigh. She was soon to join her Lord on the mountains of his separation, and to become his associate in that distant glory.

But what was her practical condition when thus called away unto her heavenly home? Was it one of weakness or of strength? In another part of this 'Song' we find the answer. She is described as coming up out of the wilderness as one faint and weary, leaning on the arm of her Beloved. The leaning was indeed a token of weakness; but the arm on which she leaned was almighty, and therein she had everlasting strength.

She leaned, evidently, as one very conscious that she was weak; very conscious that she was cast as a burden on the sufficiency of his faithful arm. There was no disposition to feed on the sinew of her own strength. No mention is made by her of past experiences, either of sorrow or of joy. There had been times when she had spoken of her 'gardens' and her 'pomegranates,' her 'milk' and her 'spices,' and when she had asked her Lord to come and view with her the scene of her labour and of their common joy. There had been times when, filled with the comfort of his love, she had besought the daughters of Jerusalem not to arouse Him, as He rested with her in her lowly habitation. But it was otherwise now. Now that the termination of her wilderness-sojourn had really come, and new scenes were opening before her, her soul turned not to the thought of that which she had ministered unto the Lord; she thought only of that which she needed to be ministered to her. She made no mention of her ministrations. The sheepfolds, the vineyards, the garden, the valley, all her labours, all her joys, and all her sorrows connected therewith, were as things of the past. To them she looked not for the sustainment and comfort that she needed then. She knew that her need could be met by one thing only—even by love, full, faithful, free, almighty; and she knew where to look for that love. 'Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm,' was her language; for thy heart is faithful, and thine arm almighty. If I were to mistrust thy love,—if I were to question its faithfulness,—how then would the love I bear to Thee become to me the source of anguish unspeakable? for 'jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame!' But I mistrust not thy love; wholly I lean on it. I know that it is love faithful and true,—love that 'many waters cannot quench, neither can the floods drown it.' It is love, too, that is free as well as faithful, flowing spontaneously from the depths of its own fulness; for how can love be purchased? 'If a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned.' On such love she leaned; by such love she was sustained. So she left the wilderness; so she entered into her rest.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA,

AUTHOR OF 'HELEN DUNDAS, OR THE PASTOR'S WIFE;' 'SHADOWS AND SUNSHINE, AND OTHER TALES,' ETC. ETC.

No. III.

SUFFERING—A GIFT.

I KNOW well that you look on your heavy and long-protracted trial as having been sent for chastening, discipline, training; and I am sure you are right. But there is another aspect in which it may, I think, be viewed by you—I mean, as a gift. Have you ever thought of it as such?—as the gift of a wise and loving Father to a precious child—a child for whom, while she was yet an alien and an enemy, He sent his well-beloved Son to die? (Rom. v. 10.)

I believe that you may look on it as such, and that to you may be applied (though in a different sense) the words written to the Philippians: 'Unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on Him, but also to suffer for his sake' (Phil. i. 29). To the Philippians these words meant that they should endure persecution for Christ's sake, and that is undoubtedly the primary meaning of the passage; but surely the comforting intimation it contains may be applied to the suffering members of the Father's family, whether the suffering comes through the instrumentality of man, or direct from the hands of God.

We read in the first Epistle of St. Peter these words: 'Ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations.' And why? 'That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ' (1 Peter i. 7). And elsewhere we learn, that at his appearing 'He shall come to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe' (2 Thess. i. 10). At the same time, also, He 'shall make up his jewels' (Mal. iii. 17); and, as you well know, the brighter the jewels, the more glorious and beautiful the crown.

It is your earnest and constant prayer, is it not, that Jesus might be glorified in you, and that you might shine brightly in his crown? Will you not, then, look on the manifold troubles and temptations which He sends, as an answer to your prayers, and that they, through the power of the Holy Ghost strengthening and increasing your faith, may enable you to glorify Him both in time and in eternity?

The desire of your heart ascends in prayer to heaven; Jesus listens to it; and then, is it not as if we could see Him going into his treasury, and considering what He could best give you in answer to it? He looks at one thing after another—health, wealth, fame, honour—but rejects them all as unsuitable. Then He sees this heavy trial, and looks at it again and again—weighs and measures it—thinks exactly how you would feel and suffer from it. Not a pang, not a sigh, not a tear is undetected. From the first crushing of life's blighted hopes and joys, to the long-protracted weariness that weighs down your spirit, all is known and understood. Yet still He sends it—sends it not in anger or in wrath—oh! no—but as the very best gift He could bestow upon you now; the gift that would draw you closest to himself; the gift that would enable you the most fully to enter into 'the length, and breadth, and depth, and height of the love that passeth knowledge;' that would be the means of enabling you best to reflect brightly your Saviour's image now, and most to bring Him praise, and honour, and glory hereafter.

Think how easily He could, and that without a miracle, remove or lighten your sufferings; and that He does not do so, surely does not imply want of willingness. Can you for one moment doubt that 'He who spared not his own Son, but delivered Him up for you' to death (Rom. viii. 32), would freely give you joy instead of sorrow, ease instead of pain, or strength instead of weakness, could He thus answer your prayer?

But He could not; and because He could not, you would not therefore withdraw your prayer! I know you would not; and that you can trust the wisdom and the power of your God as fully as you trust his love. Take courage, then, and 'be not weary of his correction' (Prov. iii. 11); for although you may be tried in a furnace heated seven times, you are far too precious to be left there one moment after the dross is consumed. And by a wondrous process, which none but the Holy Spirit can understand, your afflictions are working for you, even now, 'a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory' (2 Cor. iv. 17). Seen in the light of the future, your afflictions are counted as 'light, and but for a moment,' while 'the weight of glory' will be 'exceeding' in its intensity, and 'eternal' in its duration.

THE HIDING-PLACE.

There are, I think, few trials more difficult to bear with meekness and patience, than that described by the Psalmist as 'the pride' (or haughtiness) 'of man, and the strife of tongues' (Ps. xxxi. 20). Very difficult would such a trial be to bear when endured from the world around, but a thousandfold more so when endured within our home. Ah! yes, it is a sore trial to 'be wounded in the house of our friends' (Zech. xiii. 6)—wounded by those of whom we would shrink to speak in terms of censure to those outside the family circle, and from whom, therefore, we cannot receive either the help, or the comfort, or the sympathy which, did they know how much we needed them, they would so freely and so gladly give.

It wonderfully aggravates a trial to bear it alone—never to speak of it to any one. The greatest poet the world ever saw has said: 'Give sorrow words: the grief that does not speak, whispers the o'erfraught heart, and bids it break.' And is this the only course for the Christian, suffering either within or without her home, from the pride that despises, or the strife that troubles her? Not so; there is One to whom we may, without reserve, pour out our hearts—even Him who has said: 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me' (Ps. xxx. 13)—He who sees it all with the 'eye that is ever over the righteous' (1 Pet. iii. 12), and who in 'all their affliction is afflicted' (Isa. lxiii. 9).

When David was thus tried, he was so impatient to be delivered, that, because God did not at once appear on his behalf, he gave himself up for lost, and said in his haste: 'I am cut off from before thine eyes' (Ps. xxxi. 22). But he soon found out his mistake—soon found out that, notwithstanding his faithlessness and distrust, God did hear; and not only hear, but answer the voice of his supplication. And how does He answer it? By a promise that seems most blessedly and wonderfully suited to the depth and intensity of the trial.

Duties, position, and circumstances, may all prevent a person thus tried from going out of the reach of those whose conduct is so cruelly unkind. They cannot leave their home or neighbourhood; but there—there, in the very place and position where they are, comes in the promise, as true for them as it was for David: 'Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues' (Ps. xxxi. 20). Oh, blessed hiding-place! Oh, wonderful pavilion! Hidden in Christ—enfolded in Him—surrounded by Him! Little matters it, if we be thus hidden, that the tongues of our enemies are as sharp arrows; these arrows must pass through Christ, as through a strong tower (Prov. xviii. 10), and are blunted in the passage, and fall harmless on the ground.

It is not, however, to every one suffering from the pride of man, or the strife of tongues, to whom the promise is made. We learn from the previous verse that there are two limitations: 'How great is thy goodness, which Thou hast laid up for them that fear Thee, for them that put their trust in Thee before the sons of men!' When the hour of trial comes, how ready we are to look within or around for help, as it is said: 'Some trust in chariots, and some in horses' (Ps. xx. 6). Or again—as we are warned not to do: 'Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man' (Ps. cxlvi. 3). If we trust in such help, we shall be most bitterly disappointed; nay, more than disappointed; for it is said: 'Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm' (Jer. xvii. 5). For such no hiding-place has been provided. No; it is only for those who 'fear the Lord,'—not the fear of dread, but that 'fear which is the beginning of wisdom' (Prov. i. 7),—and that 'put their trust in Him before the sons of men.' To trust in a person is to yield oneself up to him for safety and protection; and this is exactly what we must do to God, and that not in the secrecy of our own hearts only, but before the sons of men. For God has said, 'Them that honour me, I will honour' (1 Sam. ii. 30). And it does honour God when we, in the midst of trouble, turn, not to this friend or to that, but to Him who is a 'brother born for adversity' (Prov. xvii. 17), 'a very present help in trouble' (Ps. xlvi. 1).

Turn, then, you who are suffering from the pride of man or the strife of tongues, turn away from all creature help, turn to Him of whom it is said: 'Oh how great is thy goodness, which Thou hast laid up for them that fear Thee; which Thou hast wrought for them that trust in Thee before the sons of men!' That goodness, which is laid up ready for us in the storehouse, out of which we read that 'God shall supply all our need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus' (Phil. iv. 19), which was wrought, or worked out, for us at such a cost—even at the cost of 'his agony and bloody sweat,' of his cross and passion, of his precious death and burial, and of his glorious resurrection and ascension.

And what the special goodness laid up and wrought for us, under the peculiar circumstances we have been considering, is, we have seen before: 'Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues.' The weakest woman, the youngest child, is safe in a fortress besieged by the enemy, as long as the fortress can hold out; and though you may be a very babe in Christ, yet, if hidden in the secret of his presence, you are safe till He gives way. Encourage yourself, then, in the Lord, and say: 'In God have I put my trust; I will not be afraid what man can do unto me' (Ps. lvi. 11). 'What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee' (Ps. lvi. 3).

To all who can echo these words, the hiding-place is secure; they will never be denied admittance; and once within, how little will the pride of man, or the strife of tongues, trouble them! How little inclined will they feel to answer, or resent them, far less to return them! Like their blessed Master, when they are reviled, they will revile not again; when they suffer, they will not threaten; but commit themselves (or rather, as it is in the margin, commit their cause) unto Him that judgeth righteously' (1 Pet. ii. 23).

Those around you may marvel at your calmness and your patience, but that is because they do not know the source of your strength. Your hiding-place has been undiscovered by them; they have never been in the secret of God's presence. But you—you who do know it, and do love it, never leave it. Nowhere else could you be so safe, so happy, or so blessed. Jesus is the hiding-place now; but by and by He shall be revealed in all the glory of his kingly power; and those who have been hidden in Him now, shall then be made manifest, as they fall down before the Lamb, and sing a new song, saying, 'Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God, kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth' (Rev. v. 9, 10).

THE LITTLE CHILD AND THE LETTER.

What intense delight it is to a loving-hearted little child, to get a letter from her absent mother! How she reads it, and kisses it, and kisses and reads it, until she almost knows every word of it by heart! How, in the exuberance of her joy, she dances round the room, just stopping now and then to take a peep at her precious treasure, and to say, 'I am sure no one in the world could write such nice letters as mother does, except papa; and then he is at home now, so I can see him, instead of getting letters, and that is better still. But mother is away, so I must have letters; I could never get on without them. Oh! Jeanie,' she adds, as her sister comes into the room, 'I have got a letter from mother; it is all for myself; but you may read it, and welcome. Is it not just like her? I am sure I know quite well how she looked when she wrote that part when she says that, although she is far away, yet that the Lord Jesus is always with me, watching over me, and taking care of me, and that He loves me a great deal better than even she does.'

Then Jeanie showed her letter; for her mother had written to her also, and she loved it quite as much as Caroline did hers, though Caroline did not like it so much, because, as she said, she was too young to understand it, though she was sure it was very nice.

But Caroline got ill, so ill that she could neither read her precious letter, nor have it read to her, or even think about it; but she put her hand under her pillow, where she kept it, every now and then, to feel that her treasure was safe. The mother hears that her sweet child is sick; quickly she hastens home; and, with soft and gentle steps, she hastens to her darling's sick-bed. She kisses the flushed cheek, and holds the feverish hand, and softly whispers, 'I ám come back to take care of you.'

The room is so dark that Caroline cannot see her; but that does not trouble her, for she feels the touch of her lips and hands, and hears the tone of her gentle voice; she knows that she is with her; she knows that she loves her, else why would she have come to her? And as the mother bends over her, the look of calm repose that she sees stealing over her suffering child is far more precious to her heart than any spoken words of love or thanks could be.

And is it not very much in the same way that the Lord Jesus Christ acts towards his children? When they are strong and well He speaks to them through the medium of his written word, the Bible. Do not our hearts often burn within us, as we read the letters He has written to us in the Bible, or the messages He sends to us through it? Better still, the words of love for each of his children individually—for you and for me, as distinctively and as appropriately as if written for us alone. And what wonderful pictures of himself He sends us in that word! As we read the fourth chapter of St. John, can we not fancy that we see Him in very deed, sitting weary on Jacob's well, and long to minister to Him? Can we not almost see his form, and hear his voice, as, rising from the pillow, or rather from the bench, on which He had been sleeping, He says to the terrified disciples, 'How is it that ye have no faith? Why are ye so fearful?' and to the sea, 'Peace, be still?' (Mark iv. 38, 39, 40.)

But all his children do not get the same message, or all see the same picture. Just as fifty photographs might be taken of the same person, all like him, yet all different. He may be standing in one, sitting in another, and so on. Neither would a mother write the same letter to all her children at the same time; for what would exactly suit one, might not suit another at all. And so it is with the Bible: at one time we may want to see Jesus as the little baby in the manger; at another, raising the dead, or preaching to the multitude, or taking the disciples apart to teach them. So also, at one time the promise that Jesus will come again in glory, and all his saints with Him (Zech. xiv. 5), might fall powerless on our ear—it does not suit our need at that moment; while the parable of the prodigal son is so exactly what we want, that we read it as if we had never read it before, as if the Lord Jesus himself had just written it for us, and for us alone. At another time, all thought of self is lost in anxiety about one very dear to us, whose soul we know has not yet been saved; and then the photograph we see is the man sick of the palsy, brought to Jesus by his friends, and the words we hear are, that 'when Jesus saw their faith, he said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee' (Mark ii. 3-5).

But it is useless to multiply examples, for to each is given exactly the picture, or the letter, or the message, that each one requires, and that so precisely suits their need, that having thus heard and seen Christ through the medium of the written word, they will be fain to say from their hearts, 'Thy words were found, and I did eat them, and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of my heart' (Jer. xv. 16). Well, indeed, may the apostle say, 'Let the word of God dwell in you richly in all wisdom' (Col. iii. 16).

But there comes a time when the hand of God is laid heavily on one of his dear children. He is laid low in sickness, and although the Bible is as much prized as ever, perhaps even more so, yet he can no longer see his Saviour's face in it, or hear his Saviour's voice, or read his Saviour's message. He may not even be able to think about Him, or pray to Him, the powers of his mind are so dulled and weakened.

But, blessed for ever be his holy name, the Lord Jesus is a God at hand, and not a God far off (Jer. xxiii. 23). Quicker than the tenderest mother could travel, He stands close beside his suffering child. Have you not felt Him hold your hand? Have you not heard Him whisper, 'Fear not, for I am with thee' (Isa. xliii. 5); 'Lo, I am with thee always' (Matt. xxviii. 20); 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you?' (Isa. lxvi. 13.) Have you not felt at such a time that, but that your eyes were holden, as were those of the two disciples as they journeyed from Emmaus that wondrous Sabbath evening (Luke xxiv. 16), you could see Him? But you do not need that. You feel that He is with you; you know that He will not leave you, and that is enough; you are satisfied and at rest.

And as to Jesus, He does not want words of love, or assurances of affection. No, He only wants you to trust. And you do that when, sinking down on the everlasting arms, and looking up, see that the banner over you is love (Song ii. 4), you say, in the voiceless words He so well understands, 'I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine' (Song vi. 2).

THE LORD HAS NEED OF THEE.

But can this be true of me, do you ask, of me, who am, indeed, 'less than the least of all saints?' I think it is true of you, as well as of all God's other children, and will try to explain what I mean.

With us, every one we love has a particular place in our heart, distinct and separate from every other, and which no other could fill or satisfy. Thus one friend is precious to us, because of the sympathy that lessens our every sorrow, and increases our every joy. Another, for the tender, thoughtful love that is continually devising something to give us pleasure, or to cheer us as we toil along a rugged path. Another again for the strength of character on which our weaker one may lean, or the wisdom in which our ignorance may confide. But most of all, perhaps, we love the one who clings to us for comfort or help, for guidance or support; for surely we all feel that it is 'more blessed to give than to receive' (Acts xx. 35).

And may it not be thus, that although in one sense our blessed Lord does not, and could not want any one, seeing that in Him all fulness dwells, yet that in another He does most really and truly want the very weakest and most unworthy of his blood-bought children?

Each one of them has some one or more things different in some way from every other. No one else can give that especial thing, in that especial way. Seen in Christ, it is pure and perfect. All taken together make up the perfections of the Bride, the Lamb's wife, in which He shall rejoice and delight throughout an endless eternity. You are not the Bride, neither am I; but if children of God, we are both a part, an essential part, without which the Bride would not be perfect and complete—without which, therefore, we say it with humility and reverence, the joy of Jesus would be incomplete—without which He would see of the travail of his soul and not be satisfied.

Be of good courage, then, fainting, trembling pilgrim, the Lord hath need of thee; and those of whom He hath need shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of his hand (John x. 20).

The Hidden Treasure;

HOW IT WAS SOUGHT, AND WHERE IT WAS FOUND.

BY M. H.,

AUTHOR OF 'ROSA LINDESAY,' 'THE STORY OF A RED VELVET BIBLE,' ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

'Life is only bright when it proceedeth
Towards a truer, deeper life above;
Human love is sweetest when it leadeth
To a more divine and perfect love.'

SUMMER breezes were blowing, summer sunshine lighting the world, on the day of Lucy Villiers' marriage. The ceremony took place in the house, at Lucy's request, in order that Netty might be present; for well did Lucy know how deeply Netty would feel her departure, and how fondly she loved her. It was Netty's fingers which must arrange the bridal wreath and fasten the costly veil; and Netty kept bravely up, for her cousin's sake, though her heart felt weary and sad.

A large party were assembled—friends from all quarters. Aunt Mary, with her gentle face, is there,—enticed, by the very earnest entreaties of the bride and bridegroom, to leave her quiet home for a few days, and witness the consummation of their happiness. Half unwillingly she came. So seldom did she leave her home, that even a short absence was an effort; but, despite herself, she felt constrained to go. A work was before her, of which she knew not. The Lord had appointed her to lead a weary, cast down soul to the cross; to brighten up the couch of suffering, by revealing to the sufferer the rays of the Sun of Life. Little does Netty Osborne think, as she contemplates with an aching heart Lucy's departure, that this very event, so dreaded now, will be the means of leading her to the possession of a joy greater far than she had ever conceived of—to a peace which passeth all understanding!

Harry Wilmot is also of the party. Dr. Wilmot he is now—a tall, handsome man; the fine forehead and thoughtful eye telling of an intellect of no common order. His is a noble soul. Lofty purposes and high thoughts fill his heart, from which self seems almost banished. Very zealously is he seeking the Sangreal; and already, in the endeavour to alleviate and help his fellow-creatures in his profession, he fancies that he is at least in the fair way to find it. No low aim is his. To be in any degree the alleviator of suffering humanity, and to take pleasure in being so, must of itself impart happiness. To do good to others in any way, must always, to a right-thinking mind, be a source of pleasure; but even that, praiseworthy as it is, does not give a happiness which lasts for ever. No, Harry Wilmot, higher yet—onward and upward—must you soar, ere you find the hidden treasure; and never, till you have found it, will you be able to exercise one of the most needful parts of your profession—that of pouring the balm of Gilead into wounded hearts, and comforting broken spirits with the leaves of the tree of life.

The party was a very pleasant one. All that wealth and love could bestow had fallen to Lucy's portion, and were freely given to make the marriage festival a grand one. One thing only was wanting there; one Guest was uninvited. He who graced the marriage feast at Cana of Galilee was not there—was not asked to preside and bless. Willingly—how willingly—would He have come, and given, as none but He could give, blessing greater far than any earthly friends could bestow. Only one word, only one entreaty—'Come, Lord Jesus!'—and He would have come, and, by his presence, enhanced the joy. But the silent language of most of the hearts present was: 'We will not have this man to reign over us. Away with Him! away with Him!' Love, friendship, fame, the things of this life, nay, even philanthropy itself, were the veils—brilliant-coloured, but veils still—which the prince of this world had hung over their eyes, to prevent them seeing the Lord of Life; to hide from them the true riches—the hidden treasure.

But if the veil, which covered the eyes of the bride and bridegroom, hid the glories of the unseen world from them, they missed them not, so bright, so alluring was the colouring shed on earthly things. Blessed in the love of each other—the future before them, all radiant and prosperous—what lacked they yet? Had they not found the Sangreal—the true cup of bliss? Surely yes! Other streams might fail, but this pure, living stream of love could not; it would last as long as life. Yes, it may be as long as life. We will not speak lightly of the power of even earthly love, we will not deny its pleasures; but who will whisper to the bright young couple of a love greater than that of earth, which does not annihilate, but rather increases it, which does not damp, but sanctifies it, and causes it to last not only as long as life, but throughout the ages of eternity?

Blessed indeed are the possessors of that love; blessed are they who are united both in bonds of earthly and heavenly love—one in Christ Jesus! They have found the hidden treasure, which maketh rich for earth and heaven.

---

CHAPTER VII.

'Now I have found a Friend—
Jesus is mine;
His love shall never end:
Jesus is mine.
Though earthly joys decrease,
Though human friendships cease,
Now I have a lasting peace—
Jesus is mine.'

'THE wedding was over, the guests were all gone,' and, wearied with the unwonted fatigue of the day, Netty Osborne lay on her couch, tired and depressed. Life once more lay before her a dreary blank; the interest of years was gone; the friend whose presence had been her greatest enjoyment was away; and now, what was there to live for? Conscience did whisper of a father and mother's love, and these Netty slighted not; but she had not allowed affection for them to become an absorbing passion, and both were too much engrossed in other things to enter much into her feelings, or be participators of her thoughts. No one had ever been that but Lucy, and she was away. The excitement of the morning had been too much for her feeble frame. The reaction had come now; and, woman though she was, Netty burst into tears. Alas for her boasted Sangreal! the path which she had followed so cheerfully—fancying all the while that at the end of it she saw the treasure—had come to an abrupt stop, and right below her lay, not the hidden treasure, but a great, deep, yawning abyss: the light which had allured her was gone, and overhead all was dark.

Poor Netty! despair not. In the dark a bright star shines, whose rays have hitherto been hidden from thee, by reason of the false glare which has played round thy path; but now its light will, ere long, shine into thy heart, and remove all darkness from it. From our hearts we pity thee, and all like thee, who, in hours of sadness and sorrow, know not the Great Comforter. Tossed, like the disciples, on a troubled sea, all is dark around, and Jesus not come.

As Netty lay thus, a gentle hand was laid on her, a gentle kiss printed on her forehead, and a sweet musical voice whispered words, spoken so many hundred years ago by Him whose nature and whose name is Love: 'Let not your heart be troubled.' 'I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you.'

Like balm fell the words. Quietly Netty slipped her hand into Aunt Mary's, and, resting her head on her shoulder, listened in silence as she, in simple yet pointed words, spoke of Jesus—of his wondrous work—his love, his compassion, his unfailing sympathy—of his friendship, so much more constant and satisfying than that of earth. Eagerly the girl listened. All was new to her. Of these things she had never thought. The name of Jesus had no sweetness for her; the sin-cleansing blood no meaning. Step by step Aunt Mary led her on; her confidence was gained—not all at once, not on that first night of sadness, but during the days that Aunt Mary remained at Sussex Gardens; and, ere she left, a new life, a new hope, had risen in the heart of the suffering girl. She awoke to find that hitherto she had been in the sight of God as one dead, but had become quickened into life by the blood of Christ shed for her.

No long mysterious process this, as some, in their ignorance, deem it. It is only, 'Look, and live.' The fountain is open; the sinner has only to plunge in, and he comes out spotless—'made clean every whit.' Highly honoured Aunt Mary is, to be privileged to lead one fellow-immortal to that Fountain. Say not, scoffing ones, that you question the efficacy of the Fountain, or doubt its life-giving, joy-bestowing powers. Question those who have tried it, and know its merits; and hundreds will tell you that in its waters despair and anguish disappear for ever, and joy and bliss take their place.

What means that look of peaceful repose on Netty's face; that calm, joyful spirit; that readiness to 'weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that rejoice,' which, as weeks passed on, all remarked as a new characteristic in her? Ask her where she has got them, and she will tell you, at the foot of the cross; and that He who once hung thereon—now her best and dearest Friend, Jesus—revealed himself to her, drew her to himself by the bands of love; and, right below the cross, glistening with the drops of the shed blood, He showed her the hidden treasure, and imparted of it to her in such abundance, that, even through long years of suffering and trial, she will cease not to have a happiness far greater than any can conceive, save those who have experienced it. A new song is in her lips—a song of praise. She has found a Friend who never leaves her. No more lonely hours for her now, for He is with her. She sits under his shadow with great delight, and the fruit with which He feeds her is sweet to her taste.

Very full is her heart of this new-found joy; very grateful is she to Him who sought her, even when she thought not of Him. 'What can I do to show my love to Him who has redeemed me?' is her constant question. So full of love is her heart, that she 'cannot but speak of Him.' No one is long beside her without hearing of 'Him whom her soul loveth.' What pleasure is equal to that of commending Him? 'This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend.' Is He not 'altogether lovely?'

Lucy, in the foreign lands where she had gone to spend some months with her husband, reads, with wonder, page after page of Netty's letters, filled with the preciousness of her new Friend, and that Friend Jesus. She was glad that Netty was so happy; but as to the cause of her happiness, she comprehended it not. Not yet had the light of the glorious gospel of Christ shone upon her; and not yet—perfectly happy in the love of earth—did she feel the need of the love of Jesus.

CHAPTER VIII.

'Yearned the pain within his mind
Like a quenched wail;
Nought will ease me till I find
Yet the holy Grail.
Where he wandered, weary, sad,
Story does not say;
But at last Sir Galahad
Found it on a day;
Took the Grail in his hand,
Had the cup of joy;
Carried it about the land,
Gladsome as a boy.'

THE shades of a summer evening were falling over a quiet, dreamy, English cathedral town. The sun had gone down behind the distant hills; its last rays, which had lingered long, lighting up the time-worn stones of the old cathedral, as if unwilling to leave it, had disappeared; and the few people who still loitered out of doors were now returning homeward—almost reluctantly, it seemed—so pleasant and balmy was the air.

One lad only walked quickly; his message brooked no delay. You read it in his face and in his troubled look. On he went, till at last he turned up the steps of a house, on the door of which one read, in large letters, the name of Dr. Wilmot.

It is the home of Harry Wilmot. There he lives, the comfort and support of a widowed mother; and now, though scarce five-and-twenty years of age, the well-known, much-loved doctor of the quiet town. Other doctors there are; but amongst the chief portion of the inhabitants, Harry Wilmot is the doctor par excellence—ever ready, at the call of suffering, with a kind word and gentle sympathy for all.

Let us look at him, ere the door-bell summons him away. He is sitting in his study, somewhat tired with a hard day's work. Just at this moment he is looking dreamily out of the window, apparently watching the clouds, and noticing the gentle swaying of the trees in the old-fashioned garden. But though his eyes are resting on these things, his thoughts are not. They are occupied with an open letter he holds in his hand. It is from Alfred Osborne, full of glowing descriptions of his eastern life. Only a few more years, and then his fortune would be made, and the true Sangreal be found. 'By the way, Harry,' he wrote, 'have you found the hidden treasure yet, or, like me, is it still the seeking with you? What an age it seems since I parted with you at Amberley Park, and dubbed you Sir Galahad! Do you remember it, old fellow? Nay, I beg pardon, most highly respected Dr. Wilmot, F.R.C.S., etc.'

Did he remember it? Yes, well. Though nine years had passed since then, the whole scene rose distinctly to his eyes; and beyond the old cathedral town, and its quaint luxuriant garden, he saw the lawn at Aunt Mary's, and heard her words: 'Harry is right; true happiness is a hidden treasure, only to be found in one place, but surely to be found there by those who seek it aright. The Great Treasurer, who keeps the key, himself hath said, "Seek, and ye shall find."'

And now, as he sat in the twilight, the question was forced on his mind, if, after all his seeking, he had really found true, lasting happiness. He tried to evade the question, but he could not. His life was an occupied one. No trifler on earth was he, whose greatest aim was in petty nothings to kill time; each hour was usefully filled, each day brought new duties. But, for all that, Harry felt there was something wanting still. Solemn thoughts would obtrude on him. He stood too often by the beds of the dying to forget that that is the end of all men; and then—what then? That cannot be true happiness which reaches not to eternity. No—with a sigh he confessed it—not yet had he found the Sangreal; he must seek more earnestly.

Just as he came to this conclusion, the young lad we have spoken of rang the bell, and requested Dr. Wilmot to come immediately to see his mother, who, he feared, was dying. Not long was Harry in obeying the summons. The house was in the outskirts of the town. The inmates were unknown to him, but from the lad he gathered a short account of their history. They had only been a short time there—his mother, a younger brother, and himself. They were poor; but his mother, who was a beautiful seamstress, managed to keep them, and send his brother to school, and also had paid a fee to apprentice him to a shoemaker. Of course he earned nothing yet; he only wished he did, to help his mother, who was one of the best in the world. He had been looking forward so to supporting her some day; and now she was dying—he knew she was—and a choking sob silenced him.

Dr. Wilmot tried to cheer him, saying he hoped things were not so bad as he feared; but, as he stood by the bed, and looked at her face, and observed the symptoms, he saw too plainly that the boy was right. The seal on that brow was death. No time for concealing the fact now, had he wished to do so. She was perfectly conscious. She read her doom in the doctor's face; in her boy's look of anguish, as he turned away to weep. Some simple remedy was tried; then, half trembling for the immediate consequences of the shock, kindly and feelingly the doctor broke to her that death was near.

He need not have feared; death to her had lost its sting. Calmly she looked up, then spoke some words—so low, the doctor had to stoop to catch them. They were: 'I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day.' 'The blood of Jesus cleanseth me from all sin.' Her boys stood round her, their tears falling fast. 'O God, keep my children!' she said; then, looking eagerly up at the doctor, she said, 'Oh, sir, pray, pray!'

At these words Harry Wilmot stood aghast. He pray! No, never in all his life had he prayed with another; nay, conscience even now whispered that for long years prayer had been neglected by him, or only gone through as a lifeless form. He could not. He muttered something about a minister—knowing well all the time, that long ere one could be got, the spirit would have passed away.

The woman saw his pained look; she raised herself slightly to speak one word more of the Master she served ere she left the earth. 'Oh, sir,' she said, 'seek Jesus, if you have not yet found Him; you will never be happy if you don't. Take the word of a dying woman—true happiness is found only at the foot of the cross.' Exhausted with the effort, she fell back.

Never did Dr. Wilmot feel so powerless to help. Suddenly the eldest boy knelt down, and, in a voice half choked with sobs, prayed in simple words, asking Jesus to be near and support his mother in her dying hour. Harry Wilmot knelt too, and joined in that simple, earnest prayer, as he had never done in all his life. By that bed of death the veil fell from his eyes; the long yearning need of his soul was disclosed; the place where the treasure was, lay open before him; the Great Treasurer stood there, holding in his hands the precious gold, offering it as a free gift. No doubt now as to who He was: the pierced hands, the thorn-crowned brow, all proclaiming Him the Lord Jesus, the Son of God, the Saviour of sinners.

Midnight had come ere Dr. Wilmot left the house of death. Great events had taken place there since he entered it. One soul had burst its earthly shackles, and was now singing the redemption song before the throne: 'To Him who loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, be glory and honour, dominion and praise.' Through death she had passed to life.

Wondrous change! yet not more so than the change on a soul born again by the Holy Spirit; not more so than the change in Harry Wilmot's, as he entered once more his own study, and, a humbled, convicted, believing sinner, threw himself at the foot of the cross, and spent long hours there—hours of which those only who have spent the like can speak—hours which leave their impress on the soul throughout eternity. Into that study we will not follow him now; we leave him alone with his God. We need not fear for him; out of the conflict he is sure to come more than conqueror. The grace that arrested, and the voice that called him to come, never sent away comfortless any who responded to the invitation.

Believing readers, we know our Saviour is one able to save to the uttermost all who come. Never yet have we read or heard of any who perished while looking to his cross; therefore we wonder not, as many in the cathedral town did, that ere long Harry Wilmot went about his duties in a new spirit, seeking not only the temporal, but the spiritual good of his fellow-men; speaking a word to the soul whilst he faithfully sought to heal the bodies of his patients; his favourite theme the love of Jesus—the joy in believing. He had, it is true, to bear the sneers and taunts of the ungodly, to mark the lip of contempt curl as he passed, and catch the muttered words, 'Methodist,' 'Madman.' But these things vex him not; he is not ashamed of his Lord and Master. The joy of his heart is seen in his face, and he cannot but speak of it to all around. The treasure he has got is a precious one, but there is plenty of it and to spare, and fain would he lead all to gather for themselves. 'Come and see,' are the words he addresses to many.

Very glad, very thankful was Aunt Mary, when in her quiet country home a letter from her favourite nephew told the glad news that the seeking was over, the true Sangreal was found, and found where he had never sought it, never dreamed of it—at the foot of the cross; and the messenger commissioned by the Treasurer to show him the spot was a dying woman, poor in things of this world, but rich in faith and an heir of the kingdom.

(To be continued.)

Readings for the Young.

THE BLACK FLY OF THE WOODS.

WHOEVER has been in the forest during the summer months, whether in New York State or Maine, and especially Newfoundland, has become acquainted with a goodly-shaped little fellow, commonly known by the name of 'the black fly.' He makes next to no noise, but comes in myriads; and sometimes it seems as if they rained upon you from every direction. He alights on your hands, face, or neck, as lightly as possible, and creeps along so gently that often you do not feel him. When he gets ready, he applies his little pump to your skin: 'A little of your blood, if you please, sir!' If you catch him in the very act, and wrathfully kill him, he does not seem to mind it, or make any effort to escape. You don't know that he bites or has bitten you, unless you happen to see him doing it, till he has got his dinner, and is gone. Then you see a small drop of blood in the place over which he stood. If fifty have been on you at the same moment, there will be fifty such spots. You don't even now feel any inconvenience; but wait an hour or two. The spot where he bit begins to swell, and then to burn and itch intolerably. You rub it, you scratch it, you pinch it, and you tear it, but it does no good. You now scratch it every few minutes, till it turns into a sore. Another one close to it does the same; and thus your ears, your neck, forehead, and hands become one great ache! And no bite is to pass away under about two weeks! Sometimes your eyes swell, and you can hardly see; sometimes the ears swell, and ache, and burn, and you feel as if you were turning into two huge ears, each of which is a living firebrand. You never suspected so much poison could be received from that little forester, so gentle and tender in his biting. I have had my face and neck (in Newfoundland) one area of blood, all done in fifteen minutes by the myriads of these marauders.

While trying to defend myself from the attacks of these little creatures lately, I noticed one old grey-looking fellow alighting on my hand, already covered with bites and blotches, to whom I thought I would put a question or two.

'My good fellow, what do you live on when there are no men here for you to bite?'

'That's a secret, sir, that no black-fly has ever revealed.'

'Well, what were you made for?'

'To bite you, sir, and thus to teach you.'

'Teach us what? The virtue of patience?'

'No, sir; but the nature of sin.'

'The nature of sin! Pray, explain yourself.'

'Why, sir, I come to you at any time, and at all times—I, or my friends. We don't make a noise to alarm you, or let you know that we are here. Then we bite very softly and gently, and you are not yet alarmed. Then we fly off, and leave the smart, and the swellings, and the pains. Just so temptations come to men. They are myriads in number, just as we are. They don't alarm. The poor victim sins, and thinks little of it. He lies down at night, and feels no aching. But by and by he finds that the conscience is wounded; and it smarts, and bleeds, and brings agonies to the poor sufferer. He had no thought that the poison of sin was so terrible, and its results so awful. Sometimes the child has the temptation to tell a falsehood, or to use profane language, come upon him, and he utters the lie or the profanity. He hardly felt the wound at the time; but when he comes to meet God before he goes to bed at night, will he not feel it? That boy who breaks the Sabbath, is receiving a wound in his soul that will be terrible hereafter. You know very well how it is, sir, for you men all feel these wounds more or less distinctly.'

'Thank you, my little biting friend. You have instructed me. Can't you now tell me how to keep you off, and then how to keep off temptation to sin?'

'Very easily, sir. You must know, then, that there are several things, such as olive-tar, camphor, pennyroyal, and the like, which, if rubbed on your skin, will keep us off. We shall hover round you, but not bite, so long as the smell remains.'

'But what shall we do when the smell is gone?'

'Put it on again, sir, and keep renewing it very often. In the same way you must keep off temptations, and that is by frequent reading of the Bible and earnest prayer. These are the anointing oil; and these will assuredly save you from the bites of sin, and the smarting and wounds of conscience so often received. Do you understand, sir?'

'Yes, I think I do; and as evidence, allow me to rub a little of this peppermint on my hand.'

'Oho! you do understand a part of my teaching; and I now see that you are equally prompt to follow all my hints.'

With that, he spread his wings, and without biting, flew away, and I saw him no more.—Rev. John Todd, D.D.

---

THE LITTLE BROWN BIRDIE.

As I was retiring from the dinner-table of a friend in the country, one bright sunny day last autumn, as I cast my eye through the bow-window, my attention was attracted by a little brown birdie, sitting on the ground near a mirror, which the coachman had brought from the city that morning, and left leaning against the wing of the house. A group of friends and children immediately gathered around to look at birdie, and with one voice we said it had received an injury, and could not fly; but the next moment we found ourselves mistaken, for it took wing, and was off. Very soon, however, it returned, taking its position before the mirror; and by its movements we soon discovered that it was watching its own reflection in the glass—mistaking it for a foe. It gazed a moment, moved its head towards one side, then towards the other; raised its feathers, stepped back a little,—the reflection, of course, making the same defiant movements,—and then, with all its power, rushed forward to strike its foe. The force with which it struck the mirror, of course, sent it backward. Recovering its position, it would resume the same position, and go through the same belligerent movements till exhausted. Then it would fly away for two or three minutes. On returning, it would repeat the same, till again exhausted, but with little variation. Sometimes, before flying away to recruit, it would step behind the glass, as if looking for its foe there. The bird was left undisturbed by the family, though it was closely watched till sunset. I do not think it was absent five minutes at any one time.

The next morning, when the family assembled in the dining-room, the first inquiry was for birdie. The mirror having been left in its position, we found birdie at his post, apparently with the motto in his mind, 'Never give up.' The same defiant spirit, the same belligerent evolutions were acted out, with but a few minutes' recess, till late in the afternoon, when the mirror was removed.

As I watched the little birdie's movements, and saw its persistent, unforgiving spirit, I thought how much this is like the spirit and conduct of too many human beings, both of larger and smaller growth. How many, like birdie, are fighting shadows or imaginary enemies; how many think they have defeated an enemy, when if, like birdie, they will look behind that which caused the shadow, they will find that there was no enemy to defeat!

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

2 Kings II. 9–11.

This is the parting of two friends. They journey together, they cross Jordan together, they come up to the gates of heaven together. They must separate; the one to go up to heaven, the other to remain a little longer here. They part, not in anger, like Paul and Barnabas, but like David and Jonathan—in love. Elijah speaks first; and his love to his faithful companion shows itself in the words: 'Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away from thee.'

But Elisha's request goes beyond what he had expected or could grant: 'Thou hast asked a hard thing'—a thing beyond my power to give. I must refer you to God. But I am permitted to give you this sign: if you see me when taken, that is to be the token that God grants your request.

The sign was given. Elisha saw his master ascend; nay, was allowed to obtain the mantle of his master, in token of his receiving his spirit. And acknowledging this sign, he rends his own clothes into two parts—as if putting his former self aside, and putting on Elijah.

The request of Elisha was not what Elijah expected; but it was in sympathy with his own feelings, and he therefore referred it to God. It was for the Spirit,—that Spirit that rested on and dwelt in Elijah,—nay, a double portion of that Spirit. He admired and loved his master, and his desire was to be like him—nay, to get beyond him; to rise higher. Here we find in Elisha—

I. Spiritual sympathy.—He is of one mind and spirit with his master. He has been witness of his life and doings; he sees the spirit which has pervaded all his words and deeds; not merely the spirit of power and miracles, but of holiness, and zeal, and prayerfulness, and boldness. Sympathising with all these, he longs to have the same mind—to be filled with the same spirit. How well for us if our sympathies were thus with the men in whom the Spirit of God dwells, or has dwelt in ages past! Not with this world, nor with the spirit of the world, but with the world to come, and with the spirit of it, should our sympathies be. Not with the men of the world's genius, or science, or learning; not with earth's poets or philosophers; but with prophets and apostles. Whatever there is of truth or beauty in Homer, or Plato, or Demosthenes,—in Shakespeare, or Bacon, or Milton, or Wordsworth, or Tennyson, let us accept; but let our spiritual sympathies ascend far higher—let us realize our true oneness with Enoch, and Elijah, and Elisha, and Isaiah, and Ezekiel; our fellowship with that Holy Spirit which dwelt in them. The sympathies of this age are confessedly not with prophets and apostles. These are looked on as fragments of obsolete antiquity and old-fashioned narrow-mindedness. Let us, however, go back to these ancient times and men, not concerned to be 'abreast of the age,' if we be abreast of the Spirit.

II. Holy imitativeness.—His desire is to be like Elijah. He wishes not merely to have 'the Spirit,' but 'thy Spirit'—the Spirit that dwelt in Elijah. To be like him in the divine features of his character; like him in the possession of the Spirit, and in that special form in which he possessed; this was what he sought. There is certainly but one great model; but there are subordinate ones also. Paul said, 'Be followers of me;' and the eleventh of Hebrews is a collection of models, a book of patterns, in each of which we may find something to copy. While copying Christ, let us not overlook the inferior models, either among the inspired men of Bible days, or the uninspired worthies of later times. May the spirit of Elijah, and Paul, and John, rest on us; the spirit of Wickliff, and Luther, and Calvin, of Knox, and Rutherford, and Whitefield, and M'Cheyne!

III. Divine ambition.—Elisha was not only full of admiration for his master, not only wished to be like him, but desired to get far beyond him. He asked a 'double portion' of his spirit. This is true ambition; this is coveting earnestly the best gifts, of which Paul speaks, and in connection with which he points out the more excellent way of 'charity,'—in which especially Elisha seems to have risen higher than his master, Elisha's ministry being more one of love than Elijah's. In such things as these let us be ambitious. There is no fear of aiming too high, or aiming at too much. Let us not give way to the false humility which says, 'Oh that we had but the hundredth part of what Elijah had!' let us rather at once, with Elisha, seek to have far more. This is true humility. It is desiring to be what God wishes us to be. It is honouring his fulness and his generosity. It is acknowledging the extent of blessing in reserve; reckoning on it as quite illimitable, and therefore not confining ourselves to what others have had, but going up into the divine fulness, for far more than has yet been obtained even by the fullest.

IV. Quiet expectation.—He speaks and acts like one who fully expected to get what he asked. Elijah had referred him to God for 'the hard thing' he had asked; it was in God's hands alone. 'It is not mine to give' (as if anticipating the Lord's words). Elisha owns the divine sovereignty, and is calm; but he realizes the divine love, and expects. He believes, and therefore does not make haste, but goes quietly on beside his master to see the end. He believes, and therefore he assures himself that God is not likely to be less gracious than his master, nor to deny him what Elijah would gladly give if he could. Let us believe!

V. Conscious possession.—He accepts the sign: he sees the prophet caught up; he seizes his mantle, and returns by the way he came, conscious of having received the 'double portion.' He believes, and therefore he speaks and acts. The sign promised has been given; can he doubt that the thing promised is also given? He may have nothing new in feeling to corroborate it, but that matters not. He has it in simple faith in the bare word of the true God. The 'double portion' is mine, he says to himself; and he goes back to exercise his prophetical calling, in the calm consciousness of possessing more than his master did. What is Jordan to him now? A stroke of the mantle divides it; and henceforth his life is to be one of mighty and gracious miracle. Let us speak and act as men who believe that God fulfils his word to us. Let us trust that word when we use it. There is more in it than in Elijah's mantle. It is living and divine. Let us not blunt or deaden it by our want of confidence in its power.

THE SAINT'S VALLEYS.

BY THE REV. A. A. BONAR, GLASGOW.

BUNYAN somewhere says, that the days are coming when men shall talk of Antichrist as matter of history,—telling their children how that mystery of iniquity leavened Christendom, how it prevailed, how it was destroyed by the Lord's coming. Even so, the days shall come when the saints shall speak one to another of their past pilgrimages; and all shall have to tell more or less of what they met with as they journeyed, and how the Lord led them, every one, through—1. The valley of Trouble, Achor, in their awakening; 2. The valley of Berachah, or Blessing, when they were brought to peace through the work of Christ; 3. The valley of Weeping, or Baca, at various stages and times; 4. The valley of Eshcol, where first-fruits, or earnests of glory, were given them; 5. The valley of conflict with foes, when victories were won for God in the valley of Rephaim; 6. The valley of Shaveh, or the King's Dale, where the Lord met them, as Melchizedek did Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; 7. The valley of Decision, or Jehoshaphat, where at last they saw Antichrist, and Satan, and every foe overwhelmed and swept away, and began their triumph with their Lord and King.

I. Achor.—This is the spot where Achan's sin was exposed and punished before all Israel and before the Lord,—the sin that had troubled Israel and Moses; the sin that had brought woful, fatal trouble on himself and his house; the sin that could be dealt with aright only by the stroke of justice,—death, and the consuming flame. Now, every awakened sinner opens his eyes some morning to find himself an Achan! Every awakened soul is taught by the Spirit somewhat of sin, and his own sin, and is made to cry 'Amen' to the judgment of God that dooms the sinner to death and hell (Josh. vii. 26; Hos. ii. 15).

All do not linger long in the valley, though some do. There are those, indeed, who seem to get their most memorable view of it after having got clear of it; they are made to look back and learn its lessons. Such was the case, in our own day, with Dr. Malan and Dr. Love. But others pass slowly through, burdened with the sight and sense of sin, and guilt, and wrath.

One thing is sure: all of them do learn the lesson taught in Achor, viz. that sin is exceeding sinful, and deserves the eternal wrath and curse of the Holy One, whether it be sin in the heart, or sin in the life, or sin on the tongue, or sin in the form of omission, or sin in the openness of positive transgression; sin against law, or sin against love. It is always a gloomy valley; the clouds that hide the sun are ever over it.

II. Berachah.—The Lord delights, in due time, to lead on his own to a more pleasant place, where they find favour, and peace, and joy. He leads them to see the Substitute, Jesus, 'made a curse for us' (Gal. iii. 13), that the 'blessing' might come upon us. And thus they enter the valley of Blessing.

The history of King Jehoshaphat furnishes a beautiful type of the way in which the sinner becomes possessed of all the blessings of redemption. In the valley, ever afterwards called Berachah, that king led on his army to gather the spoil of foes, and 'they were three days in gathering it, it was so much' (2 Chron. xx. 25). Their part in the matter was simply to look on and 'believe in the Lord' (2 Chron. xx. 20); and so they saw Him work salvation by his own arm. They found the work done to their hand; they gathered immense riches, and returned up the valley homewards, 'blessing the Lord.'

It is thus with the believing soul. Fearing, it sets itself to seek the Lord; and the Lord sends the tidings of his salvation, calling on the soul to come and see. And lo! it is done! Another, in our name and for our sake, has gone forth, has obeyed the law, has borne the burden, has given to God what we, by our sins, took away; and our part is simply to 'bless the Lord' that this is done—to 'bless the Lord,' and say 'Amen' to it all! to take it as our own, gathering the spoil which another has won for us, and so to 'bless the Lord,' and go homeward! Happy valley! happy soul!

This is the stage of 'joy and peace in believing' (Rom. xv. 13). Not by what we have done or felt, not by prayers nor by tears, but by discovering what the Lord Jesus has done, we are blessed. The cloud that overhung our path is gone; the sun has burst forth. The valley of Berachah is the place for songs; every song a recognition of the Lord's gracious acts accomplished for them.

III. Baca.—God's saved ones go on their way, never forgetting Berachah; but, nevertheless, they have many sorrows. They oft traverse 'the valley of Weeping,' or Baca (Ps. lxxxiv. 6). Care, trial, pain, sickness, cause them to weep. Friends and foes, corruption and temptation, the church and the world, furnish from time to time causes of sadness.

How, then, do they pass through this valley? Very much by remembering the spoil gathered in Berachah. Their tears send them ever back to Him who has removed the curse; and He turns their sorrows into holy blessing. Baca becomes a well of life to them. 'Lord, by these things men live' (Isa. xxxviii. 16). An old poet has sung of the matter in these strains:

'Seemed not thy spouse unkind to see thee weep?'

When one said to a friend who had lost a son, 'God first gave you his own Son, ere He took yours from you,' that was a well dug in Baca. When another said to a godly widow, who had newly gazed on her husband dead, and who said, 'I have lost my husband!' 'You forget that you had a Husband before you had him,' it was a well in Baca. The 'Man of sorrows' meets the weeper here with his most tender sympathy.

IV. Eshcol.—To cheer on Israel in the desert, the Lord caused the spies to be sent into the Promised Land; and an immense cluster of the richest grapes, with figs and pomegranates, was brought to them as an earnest of what they were yet to possess (Num. xiii. 23). This earnest was from the valley of Eshcol.

The Lord 'knows our frame.' He does not forget to dry up tears, and to brighten hope by special joys arising from the glimpses of glory which He sends. The Holy Spirit himself is the true 'earnest of the inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession' (Eph. i. 14). The Spirit gives samples of the 'joy of the Lord,' 'the new song,' 'the love of God,' 'the peace that passeth understanding;' and, by the light which He casts on the prophetic page, brings near to us the pearl-gates of new Jerusalem, the jasper walls, the golden streets, as well as the 'no night there,' 'the throne of God and of the Lamb,' 'the river of the water of life,' 'the kingdom, and the King,' with the multitude of the saved—the happy, holy company of the redeemed.

Many such earnests do the saints find—Eshcol-grapes in the desert. It is thus that hope is nourished; and hope is one of the soul's eagle-wings.

V. Rephaim.—All saints do some work for their God, and fight some battles. It was thus with David when seated on the throne; he was led forth to repel invading Philistines in the valley of Rephaim, between Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Twice was he called to this conflict in the same spot (2 Sam. v. 19-25); both times he won the victory; but the circumstances were not alike on the two occasions. On the one occasion, he asked the Lord; and the Lord said, 'Go up,' at once. On the next occasion, he asked the Lord; and the Lord said, 'Thou shalt not go up,' but instead, he must go round by the mulberry-trees, and wait quietly till he heard 'the sound of a going in the top of the mulberry-trees.' The impatient warrior-band obeyed; and at last the appointed signal came, and they rushed on and conquered.

Memorable conflicts for the church of God! They teach us to expect foes just when all seems peace. They teach that Satan will try to find us off our guard after a former victory. They teach us to move not one step till we have consulted the Lord. They teach us to consult the Lord anew, as every occasion comes, and not to trust to old direction and old answers to prayer. Yes, Rephaim (the 'valley of Giants,' and gigantic men of old) teaches us that, though at one time the Lord may bid us at once go forward, He may at another say, 'Sit still a while;' be patient; be neither too late nor too soon.

'God waits to bless us day by day;
But we must trust Him for the time and way.'

There is nothing for it but a continual leaning on the Lord for guidance, while we use his word and examine his providences.

VI. Shaveh, or the King's Dale.—It was here that (Gen. xiv. 7) Abraham was met by Melchizedek, who refreshed him and his army with bread and wine so seasonably and suddenly, after the battle against the five kings. He whose name means 'King of Righteousness,' and who was at the same time 'Prince of Peace,' thus kindly thought upon faithful Abraham and his worn-out company, on their way homeward. See! they sit together on yonder grassy plot, watered by Kedron, and shaded by the Mount of Olives. Emblem of such scenes as occur still among God's Abrahams!—when they meet together, their King in the midst, enjoying sweet fellowship in ordinances, or yet more specially when they sit at the Lord's table, and realize there the future days of rest, when the feast of fat things has come.

VII. Jehoshaphat.—The prophet Joel has shown us this valley, 'the valley of Decision,' or of 'the judgment of Jehovah.' Here the summons goes forth: 'Let the nations be wakened, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat' (Joel iii. 12). 'Put in the sickle;' 'there will I sit to judge.'

What a day! His saints shall be with Him there, when He comes to judge; but to them it shall be no time of fear, for 'the Lord shall be the hope of his people; and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain' (Joel iii. 16, 17).

Happy, happy they! for it is a day that ends the sinner's rebellion; it is the day that decides the controversy in favour of God. 'Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of Decision' (Joel iii. 14); and here the prophet repeats it: 'The day of the Lord is near in the valley of Decision.'

In prospect of that day, shall a man remain undecided still? Do you hope to escape—peradventure to be overlooked amid those 'multitudes, multitudes?' No, it cannot be; you shall not evade notice. The eye of Him who 'made all things for himself' shall fix upon you; for He knows how to glorify his justice in you on that day of evil. He will require you to come forth; He will insist on your abiding by the choice you made when your unbelief said, 'Away with Christ! away with grace! away with the blood of Christ! away with the obedience of Christ! away with the righteousness of Christ!' This is the valley of Decision, the valley of 'Jehoshaphat,' the 'Lord's Judgment.'

Up from this valley the saints go in triumphant procession to the city of the Great King. They have passed through all the valleys at last—Achor, and Berachah, and Baca, and Eshcol, and Rephaim, and Shaveh, and now, last of all, Jehoshaphat. They have come to their rest in the promised kingdom.

All the rivers run into the sea, and there they help to swell the vast volume of ocean's waters; and even so shall all the wanderings of saints end in the one blessed home, where the memories of the past shall all contribute to the never-ending variety and freshness of the ineffable bliss.

WILLIAM FAREL,

THE SWISS REFORMER.

CHAPTER VIII.

CIVIL and religious liberty being restored to Geneva, the senate, in compliance with Farel's urgent entreaty, met to adopt measures by which to extend the Reformation through the surrounding district, and especially in the bailiwicks, which the city had acquired by its treaty with Berne.

The village priests being summoned before the council, were informed, in the presence of Farel, that they must either prove Popery to be according to Scripture, or renounce it.

To this some assented, while many refused; and one, the oldest among the objectors, rising from his seat, expressed his surprise that, without any effort being made to convince them that their faith was erroneous, he and his brethren should be expected to renounce it. 'Send us teachers,' added the old man, 'to instruct us; and if they convince us that you are right, we will obey you.' Before the end of the month, the greater number of the country clergy adopted the reformed doctrines; but it afterwards appeared that, with many, the profession they had made was but a form of sound words. This cannot surprise us.

In the city itself, much discord and confusion still existed, even among those who were genuine friends of the Reformation: some being disposed to make greater changes than others considered prudent under existing circumstances. And while the bolder party accused the other of cowardice, they were themselves, with perhaps more justice, charged with injuring the cause by imprudent rashness. Farel and his coadjutors made every effort to quiet this excitement, and, in a great degree, succeeded.

Matters of serious moment now came before the council. For the due observance of the Sabbath, they appointed four pastors and two assistants to conduct public worship, at stated times, in various places. An early service for the benefit of servants was also appointed to be held every Sabbath, while, to meet the wants of refugees, divine worship was to be occasionally conducted in German and Italian.

The want of fellow-helpers in the ministry was painfully felt by Farel; and hearing that Viret and Fabri had lately returned from Neuchâtel, he entreated the Synod of Berne to permit them to come to his aid. His request was granted. Fabri came to his help; but Viret, urged by the officers of a Lausanne regiment, remained to preach the gospel in that city. The stay of Fabri was but short at Geneva; and soon Farel was left to labour almost alone. 'The harvest truly was plenteous, but the labourers were few;' and often did he 'pray the Lord of the harvest, to send forth labourers into his harvest.' Help, though he knew it not, was at hand.

In August (1536), there arrived in Geneva a young man lately returned from Italy, who, with the intention of taking up his abode at Bâle or Strasburg, was, in consequence of the war, making his way through Dauphiny and Savoy.

This young man was John Calvin, known to Farel as the author of the Christian Institutes. Anxious to see one of whom he had heard much, Calvin at once visited Farel, who, perceiving his suitability for the work, earnestly entreated him to remain at Geneva, and share his labours. Calvin, however, being devoted to study, was not disposed to comply; and seeing him hesitate, Farel, with characteristic vehemence, exclaimed, 'I take upon me to denounce to you, in the name of Almighty God, that if you thus, under the pretext of prosecuting your studies, refuse to labour with us in the work of the Lord, his curse will rest upon you, as a man that seeks his own, and not the things of Jesus Christ.' Overcome by this 'fearful adjuration,' as he ever afterwards called it, Calvin yielded, under the solemn conviction, that God had 'stretched out his hand' to detain him in Geneva.

By the short war between the Bernese and the Duke of Savoy, the sovereignty of the Pays de Vaud was permanently transferred to Berne; and, throughout this newly-acquired territory, the Bernese now took steps for the establishment of the Reformation.

By command of the council, reformed ministers were placed in the principal towns, with directions to make occasional tours into the surrounding country. At the same time, the government took into its own hands the disposal of church property, and that of religious houses, and, as was their habit, employed the funds for the maintenance of public worship, the establishment of schools, and the relief of the poor.

On the 24th of December 1536, these changes were established by a general edict, which was published throughout the country; and again, it must be confessed, that sufficient toleration was not extended to those who, from early education and the force of habit, had become sincerely attached to the Romish Church. The utmost liberty granted to some of them was permission to retire with their property to another country, in which they might worship according to the Romish ritual. This want of toleration, which looked as if the Bernese expected to reform the country by legal enactments, greatly irritated the people and hindered the Reformation. Nevertheless, the work, being of God, could not be overthrown, and before long it was established throughout the entire of the Pays de Vaud.

One of the most important cities in which the Reformation took root at this time, was Lausanne, a city which, besides its bishop, had a chapter of thirty-two canons, a convent of the Franciscans, another of the Dominicans, and five parish churches. In addition to his spiritual power, the bishop possessed almost regal authority over the city, though, in enacting laws, he was obliged to have the concurrence of the clergy, nobles, and citizens. Notwithstanding all this machinery for promoting the moral and religious improvement of Lausanne and its neighbourhood, the people were sunk in the lowest depths of ignorance, immorality, and degrading superstition. As an instance of this, Ruchat relates, that upon one occasion, when the lands of Lutry were infested by an injurious kind of worm, the magistrates asked the advice of Lausanne as to the means by which they might be exterminated, and in reply were recommended, first, to 'make certain processions in due form,' and if these did not prove effectual, 'to take out an excommunication against them.' We are assured that steps were taken to carry out this sage advice, but whether the sentence of excommunication was actually passed or not, does not appear. The ignorance of the common people cannot be wondered at, for, Farel says, that among all the priests he could scarcely find one able to repeat the Ten Commandments perfectly.

At Lausanne, as in other places, the corruption of the clergy prepared the way, by manifesting the necessity for the Reformation. The greatness of the disease called for a physician.

In this unpromising field of labour Viret had for some time been preaching (with consent of the council), in the church of the Dominicans, who only required, that no breaking of images or other disorders should in consequence arise. This reasonable restriction, however, was not attended to.

Thinking it expedient that a public discussion should be held at Lausanne, the lords of Berne summoned one for the first of October 1536; and immediately the emperor, Charles v., who was then in Italy, issued a prohibition declaring that such discussions were contrary to his desire, and that all religious matters should be referred to a general council. This edict was probably owing to the influence of Sabastian de Montfaucon, the Bishop of Lausanne, who, being displeased with his subjects for having furnished troops for Berne in the late war with the Roman Catholic cantons, had fled for sympathy to the emperor.

Lausanne was willing to obey the emperor's injunctions, but Berne refused. The meeting therefore took place in the cathedral, to the great dismay of the canons, who, unable to prevent this desecration of the building, carefully removed a venerated image of the Virgin Mary to a place of safety.

The discussion lasted eight days. The principal speakers of the reformed party were Farel, Viret, and Peter Caroli. Calvin spoke twice upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Blanchrose, a Frenchman, the king's physician, who had settled at Lausanne, was the chief speaker on the Romish side, which caused some to observe, 'Certainly the priests must feel their cause to be in a sickly state, seeing they have given it up into the hands of the doctor.'

Justification by faith, the corner-stone of the Reformation, was the doctrine most fully discussed; and it is instructive to observe how, upon this point, Farel and Viret were of one mind with Luther and Melancthon, Zwingle and Œcolampadius, thus testifying to the 'unity of the Spirit,' and of his work, whose office it is to take of the things of Christ and show them unto us.

Farel thus stated this doctrine: 'Holy Scripture, which is given by inspiration of God, knows no other way of justification than by faith in Jesus Christ; and this justification is nothing else than the pardon of sin. God justifies, that is, He holds or reputes as innocent and righteous. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth." And this justification comes only by faith in Jesus Christ. St. Paul has shown that we cannot be justified even by works which God has commanded; how much less, then, by those which only the commandments of men have enjoined?'

'Well then,' exclaimed Blanchrose, 'if we are thus saved by faith without works, we may do, instead of good, all the evil that we can.'

'Thus it is,' said Farel, 'that men cannot understand the doctrine of faith and of the grace of God, and blaspheme the apostle for declaring, that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound.'

Like Naaman the Syrian, Blanchrose thought we must do 'some great thing;' 'to wash and be clean' was too simple a remedy for the king's physician.

In less than a month after this discussion, the citizens of Lausanne openly professed the Reformation, and received Peter Caroli as their first pastor. It was thought by many, that this post should have been conferred upon Viret, the honoured instrument by which this change had been principally effected; but as he was only twenty-five years of age, the choice fell upon Caroli, his senior both in age and station.

It is painful to learn that Caroli, who had so clearly stated the truth at Lausanne, not long after 'departed from it.' From what we know of his life, it would appear that while 'he named the name of Christ,' he did not 'depart from iniquity,' but lived, in many respects, as one who knew not God.

Being offended with Calvin, Farel, and Viret, because of some trifling difference of opinion, he accused them of Arianism and other heresies; and being unable to prove these charges, and fearing the result should his treachery be discovered, he deserted his church and family, and fled into France, where he openly renounced his profession of the reformed faith. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.'

On the 29th of June, Viret succeeded Caroli as pastor of Lausanne.

Another general synod was held at Lausanne in 1538, to which Calvin and Farel were invited from Geneva, on condition that the Geneva church should agree to adopt the same ceremonies as that of Berne, with respect to the observance of the festivals of Christmas, New Year, the Annunciation, and the Ascension; and the use of stone fonts in baptism, and of unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper. A difference upon these points had caused a coldness between the clergy of Berne and those of Geneva; and the Bernese council now required that, 'for the sake of peace and uniformity, and to avoid the calumnies of their enemies,' concession to these demands should be promised, before Calvin and Farel could be admitted to the synod.

When this demand reached Geneva, the enemies of Calvin and Farel prevailed to have it passed into a command. The pastors requested time to deliberate. This was refused; and they were forbidden to preach. Nevertheless, Calvin preached the following Sabbath in the cathedral, and Farel in the church of Saint Germain. Great excitement ensued; and on the 23d of April 1538, an order was passed that Calvin and Farel should leave Geneva within three days, for their 'obstinate refusal to administer the Lord's Supper after the manner of Berne.' When informed of this sentence, Calvin exclaimed, 'Had I been the servant of men, I must have complained of being ill requited; but it is well for me that I have served One who never deserts those who devote themselves to Him.' 'The sufferings to which we are subjected,' added Farel, 'are indeed painful; but God has a right to impose upon those that are his, what cross He pleases, according to his wisdom, and it is our duty to bear willingly whatever He sends us.'

Upon leaving Geneva, Calvin and Farel went to Berne, to give an account of the circumstances connected with their banishment. These details roused the indignation of the senate, while the conduct of the Reformers received their highest commendation.

From Berne they went to Zurich to attend the synod, at which they declared their willingness to agree to the demands of Berne, though they would not submit to have them forced upon them. This concession gave great satisfaction, and the synod requested the Bernese government to intercede with that of Geneva for the recall of the banished ministers. Upon hearing this, Calvin and Farel declared, in the spirit of St. Paul (Acts xvi. 37), that as they had been condemned unheard, they required to be examined before their opponents previous to returning to Geneva, that being justified before the world, their recall might be regarded as an act of justice, 'and not of clemency.'

In matters connected with church discipline, the Reformers required some alterations to be made, the principal of which were, the division of the city into parishes, to insure a more intimate connection between pastors and their flocks; greater regularity in the appointments to the ministry; that the senate should abstain from the 'laying on of hands,' which belonged to the ministry alone; the more frequent administration of the sacrament; the singing of psalms as a part of public worship; and lastly, the enforcement, when necessary, of excommunication according to the mode already adopted.

The importance of these points being acknowledged, the synod promised its support to Calvin and Farel, and at the same time pressed upon them the duty of endeavouring to promote these objects in a spirit of Christian meekness. Viret and a Bernese minister were then sent as deputies to Geneva, to undertake the defence of the exiled ministers, and arrange for the proposed improvements 'in an amicable manner.' But it was of no avail. Although five weeks had elapsed since the preachers had been banished, during which time excited feeling might have been expected to subside, the councils and the citizens in general were so exasperated against them, particularly against Farel, to whom they owed so much, that on the 26th of May the decree of banishment was enforced by the almost unanimous vote of the whole assembly. So great was the agitation which prevailed, that when some members proposed that the preachers should be heard in their defence, others rose from their seats, and drew their swords, as if they would have killed them on the spot, had they been there.

It was now evident that the hostile spirit which Geneva manifested towards Farel and Calvin was but the expression of enmity against their doctrines, and not, as it was pretended, because of their refusal to adopt certain ceremonies. For a long time this spirit actuated the councils, so that Saunier, Cordier, and other friends of Farel, were banished from Geneva the following Christmas. When Calvin and Farel heard that their expulsion from Geneva had been confirmed, they went to Bâle, where they met with the deepest sympathy and kindness. They remained there for some time, waiting to see whither the Lord would direct their steps. Calvin soon went to Strasbourg.

CHAPTER IX.

THE persecution to which Farel had been subjected, revived in the hearts of the Neuchâtelans their former attachment to him; and now that Geneva had cast him out, they invited him once more to accept the pastoral office among them.

This call was very unexpected, and at first Farel declined to accept it. Information, which led him to fear that the difficulties in the way of maintaining ecclesiastical discipline at Neuchâtel would prove insurmountable, had reached him, and as, in the opinion of both Farel and Calvin, such discipline was essential to the due government of a church, he shrunk from undertaking a post in which he might not be able fully to carry out his views. His friends, however, who, from their knowledge of his character, rightly judged that hindrances which to some might prove insurmountable, would by him be easily overcome, urged him to receive the call as from God. He yielded, and with his usual energy set off without a moment's delay.

The Senate of Berne had from time to time removed the most efficient ministers from Neuchâtel into their newly acquired territories, and now scarcely one remained, whose doctrine and practice corresponded with Farel's idea of what a Christian minister ought to be. In some cases the openly profane lives of the clergy, and their consequent neglect of pastoral duties to the sick, the poor, and the ignorant, so disheartened Farel, that he almost wished he had not come amongst them. In his distress he wrote to Calvin, who replied, 'Wherever you turn your eyes you will find innumerable causes for lamentation. For myself, I see no end of them, and should lose my courage if the thought did not support me, that whatever may happen, the work of the Lord must not be abandoned, and, along with so much that is evil, the Lord always grants something that gladdens our hearts.'

It was some time before the truth of this last remark was experienced by Farel; on the contrary, troubles and anxieties seemed to multiply across his path.

His attempts to establish church discipline were unsuccessful. Neither could he introduce the regulations concerning the Lord's Supper, which had been agreed upon at Worms, and it grieved him to be obliged to administer the ordinance to many (some of whom were persons of rank and influence), of whose religious sentiments he could not approve.

A strong party opposed not only his doctrines, but his efforts to reform the external irregularities which existed. However, Farel did succeed in putting a stop to useless holidays, which gave rise to manifold evils. This restraint led many to wish, and some openly to express, their hope that he who so curtailed their enjoyments, would be banished from Neuchâtel as he had been from Geneva.

The city was divided into two parties,—one determined to expel Farel, the other to retain him. After a short but severe struggle, the majority decided that he should leave the city in two months. The greater number of the senate, and the most respectable among the citizens, however, were on his side. Calvin hastened to comfort him, while Viret, burning with indignation, so confounded the adverse party, while he encouraged the well-disposed among the people, that a reconciliation seemed at the door. But, unfortunately, just at that moment the bailiff interfered to prevent it.—When reminded that it was at the call of God that Farel had come to Neuchâtel, he replied in an insulting tone, 'Who can compel me to retain a servant when I am no longer satisfied with him?'

It was easy to impress the Bernese deputies with the belief that the city could never be quiet so long as it retained Farel, and that the sentence to leave the city within two months should be carried out. Farel replied, that having been invited to Neuchâtel by the church, by the church alone should he be dismissed. God, who had given it into his charge, would, he said, 'demand it from him.' To desert it would be to act the part of 'a traitor towards Christ.' He then requested that any man who had aught to accuse him of would state it, promising to submit willingly to any punishment, even death, should the witness prove true.

Foreseeing the injury which the expulsion of Farel, by such irregular means, would inflict upon pastoral authority in general, and perceiving, too, that no one had had moral courage to lay a true statement of the case before the Bernese government, Geneva now sent two deputies to Berne, to state the matter accurately. To the dismay of the evangelical party, Berne sent them back, stating that their views of the merits of the case had been rather strengthened by the details thus communicated to them; and the decision once more arrived at was, that, at the expiration of two months, Farel should be dismissed.

To this decision he again objected, and declared that he would rather suffer 'a thousand deaths' than desert the church in such a manner. His enemies say that he added, that he would not go, although his remaining in the city should cause the loss of life; but his friends deny his having uttered such intemperate language.

During this excitement Farel preserved a calm, unruffled spirit. Experiencing the truth of the promise, 'Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee,' calumny failed to disturb him; he saw the light of God's countenance, and that was enough. 'Whether God has determined to retain me here or not,' he said, 'is not what troubles me, for I am prepared for everything.' But he did suffer 'more mental agony than if he had been called to endure martyrdom,' when he thought of the distracted state of the church, and how its divisions made the ungodly to triumph and clap their hands; yet was he enabled to say, 'God is more powerful in raising me up and strengthening me, than Satan and all his servants are in keeping me down and discouraging me;' and to Him, who had so far led him, he willingly trusted the future.

The plague now raged violently at Neuchâtel. Farel daily visited the sick, comforting, with tenderest care, the sufferers, whether friends or foes. His enemies were softened, and confessed that, not overcome of evil, he had overcome evil with good.

The churches throughout Switzerland were not unconcerned spectators of these things. With sorrow and indignation they expressed their regret at the frequent attempts made by the enemies of the gospel, to loosen the bond of union among those who professed to be guided by its precepts. These letters produced a great effect, while the fervent love they expressed comforted and strengthened Farel. It humbled him also, and earnestly did he pray that in character he might become more conformed to the portrait which his friends had drawn of him.

The two months had now elapsed. The councils met, but the number present being small, they decided that another meeting of the congregation should be held the following Sabbath.

In the meantime the Senate of Berne sent for Farel, and proposed that he should voluntarily resign his office; but Farel was too honest for that, and refused, saying, 'That having been called to the ministry of Neuchâtel, his conscience would not permit him to give it up, unless he received another call equally clear;' then indeed he would readily obey, though it were to preach the gospel to the Turks at his own charge. His firmness so impressed the senate, that without further delay they wrote to Neuchâtel, saying, that they never really wished Farel to be removed at the expiration of two months, but that they had named that time in the expectation that before it had expired, popular excitement would have subsided into a calm. They further expressed their hope that 'so faithful a preacher of righteousness might be continued at Neuchâtel.'

The wisdom by which this letter was characterized made a great impression upon those to whom it was addressed, and popular feeling being in favour of Farel, the council revoked the decree of banishment, and at once communicated the good news to Berne.

There were, however, a few who hoped that when the governor (who was absent from Neuchâtel) should return, his influence would prevail to renew hostilities. They were not disappointed. Upon his arrival he gathered the disaffected around him, and requested a fresh investigation of the entire matter.

Once more Farel was summoned to Berne. Deputies from both parties also attended; and as they could not come to an agreement, it was decided that, unless a reconciliation were effected within eight days, the question should then be settled by a majority of votes.

During these eight days, twelve men on each side used every endeavour to bring about the much-wished-for reconciliation, and having failed, the votes were taken, when two-thirds of the assembly declared in favour of Farel. His enemies were thus put to silence, while his friends rejoiced, and blessed the Lord for his gracious interposition in thus rescuing his church. In a few months every trace of the late disturbance had disappeared, and Farel, now re-appointed for life, devoted all his powers, mental and bodily, to promote the glory of God, and the welfare of the flock over which the Great Shepherd of the sheep had placed him.

The expulsion of Farel and his friends from Geneva in 1538, was followed by the most melancholy results. James Bernard, and a few other reformed ministers, remained in the city; but they had not courage to raise their voices against error in defence of truth. In some churches mass was openly performed, while the reading of the Scriptures was restricted, and in some cases totally forbidden.

This wretched state of things revived the hopes of the Romish party, and the 'learned and eloquent' Cardinal Sadolet, bishop of the neighbouring see of Carpentra, in Dauphiny, addressed to 'his dearly beloved brethren, the magistrates, council, and citizens of Geneva,' a long letter, by which to bring back the wanderers to the true church.

This pastoral being written in Latin, was a dead letter to most of those to whom it was addressed; and to this circumstance Beza attributes the fact, that though the council courteously acknowledged it, it made no impression upon its members, or upon the magistrates. Indeed, the latter, so far from desiring a return to the Romish Church, passed a resolution 'henceforth to exclude from the city all who refused to reject the Roman Catholic faith.'

Calvin's prediction, that while the enemies of the Reformation regarded his banishment as necessary for their security, it would but hasten their destruction, was justified by events. The four syndics who had taken the lead in the late tumults, were made terrible examples of God's retributive justice. One was executed for murder; another, being accused of sedition, endeavoured to escape through a window, and falling, died of his wounds. The remaining two, having betrayed the interests of the city, were condemned to perpetual banishment.

Shortly after the restoration of Calvin to Geneva, Farel visited him there; after which he went to Worms, to ask aid from the princes there assembled, in behalf of his persecuted fellow-countrymen in France. At the same time he stated some of the wants of his own church at Neuchâtel, and his views respecting church discipline, which he desired to see carried out. The assembly, convinced of the wisdom of his suggestions, sanctioned a system of ecclesiastical discipline, which had been drawn up by Melancthon.

In September 1542, Farel visited Metz, in which city the Reformation struggled for the mastery, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the clergy, the majority of the senate and the nobility. He preached his first sermon in the churchyard of the Dominicans, while the bells were rung to prevent his voice being heard; nevertheless, we are told that above three thousand persons assembled again the following day to hear him.

Fearing a fresh disturbance, the friends of the gospel entreated Farel to discontinue preaching until the excitement had abated.

He was soon after summoned before the council, and asked by whose authority he had preached. 'By the authority of Christ,' replied Farel, 'and at the request of his members.' He then urged the senate to do their duty as Christian magistrates, and allow the free preaching of the gospel. While the senate deliberated, Farel was led away out of the town by his friends, and thus once more escaped the enemy; and shortly after the plague broke out in Metz, by which many houses, hitherto closed against him, were opened to receive his visits to the sick and dying. This returning of good for evil produced a great effect upon the people. But the civil authorities continued their opposition, and imposed a fine upon all who presumed to visit the obnoxious minister; they even refused to allow a deputation in his behalf from the reformed cantons to enter the city.

Farel retired to the neighbouring town of Gorze, under the protection of Count William of Finstenburg, and, with scarcely any interruption, preached alternately in the parish church and in the abbey chapel, until Easter Sunday, 1543. On that day a most disgraceful scene took place. About 200 persons, men and women, had assembled to hear Farel, and receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. The evening of that day, a son of the Duke of Guise, who was related to the Bishop of Metz, and commanded a troop of horse in the neighbourhood, fell upon the reformed party with his soldiers, massacred many, and drove others into the Moselle. Farel was wounded in the struggle, and with difficulty escaped to the city. It was well known that all this happened with the knowledge and approval of the king of France. There was, therefore, little use in appealing to him for redress; his only reply was a denial of having taken any part in the transaction. No attempt was made to punish the offenders. Count William supplied litters to convey Farel and the rest of the wounded to Strasburg; and shortly afterwards the Senate of Metz, with the sanction of the emperor, Charles v., utterly prohibited the profession of the reformed doctrines, drove many of their adherents into exile, and required that all books which inculcated their opinions, and particularly psalm and hymn books, should be 'delivered up under severe penalties.'

Farel warmly sympathized with this suffering church, and, unable to help her members, he wrote to assure them of his desire for their welfare, and of his continued prayers, that God, whose ways are unsearchable, would make all those apparently adverse circumstances work together for their good.

At Viret's request he visited Zurich, before he returned to Neuchâtel, in the hope of meeting some influential persons, whom he might induce to exert themselves to check the arbitrary proceedings of the French court, by whose order hundreds of Protestants were then perishing at the stake. It does not appear that he succeeded.

(To be continued.)

THE OLD TREES OF FAITH.

I ADDRESS myself now to those who think that they are investigating; to those who read a great deal, and raise a great many questions, and think themselves wise because they have knowledge. A man may know, and yet know to little purpose. Knowledge is like lumber. Wisdom is that which constructs the lumber into a dwelling. Any amount of lumber is but a shapeless heap, until the skill to use it comes. Knowledge is raw material. Wisdom is the practical using up of this raw material of knowledge. Now, there are many persons who have knowledge merely, and think they have wisdom. At this time, when there is so strong a tendency towards scepticism on the side of natural science; at this time, when, in the name of Reformation, so many humanitarians are scoffing at the word of God, and the church, and religion, and are putting forth various poetic conceptions of humanity and benevolence; at this time, when there are so many geniuses of literature that are drifting away from the cross, and so many tinkers of legislation that are filling society full of all manner of notions,—at this time it is the peculiar danger of smart, quick, and conceited young men to think that they are making great progress, because they are raising infinite questions. They are raising questions, but settling none. They are reasoning, and reasoning, and reasoning; but the reasoning that they indulge in is of a kind that tends to take away old foundations, without putting new ones in their place; and they are destroying the structure itself.

In the West, such is the prejudice that men have against forests which stand in the way of fruitful fields that they fain would draw sustenance from, that there is a perfect insanity of the axe. When men first go into forest regions, they hack and hew, and old oaks five hundred years old come down relentlessly; and the ash, and the hickory, and the walnut, and the tulip-tree, and the maple, are all pitched headlong into ruin, until acre after acre is cleared, and the timber is burned, and the stumps are grubbed, and smooth ground is obtained. And then they build their house; and when, by-and-by, the summer sun begins to pour down, melting hot, on them, they run to the forest for trees to shelter their dwelling, and get and set out around it some little saplings, that are about as good as a broom! There were umbrageous old forest trees, but they chopped them down; and then all they could do was to wait for others to grow. And you cannot make a tree grow as quick as you can make a bargain. Trees require time to grow, and they take their time to grow too.

Now, here are men going into unexplored regions, with mighty trees all round about them, which ages, through joy and suffering, have been working up. We have various structures in society, various truths in religion, various experiences that have embodied themselves in symbolic, scientific, or institutional forms; and men are running round with the axe of investigation, hewing at this and that, and cutting all before them. And by-and-by, when they have, as they call it, 'investigated'—that is, chopped everything off—they will want something to supply the place of what they have destroyed, and they will set out a little theory that will grow about a foot in twenty years, and they will go about with nothing to shelter them. There has been many a man that has thought he was investigating, when he was only destroying the faith of his fathers, his own belief in religion, and his own trust in Jesus Christ, and made the world to himself one great, giddy, empty, swirling phantasmagoria. And when at last sorrow came; when the first bolt struck through and through his heart; when he looked into the little bed, and found nothing there, and he followed the black hearse and the hideous coffin to the graveyard; when all that he loved in the world was gone, and there was not another one that ran to meet him, and trusted in him, and believed in him; when there was not another one that smiled so sweetly in his presence; when God, or something, he knew not what, had killed his child, and he had seen it buried in the ground, he went away, with no God in heaven or on earth. He felt, 'Oh that I were dead! oh that I were dead!' And then, while he was in that dreary and helpless state, there came along some fantastic lecturer, some nondescript minister, and he happened to fall in with him; and this man, that could not take the sweet, simple, fruit-bearing faith of his father and mother, joined himself to this impostor, and embraced some strange doctrine. And so, after he has cut down the century oaks, he sets out a little miserable shrub to supply their place. There must be something for the human heart to lean upon. It is not in the nature of a vine to lie upon the ground; and it is not in the nature of a man not to have some great truth to cling to.

Ye that are hewing down the old trees of faith, stop! Do not take away a tree till you know what will take its place. You cannot bear the fierceness of the noonday sun. A man that believes in nothing, is like a man in the great Sahara of Africa, where there is no fountain, no palm, no grass; nothing but the hot sand below, the hotter sun above; weariness, despair, and death.

I might also apply this subject in the same way to the undigested knowledge of our times; to that mania which exists for liberalism; to the thousand ways in which men are following the truth, as they think, but in which they are only avoiding it, as I think. I pass, however, from that kind of application to two or three others of a more practical nature.

First, let me narrate a conversation which I overheard this week in the cars. A lady (her tone, and manner, and conversation showed her to be a person of culture) was repeating to some one, loud enough to be heard when the cars were not in motion, a conversation, in which she had been asked if she belonged to the church. She said: 'I replied to him, that I had the misfortune not to belong to any church. For,' said she, 'when there are so many churches, and when they are so different—when doctors disagree, how can it be expected that I should know?' I heard just so much, and then the noise of travel was resumed, and the rest was shut out. But I thought to myself—for I was a gentleman, and did not look round to see who she was—I thought to myself how she looked, and what was the habit of her mind; and I said to myself, 'Here is a person who has confounded churches with religion; who in religion has confounded the tools with the crop.' And if I had spoken to her, I should have said: 'Madam, it is not probable that you are fit to belong to any church, and therefore I do not ask you why you do not join a church; but I do say that you need to be acquainted with your own heart. You have not learned yet to control pride. You have not learned yet to escape the wiles and guiles of vanity. You are not truthful, with the simplicity of childhood. You do not know the most sacred of all learning—the lore of divine truth. You are not yet redeemed from the dominion of things visible and earthly. You do not live above the world, as its servant.' And my message to her would have been: 'Why do you stand talking about churches, when you know that the root and marrow of the matter is—are you at peace with the Lord Jesus Christ?' She was in the condition of not having made up her mind about the church. She was neglecting to make up her mind about those great verities which the church was ordained to teach, and those states which it was its errand to produce. —Beecher.

COME.*

LET these words not merely ring in your ears, but let them be on your tongue. Is the God that called you indeed urgently calling on your fellow-men? Then what less can you do than let Him find an utterance for his overtures through your voice, and an agency for his embassy in your exertions? 'Let him that heareth say, Come.' In the dense masses of heathenism that cover so large an area of our globe—in the multitudes steeped in ignorance and vice that infest the lanes and streets of our cities, the highways and hedges of our land—in the multitudes more that, beneath the pomp of external splendour, or the guise of common respectability, conceal a heart at enmity with truth—your eye rests on the very scene on which, from all eternity, God's eye rested when his love moved Him to arise for our deliverance, and to utter this call. In proportion as that same love inspires your heart—in proportion as you gain a clearer insight into the real condition of your perishing fellow-men—in like proportion will you feel impelled to take up the words as they drop from God's lips, and cry, 'Unto you, oh my fellow-men, God is calling, and his voice is to the sons of men.' In proportion as love to man and knowledge of his condition—the elements which roused God to this enterprise—exist in you, they will produce the same effects in your heart which they did and do in his, and urge you to be fellow-workers with Him in the work which they urged Him to undertake. Oh, then, let love to your fellow-travellers to eternity—a cordial regard for their welfare—gain an ascendancy over your heart; let a true and full knowledge of their condition gain a lodgment amongst the clearest of your ideas and the strongest of your convictions. By avoiding, in your external behaviour, everything that tends to efface the marks which distinguish God's witnesses from a world lying in wickedness around them, and thus to hide the contrast, and leave that world undisturbed in its self-contentment,—by a bold maintenance and active dissemination of the truth, do what in you lies to translate men from the kingdom of Satan into the kingdom of God's dear Son. Human hearts and human minds are the materials out of which either God makes saints and freemen, or Satan makes fiends and slaves. Contribute your efforts to the former of these causes.

To those of you who have hitherto remained unaffected by this call, God's message is, 'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.' 'Now is the accepted time,'—'Now is the accepted time,' the voice is always calling, at morn, at noon, at eve; to childhood, to youth, to manhood, to old age; and if ye never or seldom hear it, it is because innumerable other voices are calling, and you give them the preference. The voice of pleasure calls, with its bewitching tones, and steals your thoughts and hearts away. The voice of ambition calls. The many distracting voices of the cares and contentions of life call—'the strong deep hum of business;' and amid their unhallowed uproar the voice from heaven is drowned. But there must have been seasons in the life of each one of you, when some Sabbath-day of unusual solemnity, or the hand of death visible amid the circle of your relations or friends, or sickness laying your head on an uneasy pillow, may for a time have hushed the din and tumult of this world's pursuits and joys. Then, in the solemn, quieter interval, you may have heard a still small voice gently remonstrating with you, and saying, 'How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? Turn you at my reproof. Behold, I will make known my words unto you, I will pour out my Spirit upon you, I will receive you graciously, and love you freely.' Such is the language of the voice now; but if you allow the hour that fixes for ever your future state to overtake you ere you have accepted its invitation, you will hear it again, and its language will be, 'I called, and ye refused; I stretched out my hand, and ye did not regard it; but ye set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof: therefore shall ye eat of the fruit of your own way, and be filled with your own devices.' God forbid that such should be the doom of any here!

* From 'Memorials of the late Rev. H. M. Douglas.' Edited by the Rev. J. MACGREGOR. Edinburgh: A. Elliot, 1867. A volume of superior remains; the 'Memorials' of one over whose early departure many will mourn.

THE OLD SONGS.

IT is Monday; Sabbath's work is done; the rain falls drearily. I am a boy, away from a brother's society and a sister's love, from a father's counsel and a mother's prayers.

The future is a dim vision of ever-changing colours; while the past is a happy picture, that I fain would live over again.

The future is like the shadow of passing clouds, which moves silently away as we behold it; while the past is like the miniature of a lost friend,—the longer we gaze upon it the more we love it, the sweeter the recollections it brings. It is true we have hope, and some prospect for the future; but the past is as a cherished album, that holds the likeness of many a departed friend. It is filled with many a bright picture, hallowed treasure, and sacred recollection. We love to take it down, turn its leaves over and over, look at its familiar scenes, and recall its pleasures, that passed quite too soon. Among all the bright spots that beautify the backward path of life, none have a nearer place to our heart than the hours we spent at home in the society of our mother. Among the many recollections that crowd our mind, the good old songs that mother used to sing are far the sweetest and dearest.

The sweetest memories I have, are those of mother at work, singing:

'The judgment day is rolling round;'
'Oh! sing to me of heaven,
When I am called to die.'

Or those other heavenly words:

'Low down in this beautiful valley,
Where love crowns the meek and the lowly.'

These hymns are sacred. There is no music of the present day that can awaken such emotions in our heart. Occasionally, in prayer or class-meetings, some one will sing some of these old songs, the first note of which sets in motion a train of reflection that lifts the soul far above the common walks of life, even to its God.

Give me the music of the fathers, when their hearts were full of the love of God. Mothers, sing before your children; your songs will do more to lead them to God than the pastor's sermon. Let them know that you have a religion that lives through the week, and that cheers you while at your work. Your singing may lead an erring son back to rectitude and to God. Then sing, and sing the old songs.—Northern Christian Advocate.

THE CLOCK OF HUMAN LIFE.

'Tis one o'clock; the silvery chimes
Are ringing soft and low
Over an infant's cradle bed,
As it swings to and fro;
While, smiling near, a mother bends,
Listening to the clear bells
Ringing the babe's sweet advent hour
In her heart's deepest wells.
Tinkle! tinkle! soft and clear
On the loving mother's ear.

'Tis two—three—four—in merry peals
Bells strike the passing hour;
While bliss pours in, through every sense,
As on this mortal shore
The tripping feet of childhood fly,
While air, and earth, and sky
Are full of joy, and childhood's bells
Are ringing clear and high.
Jingle! jingle! clear and high
Ring the bells of childhood's sky.

Now five and six ring on the ear,
In deeper golden notes;
And tender chimes and loving peals
Round youth's sweet dream-life floats.
Those notes are filling every sense
Of the young maiden life;
And their soft, mellow lullabys
Hush every thought of strife.
Love me! love me! ring the bells,
As round fair youth their music swells.

'Tis seven now—'tis eight—'tis nine;
And deeper sounds the bell,
As, in the solemn march of life,
They ring with fuller swell;
And tell of strife, and toil, and care—
Of grief and sundered ties;
And to the heart subdued by grief,
They're ringing in the sky,
Of rest above, where Jesus dwells;
Come home! come home! they faintly swell.

'Tis ten o'clock; the vanished hours
Ring out their warning tones;
The silver notes of infancy
And golden chimes are gone.
The past is all a fleeting dream;
The future—oh, how grand,
As, 'mid its deep and solemn peals,
With parted lips we stand!
Ding dong! ding dong! it slowly rolls,
Pealing the requiem of souls.

The clock has struck eleven; hark!
The awful moments pass;
'Mid muffled bells we hear them die,
And watch Time's hour-glass.
Solemn and slow, we hear their knell;
They ring of ending strife;
There's more of tender joy than grief,
Which tolls of endless life.
Oh! joyful knells, life's evening bells,
Of conflicts past their music tells.

'Tis twelve o'clock; the midnight hour
Rolls out its thrilling knell;
Ah! not of grief, and not of death,
Does its deep tolling tell.
To Christian souls—so high, so grand—
Are the bright hopes it rings,
That, 'mid the solemn knells of time,
The parting spirit sings.
As midnight bells fade soft away,
'Tis endless one in upper day.

'Tis endless one in that bright world,
One everlasting day;
Hours have pealed their last farewell,
And minutes passed away.
'Tis one effulgent, brilliant noon,
One flood of light and love;
One solemn, never-ending now,
In that sweet home above.
Oh, the deep joy of evermore,
When waking first on that blest shore!

—Episcopal Recorder.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'God said.'—GEN. I. 3.

THIS chapter, in many places, prefixes the name of God to what is said or done, that there may be no mistake as to the speaker or doer; and that God himself may be prominently presented to us in his divine personality. We read, 'God created,' 'God made,' 'God saw.' But the most frequent word here is, 'God SAID.' As it is elsewhere written, 'He spake, and it was done;' 'He commanded the light to shine out of darkness;' 'The worlds were framed by the word of God;' 'Upholding all things by the word of his power.'

God's 'word' is, then, the one medium or link between Him and creation. Creation is, in one sense, immediate, as the result of direct power; in another, it is mediate, as accomplished by the intervention of speech. How far this mode of statement is a condescension to man's weakness, we will not say; but the frequency with which it is repeated shows what stress God lays on it. There was evidently some intervention of something corresponding to human speech, if indeed the actual words were not spoken just as they are set down. Between the 'nothing' and the 'something'—non-existence and creation—there intervenes only the word; but, after that, many other agencies come in, animate or inanimate,—second causes, natural laws and processes, all evolving the great original fiat; for it is only as in connection with it, that these laws and processes have any power at all. The power or energy of the original 'word' still lasts, still vibrates through the universe, still keeps creation in motion, still preserves the sequences and orderliness of all created things above and beneath. He is the sovereign speaker and the sovereign worker. All are under his authority. He 'saith to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh.'

It is that same word that is still acting—as efficacious, as potent as at the first. Why does yon sun still move and shine? Not merely because of a word spoken some thousands of years since, but because that word is operative and energetic still. We read the original 'God said' in every sunbeam and in every revolution, in every sunrise and sunset. 'By the same word are these things kept in store.' Vitality, growth, beauty, fruitfulness, are indications not of a past power, but of a present energy,—a continuation of the original impulse, or rather, the very same original impulse still prolonged and working.

When the Son of God was here, it was thus He acted in doing his miracles. He spoke, and it was done. 'Lazarus, come forth;' 'Young man, arise;' 'Damsel, arise;' 'Be opened.' It was a word that was still the medium. And in his case we see the fitness; for He was 'the Word.' But there is the same fitness in the first creation; for He was himself the Creator. It was He who spoke the creating word at first.

1. He speaks to us in creation.—This earth and these heavens are the echo of his voice. God speaks to us in each part of his handiwork. It is not 'nature's voice,' as men speak. It is the true, authentic voice of God. He speaks each day to us, and is never silent. As He spoke at first, and the universe heard his voice, so He speaks through these to us now. Shall we hear or not?

2. He speaks to us in the word itself.—This book embodies his words. Creation is the visible embodiment of his power and wisdom; it is the result of his words. His power came forth in speech, as a channel or medium. This book of his is, in a different way, the effect of his speaking. It is his written wisdom and power. There is his voice to us! The thunder and tempest are his loud voice of grandeur; the sunshine and the gentle breeze his still small voice; but deeper, clearer, keener, softer, yet more penetrating than all these, is his word. Men speak of the Bible being the thoughts of God, but not his words; as if you could speak of a certain piece of music, apart from the notes which compose it; or of the sea, apart from the drops which make it up; as if you might say that creation embodied the general purpose of God, but not any minute or special designs. That book is what it is, because it contains the words of God. To our outer ear God speaks to us, and through our outer ear to our inner man. For it is through the word, and in connection with it, that God communicates with us. That word quickens: 'Thy word hath quickened me.' That word produces faith: 'Faith cometh by hearing.' That word strengthens, comforts, heals, nourishes, revives. It gets into contact with each part of our souls, and works its own work here. And it does this because it is divine. No human words could be trusted to work its work in a human soul so unrestrictedly. It is not eloquence, nor poetry, nor argument, but something more than all these together,—something peculiar and indescribable, which man could not have formed, and which he cannot understand, that makes it so suitable for the soul of man.

3. He speaks to us in providences.—Let us listen reverently to everything that happens, and we shall recognise a divine voice in all. No providence is dumb. No sorrow, no joy, no sickness, no recovery, no calamity, public or private, is dumb. 'God said' sounds out from them all. By them God is pursuing us at every step, and all the day stretching out his hands to us. How articulate, how eloquent are the daily events of the commonest life on earth! Yet we close our ears! Day unto day utters speech, yet we will neither interpret nor hearken!

4. He speaks to us by his Sabbaths.—I mention this especially because of its connection with the word in Genesis. Each Sabbath is to us a silver trumpet speaking direct from God. It gives no uncertain sound. It speaks of grace, and love, and rest. It is God's weekly invitation to the weary. He who would take from us our Sabbaths, would silence the voice of God.

Thus it is that God speaks to us. Yet, deeper than all these, there is a divine and irresistible voice speaking to our inner man. Not separate from the word, yet still distinct; the direct, sovereign, almighty voice of God, by which the new creation is formed. Hence it is that, out of many hearing the same sermon, or reading the same Bible, some believe, and some believe not. As in the old creation, so in the new, it is God that is the speaker and the worker.

What noble and mighty things are words! Through them we wield the minds of our fellowmen. We cannot operate on dead matter through them, as God can, but on living souls we can. What a responsibility on us for our words! What a danger and sin in idle or evil words! Let our words be ever true and holy.

DIVINE DRAWINGS.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

'Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee.'—JER. XXXI. 3.

GOD'S dealings with his people are very different; and yet, in all their strange variety and manifoldness, He here declares that they are all loving-kindnesses, — the very best that divine wisdom and power can make them. God's actings on his people are twofold: outward and inward, visible and invisible; the one affecting their body and worldly condition, the other affecting their souls and spiritual state. We all see how various is the outward condition of God's people. Some are rich and noble, others poor and unknown. Some begin life in poverty, and rise to wealth; others begin in affluence, and end in want. Some have unbroken health and strength; others spend their days in pining sickness—helpless, bedrid invalids. Some have large enlightened minds; others have little more than the dawning of intelligence, and the scantiest store of information. The same variety is seen in their inward history. Some learn early to know and fear God; others live to advanced life—sometimes even to their deathbed—in ignorance and sin. Some have the light stealing gently into their minds, and almost unconsciously purifying their hearts; others are suddenly awakened, and see themselves on the brink of the pit. Some have much abiding peace and joy in believing; others walk often in darkness, and have no light,—for in grace, as in nature, there is a shady as well as a sunny side, so long as God's pilgrims remain in the valley. But, in the eye of the Lord, one word describes all these different phases of the divine procedure—it is loving-kindness.

The world does not think this; God's own people often do not think it. Steeped in poverty, afflicted, bereaved, cast down, and disconsolate, they too often doubt, and murmur, and complain. They say, 'All these things are against me; my bones are dried, my hope is lost, I shall one day perish!' This must be very trying to the loving, pitiful Lord. He has, indeed, repeatedly told us as much; and He sets a special value on those trustful ones, who meekly, patiently, hopefully humble themselves under his mighty hand, and who, when they cannot curb and keep down the uprisings of the flesh, yet determine to put a bridle on their lips, and say, 'I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it.' But, notwithstanding the world's sneers, and his own people's complaints, and the pain it causes to himself, God holds on his way. He knows that his regimen and discipline—the rod, the scourge, the knife, the empty cup, the stirred-up nest—is really loving-kindness, is true mercy, and that they in time will come to see that it is so. Here we see darkly, as in a glass, and know only in part; but God sees all things clearly, and knows the end from the beginning, and therefore his thoughts and ways are so different from ours. Lately, when standing by the deathbed of a child, suddenly called away, and beholding the sorrow of the surprised and weeping parents, my heart was ready to give way, when my godly friend, the medical man, standing by, suggested, in a whisper, the idea, 'Perhaps taken away from the evil to come.' It was a seasonable thought; it seemed to strike and comfort the parents; and I have sometimes used it since then, in speaking to persons similarly situated. God never unnecessarily afflicts his people; there is always a need-be for every trial. It is sent in loving-kindness; and they sooner or later come to discern, appreciate, and acknowledge the character of his dealings with them. They see that all his paths are mercy and truth, that in very faithfulness He has afflicted them; and so the lonely widow, and the childless parent, and the weary inmate of the sick-chamber, the endangered mariner, and the deserted soul, that has long been seeking his face, and crying, 'Oh that I knew where I might find Him!'—at last all unite to swell the same gracious song: 'Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!'

What is the object of God's dealings with his people? It is to draw them to himself. They are all by nature far off from Him; and not only so, they are averse, enemies, alienated in their minds, and by wicked works. They are lovers of earthly things, and growingly attached to them, by depraved tastes and evil habits. They are held fast and blinded by the god of this world, who strives to keep them from knowing and receiving the truth of the gospel. God has done much to open the way for their return to Him in peace. He has sent his Son to die for their sins, that they may be forgiven, and that, being delivered from this present evil world, they may come back as children to their Father's house. His free invitation to all is: 'Be ye reconciled; for God hath made his own Son to be sin for us, though He knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. Wherefore, receive ye not the grace of God in vain.' But they are so engrossed and preoccupied with business, pleasure, sin; they are so blinded and hardened by pride and unbelief, that they will not attend, believe, obey; and so God has to awaken, alarm, enlighten, and subdue them. He cannot draw them to himself by a mere act of power, as we pull a stone out of the earth in which it is embedded. They are reasonable creatures, and He deals with them according to the nature which He has given them. They have understandings, consciences, hearts, and wills; and He deals with these by his word, providence, and Spirit, in order that, heartily and willingly, —not only because they see that it is needful, but also because they feel that it is right, and wise, and good,—they may arise and come to Him with all their heart, saying, 'We have sinned, erred, done evil very much; but now forgive us, for thy Son's sake, and receive us into thy service and favour.' This is the object which God has in view in all his dealings, providential and spiritual, personal and social, with his people; it is to draw them up to himself—draw them on in his way, and finally draw them into his eternal glory. He sends his messengers to plead with them, while they are still in their sins: 'Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me!' Only acknowledge thine iniquity—'Return unto me, for I have redeemed thee;' and then He watches patiently, hopefully for the result. He is ever looking out for the first approach of returning prodigals; He is ever hearkening for the first groans of bemoaning Ephraims, the first prayers of awakened Sauls.

What is the effect of God's dealings? They are always successful with his own. His methods of dealing, as we have seen, are very different, and they are necessarily so; for, while all are lost and ruined, there is yet among them an indescribable variety of temperament, character, and besetting sins. Each needs a different training; and hence the different ways in which He leads, and the endless variety of wheels on which He fashions his vessels of mercy. One is sensual, another proud, another vain, another covetous; and so the Lord must have different ways for Peter, and John, and Nathanael, and Thomas. It is when God's people become acquainted with their peculiar character, or the special service for which they are destined, that they begin to discern wise loving-kindness in all God's dealings, and acknowledge that He has led them in the right way. One is brought in early, that he may have growing influence and weight from long consistency. Another is left to his heart's lusts, and so he runs into open, flagrant sin; but thus he comes to know and abhor himself, his repentance is deep and manifest, and many see, and fear, and acknowledge that it is the Lord. One has his nest again and again stirred up, because he is inclined to settle on his lees, and sleep with the world. Another has his cup always full, and his head anointed with oil, that these coals of loving-kindness may melt and soften his rugged, selfish heart. God's object in all these things is to draw; and the result is, that they are drawn. He gathers all his olive-berries, even from the topmost boughs. Not one is left behind. He brings them out of the world, as He brought Israel out of Egypt, spite of all Pharaoh's opposition. Sooner or later they arise and come: the north gives up, and the south keeps not back; his sons come from far, and his daughters from the ends of the earth. They hear a voice which others hear not; they feel a power which others feel not; they see an ensign lifted up, a rendezvous opened, which others behold not; and so, one by one, or in little clusters, they break loose from all their entanglements, and hasten to Shiloh, the gathering-place of the people. Not one of them is lost, not one hoof is left behind. The stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed time, and the turtle and the crane observe the time of their coming; but more surely, unerringly, infallibly, do these children of promise, in their hour of merciful visitation, arise and press through every obstacle to their Father's house.

God's motive in all this. It is love—everlasting love. This is the key that opens the mystery of God; this is the explanation of all God's ways in providence, grace, and glory. This answers all questions, disperses all doubts, removes all fears. Why am I led in this dark, circuitous way? says the doubting pilgrim. It is love. Why have I these strange experiences,—castings down, and liftings up; fallings away, and restorations; discoveries of sin, and discoveries of grace? It is love. Why am I here? says the glorified saint in heaven. It is love. Love brought Him from his Father's bosom, and love keeps Him standing at your door and knocking, till you hear and take Him in. Know, believe, appropriate this divine love. Live in it, dwell in it, walk in it. There is no fear in this love. It is sunshine, peace, hope, and joy. It hallows, gladdens, and comforts the soul. Lord, remember me with this love. Say to me, 'I have loved thee with an everlasting love,' and then my proud, stony heart will be broken and humbled, and I will mourn before Thee, because of all my sin and ungodliness, by which I have pierced and wounded thy dear Son.

Friend, whoever you are, unless this love get hold of you, you will be lost. Unless this love get hold of you, you will never be changed and transformed. 'We love Him, because He first loved us.'

'We cannot trace the twinings
In God's long cord of love;
We cannot see the windings
By matchless wisdom wove.

E'en as a skein, when ravell'd,
Still holds the hidden end,
So love's mysterious windings
Around our chastenings blend.

That cord can ne'er be broken;
'Tis held by God alone;
His own seal is the token;
He knows, He helps his own.'

COLUMBA, THE FIRST MISSIONARY TO SCOTLAND.

FIFTY years before the birth of Christ, Cæsar had landed in Britain, and four hundred and twenty-six years subsequent to our Lord's incarnation, the last Roman had left the island. Paganism, with its idolatry, and ignorance, and debasement, overspread the land at the beginning of this epoch; and long after, Druidism, with its delusive magic, and despotic priesthood, and degrading rites, was supreme in Scotland.

If, however, Cæsar and Agricola brought us battle and bondage—the Roman fetter, and the Roman yoke, as the planned object of their invasion,—they also brought us, without their design or concurrence, the Bible and the way of life. Conquest was what Rome came for. She bequeathed to us Christianity; and when the eagle relaxed its iron grasp in A.D. 426, it was found that the seed of truth had been scattered far and wide. At this time there were four kingdoms within the narrow limits of Scotland; or, first, that of the Picts, embracing Galloway and Wigton; then that of the Angles, comprehending the Lothians, Dumfries, and Roxburgh; next, that of the Scots, extending over Argyle and the Hebrides; and last, that of the Caledonians, which included Inverness and the north. In the latter two of these divisions, it would seem that superstition reigned in sevenfold darkness; whilst there is good reason for believing, that in regard to the first two, the old couplet was not far from the truth:

'In years from Christ, two hundred and three,
Scotland a Christian kingdom came to be.'

But the Christian faith, in its purity and grace, is more obnoxious to the Papacy than even heathenism; and no sooner was it surmised at Rome that Wigton had received the gospel, than, in A.D. 360, one Ninian is despatched to pollute the water; the same malignant work being done in A.D. 431, by Palladius, throughout Kincardineshire and the Mearns. Romanist historians may ask us to admire and reverence both Ninian and Palladius, as the pioneers and prototypes of evangelical missionaries, and we need not disparage either their holiness or their zeal; but, beyond all doubt, they were trained at Rome, and were sent hither by Rome, and urged the pretensions of Rome, and were the tools of Rome, perhaps unawares, not to preach salvation, but to weave the net of priestcraft.

A truer evangelist, if not a better Christian, either than Ninian of Whithorn, in the fourth century, or Palladius of Fordoun, in the fifth, was Servanus, who laboured about A.D. 440, on the banks of the Forth, and did not a little for the true illumination of his countrymen. Posterior to Servanus, lived Ternan, a man of saintly character and manifold enterprise, and who, though he resided chiefly in Aberdeenshire, is said to have set up a monastery at Abernethy, near Perth, a hundred years previous to the kindred establishment of Iona. Perhaps a brighter luminary than any of those just mentioned was Kentigern, a pupil of Servanus, by whom he was taught Christ, a contemporary of Columba, who loved him as a brother, and to whom, in all likelihood, we owe the diffusion of the truth as it is in Jesus, from his residence in Glasgow, over all the basin of the Clyde.

But leaving behind, though not out of sight, such subalterns as Serf of Culross, Ternan of Banchory, Mungo of Glasgow, let us come to him who was as David to those three mighty ones—we mean Columba; for, were the life this apostle led, and the work he achieved, and the darkness he dispelled, and the heritage of good he bequeathed, only understood, it would be felt that, after Knox, he was the greatest gift God bestowed upon our land.

Patrick, son of Calpurnius, was a man of God and an apostle of Christ, as all who read his 'Confession' must acknowledge. Having been quickened by the Spirit through the cross, he yearned, from that hour, to make known the salvation which had filled himself with joy; and in A.D. 432, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Armagh, he began that career of labour and testimony which made Ierne a Goshen of evangelical light, whilst Caledonia, the land of his birth, was shrouded in superstitious darkness. How long this fair star continued to shine, is not recorded; but though it probably began to sink towards the close of the fifth century, it left its radiance on every hill and valley; and when there was much faith in Ireland, Columba was born.

It was on the 7th of December A.D. 521, at Gartan, in Donegal, that this event took place; and both through his father, Fedelmith, and his mother, Eithne, he was sprung from royal ancestors. He was baptized at Temple Douglas by Cruithnechan, and named Colum; though afterwards, in allusion to his punctual attendance at church, even when but a boy, Cille, which signifies a church, was added as a surname, whence he is at times called Columkill. Carefully trained from his earliest years, he enjoyed the advantage of the best masters in every department, and studied various languages, as well as theology, with vigour and success. It would appear as if he possessed an aptitude for the acquirement of foreign tongues; and three odes of his, which have been preserved, may be referred to as showing that he was at once a classical Latinist and an expert versifier. The polish of his style, and the elevation of his thoughts, at the same time indicate that he was not without the elements of genius, and might have easily won pre-eminence and power on any field of literature.

At what period of his life God woke up, in his grace, the heart of this youth, we have not been told; but so pure, and gentle, and heavenly was he even as a little child, that they were then accustomed to call him 'Saint.' Scarce had he entered into manhood when he became 'a deacon,' and went to reside in Leinster. Not long after this, he took up his abode as a student in the monastic seminary of St. Clonard, and, when still there, was ordained 'a priest.' But there is an influence at work within him, which will not suffer that he content himself with a narrow sphere, or common service. Columba now separates himself more specially from the world, and joins a select brotherhood at Glasneven; there, in the company of wise men and learned, bent on charity, and ambitious of holiness, to prepare himself for the duties and hardships of a strenuous career. Cultured, animated, braced by his retirement on the banks of the Liffey, and perhaps all the better equipped as a soldier of the Cross,—seeing that Glasneven at this time was no more than a collection of rude huts,—Columba steps forth in a little while, ripe, and eager to do work for Christ, in his own loved native country. He is only twenty-four years of age; but young as he is, he founds an abbey at Derry, and in A.D. 546, raises a mission institute in the north of Ireland, in aim and form similar to the one which he just has quitted in the south. Having placed all his arrangements at Derry on a firm basis in A.D. 553, just seven short years later he calls into existence another monastery at Durrow, and creates, in the very heart of his own Scotia, a new centre of Christian light and evangelistic impulse.

From the ecclesiastical academies, which the sagacity, and wealth, and patriotism of Columba have organized at Derry and Durrow, devoted men have gone forth to every region of the world; and in hopes of stimulating and guiding them wherever they might be found, their chief follows their steps from city to city of the European continent. But it was neither to visit palaces, nor muse on ruins, that Columba travelled into foreign parts; and having seen and cheered the friends he had gone forth to encourage, he returns home without loss of time, and more than ever set on doing some great thing for the cause of righteousness, 'constrained by the love of Christ.' Is it too much to suppose that from Rome he has come back once more to Derry? But from the windows or terraces of his abbey he looks out upon the Hebrides, and Argyll, in the fading distance towards the north. It is but a speck on the wild ocean he can descry, or a tall peak among the clouds; but his spirit is moved. They are Scots from Ierne who inhabit these desolate shores; and he asks, Shall my own countrymen, who once dwelt by my side, whose tongue is my tongue, in whose veins flows the same blood as in mine, 'perish evermore for lack of knowledge,' when my voice can warn, and counsel, and beseech them? I do not want means; I have also rank; I am but forty-two—in the very noon of life; why should not Columba do for Scotland what Patrick did for Ireland? The inspiration is from above; the resolve is formed, the plan is sketched. Columba devolves his estates upon three uncles. He unbinds the various ties which held him to his native land. And as the ancient author of Old Irish Life writes, 'Like Abraham, his country he left for the love of his Lord, who said to him, Exi de terra sua, et vade in terram quam tibi monstrabo.'

Twelve kinsmen, like-minded and true-hearted, share the enterprise, and provide the means. In a slender wherry, or canoe, made of osiers covered with hides, these courageous witnesses for Christ embark about the middle of May A.D. 563, and leave behind noble relatives, loved friends, vast estates, their colleges, their churches, their all; unseen, unheeded, it may be, save by Him whose glory is their pole-star, they drop down Lough Foyle, as the sun is rising, to show them the grand mountains, and quiet shores, and burnished verdure of Erin for the last time. Measured by the standard of these days, it may seem as if neither the hazard of the voyage nor the hardships of the exile were in any respect unusual. But the following wail, which, if not the effusion of Columba's age, cannot be dated at a much later period, may let us see how they who knew him best, were accustomed to depict the conflict of his spirit:

'How rapid the speed of my coracle!
And its stern is turned upon Derry:
My foot is in my little coracle,
My sad heart is bleeding still;
Large is the tear of my soft grey eye,
When I look back to Erin!
In Scotland are tall warriors;
Many the diseases and evils there:
In Erin, plentiful is the apple fruit.
Its kings are many, and great its princes;
Melodious are its clerics, and its birds;
Gentle are Erin's youths; her old men wise.
My Derry! my little oak grove,
My dwelling, and my little cell!
Were the tribute of all Scotland mine,
I would prefer fair Derry;
Death is better in reproachless Erin,
Than perpetual life in Alba.'

With such emotions, in all likelihood, as these, Columba with his comrades sets sail, though, it may be, they could not tell the haven where they would drop anchor. But if their course is not decided yet, and there is a tear in their eye, there is no misgiving in their heart. For Christ Jesus their Lord they have left all on earth they counted dear, and with the calm intrepidity of faith they lay themselves into the arms of his care. Gliding gently with the tide, let us believe, they have leisure for converse, and reading, and prayer. They have risen from their knees, the oar is stowed away, the little sail is hauled up, and a light breeze is carrying them slowly towards the Hebrides. They pass Islay, lying to the east, with its conspicuous mountains and tempting creeks. But Islay, though it might be a field of work, is neither a place of exile, nor a centre of operation. It is not more than a hundred miles from the martyrs' wept-for home, and still their fragile skiff must run before the wind, though the night is falling. By early morn they may have made fifty miles more, and are now abreast of Colonsay. Their scanty sheet is soon gathered in, the helm guides them to a quiet inlet, the coracle is moored in a bright pool, and the Irish apostle is ready to take possession of the island in the name of Christ. On reaching an eminence, however, the resolute band catch a glimpse of the Hibernian mountains in the transparent air of the cloudless dawn, and fearing lest they have not left their native land at a sufficient distance behind, as true martyrs ought to do, they make haste to lift their anchor, and hoist the sail. The breath of prayer is in the canvas, whilst at the rudder there is the hand of faith; and after proceeding some forty miles farther to the north, they all at once descry the dark outline of a level shore, lying right underneath the prow of their venturous yacht. It is 'I,' or 'Hy,' afterwards called both 'Iona' and 'I-colum-kille.' On this barren shelf of rock there were no resources of wealth or aspects of beauty, no mines nor agriculture, no society, no trade, no crops, no hamlet, but, remote from the mainland, it had the two advantages of safety and seclusion; and here Columba determines to establish himself, that, as if on the outside of the world, he and his associates may have opportunity of holding undisturbed communion with their Father in heaven; and also be able to organize, and animate, and govern the evangelistic schemes with which their soul was filled. Accordingly, as the third day, it may be, since they bade farewell to their own Scotia was fading into the west, on Whitsunday of A.D. 563, the pinnace floats into a shallow bay, and the little company of missionaries, who had come to sow the seed of divine truth over the waste places of this land, stepped out upon the lonely beach. Can we doubt, that so soon as they planted their foot upon the shore, they fell upon their knees? And was ever a nobler scene looked down upon from heaven than these thirteen devoted and indomitable followers of the Lamb, consecrating themselves, at every risk, and with the calm surrender of all that the flesh loves, to perpetual war with the devil and darkness? No eye on earth sees them kneel, their voice falls on no human ear; but who can estimate what we of this other Scotia, and even at this distant period, owe to their mighty wrestling, as they pleaded on the pebbly strand of Iona, and asked 'that they might be spared for thirty years to prosecute the work of God among the Picts and Caledonians?'

To remind them that they had no more to do with their native land, and meant not to return amid the pursuits of the world, the coracle in which they had crossed the sea was buried under a heap of stones, and tradition still indicates the tumulus. A double frame of basket-work, woven with their own hands, and coarsely filled up with sandy mud, was the dwelling of Columba and his staff, and it was not too strong for the Atlantic gales, nor too comfortable for a northern climate. The remains of a cathedral may yet be seen in Iona; but this was a structure reared five centuries subsequent to the time we write of, by Queen Margaret; and even Columba's own monastery was not founded at the beginning of the mission. For long it was a recess or cell among the rocks our hero made his temple; but there, with his chosen companions, all strong in hope, and mighty with God, they loved to worship, with the gloomy sky above, and the billows raging at their feet.

(To be continued.)

THE BELOVED'S LITTLE WHILE.*

I. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . of warning.
II. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . for winning.
III. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . for working.
IV. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . of waiting.
V. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . for watching.
VI. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . of winnowing.
VII. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . for warring.
VIII. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . of weeping.
IX. The Christian's life upon the earth is a little while . of wandering.

* From 'The Beloved's Little While.' By Rev. W. Fergusson, Ellon. London: Nisbet and Co. 1867.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

THE SLEEP OF THE BELOVED.

Words by Horatius Bonar, D.D. Polish Melody.

Met. 96 = ♩

Treble.
Alto.
Tenor.
Bass.
Accomp
Sun - light has va - nish'd, and the wea - ry earth
Sun - light has va - nish'd and the wea - ry earth
Lies rest - ing from a long day's toil and pain,
Lies rest - ing from a long day's toil and pain,

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

And look - ing for a new dawn's ear - ly birth,
And look - ing for a new dawn's ear - ly birth,
Seeks strength in slum - ber for its toil a - gain.
Seeks strength in slum - ber for its toil a - gain.

We too would rest; but ere we close the eye
Upon the consciousness of waking thought,
Would calmly turn it to yon star-bright sky,
And lift the soul to Him who slumbers not.

Above us is thy hand, with tender care,
Distilling over us the dew of sleep;
Darkness seems loaded with oblivious air,
In deep forgetfulness each sense to steep.

Thou hast provided midnight's hour of peace,
Thou stretchest over us the wing of rest;
With more than all a parent's tenderness,
Foldest us sleeping to thy gentle breast.

SAFDAR ALI, INSPECTOR OF SCHOOLS IN JUBBULPORE:

A FRAGMENT OF MISSIONARY AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

IN the course of the first year I clearly perceived that neither the Koran nor the Hadis was of divine origin, and that Mohammed was not the prophet of God. But still, in some points, doubts and difficulties remained. Especially I still had a high opinion of the value of those austerities and self-inflictions which are practised by the religious orders, and which are stated to be of the class of most meritorious works, and tokens of piety and orthodoxy. In the Holy Scriptures I found a detailed statement of the diagnosis of spiritual disease, an account of its cause and origin, particular directions for its true and perfect cure—all so accurate and correct, that I was assured of the divine character of its medicinal prescriptions. But with all this, many doubts arose respecting its contents. As to other creeds and systems—those of the Hindoos, and the philosophers, and the atheists—I now perceived them to be nothing more than either the fancies and speculations of the learned, or the perplexities of the unlearned—the theories of men who, drowned in their own imaginations respecting the origin and order of creation, had lost sight of the true Creator and real First Cause.

In the second year, too, notwithstanding that the superiority and triumph of Christianity over other religions was very evident, yet difficulties beset my mind from every quarter. The least difficulty begat great doubt. To be sure, I was now convinced of the emptiness of other religious systems; and especially I now saw the real character of the pretensions to spiritual knowledge, and the various practices and acts of religious meditation belonging to the Fakeers' profession—that they had no real connection with faith or religion, but were referable to causes inherent in temperament. During this year a mountain of anguish oppressed my sad heart, such as I had never before experienced. I rejected food, and neglected sleep. And especially when I was laid up with a severe bodily ailment, through which my life was despaired of, I felt and uttered keen regret that I was without creed or faith, and still unpossessed of eternal salvation!

'Neither Hindoo, nor Moslem, nor Christian, nor Jew am I:
Sore perplexed is my soul to know what the issue will be!'

In the end of the second, and the beginning of the third year, my interest and attention in investigating and studying the sacred Scriptures, the consistency of its teachings, and its future and eternal aims and issues, were as intense as my sickness was violent. Many of my friends and acquaintances, who were aware of my state of mind, remonstrated with me, and represented the impossibility of any religious system being so faultlessly exact as to pass through such a process of minute and hypercritical investigation unblemished. 'You are under a mistake,' they said; 'no religion is without some defects.' But the Lord was with me; and at this stage He continually gave me peace and comfort. I could not believe respecting the Most High—of whose existence there was no doubt, all of whose perfect qualities and attributes were matters of certainty, whose love also was sufficiently evident in the works of creation,—that, our spiritual need being so manifest, He who had made such large provisions for our perishing bodies, which to-day are, and to-morrow are dust, could possibly, or consistently with any experience, be supposed to have prepared no means of salvation, or way of supply for the spiritual necessities of man's immortal soul, or to have shown him in this world no way of everlasting felicity. I often sustained my heart with the following stanzas, and still, as far as possible, carried on my investigations:

'Weep not—the exiled Joseph shall yet return to Canaan;
Weep not—thy prickly sorrows shall yet bloom forth like roses;
Grieve not, O sorrowful heart, thy lot shall again be pleasant;
Weep not—the broken-hearted shall come in triumph again.
Be not despondent, although thou know not the secret of God;
Weep not—behind the curtain concealed blessings may lie.
Perilous is thy journey, and dim the goal of thy pilgrimage;
Yet refrain from weeping, for the longest way has its terminus.
Comfort thy heart, for swift upon every sorrow comes gladness.
Weep not—for not an ill but hath its appropriate medicine.
If there be one that hath ranged the world untouched by sorrow,
Sorrow will find him yet: 'tis the lot of all; therefore weep not.'

And now, thousands upon thousands of thanks and praises be to God, the wise and the gracious, who, of his compassion and goodness,—not on account of my pains and toils, but according to his own love and kindness,—took pity upon the miserable and forlorn condition of me, a sinner, and gradually, by the leading of his wonderful word, by means of commentaries and expositions of learned Christians, and by the instrumentality of certain brethren who laid the truth before me, put to flight all my difficulties and doubts, my temptations and fears, and solved for me every question,—thus clearing my mind of the darkness of all its doubts, and illuminating it with the light of counsel and understanding. He bestowed upon me full assurance, so that I knew his way to be the way of salvation, and accepted with confidence, as my Master and Leader, Him who is the infallible Pilot, the Guide of the erring, the Saviour of sinners, the Redeemer of the world, the most merciful One, the Lord of heaven and earth, the Sun of Righteousness, and Prince of Peace, to whom all the prophets and apostles, since the world began, successively bore testimony, whose innumerable perfections and illimitable beneficence surpass the limits of understanding,—our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, whose grace and mercy are everlasting. Amen.

On the day when I obtained the full assurance of salvation, my relieved heart breathed forth these lines:

'My Friend was very near me, and I roamed far in search of Him;
My well was full of water, while I was parched and thirsty.'

And these also:

'Praise upon praise; to-day my journey is ended:
Now the last stage is reached—my pilgrimage is o'er.'

Another curious coincidence now took place. When I was quite ready to receive baptism, I wrote word to that effect to my two dearest friends. One of these, Kasim Khan by name, who for more than two years had been my confidential and sympathizing companion in religious inquiry, as a preliminary step to a visit in person, addressed a letter to me at Jubbulpore, to say that he would now no longer delay to receive baptism, for in heart he was a Christian already; and that, of course, he would not attempt to hinder me. As I was on an official tour at the time, the letter did not reach me until after the arrival of my friend himself. And it actually came to pass that Kasim Khan and I were both baptized on the same day—the feast of Christ's nativity. My other friend, Karim Bakhsh, still entertained doubts; but they were removed, and, in a little time after, he suddenly arrived in Jubbulpore, and was also baptized.

Such, then, being my case, sir, it is meet and right that I should offer up continual praises and thanksgiving with all the ability of tongue, and mind, and spirit. Such vast goodness transcends the reach of thought and comprehension. And it is a matter for special thankfulness that, during the process of my inquiries, the Lord granted me just such opportunities as I needed of learning that to Christianity belonged that church, into which I have now been baptized, which is free from improbabilities and exaggerations, and adorned and beautified with the jewel of truth.

Now, if I had procured this unhoped-for, imperishable, and unmixed benefit, which from first to last was of the divine love and pity, and all this happiness and joy, at the cost of dear life and worldly goods, it would have been well worth the price. But the Lord gave it to me freely. Of what consequence, then, are the few temporal trials which may be mingled with my lot? And though, in India, the becoming a Christian is a cause of much suffering,—friends and strangers alike seeking one's ruin, humiliation, and annoyance in every way,—still, by the grace of God, our Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria the Great reigns here, and there is abundance of protection and security. None can inflict illegal injury with impunity. And there is here but little of the affliction which brethren elsewhere have been called to bear. And they have endured all, and glorified God. And let our trials be ever so great, the comfort, and peace, and grace which the Lord gives us, are infinitely greater.

I am thankful, also, that as the Lord healed my spiritual disease, so that I am fully assured of enjoying, by his grace, perfect health, and inward strength, and spiritual power, and of being numbered with his people, in like manner He has vouchsafed me deliverance from my dangerous bodily disease, which I had been doctoring for two years without effect. From the day of my baptism to the present time I have been well. Let who will consider this a chance coincidence,—let who will ascribe it to the accession of confidence and cheerfulness of heart,—I accept it as the gift of the Lord.

It would be my delight, and is my earnest desire, that my fellow-countrymen, especially all my friends and neighbours of my own native place and my own position in life, should become inquirers, and be made partners and partakers with myself in this indefectible grace. I am heartily at their service with tongue and pen, so far as my leisure permits; and, indeed, I have already made a beginning in that direction. But, alas! the bigotry and complacency of these people are immense. If I were the disciple of some Fakeer, no doubt I should procure him a thousand adherents. But immediately people hear the name of Jesus, or of a Christian, they will not listen to a single word; they will not suffer themselves even to look at the Christian advocate.

When the tidings of my conversion first spread about, many of my friends absolutely refused to credit them. They inquired of myself; and, on obtaining my reply, they declined to correspond with me any further. Nevertheless, there is cause for thankfulness that some individuals have set on foot a series of religious inquiries; and a strong determination is perceptible to search out the truth of the case, and to engage the doctors and eminent men of Islam in a written controversy. So I am rejoiced to think that the Lord may help these inquirers, and strengthen their hearts, that they may seek after truth and righteousness, until they are embraced by the free grace of God. Amen.

I have carried this letter to an undue length; and being but slightly acquainted with English, I have necessarily written it in Urdu. I trust that I may be excused.

To the church of God which is in London, even to those that are sanctified through our Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ, together with all who in every place—India and elsewhere—call upon the name of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, be the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, for evermore. Amen.—Your humble and obedient servant, SAFDAR ALI.

Readings for the Young.

WHAT BECAME OF THE LITTLE BIRDS?

IN a pleasant valley of the Hartz mountains there lies a little village, so covered and penned in that the news of the world seldom gets there. The name of that village is Friedenrode. As it lies just in the midst of mountains, unless you knew the paths very well, you could not find it at all. The people who live there seldom go out to the large cities. The schoolmaster, and the doctor, and the pastor are the only persons who have ever seen a large city. In the summer time the village presents a beautiful appearance. Every house has its little garden and door-yard. Then in the orchard there are fruit-trees of many different kinds.

At the farthest end of the village, where the mountains come close together, and only afford a narrow road by which the people can leave home, there is a very small and neat cottage. It is built of wood, and covered with straw. In this cottage Colestin Wagner lived. He was a woodcutter, and had a wife and two sons. Colestin was a poor man, whose labour was constantly required to support his family. If he had not possessed a cow, and a few goats, that supported themselves by wandering through the forest and getting all they could eat there, Colestin could not have maintained himself. One of his sons was named Fried, and the other Hubert. One day the two boys were out in the woods with their father, when he was chopping wood. Hubert, who was the oldest, had climbed a tree, and was swinging on one of its branches; but suddenly the limb broke, and he fell to the ground. He was severely hurt. One of his legs was broken, and his father had to carry him home. It was a long time before he was able to walk about the house. When he could walk, his parents found, to their great sorrow, that he would be lame for life; for the physician did not know how to set his leg well.

It was a great denial to Hubert to be compelled to stay in the house or walk about in the little garden, for he loved the forest, and nothing delighted him more than to go with his father and enjoy himself in the woods. Colestin and his wife grieved a great deal over Hubert's fate; 'for,' said they, 'he will never be able to support himself, and his lameness will always be an affliction to him. But never mind; we will do the best we can for his support.'

By-and-by Hubert became strong enough to limp along with his father, and go with him into the forest. He would spend a whole day in walking about and listening to the singing of the birds. He became so fond of their singing, and listened to them so attentively, that he finally learned how to imitate some of them. One day he set to work to make a bird cage; and he did it in such a way, that if a bird should hop down on the top of it, it would be caught as if in a trap. Hubert practised imitating the songs of birds carefully every day; and so successful was he in his undertaking, that he finally learned how to imitate all the nice singing birds in the woods. He would conceal himself in a little clump of bushes, near which his cage was set. Then he began to imitate some singing bird, until by-and-by the bird that he was imitating would answer him. Hubert would answer in return, just as if he were a bird; and then the bird would come closer and closer to the cage, thinking all the time that one of its mates was close at hand. Suddenly the trap would spring, and the bird would be caught. Then Hubert would take it out, and put it into another cage that he had there, and at night carry it home and sell it for a few cents to old Hame, the bird-seller of Friedenrode.

By this means Hubert made a little money occasionally, which he gave to his parents, and which aided in his support. He had no knowledge of the true value of the birds that he caught, and therefore he sold them for anything that old Hame had a mind to offer him.

One day Hubert was in the woods engaged in his usual occupation. He had no trouble that day in catching birds. Just as often as he would imitate one, and catch it, he would immediately imitate another, and catch that too. When the sun was about an hour high, he had twenty-five different kinds of birds safely confined, and was just going home. Suddenly he heard a rustling of the leaves, and saw a strange man close by him. The man's name was Kisko, and he was evidently from some other place than Friedenrode. He engaged in conversation with Hubert, and asked him all about the beautiful birds that he had caught.

'Will you sell them to me?' said Kisko.

'Yes, sir,' said Hubert, 'if you will give me enough for them.'

'I'll tell you what I will do,' said Kisko. 'I will take them home with me to Russia, and sell them in the city of St. Petersburg. I will give you a handsome profit if they sell well enough. I will give you now five cents a piece for them. Next spring I will be in Friedenrode again to catch birds myself, for that is my business. If your birds sell well, I will settle in full with you at that time, and I think you will be satisfied with your success.'

Now, Hubert had never received more than three cents a piece for his birds from old Hame; so he thought he would make a very good bargain, even if he never saw Kisko again, and never received any more money from him.

Autumn came. In November Colestin was taken very sick. A doctor came to see him, and told him that it would be a long time before he would be well again, for his disease was of a serious nature. Week after week passed by, until the weeks grew into months. It was fully four months after Colestin was taken sick, that he could sit on the bench in front of his cottage door. By this time his family were in great want, and it became almost certain that his wife would have to sell the cow in order that they might be supported. One morning, at the breakfast table, Colestin's wife said: 'We must sell the cow this day. To live on nothing is impossible.'

'Oh!' said Hubert, with tears in his eyes; 'oh, mother, don't sell the cow. Can't I do something to keep us from parting with her?'

She replied: 'My child, we are starving, and the cow can save us for a little while.'

'Then, won't you wait three days, mother, before you sell her? for I do believe that God will provide for us within that time.'

She answered: 'Possibly we might; but we would be very hungry in the meantime. Still,' she added, 'let us do it, if it is a possible thing.'

The first and second days came and went without relief. Now the afternoon of the third day had come. Hubert and his brother had wandered out in one of the mountain paths to gather a few sticks for firewood. They saw a gentleman coming along on horseback. It was none other than Kisko. Hubert's heart leaped for joy, for he remembered what Kisko had said to him about selling his birds in St. Petersburg.

'You are the boy,' said Kisko, 'whom I want to see. I want us to engage together in business; for the birds that you sold me were the finest I have ever taken to St. Petersburg. I was told on the way there that they were a very superior kind; and knowing that they sung so beautifully, and having learned that the Emperor was very fond of singing birds, I took twenty-one of them to his palace—for four had died on the way. It had so happened in my favour that the Emperor had told his porter always to admit anybody who had birds for sale; and no sooner did the porter see my little cages, with birds in them, than he said: "Come in, the Emperor will be glad to see you." In half an hour I was brought into the presence of the Emperor himself. He was delighted with my birds, and asked me a great many questions about them. He wished to know whether I caught them, or got somebody else to do it; and he was very anxious to know what part of the world they came from. Then I told him about you, Hubert, and how successfully you could imitate almost any bird; that you were a lame boy; and that your parents were poor. My story at once appealed to his sympathies. He bought the birds, and gave a good price for them. Then he drew from his pocket five pieces of money, and told me to present them to you. Here they are. You will find that they are five large pieces of gold. I also received a good deal more for the birds than I expected; and I will now pay you for them.'

Kisko then paid over to Hubert, in addition to the pieces of gold, thirty-nine dollars and eighty cents, as his part of the profit on the birds. Hubert was now almost wild with joy at such success. He felt that the little prayer which he and his brother had offered that afternoon in the woods was now answered. The cow would not be sold. They were richer than they had ever been before. Joy and gladness prevailed once more in that little thatched cottage. Deliverance came at the end of the third day, and the cow was not sold.

Hubert entered into partnership with Kisko, and every year he succeeded in catching a great many valuable birds. The following year Kisko would return and pay him large sums of money as his portion of the profits.

Hubert's brother was very anxious to get an education; and one day Hubert said at the table: 'Brother, you wish to be a lawyer; I have now enough money to send you to a school in Brunswick. You can leave home in two weeks' time, and I will support you.'

Hubert was true to his word; and for six full years kept his brother at school studying law. At the same time, Hubert's profits from his birds were sufficient to enable him to support his father and mother, and to provide them with every necessary comfort.

Thus God made that lame boy the instrument of saving all the family from starvation at a time of great need, and also of educating his brother for professional life. So does God sometimes use the most unpromising agents as instruments of blessing.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

Into a desolate land,
White with the drifted snow,
Into a weary land
Our truant footsteps go:
Yet doth thy care, O Father,
Ever thy wanderers keep;
Still doth thy love, O Shepherd,
Follow thy sheep.

Over the pathless wild
Do I not see Him come?
Him who shall bear me back,
Him who shall lead me home?

Listen! between the storm-gusts,
Unto the straining ear,
Comes not the cheering whisper—
'Jesus is near?'

Over me He is bending!
Now I can safely rest,
Found at the last, and clinging
Close to the Shepherd's breast.
So let me lie till the fold-bells
Sound on the homeward track,
And the rejoicing angels
Welcome us back!

—W. E. Littlewood.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Sam. i. 12–18.

Here we have an earthly high priest dealing with a child of sorrow; and in his treatment of her we find both a contrast and a comparison with the heavenly High Priest. The contrast comes out strikingly. Eli shows—First, Want of knowledge; for he speaks under a mistake—in ignorance of the person and the condition of her whom he addressed. Secondly, Want of charity; for he charges her at once with drunkenness. Thirdly, Want of patience and caution; for he does not wait to inquire. Fourthly, Want of tenderness; for he speaks harshly as well as rashly. How great the contrast in all these respects between the earthly and the heavenly High Priest! Contrast this scene with that of the woman of Sychar, or the woman taken in adultery: what a contrast between Eli and the Lord! How differently does Jesus deal with a sinner from the way in which Eli does! The way in which Eli acts makes it necessary for the woman to defend herself; the way in which Jesus acts creates no such necessity; for they to whom He speaks feel that their unworthiness is no bar to his grace, and that the admission of that unworthiness does not alter that grace. The words and acts of Jesus do not set them upon self-defence, as did Eli's.

But there is comparison, or likeness, as well as contrast. Eli, though imperfectly, does represent the better High Priest—even Him 'who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities;' who can have compassion on the ignorant; who is 'a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God.' This will come out as we consider —(1) The application to the high priest; (2) The answer; (3) The confidence; (4) The consolation.

I. The application.—Hannah deals directly with Eli. She is in Jehovah's tabernacle; she has access to its altar; she speaks to the high priest face to face. Two special requests she makes: (1) Count me not a daughter of Belial—treat me not as a sinner; (2) Let me find grace in thy sight. These are our two special petitions in our dealings with the better High Priest: deal not with me as a sinner; let me find favour with Thee. Forgiveness and favour, these are what we need, and they are what we come to the Priest for; for He is the High Priest of the good things to come. Let us deal with Him directly. Let us put our whole case into his hands. We apply to Him as the Son of God; as the Priest; as He who sits on the throne of grace. He waits for us; let us wait on Him. He is our Eli, our Aaron, our Melchizedek; all fulness is with Him. He sets open that fulness to us. Though sinners, let us remember we have to do with One who can manage the worst case, and can undertake for the chief of sinners.

II. The answer.—His answer is, 'Go in peace: may the God of Israel grant thy petition.' He speaks peace to her. She was sorely troubled and tempest-tossed; she needed peace; and it is with peace that he begins. So is it with peace that our Eli begins. He has made our peace, and He speaks to us the peace which He has made. 'Go in peace,' He says to every one who comes to Him; for 'him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out.' This answer is sure to every one who comes to Him. He does not stand on ceremony with his petitioners. He gives what is asked; He sends none empty away. Let us believe that we have what we ask of Him. And then, as if speaking to us of the Father, He says, 'Jehovah hear thee, and grant thy petitions.' We do not hear his voice. But just as surely as Eli speaks to Hannah, and grants her prayer, so does He speak to us, and does for us exceeding abundantly above all we ask. Every one who goes to our High Priest is quite sure of an answer, and that a gracious one. He sends none empty away. Peace and favour from the God of Israel—these are the things He gives. Hannah went to Eli uninvited; but we go invited; it is our heavenly Priest who says, 'Come unto me!'

III. The confidence.—Hannah went her way. She did not trouble, nor vex, nor affront Eli with a second or a third application. She took him at his word, like the centurion who came to Jesus about his son. It is thus that we are to deal with our Eli. Take Him at his word. Trust Him. Do justice to his faithfulness and honesty. Let us not stand on ceremony, or approach in terror and doubt, but believe that He is the rewarder of all that seek Him. Nor let us deceive ourselves, and mock Him, by saying, 'I don't distrust Him; I only distrust myself.' This is absurd. You are really distrusting Him, and doing so on the ground that you are not fully complying with his conditions (as if He made any conditions); whereas He bids you trust Him just as you are. If your faith is not good enough, come with it as it is. If your way of coming be imperfect, add that to the number of your sins, and still trust. Let nothing in yourself produce distrust.

IV. The consolation.—She 'did eat, and her countenance was no more sad.' Deep had been her sorrow; now it passed away, at the gracious voice of the high priest. Thus we learn what it is that relieves a disquieted soul. It is the voice of the high priest: 'Go in peace.' We have an High Priest with whom to communicate in our troubles—a greater than Aaron or Eli; and we know, even more surely than Hannah when she heard Eli's voice, that his words, to every soul who comes to Him, are: 'Go in peace.' He does not stand on ceremony with us, nor scrutinize the quality or excellence of our manner of approach. The moment that our words, 'God be merciful to me!' come up to Him, his answer comes down: 'Go in peace.' Let us be sure of this; let us give credit to his promises, even though we do not actually see his face or hear his voice. Our application must be successful. He cannot deny himself. He cannot dishonour his priesthood nor break his promises. Not more certain ought we to be that we have asked, than that He answers. How long are we to wait before believing Him? How many signs are we to ask before we are sure that He will do as He has said? Why will we persist in doubts, which all take for granted that He is not true to his word, and which disguise their wickedness under the name of humility, and under the pretence that, as we do not know whether we have asked aright, we cannot know whether He will answer, till He has answered. Let us beware of the Pharisaism that is always asking for a sign before it will trust the Son of God.

THE COMFORTER.

BY THE REV. J. J. BONAR, GREENOCK.

JOHN XVI. 7–11.

THEY may not like what He is going to mention: it may even sound as incredible—'Nevertheless, I will tell you the truth,' said Jesus to his disciples, as we find related in the seventh verse. And we too have a Master, who will rather meet our wants than consult our wishes.

But what was the announcement that Jesus made, and which needed to be introduced with so much precision and authority? It was this: 'I go away, and our pleasant fellowship is near its close.' What a shadow—so dark and cold—must now have fallen upon the path of the disciples; and who could wonder if they wept aloud where they stood! 'I go away!' it is the sun eclipsed at noonday. And still Jesus is 'away.' But, beloved, did you ever weep for an absent Jesus?

The Master heard the anxious sigh that broke from the lips of his grieved friends, and, as if to brush off the tear ere it had fallen, He immediately adds, 'But it is expedient for you;' and if I tear myself from your embrace, and if I pass into the shadow of death, and if I stop not short of the cross, it is all in love for 'you.' Blessed assurance for us, as well as for the apostles! Jesus 'went away,' and Jesus remains away, not because He has forgotten us, but because He loves us. 'It is expedient for you.'

And if you ask, how? here is the explanation. 'If I go not away,' that is, to suffer, 'the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart,' that is, return to my Father, 'I will send Him unto you.' The Spirit 'comes' because He is 'sent.' But He is 'sent' of the Father, through the hands of the Son; yet not until these hands have bled, and the sacrifice of the cross has been accepted in the heavens. After all, then, we gain, and gain vastly, by the withdrawal of Jesus, meanwhile, from earth; seeing that an absent Christ is a present 'Comforter.'

The thought, however, would still rise in the mind of the disciples, But who is the Comforter? and what is his office, his work, his ministry? They well knew all that Christ had been to them, and is it strange if they should desire to be shown the blessings they might expect from 'the Comforter,' who was to take their Master's place? Accordingly, Jesus goes on to 'tell them the truth' pertaining to the Spirit, as He had 'told them the truth' regarding himself, and in the passage of our text declares, 'That the Comforter, when He is come, will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment.'

Let us, then, beloved, fixing our eye on these words, think of 'the Comforter' as our Lord here describes Him. For, oh! it would be well for our peace and strength did we better know, and better love, the Holy Ghost. And let us begin with marking the Personality of the Holy Ghost as here brought out.

'The Spirit' is not merely an influence or an attribute. He 'comes,' and He stays. He is 'sent,' and He 'reproves.' He cannot, therefore, be only a Perfection, or a Property, or a Prerogative,—but is a Person. Yet, He cannot be the Father, for nowhere do we read of the Father that 'He comes.' And He is not the Son, inasmuch as it is in room of the Son He is 'sent.'

Brethren, hear what Jesus 'tells' us of the Holy Ghost, and dwell upon these views. He is not an Emanation, but an Agent; a Being, not an Energy. He is of God, and He is God. For who but God could govern, and reverse, and mould the thoughts of 'the whole world,' as is here affirmed to be done by 'the Comforter?'

Mark next the condescension of the Holy Ghost, for is He not 'sent?'

One who is 'sent' may have equal rank in nature and title with Him who sends. For a time, however, 'the Sent' is in an inferior position to the Sender. It was so with Christ, and it could not be otherwise with 'the Spirit.' In what 'the sending' of 'the Spirit' consisted, or how his inferiority was manifested, we cannot pronounce. It could not be, in regard to Him who is everywhere, a leaving of one place for another. Yet might it not be the exertion of his power in such visible subordination to the designs of the Father and the Son, as would be equivalent to their 'sending' Him? At all events, in his relation of 'Comforter,' executing the will of the Father and the Son, the Spirit was 'sent;' and when He publicly descended in the form of a 'dove,' He must have wished it to appear that, for a season, He had as if come out of heaven in furtherance of our salvation.

Whilst, then, we forget not the condescending love of Jesus, let the condescending love of the Holy Ghost not less touch our hearts, and make us wonder. The Spirit loves us, and, as it seems to me, He loves us at some expense. I say not that He humbled himself for us. But surely the hosts around the throne must have felt as if He had covered his majesty, when He took the shape, and floated with the motion, of a creature his own hands had fashioned.

But let us further mark the sphere of the Holy Ghost; for 'He is come.'

Ere Jesus took our flesh He had been often down to the world. And so, likewise, previous to this, the Spirit has touched the hearts of men. But as Christ entered on a closer fellowship with men from the day He became incarnate, so, too, from the hour He 'came' forth to take the room of Christ, the Spirit has been among us in a new plenitude of influence, in a variety of gifts hitherto unknown. 'He is come!'

Let none say, therefore, 'I am waiting for the Spirit, who will fetch down the Holy Ghost.' Man! the Holy Ghost is waiting for you; the Spirit is on the earth. 'He is come,' and seeks admission into every soul. At this moment He is at thy side! The truth now preached is his 'striving;' that Bible before thee is his testimony; and unless thou wilt forbid, He stands on the threshold, ready to take possession of thy heart.

For now let us mark finally the work which the Spirit has undertaken. 'He will convince the world.'

1. 'The world' is our fallen race, mankind-sinners, wrapt in darkness, and wandering on to hell. It was this 'world' the Holy Ghost had pity on. Like Christ, 'the other Paraclete,' 'He is come, not to call the righteous, but sinners.' He is 'the Physician' of the sick, not of the whole. He is the Helper, not of the strong, but of the prostrate. He is 'the Comforter,' not of the satisfied, but of the restless. 'The world' is his sphere. And knowing how mistaken and presumptuous sinful men are, in regard to divine things, the Holy Ghost has 'come to reprove,' that is, to reason, to debate, to argue with them, that He may 'convince' them of what is wrong and false, of what is right and true. This is the Spirit's errand, his object, his work.

Though, then, there be power with the Holy Ghost, He at the same time deals with us as intelligent beings whom He will 'convince' that He may win. He does not violently break open a gate of entrance; He forces not truth upon a reluctant mind; He will compel no man to believe. On the other hand, He remonstrates and pleads; He quickens and illumes; He directs and sways, and by operations, and through avenues, known to himself alone, He restores us to God, and God to us.

Brethren, this is the great work of the Spirit; and let it show us how hard, as well as how misled, our soul is because of sin. It is not enough that the Holy Ghost enlightens, He 'reasons,' and at every step He must debate with us, ere we will walk along the road of heavenly revelation.

Let us also reflect, beloved, what advantage we enjoy in the power of the Holy Ghost for the acquisition of all truth, and let us feel that now to err—to doubt, is sin.

Men are not afraid to err; men think it laudable to doubt, in regard to what the Scriptures reveal, in regard to what saves. But it is a very serious thing indeed, either to doubt or to err in a matter such as this, and in our circumstances. For, tell me, was not the express end of the Spirit's coming to displace error by truth, and to terminate doubt in 'conviction?' Has He not done this in the case of innumerable thousands in all ages? Are not the same willingness and unction with Him still? Is He not here, everywhere, as the Spirit of truth in opposition to error? the Spirit of conviction to vanquish doubt?

I will think it, then, a sinful thing, a truly sinful thing, to make light of error regarding salvation, to look with approval on doubt. And it is wrong to speak of honest doubts, to imagine that they who stray into error are in a hopeful way. Errors may be honest, doubt may be hopeful in some cases, let us admit. Nevertheless, when I remember that there is a Holy Ghost, and when I remember that this Holy Ghost is around us, and when I remember that the present Holy Ghost has 'come' with the proclaimed design of giving us truth for error, and conviction instead of doubt, what less can I say, but that to cleave to error and cherish doubt can only rise from a determination not to accept the aid of the divine Holy Illuminator? In the estimate of our age, religious error is manful, spiritual doubt is modest. But He who sees the inner man, could tell that it is all the offspring of a self-sufficiency which will rather perish in its own darkness than trace its path to rest by light that the Spirit sheds.

2. You inquire, But what is it the Spirit debates? and our text acquaints us that He debates of 'sin,' of 'righteousness,' and of 'judgment.'

The Spirit debates with us regarding 'sin,' first of all. We are at no loss to understand what vice is, and what crime is, but 'sin' is an idea we cannot master without the Holy Ghost.

Scripture is quite definite; yet never shall we realize what it is that pollutes the soul and provokes God, till the Spirit reasons out the whole subject of 'sin,' on the ground that Scripture furnishes. Conscience may not be altogether dead; yet never will conscience sensitively recoil from all that God hates, until 'the Spirit' enables us at once to discern and detest as 'sin' whatsoever God condemns.

If, therefore, you would both know and resent 'sin,' bear in mind that it is the Holy Ghost who must teach you here, and that without Him you can have neither any abhorrence nor any apprehension of it. The Spirit 'convinces of sin.'

But the Spirit debates with us also concerning 'righteousness;' and this means the obedience of Christ accomplished in our room, and which is imputed as our merit. All acknowledge that Christ was 'righteous,' and that his 'righteousness' (made up of what He did, and what He suffered) was at once complete and vicarious, a substitutionary and a sufficient righteousness, free of every defect, and wrought out for 'the world.' Nevertheless, until 'the Spirit convinces,' no man will inquire into, or extol, or build upon, this 'righteousness,' which 'the world' needs, any more than we might comprehend 'the sin' under which 'the world' is pining.

No doubt we may, by an effort, ascertain the elements of that 'righteousness' I speak of, and have a dim conception of it. But all this fails to break us off from our own merit, and make us seek after the merit of another. So soon, however, as the Holy Ghost 'convinces of righteousness,' we see that the righteousness of Jesus Christ is perfect, that it was brought in for 'the world,' that it is offered to us; and being severed from all 'confidence in the flesh,' we plant our feet for ever on the atonement of the cross.

It is far, then, from being enough to say, 'Jesus finished the work given Him to do.' The Holy Ghost must show us the perfection of his 'finished righteousness,' if we shall put it on, indeed, and wear it as a garment wherewith to cover our nakedness. His 'conviction' will alone strip us of our own filthy rags, and clothe us in the beauty of the Son of God.

But once more, we are told that the Spirit debates with 'the world' in regard to 'judgment;' and this refers to the condemnation incurred by 'sin.' Perhaps there are few who have not at times been alarmed for wrath; wrath near and consuming. But they soon fell asleep again, and became more supine and impenetrable than ever. It was the terrors of their own fancy that shook them, and though they deprecated hell, they trembled not for God.

When, however, the Holy Ghost convinces of 'condemnation,' our delusive peace is at an end. For, though it may 'be only one drop of wrath' He lets fall upon the soul, if it be He who drops it, it will consume, and spread, and never abate, until it obliges the man to seek refuge in the arms of Christ.

Ask the Spirit, then, to show you what 'condemnation' is, and if you would be shaken in its grasp, look to Him alone. What though your heart be rent from top to bottom? it secures no advantage if it be just man who cries in your ear, and sounds the alarm. But let 'the Spirit convince of judgment,' and even though He speak in 'a still small voice,' it shall be as thunder in your heart, and never to be silenced till silenced in the peace of God.

Men and brethren, ye have seen what it is we must be convinced of. And are they not great things? even the inexcusableness of sin, the provision of grace, and the certainty of wrath? And who is it that brings these truths home but the Holy Ghost? God himself seeks to remove our darkness, and deliver us from every yoke of unrighteousness. He is in earnest with us, and He will have us to be in earnest too. He comforts us with the truth, and He invests it with light, that we may behold it. He reasons, He expostulates, He argues. 'The Spirit convinces.'

And all this He does for each one of you. It is not a general appeal He makes, but He deals with us as individuals, and there is not one single heart at which He has not knocked loud and often. Even the youngest here have already felt so much as should have awakened them, and have seen enough to guide them aright, if they had only been faithful. Yes, friends, you may gainsay his arguments, and resist his love, even to life's close; you may remain deaf to his voice, and suffer not his tenderness to melt you; still, most certain it is, that the very Holy Ghost offered you truth for error, conviction for obduracy, life everlasting for endless woe. And if, after all, you lose your road, and stumble, and perish, the blame will be your own.

3. Our Lord having stated what the truths are which the Spirit 'convinces' of, goes on to show what are the arguments whereby He makes his appeal effectual. For does He not declare: 'He will convince of sin, because they do not believe on me; of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more; of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged?'

'The Spirit convinces of sin,' says Jesus, 'because they believe not on me,' and thus warns us, at the onset, of the source from which our danger flows. Alas! how easily we sit for long under the yoke of 'unbelief,' and count it no burden or reproach, but freedom rather, and joy! In the day, however, when the Spirit anoints, all is changed, and we feel as if the very worst of sins was unbelief. It is ingratitude, and rebellion, and blasphemy. It sheds the blood of Christ anew, and shakes the throne of God. It disputes the wisdom of the Divine Lawgiver; it sets at nought the authority of the Universal Potentate; it spurns the merit of the atoning Days-man, and it tramples under foot the riches of the manifested Godhead. It is the origin and strength, the top and bottom, of all evil then, and no challenge so abashes the soul as that of 'unbelief' 'when the Spirit convinces.'

Ask the Holy Ghost to show you this, and learn to make 'unbelief' the test and measure of all sin. The idea is not welcome to philosophy; it was never found out by reason. The unrenewed heart will disclaim it. Yet the truth lies here, and salvation is here, and holiness is also here, even in the conviction that the sin of sins is 'unbelief.' Beloved, men talk lightly of unbelief; but remember you that unbelief is the rejection of Christ, and that the rejection of the Son is the rejection of the Father. Beloved, 'the world' often looks fair to us; but, oh, how the world must delight in sin, when it will not believe in Him who came to take sin away! Oh! what a heart, beloved, must ours be, which rather would love a sinful creature of the dust, than the sinless Lamb of God!

As to 'the righteousness' prepared for 'the world,' does not Jesus next say, that 'the Spirit will convince of it, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more?' Jesus had been 'sent' by his Father to work out a propitiatory 'righteousness,' by his obedience, and suffering, and death. But Jesus has 'gone back to the Father,' with 'the righteousness' He had accomplished; and with exceeding joy the Father received Him to the fellowship of his bosom, and the majesty of his throne.

'The world's sin,' then, is met by 'the righteousness of Christ;' and if we will only take this 'righteousness' for our shield, we shall have no more cause of alarm, seeing that we are not merely told that Jesus 'has gone back to the Father,' but that it is added, 'and ye shall see me no more.' Alas! had 'the world' seen Christ again, ere He is seen in the clouds, it must have been because He had not finished his work. But Jesus is not remanded to earth again, that in poverty, and reproach, and pain, He might complete an incomplete work. His work is done, 'and we see Him no more,' for everlastingly He appears in our behalf, within the veil, in all the splendour of his perfect 'righteousness.'

Beloved, it is a sweet assurance, 'I go to the Father,' intimating as it does, that 'the righteousness' Jesus prepared for 'the world' has been accepted by our Judge, and is enough to hide all sin from his view. But 'Ye shall see me no more,' is an assurance quite as sweet, announcing that Jesus will stand before God as our Representative, without failure, until there be no further need of his intercession.

The departure and absence of Jesus, then, is the seal of his mediatorial righteousness, of his vicarious merit, as affixed to it by God himself, and evermore let us rejoice in this attestation. When Jesus looked at the robe of righteousness He had worn for us by pain, and endurance, and blood-shedding on the cross, He said, 'It is finished,' and on this testimony our soul might have securely rested. But He took the robe through the skies, and having shaken it out, amid the light of heaven, He asked the Father, 'if his eye could detect a single stain?' But giving Him 'glory at his right hand,' the Father told the Son that the robe was spotless. Friends, ask 'the Holy Ghost' to show you this. We are prone to tarry always at the cross, where is only seen the sacrifice offered. But if we allow the 'Holy Ghost' to point our eye to the throne, we shall see the offered sacrifice accepted. When I look to the altar on Calvary, I behold the ransom paid, and my peace is strong. But when I look to the mercy-seat, behind the veil, then I behold God delighting in the ransom, and my peace rises to the height of triumphant joy.

But what says 'the world' to 'the righteousness' of the Son of God? 'O world,' it was designed for thee, and it will cover every sin. It is 'altogether fair,' and will abide the scrutiny of fire. It is free, and it is close at hand. Oh! then, put it on, put it on by faith,—put it on, put it on, and shine brighter than an angel.

How keen will be thy remorse, O man, if thou shalt hereafter behold the matchless garment Jesus offered thee, and must for all eternity remember that thou didst prefer to it thy filthy rags, thy nakedness. Get hold, then, at once of 'the righteous Christ,' and be righteous in his 'righteousness,' even as He is righteous. Apart from Him, thou art all misery and pollution. One with Him, thou art all loveliness and honour.

But, in the last place, does not Jesus say, that the Spirit 'convinces of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged?' Satan was 'the prince of this world,' and he could claim men, and the earth too, because of sin, as his 'lawful prey.' But Satan has been 'judged.' On the cross Jesus met him, and brought his reign to an end. On the cross Jesus vanquished him, and assumed the principality from which He cast this usurper out. 'The prince of this world is judged;' he is defeated and dethroned. 'The prince of this world' is its prince no more. 'He was judged' by the Son of God, and is his prisoner in everlasting chains.

Be sure of this, believer, and let not the fear of Satan disquiet thee at any time. Our adversary is in the strong grasp of Christ, and though he will accuse, he cannot prevail. He may threaten, but he cannot wound. What though he alarms? he can never cast us down. Oh! no; even already we are set free from his malice, and 'shortly we shall bruise him under our feet!'

Unconverted friends, what say you? Will ye be condemned with Satan in his condemnation, or conquer with Jesus the Conqueror? Will ye divide the triumph with the Son of God, or share the ignominy of Satan's overthrow? Thus it lies with you to say, and you can tell us now. Only let the Holy Ghost 'convince you,' and putting away all your 'sin,' by putting on 'the righteousness' of Christ, you escape for ever 'the judgment' which has smitten into hell 'the prince of this world.'

But if you will not believe, and let your iniquities thereby be washed away, then learn what your condemnation will be, by the condemnation of Satan, and bear in mind that it is 'with the devil and his angels' your eternity must be spent. Satan had no advantages of grace, and refused no offer of salvation. Yet was he 'judged,' and sunk into darkness. But, says Jesus, take heed, 'O world;' for if God so dealt with angel-sinners, will He not deal in like manner with mankind-sinners?

Perhaps you will not own that there is a devil. But there is a devil. Jesus says it; and He adds that this devil has power over human hearts. Ask, then, the Holy Ghost to show you this. Ask Him to 'convince' you, first of Satan's being, then of Satan's doom. And when He opens your eyes, He will make you know, 'in the judgment of the prince of this world,' what is awaiting them who are too proud to let their guilt be washed away in the blood of Christ.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA,

AUTHOR OF 'HELEN DUNDAS, OR THE PASTOR'S WIFE;' 'SHADOWS AND SUNSHINE, AND OTHER TALES,' ETC. ETC.

No. IV.

GOD'S THOUGHTS NOT OUR THOUGHTS, NOR HIS WAYS OUR WAYS.

HAS it ever puzzled or perplexed you to know why it was that, when you were quite sure that if such an opportunity was granted, or such a circumstance happened, or such a plan succeeded, it would be for the glory of God, and the good of souls, yet that the opportunity was not granted, and the circumstance did not occur, and the plan did not succeed?

Shall I tell you why; or rather, shall God himself tell you, for then there cannot be any mistake? Listen to Him, then, as He speaks through the prophet Isaiah, and says, 'My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For' (oh! blessed reason)—'for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts' (Isa. lv. 8, 9).

When we are high up on a mountain side, our eye takes in a far wider and more extensive range of vision than it could do were we in the valley beneath. We may even climb so high as to be above the clouds which overhang the valley, and hide from those who inhabit it the mountain top where we are standing.

And so it is with God. His thoughts are so much higher than ours, that they can see above the mists and clouds that envelope us; yes, and look on and on, throughout an endless eternity. No wonder, then, that his thoughts are so often different from ours; different, because wiser; wiser, because higher.

Take, as an illustration, the case of a lady, of whom I heard some time ago. She was an old and feeble invalid, and many wondered why she was spared year after year, seldom able to leave her arm-chair, while the young and the active in God's service were taken. It was so strange, so mysterious, they said. Yes; for their thoughts were lower than God's thoughts.

One day a young nephew came to see her, who had just got his lieutenancy on board a man-of-war. Life looked very bright and joyous before him; and warmly did his aunt congratulate him, and lovingly did she enter into and sympathize with all his hopes for the future. But, when he was leaving, most earnestly and solemnly did she say: 'My dear boy, remember one thing. Remember to seek first—first of all—first, before anything else, "the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then all other things shall be added unto you"' (Matt. vi. 33).

Little heed did he pay to her words at the moment; but that night, as he lay in his berth, vainly endeavouring to sleep, God the Holy Spirit brought them home with power to his heart. In a strength not his own, he resolved that henceforth he would seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness. Through God's grace he kept his resolution, and experienced the truth of the promise annexed to the precept quoted by his aunt. Other things were added to him; he rose rapidly in his profession, and was not only blessed, but made a blessing to many.

Or take another, and not by any means uncommon case.

A devoted clergyman, in a large and important parish, is suddenly laid aside by illness, in the midst of a career of active usefulness, where he had been made a blessing to many, and where crowds assembled whenever and wherever he preached or lectured on the glad tidings of the gospel of peace. Sinners were converted, and saints were strengthened; and still, in the midst of it all, the faithful, zealous, hard-working clergyman is entirely shut out from the labours he so dearly loves.

His parishioners are in dismay. 'How strange! how mysterious!' is the cry raised on every side. 'We shall never have such another pastor! Why did not God still spare him to us, and take one of the many who seem to slumber at their post, and never to awake to a sense of the shortness of the time there is to work, or the value of immortal souls?'

How strange, how mysterious to such people would have seemed the forty years spent by Moses in the back side of the desert! Forty years!—a third of his whole life, and, as they would suppose, the part of it in which he was best fitted for active work. 'What waste of time!' would they not have said; 'how much more good he might have done had he spent that forty years in preaching to the children of Israel!'

But then, as now, 'God giveth not account of any of his matters' (Job xxxiii. 13). And time passes on—weeks, months, perhaps even years roll by—and again the pastor is given back to his people; again he is permitted to labour amongst them, and preach Christ crucified. But is he the same man that he was when he left them? In order to find out, let us see how the time of trial was spent.

Grief and sorrow, mingled with surprise, were probably his first feelings. There was so much that he wanted to do, so much that he had arranged to do, so much that no one else could do, —what would his people do without him? Then come thoughts—sorrowful, humbling thoughts of what he might have done; and, more sorrowful, more humbling still, of what he might have been. Amidst the constant pressure of work for Jesus, had he been as much with Jesus as he ought? While continually teaching others, had he continually sought to be himself taught of God? While keeping the vineyards of others, had not his own been sometimes neglected? Had not the want of sufficient communion with the Lord Jesus—of quiet reading of the word of God —of constant and earnest prayer—often ruffled his spirit, and made him hasty and impatient? When he looked at the crowded church, or meeting, or schoolrooms, had he not sometimes forgotten that he was but an instrument, and a very imperfect one; and that, though even a 'Paul might plant, and an Apollos water, yet that it is only God who giveth the increase?' (1 Cor. iii. 6.)

Ah! he no longer wonders why he has been laid aside; rather does he wonder that one so unworthy as he feels himself to be, has ever been permitted to work. His illness seems like a gentle message from 'the Shepherd and Bishop of souls' (1 Pet. ii. 25), saying to him, as He did to his disciples in the days when He was on earth, 'Come ye yourselves into a desert place apart, and rest awhile' (Mark vi. 33); and with the simple faith of a little child, he is now able to answer, 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth' (1 Sam. iii. 9).

And in his hours of weakness or of suffering, how near does the Lord Jesus draw to him!—revealing himself to him as He does not unto the world; teaching him some lessons that can only be learned on a bed of sickness, and others that can only be learned in times of quiet communion; while others again, that may be learned under any circumstances, are now learned by him with a depth, and an intensity, and a fulness unknown before.

And so, once again he returns to his people; and they do not any longer wonder at God's dealings, or speak of them as strange and mysterious. No, their pastor is not the same as he was when taken from them. There is a calmness about him now, that is only gained by living very close to Jesus. There is a patience and a tenderness in dealing with others, only exercised by those who have felt how deeply they have needed patience and tenderness themselves. There is a humility learned only by a solemn sense of God's holiness. There is a spirituality, never acquired except by a perpetual drawing of fresh grace from Him in whom all fulness dwells.

His people take 'knowledge of him, that he had been with Jesus' (Acts iv. 13). It was worth while to have lost him for a time, to have got him again, the same, yet oh! how different—'emptied of self, and filled with Jesus!' There was the change; and there, as it is true in a greater or less degree, lies the grand secret of the greater or less efficiency of every pastor.

But the people—were there not lessons for them also to learn? Had not some of them exalted their pastor too highly? Had they not forgotten that he was but an instrument in God's hands? Had they not thought it so impossible that his views on any subject could be mistaken, that they had neglected to follow the example of the Bereans, and search the Scriptures for themselves, to see whether these things were so? (Acts xvii. 11.) Had they not felt that they could not, perhaps even that they would not, learn from any one else, or work under any one else? And may not God, through their pastor's illness, be sounding loudly the solemn warning, 'Cease ye from man?' (Isa. ii. 22.)

Others, again, may have despised or neglected his ministrations, or been offended at his faithfulness; but now that he is gone, they learn their loss—learn how anxiously he 'watched for their souls, as one that must give an account' (Heb. xiii. 17).

To both of these different classes God may have had a message to send through their pastor in illness, that He could not have sent in the same way, through their pastor in health. A message lived, if I may use the expression, on a sickbed, often penetrates where a spoken word could not reach. And, surely, if a pastor and his people benefit, as they may do, by such a trial, they shall have abundant cause to thank God, both here and hereafter, that his thoughts were not their thoughts, nor his ways their ways.

But, in whatever circumstances we may be placed, and however perplexing and mysterious they may seem to us, shall we not seek for faith, to rest trustfully and joyfully in the wisdom, and the power, and the love of Him who, though his thoughts and ways are different from ours, yet 'doeth all things well,' and who has promised to make 'all things work together for good, to them that love God?'

'BE CAREFUL FOR NOTHING.'

What startling words! How strange they sound—how impossible it would be to obey them! Is not this what, in our inmost hearts, we are tempted to say and to think, as we read them? And yet they come from One who 'knoweth our frame, and remembereth that we are dust' (Ps. ciii. 14); from One who is not wont to issue an arbitrary command, and then leave us, in our ignorance and weakness, to discover, as best we may, why and how it is to be obeyed.

The command before us is very like that in the sixth chapter of St. Matthew, where our blessed Lord says, 'Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?' Do not be over-anxious, or tossed about (for that is the more exact meaning of the words), about your food and clothes; and then comes the blessed reason for the command—'for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things.' Surely, if an earthly father knows his children's wants, and has power to relieve them, he would gladly do so: 'how much more shall your heavenly Father give good things to them that ask Him?' (Matt. vii. 11.)

But to return to the command we are more particularly considering—'Be careful for nothing' (Phil. iv. 6). Our word 'carefulness,' or 'care,' comes from one which means 'to draw the heart two ways,'—very like what we read of Israel: 'Their heart is divided' (Hos. x. 2). And is not this drawing of the heart two ways the natural effect of care in a Christian? With one side of his heart he is, as it were, trying to raise his thoughts to God, and with the other he is thinking of his trouble; and this side being the heaviest, draws the upward thoughts down again, and the heart becomes burdened with care.

It would not, however, be of much use telling of a fault (for carefulness is a fault, and a serious one), unless we could point to a remedy, and a remedy that is not only certain in its effects, but applicable to all circumstances, and which may be used by the weakest and most ignorant of God's children, as well as by the strongest and the wisest. Such a remedy has been provided for us, to enable us to obey the command, 'Be careful for nothing;' and consists of three parts—all, however, closely and intimately connected with each other.

The first part of this remedy is given in the last clause of the immediately preceding verse, and is contained in the words, 'The Lord is at hand;' or, 'The Lord is close beside you.' In order, however, that this thought may help us to obey the command, we must find out what kind of Lord He is. All depends on this. If the kindest friends in the world were beside us, they might be all powerless to help us; or an enemy might be beside us, and have the power, but not the will. Both are essential, and both the Lord has. To Him has been 'given all power in heaven and in earth' (Matt. xxviii. 18); and can we doubt his willingness, when we read that He 'is merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in mercy and truth' (Ex. xxxiv. 6); and that 'He is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works?' (Ps. cxlv. 9.) Ah! is there not strength and comfort in the thought of having such a Lord beside you?

But to come to details. What is it about which you are careful? Is it about your soul? The Lord beside you has said: 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out' (John vi. 37); 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool' (Isa. i. 18). Are you troubled about one very dear to you? The Lord beside you has said: 'I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked' (Ezek. xxxiii. 11); and is 'long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance' (2 Pet. iii. 9). Or is it that your husband is dead, and you feel that you will soon follow him, and then what is to become of your children—who is to provide for them? Hear that same gracious Lord saying to you, in perhaps the most trying circumstances in which you could be placed: 'Leave thy fatherless children, and I will preserve them alive' (Jer. xlix. 11); and again: 'A father of the fatherless . . . . is God in his holy habitation' (Ps. lxviii. 5); and yet again we read: 'In Thee the fatherless findeth mercy' (Hos. xiv. 3). The meaning of mercy is, 'laying misery to heart.' You know that the Lord has power to relieve your children's misery, and He has promised to lay it to his heart. Could He do that, and not relieve it? Well might He say, 'Let thy widows trust in me' (Jer. xlix. 11). To take but one more instance. Is it because you have been misunderstood, or misrepresented, that makes you careful—fearing that your character may suffer? Listen to the Lord beside you, as He assures you that 'He will bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noon-day' (Ps. xxxvii. 6).

Have we not, then, a most strong and powerful reason for being 'careful for nothing,' in the simple assurance that 'the Lord is at hand?'

There is another reason, however, which follows the command, and is joined to it by the little conjunction 'but.' 'But' (as if it said, instead of being careful) 'in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.' Sure it is, that 'all things,' and therefore the things which are making you careful, 'are naked and open unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do' (Heb. iv. 13). Yet we must tell them to Him in prayer. Willing as He is to grant our desires, and to satisfy our wants, still the promise is, 'Ask, and ye shall receive' (Matt. vii. 7). And He not only permits, but invites us to do this; for He says, 'Put me in remembrance' (Isa. xliii. 26). Then, again, how precious is the little word 'every!' The thing that is making you careful may be something so important, that on its being granted may depend, so far as you can see, the happiness of your whole life; and you think, perhaps, 'What right have I to ask such a favour—I that am so worthless, so unprofitable? Look at the verse, and you will find it says, 'In everything;' therefore that everything must include great things as well as small.

Perhaps, however, what is making you careful may be in itself a trifle so small, that you would be ashamed to tell it even to a friend; but still it has power to trouble you, and make you careful. Or, again, it may be a combination of little things that, on this particular day, seems to make everything go wrong. We will suppose a case. It is late in the afternoon, and, weary and depressed, you are sitting in your own room, to secure a quiet half hour for rest and thought before your husband comes home. What is it that has made the day so weary? You think over it. It was a bright sunshiny morning, and the children were restless and inattentive, longing for their lessons to be over, that they might go out, and you are afraid you were not as patient and gentle as you might have been. When you went about your housekeeping, there had been some mistake about the marketing—something you particularly wished to have for dinner had not come—and, at great inconvenience, you had been obliged to send one of the servants for it, and she did not like going, and you felt worried. Then, just as you sat down to write a letter you wished to send by the day's post, a young friend came in. You liked her, and were interested in her, and had often tried to win her confidence and lead her to Jesus; but you wished she had not come in just then. You had not time to notice her wistful look of disappointment, as, plainly perceiving she was in the way, she left in a few minutes. If you but knew that she had come to-day intending to open her heart to you, but, seeing you looked worried and troubled, went away without doing it, thinking how sadly altered you were, how grieved you would be! But you do not know it; you only suspect it, as you sit thinking. Then other visitors came in; and just as you were setting off to visit a poor sick woman, it began to rain so heavily that you could not go out at all. Now you remember the words, 'Be careful for nothing;' but you would much rather not remember them,—they sound cold and unsympathizing,—and you say, 'I cannot help being careful; no one could, who had such a multitude of little things to do and to think of.'

Again you think of the verse—of the whole verse this time—and with a sigh you say, 'Yes, certainly, if I was careful or anxious about anything great or important, I would certainly pray about it; but these things are such trifles, I should be ashamed to bring them to God in prayer.' Look at the verse, and you will see that the words are, 'In everything;' and does not that word include small things as well as great? Besides, if things are too small and insignificant to tell God, they are surely too small and insignificant to trouble you, and make you careful.

Would not the day, with all its troubles, have been a happy one, had you lived through it in the realized consciousness that the Lord was beside you? How calm it would have made you, how gentle, how patient! And then, how a moment's prayer about the children and servants would have smoothened your temper and theirs! Would not this consciousness and prayerfulness have made you watch to see the Lord's purpose in your young friend coming to you; and would not the answer have been sent, in your being given the right word to speak to her; while the wet afternoon might have seemed sent by God as a time for you to look after your own vineyard, instead of those of others? Think not for a moment, that the most trifling thing that concerns you is too small for your Father in heaven to care about. What could be more unimportant than the number of the hairs of your head? yet He who 'telleth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their name,' has numbered them (Ps. cxlvii. 4; Matt. x. 30). We think the sparrows very insignificant, yet not one of them falls to the ground without your Father's knowledge. Fear not, then, to tell that Father your cares, for ye are 'of more value than many sparrows' (Matt. x. 29).

But perhaps you may say, 'I have prayed; but I suppose I did not pray in faith, for somehow my prayers, instead of rising to heaven, seemed to fall powerlessly on my heart, and I had not hope enough to try again.'

And if you had, it would not have been any use. As the poet has truly said—

'Words without thoughts, never to heaven mount;'

your thoughts were with your cares, and you only prayed because you ought, or because you knew that sometimes, when people prayed, they did get answers; so perhaps, as God is very merciful, He might possibly do what you asked Him.

Ah! such prayers never reach God—never win an answer. You did not search the Scriptures and see what good cause you had to trust the Lord who was beside you. Neither did you try the effect of the third part of the remedy against carefulness, woven into the verse we have been considering, and which until now we have purposely avoided mentioning. You did not let thanksgiving for past blessings mingle with your prayers for present ones. And yet the injunction is: 'In everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.' And how wonderfully the recollection of past mercies, and past answers to prayer, strengthens and confirms our wavering faith and trembling hearts!

It is not enough to raise your 'Ebenezer,' and say, 'Hitherto hath the Lord helped us' (1 Sam. vii. 12); with thanksgiving, as with prayer, you must go into details. Not long ago, a dark cloud had come between you and your Saviour, and there was not any one to whom you felt you could tell your trouble; but one day you were paying a morning visit, the lady of the house was particularly engaged, and you were asked to wait a few minutes. You took up a book that, as people say, happened to be lying on the table; in that book you found that 'God's way of peace' was a way that exactly suited you, for it showed you that He had 'made peace through the blood of his cross' (Col. i. 20), and that you had only to accept it. You did accept it, and you went home 'rejoicing in God your Saviour' (Luke i. 47).

Or it may be, that one, dearer to you than life, was ill—dying, as it appeared; and in an agony you prayed that, 'if it was possible, the cup might pass from you' (Matt. xxvi. 39); and it did pass, and your loved one was restored to health and strength again. Nay, more, life to the soul was given, when life to the body was restored.

Then, again, you remember how, some months ago, you had promised your children that, if the morrow was fine, you would give them a holiday, and a pic-nic in the woods. The evening looked very unfavourable, and the children were sadly afraid the weather would change. You remember how you gathered them all around you, and read them first some verses, to show that God was so good and gracious that He liked to see people happy; then you read them some to show his power over the weather, and how He could send rain, or not send it, just as He pleased; and then, when their hearts had been cheered, and they had been encouraged to trust God's love, you knelt down with them all, and in few and simple words you told God the plan for the morrow, and why your children were so anxious that it should be fine, and asking Him that, if it were good for them, their desire might be granted. And it was granted, for the day was most beautiful; and very heartily had you thanked God, as again you knelt with your happy children, who you felt had learned one more lesson of their heavenly Father's goodness, and his love of answering prayer.

As you recall these, or similar instances, and remember the character of the Lord who is beside you, do you not feel that you can pray in faith, and can cast your care upon Him, knowing that He careth for you? (1 Pet. v. 7)—knowing, too, that He who delivered you in six troubles, in the seventh will not let evil touch you (Job vi. 19).

And then, how beautifully, in the next verse, comes in the promise, 'And'—that is, if you trust in the Lord, who is always at hand, and in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, make your requests unto Him, the blessed result shall be this: 'And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds.' What a marvellous promise! It is not our peace that is to keep our hearts and minds. Ah! if it was, the first cloud of care would dim its brightness. No; it is God's peace—the peace that the Lord Jesus died to gain for us—a peace which may truly be said to pass all understanding, because it may be yours under circumstances when, either because of the multitude of petty troubles that daily throng your path, or from intense anguish, nothing else, or nothing less could keep you calm. But, as it is elsewhere said, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee' (Isa. xxvi. 3). If we have a strong warder to keep our castle, will he not prevent intruders from entering? and if the peace of God is keeping our hearts and minds, it will banish cares.

If, therefore, at any time we do find cares returning, we may be quite sure that the warder is absent. He never leaves his post of his own accord. Oh! if he is gone, see to it, that by using the means of which we have been speaking, you speedily bring him back. And watch that you do not do anything to drive him away again, for when you do, you grieve the Lord who is beside you. The passage closes with the words, 'Through Jesus Christ our Lord.' Oh, how it enhances the joy, to receive such a blessing, through such a messenger!

Readings for the Young.

LIGHT FOR THE DARK VALLEY.

ONE of our greatest statesmen lay wrestling with his last enemy. All his learning, all his eloquence, all the worldly applause he had won, were nothing to him now. Though he complained of no bodily suffering, yet his frame tossed restlessly upon his couch, and his countenance betokened an agony within, which all his pride and power of will could not command. He asked a friend to read to him; and his favourite poem, Gray's Elegy, was the consolation of his dying hour!

Lately a light has gone out from the land. One of America's bravest sons, and most honoured, has left us. The record of his deeds of valour will ring down the centuries. And yet, what have his victories achieved for him at the grave's mouth? What things occupy his last moments? We may not fully know; but it is recorded that the last intelligible words of one of America's greatest generals (Winfield Scott) were addressed to his hostler: 'James, how is the horse?' 'He is well, General.' 'Take care of him, James;' and in less than half an hour his soul took its flight.

How different the scene when a poor converted red man laid him down to die on his bed of leaves! Though racked with suffering, he exclaimed to one who watched over him: 'Me no have plenty book learning like white man, but Jesus teach poor Indian. He come in night time, when all is dark, and then me have light, and joy, and happiness. And now me go soon to Him. He come quickly, take poor Indian home, and then there be no more dark!'—Sunday-School Times.

YOU CAN'T CATCH IT.

YOU can't catch it, boys or girls. You may be as fleet of foot as the antelope, or you may fly as on the wings of an eagle, yet you cannot overtake it.

Cannot overtake what?

The bad word which has passed your lips! It fled to heaven, and wrote itself on the book of God. You can't catch it.

The wicked deed you performed. It soared to the judgment, and was stereotyped on the memory of the Judge. You can't catch it.

The sinful thought you indulged. Its image was caught by the light of God's eye, and photographed on the roll of your history. You can't catch it.

Beware then, O my children, what you think, what you do, what you say.

SOMETHING COMES.

SOMETHING comes of all we do. There is a little girl, she lives in the country, she has a little plot in the garden—her own flower-bed. There, one day, she planted a little seed. Left it there a week at least, and took no notice of it? No, no; up early in the morning after, hastening to look at the spot where but yesterday she sowed the seed, so anxious to know whether it would take root and grow. And oh! with what delight does she watch the result of her little seed-sowing!

There is a boy standing by the river; he takes up a stone, the largest he can find, and throws it with all his might into the water. And runs away? No; but waits to watch the circles, the widening circles, that follow the casting in of the stone.

Nor must we forget that the something that comes of all we do is according to what we do. Foolish would that man be who sowed tares, and expected to reap wheat; yet not more foolish than the conduct of those who sow the seeds of wickedness and folly, and think, by and by when the harvest comes, to reap the fruit of holiness and love. God's word is plain; ever keep it in mind: 'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap: for he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.'

'I HAVE ORDERS NOT TO GO.'

'I HAVE orders, positive orders, not to go there; orders that I dare not disobey,' said a youth who was being tempted to a smoking and gambling saloon.

'Come, don't be so womanish! come along like a man,' shouted the youths.

'No, I can't break orders,' said John.

'What special orders have you got? Come, show them to us, if you can. Show us your orders.'

John took a neat little book from his pocket, and read aloud: 'Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it! pass not near it! turn from it, and pass away!'

'Now,' said John, 'you see my orders forbid my going with you. They are God's orders, and by his help I mean to keep them.'

GOING HOME.

WHERE are you going so fast, old man?
Where are you going so fast?
There's a valley to cross, and a river to ford;
There's a clasp of the hand, and a parting word,
And a tremulous sigh for the past, old man—
The beautiful, vanished past.

The road has been rugged and rough, old man;
To your feet it is rugged and rough;
But you see a dear being, with gentle eyes,
Has shared in your labour and sacrifice.
Ah! that has been sunshine enough, old man,
For you and me—sunshine enough.

How long since you passed o'er the hill, old man,
Of life—o'er the top of the hill?
Were there beautiful valleys on t'other side?
Were there flowers and trees, with their branches wide,
To shut out the heat of the sun, old man—
The heat of the fervid sun?

And how did you cross the waves, old man,
Of sorrow—the fearful waves?
Did you lay your dear treasures up, one by one,
With an aching heart, and 'God's will be done,'
Under the wayside dust, old man,
In the graves 'neath the wayside dust?

There is sorrow and labour for all, old man;
Alas! there is sorrow for all;
And you, peradventure, have had your share,
For eighty long winters have whitened your hair;
And they've whitened your heart as well, old man—
Thank God, your heart as well!

You're now at the foot of the hill, old man—
At last at the foot of the hill!
The sun has gone down in a golden glow,
And the heavenly city lies just below.
Go in through the pearly gate, old man,
The beautiful pearly gate! —Anon.

Miscellaneous.

Italian Caricatures. — Of the hundreds of caricatures which we saw in Italy, none so impressed us as a little card which we were shown at Naples. It expressed, with antithetical consciousness and power, a great truth. In two sentences, the respective genius of the gospel and that of the Papacy was comprehensively and vividly hit off. The card was divided into two compartments. In the one compartment was a representation of Christ on the cross, his head encircled with the wreath of thorns. In the other was Pius IX. on the throne, adorned by the triple crown. Underneath Him who wore the thorny crown were the words: 'God made himself a man, that He might save men.' Underneath the wearer of the tiara was written: 'A man made himself God, that he might destroy men.' Pasquin is an ancient institution at Rome. An invisible Rhadamanthus, he erected his tribunal in the midst of society, and fearlessly summoned before it personages of every degree, and opinions and manners of all sorts. His decisions were often severe, sometimes sarcastic, sometimes witty, occasionally quaint, but commonly just. Seldom does he fail to hit the mark. The Romans listened to Pasquin, and bowed more profoundly to the oracle of the pillar than even to the oracle of the Vatican. The former was generally accounted the more infallible of the two. After a long silence, Pasquin has again spoken. Let us hear him on the present state of things in Italy. The following appeared recently upon the famous column:

'The Pope wields the two powers.
The soldier defends all the two.
The citizen pays for all the three.
The labourer toils for all the four.
The priest eats for all the five.
The doctor kills all the six.
The thief robs all the seven.
The confessor absolves all the eight.
The grave-digger buries all the nine.
Diabolus carries off all the ten.'

Old Egypt.—It is hardly possible to imagine a greater contrast than is presented between the Monuments and the History of Egypt. The monuments tell of a native monarchy flourishing among the great empires of the East; its kings little less than demigods; its priesthood endued with a sanctity revered in distant lands; its chariots and horses pouring out to battle under the banners of a thousand gods; the nations of the earth bringing tribute; and art and luxury carried to an extent only possible to a numerous population, with abundant material resources and a high mental development. On the date and duration of this splendid period the monuments are dumb. They witness what Ancient Egypt was; they know nothing of her rise, progress, or decay. Their testimony is confirmed by the position of Egypt in the Holy Scriptures, where her rulers are found showing hospitality to the father of the faithful, or reducing his descendants into bondage. Still, we only know that Egypt was a great power before Israel was a nation. It gleams out of a remote antiquity with a splendour that cannot be denied; but the splendour is a pre-historic memory, separated from authentic chronology by a gulf, which nothing but the Bible can span. All that we know of it is, that it existed before Moses, and perished about the close of the Old Testament. With the first page of secular history Ancient Egypt is already dead. The Pharaohs have become a tradition, the temples and altars are shrouded in mystery, the fleets and armies have disappeared, the people are reduced to inexorable servitude.—Canon Trevor.

The Cost of War.—Give me the money that has been paid in war, and I will purchase every foot of land upon the globe. I will clothe every man, woman, and child, in an attire that kings and queens would be proud of. I will build a schoolhouse upon every hill-side, and in every valley over the whole habitable earth. I will build an academy in every town, and endow it; a college in every State, and fill it with able professors. I will crown every hill with a church, consecrated to the promulgation of the gospel of peace. I will support in the pulpit an able teacher of righteousness, so that on every Sabbath morning the chime on one hill should answer to the chime on another round the earth's broad circumference, and the voice of prayer and the song of praise should ascend like a universal holocaust to heaven.—Stebbing.

A Progressive Age.—'We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord.' The march of intellect has left Paul far behind. The lofty course of modern thought has brought to light a new style of preaching. We find it thus expressed in the words of a modern divine, in an address delivered not long since to the graduating class of a theological school of 'Liberal Christians.' After assuming that the authority of the church and of the Bible has passed away, that history and criticism do not verify Christ, and that it is necessary to appeal to something deeper than either for the basis of authority, he goes on to say: 'Your courage is your credential. Fear not what scepticism, in the name of faith, may say to you; heed what faith says to you in the name of scepticism. . . . . You must preach yourselves—preach yourselves, honestly, simply, telling no lies, affecting no policies. Preach your best selves, and, for God's sake, make yourselves worth preaching.' Surely, more needless advice was never given. Every man of his own accord, even without Satan's suggestion, is disposed to preach himself, whether he is 'worth preaching' or not. But if Paul is not 'worth preaching,' who is, or ever can be?

Snarling.—The way not to be healthy or happy, is to keep up an incessant snarling. If you want to grow lean, cadaverous, and unlovely, excite yourself continually about matters you know nothing about. Accuse other people of wrong-doing incessantly, and you will find but little time to see any wrong in yourself. We wish, here and now, to inform all men of irritable dispositions, that they will live longer if they only keep cool. Snarling will kill about as quick as anything we know.

Moral Greatness.—Moral greatness, we apprehend, does not consist in doing extraordinary things, but in doing ordinary things with a great mind; that is, with a view to please and glorify God. 'Win and wear it,' is the motto on the crown for which the Christian is striving.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 JOHN v. 19.

THE Bible is the book of certainties. It gives no uncertain sound anywhere. It does not speak the language of doubt, or speculation, or conjecture, or opinion, but of certainty. Its object is to place us on the same footing of certainty—absolute certainty; enabling us to say not merely, I think, or I judge, but I know; enabling us to say without faltering, yet without boasting, 'I possess the true, the real, the certain, the authentic.' Our certainty from such a source is as sure as demonstration, because it rests on the authority of the God only true and wise.

This epistle is written in the language of certainty. 'We know,' is its motto—its burden from first to last. 'Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things' (1 John ii. 20); 'We know that we have passed from death to life' (1 John iii. 14); 'We know that we are of God' (1 John v. 19); 'We know that the Son of God is come.'

In our text there are three clauses or statements, each of them connected with 'We know.' Thus we have three certainties here; to each of them let us look.

I. We KNOW that the Son of God is come.—This is the central point of earth's history; the most real, and certain, and productive of all its facts and events. On it everything turns, whether men see it or not.

(1.) There is such a being as the Son of God.—He is not merely a Son, but the Son; the eternal Son; the only-begotten Son; the well-beloved Son; one with the Father.

(2.) He has come.—Not merely He is, but He has come down to us, in very deed. The word implies remaining as well as coming. It is not, He has visited us—He has come and gone; but, He has come to us, and is with us. He has arrived, not to depart, but to remain. 'I am with you always.'

(3.) He is Jesus of Nazareth.—A very man is He. Born at Bethlehem, brought up at Nazareth, the Son of Mary—Jesus, who went out and in amongst us! 'The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.'

(4.) We know this.—It is the most certain of all certainties; an event beyond the shadow of a doubt; the surest of all sure facts in earthly history. We know it on God's authority and on man's. Divine and human testimony unite here. Word and deed make us sure of this.

Ah! this is knowledge! The like of it is not to be found elsewhere. This is the knowledge that satisfies, gladdens, and gives us a foundation to rest on. The Son of God has come!

II. We KNOW that He has given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true.—For the meaning of 'understanding' we refer to Eph. i. 18: 'The eyes of your understanding being enlightened;' and Eph. iv. 18: 'Having the understanding darkened.' Christ is the giver of the new mind, whereby we discern the truth. He is (1) Renewer, (2) Teacher, (3) the Wisdom itself. He is the knowledge, and He gives the power of knowing. 'Who teacheth like Him?' He is the opener of the eye and ear. 'He that is true' is evidently the the true One, or true God: 'This is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God.' The Son of God has come to reveal to us the true God; to give us a mind capable of knowing and comprehending this true God. It is not a God that we need to know, but the God, THE one living and true God. There is no knowledge of God out of Christ, apart from Christ, or without Christ. Where the knowledge of Christ is not, there is utter ignorance of God; the worship of a false or an unknown God. False worship is a serious thing; a fearful sin; a hideous blasphemy. Falsehood touching God is infinite dishonour. Misapprehension of God is the root of all idolatry; and worship, under such misapprehension, is idolatry or superstition. It is the true God that is to be worshipped—none else. He will not give his glory to another. Nor will the knowledge of any false God fill or pacify the soul. It is only that God whom Jesus of Nazareth revealed, that will suffice for the human spirit. It is in 'the Word made flesh' that we find the true God.

III. We KNOW that we are in Him that is true.—To be in Him, is to be out of the world and out of self. We are to be in Him as the flower is in the garden, as the star is in the sky, as the graft is in the olive-tree. We are to be rooted and built up in Him. Here it is not near Him, nor on Him, but in Him. We dwell in Him, and He in us. We are in Him as the true God: as such He is our God, our habitation. Thus we are compassed about with Him as the earth is by the air: He compasses us about. It is not merely that 'in Him we live, and move, and have our being;' but much more than this; something of another kind, something that involves spiritual life, fellowship, love, and everlasting blessedness. But it is added, 'In his Son Jesus Christ.' We are not only in the Father, but in the Son, as we read (1 Thess. i. 1): 'The church of the Thessalonians which is IN God the Father, and IN the Lord Jesus Christ.' It is this inbeing, this indwelling, this participation or fellowship, that is our true standing and privilege.

(1.) This knowledge saves.—There is no salvation without it. It is saving knowledge. In knowing the true God we are saved.

(2.) This knowledge gladdens.—False knowledge of God, or the knowledge of a false god, imparts no joy; this does. It is joy to know the True One.

(3.) This knowledge purifies.—Error or falsehood cannot deliver from sin—cannot purify the soul. All error is impurity, unholiness. All truth is good; and all truth respecting God sanctifies, expands, elevates.

(4.) This knowledge makes us useful.—It is like a light or fire within us, that cannot be hidden. It is like a power within us, which cannot but work. It is irrepressible.

'Acquaint thyself with God, and be at peace, thereby good shall come unto thee.' He has revealed himself in Jesus Christ his Son. Blessed the man that knows Him; unhappy he that knows Him not! Better that he had been a beast; better that he had never been born! What must be an eternity without the knowledge of God!

GOD'S WISDOM AND MAN'S.*

THE apostle did not affect, therefore, as some others did, to turn philosophy to the service of the gospel, by seeking for presumed affinities of the lower and the higher wisdom. Such compromises he well knew could lead only to a corruption of the word of God, while they implied also an incompleteness in the testimony which professedly came forth from God. If Christ was to be the end, so should He likewise be the beginning of his doctrine. He would begin where nature ends. Of death he would speak, but not as a helpless confessor of its power. Nor would he philosophize upon mortality, like their own inquiring sages; but he would explain its meaning, and declare its cause. He would speak of it in connection with His name, who alone had tasted without sin a sinner's doom. He would show them how by dying Jesus had abolished death, and brought to light (for those who would by faith behold that light) both life and incorruption by the gospel. He would know among them nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified. He would declare to them his name, and who He is that bears it; his title, and by whom and why conferred; his living and meritorious obedience, and the much long-suffering of his grace. But especially he would insist upon his cross; for thus, and thus only, could the truth be fully told, whether of man in the dark bondage of his sin and misery, or of God in the abundant greatness of his love. He would declare God's testimony of his Son.

'And I was with you in weakness,' etc. But though he well knew both the nature of his work and its results, and while his sound spiritual judgment taught him the right mode of dealing with the Gentile mind-worshippers, he could not but be conscious, on that very account, of the formidable character of the resistance which the prince of this world was everywhere organizing against the truth, and which, in a city like Corinth, possessed in full force and efficiency its two main elements of Jewish virulence and Gentile pride. Against the threatenings of personal danger, as well as the disheartening effect of doctrinal opposition, he both needed and received the special encouragement of the Lord. Nor should we, in considering this verse, lose sight of the bearing which it also seems to have upon that inward and helpful, though often sorely-trying exercise of soul, which constitutes so large a portion of the 'travail,' which God commonly uses as a moral means of bringing his own children into light. They who truly work with God are made to feel continually that it is not they, but He, in whom the power dwells.

'And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words,' etc. He would neither leaven his teaching by palatable flatteries, nor commend it by rhetorical artifices to his hearers' taste. Both in manner and in substance his ministry should be 'of God.' In his presence no man can be otherwise than simple, and Paul fulfilled his mission as one who would persuade not men, but God. Instead, therefore, of rhetorical suasion, his gospel made its way 'in demonstration of the Spirit and of power.' In this large and general expression there is, probably, a reference to the outward miracles, which were so freely lavished at the beginning of the gospel as a demonstrative token to mankind at large of the source from whence the testimony came. But if so, they hold, in this description of his work at Corinth, but a secondary place. What he evidently insists on is the purely spiritual character of his ministry, and its effect upon the hearts and consciences of those who had received it. The Spirit of truth is the glorifier of Jesus; and both as the convincer of sin, and the revealer of divine righteousness, He had wrought effectually at Corinth through the ministry of Paul.

In verse 5 we are shown the motive which governed the apostle in thus rigidly avoiding, in his preaching, the ordinary methods of persuasion. It was, he tells us, 'That their faith might not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.' If the gospel is God's wisdom, the faith which embraces it is a token also, and a witness of his power. Credence may be given to the doctrines of men, and human wisdom has its votaries; for nature easily responds to what is natural. But a faith which justifies discerns the Person of its object, and is itself the gift of Him who sent his only-begotten into the world, that we might live by Him. Its quality is according to its origin. True faith believes God's word, and reckons on his power, regardless of the doubts or remonstrances of natural reason; for the gospel treats of natural impossibilities, while human wisdom either deals with natural facts, or wastes itself in empty speculations. But in neither of these can faith find any rest or stay; it must have a definite object before it, and can live only on a positive testimony. But philosophy does not testify. It has no message. That can only come from truth that is from God. And thus it is that every one who has known experimentally the power of the gospel, feels an instinctive disgust at artificial mannerism of any kind on the part of those who take in hand to preach the word of life. The faith of God's elect stands not on that 'rational conviction' which is the pedestal of mere historic Christianity, but by the upholding power of Him who gave it, and because it is itself a faculty of that new nature which the regenerative grace of God has conferred upon his own. Now, the work of regeneration is by the quickening word of truth. To the apostle, therefore, any artificial methods of commending his testimony would seem a sort of sacrilege. His power of persuasion was the native force of truth; its effect was to ground the willing listener upon the living Rock of Ages. Thus God is glorified in that which is his own peculiar work.

* From Notes and Reflections on the First Epistle to the Corinthians. By ARTHUR PRIDHAM. London: Longmans. 1866.

'Howbeit we speak wisdom,' etc. While the preaching of the cross is, in the manner of it, 'foolishness,' there is a wisdom which is spoken to the perfect. We have thus a clear and decisive line of demarcation established by the Spirit between those whom He addresses on the gracious invitation of the gospel, as the word of reconciliation, and those who, having by faith received the word with understanding, are now estimated according to the grace in which they stand. The latter are by description 'perfect,' because seen and accepted in the Perfect One himself. But though perfect in standing, as complete in Christ, they are not so in knowledge. On the contrary, in the true order of the Spirit's teaching, the complete justification of a sinner is the prelude to his education as a saint. To 'go on unto perfection' is the natural progress of those who have begun to know the Lord. The 'path of the just' can be trodden only by the just. The Father guides and chastens his own children, while in grace He seeks still to reconcile his adversaries to himself.

Accordingly, the teaching, as distinguished from the preaching, of Jesus Christ, is the subject of the present and following verses to the close of the chapter. And now, reversing his own language, he asserts as a teacher what as an evangelist he had disclaimed. It is no longer foolishness, but wisdom that he speaks. 'Yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, which comes to nought.' The first point of contrast to be noticed between the wisdom of this age and the wisdom of the just is, that the first is perishable like the fleeting time which witnesses its efforts, while the last grows on to a completion which will only be attained when the former things are passed away. They are diverse also in their origin, their object, and effect. The one is from beneath, the other from above. Self-seeking is the rule and aim of worldly wisdom, while the fear of the Lord is the beginning and the sum of the wisdom which cometh from above. 'In much wisdom is much grief,' is the confession of him who saw the furthest into things beneath the sun; but the wisdom that God teaches leads his children in the way of pleasantness and peace. Corruption and a fool's reward are the certain end of what the world esteems, while the good fruits of true wisdom will be reaped with endless praise when the day comes for her children, who have justified her, to receive her crown.

But besides these broad and general distinctions between the wisdom of the Spirit and the wisdom of this world, there is revealed now to the perfect a form of wisdom which no other eyes can see. Of this, in verse 7, he proceeds to treat: 'We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery,' etc. There are mysteries of grace as well as mysteries of nature. Philosophy still hopes to penetrate the latter, while the former are the birthright of the simple, who believe in God. At all times the secret of the Lord has been with them that fear Him; for in his name was treasured all that He could give or show. But there is an order in the revelations of his truth, even as there are measures and degrees in the bestowment of his grace. As we are taught elsewhere, a better lot has been reserved for us who now receive God's calling than that of the fathers, who obtained a good report through faith. The language of the passage now before us is both clear and definite: the wisdom to be spoken among the perfect, although ordained before the world, was hidden until its destined recipients had attained, through the revelation of God's finished love in Christ, the distinctive title now conferred upon them by the Spirit.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XIV.—AN AGED CHRISTIAN.

'THE great diary of the human race is daily being written,' says one, 'and every man in every place enters his daily quota in the vast journal.'

A great variety would we find in these entries, had we only the power to read what is there so unchangeably written; and how many books could be produced, not only interesting, but also of great practical value, were we only permitted to peruse them!

But as there is no hope of obtaining volumes from such a view-point of human life, one must be content to take much lower ground, in presenting a brief account of an aged Christian, whom grace enabled to write many a fair page in the great day-book.

In describing the inward change he experienced, and the future manner of his life, only such parts can be noticed as are palpable to our limited capacities. But although the secret touches of divine power on the human spirit, with the silent but efficacious operations of grace by which it is made responsive, are quite beyond our present range of vision; yet their results, as they appear in the life, may be observed and turned to account, as practical illustrations of Christian principle, acted out to its legitimate issues.

The Bible, it has been said, finds its best commentary in the lives of its disciples; so perhaps the following narrative may help to set some of its life-giving principles in the same clear and beautiful light as they appeared in the life of Mr. A——, from the time that he was first blessed with a discovery of the Saviour's love, until every earthly thing brightened with the nearing glories of a certain heaven.

With the subject of this sketch I became acquainted in the following manner. I had, with a friend, been spending a very pleasant evening in the house of Col. B——. He usually maintained a great reticence regarding what he had seen of active service. But on this occasion he had entertained us with reminiscences of several engagements, and, as was natural, considerable admiration was expressed for the brave men who so willingly encountered the horrors of war in defence of their country.

'That is true,' said the Colonel, somewhat pensively; 'but do you know, I saw an old man today that I believe to be a greater hero than any of us; his victories, at least, will be more enduring in their results.'

'I am quite in earnest,' he again said, seeing his speech had provoked a smile. 'Do we not read that he is greater who ruleth his own spirit, than he that taketh a city?'

'I hope,' said my friend, 'you will tell us something of this brave old veteran;' and on condition that he would be taken on our visiting list, we had the following account:

Mr. A—— had been a man of some wealth, which he had used freely in doing good, but by the failure of the E—— bank, he lost nearly all.

His near relatives were dead. The rest, with many other friends, had illustrated but too correctly the truthful, if bitter, sentiment of Moore:

'The friends that in our sunshine live,
When winter comes are flown;
And he who has but tears to give,
Can weep those tears alone.'

But happily for Mr A——, before these springs of earthly joy ran dry, he had learned to drink of the deeper well whose waters fail not; and before proceeding further, the history of his inner life may be thus briefly stated.

His youth and early manhood had been so strictly moral, that his character as a man of the world was unexceptionable. Yet, when about the age of twenty-six, a struggle commenced, and that seemingly without human agency, for there were none about him capable of instructing in the scriptural way of salvation.

The first step was a conviction that the life he was leading was far below what he was capable of. Then he began to see that his morality was not perfect, as he had supposed, but that he had sins of the heart which exposed him to condemnation. Then he was gradually led by the Spirit through that chamber of imagery, and showed its abominations, until he was well nigh driven to despair.

Then a strange bitter animosity began to rise in his heart as he inquired why he, without the concurrence of his will, should have been placed under such conditions; and for a time he battled against his convictions, and tried to persuade himself that he was not to blame.

But when the Spirit begins to work, He does it effectually; and these exercises, though very painful, were part of the effectual process by which he was brought quickly from all false resting-places straight to the rock on which he was henceforth to rest.

Gradually he was led to see that, though he could not understand why sin had been permitted to enter the world, yet as it was so, and salvation from it had been provided, it was his duty to submit to God, to trust rather than arraign his goodness, and solicit his proffered mercy.

And one day while in prayer, after this warfare with his wilful heart was brought to a close, what he experienced is well described by those lines of Keble:

'The storm is o'er—and hark! a still small voice
Steals on the ear to say Jehovah's choice
Is ever with the soft meek tender soul.'

So it was with Mr. A——; that still small voice seemed to whisper through the very depths of his being: 'Because I live ye shall live also.' Then did his happy spirit, consciously accepted, nestle itself for ever to rest on the bosom of its reconciled God and Father.

But to return to the outer life of Mr. A——. After the loss of his money, he set at once about accommodating himself to his altered circumstances—no easy matter to a man about seventy. The spirit in which he did so may thus be expressed:

'Take all, Great God, I will not grieve,
But still will wish that I had still to give;
Thy presence in my heart sustains me,
Thy mercy orders all that pains me.'

And resolutely he determined to live in the most sparing manner possible, rather than solicit help from any one, at least not until his own little pittance was consumed.

Soon after moving into his little lodging, a stroke of paralysis laid him low. He recovered, however; but another followed, and left him more helpless than before. This illness was a heavy drain upon his resources; yet he would receive nothing until they were quite exhausted.

I do not now remember whether Col. B—— knew him in his better days, or if he had merely ferreted him out since his misfortunes; for that gentleman had a wonderful faculty of finding out such sufferers, and enacting to them the part of a good Samaritan; whichever way, he was fully conversant with the history of Mr. A——, and deeply interested in his case.

The street to which Mr. A—— had removed was tenanted chiefly by poor but respectable people. But in choosing his lodging he had not made a happy selection. His landlady was a very dirty, slatternly woman, and though outwardly the tenement vied with the most respectable in the street, the litter and filth within was almost inconceivable.

This was true of all the apartments, but particularly so of the one he occupied.

'A little room with a rugless floor,
And the winter blast,
As it whistled past,
Piercing in at the broken door
And broken pane,
Where the light of day
Had its wildest play,
And no curtain to drive it out again.
A table bare, and one Old Book,
On which dim eyes grew bright to look;
A smouldering fire and two big chairs,
A bed for the feeble.' . . . .

Bad enough certainly for one accustomed to something better; yet a place answering the above description would, speaking comparatively, have been a palace to Mr. A——'s.

He had not even a smouldering fire. There was a table, not bare, but covered with the debris of all the edibles used by him for, I suppose, at least a month previous, and above all, a profusion of dishes, phials, etc. The two big chairs,—for there were two,—were in much the same condition. The Old Book lay on a small shelf, where it could be easily reached by the visitor, and was the only instance where the least attempt at convenience was visible.

It could not be said of this place, what a great man said of his friend's library, that it was in 'orderly disorder,' for it seemed a receptacle for all sorts of litter quite foreign to the requirements of a sick-room, heaped together in an interminable mass of filth and confusion.

I have been purposely minute in this description, because in that lonely chamber religion appeared in one of its sublimest forms, and did so effectually counterpoise the horrors of that recess of misery, as to turn it into a very Elysium.

On entering it for the first time, I was struck with its squalor and misery, but much more with the appearance of Mr. A——. A storm had evidently passed over him, and now he lay like a noble tree torn by a hurricane from its roots. And if there had been any of those convulsive struggles of irritable nature incident to such circumstances, all traces of them had disappeared.

But for its expression, there was nothing remarkable in his countenance. To features originally large, paralysis had imparted a sort of coarseness. From his mouth, which from the same cause was partly open, his tongue, apparently much swollen, protruded. His hair, which time had fully silvered, was matted and disorderly. But he seemed to have within himself a living spring of peaceful joy; and though it may appear exaggerated to say it, the whole of that countenance, so destitute of external grace, was literally radiant with Spirit-light.

No sooner had I entered the room than he spoke, but in such deep guttural tones that I could not understand one word.

When I told him that Col. B—— had been speaking about him, and that I had consequently taken the liberty of paying a visit, he again spoke, and made a great effort to be understood, but in vain. Then he looked to his hand, for he had no power to extend it.

When I had taken his hand in mine, he kept gazing upon me for some time very steadily, while that wondrous light kept playing over his features. And that steady gaze, the object of which was evidently to decipher something of my character, did at the same time reveal so much of his own, that you longed to blend more fully with what you saw—

'And share
The inward fragrance of that holy heart!'

How I did wish that he had been able to speak intelligibly, and impart some of those rich treasures which his long experience could have afforded; for

'Thoughts in the heart of age
With deep pure radiance shine,
As priceless gems deep stored
Down in some ancient mine;
Which time and faith have polished
With beauty day by day,
Until the pure soul shineth
With almost heavenly ray!'

As the poor gentleman continued to make fruitless efforts to speak so as to be understood, I thought he might feel pained at not succeeding; so, to put an end to it, I took up his Bible and asked if I would read for him.

Having read and talked a little more, I asked again, 'Shall I pray with you?'

'Will you do that?' he said, with such a look of mingled surprise and pleasure.

The words were spoken, as before, in deep guttural tones, yet I understood them, and was very much pleased, as it afforded ground to hope that I might yet be able to communicate with him fully.

I suppose the surprise he manifested arose from this, that the Colonel, who visited him frequently, read, and talked with him, was yet so diffident of his own powers, that he never would attempt praying extempore in presence of any one.

Next visit I talked to him freely, and did not seek to restrain his efforts to speak to me. I hoped, by accustoming myself to the peculiar sounds, ultimately to understand them fully; and to a great extent I succeeded.

One day I told him of a poor old man, who had been a professor of religion the greater part of his life, which had also been quite in keeping with that profession. Quiet and steady he had been, highly honourable in all his dealings, constant in his attendance at church and other religious duties, yet was now in a very despondent state of mind, in consequence of having, as he thought, discovered that he had never possessed the inward and spiritual grace which should have been the mainspring of these actions, and could not be persuaded out of the belief that his state was hopeless.

This account deeply interested Mr. A——. He talked, oh, so earnestly! but I could not for some time catch his words with sufficient frequency to give them much connection. Our conversation, however, greatly facilitated my progress towards understanding him, having a pretty good idea of what he was likely to say when I caught a little, and from that I could guess a good deal more. Then I would repeat to him what I thought he said, and, to our mutual pleasure, was pretty often correct.

How the sympathies of Mr. A—— seemed to flow out towards the poor old man I have spoken of! How many encouraging messages did he send to 'trust in the Lord,' to lay hold of such promises as suited his case! There was one: 'He that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.' 'Tell him the Lord will be as good as his word. There's no condition but that of coming; and though he's been late of going, that will not affect God's faithfulness; he will not be cast out.' At another time it was, 'Tell him that the Spirit is now dealing with him, or he would have been left in his formality to die as he had lived. He ought not, therefore, to be afraid to come to Christ; He never excluded any, and He never will. The idea would be monstrous that a sinner came to the Saviour and was cast out, had taken God at his word and was disappointed, or had tried the promise and found it false,' etc. One day while we talked of him, the difference between their spiritual positions seemed to strike him forcibly, and he told me that it was forty years since he began to follow the Saviour, and that through all that lengthened period he had known his acceptance. 'I am sure, quite sure,' he several times repeated, 'I know that I am saved. But it was not always so; my starting-point was lowly enough,—submissive trust,—then the light came. I thought it bright then, yet it was but a feeble spark to what I now enjoy. How He has led me about, and instructed me, and up and up, and from my present position all is light!'

I suggested the scene on Pisgah.

'Yes,' he replied, 'and not only have I some glimpses of the coming glory, but also the wherefores of much in the past. And now I wish to say to you, and to others through you, that He is worthy of trust, boundless trust, implicit trust. Never cherish a doubt, or even the shadow of one, about Him or the rectitude of his government. He has good reasons for all He does, and in due time He'll reveal them.'

This was no common experience; but he evidently did enjoy that intimate communion and fellowship with Jehovah, which indicates the almost perfect meetness for the inheritance among the saints in light. I think he also well exemplified the statement, that there is an inexhaustible fountain of grace and life, accessible and attainable according to the measure of our spiritual appetites.

During one morning visit, which proved to be the last, we had a more than ordinarily interesting talk. What a glorious being grace had made him! His spirit seemed tuned into such harmony with heavenly realities, that his whole experience was one long sensation of bliss. It was virtually and essentially religion in full triumph. How I wished it possible that every sceptical one could see this splendid and irrefragable proof of the reality and power of religion, and the complete triumph which it had won, where every form of evil had apparently combined to crush a suffering being!

In addition to the weariness of old age, and the pain and languor of disease, there was the loss of all the comforts and distinctions which wealth bestows; and his reduced condition was accompanied by many aggravations, which, but for some supreme power, would have left this helpless man in all the agonies of despair.

That day on leaving I noticed, for the first time, a shadow cross his countenance.

'There is something grieving you, Mr. A——. What is it?'

'I can do nothing now for my Master,' he replied, with a wistful kind of expression.

'You are very much mistaken. I believe you are doing far more for your Master, suffering as you are, than any of us who are actively engaged in his service.' Then I told him what had been passing in my mind for the last half hour:

> 'Chosen to bear witness of religion's power,
> And purity, and nobleness.

'Amid such peculiar circumstances, do not think, Mr. A——, that your life is a useless one.'

The gratified look which overspread his countenance seemed to say, 'I have no further desire;' and certainly it came up quite to what I had often conceived old Simeon's to wear, when he said, 'Lord, now lettest Thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.'

That day his landlady came out after me, quite anxious to know what was to be done, as his money was almost gone.

'Is there enough until to-morrow?' I inquired; for I regarded as sacred his objection to receive help until his own resources were completely exhausted.

'Yes; but not longer than that,' she replied.

'To have everything needful?'

'Yes.'

'Then you may keep your mind quite easy, it will be all arranged to-morrow.' And so it was, but in a manner different from what we anticipated, for during that night

> 'Death did o'er him creep
> Like a slumber sweet and deep.'

Thus the one strong desire of his heart was gratified: he did not require pecuniary aid from any one, as a few pence still remained of his own little store, when he was permitted to enter upon that inheritance for which he had obtained such a remarkable meetness.

How truly it has been said, that 'religion is the best panacea for all the ills that flesh is heir to!' A good proof of it is afforded by what I may call this sunny sketch. For though dark clouds hemmed in his outer life, what openings were made in them, and through those narrow vistas what floods of celestial sunshine poured themselves perpetually into his heart, until even the frail earthy tenement was invested with a halo of living light, and at length the quickened spirit was sundered from it, with touch so gentle, that what was death seemed but transition to that place where there is > 'No need of the sun in the day

> Which never is followed by night;
> For the Lamb is their Light and their Sun!'

It is well occasionally to turn our attention to such instances of triumphant faith and exalted Christian experience, as, by showing so vividly what is attainable through grace, they act as an incentive towards the higher walks in the divine life. There is no doubt but, in the case of Mr. A——, as in every other sinful mortal, the serpent's trail marked his path; yet how completely, towards the close of life, was he made to tread on the necks of his enemies! The promise in his case was fulfilled: 'Thou shalt tread on the lion and on the adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under foot.'

Most of us, I believe, would join in the poet's wish:

> 'Oh! may I triumph so
> When all my warfare's past,
> And dying find my latest foe
> Under my feet at last.'

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

'Harp of a thousand strings,'
Swept by a mightier minstrel than the wind—
A viewless spirit, whose unfettered wings
Leave all save thought behind!

Thine is the magic spell
With widest touch the human heart to thrill;
The power outvying feeble speech to tell
Tidings of good or ill.

Peace, tumult, joy, or woe—
These, fleet-winged minstrel, we entrust to thee;
All that our frail humanity may know,
Thy harp's deep lays must be.

Thou who dost herald on
To the vast inland, stretching far and wide,
Tales of the ship whose port is not yet won,
Which still the waves must ride—

Mocking, o'er hill and plain,
The traveller spurring on his panting steed,
The engine's fiery breath and thundering train,
Outvying all their speed—

We pause and gaze on thee;
Marking with wondering eye the tiny cords,
Weaving, perchance, our fortunes yet to be,
Still unrevealed by words;

Telling of kings and thrones,
A nation's downfall, or an empire's birth;
Revealing, in thy weird and mystic tones,
Strange histories of earth:

Of famine, fire, and flood,
The raging whirlwind, with its stormy breath,
The fierce revolt, the battle's field of blood,
The pestilence and death:

Or tidings sweet and dear—
The blissful messages of love and peace,
The waiting hearts which yearn from thee to hear
Hope, joy, return, release.

Thou who shalt link all lands;
Thou who, at last, shalt chain the mighty sea,
Binding the nations into brother-bands,
How shall we sing of thee?

Thine are the magic strains
Whose triple chords shall make the electric zone,
Which east and west in closest union brings,
Where space no more is known.

'Harp of a thousand strings,'
Touched by a mightier minstrel than the wind—
A viewless spirit, whose unfettered wings
Leave all save thought behind.

—Miss E. G. Barber.

The Hidden Treasure;

HOW IT WAS SOUGHT, AND WHERE IT WAS FOUND.

BY M. H.,

AUTHOR OF 'ROSA LINDESAY,' 'THE STORY OF A RED VELVET BIBLE,' ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

'Object of my first desire,
Jesus crucified for me,
All to happiness aspire,
Only to be found in Thee.'

A LARGE party are once more assembled at Amberley Park.

Fifteen years have passed away since the first gathering we wrote of took place there; and time, in its steady course, has left its marks on the faces of many we saw then. But nature is unchanged. The hills, dales, and lakes stand as of yore, glistening under the same glorious sunshine, showing forth the handiwork of the Great Creator,—speaking of Him who, year after year, reneweth the face of the earth, and rejoiceth in his work. The rosy tints of early dawn, the purple shades of sunset, and the pale moonlight, touch with beauty the landscape around, even as they did when, in the flush of youth, the party of treasure-seekers last met at Amberley Park.

Are they, too, unchanged? or, if they be, is the change for better or worse? Once more they are all met; let us look and judge for ourselves.

Yonder sits Aunt Mary, not so much changed as we might have expected. Time has dealt kindly with her—only silvered still more the once golden locks, and enfeebled the once sprightly step. Aunt Mary must be well advanced in years now,—'nearly home,' she says, with a beaming smile and an upward look, as of one who already had caught a glimpse of the 'golden city,' and longed to be there. Very peaceful and happy she looks; the peace of God keeping her heart, and legible in her face, telling to all who will read it aright that God is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.

Close by her, lying on a couch under the shade of a fine old tree, is Netty Osborne. She is entering warmly into the cheerful talk around, her hands occupied in weaving some beautiful flowers into a wreath, for a pretty little girl of some ten years, who stands beside her. No need to ask who the latter is; the soft grey eyes and the striking likeness tell at once that she is the child of Lucy Stewart. Ask her whom does she like best in all the circle, and she will tell you that, next to papa, mamma, and sister Emily, she loves Cousin Netty far the best; she is always so bright and happy, and no one can tell such nice stories as Netty can.

And little Lucy is right: bright and happy are terms which best describe Netty Osborne. 'How could it be otherwise?' she says; 'only think, I have Jesus for a Friend; and who that has that can be anything but joyful? He gives me work to do for Him on earth, and then I shall have eternity in which to praise Him. Oh! I scarcely believe in a Christian who does not joy in God through the Lord Jesus, by whom we have received the atonement.'

Not far from Netty's couch another group are assembled. Lucy and her husband, Harry Wilmot and Alfred Osborne, compose it. Our thoughts go back to the last time we saw them there—the merry young group, with life before them, eager to run the race, keen to enter on the search for happiness.

Lucy's thoughts have also gone back to those days. Her eyes are ranging over the surrounding scene, and in imagination she beholds it silvered with moonlight, as she saw it the last evening she spent there. Ask her now if she thinks that true happiness can be found in the enjoyment of the works of nature, as she once fancied, or amid the crowded haunts of the world's vanities, where she had striven to find it. She will tell you, No, not there. Ask her if it is to be found in intellectual pleasures, or even in the fondest love of earth, and her answer will still be, 'No, not even there.'

Where, then, Lucy? tell us where.

Silently, but with a sparkling eye, she opens a small book, and reads the words, 'Lying on Jesus' breast' (John xiii. 25). Yes, there she had found the Sangreal.

Ask her what led her there, and she can tell of no sudden event, of no striking conversion; she scarce knows how or when the light first shone, and the darkness fled. Perhaps Netty's words opened the way. Step by step she was led on, drawn by the bands of love. Two sweet baby girls—a kind, loving husband—surely God was good to her! Then rose the question, 'What shall I render unto Him for all his mercies?'

Ay, what? The world is his, and the fulness thereof; the cattle on the hills are his also. Only one thing can sinful man give to God; and that is, his heart. Only in one way can he please Him, and give glory to Him; and that is, by accepting as a gift (purchased for him by the blood of Christ) the priceless boon of eternal life.

Stooping over her sleeping babes, a Bible in her hand, Lucy read the words: 'Lovest thou me more than these?' More than these! 'Nay,' conscience spake loud, 'not more, Lord. Nay, my love to Thee is cold indeed; and in these my heart is bound up.' Gently, lovingly the Lord had led her thus far; closer and closer He drew the bands, till the loving spirit found its true rest, in lying, like John of old, on the Saviour's breast. The vain search was over at last; the mother's prayers, offered in faith so long ago, were answered now; the true Sangreal was found; and, with humble yet assured confidence, Lucy Stewart could say: 'Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee.'

And what of her husband? Has he realized the dreams of his youth? has he gained the so much coveted literary fame? or, having gained it, has it yielded him the pleasure he anticipated?

Yes, in one way the dream of Robert Stewart's young life is fulfilled; the fame he panted for is his. Not in his own country alone, but in foreign lands also, his name is known as one of England's greatest scholars—his works eagerly sought after, his opinion on many subjects deferred to. Quietly but surely is he climbing the pedestal; and men, fit to judge on these matters, point to him as one who lacks only an increase of years and work to reach the very summit.

Only one short year before the time we now write of, and to attain that pinnacle was the one aim of his life. Day and night he toiled for it. Wife and children, loved though they were, were completely subordinate to the ruling passion. A deep treatise on the learning of the ancient Greeks must be finished ere a certain day; and night after night saw the lamp burning, till the day rendered it useless; but even then the scholar rested not. In vain Lucy remonstrated; entreated him to rest. He laughed at her fears, and worked the harder,—all the more so, as a restless feeling was in his heart that even his favourite pursuits were failing to give him true happiness; and a low small voice suggested the idea, that possibly the place where the Sangreal was to be found might not, after all, be the Temple of Fame. What if the way to it should really turn out to be indicated in the book which Aunt Mary, and now his own Lucy, loved so much—that book, of which, with all his wisdom, he was so ignorant? But not yet would Robert Stewart listen to that warning voice. Speak it would; but he only toiled the harder, that he might not hear its words. Yet all the time, though as yet he owned it not, his was the experience of the wise king, who had more wisdom than all that went before him—who gave his heart to know wisdom, and to search out concerning all things that are done under heaven—that even of those things 'all is vanity and vexation of spirit.'

But He who arrested the proud Pharisee, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and laid him a lowly suppliant at the feet of the crucified Nazarene, was ordering every event in the life of Robert Stewart, leading him by a way he knew not, till, trembling and astonished at the new strange light from heaven shining around him, he should call out, in anguish of spirit, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?'

Truly we are 'fearfully and wonderfully made,'—mind and body so closely united, that, overtask the one, and it acts on the other. Alas! many have to bewail 'a spirit of fire in a prison of clay;' and Robert Stewart was no exception to the common law. True, often warned, he heeded not. He was strong; why should a little overwork make him ill? But the blow came. One sultry summer day the pen fell from his hand, the overstrained nerves gave way, and a long dangerous illness brought him to the gates of death. Long he lay there: wife, parents, friends, despaired of his coming up from thence; but the reaction came. Slowly, but surely, the ebbing life returned; and as weeks passed on, with returning strength, it was plain to all that a new life, even the life which is hid in Christ Jesus, was begun also. The man who had cared only for the wisdom of this world, that cometh to nought, was now lying at the feet of Jesus, drinking in, with the simple faith of a little child, the words of Him who spake as never man spake. Dark indeed was the veil which, as he lay on that bed of sickness, hid the Saviour from his eyes; but He who laid him low sent one to him, commissioned, even as Ananias was (by himself), to remove the darkness, and let in the glorious light of the gospel.

That messenger was Harry Wilmot. He it was who watched long hours by his cousin's bed, and, as returning strength could bear it, whispered to him words of heavenly comfort and hope, and pointed to 'the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world.' He spoke, not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but simply told of Jesus, and Him crucified, and spoke as from the heart to the heart, and in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power. As dew on the thirsty ground, the word fell, and was eagerly received. The Scriptures were searched, the truth shone out, old things passed away, all things became new; and from that bed of sickness Robert Stewart rose a new creature—not to hide his God-given talents in a napkin, but to consecrate them to the service of his new Master, and to strive to let it be seen, in all his future writings, that his one aim was to exalt the name of the Lord. He gave up neither his scientific nor his classical writings—only brought the light of the gospel to shine on them and sanctify them. He held, with one of no small fame, that 'as science has a foundation, so has religion. If they will unite their foundations, the basis will be broader, and they will be two compartments of one great fabric, reared to the glory of God.'

He, too, had found the Sangreal—not where he had so sedulously sought it, in the Temple of Fame, but in Him in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

CHAPTER X.

'Think not, when in loved and prized
Sense of sin is paralyzed,
So that ne'er they sue for grace—
Think not 'tis a desperate case.
Ye that love them, join to bear
Those to Christ by zealous prayer;
Like the paralyzed of yore,
To the Saviour borne of four.'

A SUDDEN pause in the conversation of the group under the trees was broken by Alfred Osborne, now a fine-looking man, with a brown complexion, telling of years spent in an eastern climate.

'Come, Wilmot,' he said, 'when are you going to give me a week or two's visit? Say good-bye for a while to all your patients, young and old; throw medicine to the dogs; forget there are such things in the world as fevers and headaches, and come with me to Sudbury Hall, and I'll be bound you'll confess it is one of the most splendid places you ever saw; and as for its stables and stud, I'll bet you a round sum there are none finer in all England; nor, if you come to that, a man more to be envied than the owner of all, namely, your humble servant, Alfred Osborne! Ha! Sir Galahad, with all your boasted wisdom, it seems to me I have got the true Sangreal, the only treasure worth the getting. The bright golden guineas for me! I have to thank myself for the most of them, and the old cousin a hundred times removed, who left me his heir, for the rest; but, anyhow, I'm to be envied, Wilmot, am I not—in possession of everything one can desire? Wouldn't you like to change places with me?'

The look which passed over Harry Wilmot's face at these words was one which Alfred Osborne could not understand. 'Change places with him!' it said; 'exchange the joy and peace in believing, the riches which are hid in Christ, the certainty of a glorious inheritance, an unfading crown in heaven, for the pleasures of a day, and the perishing riches of this world!' No, verily, not for all the world could give, would he exchange his treasure for that of any good of earth. Fain would he lead his friend to the inexhaustible mine where lay the heavenly treasure, and bid him gather of it.

Quietly he said, not so much in answer to Alfred, but as if he were speaking aloud his own thoughts: 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.'

Alfred gave a loud whistle. 'Not so sure about that, old fellow! Life without the abundance of things would have small attractions for me; it is only with them that it is worth the having!'

Kindly, earnestly, Dr. Wilmot laid his hand on his friend's shoulder. 'Nay, Osborne,' he said, 'say not so; listen to the words spoken more than eighteen hundred years ago by Him who spake as never man spake: "The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully: and he thought within himself, saying, What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits? And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns, and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided? So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God."'

The words were spoken very solemnly; the frank, pleading, kindly look of the speaker's eyes making it impossible to be offended with the plainness of the address; and when Alfred Osborne tried, in his good-humoured way, to turn the conversation, and laugh down Harry as a capital hand at preaching—declaring he should have been a parson instead of a doctor—Harry's grieved look cut him short, and, shaking him kindly by the hand, he owned that all he had said might be quite true, and that some day he must really begin to think more of these things. At present he had so many things he must look after, that positively he had no time; but, after he was fairly settled at Sudbury, he was determined to begin. And so, with the 'Go thy way for this time; when I have a more convenient season I will call for thee,' of Felix of old, he dismissed uneasy thoughts, stifled the voice of conscience, and went on his way,—hugging in his breast the fancied Sangreal, following the delusive light which, unless arrested by divine grace, would lead him down to destruction.

And Netty, what does she feel as she sees her only brother thus wilfully yielding himself up as a slave to the god of this world—'laying up for himself treasures in earth, where moth and rust corrupt, and thieves break through and steal,' and regardless of the true riches? Netty says little to any earthly friend on the subject; but she tells Jesus, her heavenly Friend, all about it. She pleads his promise, made when He was on earth: 'Whatsoever you shall ask the Father in my name, I will do it;' and doubly underlined, in her pocket Testament, are the words, 'Being fully persuaded that what He had promised He was able to perform;' and so, when Alfred jokes about the Sangreal, and even Aunt Mary shakes her head and sighs, fearing he has turned too far away from the path which leads to it ever to retrace his steps, Netty does not despair; she only whispers quietly, 'He is faithful that promised,' or sings the words of her favourite hymn

> 'Earthly friends may fail or leave us,
> One day soothe, the next day grieve us;
> But this Friend will ne'er deceive us;
> Oh, how He loves!'

She does what, alas! so many of us fail to do—she takes God at his word, and, like Paul, believes that 'it shall be even as He hath said;' giving glory to God by the strength of her faith. Happy Netty! yours is the true secret of peace; 'according to thy faith be it unto thee.'

Once more Aunt Mary is alone. Her visitors have returned to their homes and their duties; the summer has changed almost imperceptibly into the golden autumn, the beauteous tints of which, pleasing as they are to the eye, yet speak of approaching decay.

Dearly did Aunt Mary love these quiet autumn-days; and pleasant were her meditations as she sat watching the sun go down behind the hills, encompassed with fleecy clouds of crimson, purple, and gold; and, as she gazed, her thoughts turned to that glorious city, whose gates are of pearls, whose streets are of pure gold; where the sun never sets, and where there is no night, by reason of the glory which proceedeth from the Lamb, who is the light thereof. With joy she thinks of the loved ones who are already safely landed there, and in spirit she returns thanks to the Great Treasurer, who had led so many of those dear to her to find the hidden treasure, the true Sangreal, where alone it can ever be found—at the foot of the cross.

Dear readers, one word in conclusion. Are any of you seeking the hidden treasure in any of the paths we have written of? Stop and think. Attractive as they may seem for a while, they will fail you at last. Leave them all; come and see this great sight. Three crosses are erected on yonder hill, called Calvary. Over the centre one ye read the words: 'This is the King of the Jews.' Readers, He is dying that you may live—that you may obtain the hidden treasure. He has purchased it for you with his own blood. Go and claim it; own Him as your Saviour and Master, and go on thy way rejoicing, joining in the pilgrim song:

'Vain are all terrestrial pleasures,
Mixed with dross the purest gold;
Seek we then for heavenly treasures—
Treasures never waxing old.

Earthly joys no longer please us;
Here we would renounce them all;
Seek our only rest in Jesus,
Him our Lord and Master call.'

OUR NATION'S BULWARK.

'MY only solid hopes for the wellbeing of my country depend, not so much on her fleets and armies, not so much on the wisdom of her rulers, or the spirit of her people, as on the persuasion that she still contains many who, in a degenerate age, love and obey the gospel of Christ; on the humble trust that the intercession of these may still be prevalent; that, for the sake of these, Heaven may still look upon us with an eye of favour.'

'It is for the sake of the wheat that the tares are spared, lest, as our Saviour says, while the tares are gathered up, the good wheat be rooted up also. Every additional ear of good wheat, every new convert to Jesus Christ, is so much added to the safety of England. Were all good, the nation would be righteous, and God's favour would rest upon it. The land would be like the garden of Eden, so that all who visited it would say: "See the land that the Lord hath blessed!" On the other hand, if all were evil,—if the people had altogether corrupted itself, and forsaken the law of God,—the land would soon be turned into a wilderness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein.

'I repeat it: the truth that the safety and happiness of kingdoms depend solely on God's blessing, is a truth which it concerns every Englishman, poor as well as rich, to keep in mind; for this plain reason—because every Englishman can lend a helping hand toward drawing down that excellent blessing on his country. For what says King David in his fifth Psalm? "Let all those that put their trust in Thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because Thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in Thee. For Thou, O Lord, wilt bless the righteous." To the same effect writes Solomon in the book of Proverbs (xi. 11): "By the blessing of the upright the city is exalted: but it is overthrown by the mouth of the wicked." From these texts we learn that God blesses the righteous in such a way, that by their means and for their sakes nations are exalted. We, as a people, need no further exaltation. In wealth, in strength, in renown, in extent of rich and cultivated dominion, in variety of possessions in every quarter of the globe,—no nation was ever equal to us. In these respects God has raised us to a height unknown before, and has placed us on the spire and pinnacle of glory. Let us take good heed that the height does not make us giddy. Let us look well to our footing, that we slip not. And how is this to be done? By praying to God to hold up our goings in his paths; by trusting in God that his mercy will preserve us; by acknowledging the Lord in all our ways, and seeking his heavenly wisdom, whereby alone men walk safely, so that their feet do not stumble.'

'The wicked derive great benefit from the presence of the righteous, in the participation of many mercies and blessings which are communicated to an unworthy world for their sake. Ten righteous persons would have saved Sodom. The whole posterity of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were spared and blessed through many successive generations, on account of the piety of their ancestors. Children inherit the prayers of their parents—often the most valuable legacy they can receive; and a blessing descends upon a whole family, or nation, for the sake of the righteous contained in it.'

'There are walls and bulwarks, constituting a nation's strength, nobler than material strongholds and vast armaments. The great and the good—men of prayer, and men of faith, and men of God—are a nation's noblest defenders, the truest guardians of her liberties, the best rampart of defence around her hearths and homes. Let us not be guilty of the impiety of measuring a nation's might, in modern times, by her arsenals and dockyards, the stores of her ammunition, and the calibre of her cannon. Thanks be to God, we have all these to boast of too; and brave souls, ready to leap, like the sword from its scabbard, to do gallant defence for all that is dear in the hour of peril! But it is matter of thankfulness that Britain has more than these. She has more than the bravery which had its representative in the furious courage of another contemporary of Elisha, and one divinely appointed to co-operate with him; she has more than her "sons of Nimshi," with horses' hoofs spurning the plain as they rush on to battle. She has her Elishas too—noble, lofty souls, bold in the maintenance of Christian principle; men, in her high places, who count not their coronets tarnished because they love their Saviour, and who are not ashamed to avow their allegiance to the Prince of the kings of the earth. Yes, we may be proud to point to the annals of our country's old martial glory; to listen to the roll of her conquering drum by land, the voice of her thunder by sea, challenging the sovereignty of the ocean; the old indomitable lion making its proud leap still, against fearful odds, as on the stern battle-fields of other days.'

'But we own a nobler title to supremacy—one which preserves our ark in the midst of European storms. We have not only a strong city, a strong nation, but "salvation is appointed for bulwarks." While the statesmanship that, in some momentous crisis, wielded the nation's destiny, is lauded and extolled; while brilliant homage is awarded to the political sagacity which steered the vessel amid conflicting storms; while every tongue is justly eloquent in the praises of the valiant squadrons that mounted breach after breach to victory; while science wins new laurels in girdling our shores with impregnable bulwarks, frowning defiance on every invader,—we may do well also to ask Israel's king to read to us the grand philosophy of a nation's greatness; we may hear his voice echoing in every chamber where a Christian dies: "My father, my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!" (2 Kings xiii. 14.)'

'With respect to national mercies, what is it that shortens the day of visitation upon any people, but the prayers of the elect? Or, was it human wisdom, or human power, which has at sundry times delivered this country, with so high a hand, out of all her difficulties and dangers? No; it was prayer. It was the supplication of believers, offered up in faith, to a prayer-hearing God. For their sakes alone is any country saved, or worth saving. For their sakes alone is there peace to Jerusalem; safety within her borders, plenteousness within her palaces, or salvation around her walls.

'Prayer can move the hand that moves the world. Who, then, is best prepared and qualified to save and bless his country? It is the man of prayer—the man who has interest in the court of heaven—the man who can claim the promise, that whatsoever he asks of the Father, in the Son's name, it shall be given him.'

'Mark and consider what a man may do, yea, what one man may do; what an Abraham may do; what a Moses may do; what an Elijah may do; what a Daniel, what a Samuel, what a Job, what a Noah may do! Some one man, by reason of his high favour with the Eternal, is able sometimes to do more for a land by his prayers and tears, than many prudent men by their counsel, or valiant men by their swords. Yea, it doth evidently appear, in the sacred volume of the Holy Ghost, that some one poor preacher, being full of the spirit and power of Elijah, doth more in his study either for offence or defence, either for the turning away of wrath or the procuring of mercy, than a camp-royal even four thousand strong.'

THE GREAT WORSHIP.

THE harp at nature's advent strung,
Has never ceased to play;
The song the stars of morning sung
Has never died away.

And prayer is made, and praise is given,
By all things near and far;
The ocean looketh up to heaven,
And mirrors every star.

Its waves are kneeling on the strand,
As kneels the human knee,
Their white locks bowing to the sand,
The priesthood of the sea!

They pour their glittering treasures forth,
Their gifts of pearl they bring,
And all the listening hills of earth
Take up the song they sing.

The green earth sends her incense up
From many a mountain shrine;
From folded leaf and dewy cup,
She pours her sacred wine.

The mists above the morning rills
Rise white as wings of prayer;
The altar curtains of the hills
Are sunset's purple air.

The winds with hymns of praise are loud,
Or low with sobs of pain;
The thunder-organ of the cloud,
The dropping tears of rain.

With drooping head, and branches crossed,
The twilight forest grieves,
Or speaks with tongues of Pentecost,
From all its sun-lit leaves.

The blue sky is the temple's arch,
Its transept earth and air;
The music of its starry march,
The chorus of its prayer.

So nature keeps the reverent frame,
With which her years began,
And all her signs and voices shame
The prayerless heart of man.

—J. G. Whittier.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'They sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves aprons.'—GEN. III. 7.

THEY are alone, yet they are ashamed. They are in Paradise, yet they are ashamed. It is conscience that is making them blush. It not only makes cowards of them, but it works shame and confusion of face. They are ashamed of themselves, of their nakedness, of their recent doings. They cannot look one another in the face, after their disobedience and recriminations against one another. They cannot look up to God now. Possibly, too, they shrink from being in view of the serpent who beguiled them. The feeling of happy innocence is gone.

They must be covered. This is their feeling; the dictate of conscience. No eye must see them—either of God or man. The light must not shine on them; the eye of the sun must not look on them; and the fair flowers and trees of Paradise must not see their shame. They love darkness rather than light. Covering is what they seek—covering from every eye. Thus shame and guilt are inseparable. 'I must be covered,' is the sinner's first feeling,—from the eye of God and man, even from my own. They cannot look on me, nor I on them!

Thus far they are right. But now they go wrong. Their mistake was twofold: (1) That they can cover themselves; (2) That they can be covered by means of vegetable nature. Let us look at these.

I. Man thinks he can cover himself.—He knows not the greatness of the evil; he does not calculate on the penetration of the all-seeing Eye. He sets to work, and makes himself a covering; and he says, This will do. What sin is, or what the sinner needs, or what God requires, he has no idea of. Each sinner has his own way of covering himself; he weaves his own web, whatever may be the substance of which it is composed. He wishes to be his own coverer, the maker of his own raiment. He thinks he can do it himself. He has no idea that this is utterly beyond his power. He trusts to the skill of his own hands to provide the dress that shall hide his shame from the eye of God and man. He thinks it an easy thing to deal with shame, and fear, and conviction, and conscience. He will not believe that these can only be dealt with by God. This is the last thing that he will admit. He will try a thousand plans before accepting this. He will make and try on a thousand kinds or sets of raiment before betaking himself to that which God has made. The unbelieving man's whole religious life is a series of plans and efforts for stitching a raiment for himself, with which to appear before God and before men; nay, with which he hopes to appear before the judgment-seat. It is with this man-made, this self-made clothing—this earth-made, or priest-made, or church-made religion, that he robes himself; with this he soothes conscience; with this he quiets fear; with this he removes the feeling of guilty shame. He can do all that is needful himself; or, at the most, with a little help from God!

II. Man thinks he can cover himself with leaves.—He supposes that what will hide his shame from his own eye, will hide it from God; that even such a frail covering as the foliage of the fig-tree will do. He has no thought of anything beyond this. The fig-leaf will do, he thinks; what more do I need? But he is mistaken; the fig-leaf will not do, broad and green as it may be. But why will it not do?

(1.) It is man's device, not God's.—That which covers sin, and renders the sinner fit to draw near, must be of God, not of man. God only has the right,—God only can prescribe to man how he is to draw near. What, then, is ritualism but a religion of fig-leaves?

(2.) It is simply for the body, not the soul.—It does not relieve the conscience, or satisfy the guilty spirit, or cover the whole man. It is utterly insufficient. It could not remove one fear, or quiet one pang of remorse, or make the man feel tranquil in the presence of God.

(3.) It is composed of life, not of death.—That which is to cover man's sin, and deliver him from the sense of shame, must be something which has had the life taken out of it. The green fig-leaf will not do. It is no better than Cain's sacrifice—the fruit of the ground. The only thing that can relieve the sinner from guilt and shame is atonement; the only atonement is by blood, for without shedding of blood is no remission; and therefore the only covering must be one connected with atonement,—one which represents death,—one which tells of the payment of the righteous penalty, and the removal of the righteous condemnation. The fig-leaf spoke of life, not of death; of the blessing, not of the curse. It had nothing in it which told of propitiation or substitution; nothing which spoke of God's anger turned away by means of the endurance of another.

The truths here taught us for ourselves are not a few. They are of profound importance.

(1.) Man's devices for covering sin are useless.—They may be easy or difficult, cheap or costly, still they are vain. They profit nothing. The covering is narrower than a man can wrap himself in. These devices are innumerable. Good deeds, long prayers, fervent feelings, self-mortifications and penances, church-membership, rites, ceremonies, sacraments, religious performances,—such are man's ways for approaching God, his coverings for a sinful soul. They are all fig-leaves!

(2.) Man's devices all turn upon something which he himself has to do, not on what God has done.—Man misses the main point of importance. This was not wonderful in Adam, to whom nothing had been revealed; but it is amazing now, when God has announced that He has done all; that it is finished! Strange that man should persist in reverting to the unfinished, when God proclaims the finished!

(3.) Man's devices assume that God is such an one as himself.—He can conceal himself from his fellow-man, therefore he thinks he can cover himself so that God shall not see him. That which conceals him from a human eye, he supposes will conceal him from a divine.

(4.) Man's devices all trifle with sin.—They do not fathom its depth of malignity in God's sight. They assume that it will be easily forgiven and forgotten. They overlook its evil, its hatefulness, its eternal desert of woe. What are fig-leaves as a protection against the wrath of God or the flames of hell?

HEART SINKINGS.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

ACTS XXVII. 18–25.

THE narratives of Scripture are very different from ordinary memoirs, even when they are written by true men of God. Man is jealous for the honour of his hero, the Bible is jealous only for the glory of God: 'Let God be true, and every man a liar.' The human biographer, from a natural partiality, is apt to omit or extenuate the failings and errors of those about whom he writes. But it is never so in the word of God. There we have the shadows as well as the lights, the blemishes as well as the graces. It is well for us that it is so; for oftentimes the faintings and shortcomings of those who have gone before us are as instructive and helpful as their virtues and excellences. We see in this place one of the boldest and most courageous spirits that ever lived losing hope, and giving way to fear, when for a season he let go his hold of the word of God:—Paul's fear; its cause and cure.

We are not told in words that Paul was afraid; he does not say that he was, and there may have been nothing in his conduct and bearing that would indicate to those around what was passing in his mind. But there is One who looks into the heart, and beholds all its secret thoughts and feelings. He saw the uprising and prevalence of fear, and therefore He says, 'Fear not, Paul.' How much that witness beholds, which men know nothing of! Paul had watched the disastrous progress of the voyage, he had perhaps been vexed at the refusal of his wise counsel when he warned them of coming danger, and exhorted them to lay up at the fair havens, the Porto Bello as it were, and wait there till a fitter season for navigation came. He says, 'Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss.' But he did not stand aloof from them on this account; he sympathized with them in all their toils and dangers, and joined them in their efforts to manage and preserve the ship. A tentmaker by trade, accustomed to work with his hands, he could probably render valuable help in this crisis, when the sails were torn, and required to be mended or replaced. At verse 14 we see the growing danger. A tempestuous contrary wind has arisen, and the rude unwieldy ship of those days cannot bear up into it, and so they let her drive. But now there is a gleam of hope. They get under the lee of a certain island, Clauda, where, in smoother water and somewhat sheltered from the wind, they are able to take certain precautions for their safety. They hoist on board the boat, which had hitherto been towing astern; and they undergird the ship, passing cables underneath and round it, to strengthen and hold it together, an expedient not unknown to our own sailors in former days. But the vicinity of land in a storm is more dangerous than the open sea; and so, fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, they strike sail, and drive, as it is called, under bare poles. At verse 18 it is said, 'Being exceedingly tossed they lightened the ship,' meaning, I suppose, that the crew did so. But two days later, verse 19, it seems that all on board, even the prisoners, took part in this work; for the writer of the narrative says, 'We cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship,' that is, I suppose, everything that was not absolutely required for its management. The vessel was evidently becoming waterlogged, like the 'London' lately, and drifted at the mercy of the winds and waves. It was only a matter of time how long she would remain afloat. What was Paul's state of mind in these solemn trying circumstances? Luke, his companion and bosom friend, here tells us: 'When neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away.' Paul was a man brimful of sympathy, and doubtless he felt the influence of the growing anxiety and alarm. Like the rest, he must have been worn out and weakened by toil, anxiety, and abstinence from food, and he seems to have believed that there was nothing before them but a speedy and watery grave. Dark thoughts would come into his mind, for Satan knows how to take advantage of such seasons. Paul thought that the end of his life was come, that his light was about to go out, that his career of Christian usefulness was to be thus sadly, prematurely terminated. He saw no ray of hope; for, says Luke, 'all hope that we should be saved was taken away.'

Such seasons of fainting and collapse occur occasionally in the history of the best and greatest of God's people. Abraham, when he went down into Egypt, feared that they would kill him. Jacob more than once had the same fear: he thought Esau would destroy him and his family; he thought that the Canaanites and the Perizzites would gather together, and slay him and his house. David feared that he would one day perish by the hand of Saul. Elijah feared when he fled from the threats of Jezebel. John Baptist seems to have had such a season of heart sinking, when he sent from his prison the question, 'Art thou He that should come?' Luther had the same at Worms, when he found himself in the lion's den, and saw the toils of his enemies all around. Even the Master, who took all that belongs to his people, saving sin, can sympathize with this. He has known it himself. When Philip and Andrew told Him about the inquiring Greeks, who were longing for an interview with Him, He seems to have got a glimpse of the coming glory, an earnest of the joy that was set before Him; He seems to have regarded them as the forerunners of that great gathering who shall come to Him from north and south, and east and west. He says, 'The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified.' But He was still in the valley, the place of change and temptation, where our liftings up are speedily followed by castings down. Scarcely has the eye of the Man of Sorrow rested on the gladsome prospect, when the cloud comes down, perhaps an exhalation from hell, and hides it from his view. He finds himself all at once face to face with Gethsemane and Calvary, and cries, 'Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour.' It was the cry of perplexity and distress, and the Father heard it, as He hears every cry of Jesus, and He did save Him, not, indeed, by turning away the trial, but by strengthening Him to bear it. Children of God, you know these things. You have been seeking what you thought an important, needful object; you have used earnestly, diligently, every means to obtain it, and you have become weary and worn with the greatness of your way. Suddenly a cold damp mist comes down on you. Your heart fails; you cry, All is lost. There is no more hope; you anticipate nothing but failure, discomfiture, disaster. Why are these things permitted? I believe it is to show the creature how weak and insufficient it is. Men thus come to feel, I am but a worm, I have no inherent power; and so they look to the 'hills whence cometh their aid;' they take a firmer hold of Him who made heaven and earth, and thus they become stronger, and rise higher than ever they did before. This is safe strength and success. The worm Jacob threshes the mountains, and makes them as chaff, and yet he rejoices in the Lord, and glories only in the God of his salvation. These seasons of heart sinking and collapse are very trying and painful at the time, nevertheless afterwards we look back on them with joy and thankfulness.

What was the cause of Paul's fear? You say the storm and danger. True; but Paul was no novice in this. He had been in peril, perhaps greater than the present; he had fought with wild beasts at Ephesus; he had been stoned at Lystra, and left for dead. The Master, when He sent forth his disciples, had said, 'But beware of men,' they are more dangerous than the stormy elements. Great as the peril was, Paul would not have been so alarmed if he had not for the time forgotten or let go his life-buoy. He had a life-buoy which would have carried him peacefully as well as safely through the storm. He might have sung in the midst of the tempest:

'Though hills amidst the seas be cast,
Though waters roaring make,
I will not fear.'

What was it? A word or promise of God. In the twenty-third chapter of this book, we find Paul at Jerusalem, in the midst of his enemies. The storm is up, and the waves of bigotry, envy, and malice are high; but the Lord comes to Paul by night, and says, 'Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome.' Oh these precious Bible 'musts!' they are old, sure, infallible. Paul has been delivered from the rage and devices of his countrymen, and is on his way to Rome, according to the Lord's word. But new dangers now menace him, the winds and waves seem to be combined for his destruction. Had he, however, remembered and rested on the Lord's distinct word, 'Thou must bear witness also at Rome,' he would not have been afraid. But he had somehow forgotten this, or lost his confidence in it, and so he became like his fellow-voyagers, a prey to fear and alarm. Is it not always thus when God's people quail, and the men of might become unable to find their hands? Abraham forgot God's promise, 'I will make thee a great nation, a blessing to all the families of the earth,' and so he drew upon himself the merited rebuke of a poor heathen. Jacob had forgotten God's faithful word, 'Behold I am with thee, and I will keep thee in all places whithersoever thou goest,' else he would not have been afraid of the Canaanites, or of Esau and his Bedaween. David must have forgotten God's word of promise, and his act of anointing, else he would not have said, 'I shall one day perish.' Elijah must have slipped from his rock—his true vantage ground,—'The Lord God before whom I stand,' else he would not have been frightened into that unseemly flight by the threats of a wicked woman. And so of the others. It is the word of God that lifts his people up on high; and when they lose it, or cast it from them, they become poor, weak, and base as other men. It is their sword—a mighty weapon, fitted to fend as well as offend, to ward as well as wound. Satan's policy is to strike this out of their hand; and when he succeeds, they are at his mercy. John Bunyan notices this. Christian, fighting with Apollyon, lets his sword slip out of his hand, and Apollyon cried, 'Now I have you.' But poor Christian, groping about as he lay on the ground, got hold of it again, and dealt the monster such a wound, that he howled in agony, and, spreading his large wings, he flew away. Study the whole Bible, for you know not what you may need; keep it ever near at hand, as a soldier girds his sword upon his thigh. Passages which you see little in at present will flash forth with a new light and power when the occasion for them comes.

The cure of Paul's fear. The real cause of it was his forgetting and losing hold of the word of God. The remedy was bringing it again to his remembrance, with power and demonstration. The Lord came to him as he lay in the endangered ship, and said, 'Fear not, Paul, thou must be brought before Cæsar.' Oh the watchfulness of the Lord! He is ever near his people, and when their foot slippeth his mercy holds them up. That divine word of reminiscence was just what Paul needed to reassure and strengthen his fainting spirit; and it was enough, he became himself again. How discriminating is the Lord! how special in his manifestations of himself! There were hundreds of troubled, despairing spirits in that ship; but it was only to one that Christ spake. How true that word: 'Yet a little while and the world seeth me no more, but ye see me.' Not only shall Paul be safe, but all that are with him in the ship shall be safe for his sake. 'Lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee.' Paul had joined in the efforts to save the ship; but when all hope was gone, he betook himself to prayer. He wrestled and cried to God; but I am sure that it was not merely for himself. He sought the safety of all who were journeying with him; and you see the Lord heard his cry. How different Paul's position on this occasion from that of Jonah, who was asleep in the midst of the storm, and brought on himself the stinging reproof of the heathen, 'Awake, O sleeper, and call upon thy God!' Paul here is the shield, the guardian angel. He stands forth in the midst of the trembling crowd, and claims a hearing. He says, 'I exhort you to be of good cheer; for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship. For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve.' How frank and manly is his profession of special relation to God! 'Whose I am,'—he does not say, 'Whose I wish to be,' or 'Whose I hope to be,' but 'Whose I am.' His bold, confident bearing, impressed and gained credence with those who heard him. He exhorted them to take food; and so they did, and in a little while they were all safe on land. How strangely were the tables turned! The poor despised prisoner has become the animating spirit of the ship, beloved and wondered at by all. Fainting one, be it so with you. Say with the Psalmist, 'Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God.' Hope also in God's word; cast anchor there, and wait for the morning.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XV.—WASTED LIVES.

SOME time ago, a gentleman visiting an hospital in D——, was strangely attracted to a young man lying in one of its wards, whose very intellectual cast of countenance and dark lustrous eyes were extremely prepossessing.

Mr. A—— went up to him, and endeavoured to enter into conversation; but found him strangely reserved and incommunicative. So much so, that not until several subsequent visits could he learn anything of his history.

At length he told Mr. A—— that he belonged to W——shire; but would not be more definite, or tell his real name. His parents were pious, and took him regularly to church, had worship in the family every night, etc.

His mother was very indulgent, and allowed him a good deal of pocket-money. At first this was spent in sweetmeats, and such-like things. But, when about fourteen, some new companions he had found persuaded him to go with them to the public-house.

The first time he entered it, his conscience was so sensitive he could not remain. But when he rose to come away, his companions laughed at him, and said jeeringly—

'He's afraid of his mother.' 'So were we once,' said others. 'We were once that way too; but now we can go home at any hour we like, and she dare not say a word to us. Set ye down there and make a man of yourself.'

He did not remain much longer that night: but it was not long until his mother had to let him in at any hour he liked. She endeavoured to conceal it as long as possible, particularly from his father; but it would be out, and as a result he was avoided by all his former sober companions.

That his proud spirit could not brook; so he left his early home, and went to Edinburgh. There he went from bad to worse, 'until,' said he, 'I could no longer hold up my head in my native country; so I went to England. Then I became connected with the stage, and have been strolling about with various companies until I took badly, and was put into this hospital. My manner of life has been very dissipated. Drink has been my ruin; and though at first it was scarcely possible for me to swallow a single glass, I have had so many as twenty-seven glasses of rum in one day.'

Mr. A—— asked him one day how long it was since he had written his mother. The tears gushed from his eyes as he said—

'Oh, man! I had the kindest mother that ever lived; but I have not written her this eight years.'

Nor could he be induced to give her address, or tell his own real name.

'No, no,' he always said. 'It would break her heart to know how I have been living, or where I am now.'

He was dying, and, from the nature of his disease, was allowed so much spirits per day. But so great was his desire for drink, that he bargained with the doctors to give them his body for purposes of dissection, if they would give him a larger quantity of the spirits. They agreed, and he was actually receiving the enlarged allowance at the time Mr. A—— was visiting him.

His end was a miserable one, yet he knew it was only a prelude to that 'Eternal misery which summed up the cost—

Made up from the vials of wrath,
Vials of bitterest wrath.'

Having borne his ghastly evidence as to the danger of tampering with strong drink, he disappears for ever from our view; but multitudes of others, whose evidence is equally striking, are ready to take his place. But we can only meantime hear one more.

'Have you ever been in the house richt below this?' inquired a poor woman I called to see one day.

'No. I have been several times at the door, but never got in.'

'Oh, mem, I think ye sud try an' get in the day. I doot sair there's something far wrang doon there.'

'What do you think is wrong, Mary?'

'Weel, I think Mr. P—— is deeing for want.'

'Who is Mr. P——?'

'A fine young man that's been livin' there this 'almonth. They say he was to be a doctor; but was gey fulish, an' had to gie't up. He's been 'n' o' a clerk since syne; an' he's that prood, 'id dee afore he wid let his wants be kent.'

'What makes you think that he is in want?'

'I met him on the stair last week. I could hardly believe my een it was him, for he was picket till a skeleton. 'Twas amazin' to me how the man could be aboot. An' this mornin' a wee lassie, that bides in the same house, said that Mr. P—— wasna weel, for he hadna naething to eat. Will ye try an' win in till him?' she again asked, with the greatest earnestness.

'I'll try. But how will I know where to find him?'

She then described the construction of the house—a somewhat peculiar one, with the rooms opening through each other, adding, 'You sud jist gang in till him, an' no spier if they'll let ye.'

I did not know very well how to proceed; but I found the way unexpectedly opened up, for, on going down stairs, the door stood slightly ajar.

I knocked and went into the first apartment; but there was no one in it. I passed into the second, and found the mistress of the house. She seemed quite taken by surprise.

'Are you all well here to-day?'

'Pretty well, thank you.'

'I heard you had an invalid here. May I not go in to see him?' and ere she had time to say no, I tapped at the door of the inner room and went in.

The apartment was large, almost noble in its proportions, but its meagre furnishings gave it a very desolate look. A bed in the farther corner, a table, and two chairs, with a settee about four feet long, on which the young man lay doubled up in the most uncomfortable-looking manner, summed up the whole.

He looked up when I entered; but, as if displeased at the intrusion, dropped his eyes again on the novel he was reading.

I surveyed him for a moment in silence. Seldom had I seen anything so sadly interesting. Beautiful fair hair still curled over a massive forehead. His eyes, to which disease lent an unnatural lustre, had sunk deep in their sockets. From the lower parts of his face the flesh was so completely wasted, as to give his jaw-bone and teeth a ghastly prominence. He was indeed as his neighbour had said, 'wasted to a skeleton.'

'You are very ill, sir.'

'Rather weak,' he replied, without lifting his eyes.

'Have you had any medical advice?'

'No. What good would it be?' he almost growled.

'You would require very nourishing food.' I scarcely knew what else to say.

'I take the most nourishing food I can get,' he replied, quite sarcastically.

It seemed a desperate case. I could not give up, however; so I went close beside him, and said—

'You will pardon me, sir, for the liberty I am taking; but you must be aware that your case will soon be desperate if something is not done for you. I have a friend, a medical man, who has himself known suffering, and who will be very glad to do anything for you. May I not ask him to come and see you?'

A quick searching glance was darted at me; then, after some minutes' silence, he said—

'Well, if he would be so kind, I suppose it would be bad to object.'

And you cannot have things very comfortably prepared here. May I not bring something suitable for you?'

'What makes you care for me?' he asked, in a considerately softer tone.

Thankful for this almost unexpected success, I came away; and not willing to intrude again upon him, I left some things for his use with the people of the house.

Next day I was received with a scowl. No wonder; the wicked people had appropriated what I left for him to their own use, and he, not knowing that, believed all my promises to be hollow. It was soon rectified; and I remained with him until Dr. S—— arrived. After making his observations, Dr. S—— said he would tell me what he wanted done; so we went out together.

'The poor fellow's gone,' were the doctor's first words on reaching the street.

'Indeed! what is the cause?'

'Want; perfect want.'

'Can nothing be done for him?'

'We may keep him living a short time, that's all.'

'It's a sad case, a very sad case,' he again repeated. He then gave me all necessary directions for his comfort, also a considerable sum of money to help in carrying them out, which I did without delay.

From the time he had been unable to pay for a bed, he had lain on the settee night and day, without even being undressed; an old coat thrown over him was his only bed-clothes. What misery he must have endured! A bed was consequently among the first things procured; all in the house being fully occupied, and he too weak to be removed to another lodging.

He was much exhausted by the time these arrangements were completed; but next day he was much revived, and I was much pleased to notice that the novels, which had apparently engrossed him, had all disappeared.

I had hitherto avoided anything like religious talk, being convinced, that in this case, exclusive care for the body would afterwards aid me in speaking to his heart. The sequel shows that I was not quite mistaken.

'You are looking very comfortable to-day, Mr. P——.' His reply was a very grateful one; and, having talked a few minutes on various little matters, I said, 'You are still too weak for talking; suppose I read a little for you?'

'I'll be very happy.'

'What shall I read?'

'Anything you please.'

'You don't seem to have any books at hand,' I said, looking round the apartment, 'and I have nothing but a New Testament; shall I read part of it?'

'Yes; that will do very well,' he replied.

I chose the 2d chapter of Ephesians to begin with. Having read it, I began to say, 'I do not know, Mr. P——, if you have yet realized the peace that flows from believing in Jesus; but, do you know that, since I saw you lying here so helpless, I have had such views of the freeness of the gospel, and its adaptedness to every case, as have been really profitable to my own spirit.'

'Indeed!' he said, looking quite interested; 'tell me how.'

'Well, my thoughts have been running something in this strain. If this man be not already saved, what could he do now to obtain salvation? Absolutely nothing. So, however easy the terms, if it depended at all on doing, his case would be hopeless. Though, for instance, the conditions were to read the Bible over once, you could not do it; or to appear even once before God in a place of worship; or perform some little act of kindness to a fellow-creature,—your case would be hopeless, you could do neither, and so would remain for ever unsaved. Then I thought of the goodness of God in requiring nothing of that nature—nothing but what is quite within the reach of the most helpless ones; and that is simply to receive the life, the peace, the love—everything, in short, that He has treasured up for them in his Son.'

'Ah!' he replied, with peculiar earnestness, 'I know nothing of that peace—nothing of salvation. I have been a prodigal.'

'Indeed! Mr. ——. Then I wish very much that you would act the prodigal a little longer.'

'What do you mean?'

'I mean that you should, like the prodigal we read of in this book, arise and go to your Father.'

'I cannot do that; I would be ashamed to go to God, now that I am just on the eve of perishing.'

'It was not till he felt himself perishing, that he thought of going back; but that did not prevent him from getting a warm welcome. We do not find the Father upbraiding, but rejoicing over the lost one that dire necessity had driven back to the parental dwelling. And let me tell you that his heart is now yearning over you; his eye has been upon you through all your wanderings; and now that you are come to yourself, conscious of your wretched condition, He waits to be gracious.'

'Oh, me!' he groaned.

'Do you know this hymn?' I inquired; then repeated the first stanza—

> 'Depth of mercy, can there be,
> Mercy still reserved for me?
> Can my God his wrath forbear,
> Me, the chief of sinners, spare?'

'Can you not go on with that?' he inquired.

'Yes, if you wish it;' so I repeated the rest of the hymn:

> 'I have long withstood his grace,
> Long provoked Him to his face;
> Would not hearken to his calls,
> Grieved Him by a thousand falls.
>
> I have spilt his precious blood,
> Trampled on the Son of God;
> Filled with pangs unspeakable,
> I who am not yet in hell.
> Whence to me this waste of love?
> Ask my Advocate above;
> See the cause in Jesus' face,
> Now before the throne of grace.
>
> Lo, I cumber still the ground;
> Lo, an Advocate is found:
> "Hasten not to cut him down;
> Let this barren soul alone."

Jesus speaks and pleads his blood,
He disarms the wrath of God;
Now my Father's bowels move:
Justice lingers into love.

Kindled his relentings are,
Me He now delights to spare;
Cries, "How shall I give thee up?"
Lets the lifted thunder drop.
There for me the Saviour stands,
Shows his wounds, and spreads his hands.
God is love! I know! I feel!
Jesus weeps, and loves me still.'

'How that suits me!' he said, clasping his hands together. 'Will you repeat it again?'

When I had repeated it several times at his request, he asked if I knew any more of the same kind.

'There's one I know partially. I'll repeat what I can of it, and bring the book with it to-morrow.'

'Lamb of God, for sinners slain,
To Thee I humbly pray;
Heal me of my grief and pain,
And take my sins away.
Wilt Thou cast a sinner out,
Who humbly comes to Thee?
No, my God, I cannot doubt
Thy mercy is for me.'

'Oh! these are precious, precious,' he exclaimed; 'they make me feel as if I could believe in spite of myself.'

Fearing that more speaking would be injurious, I was coming away; when he took my hand, and said, with great earnestness, 'Will you not pray for me?'

From that time I read the Scriptures daily, and had many interesting conversations, which space forbids me repeating. This was not only a labour of love, but also of self-denial; for the effluvium from that wasted body was almost overpowering, and his weakness was such that he could only bear me to speak in whispers, while, in order to catch his words, it was necessary to have my head very near him.

Of the hymns he continued very fond. One day I forgot the book, and offered to go home for it.

'Oh! no, no,' he said, 'I cannot let you have that trouble. Just read me a paraphrase to-day instead.'

'Any one in particular?' I inquired.

'Yes,' he said; 'isn't there one beginning—

"Come let us to the Lord our God
With contrite hearts return?"

Perhaps you will read it.'

When I had read the first verse, he looked as if he wished to say something.

'How often have I heard that before, and thought little about it! My father used to sing it at worship; but now I feel it.'

He gradually got so weak that it was difficult to communicate with him; and how touching it was to hear his bitter regrets for the past, and anxieties for the future! But one day, shortly before his death, he laid his hand upon his heart, and apparently summoning up all his strength, he said—

'I'm almost almost afraid to say it; but it's all peace here!'

'He is my peace,' he again said, most emphatically, in answer to a question I asked him. So one could only hope that this death-smitten one had received

'Sin's sure antidote—leaves, fruits immortal,
Pluck'd from the tree of life!'

He lingered on a considerable time after this, in a state of great weakness, unable to articulate a word, looking peaceful, sometimes even happy, and at length quietly breathed his last; and we could only hope that he had an entrance, though not an abundant one, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Much more might have been stated of this young man's history, of the unfortunate connections he formed, and habits which ultimately proved his ruin; but enough has been related to show

'How quick the meteor-flash of sinful joy
Was followed by the curse, the withering curse,
And quenched in midnight gloom; yet left
Its bitter fruits hang darkly clustering o'er
The ruin-reft creation.'

Maggie Morris:

A TALE OF THE DEVONSHIRE MOOR.

CHAPTER I.

EASTSTONE.

IT is only an April shower; and lightly it sweeps across the Devonshire moor, just sprinkling the little hamlet of Eaststone, which snugly nestles among the trees in a sheltered hollow. The cottages are dotted irregularly over the uneven ground, forming a picturesque and scattered group on either side of the high road. The rain-cloud disappears from the blue face of the sky, and the sun bursts forth once more, shedding golden light on the fresh spring green. Seeing this, a group of merry children run out from the doorway of an old barn that had sheltered them from the rain, and, with a joyous shout, resume their happy play.

On one cottage in particular the sunbeams glance and linger, darting their kindly, cheering rays into the interior. They fall athwart the lime-ash floor, and dance on the walls of that bare and scantily furnished room—even upon the old patched coverlid of a small bed, which stands in one corner, till they rest on a pale, worn face. Closed are the heavy eyelids, and the breathing is short and irregular. But something of a smile lights up the poor woman's wasted features, as she suddenly wakens to find her room bright with sunshine.

'I wonder how long Maggie has been gone!' said she with a sigh; 'she must have slipped away while I was asleep.'

At this moment the latch of the door was softly raised, and a girl of about ten years of age entered.

'Mother, have you been awake long? I just stepped down to Mrs. Wilton's for the milk; and look what she gave me besides,' said Maggie, joyfully, pointing to the huge loaf she carried.

'Thank God,' murmured the widow. 'Mrs. Wilton has too kind a heart to let the poor around her starve.'

The child laid down the bread with a sad look, and busied herself about the room, piled up the wood fire, set the kettle on to boil, and 'tidied up,' as she called it.

The sick woman watched her child through all these movements, her eyes filling with tears, and big drops rolling down the sunken cheeks. She tried to hide them from Maggie; but it would not do, she was at her side in an instant.

'Mother, what is it? Why do you cry? You will be well again, and able to work now the spring has come.'

''Tis the rent, Maggie, child, and I cannot but fret over it. What if Lord Rivers' new steward turns us out of the little home?' said she, sobs choking her utterance.

'Is there any money in the rent box, mother?' said Maggie, wiping her eyes with her pinafore.

'Reach it over child, and see.'

Maggie quickly obeyed; but two shillings only lay shining inside.

'It must be made up to five before the quarter,' said the poor woman; 'and how am I to do it? I thought when we gave up the rest of the cottage, we might manage to pay for this one room. But look, child, there is a horse at the door, and somebody knocking.'

Maggie's eyes were so full of tears, she could hardly see; but she ran and opened the door, half shyly, and curtsied low to the gentleman who thus accosted her:

'Can you tell me, little one, the way to Farmer Wilton's? Holne Farm, I think it is called.'

'Yes, sir; you go straight along this road, and take the first turn to the left, and you will see right before you a big gate. If you please, sir, I will step down and open it for you.' And without waiting for his reply she led the way.

'What is your name?' presently inquired the gentleman.

'Maggie Morris, sir.'

'I think then, little Maggie, that your face looks something like this April morning,—tears and smiles,—eh, little one?'

Maggie coloured and hung down her head, then looking up, said:

'Mother is very ill, sir; she is afraid she will never be able to work any more, and we shall be turned out of our home.'

'That is a sad state of things, certainly,' said the gentleman; 'but it may not be as bad as you think. Tell your mother I will call in and see her on my way back from the farm.'

'Thank you, sir,' said the child with a grateful look. Then seeing they were close to the gate, she ran on and held it open.

'Thank you, my little maid; there's a sixpence for your trouble. Ah! I have dropped it among the grass, just there,' said he, pointing with his whip.

Maggie, smiling, curtsied her thanks, and thought what a kind-looking face the gentleman had. She turned to pick up the sixpence, and surely it did glitter. Was it the sun shining so brightly made it look golden? Maggie turned it over and over, and wondered how it was, for she had never seen a golden sixpence before.

'I will run home and ask mother about it,' said she, and away the little feet tripped back to the cottage.

'Mother! mother! just look what the gentleman gave me for opening the gate—a golden sixpence! I never saw one before,' said she, opening the hand in which lay the glittering coin.

'It is a mistake,' said Mrs. Morris; 'the kind gentleman meant to give you sixpence, and it is a half sovereign.'

'Is that a great deal, mother?'

'Yes, it is worth twenty sixpences. We must watch for him as he returns, and give it back.'

'Mother, he said he would come in and see you, when I told him you were ill. But you won't give back the money, when you want it so much?'

'Yes, my child; I could not do a dishonest thing, though that ten shillings is what I long for more than anything. Pin my shawl round me, and shake up the pillows.'

Maggie obeyed, and then went out to the cottage door to watch.

At last she heard the horse's gallop along the road, and presently the gentleman appeared. He drew up as Maggie ran towards him.

'I can spare you a few minutes,' said he, 'if you will hold my horse the while.'

And giving the bridle into her hand, he entered the door Maggie pointed to.

A sorrowful look came over his countenance when he caught sight of that pale face.

'Sir,' she began, 'you were kind enough to notice my little girl; but you made a mistake, and gave her this half sovereign.' Here a violent fit of coughing interrupted her speech.

'Did I?' said the gentleman, laying down his hat, which was covered with deep crape, on the table. 'You seem very ill, my poor woman;' and, taking a chair by the bedside, he felt the feeble pulse.

'Is no doctor attending you?'

'No, sir, the nearest doctor lives at Chagford, three miles off, and we cannot afford to send for him.'

'Well,' said the gentleman, 'I shall be here again next week, and will see you again. Meantime, here is a prescription, which I suppose you will have no difficulty in sending to Chagford to be made up.'

'Oh no, sir; my little girl goes there twice a week with eggs and butter to Holne Castle, from Mrs. Wilton's.'

'Very good,' said the gentleman, as he took a note-book from his pocket, and tearing a leaf out, he wrote on it, and gave it to Mrs. Morris.

'Thank you, sir,' said she.

'You are welcome,' he answered. 'Nay, keep the money,' said he; 'you are poor and ill, and seem in much need of it. Good-bye till we meet again.'

The poor woman's words of gratitude were poured forth until the door closed upon him; and springing quickly into the saddle, he was soon lost sight of in the sudden bend of the road.

What joy there was in the cottage that evening! and both mother and child slept under the happy consciousness that a sore burden had been lifted from off them.

---

CHAPTER II.

A VISIT TO HOLNE CASTLE.

MAGGIE awoke the next morning feeling very happy. She was up early, for it was her day for Holne Castle; and after seeing that her mother had everything she needed, and the neighbour who lived in the other part of the house having promised to look after her during her absence, she set off to the farm.

It lay embosomed among mighty oaks in the centre of a park-like domain, whose green and mossy slopes rose on all sides, with pieces of grey rock jutting out here and there covered with lichen. And every now and then the heads of the graceful deer would rise and peep through the bracken fern; and you could hear the rush and murmur of the river as it dashed and tumbled over the amber-coloured stones, through the wood that stretched far, far away down the valley. The estate belonged to Lord Rivers; and formerly there used to stand on the site of the farm a grand old mansion; but in the course of years, when it had crumbled into decay, a farmhouse had been built on to the remaining few rooms. The Rivers family then built a fine castle on a commanding point of the hill, overlooking the valley; and there dwelt the present Lord Rivers, at this time a very old man. He led the quietest of lives, for his only son was obliged to be a great deal in London; but generally in the summer his married daughter would come for a few weeks, and then the grounds and woods round the castle would ring with the merry voices of her children. But, excepting these visits, the solitude of Lord Rivers was never disturbed, and the management of the estate was entrusted to the steward. The Holne estate extended all down the valley; and the farmhouse that was now built in the midst of the deer park, was tenanted by Farmer Wilton, who also rented the outlying fields.

Maggie thought of the golden sixpence as she passed through the great gate, and walked down the long avenue that led to the farm; and, making her way through the noisy farmyard, she soon found herself inside the cheerful kitchen, with its nicely sanded floor, and table scrubbed quite white. She took her seat beside the tall eight-day clock, which ticked away lustily. In the deep window sat the only daughter of the house, a girl about sixteen. Her brow rested on her thin, small hand, and over her shoulders fell a luxuriance of light hair. The face wore a pained expression, which changed almost to a scowl as she turned to look at Maggie.

Mary Wilton was the source of the deepest sorrow to the farmer and his wife, for God had seen fit partially to withhold from her that most wondrous gift of his to mankind—reason. Her parents had hoped against hope, and lavished every care and attention upon her; but time made no difference in the poor child.

Maggie rose quietly, and laid a bunch of bright primroses on her lap, which she had gathered on the way down.

Mary clutched them eagerly, and said, 'Thank you,' and then began to arrange the flowers.

'Good morning, Maggie,' said Mrs. Wilton, as she came from the dairy, and put the great basket of butter and eggs upon the child's arm. 'How is your mother to-day?'

'I think she is a little better, ma'am,' said Maggie, glancing timidly up into Mrs. Wilton's face, for she stood in great awe of the good dame, who was a tall, buxom-looking woman of fifty, whose quick manner and sharp voice made all those under her do her bidding, without losing any time. At this answer of Maggie's, she turned away, and said, in a low tone, 'She'll never be better in this world;' then added aloud, 'Tell your mother I have let my lodgings to Dr. Harcourt, whose daughter is coming here for change of air; and I expect to be so busy, getting the rooms ready, that I shall not be able to come and see her for a few days. But if she wants anything, you must let me know. What is the paper in your hand?'

'If you please, ma'am, it is what the kind gentleman, who stopped to see mother yesterday, told me to take to Chagford.'

'What! Dr. Harcourt?' said Mrs. Wilton.

'I suppose so, ma'am; he spoke so kindly to us.' And then Maggie simply told the story of the golden sixpence.

'I am glad to hear it,' said the kind farmer's wife. 'And now, lassie, be up and away to the castle, and if there is any message bring it back to me.'

'Yes, ma'am,' said Maggie, as she stepped into the yard, and stood debating, for a moment, which way she should go.

The brightness of the day decided her for the path through the wood; and, quickly crossing the small plank which spanned the stream, where the ducks were sailing, she tripped over a bright green meadow, and was soon lost sight of among the trees bursting forth into new green.

Maggie's heart was light and bounding; no wonder then that her feet sped swiftly through those primrose paths, as the birds carolled forth their joyous notes around her. A stile terminated this woodland path, and Maggie, having first carefully lifted her burden to the other side, sprang lightly over. There was now a long, steep lane to be toiled up, and the sun came out so hot that little Maggie wished she had no basket to carry. But when the happy thought came that she was earning money for her sick mother, the load felt ten times lighter. At the top of the hill she could see the houses of Chagford not far off, rising one above another, and one more turn in the road brought her facing the handsome iron gates and pillars that led to the castle.

Passing these, she walked on till she came to the back entrance, and, after winding through a laurel shrubbery, she found herself at the kitchen door. The cook spoke kindly to her, and told her to come inside; and in a few minutes Mrs. Rokes, the housekeeper, appeared—a tall, quiet-looking person, dressed in black, her grey hair being banded under the closest cap.

'Ah!' said she, 'that's right, Maggie. I see you have brought me a good supply;' and she unpacked the well-filled basket. 'Let me see,' she added, 'if I can find anything to send back to your sick mother;' and taking the empty basket, she disappeared for a few minutes, but soon returned with it well filled with scraps of all sorts.

'When is she coming for some more plain work?' said she, as she gave it into the child's hand. 'I have plenty for her to do.'

'Thank you, ma'am, she hopes to soon,' said Maggie, as she turned to go.

She did not hear Mrs. Roke's last sentence, as she closed the door: 'The poor young thing will be motherless ere long, I reckon.'

It was well she did not, for it would have cast a cloud over the little heart which was now filled with sunshine in every corner.

Onward she hastened to the town of Chagford, and soon the bottle of medicine added its weight to the basket, and then the weary little feet traversed the three miles of turnpike road home.

But the glad looks and sweet smile with which her mother greeted her, fully repaid the toil of that long day.

CHAPTER III.

AN ARRIVAL.

On the Tuesday afternoon of the following week, as Maggie was again seated in the farm kitchen, after a walk to Holne Castle, she noticed there was an unusual stir about the house. At least, Mrs. Wilton seemed more alive than usual, and her voice was heard in every direction. Presently Maggie heard her name called, and, on answering the summons, Mrs. Wilton bade her run to the little front garden and gather a bunch of spring flowers. To do this, she had to pass the door of the front parlour, and, as it stood half open, she ventured to peep in.

'The gentlefolks must be coming to-day,' thought she, as she caught sight of the snow-white table-cloth, spread with Mrs. Wilton's best china, and the bowl of Devonshire cream in the middle, looking so tempting.

And away she hastened to the pretty garden, and soon gathered a sweet spring bouquet of primroses, japonicas, hepaticas, ranunculus, etc. These she arranged in a small vase Mrs. Wilton found for her, and the flowers gave the table a bright and cheery aspect.

Suddenly Maggie heard the sound of wheels, and she lingered at the farm door to watch the visitors arrive at the front entrance, which led in by a rustic gate through the aforementioned garden.

The tired horses drew up, and Dr. Harcourt stepped from the carriage, and gave his hand to a young lady dressed in deep mourning. Maggie tried to see her face, but it was hidden by the crape veil. She was followed by a little sister, about nine years old, and a servant.

They disappeared under the ivied porch; and Maggie heard Dr. Harcourt tell the coachman to be in readiness on the following morning to take him home again, when, thinking she had stayed long enough, she took up her can of milk, and hurried home.

'Mother,' said she, that evening, after fully recounting everything about the arrival, 'I wonder if the young ladies are as good and kind as their papa.' And wondering this, she crept into bed beside her mother, and fell asleep.

Meanwhile, I must introduce my readers to the Harcourt family.

Dr. Harcourt was an eminent physician, living at Torquay, about twenty-four miles from Eaststone.

Three months before my story commences, his beloved wife had drooped and faded in rapid consumption, leaving him with two daughters. The eldest, Mabel, had been her mother's constant attendant during her long and trying illness, and after her death she became so seriously ill, her poor father thought he must lose her also. But he was spared the double sorrow; and Mabel so far recovered as to be ordered a change of thorough country air, with rest and quiet for some months. Holne Farm was accordingly resorted to, and Dr. Harcourt consented to leave his children there for the present.

They were all astir early on the following morning, as Dr. Harcourt was to leave directly after breakfast; and, amidst farewell kisses, and promises of another meeting very soon, the carriage drove off.

Maggie heard the tramp of the horses as they came down the hill, and ran out.

But the doctor had not forgotten his promise, and the carriage stopped. A minute after, and he was inside the cottage, greeting his patient with kindly word and smile.

'Do you think I shall ever get well, sir?' asked the poor woman.

'You are in God's hand,' said the doctor, gravely; 'but you are very ill. I cannot stay now to talk to you; but I have spoken to my daughter, and she will come and see you very often, I hope.'

And, after giving a few more directions, he returned to the carriage, patting Maggie's head as he passed out, and telling her to be a good girl to her mother.

On the afternoon of the next day, as Maggie sat sewing by her mother's side, a gentle tap was heard at the cottage door. A sweet voice said, as the latch was raised, 'May I come in?' and the slight figure of a young lady glided in. 'Papa asked me to come and see you as soon as I could,' said she.

'Thank you, ma'am,' said Mrs. Morris, who at once guessed who her visitor was. 'Maggie, put forward a chair for the lady, and then take the can and step down to Mrs. Wilton's for the milk.'

As soon as the child was gone, Mabel drew her chair close to the bedside, and threw back the veil from her face; and the deep, calm, brown eyes looked compassionately on the sick woman, as she said, 'Papa told me you were very ill. Do you think you are a little better to-day?'

'No, miss; I fear not,' said the sufferer; 'this constant cough, and wasting strength, tells me I shall never be better in this world.'

Mabel hardly knew what to answer, for she had heard from the doctor that the case was a hopeless one; so, breathing an inward prayer that she might be permitted to speak a word in season, she answered:

'But I trust your face is set towards that better land, where sorrow and sickness can never enter, and where the weary are at rest.'

'Well, miss, I have always tried to do my duty in this life, and I trust God will forgive me at the last. My poor husband died when Maggie was only a few months old; and, ever since, I have struggled to bring up my child honestly, and cannot bear the thought of leaving her alone in the world. She does not know I am dying.'

'Do you feel afraid to die?' asked Mabel.

'Yes, miss, when I think of my sins; but I hope God will have mercy upon me.'

Mabel quietly drew a little Testament from her pocket, and, in a clear voice, read the parable of the prodigal son. She then applied it to our natural state in God's sight, showing that we have nothing wherewith to come before Him, and that 'all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags.' Then she proceeded to unfold the story of grace; how Jesus, the Son of God, had taken upon himself our nature, and suffered in the stead of guilty man; and now the door of mercy stood open wide, that all sinners might have their robes washed white in the blood of the Lamb, receiving a full, free, and perfect forgiveness.

The poor woman listened eagerly to every word; and when Mabel ceased, she said, 'Then there is hope for me? I too may come for forgiveness?'

'Yes,' said Mabel, 'the invitation is: "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." 'Seek him, and you shall have "the peace that passeth all understanding."'

They were interrupted by Maggie's return; and, as Mabel rose to go, she said in a low tone, 'I will leave a verse of a favourite hymn of mine for you to think about,' and she repeated the following lines:

'Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bid'st me come to Thee;
O Lamb of God, I come.'

And, with a sweet smile, she took leave, promising to call again in a few days.

That evening Mabel had a long talk with Mrs. Wilton about the widow and her child, and was glad to hear from the good farmer's wife, that as soon as the orphan needed a home, she intended taking her to train for a farm servant.

'She will have to rough it pretty well,' said she; 'but it will be good training, and provide her with a home.'

Mabel assented to the plan as an excellent one; and, after more talk, Mrs. Wilton left the room, saying, 'Miss Harcourt, I could not turn my back upon the orphan.'

CHAPTER IV.

THE ORPHAN.

THUS some weeks rolled by, and as spring advanced Mabel's health was restored. Colour returned to the pale cheek, and strength to the exhausted frame. Her father, in his constant visits to Holne Farm, watched joyfully the gradual improvement. He always arranged to come out every Saturday so as to spend the Sunday with his children, and in the morning they drove to the parish church of Chagford.

Mabel never forgot the sick woman, and hardly a day passed without her visiting her, and many a little delicacy she prepared with her own hands to tempt the failing appetite. But this was not the only cottage that was gladdened by her sunny smile. She was a general favourite throughout the hamlet; and the poor blessed the day she came amongst them, and always welcomed her as a sunbeam. The little children, too, loved her; for on Sunday afternoons she would assemble them at the farm, and, gathering them round her, she would teach them about their Saviour, and train their infant voices to sing his praise.

Maggie loved those Sabbath afternoons, and she would repeat the hymns and Bible stories she had been taught to her mother.

Even poor Mary Wilton took her place in the class, and joined as well as she was able; and Mabel hoped she comprehended in some measure the story of Jesus' love, for she would listen with clasped hands and earnest face to every word, and afterwards her mother would hear her murmuring to herself, over and over again, bits of her favourite hymns and texts.

It was on one of these Sabbath afternoons, after Mabel had dismissed her children, and was quietly walking round the little garden with her papa and sister Alice, that suddenly the rustic gate was thrown open, and Maggie ran in breathless.

'Oh, if you please, miss, mother is much worse, and she wants to see you once more; will you come?' said the child with pleading looks.

'Yes,' said Mabel; and turning to her father, she linked her arm in his, and the two followed Maggie.

The poor woman heard Mabel's voice as soon as she entered, and made a sign she wished to speak to her.

Mabel bent down and caught the words:

'The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin. I am so happy.'

Mabel pressed the wasted hand, and whispered: 'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me.'

The dying eyes were once more turned gratefully towards her benefactors, and the lips murmured, 'Maggie,' and the child gently kissed her mother.

A few short sighs were all that were audible after that. A few moments more, and Dr. Harcourt said, 'It is all over, she is at rest.'

Maggie knelt down by the bed, and sobbed as if her little heart was breaking.

Several of the neighbours had stepped in to see if they could help, and there was not a dry eye amongst them when they saw the orphan's grief. Mrs. Wilton was there also; and Mabel, seeing she could be of no further use, quitted the cottage with her father. Soon after Mrs. Wilton followed, leading the motherless Maggie to the shelter of her own home.

The poor child was glad to creep up early to bed that night. A tiny attic had been prepared for her, with a window so high, you could only just get a peep of the blue sky. Maggie gazed wistfully through it at the patch of golden stars, and thought of mother gone far, far beyond them, and gradually she cried herself to sleep.

(To be continued.)

THE NIGHT-WATCHMAN'S SONG.

HARK, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of Eight, good sirs, has struck.
Eight souls alone from death were kept,
When God the earth with deluge swept.
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of Nine, good sirs, has struck.
Nine lepers cleansed returned not:
Be not thy blessings, man, forgot!
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of Ten, good sirs, has struck.
Ten precepts show God's holy will:
Oh, may we prove obedient still!
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour Eleven, good sirs, has struck.
Eleven apostles remained true;
May we be like that faithful few!
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of Twelve, good sirs, has struck.
Twelve is of Time the boundary:
Man, think upon Eternity!
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of One, good sirs, has struck.
One God alone reigns over all;
Nought can without his will befall.
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of Two, good sirs, has struck.
Two ways to walk has man been given;
Teach me the right—the path to heaven!
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of Three, good sirs, has struck.
The Three in one, exalted most—
The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.
Unless the Lord to guard us deign,
Man wakes and watches all in vain.
Lord, through thine all-prevailing might,
Do Thou vouchsafe us a good night!

Hark, while I sing! our village clock
The hour of Four, good sirs, has struck.
Four seasons crown the farmer's care;
Thy heart with equal toil prepare.
Up! up! awake, nor slumber on;
The morn approaches, night is gone!
Thank God, who, by his power and might,
Has watched and kept us through the night!

—From the German.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

LEV. VI. 13.

THIS was one of God's special commandments to Israel, and, no doubt, has a special meaning both to them and to us. For He speaks no random words; his trumpet utters no uncertain sound. He says only what He means, and He means all He says. His words are profoundly real, more so than those of the deepest thinker of any age; and far more enduring, for they are eternal words, embodying eternal truths. The fire, the altar, the sacrifice, the tabernacle, have all passed away; but the truth embodied in these remains for ever. It is for our instruction as truly as for Israel's.

I. The Fire.—Fire, in general, is the symbol of wrath. It is sometimes the figure of purifying, but more commonly of anger, divine anger,—anger on account of sin; for in no other connection do we ever read of divine anger. Not personal affront, or caprice, or pique, or partiality, or ill-humour—none of these are ever connected with God's wrath. Only SIN! The history of fire in Scripture is very instructive. It begins in Paradise, and ends in the last chapter of Revelation: there is the flaming sword; the fire of the sacrifice; the fire of Sodom; the fire of Egypt's plagues; the fire of the pillar; the fire of Sinai; the fire of Korah; the fire, enfolding itself, of Ezekiel; the 'unquenchable fire;' the fire that accompanies Christ's second coming; the fire of apocalyptic judgment; the lake of fire; the fire that comes down from heaven, that is to consume the world,—these are some of the memorable allusions to fire in Scripture. Most of these are connected with the Shekinah, or visible symbol of the divine presence; intimating that it is from that presence that the fire proceeds, even from God himself. Thus God intimates, most solemnly, that there is such a thing as wrath. Yes, there is wrath; now hidden, one day to be revealed; wrath which the wicked treasure up against the day of wrath. God is not too benevolent, too merciful to be angry. If there be no anger in God, the Bible utterly deceives us. A large, very large, portion of it is quite unmeaning, or rather false. The expulsion from Paradise, the deluge, Sodom, sacrifice, pain, death, sorrow, the law, the cross, the unquenchable fire,—these are very plain intimations of wrath—wrath against sin; wrath for the punishment, not the deliverance or warning of the sinner. All the ills that flesh is heir to, are originally, and in their proper interpretation (however overruled), expressions of divine anger. How terrible for a sinner to be confronted with an angry God! How hateful a thing must sin be to excite that anger,—the one thing that provokes his wrath!

II. The Altar.—The word means the place of sacrifice. It was elevated, implying that what was placed on it was lifted up to be presented to God. There was but one altar of sacrifice,—one spot for a sinner to meet God. It was the most essential part of tabernacle and temple; without it, there could be no place of worship for a sinner. A sinner can only worship at an altar, can only meet God there. Why? Let us see. There are two things very prominent and visible about the altar—the fire and the blood; the fire, the symbol of wrath; the blood, the symbol of the effects of that wrath, in the infliction of punishment. Thus, while the altar proclaimed wrath, it also proclaimed wrath appeased, in consequence of the deserved punishment having been inflicted. Condemnation and pardon were thus fully expressed: hatred of sin, yet love to the sinner,—inexorable justice, inexhaustible grace. No sin pardoned, without first being punished (either in person or by substitute); no debt cancelled, without being fully paid. A just God, and a Saviour; not only a Saviour, though a just God; but a Saviour because a just God. Thus the altar was

(1.) The place of condemnation.—There God condemned the sinner and his sin. Condemnation was the first thing the altar exhibited and proclaimed.

(2.) The place of confession.—The sinner comes, not to hide, nor to extenuate, not to excuse, nor to deny, but to confess his sin.

(3.) The place of pardon.—The pardon is the result of the condemnation—the condemnation of the substitute or surety. First condemnation, then confession, then pardon,—free, and large, and irrevocable.

(4.) The place of meeting with God.—The one spot on which God and the sinner can meet. Only over blood, over death, can the great business of salvation be transacted, and the great question of pardon settled between the sinner and God. There only is it lawful or honourable for God to meet with the sinner; there only is it safe or comfortable for the sinner to meet with God. There the great reconciliation takes place.

The cross is the altar. At the cross we meet with God, and God with us. There we learn our condemnation and our deliverance, our death and our life. There we confess, and there we are freely forgiven. There we know what sin is, and what grace is. Our God is a consuming fire; yet God is love.

The fire upon this altar was peculiar in many respects.

(1.) It was kindled by God.—At first it was lighted directly from heaven,—from the Shekinah glory. It was God's own fire.

(2.) It was fed with the fat of the sacrifices.—The peace-offering is specially mentioned in connection with this. As if that which ratified the peace was that which satiated the fire.

(3.) It was never to go out.—Once kindled, it was to burn always. It needed no rekindling. It was kindled by God, but fed and kept up by man. In the case of the lost, the fire of God is eternal and unquenchable; and, in the case of the saved, it is only quenched because exhausted in and by Him who, as the Eternal One, endured the wrath of eternity during his brief life on earth. Good news to sinners! There is One who has borne wrath for sin. He who accepts that one wrath-bearing is personally delivered from it all. But he who rejects it, and tries to bear the wrath himself, must reap what he sows, and bear it for ever.

There is but one tabernacle, one altar, one fire, one sacrifice, one Priest. Not two ways of approaching God, or two ways of pardon, only one. He who accepts and uses the one is safe; he who tries another must perish for ever. Yes, there is but one cross, one Christ, one Saviour. But He is sufficient.

THE SURE KNOWLEDGE OF SALVATION.*

IT is not presumption to believe God; presumption is just the opposite. If an Israelite, who had sprinkled the blood, were to be doubting and fearing lest, after all, his first-born might perish, we should at once say, There is a man who has not faith in God; he does not believe what God says; he is making God a liar. And for a soul that rests on Jesus to doubt that he will be, nay, that he is saved, is the very height of presumption. It is not believing 'the record that God has given of his Son.' It is believing half the record, but not the other half. It is most unreasonable. God says, 'He that believeth hath everlasting life;' the believing soul that doubts God as to the certainty of its salvation says, 'I believe in Jesus; but I do not think I have everlasting life.' One must be wrong. Who is it? 'Let God be true, and every man a liar.' Do not you see the illogical nature of such unbelief; that there is no reason in it; nay, that it is presumptuous?

Oh, dear friends, Satan turns things upside down. He has two ways of making sinners presumptuous, or rather, one way of making sinners presumptuous, and another way of making saints presumptuous. He makes sinners presumptuous by leading them to doubt God's word that they will be damned. God says, 'Ye shall surely die.' Satan says, 'That is not true; you shall not surely die. You may not be believing in Christ; still, you have a good hope that you will be saved.' That is the height of presumption. It is believing that God will not keep his word. Such is the presumption of the world, which hopes to be saved, though it does not trust in Christ. On the other hand, he makes saints presumptuous, by leading them to think that, after all, they may perish, and that God will not keep his word. That, again, is the height of presumption.

See how an Israelite was shut up to faith. He was not allowed to see: he was shut up to bare, naked faith. The blood was on the outside of the house; the man was on the inside; and it was said, 'None of you shall go out at the door of his house until the morning.' So that, if a man wanted to strengthen his faith, he was not able to go outside the house to see whether the blood was there. His faith had to be strengthened by the recollection of the promise of God. So it is with us; we are shut up to faith. We are to believe, not only when we see, but when we do not see. There need not be a running backwards continually to see whether the blood is on the soul; a perpetual self-examination as to whether one really believes or not. That is done once for all; and assurance is nothing but believing—staying yourself on—the promise of God.

But let us go a step further. You ought to have assurance. Every believer in Jesus ought to be perfectly assured of his salvation. I know that such is not the case; but it ought to be. It is your birthright. I do not find in the New Testament that there were such trembling, doubting Christians, as there are in these days. I do not find there that, when a man was converted to God, and believed in the Lord Jesus Christ to the saving of his soul, he had a vague hope that, after all, God might pardon him; or that, if he did the best he could, he would be saved. I read this: He 'rejoiced, believing in God, with all his house;' 'He went on his way rejoicing;' 'There was great joy in that city;' 'Our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance;' 'Ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost.'

You cannot be happy without it. How could an Israelite, standing with his household round his table, having in his hand the little hand of his eldest boy, be happy if he did not believe that he was safe? And how can you? A vague hope will not do. A criminal is not happy as long as he hopes for a reprieve; but he is happy when he sees his pardon, with the queen's name at the bottom of it, when he knows that that name is good for his life. And so will you be happy when you know from the word of God that, trusting in the blood of Jesus, you are safe.

You ought to have assurance, because you cannot be holy without it. There may be a degree of holiness; but there is none of that holiness which springs from the consciousness of adoption into God's family. 'I will run in the way of thy commandments,' said David. But when? 'When Thou hast set my heart at liberty' (Ps. cxix. 32). Not till then. It is the holiness of a slave, and not the holiness of a son. It is not the happy consciousness of pleasing God. It is a bondage. Mark the order in this chapter. When was the Israelite to put away the leaven out of his house? After he was saved; after the word of God had conveyed to him the assurance that he was safe. So it is with you. Do you want to put away the evil things that lurk in your heart? You must know that you are God's child; you must know that you are pardoned; you must know that your name is written in the Lamb's book of life; you must know that your soul is 'saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation.'

* From The Shadow and the Substance. By S. A. Blackwood, Esq. London: J. Nisbet and Co. 1867.

You ought to have assurance, because you cannot be useful without it. Satan knows that well; he knows well that a redeemed sinner can never serve God heartily, until he is conscious of his acceptance with God; and therefore he blinds our hearts to it as much as he can. You cannot set about your work happily and heartily, you cannot go and tell other fellow-sinners of what the Lord has done for your soul, till you know it. You cannot give a clear message of pardon to others, if, when they turn round and say, 'Are you pardoned?' you are obliged to say, 'I do not know.' What can you do? Your tongue is tied, and your very feeblest efforts at the threshold of service are stopped and rendered useless.

Therefore, dear friends, seek after assurance, and do not think that it is to be got by a round of religious duties, or attendance upon ordinances; by a certain amount of obedience yielded, or experience acquired. That was not the way of old, neither is it the way now. How is assurance obtained? By trusting in the word of God. The question can be settled in one instant. Are you content to take God at his word? You receive the witness of a man; you believe what a man tells you; why not receive 'the witness of God, which is greater?' 'This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. HE THAT HATH THE SON HATH LIFE.' Believe it. Take God at his word; and having done so, go on your way rejoicing, heartily and wholly to serve Him who has bought you with his blood, and who promises to keep you, trusting in Jesus till the very end, and then to translate you from his kingdom in this world to his kingdom in glory.

I know that there are some here who do not like assurance. And why? Because the absence of assurance is a very convenient thing for those who like to live a half-and-half life. Many know that, and they tell you, If I were perfectly sure that I was saved, I must be an entirely different person; I must live more heartily for God; the line between me and the world must be drawn much more distinctly; I could not be living with one foot in sin, and another foot in holiness; I must be altogether on the holy side. Satan knows that, and therefore he labours hard to persuade people that it is a very humble, and a very proper, and a very respectable thing, to indulge a kind of vague expectation that perhaps, after all, you may be saved.

To such I would say, Have done with such Christianity as that. It is not worthy the name of it. It is a half-and-half Christianity. It is not God's Christianity. Get rid of it. Say, 'I will have done with it from to-night. If I have passed from death unto life, as God says, I will believe it, and live as one ought to live who is "alive for evermore."' Oh that God would enable you to rejoice in this fulness of assurance; that the dark cloud which hangs over many a mind, when they think of the time of judgment, might vanish; and that you might see, as God in his mercy has shown me for ten years, the glorious certainty, that 'he that believeth in the Son of God hath life,' and 'shall never perish!'

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY.

OUR third year in Jerusalem as home! I do not count from my first arrival in the autumn all alone, when sorrow and illness clouded the first weeks of my sojourn; but I reckon from the following spring and Eastertide when my brother had joined me and removed all uncertainties about our plans, by the delightful idea of taking a house and settling down in the Holy City for at least two years, while he painted the 'Return of Naomi and Ruth,' which my father had suggested.

It seems so natural in Jerusalem to consider Eastertide as the beginning of a new year. Winter, though broken into short fragments by warm sunny intervals, still does come down to the time of Passover. Keen winds, frosts, and sometimes heavy falls of snow, are to be expected in March. I have even seen the severest weather of the whole winter during that month.

Well may the Apostle Peter have been glad to warm himself over the fire of coals in the high priest's palace at the beginning of the Passover week, if the weather was as keen as we have known it in Jerusalem at the same season.

But the winter ends here: a day or two more, and the wind changes; the sun, always powerful even in winter, melts the snow, dries the heavy ground, clothes the corn-fields in vivid green, decks every bank with anemone and iris, and covers the fruit-trees with a mantle of delicate blossom. Then the vines bud and swell, the birds are busy and sing; ploughmen finish their sowing, and men look for the coming fruits of the earth.

'This month shall be unto you the beginning of months,—it shall be the first month of the year to you,' does seem in Palestine a most natural command. Winter is suddenly left behind, and summer takes its place, but with all the loveliness of spring. Nature is putting forth the energies of renewed life, and man also awakes from wintry torpor and bestirs himself, rejoicing in the genial warmth and brightness which Orientals so dearly love.

Jews prepare for their Passover, Moslems for their pilgrimages to the tomb of Moses, Christians for Easter, their 'great feast'—so called by all sects alike; and thus the year of activity and business is begun. We had now spent two whole years in our 'hired house' in Jerusalem. Walter had been diligent in his chief work—painting Scripture incidents in the land, and among the scenery where they had occurred. 'Naomi and Ruth' finished, he had gone to his next subject, 'Abraham purchasing the Cave of Machpelah from the children of Heth.' This would still occupy him during several months, and make necessary a future visit of some weeks to Hebron.

Therefore we renewed the lease of our house, which was much endeared to us by the happy time we had spent in it. Walter continued his tuition of Nathanael with much pleasure on both sides; for the boy got on well, and looked forward, as did his father Rabbi Abraham for him, to a journey to England for thorough schooling; only, nobody could yet tell when that was to happen. His sister Rachel had made more rapid progress, and was a very interesting pupil to me. Mrs. Wills also was delighted with the success of her musical studies. Our household was not much changed. Helaneh, the Arab woman, had left me to keep house for her little new married daughter, scarce ten years old. In her stead, I first had a Bethlehem woman, who soon left me to go and look after her olive crop. After being a while without a servant, Constantine (our servant lad) found me another Jerusalem widow—a Greek—respectable, but painfully inert, and feeble in her movements—the more so as the long Christmas fast thoroughly exhausted her.

Sarah, the Spanish Jewess, had been a great help to me. She had not only improved in needlework, but one day, when she found me doing the housework myself, she went off and got her Rabbis to allow her to spend an hour or two in helping me, even though it was Saturday, and her Sabbath. So thoroughly had her dislike and fear of Christians been melted away by kind treatment.

Old Haj Omar, our groom, and the horses, still formed an indispensable part of our establishment. The occasional rebukes which his obstinacy drew down, only seemed to make him the more attached to Walter Beg; and whenever he was not under the influence of opium, he was a trusty servant, loving his horses as if they were his children.

Thus we had plenty to do; Walter with his painting and his pupil; I with my household, with Rachel's lessons, and with the Jewesses, who more than ever came to me for employment in needlework and knitting; and our steady home life continued its daily round of ever deepening interest.

CHAPTER II.

ATTEMPT TO GET UP A MASSACRE OF THE JEWS.

ONE morning after the Jewish Feast of Purim, which came exactly one month before Passover, Walter came upstairs to look for me. 'Sarah is down stairs, Emily, and wants you. She seems to be in some trouble, and has brought a little boy with her. She has been kissing my hands all over in spite of me; but I can't exactly make out what is the matter. Her queer Spanish is too much for me.'

I went down, and Sarah, generally grave and dignified in her manner, seized my hands and kissed them vehemently, and even attempted to kiss the hem of my sleeve, while her little grandson, about nine years old, tried to do the same.

'What is the matter, Sarah?'

'Senora, that you should help us. Mos spontamos mucho (we are much afraid). Let us come into the room and we will tell you.'

As soon as she had carefully shut the door, for fear Um Habeeb or Constantine should hear, she said: 'We are very much afraid of estos Christianos (those Christians). They want to kill us, and Jerusalem is full of them this year. What shall we do? Our hope is first in God, and next in you.'

We succeeded with difficulty in calming her down, so as to get a coherent account of what had happened to frighten her.

She said, that yesterday morning early, her little grandson here, Yakovieo (little Jacob), son of Gershon the pedlar, was in the bazaar, buying vegetables for his mother, and as he was going back, a Greek pilgrim boy cursed him and pushed him down, and took away his vegetables. 'Yakovieo was frightened, and ran into an adjoining house, and waited there until he thought the Greek boy would be gone, and then he came out. But no, the Greek was still lying in wait, and Yakovieo was afraid to pass by; so he threw a stone at the Greek to make him go away, and, ahi di mi! (woe is me) the stone hit the foot of the Gentile and made his blood flow, and then the pilgrims raised a great tumult, and would have killed my child, but some of the rich Moras (Moslems) ran out of their shops, and took him to the seraglio. The Pasha—que biva cien anos! (may he live a hundred years)—would not listen to an affair of children, and sent them all away; and one of the Moslems, to whom Gershon, my son, has sold cloth these fifteen years past, kept Yakovieo until the Christians were all gone, for fear alguna cosa negra (any bad thing or harm) should befall him, and then he brought him home to us. Gershon gave him a piece of print for his kindness. What else could we do? for he saved the boy's life. But to-day, the Moro came again, and told us that we had better not let Yakovieo go out again into the streets, because the Christians are very angry. They say that the Jews want blood for the Passover, and are talking many bad words, and are going to do us much evil. We are so frightened, Senora. Oh! for the kuvod (honour) of God let the boy stay in your house till the danger is past; it will be a mizrah muy grande (very great merit). Oh! save the life of the boy.'

'Hush, hush, Sarah, that is enough. Yakovieo may stay here if he likes; but perhaps you are too much afraid, and the Christians are not thinking of any harm.'

'Oh yes, Senora, indeed they are. I went a long way round to come here, but three of the pilgrims saw me at the end of a street, and they did so (drawing her hand across her throat), and cried, Yahoody! Yahoody!'

'Your boy may stay here, Sarah; but I hope there is no danger.'

'May your lamp never be extinguished, Senora! May you live many years; but don't let your servants tell people that he is here.'

'Nonsense, they don't know that he threw the stone; and why should they tell if they did?'

'Perhaps she is right, Emily,' said Walter. 'You know what Helaneh said about blood being used by Jews.'

'Oh! but that is very different from giving a poor boy to a mob to be killed. Besides, I should like to know who would dare to take him out of an English house.'

'At any rate, it's best not to tell the servants why he is here,' said Walter. 'I have it. I'll make him sit for his picture, and that will explain his staying. He will just do for one of the boys in my last sketch.'

Sarah went away, full of gratitude; and my brother took the boy with him to the painting room, but presently came back. 'Emily, it has occurred to me that we ought to let Mr. Wells know about this affair; it may concern him as Consul; and, if there should be anything serious in it, he ought to be informed. First, attend to the boy for a while, and I will go up to the Consulate.'

Walter told me, on his return, that Mr. Wells had already heard of the affair, and had deputations of Jews, seriously alarmed, seeking his counsel and aid. He says he has done all he can to reassure them; but that, were it not that the Pasha is so strong, he himself would be uneasy, for there are at least ten thousand Greek and Armenian pilgrims in the city, and a sudden riot might be a very dangerous business.

The next day passed quietly till the afternoon, when Mr. Wells came to our house. The matter was becoming more serious. 'The Greeks directly, and the other Christians indirectly, are persisting,' said he, 'in having the enormity further investigated, and a Divan is to be held to-morrow of the Turkish legal authorities, before whom the case is to be fully argued. The Pasha might take umbrage at my presence; but I have come to ask you, Mr. Russell, to be so good as to go there, and witness the proceedings, and give me a report of the same.'

'How shall I understand what is going on?'

'My dragoman shall go with you—Senor Beehor Ariyeh—and Rabbi Abraham. Senor Beehor speaks Arabic, and can translate to you in Italian. Abraham will tell you what the Jews are saying, and I will also send my Arabic dragoman, who, being a Latin, rather scouts this affair as a bit of Greek fanaticism.'

'Do you really anticipate a tumult among the pilgrims, Mr. Wells?'

'Who shall say what pilgrims may do, if the thing were once begun? The pilgrims are crowding the Jewish street more and more, using menacing language and gestures, pushing women up against the walls, and hooting children. This is not a state of things to be trifled with.'

At noon next day, Walter went to the seraglio, and I waited his return with no little anxiety. It was nearly sunset before he came to snatch a mouthful of food, before going up to the Consulate to deliver his report. I was so desirous of hearing it, that I went up with him, and heard the whole history, as told to Mr. Wells, from Walter's notes.

'The case came on at noon, before the Pasha himself, in full Divan—at least, so I thought, from the large number of white-turbaned Effendis present. Your dragoman pointed out to me the Kadi, Mufti, and various others whose names he will tell you. I was very well treated, and given a seat not far from the Pasha's left hand, and pipes and coffee were served. There was a deputation from the Greek Patriarch—several of the black-robed clergy—who formally accused the Jews of being in the habit of mingling Christian blood in their Passover cakes, and of having intended, for that purpose, to take the life of Stavro, the Greek boy, whose foot was wounded, had not he been rescued by the other pilgrims.

'The Christians pleaded that their most venerated theologians, in all ages, had uniformly asserted this accusation; and finally appealed to the Pasha, whether the Moslem doctors do not also confirm this.

'There was a large number of Rabbis present, as deputation from the chief Rabbi. They were visibly perturbed, and I could see one old man literally trembling, when the Pasha called on the Kadi and the Mufti to say what was their opinion. They asserted that their sacred books declare the same as the Greeks, indirectly, and by implication, namely, that Jews do use Christian blood.

'Triumph sat on the faces of the Christian clergy, and the Pasha had to rebuke one deacon, who cried out loudly, "Oh ye cursed Jews! hear that!" shaking his fist at them in open court.

'Finally, the Pasha called upon the Jews to reply to the accusation. They appealed to their divine law and its expositors, and quoted passages to show that, not only is such a practice not enjoined, but that the principles pervading those writings were diametrically opposed to it; that blood is an unclean thing; that they dare not take it within their lips; that a Jew would rather die than wilfully swallow blood, "for is it not the life of a man?"

'Then they referred to the firman received in 1841, from His Majesty the Sultan, after the dreadful cruelties enacted in Rhodes and Damascus; which firman declares that strict search has been made into all the Jewish writings, and that no trace of such practice as this is to be found.

'The Pasha ordered this firman to be produced in a Divan to be held on Saturday. The Greeks looked rather crestfallen, but the Jews were evidently in great terror, and I was not at all satisfied with the looks and sentiments of the Moslem Effendis. The Pasha appeared to be impartial, and I don't think he believes in the accusation.'

'I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Russell. I will call on the Pasha to-morrow morning; for I fear something may occur if he is not very firm. Should the priests dare to give the signal, I fear we might have the fanatic mob of pilgrims proving the orthodoxy of their faith by a slaughter in the Jewry.'

As we walked home, Walter told me that he would have given anything to have been able to have sketched the scene. 'What a subject that would be, Emily! The Jewish Rabbis of Jerusalem, summoned before the Council, on the charge of mingling Christian blood in their Passover cakes, in the year of grace 1849! The judge, indifferent as Pontius Pilate himself, a "civilised" Turkish Pasha. The accusers, reverend fathers of the orthodox Greek Church, with snowy beards and grave robes of black, but with countenances unpleasing, bigoted, unsoftened by Christian charity—nay, rather flushed with eagerness to prove the vile accusation. The Effendis—contemptuous, luxuriously clad, indolent, greed of gain stamped upon their features; and the Jewish Rabbis—the venerable chief Rabbi, and Rabbi Raphael, and his old father, and the rest,—their noble intellectual countenances pale and perturbed, quoting Hebrew from the Holy Law in their defence; large drops of perspiration breaking out upon their brow, as the Mufti and the Kadi inclined to the side of their adversaries. I never was more moved in my life. I thought (who could help doing so?) of the night when, perhaps on the very same spot, a council was held, the high priest being the judge, and the Innocent One was condemned, on testimony of false witnesses, to the shedding of his blood.'

'But to think that Christians should be the accusers in this case! It is very dreadful, Walter.'

'Indeed it is. Just think of the heads of the Jewish nation being summoned to answer such an accusation at the Passover season, in Jerusalem! Eighteen hundred years ago they were the accusers; now they are on their defence. Alas that the accusers should be Christians! It is remarkable that Rabbi Abraham, a Christian Jew, should be there present to assist them.'

Next morning, Walter and I went out for an early walk, before breakfast. We returned by the Zion gate, and through the crowded streets. Suddenly Walter left my side and darted across the street. A Greek pilgrim had got hold of a Jew, and was using threats and making signs of cutting his throat. Walter drew the Jew away, and he made his escape down a narrow lane.

'I must go at once and report this to Mr. Wells,' said Walter; 'really something may happen. The Jews ought to keep at home till this blows over. Come, Emily, let us go to the Consulate.'

We found a considerable number of Jews there already; fear was visible on all their faces. Mr. Wells looked grave. Several similar cases had been brought to his knowledge; and, just after we got there, a son of the Grand Rabbi of London came in to report that a company of six pilgrims had seized hold of him in the street, exclaiming, 'Ah Jew! have you got the knives ready?'

The Consul prepared to visit the Pasha immediately, and remind him yet more strongly how much displeasure it would cause the Queen and government of England if any persecution of the Jews were allowed.

It was really impossible to foretell, from one hour to another, what fanatic excitement might be raised among the multitude of ignorant pilgrims thronging the streets.

However, that day passed off quietly; and at about two o'clock the next day, Mr. Wells came to tell us that he now hoped the danger was past, for the Pasha had terminated the affair. The Divan had been held; the Jews produced their firman from the Sultan, and His Excellency put it on his head. But, even then, the Kadi wished to argue that the charge must have had some foundation in ancient times. However, the Pasha spread out the imperial firman, and asked the Mufti, Kadi, and assemblage of Moslem grandees whether they meant to fly in the face of that document.

'God forbid! God forbid! Our lord the Sultan knows what is right.'

The Pasha then declared the charge disproved, and ordered the Jews to make payment to a surgeon for healing the wound in the Greek boy's foot.

Thus the Christian accusers lost their cause, and were, moreover, warned by the Pasha to look to it that none of their pilgrims break the peace, as he will hold the Patriarchs responsible if a single life is lost.

'You think it is really all over, Mr. Wells? Do you think there is no more danger from the pilgrims?'

'Not the least. We were all very uneasy yesterday; but the convents know the Pasha too well to trifle with him. On another subject (the Easter fights in the Church of the Sepulchre) he has threatened that if there is any disturbance this year, and he is obliged to call in the troops, he will begin by hanging up a dozen Greek priests outside the church.'

That evening Gershon and Sarah came and fetched home Yakovieo, offering us thanks most touchingly for our protection of him, and bringing us a parcel of the finest Passover cakes I had seen, and some of the rich sweet wine they make for their feasts.

The accusation that the Jews use blood was dropped; at least, we heard no more of it for that year.

(To be continued.)

'I SLEEP, BUT MY HEART WAKETH.'

CANT. v. 2.

METHOUGHT I saw that all the vast assemblage of human beings were admitted through one narrow avenue into a cavern-like area; and that, as soon as admitted, they began to struggle and elbow their way up the incline immediately before them. To where, or for what purpose, did not seem to them to be definitely ascertained. Some, however, who were pressing more anxiously and eagerly than the rest of the crowd, by whom they were surrounded, had heard that something definitely to their advantage could be obtained farther on in the road they were now pursuing, viz. riches, honours, pleasures, etc.; hence their haste. From the top of the cavern hung some splendid stalactitic formations, whilst the floor was covered with a calcareous crust, which largely impeded the progress, as well as sometimes maimed, by its sharpness, the exposed feet of the eager travellers. Few heeded the unevenness of the ground; and some, indeed, seemed stimulated, by the very dangers and difficulties of the way, to press forward with the greater determination.

A strange light, or rather twilight, pervaded the whole, striking on some of the stalactite formations with peculiar grandeur, revealing also very dark cavern-like recesses, where no light seemed to enter, and into which many fell headlong, breaking all their bones.

It was only when you placed yourself at a given angle, in a stream of light which flowed through an opening in the rock to the right, that you could properly discern the circumstances by which you were surrounded. So dim was the twilight, that you could scarce, unless at the angle spoken of, discern 'men from trees walking;' and, indeed, some of the more near-sighted did actually run against, and embrace with so much ardour, the rocky formations rising from the ground, that they were impaled thereby, leaving their bones as a beacon to all who after came that way.

Far above, and over the opening in the rock from which the continuous stream of light issued, and illuminated by the same light, were the following characters:

'ROCK OF AGES.'
'WHOSOEVER WILL MAY COME.'

The light streamed through the opening at right angles with the mass of the people, so that few, if any, could pass it without discovering from whence it proceeded, as well as discern the inscription over the entrance. Few, however, seemed at all to heed the matter, as a passing glance was all, for the most part, bestowed as they hurried onward.

I saw as I stood, that the opening emitting the light was in the form of a cross, and that close to its entrance stood 'One whose form was like unto the Son of man;' and ever and anon He cried to the footsore wayfarer, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.' But they made light of it; and I could hear the echo of the words, 'riches, honours, pleasures,' as they struck upon some rocky prominence, and were reflected back to the spot where I stood.

I saw also that a band of young men, in the prime of life and strength of manhood, came pressing up the hill, and their jocund laugh and pointed wit seemed to set all the ordinary difficulties of the way at defiance, as each vied with each to outstrip his fellow. But the face of Him who stood at the entrance of 'the way' grew troubled, and as they passed I heard Him soliloquizing, 'How often would I! but ye would not;' and then, with a voice that seemed to make not only the young men, but the whole, far and near, to tremble, and the very rock to vibrate, He cried aloud, 'Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God shall bring thee into judgment.' At the sound of which, all turned to behold the face of Him that cried. Some glanced so hastily, that they mistook the one who cried; others mistook not, but there was neither form, nor comeliness, nor beauty, that they could desire in Him; whilst a few stood lingering, hesitating until their companions, pointing them forward, reproachfully repeated the talisman of all their hopes, 'Riches, honours, pleasures!' at the sound of which, all, with one exception, rejoined their companions, and, with a hearty cheer, were soon lost in the crowd; whilst the one came straight up to the cross-like opening, stood for an instant only, and then with a bound passed through. I observed this peculiarity, that as he passed through, he seemed to fit the opening; his arms were extended in the openings or arms of the cross, whilst his head just fitted in the opening above the arms. (This also was the case with all that passed that way). I further observed that 'the way' was 'without shadow of a turning,' so that a right line could have been drawn from the cross-like entrance, which would terminate at the other extremity; and withal the way was 'narrow' throughout, yet such as presented a convenient walking space. In the case of the young man, he was soon lost to view, as he seemed to press on with supernatural vigour, as I could see by the company who pressed hard after him, endeavouring to keep pace with him.

I stood wondering, when lo! I was startled by the sound of voices in the distance, which I soon found proceeded from a great company, pressing on far in the narrow defile. It was the voice of praise, for I heard them sing:

'Jerusalem, my happy home!
Name ever dear to me;
When shall my labours have an end,
In joy and peace with thee?'

I saw that many in the narrow way occasionally stooped down, and that, as they arose, they held in their hands a peculiar phosphorescent light, which were rare gems, found only in the way of truth and righteousness, such as Faith, Hope, Charity; and as to the pearls that were therein discovered, they were pre-eminently pearls of great price.

I saw that it was only when the entrance end was reached that the travellers could rest secure. He who stood at the entrance was pleased to instruct the ignorant, and cheer those who arrived sick and faint. And for the encouragement of those who were timid, He said, 'Fear not, I am with you alway. Soon shall you hear the triumphal song of ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, saying, "Alleluia, Alleluia, worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing;"' and every hill and valley reflected and echoed the sound; and I exclaimed, Amen, amen! and awoke.

Reader, are you in the narrow way?

H. M.

'THE SABBATH BELLS.'

HOW pleasant it is to hear the church bells pealing forth so joyously and sweetly on a Sabbath morn! and it is still more so to see rich and poor, old and young, obeying this call to go to the house of God. But if it be so pleasant to see this, how sad it is to find so many idling about within hearing of the bells, and yet paying no attention, having no desire to attend their summons, to hear the word of God, praise Him for his past mercy, confess their sins, pray for pardon, and for health and strength to walk in the narrow way, and do what is pleasing in his sight! How many thoughts, both sad and pleasant, may the sound of the Sabbath bells bring to our minds! To what a variety of places is their music borne on the wind! Could they speak, what interesting accounts they would give us of the various ways their sweet music was received! How some listened with evident pleasure, yet did not seem to think the call was for them, but merely listened as they would to any other sound agreeable to the ear. Then they would tell of some who, laid upon beds of sickness, listened to them as to some loved familiar strain, and that their sad looks told how gladly they would obey their call were they able to do so; and perhaps they would add, that the sufferers comforted themselves under the loss of their prized hours in the sanctuary, by thinking of the Saviour's words: 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,' and other verses of consolation from the book of life; and those who attended them with anxious loving care, were reminded by them that their dear ones were in the hands of Him who doeth all things well, and that, after their sweet tones had ceased, strength, help, and comfort would be implored at the throne of grace for all who were sick or in trouble in many a sacred edifice. Then they would speak of some who set out gladly, and who seemed to go in the spirit of King David, when he said, 'I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go up into the house of the Lord;' and again, of some who went by mere habit, or for credit's sake. Yet, though the bells cannot thus speak to us, they may bring many thoughts of the past and present to our minds, which may be of benefit to us. When we think of the dark sad times of bygone ages, when few possessed the Bible, and many who did, and worshipped the one true God, were hunted from place to place, and, if captured, most cruelly treated to make them give up their religion, their Bible taken from them, and often they were put to death; the places where they assembled together to worship God were often amongst the mountains, or some lone hut, and often the service broken up by the approach of enemies to the cause of truth;—when we think of all this, and then turn to the present age, what a contrast presents itself! In our favoured land no one need be without a Bible, which they may read without fear of persecution.

I have read of some poor people in Belgium in the time just mentioned, who, having given a sum of money for a Bible, used to hide it during the day, and go into the woods, and there, by the light of their lantern, read the book which they felt was able to make them wise unto salvation; but it was soon taken from them, and they said they would rather have had their houses burned than have lost their precious book. Should not such accounts make us ask ourselves if we prize the Bible as they did, and also cause us to value it more and more when we think of what others suffer in its cause?

Then what a contrast Sabbaths are now, to what they once were! Now we hear the bells pealing forth from various places of worship, numbers of children going from Sabbath schools to their respective churches or chapels. Old and young, rich and poor, may also be seen hastening on their way to the house of prayer. What a difference is there, in this bright picture, to the Sabbath of past times! No sweet Sabbath bells, no children returning from the schools, and few sacred buildings open to receive those who wished to serve God, and hear his holy word. Ought we not to be very grateful for the privileges we enjoy, and our peaceful Sabbath-days? But if we do not love the Giver of these blessings, they will be of little value or use to us; for if we have no desire to serve God, Sabbath will be no holy happy day for us, but wearisome and dull. Yet we must remember we shall have to account for the precious Sabbath hours we have had given to us; and also, that if they are dull and uninteresting to us, heaven (even could we enter it with such a distaste for holy things) would be still more so, for there all is holy, the service and praise of God the constant and everlasting occupation of its blest inhabitants.

Reader, can you say with truth, in the words of the hymn:

'I love the soothing Sabbath bell,
I love the house of prayer?'

If you can, be thankful that you have learned, at least in some measure, the value and importance of religion and of the Sabbath hours; then may you increase in the knowledge of their value, and the consolation they can give, till you reach that land,

'Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths have no end.'

Readings for the Young.

LITTLE FOXES.

'TAKE us the foxes, the little foxes which destroy our vine; for our vine hath tender grapes.'

Softly, yet in solemn tones, the words fell on the ear of that little band of worshippers, as the good pastor closed the services of the day.

It was the communion Sabbath at Ruthven, and a motley group knelt around the table of the Lord, commemorating that one great sacrifice offered so long ago, when our redemption song rung out in the 'It is finished' of Calvary. Many there for the first time: young disciples standing on life's shadowy threshold in their bright gladsomeness, hearts glowing in fresh and holy love—they saw no cloud in the summer sky, no dark horizon in the dreamy distance; not yet entered on life's battle, they thought not of the coming struggles, only the victory which must follow. Others, aged saints, feeble and dim-eyed, worn with long years' conflict, as they waited on the very brink of Jordan till the Lord should call them hence, to be partakers of a heavenly banquet and a holier fellowship. Many there, too, weary souls, bearing the 'heat and burden of the day,' but seeking rest and refreshment by the green pastures and 'still waters' their Shepherd had provided for his often-times tired flock. In truth, a motley group, each having his own heart experience and feelings unexpressed, save to Him who knoweth the hearts of all, and lends a willing ear to our feeblest cry; but to every one came the solemnly repeated warning, 'Take us the foxes, the little foxes.'

They had heard that day of Jesus, the 'Bread of Life,' who, in his vicarious love, had given himself a 'living sacrifice' for his people, and now as our great High Priest, yet Brother man, intercedes in our behalf before his Father's throne. They had heard words of gentle encouragement and faithful exhortations. 'Be ye not conformed to the world,' but 'set your affections on things above.' 'Watch ye, and pray, lest ye enter into temptation. The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak.' Such had been the subjects of that day's thought,—words which glowed in fervid eloquence,—words from an earnest heart, pleading his Master's love and mission,—words sinking very deep in many a heart, afterwards, may we trust, to be as good seed springing up, and bearing fruit 'yet more abundantly.'

One among that assembly listened with thoughtful earnestness and mingled feelings. Nellie Raymond, as for the first time she came to the communion table, felt she was entering upon some new life, a holier, heavenlier atmosphere,—even that straight path leading to eternal life. Very solemn were the vows she had taken upon herself that day: covenanting with the Lord was no light thing, and this was a covenant for life and for death. Nellie thought of the future, and almost trembled. Her Saviour, indeed, was 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;' but—and Nellie tried to probe her own heart yet more deeply; poor child, she little knew its fathomless depths—would she ever forget?—forget Jesus in his wondrous love, her Father's watchful care and pity, the home 'afar off,' which made her now as a pilgrim journeying in a 'strange land?' Would she ever forget those communion vows of a holy life, separation from the world, a heart consecrated to the Lord, weaned from earth in its fixed affections heavenward? Would she ever disregard his precepts, or stray from the path she had chosen? 'My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed,' was the answer which came in the full assurance of self-confidence; but, Nellie, remember it is only when the Lord is at thy 'right hand' thou 'shalt not be moved.' Blessed are they who trust in Him.

It was but a short time since the Holy Spirit had quickened her lifeless soul, since she had sought Jesus; and having found Him, He was in very truth as the 'shadow of a great rock in a weary land,' even that Rock of Ages upon which she rested in 'quietness and assurance.' Now she thought any sacrifice must be easy, any burden light, that He could impose. There could be nothing to fear when Jesus was nigh: temptations would be overcome, trials borne without murmur, affections made holy when it was his will. Why all these warnings? 'Little foxes' could surely do no great harm to the vineyard of the Lord when the Great Keeper himself was near? Ah, Nellie! you have not yet learned the deceitfulness of your own heart, the weakness of self-confident resolutions, or the terrible power of sin. It is easy now, in the light of this hallowed communion, to resolve nothing will impede your onward course, nothing damp your love, or dim your faith and joy.

Wait a little. Return to the world, mingle in its busy throng, bear its taunting sneer or bitter reproach; wait till the hidden evil of your own heart, which now seems quenched so surely, rises rampant as before, when there are 'fears within, and fightings without, 'when crafty temptations assail, or heavy trial burdens you,—then you will learn the very nothingness of self; but, blessed be God, you may also learn the all-sufficiency of Christ.

The 'last soft light' of an April afternoon was shedding its quiet radiance, gilding the long dark ridge of hills with the farewell beams of the sinking sun, softening their rugged outline in the mellow light, and flickering golden darts on the thick-leaved forest, as the congregation dispersed to return to their own homes.

Wrapt in thought, Nellie walked home through the sweet green fields and shady lanes, now budding into summer beauty. She gazed on those golden bars spanning the broad blue vaults above, and their glorious vistas seemed a fitting entrance to the still more glorious mansions beyond. Nature seemed in such close unison with the spiritual, Nellie could have lingered long enough in those twilight musings. It was hard thus to descend from the mount of communion, to meet again the world's ceaseless strife and cares, and the impulsive heart longed for the 'wings of a dove,' to fly away and be at rest. But the race must be run ere the prize is gained, the battle fought ere the heavenly crown is won. Onward and upward we must go, till the goal is reached and the victory ours, till we enter the 'desired haven,' the land of eternal rest, where sorrow and sighing have fled away. 'Ah!' says one, speaking of the transfiguration, 'visions of heaven are not for every day. Duties await us all at the mountain foot; but Jesus in his meek humanity is with us still.' Yes, and a sweet sense of his presence cheered and strengthened the lonely girl. Trusting for Him, living for Him, life could not be aimless, death could not be terrible. And as the earnest prayer of Nellie's heart was, 'Draw me, O Lord, and I will run after Thee,' the song arose triumphant, 'My Beloved is mine, and I am his.'

It was a quiet summer night, only the soft moaning sound of the faint breeze, as it rustled through the thick shrubs and fanned the closing flowers, broke the hushed stillness, except, indeed, some last note of the bird's good-night song, as it rose sweet and clear to the dim sky above. Nellie Raymond sat by the open casement, as if unwilling to leave the fair scene, and forgetful of the fast falling night. Yet the troubled brow and dreamy eyes told of thoughts far distant. Unheeded, the wind tossed the heavy curls, and the gathered flowers, now almost withering, fell carelessly on the floor. Ah, Nellie! those dreams of yours play mischief with quick flying time; but was she solving some question of right or wrong, as the unconscious murmur fell?

'No! no! I cannot,—not even to please Harry.'

Her reverie was interrupted by a hand laid on her shoulder.

'Well, Nellie! wrapt in a brown study?'

She started and smiled. 'I believe I was.'

'Discussing by yourself all the pros and cons of this grand ball, eh?'

'I am not going, Harry.'

'Nonsense, little sister,' said her brother gaily. 'Why, what's the harm?'

'Dear Harry, I said so before. I cannot think it consistent to reconcile it with other principles. Indeed, I should not be happy,' yet she wavered as she spoke.

'If you won't go, Nellie, neither shall I. Come now, just yield this once to please me.'

After all, the temptation was very strong, and again she hesitated. Quick as thought a thousand excuses presented themselves, linked not quite coherently with each other. Was it really wrong? Many good people went to balls. Even those she knew to be professing Christians countenanced such-like amusements. Might not she too? And then it would disappoint Harry! Perhaps she ought to go, when it was not to please self, but gratify her brother. (Ah! such unselfishness is very easy.) Yes, she thought, just this once she might yield the point. To Harry it might seem as if religion brought only gloominess and self-will. So Nellie reasoned, forgetting the one light, the one joy which rejoiceth the heart, the great 'mark' for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Skilful sophistries, they were 'little foxes' in disguise.

'Why, Nellie,' exclaimed her brother, wondering at the continued silence, 'what are you looking so grave about? Do you always give such very solemn consideration to mere trifles? Surely this is a very little thing?'

Little things! little foxes! Oh! what a tide of recollections these words recalled! Three short months ago since those holy vows were spoken, that covenant ratified by the table of the Lord, those resolutions so firm and stedfast determined upon; and now, almost drifted already on the strand of temptation; the warning then thought so needless, now almost forgotten. Where now all her resolutions?—broken, marred, nearly cast aside! Nellie bowed her head in meek contrition, and as the bitter tears of self-reproach sprang to the dark eyes, her decision was made.

'It is just those little things, dear Harry,' she said very gently, 'that we must watch against. It may seem to you but a trifle. You think a little conformity to the world but a small point to yield, yet our Saviour's command is, "Come ye out and be separate," and I dared not disobey.'

Harry Raymond's face clouded darkly.

'Once, Nellie, it was different; once you had, at least, some regard for my wishes,' and coldly turning away, he left the room.

Poor Nellie! those quick words left a stinging sorrow behind, and the reproach seemed almost cruel. What if she had judged harshly, wrongly? Surely she could never be called upon to sacrifice Harry's love?—that thought was unbearable. After long years of absence, her only brother had returned to his early home; and though the visit promised to be but a brief one, Nellie's heart was very full of joy. Cherished hopes and sweet dreams now realized; for in the presence of this much-loved and loving brother, Nellie had her deepest earthly gladness.

Since childhood, when left lonely orphans, Harry had watched over and guarded his little sister with such brave honour and generous love as suited a mature age; and very reluctantly had he placed the tender flower in other, though kindly hands, to seek a home so far distant. Very amply was his affection repaid; absence could not chill the loving sister-heart; but now, though dear as ever, ay, dearer, Nellie had found a higher, holier Friend, He who, 'sticking closer than a brother,' claims our first obedience and purest love. This she knew, indeed; but the blighting shadow of disappointment fell heavily on the bright young life, and those first unkind words from a brother's lips caused a flood of unrestrainable tears. Stay, Nellie! little sister, remember, 'Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him.'

A little longer, and Harry had again left, on his return to India. The parting had a keener pang to Nellie, for as yet there was no evidence that her brother was a child of God. True, the sneer was not so frequent when she spoke of the gospel's blessed truth, and endeavoured to persuade him to seek the Saviour he so proudly rejected. He at least respected her conscientious scruples, as he called them; and though no heart change was apparent, Nellie could only hope and pray.

'Perhaps it is for the best after all,' she thought. 'I was relying too much on my own efforts for his conversion, independent of the Holy Spirit's aid, and the Lord is just teaching me that He alone has power to change the heart.'

Ah, Nellie, take courage! In that humble self-distrustful spirit, in that meek submission to thy heavenly Father's will, believing 'He doeth all things well,' a great victory is gained. The 'little foxes' are taken 'captive,' and the 'tender' vine is yet upright.

'Letters from India! Here, dear Nellie, is your portion,' and Cousin Kate joyfully throws a great bundle into Nellie's waiting hands. Oh, how eagerly it is received, and how impatiently the seal is broken!

'Letters from India!' is echoed everywhere, and the whole household brightens under the glad tidings, for Harry Raymond is beloved by all, and they have not heard from him for many long months. But has sorrowful news only come? Nellie's tears flow thick and fast, blotting the delicate Indian paper, as again and again she pressed it to her quivering lips. No, they are not tears of sorrow, but of joy,—such intense, holy, unspeakable joy, as moves the angels of heaven over one sinner who repenteth.

Here is an extract which tells its own tale:

'And now I must say what I know will give my own dear sister great joy, Nellie, your prayers (for I know you prayed) have been answered. Now, in all humility, yet surest confidence, I can say, "I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." What this great dawning of light has been I cannot describe,—"the Sun of Righteousness arising with healing on his wings;" but in his wondrous love and mercy, God had indeed led me by paths I knew not of, that in the end He might bring me unto himself. You will probably ask, Whence this change? Well, first of all, Nellie, I trace it, under God's blessing, to the influence of your own life. When I saw my little sister denying herself, overcoming temptation, pleasing Christ rather than others, seeking in all things to glorify God,—in truth, striving to live a holy, consistent, Christian life,—I knew religion could be no vague, weak sentiment, or covert hypocrisy, as I supposed it. But there was a heart struggle, not easily overcome; for long I was too proud to yield, too much wrapt up in my own code of self-righteousness, till Jesus brought me to the foot of the cross, sore stricken and self-abased, that He might say to my sin-stained soul, "Arise, thy sins are forgiven thee." And now, pray for me, dear Nellie, "that He which begun a good work" in me so unworthy, may "perform it until the day of Jesus Christ."'

Little wonder Nellie wept as she knelt in the lonely darkening twilight; and a great cry went up to her Father in heaven, a cry of deep and holy gratitude, a prayer breathed from an overflowing heart, yet in all meekness she murmured, 'Not unto me, O Father, not unto me, but unto thyself be all the glory.'

And her joy was not unshared. Tears rose to the old minister's eyes, as, letter in hand, Nellie told the joyous tidings, and the story of the 'little foxes.'

'Give God the glory, my child,' he said gently, as he laid his trembling hand on her girlish head, 'and go on thy way, striving in his strength to overcome. "Seek, sinner-like, distrust in self, and childlike trust in Jesus." This is the victory which overcometh the world, and taketh captive the "little foxes."' M. S.

---

WHAT DO YOUR CHILDREN READ?

A LAD of sixteen lay upon his deathbed. A wasting consumption was slowly but surely doing its fatal work. He was a former pupil of mine. I approached his bedside, took him by the hand, and gazed a moment on his thin, emaciated form, pale, hollow cheeks, and sunken eyes—all telling me that his sojourn on earth must be brief.

'How are you to-day, Arthur?' I asked.

'About as usual,' he replied.

'Do you suffer much lying here?'

'Sometimes I suffer a good deal, especially from difficulty in breathing.'

'Do you think you will get well?'

'No, sir.'

'Would you like to get well?'

'It makes but little difference with me whether I do or not.'

'Does the thought of approaching death give you any anxiety or alarm?'

'I have no fears nor care about it.'

'Do you feel willing to die?'

'I have wished I were dead a hundred times since I have been sick, to get rid of my sufferings.'

'What is your hope for the future?'

'I do not concern myself at all about the future.'

Afterwards I asked him if I should pray.

'I do not care, if you want to pray,' he replied.

In two or three days he died. His father made this remark in my hearing: 'My son lies in yonder cemetery—an INFIDEL—from the effects of novel reading!'

Parents, what do your children read?

THE STILL MOUTH.

A WORTHY pastor of a neighbouring church was telling me of a matter of contention among his people. There was great excitement and much bitter discussion. I was acquainted with many of the members of his church; and among them was a lady of superior education, excellent judgment, and humble piety. So I very naturally inquired, 'What does Mrs. —— say?' 'Oh,' he replied, 'Mrs. —— is a still-mouthed little woman, and takes no part in the controversy, though we all know that she is on the right side.' How wise, how pleasant to be silent, and yet to be so consistent, so ready in every good word and work, as to be known to be on the right side!

A still-mouthed person will never slander, never misrepresent us;. will never use harsh, denunciatory tones in speaking of one whose views do not exactly accord with his own. There may be times and occasions when it may be well to speak out; but, as a people, we are in far greater danger of saying too much than too little.

How often, during the last twelve months, have I listened with intense disgust to excited denunciations of the proceedings of many of our public men, and have thought, How much wiser to be silent, how much more reasonable to 'wait and see!'

Well-timed silence hath more eloquence than speech. Do our children come to us, clamouring for some forbidden indulgence? a still mouth and kindly glance may reprove them more effectually than many words.

The 'wise man' assures us, 'that whoso keepeth his mouth and his tongue, keepeth his soul from troubles.' Still-mouthed! The sweet Psalmist of Israel must have known the importance of this excellence when he resolved: 'I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue; I will keep my mouth with a bridle.' 'I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress.' And Peter, while earnestly exhorting us, says: 'He that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile.'—Congregationalist.

THE SWEETEST WORD.

ONE sweet word of holy meaning
Cometh to me o'er and o'er,
And the echoes of its music
Linger ever—evermore.
Trust—no other word we utter
Can so sweet and precious be,
Tuning all life's jarring discords
Into heavenly harmony!

Clouds of thickest blackness gathered
O'er my soul's dark sea of sin,
And the port of heaven was guarded
From my guilty entering in;
Then came Jesus, walking to me
O'er the surging waves of sin,
Calling, clear above the tempest,
'He that trusteth, heaven shall win!'

Now, through all the sacred pages,
Where my woe and doom had been,
Gleam those golden words of promise,
'He that trusteth, heaven shall win!'

Blessed, sure, and blood-bought promise,
Let me drink its sweetness in;
He that trusts his soul to Jesus,
'He that trusteth, heaven shall win!'

Trust—O Saviour! give its fulness
To me at thy feet in prayer;
Grant my dying lips to breathe it,
Leave its lingering sweetness there,—
Sweetness there, to stay the breaking
Of the hearts which love me so;
Whispering from my silent coffin,
'Trust the hand which lays me low!'

Loved ones, as ye rear the marble,
Pure above my waiting dust,
Grave no other word upon it
But the holiest, sweetest—TRUST;
For this password know the angels,
Guarding o'er the pearly door,—
Password to his blessed presence,
Whom I trust for evermore.

—Herbert Newbury.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'They took no oil with them.'—MATT. XXV.

THIS parable has many sides and aspects. It is prophetical; it is also practical. It suits all ages, but especially the last days. It suits the world, but specially the church of God: 'If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?' It is searching and sifting; it is also quickening and comforting. It suits us well in these days of profession and fashionable religion or religiousness.

It divides the church into two classes,—the wise and the foolish;—wise in God's sight, not man's; foolish in God's sight, not man's. Thus, it is not a parable for the heathen, as if they only were foolish; nor for the profligate, as if they only were foolish; nor for the infidels, as if they only were foolish; but for the church. It comes into the inner circle of Christian profession, and sifts it, divides it. Let it sift us and test us. Better to be weighed and found wanting now, than hereafter. Better to be undeceived now than when it is too late. Let us notice:

I. The points of likeness between the two classes.—(1) They get the same name, virgins; (2) They wear the same dress; (3) They are on the same errand; (4) They have both lamps; (5) They have both vessels; (6) They both slumber and sleep. They have thus many features in common. Man could not discern the difference, at least for the time. The peril of a mere externalism is that which our Lord points out here. No doubt, there must be externalism. Religion must have an outside as well as inside. The lamp must not only have oil, but it must burn: the external must indicate the internal. And, we may say, that our Lord intimates the necessity of a thorough consistency and completeness in the outward religious life of a man, so that, as a fair external is no excuse for internal unsoundness or incompleteness, so a sound internal is no excuse for an inconsistent life. Our Lord then here depicts: (1) A complete externalism; (2) A beautiful externalism; (3) A deceptive externalism; (4) A prolonged externalism; (5) An unavailing externalism. Up to a certain point in a man's life, or character, or religion, externalism may avail; but beyond that, it gives way; it breaks down; it exhibits its unprofitableness. This externalism may not always be hypocrisy, but it is imitation. It is not the flower, in its natural colour and growth, but painted,—artificial. Let us watch against an artificial life, and an artificial religion. What does it profit now? what will it profit in the day of wrath? The name, the dress, the lamp, the outward show, will all go for nothing in the day of universal discovery and detection.

II. The points of unlikeness.—Though in most respects they were all alike; yet there was a difference. It was within; it was imperceptible from without; it could only be discovered when the Bridegroom came. Up till then, all were completely similar. Only then the want came out in the foolish. Then was it seen who were wise and who were foolish. That day is the day of certain and unerring detection. It is the day of weighing in the balances! It is the separation of the false from the true.

The difference was confined to a single point,—the lack of oil. Some have supposed that the foolish took oil in their lamps, but not in their vessels. It appears, however, that they did neither. The lamps were not required to be lighted till the bridegroom came; and so the oil was not poured in, nor the wick inserted till then. For it was at midnight that the cry was made; and then all the virgins arose and trimmed their lamps, that is, supplied them with the wick and oil, and lighted them. Then it was that the foolish discovered, (1) Their need of oil; (2) Their lack of it; then they went to the wise to beg a supply; then they (being wisely refused) went to buy and returned too late. There was 'oil in the dwelling of the wise' (Prov. xxi. 20); but the foolish were without it.

The oil is the Holy Spirit. To oil He is likened throughout all Scripture,—though in some places to fire, and to water, and to wind or air. There is the oil of consecration (Ex. xxx. 25); of daily food (1 Kings xvii. 12); of fragrance (Est. ii. 12); of joy (Ps. xlv.; Isa. lxi. 3); of healing (Luke x. 34); of light (Zech. iv. 12). The Holy Spirit is all these. But it is as the light-giving oil that He is specially spoken of here; and the lack of Him, as such, makes the difference between the foolish and the wise,—'having not the Spirit' (Jude ver. 19).

Thus a man may be very like a Christian, and yet not be one. He may come very near to the kingdom, and yet not enter in. He may have all the outward features of a Christian, and be lacking in the main one. He may have the complete dress of the saint, and yet not be one. He may have a good life, a sound creed, a strict profession; he may be one who says and does many things excellent; he may be a subscriber to all the religious societies in the land, a member of all their committees, or a speaker at all their meetings, and supporter of all their plans; he may profess to be looking for Christ's coming, and going forth to meet the Bridegroom, yet not necessarily a Christian. He may lack the oil—the Holy Spirit.

A religion without the Holy Ghost profiteth nothing. There is the religion of the intellect, of the sense, of the fancy, of the flesh, of the creed, of the liturgy, of the catechism, of nature, of poetry, of sentiment, of mysticism, of humanity,—but what are these without the Spirit? Christianity without Christ; what would that be? Worship, without God; what would that be? So religion without the Holy Spirit; what would that be?

Yet, is there not much of this among us? Is there not much of dry formalism, lifeless doctrine, sapless routine? I do not call it hypocrisy; I simply call it unreal religion.

And what can unreal religion do for a man? Will it not prove irksome and vain? Will it make him happy, or free, or liberal, or zealous, or holy? No; it can do none of these things. It is bondage, and darkness, and weariness.

Yet, here is the Holy Spirit, in the hands of Christ for you. Go to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. Not to men, or churches, or creeds, or ministers, but to Christ. Go to Him. He is exalted to give it; and He will. Apply to Him, ere it be too late.

THE SPIRIT HELPING OUR INFIRMITIES.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

ROMANS VIII. 26, 27.

THIS is the Holy Ghost. We have here an affecting view of our indebtedness to Him. What are the infirmities which He is here said to help? Certainly not the infirmities of the flesh or old nature. That is indeed all infirmity and incapacity for good; but the Spirit does not help it. On the contrary, He wars against it, mortifies it, seeks to destroy it. It is the infirmities of the spiritual nature, the new creature, that the Spirit helps. You say, 'How can infirmity attach to that? Is it not born of God? is it not spirit, sinless and holy?' Yes; but still it is comparatively weak and infirm. Think of Christ Jesus, the Holy One of God. At first He was a babe, with all the sinless infirmity and weakness connected with that stage of life. He had to grow in wisdom, and stature, and strength. He had 'to learn obedience by the things which He suffered.' And so with the new creature, which is born of the Spirit, which is Christ formed in the soul—Christ dwelling in the heart by faith. At first it is, from the very nature of things, weak and infirm, and so unable, without special help, to contend successfully with its many enemies. The world seeks to distract and harass it with cares, and fears, and multitude of business, and thus to keep it away from God and heavenly things. God's people feel this, and cry for help: 'My soul cleaveth to the dust; quicken Thou me according to thy word.'

Look at a babe: it has not yet full knowledge; it does not know what it really needs; and, left to itself, would often ask improper or hurtful things. So it is with God's little ones: they know not fully their sins, wants, dangers, duties. They are often at fault as to the matter, and manner, and times of prayer. They often do not ask when they should, and very often they ask amiss. Elijah prayed that he might die. How much would he and the church of God have lost if his request had been granted! Paul wanted to have his thorn in the flesh removed. How different his career and end might have been, if his wish had been complied with! God's little ones do not know what their Father is able and willing to do for them. His thoughts are not as our thoughts. 'As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his thoughts higher than our thoughts, and his ways than our ways.' When at any time the light regarding this breaks in upon them, they cry in admiration: 'Is this the manner of man, O Lord God?' Sometimes they are so oppressed and overwhelmed by their troubles and fears that they cannot speak; they can only sigh and groan. As Hezekiah says, 'They chatter as a swallow, and make a noise.' But again, there are two things in the promises of God: there are the blessings promised, and there are the times or seasons when He has purposed to bestow them. He has his set times and seasons, but He keeps these in his own power. In their ignorance, God's people often seek things before the time; they shake the tree before the fruit is ripe, and so they are often disappointed and discouraged. They need some one, who knows the mind of God, to prompt and guide them in this matter, and to send them to their knees in fulness of hope and assurance, when the Lord is about to arise and have mercy upon them.

How does the Spirit help these infirmities of God's little ones? His help is always ready, suitable, sufficient. He has a parental interest in them. They are his own production; they are born of the Spirit. He dwells in them, never leaves them, and so is ever near to help and guide them. He keeps or garrisons their souls; He is in them as a well of living water; He is the enemy of their enemies. Does the world seek to oppress them, with its fears, cares, pleasures, and multitudinous, importunate demands upon their time and thoughts? the Spirit brings before them heavenly things, shows them things to come. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit;' and so the snare is broken. They look no longer at the things which are seen; and they get the victory over this present evil world. They say, 'The lines have fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.' They no longer grudge and envy the prosperity of the wicked; they rather pity and pray for them. You see this in Asaph. His feet were almost gone, his steps had well-nigh slipped, as he looked on the irregularities and paradoxes of providence. But he went into the sanctuary of God, the Spirit helped him, and all was changed. He cries, 'This is my infirmity: surely Thou hast set them in slippery places; they are as a dream of the night.' Does Satan seek to oppress or beguile God's people? the Spirit puts his sword into their hand, suggests or brings to remembrance some seasonable word, and the enemy flies. Look at Jesus; He goes in the power of the Spirit, and hence his mighty works, and weighty convincing words. He says to his disciples, 'It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of my Father that speaketh in you.' Do the lusts of the flesh war against the soul,—discontent, selfishness, impatience, unbelief? the Spirit produces the opposite graces,—meekness, patience, gentleness, temperance, faith, love. God's people thankfully acknowledge this. They say, 'In the day when I cried, Thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul.' Thus Christ fulfils his promise: 'My grace is sufficient for thee.'

But more especially the Spirit helps in prayer. He shows us our state and character; opens up more and more our sinfulness, dangers, ceaseless wants, and thus stirs up confessions, supplications, and crying, often with tears. He knows and reveals the good things of God. He took part in the counsel of peace, and knows all the blessings of the covenant. He knows the promises, for He dictated the very words by which they are revealed to us. He knows the Son, and all his benefits. Hence the Apostle Paul prays 'that we may be strengthened with might by the Spirit in the inner man, that we may know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that we may be filled with all the fulness of God.' He sets the things of God before us in their reality, power, and sweetness, and thus stirs us up to seek them with earnestness and perseverance. He knows the set times to favour, the acceptable seasons, and can make us feel that we shall not have long to wait; and so we pray with more fervour and assurance. Sometimes He produces desires that are too great for utterance. The emotions are too big to find expression in human language. The channel is too narrow and shallow to give vent to all that fills and swells the heart. Elijah speaks not at Carmel, yet it is effectual, fervent prayer. Jacob speaks not at Jabbok till he has conquered. He wrestles silently, till his seeming adversary cries, 'Let me go,' then he speaks. Hannah's lips moved, but she uttered no words.

Such Spirit-prompted, Spirit-guided, Spirit-helped prayer, is always successful. Though it is often only groans, and sighs, and inarticulate moanings, yet God hears, and knows, and grants its requests. 'The Spirit himself maketh intercession for us, with groanings which cannot be uttered: and He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God.' God's children often feel ashamed of these incoherent, broken cries, these chirpings as a sparrow; but they are, perhaps, their most effectual prayers,—humbling to the flesh, but honouring to the Spirit. How condescending it is in the Holy Ghost to make us his organs and instruments in expressing those deep, earnest, everlasting desires for redemption, which are common to Him with the Father and the Son! What an encouragement it is! what a consolation! He is willing now thus to use us. Are you not apt to forget his personality, and the interest He takes in the things of salvation? Let Him, and He will make you Israels,—powerful with God, and so powerful with man. Let Him lead you through Jesus into the presence-chamber, and there help your infirmity, and you will return with your heart cheered, your face shining, to become blessings to all you meet.

Does not this also show the benefit and power of social prayer? Christ says, 'If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father who is in heaven.' Here it is not the Spirit in one, but in many; it is the unity of the Spirit, separate souls brought to oneness of accord; it is a triumph of grace; it is the meeting of many fires, which kindle and inflame one another, and so blaze up to heaven in holy ardour and devotion. There is no prayer without Christ, the only way to the Father. But there is also no true prayer without the Holy Ghost. All is cold, dead, and formal, when He is not in it. How poor and empty all is, when it is only strange fire, the excitement of the flesh! We should be very careful not to grieve, vex, quench the Spirit of grace and supplication. We too often suffer the blessed fire to smoulder and be overlaid. Hence arises disinclination and inability to pray. We can hardly drag ourselves to the mercy-seat; and when there, we have no liberty and enlargement, no lively hope and fulness of assurance. 'Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving.' Keep the fire always burning. Improve occasions and opportunities for prayer; let them not slip heedlessly, thoughtlessly by. They will be constantly occurring in the grace and providence of God; watch for them, and diligently use them, in spite of the world, the flesh, and the devil. Seize them as the miner seizes the lumps of gold, and you will become fast rich unto eternal life. Your holy zeal and fervour will touch many a conscience; your 'Come, let us pray,' will stir up many a sleeper; while the supplication that follows will bring down the blessing from on high.

THE INDIAN MERCHANT.*

WE transcribe portions of Robert Brown's correspondence, written, as in former years, during fragments of time snatched from his busy life, and with a rapidly flowing pen :—

'BOMBAY, 25*th January* 1853.

'MY DEAREST ———,—You know the prejudices of caste are strong here. Well, we lately turned off the office tiffin boy, owing to the large quantity of soda water unaccounted for (but doubtless stolen and sold); and not intending to get any other in his place, we requested one of the sepoys (chaps that go messages) to bring the tiffin up to the office and put it on the table; but nothing would prevail on them to do this. To carry a basket which contained beef or mutton was the essence of pollution; and they would rather lose their place than become defiled. So the coachman, a man of a lower caste, has to do this degrading office; and the other day, when he was away, Messrs. Hunter, Brown, and Ryrie had to put the tiffin on the table themselves, showing that the prejudices of caste are not strong enough with them to overcome the love of tiffin.

'We had a nice party on Monday evening. I had some interesting talk with Mylne, chiefly about prayer. He says, "If I am a child of God, I have a right to take every finger ache (the smallest thing) to Him;" and spoke of the importance of doing everything with a reference to the will of God; also of realizing our adoption, and need, at the same time, of constantly applying the blood of Christ to the conscience. On these two last points I am sadly backward, but particularly the latter; consequently, I am often burdened with a sense of sin, which should not be, if all the guilt has actually been washed away. By constantly looking unto Jesus, however, I hope to attain this; for I am sure we have declarations enough in the Bible to prove that God wants us to have a full sense of forgiveness, and to feel assured that all our sins are completely put away. It is a great thing to practise faith on the simple words of God, because there is a day not far off, dear, when we shall probably lose all our evidences entering the dark valley; and if we can only then fold up in our bosom some promise that we have lived upon, and proved in our journey through the wilderness, we shall be able to cling with a firmer grasp to the rod and staff of the promises when we are about to cross the swelling of Jordan. I can easily fancy dear Evans, who was so nervous on his deathbed that he could not bear the sound of any one's voice, having his bed curtains hung round with Scripture texts, so that whichever way he turned, he might be reminded that his heavenly Father had not forgotten him.' . . .

Among the many friends he so easily attached to himself through life, none held a higher place in his estimation than the devoted missionary referred to in the following letter. As he still lives and labours in Bombay, we forbear to indulge in well-merited eulogium, simply remarking that Mr. Bowen is an American missionary who has literally given up all for Christ. His labours among the heathen are abundant, and they are emphatically labours of love, unrequited and unacknowledged by any earthly society, since he prefers to give his services without fee or reward, living upon a few rupees a month, and thereby removing one argument from the mouth of the heathen, who are slow to allow the disinterestedness of their religious teachers. Robert owed much, as he frequently acknowledged, to the high standard and deep spiritual views of this Christian brother, whose appreciation of his character, on the other hand, was also very high. In a letter received since his death, Mr. Bowen writes, 'I have known many good men in Bombay, but none like him.'

'BOMBAY, 22*d February* 1853.

'. . . I shall begin by telling you that we had Bowen dining with us last night, and I only wish some reporter had been behind the scene, to take a note of his "droppings," for I feel sure they were far more precious than the worthy Mr. W.'s. Let me try and recall one or two of his remarks, as they float on the surface of my memory. . . .

'I think I have before told you of Bowen's advice in studying Scripture,—to take a verse or two at a time, and ponder them, returning to the expressions again and again, when they are driven out of the mind. And in regard to the sufferings of our Lord, B. remarked that the account of them is wonderfully detailed—every little particular dwelt upon. He instanced the verse, "And they took Him and scourged Him," as affording abundant food for meditation,—the glory of the person thus roughly seized, then the ignominy and disgrace of the punishment, and the suffering of it. Let us try this plan, dear, and give up the old one of reading a chapter or so in the mornings. We shall get more food, I am sure, by taking a verse and carrying it about with us during the day. Another remark of Bowen's was, that the thing that gives dignity to one's existence, is the knowledge that so great and glorious a being as God is interested in us, and to such a marvellous extent that He never leaves us for a moment, but gives us every breath that we draw, keeping us as the apple of his eye. What unbelief ever to doubt his love, when He has given such assurances of it! and given us, besides, the greatest pledge Omnipotence could offer that He loves us better than we do ourselves.

* From a striking and stirring memoir, entitled Passages in the Life of an Indian Merchant; being Memorials of Robert Brown. Compiled by his Sister, HELEN COLVIN. London: J. Nisbet and Co. 1866.

'Oh, I wish you had been with us last night. You would have been elevated when listening to Bowen discoursing on these wondrous themes,—a meek, lowly, despised man; but oh, how happy! living in that miserable hut in the Bazaar, holding converse with his God. Hunter is greatly enamoured of him, the more so because he is very musical. Last night, before going away, he played an accompaniment on the piano to Hunter's violoncello, "Weep not for Sorrow." You need not be surprised if you hear of both of us taking up our quarters with Bowen in the Bazaar at Rs.10 a month! I wonder what —— would say! We must try and see more of the dear man, for his society is most improving, and I know not when I have relished an evening so much. Still, we must watch against creature-worship, and bear in mind that Bowen, and C., and M., and N., are only reflectors, in a most imperfect degree, of the glory of Christ. They are but candles: He is the sun. Let us seek more acquaintance with Him, and in close and intimate communion, make known all our requests by prayer and thanksgiving. What encouragement have we to do so! He says to us: "The companions hearken to thy voice; cause me to hear it;" and again: "Let me hear thy voice, for sweet is thy voice." Wondrous words! but the Song abounds with such, and I am only now beginning to find it out. Let us drink deep into the spirit of this love-song, and ever listen to the Bridegroom's voice, opening the interview, "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away;" "These things have I spoken unto you, that your joy may be full;" and again: "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name; ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full."

'Poor C. H.'s case is a very sad one. It is part of the "tribulation" she must pass through, for it must be bitter experience indeed to see those she loves hurrying to destruction. Here, though, she can surely realize the sympathy of Jesus. Pray give her my very kind love, and ask her to study Rom. viii. 32. She will now get some new light on that passage. We have all some cross to bear, some trial to suffer. Mine is an evil heart, which has been making some fearful discoveries lately of its depravity. . . .

'You have chosen a good motto to commence the year with, and one that used to be a good deal before my mind. Now, I look more to the words of Jesus himself: "Let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice." "Eat, O friends, drink abundantly, O beloved." As M'Cheyne says, "We can't put greater dishonour on the master of a feast, when a grand banquet is spread before us, than being content with a few crumbs under the table; yet is not this the way we treat the Saviour? Oh, how much we lose by not asking! Let us take God at his word more than we have hitherto done."

'I must now be looking out for something to read to the Parelle people to-morrow morning. I am thankful to say I have been somewhat stirred up of late, and have had some real delight in prayer and study of the Bible, particularly the Song of Solomon. I would fain sit under the shadow of Christ, and find his fruit sweet to my taste, having the banner of love spread over me, and drinking out of his fulness. I seem never to have drunk yet. True, I have come; but He says, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." Oh, let us obey the invitation, and enter into very close fellowship with Jesus. He invites us, assuring us that "we are in the clefts of the rock." We should not be much troubled with doubts, if we were on such terms as these with the Judge."

CHARITY.

On no quality in the Christian's character do there exist ideas so erroneous as on charity. To be generous is not always to be charitable, but often to be uncharitable. Charity must not be measured by its profuseness, but by its judiciousness. There are few blessings which may not become curses by being perverted; nor is charity an exception. The refusal of a favour may seem unkind; but to grant it may be still unkinder. The stern denial may be interpreted as springing from an unfeeling and unkind heart; but is often the dictate of one wiser than our own, and of one who saw more charity in the denial than in the concession. If by being profuse in charity indigence is only engendered, it does but sap the tree it was intended to support, and create wants it was intended to relieve. On the other hand, by a discriminating carefulness in the distribution of charity, what suffering may be relieved, what care softened, what sorrow lightened! If by holding out the timely hand, by the kindly encouraging voice, one struggling though unfortunate pilgrim, who has sunk beneath the burden of accumulating misfortunes, is again enabled to proceed on his journey, then indeed has charity achieved a triumph. To help the struggling, to strengthen the weak, to aid the willing, is the true object of charity; but charity misplaced only fosters indigence. There is yet another thing to be observed in charity—it must be assisted by prayer. Little is the use of giving—little is the use, indeed, of judicious giving—unless it is the result of an heartfelt sympathy with suffering, and not the mere mechanical giving which is the result of habit. Charity must be sincere: it must be given not because we think we are doing an action which will merit applause in this world and reward in the next. No, readers, such is not charity. It must be accompanied by prayer—prayer that our feeble efforts in the alleviation of suffering may be assisted by Him who, in his incomprehensible wisdom, thinks fit to wound; and who, in his boundless mercy, may think fit to heal. Reader, think before you give, and pray when you have given.

WITTY PREACHERS.

THERE is a class of preachers—we hope it is a small one—who come within the descriptive line of Cowper, of those 'who court a grin where they should woo a soul;' aiming to say amusing and funny things to move the risibles of their auditors, seemingly forgetful that their vocation is something far more serious than this. A careful study of the ministerial epistles of Paul would fail to discover any directions on the value of securing attention by keeping an audience in jolly good humour. Paul himself was a model minister in matter and manner. We hear of his earnest exhortation and persuasion—of his consuming self-sacrifice and zeal—of his weeping and tears while beseeching sinners; but never of his effort to make his hearers laugh. He had too awful a sense of his responsibility in delivering his message, which was to prove a savour of life or death to others, and of his anxiety to be free from the blood of all men. But where do we hear of his studied attempts to amuse? He habitually remembered the ministry of his Master, who wept over the incorrigible, and was even occasionally angry at their obstinate unbelief, without once being jocose or comical. The discovery was left to more modern times to visit an infirmary in a merry mood, that the diseased and dying might be diverted from their real condition. If there is a 'time to laugh,' it is certainly not in the sanctuary, or when sacred and momentous truths are to be enforced on the attention of dying sinners. Make merry over the prodigal returned, if you will; it is out of place while he is spending his substance in riotous living. A bishop should be gravely in earnest, whether he occupies the pulpit or platform; serious while he handles serious things; and tremble at the thought of putting sinners into good humour with him or themselves by the outflowings of an eccentric wit. What! it may be said, would you recommend ministers to be stupid in the pulpit? Surely this is not the alternative. He that would be in danger of becoming stupid in fulfilling God's solemn embassy to dying men, in a solemn way, may possibly have mistaken his vocation altogether.

THE FOOTSTEPS OF DECAY.

OH! let the soul its slumbers break,
Arouse its senses, and awake
To see how soon
Life, in its glories, glides away,
And the stern footsteps of decay
Come stealing on.

And while we view the rolling tide,
Down which our flowing minutes glide
Away so fast,
Let us the present hour employ,
And deem each future dream a joy
Already past.

Let no vain hope deceive the mind;
No happier let us hope to find
To-morrow than to-day.
Our golden dreams of yore were bright;
Like them the present shall delight—
Like them decay.

Our lives like hastening streams must be,
That into one engulfing sea
Are doomed to fall,—
The sea of death, whose waves roll on O'er king and kingdom, crown and throne,
And swallow all.

Alike the river's lordly tide,
Alike the humble rivulets glide
To that sad wave!
Death levels poverty and pride,
And rich and poor sleep side by side
Within the grave.

Our birth is but a starting-place;
Life is the running of the race,
And death the goal.
There all our glittering toys are brought;
That path alone, of all unsought,
Is found of all.

See, then, how poor and little worth
Are all those glittering toys of earth
That lure us here;
Dreams of a sleep that death must break:
Alas! before it bids us wake,
We disappear.

Long ere the damp of death can blight,
The cheek's pure glow of red and white
Has passed away.
Youth smiled, and all was heavenly fair;
Age came, and laid his finger there;
And where are they?

Where is the strength that spurned decay,
The step that roved so light and gay,
The heart's blithe tone?
The strength is gone, the step is slow,
And joy grows wearisome; and woe
When age comes on!

—From the Spanish.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

SABBATH HYMN.

Words by Horatius Bonar, D.D. Music from Dr. Miller.

Met. 80 = ♩
Treble.
Alto.
Tenor.
Bass.
Accomp.
Glo - ry to the glo - rious One, Good and Glo - ry to the glo - rious One, Good and great, our God a - lone, Who this day hath glo - ri-great, our God a - lone,

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

-fied, First and best of all be - side, Mak - ing it for Mak - ing it for ev - y clime, Of all times the sweet - est time.
ev - 'ry clime. Of all times the sweet - est time.

From the beginning, day of days,
Set apart for holy praise,
When he bade the willing earth
All its hidden stores bring forth,
When he gave the shining heav'n,
Then to man this day was giv'n.

On this day the Son of God
Left his three-day's dark abode;
In the greatness of his might,
Rising to the upper light.
On this day the Church puts on Glory, beauty, robe, and crown.

WILLIAM FAREL,

THE SWISS REFORMER.

CHAPTER X.

DURING the year 1545, Chaponneau, Farel's colleague at Neuchâtel, died. He was succeeded by Fabri, minister of Thonon.

Calvin tried to induce Farel to rejoin him as fellow-labourer at Geneva, but failed; and he now made an attempt to draw him into his neighbourhood, by suggesting to the senate, that, as he was a good Hebrew scholar, his appointment to the professorship of divinity at Lausanne would be very advantageous to the interests of the church. But though the government readily acknowledged his services, in that he had been the principal instrument in promoting the Reformation in the Valais, Neuchâtel, and Geneva, they refused to follow Calvin's advice. Farel's hasty temper, his bold, uncompromising tone in stating his opinions, and, perhaps more than all, his having refused to make the church at Berne his model for that at Geneva, probably caused his rejection. Besides, Berne was rather afraid of bringing Calvin, Farel, and Viret together, as, being actuated by one spirit, they were likely to succeed in any object they set themselves to accomplish; and this excited the jealousy and envy of Berne. This second effort, therefore, to remove Farel from Neuchâtel failed; and Beza was appointed to the Lausanne professorship.

Mathurin Cordier, head master of the school at Neuchâtel, who had been tutor to Calvin, was now removed to Lausanne, and in much anxiety the Bernese senate wrote to the council of Neuchâtel on the importance of seeking an efficient teacher to supply his place in a school designed 'for promoting the glory of God, and instructing the young in the divine word and propriety of conduct.' 'Certain tyrants,' they added, 'who undertake to suppress and extirpate the gospel, know of no better method than the abolition of the Latin schools.' Farel entered fully into these sentiments, convinced that darkness would again overspread the church, if young men were not carefully trained for the ministry. He therefore entreated the council to educate some candidates for the ministry at the public expense. To this the council agreed, and arranged that four should be thus provided for, who should be required to study Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, with a view to the more perfect knowledge of the Scriptures, and also make themselves acquainted with natural history, to understand 'how wonderful the Creator is, how weak and short-sighted is man.' Logic and rhetoric were also to be cultivated, that the students might learn to express themselves so as to arrest and fix the attention of their hearers. 'Truly,' said Farel, 'these sciences are the gifts of God, and must not be condemned or rejected on account of the perversity of men, who abuse them: in short, for the sake of public welfare, let no one in any way obstruct the cultivation of learning, or of the arts and sciences.'

He especially pressed this upon the attention of parents, saying, 'If you are desirous of worthily bearing the honourable name of father, which God applies to you, and assumes also for himself,—if you wish to be fathers in reality, and not in name only,—give your children pious and faithful teachers, or bring them up yourselves in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.'

This year Farel published a small work, somewhat similar to the Confessions of St. Augustine; and about the same time, he wrote pastoral letters for the consolation of those who were suffering for righteousness' sake.

The Anabaptists gave him much anxiety. To Peloux, one of their leaders, he wrote a severe letter, in reply to some of his writings, which had been extensively circulated in Germany. He had also to contend against 'philosophers, falsely so called,' who, while boasting of their knowledge, led many astray by their pernicious example.

A few of the sect of the Libertines now appeared in Geneva and other parts of Switzerland. They came from the Netherlands, and, under the pretence of correcting the errors of Popery, endeavoured to undermine the foundations of religion. Farel had known something of their doctrines before, and now openly rebuked them, saying, 'Beware, as of infernal spirits, of those who say that the Scriptures contain profound mysteries too deep and spiritual to be expressed. For though it is true that divine things are sublime and unsearchable, so that we must humbly ask God's assistance to learn his holy will, to be governed by it, and to obey it, yet, that which God has revealed for our salvation is so plain, that no father can speak more intelligibly to his children than God speaks to us. Whether the Papists boast themselves, the Turks conquer, the Jews continue hardened, heretics lift up their heads, or innumerable sects buzz around us, like swarms of gnats, let the gracious Saviour be all in all to us. To Him we will firmly adhere, and prefer his poverty and humility to all Popish grandeur, and all worldly riches.'

The dangers which threatened the church, involved him in an extensive correspondence; his advice being anxiously sought, and freely given. Bucer wrote to him from England, detailing his 'sufferings, dangers, and labours,' and was cheered by his hearty sympathy. Shortly afterwards, Farel thus alludes to his death: 'Our friend has happily seized the prize, and left us struggling in the course below. We deplore our loss, and that of the church, in being deprived of a man so distinguished, and whose labours in the Lord's service were invaluable. While on earth, his enemies persecuted this holy man, not, indeed, to the extent of their wishes, but of those limits which were set to the endeavours of Satan and his agents; but now, escaped from all dangers, he lives in safety with the Lord. The same happiness awaits us; but at present we must suffer persecutions from the world, which, however, our faithful Father, according to his promise, will so alleviate, that we shall be able to bear it. Let not our courage, then, be depressed. We will persevere, in spite of Satan, and finish the work committed to us, which will in the end bring forth much fruit. We know whom we serve.'

In addition to the loss of Bucer, and the distressing matters of public interest connected with the church, Farel was much tried by some painful events which occurred among the members of his own congregation. Instead of the rest which his age and increasing infirmities called for, his labours so multiplied that he complained: 'I am already advanced in years, and have not sufficient vigour to urge those under my care, who require a continual spur. I am honoured with the title of "father," it is true, but my sons have little reverence for my authority.' Many refused to submit to the discipline which he felt it his duty to enforce; and even his friends complained that his censures were harsh and unreasonable, not duly considering that the low state of morality which prevailed around, called for firm and unbending reproof.

Farel wished others to treat him with the same frankness with which he treated them—to rebuke him when they considered him in error. 'I conjure you,' he wrote to one, whose judgment he highly valued, 'to admonish me faithfully of what you see to be amiss, and remember me in your prayers. Thus you will profit me and the church also far more than by your commendations, which proceed from an excessive attachment to me.'

His sympathies were now engaged in behalf of the persecuted descendants of a little colony of the Waldenses, who had settled in the mountains of Provence. In 1540 the Parliament of Aix resolved upon their destruction, unless they acknowledged their errors and returned to the Romish Church within a limited period. And because Merindol and Cabrières were considered the chief seat of heresy, they were ordered to be razed to the ground. This cruel edict required that 'all the caverns, hiding-places, cellars, and vaults in the vicinity of the town should be destroyed; that the woods should be cut down, and all the gardens and orchards laid waste; and that none, who had ever possessed a house or property in the towns, or within a certain distance from them, should ever occupy them again, either in his own person, or in that of any of his name or family, in order that the memory of the excommunicated sect might be utterly wiped away from the province, and the place be made a desert.' There was a respite for five years, and then the cruel edict was enforced. 'Everything,' says a French historian, 'was dreadful in the decree, and everything was dreadful in its execution.' Twenty-two towns or villages were then burned. The wretched inhabitants fled in the darkness of night to their rocks for shelter. They were pursued and barbarously strangled. At Cabrières seven hundred were killed, of whom many were burned in a barn in which they sought refuge. A Jesuit, writing of this dreadful massacre, says, 'Above 3000 persons were killed, and above 900 houses destroyed.' Not a vestige of Merindal or Cabrières remained.

These enormities practised in Provence were extended to Dauphiny and Languedoc, and brought to light instances of the most sublime Christian heroism. One of these is thus related by Gilly: 'Aymond de la Voye, though aware of the edict issued against his people, went with his life in his hand, from house to house, to confirm the wavering and cheer the desponding. He was soon seized and carried before the Inquisition. Being asked, "Who are your associates?" he replied, "My associates are those who know and do the will of my heavenly Father, whether they be nobles, merchants, peasants, or men of any other condition."

'On his way to execution he passed an image of the Virgin, and refusing to bow to it, the mob assailed him with utmost fury; but their malice had no effect, save to make him pray aloud: "O Lord, I beseech Thee to make it known to these deluded creatures, that to Thee only they ought to bow the head and offer supplications." As he ascended the scaffold, he cried, with a loud voice, "Be it known that I die not a heretic, but a Christian."'

In the hope of serving these poor people, Farel and Viret travelled to Berne and Bâle on their behalf. To this 'labour of love' Farel was the more constrained, as his brothers, Daniel and Claude, were among the sufferers, fast bound in prison. They were released shortly after his visit.

Under the pressure of these trials and labours, Farel's health gave way. In 1553, a severe attack of pleurisy brought him so low that his physician almost despaired of his recovery. Calvin lost not a moment in coming to him, and was the first to sign his name as witness to his will.

In this will Farel expressed his gratitude to God for the unspeakable mercy manifested to him, notwithstanding his unworthiness, particularly for redemption by the death of Christ from the curse under which 'the human race lay,' and for having been brought 'out of the horrible darkness of Popery to a knowledge of the truth.' He then committed his soul and body to Christ, in the hope of a glorious resurrection, and acknowledged with thankfulness the grace which had called him to be a preacher of 'righteousness, by faith in Christ.' He declared his stedfast faith in those doctrines which he had so long maintained as the truth of God, and hoped that this, his death-bed confession, might tend to confirm those who had learned the gospel from him. Farel left his property to his brothers, Daniel and Claude, and entreated them 'to live in peace with each other, and to continue stedfast in the faith.' He left a fourth part of his books to the library belonging to the ministers in his district, and the rest to the sons of his late brother, Walter, and to his nephew, Caspar Carmel. In his will he also remembered the poor, and desired that his furniture and some money should be given to them.

Farel longed to be at rest, but his work was not finished, and he recovered.

When his strength returned, he assisted in publishing some regulations respecting the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and the instruction of children preparatory to receiving the ordinance; the selection of preachers and schoolmasters; baptism, marriage, the observance of the Lord's day, and forms of prayer. Parents were admonished to 'send their children to catechetical instruction;' and children reminded 'to obey their parents.'

In the remarks upon lawful and unlawful amusements, dancing was forbidden; while 'certain games and military sports' were allowed. Fortune-tellers, sorcerers, and witches were to be punished, and gypsies to be expelled the country. Ecclesiastical censures were not alluded to, though Farel regarded them, under certain circumstances (as well as exclusion from the Lord's Supper), as necessary to preserve order in the church. The question, 'Whether it was according to the word of God, that those who had given public offence to the church should do penance openly,' being about this time discussed, various opinions were given. Calvin and others of the Geneva church considered that it was so; the Bernese churches replied that, 'in general, they approved of church discipline, but that the same forms in administering it could not be observed everywhere.' 'Let every church,' they said, 'practise that to which they have been accustomed and find most useful.' The clergy of Bâle took the same view of the matter. Fabri, Farel's colleague, agreed with him, but yet thought Farel too severe in carrying out his views. Hence arose a coolness between those two friends, who, nevertheless, were really one in heart. And yet, probably the difference in their characters, which led to this disunion, was that which made their united labours so efficient. The courteous manners of Fabri often compensated for that bold, uncompromising tone which often made Farel repulsive to those who did not thoroughly understand him.

The state of affairs in Geneva continued very perplexing. Calvin longed for Farel to advise with; but yet, fearing to burden him with fresh anxiety, he did not mention his difficulties to him. This reserve pained Farel, and he went to Lausanne to consult with Viret upon the best means of affording his friend assistance. 'The origin and aim of our friendship,' said he, in one of his letters, 'is Christ and the edification of the church. Riches, honour, power, worldly pleasure, are not what we seek, but only how we may best serve the Lord. If you believe it to be for the glory of Christ, beseech, command, constrain me to come.'

The trial and execution of Servetus now took place. We gladly pass over its details. The trying office of attending him at the last devolved upon Farel, who in vain endeavoured to bring him to acknowledge his errors. Servetus underwent the dreadful sentence pronounced against him (October 27, 1553), 'showing,' says Beza, 'no sign of repentance,' 'but,' adds Spon, 'a great fear of death.' 'Servetus was executed,' Mosheim says, 'according to the established law of Geneva, which had been enacted against heretics by the Emperor Frederick II.'

The disputes upon church discipline were now renewed with greater violence than ever. A citizen of Geneva, Philibert Berthelier, had, in consequence of misconduct, been excluded from the Lord's Supper by the consistory. Indignant at this disgrace, and influenced by Perrin, Berthelier demanded, and, strange to say, obtained, absolution from the Council of Two Hundred, on the ground that 'the usurpations of the church should be resisted.' The council also passed a resolution that the final decision on all cases of excommunication should in future be vested in the senate.

Hearing of these tumults, Farel came again to Geneva, to assist his friends and rebuke the offenders. His tone and manner so offended the Libertines, that he had scarcely left the city when he was recalled to answer for having 'assailed the honour of the whole community.' Notwithstanding the severity of the weather (winter having just set in), Farel at once returned on foot. Calvin was charged not to allow him to preach, and his enemies threatened to throw him into the Rhone. Friends, however, were raised up in his defence, by whom Perrin, the leader of the sect, was warned not to touch 'the common parent of the citizens,' and his accusers, perceiving that public opinion was turning against them, secured their own safety by voting for his acquittal. By the command of the senate, they gave their hands to Farel, in token of reconciliation, acknowledged him as 'their kind pastor and teacher,' and requested him to retain the Genevese in his affectionate remembrance.'

Thus closed this stormy year (1553), 'the whole of which,' says Beza, 'was spent either in contending for sound doctrine, or for wholesome discipline, and with a prosperous issue on all sides, save for the wound which, not England alone, but all Christian churches, suffered in the premature death of that most pious prince, King Edward VI.'

Farel returned to Neuchâtel, where fresh vexations awaited him. Pierre, pastor of Cressy, attacked him as 'a savage man, a perverter of the truth, and possessed with a devil.' A public trial ensued; Pierre was found guilty of slander, and obliged to ask forgiveness of Farel, and the governor and citizens of Neuchâtel.

Through evil report and good report the aged pilgrim pursued his pastoral duties. But while calumnies uttered against himself failed to disturb him, he keenly felt those by which Calvin was assailed. 'I must be made of wood and stone,' he said to his friend, 'if I do not cleave to you with the tenderest affection. Christ has hitherto wrought beyond our expectations, and will effect still greater things. Let us stand undaunted. The battle is not ours, but the Lord's. We are rather spectators than combatants. If we sow in tears, we shall reap with joy an abundant harvest. The Lord never forsakes his cause.

He assisted Moses against the magicians, and destroyed Pharaoh with his host. And if He thus honoured the minister of the law, can you suppose that He will withdraw his aid from you? Antichrist and his adherents must be entirely cast down and annihilated, and the ministry of the gospel, which has been committed to you by Christ, shall shine forth in all its splendour. Be satisfied that you serve the Lord, and that He ordains your labours and your sufferings. His will, and not ours, be done.'

Like the Apostle John, Farel had 'no greater joy than to hear that his children walked in truth;' and now he received many satisfactory accounts of the progress of the gospel in Orbe, in which town he had sown the good seed of the word, and watered it by his prayers. Geneva, too, after passing through so many changing scenes, now resembled 'a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season.' Blessed in herself, she became a blessing to others, and many, driven by persecution from their homes, found refuge within her walls. Writing to a friend at this time, Farel says, 'I was lately in Geneva, and such was the pleasure I felt, that I could scarcely tear myself away. Not that I wished to be the teacher of a church so large, and so eager for the word, but only to hear and learn as the meanest of the people. If the Lord, and love to the work committed to my care, did not forbid, nothing should keep me from coming to reside among that people to whom I have always been united in spirit.' The Genevese warmly returned his affection, treated him as a father, to whom they owed a debt of gratitude they never could repay, and more than once the senate proposed to allow him an annual income if he would remain and labour amongst them.

But in the midst of joy, sad news reached Farel from Montbeliard, the scene of his early ministry. Though not advocates of Servetus, some of those who held his sentiments had such influence over its pastor, Tossanus, that many suspected him of holding similar opinions. Tossanus, too, rather seemed to avoid his former friends, and treated them with want of confidence. For this Calvin rebuked him, and Farel endeavoured to act as peace-maker, but failed. 'How much I wish,' he said, 'that we would all consider that we do not live at Rome, but in the church of Christ; that we are not to strive for ecclesiastical preferment, but should hazard our lives for the defence of the gospel and the truth of religion!'

(To be continued.)

THE NOONDAY REST.

Lo, every wish, O God, I fold
Within my breast.
Do Thou bestow, do Thou withhold,
As seems Thee best.
Thus in thy love, as in some tranquil nest,
I fold my wing,
And blithely sing
For ever, and for evermore at rest.

Let nought disturb this peace,
So calm and deep;
All vagrant thoughts and fancies cease—
Be hush'd to sleep.
Would we could ever know a full release
From restless will,
And take our fill
Of childlike, uno'ershadowed happiness!

Lord, in the high and sultry day,
Where wilt Thou lead
Thy languid flock away?
In what soft mead?
Where through broad fig-leaves, temper'd, steals the ray,
And the hot air
Is made to bear
Odour of orange and of flowers gay?

Dost thou not know, O blessed one,
Where thou should'st go?
The rocky defiles shun,
Haunts of thy foe,
The fell wild beast; and where pure waters flow,
And shepherds lead
Their flock to feed,
Beloved, rest thee too.

Rest, rest thee ever in my love,
Church of my choice;
Let nought awake thee but the pleasant voice
Of Christ thy Lord,
By thee adored;
Thy Sovereign, and the root of all thy joys,—
As gives the earth
To wild flowers birth,
And spring awakes the land to Beauty and to mirth.

E. A. W.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

HEB. III. 14.

HERE is, (1) The privilege; (2) The way of possession and continuance.

I. The privilege.—'We are made partakers of Christ.' 'We' means, of course, all the saints; not apostles merely. But there may be, as frequently elsewhere, an emphasis on the word, connecting New Testament with Old Testament saints. We as well as Israel, and the saints of old (iv. 2); showing the identity of standing, and of privilege, among the saints of all ages. 'Are made,' or 'become'—intimating that we were not originally so, but have been made what we are by God—'created unto good works.' 'Partakers of Christ.' The expression is a peculiar one and very striking—(μέτοχοι and κοινωνοι are nearly synonymous. See Luke v. 7, 10.) The word partaker, or partake, is frequently used in this epistle: 'took part of the same' (ii. 14); 'partakers of the heavenly calling' (iii. 1); 'partakers of the Holy Ghost' (vi. 4). It implies that we obtain a part or possession in Christ and of Christ, that we become participators with Christ in all that He is, and has, and gives.

1. In what He is.—He makes us partakers of the divine nature; one with himself; sons of God; joint-heirs; kings and priests; lights of the world. He gives himself to us, as He gave himself for us.

2. In what He has.—The Father's love (John xvi. 27); all fulness of grace and blessing; a kingdom, a crown, a throne, an inheritance.

3. In what He gives.—These gifts are 'life' (I give unto them eternal life), forgiveness, salvation, strength, holiness, consolation.

Thus, our possession is Christ himself, nothing less than this; Christ, and all his fulness; Christ as the divine and eternal fulness;—a personal Christ; not a mere doctrinal Christ, or a mere theological Christ, or an ecclesiastical Christ, or a ritualistic Christ, or a rationalistic Christ, or a sentimental Christ, but a true and living Christ—the very Christ of God. This is the Christ we need; of this Christ we are made partakers. He is one with us; we are one with Him: we in Him, and He in us! We possess Him, and He possesses us! We are his inheritance, and He is ours. As He took our sin to give us his righteousness, as He took our shame to give us his glory, so He took us to give us HIMSELF.

II. The way of possession and maintenance.—'If we hold the beginning of our confidence stedfastly unto the end.'

1. The confidence.—This means firm, bold, unreserved, childlike confidence in God. It is not the same word as is used elsewhere for 'boldness.' 'In whom we have boldness' (Eph. iii. 12); 'Let us come boldly' (Heb. iv. 16); 'Boldness to enter into the holiest' (x. 19); 'That we may have confidence' (1 John ii. 28). But it is even more expressive of certainty, or assurance, or substance (as Heb. xi. 1); it might be rendered, 'that assured substantiality;' the one word referring more to the actual or objective certainty (ὑπόστασις), the other to the conscious assurance of it subjectively. The basis, then, of all true religion, and acceptable service, is confidence; for, without faith, it is impossible to please Him. A religion of distrust and uncertainty is no religion at all. It lacks that special element which God recognises and delights in. Whether, then, does your religion exhibit the trust or the distrust; the confidence or the want of confidence? Do not say that confidence is presumption, and diffidence humility. It is no presumption to take God at his word, and deal with Him in confidence, not supposing that anything in us can furnish ground for distrust, seeing everything invites, nay, demands trust.

2. The beginning of our confidence.—That confidence has a beginning, it has certain first principles. We were not born with it. Unbelief, distrust—these are the native roots of bitterness. The beginner of that confidence is the Holy Spirit. Only He can eradicate the distrust, and impart anything of confidence. But in what way does He operate? Through what media does He produce the trust? Through the gospel of the grace of God; for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing, by the word of God. The natural heart shows itself in two ways: (1) By misrepresenting the character of God; (2) By hating that which is not misrepresented,—i.e. whatever of his true character it apprehends. The Spirit works in counteraction of both of these. Take the case of Adam. Before he fell, he had confidence, not a shadow of mistrust. The moment that sin entered, confidence fled, and distrust came in. In what way did God remove the distrust, and reproduce the lost confidence? Not by any mere command, not by law, not by terror and threat; but by the revelation of his grace. It was the exhibition of God's true character as the Friend of man, and the enemy of man's enemy, that reproduced Adam's lost confidence, and drew him back to God. Thus Adam's confidence was rekindled. Thus ours begins—at the cross—through the right discernment of God's true character, as seen in the gospel of his grace.

3. The holding.—We are to hold, or grasp, the beginning of our confidence. In order to the holding, there must be the having. We must begin, before we can go on to the end. It is not merely our confidence that we are to hold, but the beginning of our confidence; and our confidence can only be rightly held by holding the beginning. That which gives us confidence at first, is to give us confidence to the last. We do not merely begin at the cross, but we go on as we began. We began without deriving any confidence from our goodness, but simply from God's gracious character as exhibited in the cross; and we are to continue in the same way. How easily we forget this lesson, and so lose our confidence altogether! And when we lose it, how foolishly we try to regain it, by some different way, or from some different source, than that from which we got it at first! Instead of going back to the blood for fresh peace and fresh confidence, we try to find out or work up graces, or recall evidences, as if out of them we might extract confidence and peace! Alas, they contain no peace; how can they give it to us? In spite of every temptation from within or without, let us hold the beginning of our confidence, not for a day, but for a lifetime—to the end!

How much happier should we be in this case! We should be kept in perfect peace. How much holier should we be! We should be strong against sin and the world; for confidence towards God is the great preservative against sin. How much more useful should we be! For this confidence is the spring and stimulus of all zeal and love.

NO CONDEMNATION.

BY THE EDITOR.

'Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?'—Rom. viii. 33.

ONE of the church's names is 'elect of God;' and each of its living members is one whose name is written in the book of life from the foundation of the world (Rev. xvii. 8). Of these chosen ones the history is thus summed up: 'Whom He did predestinate, them He also called; and whom He called, them He also justified; and whom He justified, them He also glorified' (Rom. vii. 30).

The state in which each one of these is born into the world is that of 'condemnation;' the state into which each one is brought, in believing, is that of 'no condemnation' (Rom. viii. 1). Forgiveness of sins—present, conscious, complete forgiveness—is that into which faith introduces us, and out of which unbelief alone can keep us. Justification from all things—certain, immediate, and unchanging justification—is our portion here. It is respecting us, as men forgiven and justified, that the apostle asks, 'Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?' On believing the gospel of forgiveness, they were placed beyond the reach and risk of any charge or impeachment whatsoever; they are brought by God into such a state, as to render condemnation an impossibility; for the forgiveness is irreversible, and the righteousness in which they stand is divine.

Not that they cease to be sinners. But they cease to be treated as guilty. Iniquities prevail; but there is continual forgiveness to cancel these, and a perfect righteousness to cover these, and the ever-flowing blood of the everlasting covenant to wash all guilt away as it comes up, and to prevent their peace with God from being broken. They do sin; but they have an Advocate with the Father; and who can demand the execution of the penalty in their case? Who shall condemn? Who can do it? Who dare do it? Who has the right to do it? Not angels. They are too glad to welcome back the sinner, and to take the side of those whose side God has taken. Devils would, if they could. But they cannot. The prey is taken from the mighty, and placed beyond their grasp. The law might have done it; but it has been satisfied, nay magnified. It has therefore no claim, and could gain no object by accusing us; for our acquittal is a righteous one—an acquittal in which law itself rejoices.

Mark, then, how complete and how satisfactory the challenge is; for the words of our text are not so much a question as a challenge—a challenge thrown down before the universe!

I. It is a righteous challenge.—It is not the challenge of one who, through might, had baffled right, and triumphed over law. It is that of one who sees all righteousness fulfilled, and all good confirmed, by that very sentence which acquits himself; who, unable to contribute aught toward his own acquittal, has recognised God's righteous way of justifying the unrighteous, and in doing so, has found deliverance from condemnation. It is a challenge so righteous, that every righteous being responds to it; so righteous, that his own conscience, even when most fully awakened and enlightened by the Holy Spirit, rests satisfied and unalarmed; so righteous, that none can undertake to answer it, save those who are prepared to reject God's way of saving the lost and forgiving the condemned.

II. It is a holy challenge.—It is not that of one who was seeking to sin that grace might abound, but of one who saw that this is God's way of delivering him from sin, and making him hate sin. God's way of forgiveness brings out all the loathsomeness of sin, shows it to be the enemy both of God and of the sinner. Thus the man who says, 'Who shall lay anything to my charge? who is he that condemneth?' is the man who is also saying, 'Now I have some hope of being holy; now I shall be delivered from sin; now sin has received its death-blow; and now love and a free pardon will do what terror and uncertainty, and an unsatisfied law, could never have done. Being delivered from the first and great matter of seeking a forgiveness, by having got that question for ever laid to rest, I am free to attend undistractedly to the one question, How shall I be holy, and by a holy life serve and glorify God?'

III. It is a joyful challenge.—The question, and the way of putting it, show the exulting gladness of the soul. It is the joy of a soul delivered from an infinite fear; from overwhelming foreboding of wrath; from the certainty of an eternal hell, and the sore vengeance of an angry God. What gladness is this! To be forgiven all sin, and clothed with an infinite righteousness! To be as thoroughly assured of the favour of God, as formerly of his displeasure! To see the dark cloud of wrath which had wrapt the soul round rise upwards and pass away, leaving the wide azure clear and bright, with not a mist to intercept the light of reconciliation and love, pouring down from the heaven of heavens! What joy unspeakable and full of glory is this!

IV. It is an unanswerable challenge.—It is boldly put, and with no muffled voice. It is spoken aloud, that all may hear, and answer if they can. But no one can take it up. There is silence in heaven, and earth, and hell. It is Paul's challenge to the universe. Nay rather, it is the Holy Spirit's challenge. Who shall answer Paul? Who shall answer the Holy Ghost? Who shall condemn us? Who shall lay anything to our charge? Who shall trouble our conscience or break our peace? We ask aloud; we repeat the challenge to the devil and all his legions. But no answer is given. We hear only the echo of our own voice. It is unanswerable even now; for from the first moment that we believed we were entitled to take it up. It shall be no less unanswerable when we go down to the tomb; and we may make the caverns of the dead reccho with it. It shall be unanswerable in the day of the Lord; so that, even when standing before the judgment-seat, surrounded with angels or surrounded with devils, we may lift up our voice and say, Who shall lay anything to my charge?

Nor is there anything presumptuous in this challenge. It is one of simple faith. It is meant for every believing man; and there is something lacking in that faith which falters here. A believed gospel ought to lead him who believes to adopt this bold and blessed attitude. For a believed gospel is meant to assure the believing soul of forgiveness and eternal life.

It is a challenge which God himself will own. He does not reckon it too bold or too decided. He puts it into our lips, and He will acknowledge it. In our believing, we set our Amen to his testimony; and in his giving us this challenge, He is setting his Amen to our faith. Nay, not only will He own it, but He will take it up out of our lips, and himself proclaim it through the universe, Who shall lay anything to the charge of my elect?

Our right to take up this challenge is simply our having believed the gospel. It is not our graces or evidences that embolden us thus to speak. It is not as holy men, or old Christians, or deeply humbled souls, that we have a warrant to do so. Our warrant is simply our having believed the gospel. And oh how much we lose from not seeing the sure and high standing into which a believed gospel brings us, long before we have time to consider our own selves, or number up our graces! It would indeed be presumption to rest an assurance like this, or a challenge like this, upon our own graces; but it is no presumption to rest this on the gospel of the grace of God. Even the Spirit's work in us would be quite inadequate as a foundation for such boldness; but Christ's finished work for us is altogether sufficient, without anything else, to warrant us in entering into the apostle's mind, and taking up his triumphant challenge. Nor can any amount of past or present sin prevent this; for where sin has abounded, there grace has abounded much more.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA.

No. V.

GERTRUDE AND HER MULTIPLICATION TABLE.

CLOSELY as her shadow, had little Gertrude Playfair followed her mother all day. On the morrow that mother was to leave home for some weeks, to take care of an invalid sister; she therefore could not take Gertrude with her; so, for the first time, they were to be separated for more than a day or two.

No wonder, then, that Gertrude followed her wherever she went, fearful of losing a moment of the short time they could still pass together. After the usual Bible lesson, which was always the first thing after breakfast, Mrs. Playfair went to her room, to oversee the packing arrangements, and, to Gertrude's great joy, she was allowed to help, and fancied herself very useful, —wondering what her mother would do when she was returning home, and would not have her little daughter to assist her.

In the afternoon they went to the library, and then every servant in the house, from the housekeeper to the kitchen-maid, was summoned in turn, while Mrs. Playfair gave each special directions as to what they were to do and to avoid doing during her absence, and adding a few kind encouraging words before dismissing them. Poor thing! she had to think of everything herself now; for her husband was in India, and she could not live there on account of her delicate health.

Gertrude had been a most attentive listener to all that passed, and as the door closed after the last servant, a sudden thought struck her, and she said: 'Mother, will you not give me something to do for you while you are away? I should like it so much.'

Her mother looked lovingly at her, and said, 'You shall have something to do for me most willingly, my child, if you really wish it; but I cannot tell you about it now, because I have letters to write, and shall be very busy. Besides, you ought to go out; so run and get your hat, and play about the garden, and in the evening we will have a long quiet talk together.'

Gertrude was disappointed; she would much rather that her mother had told her then what she was to do for her, and she did not at all like to leave her and go out. However, as she had been too well trained to prompt and unquestioning obedience to make any objection, she got her hat and did as she had been desired.

Very little notice did she take of the flowers, now in the early spring-time looking so fresh and gay; little attention did she pay to the gambols of her pet dog, who ran beside her, and wondered what had happened to make his merry little mistress so grave and sedate. But Gertrude could only think of one thing, namely, what it could be that her mother would give her to do. Perhaps she might allow her to take care of her mignonette bed, as she had done last year. But then it was rather early for that; for, when she had spoken to the gardener about it a few days before, he told her that the plants were too young, and the ground too dry for anything to be done, and that if she meddled with the bed she would only do mischief; so it could not be the mignonette.

Could it possibly be that she would give her the greenhouse to manage! That would, indeed, be delightful, she was so fond of flowers; and she had watched the gardener so often, she was sure she understood all about it. Certainly she had broken a beautiful geranium last year, when she was trying to shake off the loose leaves, as she had seen the gardener do every morning; but then she was only six years old at the time, and the pot was very heavy and slipped out of her hand. But there would not be any fear of that now, she thought, as she was a little past seven—quite a great girl!

Many other nice things to do, as she expressed it, were thought of; at last she came to the wise conclusion that her mother was sure to choose what was best, and that it would probably be about flowers, as she knew how fond she was of them. She only hoped it might be something very difficult and very troublesome, that she might be able to show her how much she loved her by doing it well.

At length evening came; and, seated on Mrs. Playfair's knee, Gertrude said: 'Now, mother, please tell me what I am to do for you.'

'I think I should like you to learn your multiplication table,' replied Mrs. Playfair.

'My multiplication table!' said Gertrude, in amazement and dismay. 'My multiplication table! Oh, mother! you surely do not mean that? Why, learning my multiplication table would not be doing anything for you.'

'It would, indeed, my child,' answered Mrs. Playfair; 'it would be doing what would please me more than anything else you could think of.'

'But I hate the multiplication table,' said Gertrude; 'do, please, let me do something else. I would so much like to take care of the greenhouse, and I am sure I could do it quite well.'

'I do not think you could,' replied her mother; 'but at all events that is the gardener's work, and I have given him directions about it long ago. And just tell me, darling, is it to please me, or to please yourself, that you are anxious to have something to do for me while I am away?'

'Indeed, it is to please you,' said Gertrude, half crying at the question; for, notwithstanding her disinclination to learning the multiplication table, she dearly loved her mother.

'I am sure you do wish to please me rather than yourself,' the latter continued; 'and the way to please me would be by learning your multiplication table so perfectly, that, on my return, you will be able to repeat it to me without a single mistake.'

There was a moment's struggle in little Gertrude's heart, and then she said bravely, 'I will learn it, mother, because you wish it; but I am sure I could learn it quite easily in two or three days; and then, may I do something else for you?'

Mrs. Playfair shook her head, as she answered, 'If you learned it so quickly, dear, you certainly would neither learn it perfectly nor remember it, and I want to secure your doing both. What I wish is this, that you should learn half a table quite perfectly every morning before you go out; and every day before you learn a new part, say over all that you have learned before, that will ensure your remembering it; or rather,' she continued, 'as you have not any one to say it to, write it up and down, backwards and forwards on your slate; then compare it with the book, and correct the mistakes, and remember not to begin your new lesson until you have written out the old ones correctly. I shall probably be away a little more than three weeks, so that you will be able to come to the end of twelve times before I return. And now, darling, what do you think of the plan?'

'I cannot understand what good it can do you,' replied Gertrude; 'but I always find out, if I wait patiently, that you are right about everything; so I am sure you are right now. And I shall not mind disliking my multiplication table one bit, since I am to learn it to please you; that is so different from learning it because I must, or to please myself.'

A kiss was Mrs. Playfair's answer; and then, after a talk of the Good Shepherd, and how He would watch over his little lamb while her mother was away from her, Gertrude went to bed, and did not awake until she felt her mother's arm round her in the morning. Then she started up, for she knew the hour of parting had come. Quickly she dressed; and then for the last time, until Mrs. Playfair's return, they knelt together, while in a few simple words the mother asked God to take care of her and of her precious child,—to keep both from evil while they were separated, and to bring them together again in health, and joy, and safety.

Immediately after breakfast, the carriage drove up to the hall door, and after a hurried but very loving good-bye, Mrs. Playfair had to leave.

Poor little Gertrude! She did not know what to do. She felt so lonely and sorrowful, that she was sure she would be miserable until her mother returned. She wandered forlorn about the house, and was just getting her hat to go out, when she remembered her multiplication table.

'I will begin this very minute,' she said; 'it would have been dreadful to have forgotten what dear mamma wished.' And although at the name her tears flowed afresh, yet she went for her book, and in a few minutes had learned the first half of twice times so perfectly that she wrote it all sorts of ways on her slate without a mistake. The thought that this would please her mother cheered her; and in much better spirits she called her dog, and went out into the garden.

The day passed more quickly and pleasantly than she could have believed would have been possible, and so did the few following ones. But when the morning came for her to learn the last half of four times, it found her in no pleasant state of mind.

The sun was shining so brightly, so many butterflies had come out, and the flowers seemed fresher and sweeter than ever. It was very hard that she might not go out. That tiresome multiplication table! she wished her mother had not asked her to learn it. It was so stupid; and it certainly could not do any one any good. Surely it would not be any harm to pass over one day, and learn a double lesson the next. But it would not do; a still small voice was whispering in Gertrude's heart, 'Will you not do it because your mother asked you? because you know it would please her? Would you not like to please her, she loves you so dearly?'

'I should like to please her,' said the child, as if in answer. 'I shall have plenty of time to play afterwards; dear mother,' she whispered, as she took up her book and slate, and seated herself at the table to learn her lesson. Her thoughts wandered a little, so she was somewhat longer than she would otherwise have been; but at length her old lessons and her new one had all been written on the slate without a mistake, and shouting out that four times twelve is forty-eight, the happy child went into the garden.

After this, she had not any trouble until she came to seven times. And seven times seven puzzled her terribly. It would come, as she said, sixty-three, or fifty-four, or even forty-eight—every number but the right one. She was just beginning to get cross as well as tired, when the postman's knock was heard at the hall door, and a note from her mother was handed to her.

Such a tender, loving note as it was! Not a word about fearing that Gertrude had forgotten or neglected her mother's wishes; but an assurance that she knew her little daughter would try to please her while she was away, even more than when she was at home, and concluding with the hope of soon seeing her again.

Ah! it was not hard to take up her book now, after having read and kissed her letter over and over again. Yes, she would please her mother while she was away; so, setting to work again, she soon mastered her difficulties, and said and wrote that seven times seven is forty-nine so often, that she was quite sure she could never forget it. Ten and eleven times were so easy that they did not give her any trouble; and as to twelve times, why, she knew it all except twelve times twelve, before she began to learn it separately. She had not calculated on this, so it was a pleasant surprise.

Two days afterwards Mrs. Playfair returned. What a bright and joyous meeting it was both for mother and child! Gertrude was in too great delight to have time even to think of the multiplication table, or to wonder if her mother would be greatly pleased that she had learned it so well. In the evening, however, her mother asked about it; and then Gertrude did feel very glad to be able to tell her that she knew it perfectly, and that she had learned it exactly as she had wished her to do.

Mrs. Playfair's look of pleasure, as she kissed her, and said, 'You have pleased me very much, my child,' rewarded Gertrude for all her trouble. Then her mother asked her how she had enjoyed learning it.

'I did not enjoy learning it at all for its own sake,' she replied, thoughtfully; 'but I enjoyed learning it because you wished it, although sometimes, when I forgot that, I used to get so tired of it.'

'But did being tired of it ever make you neglect your lesson?' asked Mrs. Playfair.

'Oh, no,' answered Gertrude. 'I used sometimes to be tempted to do it, but when I thought of you, and all your love for me, I felt that no matter how tired I was, or how much I disliked it, I should like to do anything in the whole world that pleased you.'

'And you have pleased me very much indeed,' said Mrs. Playfair. 'And now I wonder if you would like to do something else for me?'

'Indeed I should,' replied Gertrude. So her mother told her to come with her to the greenhouse, where all by itself, on the lowest shelf, was a beautiful geranium just coming into blossom.

'I value this plant very much,' continued Mrs. Playfair, 'because it was given to me by dear Aunt Alice; but if you would like to take care of it for me, I should not be afraid to trust you with it.'

Gertrude could hardly believe that she was to be given the care of anything so lovely; she could scarcely speak for joy. At length she asked what she was to do with it.

'It will not want anything but a little water to-night,' said her mother; 'but I cannot tell what it will want to-morrow; so I think your best plan would be to come and look at it the first thing you do after you are dressed every morning. Then, if you come and tell me how it looks, and all about it, I will give you directions what to do for the day.'

All night long Gertrude dreamed of her geranium, and very early the next morning she ran to the greenhouse to see how it looked. The flowers were drooping a little, and poor Gertrude thought it was dying; but her mother told her that it had only been too long in the hot morning sun, and that she had better move it to the other end of the shelf, and put some damp moss over the earth, and water it again in the evening.

An unfailing source of delight did this geranium prove; it was so pleasant to talk to her mother about it, and to watch blossom after blossom as they came into full flower. Sometimes, however, Gertrude would look wistfully at the other shelves, crowded as they were with plants, and contrast them with hers, which had only one. I am sure I could take care of more than one, she would say to herself; but then her trust in her mother's wisdom used to come to her help, and the thought that 'mother always knows best,' would settle the matter satisfactorily.

But one morning, when she went to the greenhouse as usual, to her utter dismay she found the shelf empty! She was sure that the gardener must have moved her plant to some other place by mistake. But no; she looked in vain, not a trace of it was to be seen, and crying bitterly, she ran to tell her mother that some one had taken away her plant, and what was she to do?

'Your plant, my child?'

'Oh, no,' said Gertrude; 'I mean your plant,—the beautiful geranium that you lent me to take care of. I cannot think what has become of it. Oh, mamma, mamma, I have nothing to do for you now!'

'I think you have, darling,' replied her mother. 'What did I want you to learn for me when I went away besides the multiplication table?'

'Not anything, mother,' answered Gertrude.

'I did not ask you in so many words, certainly, to learn anything else; but I knew that if you learned the multiplication table to please me, you would learn other things far more important at the same time.'

Gertrude looked up in surprise, and her mother added, 'I think you learned lessons of obedience, and patience, and self-denial, my child.'

With a beaming face, Gertrude looked up again, and said, 'I understand it all now, mother. Was it not that I might learn those lessons, that you wished me to learn the multiplication table?'

'It was,' answered Mrs. Playfair. 'Nothing you could possibly have done would have pleased me half so much. And now about the geranium, shall I tell you about it at once, or shall I wait a little, as I would rather do, though I will tell you now if you wish?'

Trust in her mother again came to Gertrude's help, and conquered her curiosity, and she said, 'I will wait as long as ever you please.'

'Very well,' answered Mrs. Playfair; 'and now you may run away and play about.'

For four mornings Gertrude found the shelf empty; but on the fifth there was the geranium looking more beautiful than ever, and close beside it was a pot of mignonette, filling the whole greenhouse with its sweet perfume. Could it be that she was now to have two plants to take care of? That would be almost too delightful; but then her mother was so kind, she could not be long surprised at anything she did. Away she ran to tell her about it, and found that it was all right, and that she really was to have the two plants to take care of. 'And now,' said Mrs. Playfair, 'I will tell you about the geranium. I suspected from the way the leaves looked, that some insects had got to the roots; I called the gardener to look, and he said I was right, and that the plant must be taken up and carefully examined, and after all the insects had been removed, that it must be replanted, and kept in a cool shady place for a few days. I asked if you could do it. "Oh, no, ma'am," he replied; "I would be afraid to let any one do it, especially at this season of the year, while the plant is in blossom, except myself. I will take it away for a few days, and then Miss Gertrude can have it again, and I have a nice little pot of mignonette that I can bring with it." So now you have both the plants, my child, and have been doing something else, while you had not them to take care of.'

Gertrude did not quite understand; so Mrs. Playfair went on, 'Have you not been learning a lesson of patience, and waiting, and trust, darling?'

'But I could not help trusting you,' said Gertrude.

Her mother smiled, and asked why.

'Because you are so kind, and wise, and good,' said Gertrude, 'and never make a mistake.' Mother and child then went together to the greenhouse, and had a talk about the plants. And many talks they had. Gertrude had now become so watchful and so careful, that the very least change was observed, and reported to her mother, whose directions were faithfully carried out.

Before very long, Gertrude found a little yellow tea rose-bush on her shelf, almost covered with buds. How glad she was, not only because of its beauty, but because now that she had three plants to take care of, the talks with her mother must be both longer and more frequent; and these talks were beginning to be a greater joy to Gertrude than even watching the plants, for the more she was with her mother, the more she loved her.

Very happily the time was passing on; but while the rose-tree was still in its full beauty, poor little Gertrude awoke one morning hot and feverish, and with such a headache that she could hardly speak. In great anxiety, Mrs. Playfair sent for the doctor, who thought her most seriously ill; and, indeed, for many days she seemed to be hovering on the very brink of the grave. But she knew nothing of it, for she was quite unconscious, and never spoke except in delirium, when she used continually to talk about her flowers.

One day as her mother sat beside her, she opened her eyes, and said, 'Mother,'—that was all, and then closed them again. But her mother's heart thrilled with joy at the word, for she thought her sweet child would recover now.

In the evening, she again said 'Mother;' and then, 'My flowers, my poor flowers, they must be all dead, and I did love them so much.' The tears fell fast down her wasted cheeks, and her mother, fearing to speak, and yet wishing to save her a moment's anxiety, went to the greenhouse and brought the rose-tree, looking more lovely than ever.

The sick child smiled with pleasure. 'You took care of it, mother,' she said, 'and watered it?'

'I did, darling.'

'Ah!' said Gertrude, 'I might have known that you would not forget; they were your flowers, you only lent them to me; you must have loved them even better than I did. Mother, I know it all now; I am quite happy.'

In another moment, she was fast asleep, with her mother's arm under her head. When she awoke, it was in that land where the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick (Isa. xxxiii. 24), and where they who have loved the Lord Jesus here shall serve Him without sin, or sorrow, or weariness, 'day and night in his temple' (Rev. vii. 15).

WE WOULD SEE JESUS.

How often, in hours of loneliness and sorrow, do our weary hearts echo the words, 'We would see Jesus!' feeling, and feeling truly, how greatly it would strengthen our faith, and brighten our hope, could we do so; while in days of gladness, we feel as if this alone were needed to make our cup of joy run over.

But although that 'fulness of joy' is not granted to us yet, may we not take comfort from the thought that He sees us, and therefore must be near us? When we are in the drawing-room in the evening, with the lamp lighted, and the curtains drawn back, a friend outside the window could see us quite well—could distinguish one from another; know how we looked, how we were dressed, what we were doing, etc. But we could not see him well; we could just see a figure, and know that it was that of a man, and might even guess who it was, without being absolutely certain. If, however, we were continually on the watch, a gleam of moonlight might for a moment reveal the features; and though gone in an instant, we should be satisfied. We would now be sure who it was, and would again and again recall the moment, and the recollection would give a distinctness even to the shadow which it could not otherwise have had.

And is it not very much the same with the Lord Jesus and us? He sees us perfectly, for 'the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous' (Ps. xxxiv. 15); but as to us, we 'now see through a glass darkly' (1 Cor. xiii. 12). We believe that He is indeed close, as close as if there was only the window between us, but we cannot distinguish the features. Are there not, however, times when God the Holy Spirit gives us such a realizing faith, that we do not need sight to know that He is beside us? And though the brightness may fade away, yet the memory of it remains, and cheers, and strengthens, and encourages us, when the night is so dark that we cannot see even the shadow.

No, we cannot see, but even then we can wait, and we can hope. For we know that 'yet a little while, and He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry' (Heb. x. 27). Then, then we shall no longer 'see through a glass darkly, but face to face.' Yes, we shall yet 'see the King in his beauty' (Isa. xxxiii. 19); 'see Him as He is,' and because we see Him, 'shall be like Him' (1 John iii. 2).

WILLIAM FAREL,

THE SWISS REFORMER.

CHAPTER XI.

THE controversy upon the Lord's Supper, which caused such dissension among those who withdrew from the Church of Rome in the sixteenth century, was a source of great trial to Farel. The question from which this lamentable division arose, was concerning the mode of Christ's presence in the sacrament.

In the Confession of Augsburg, drawn up by Melancthon in 1530, the article upon the Lord's Supper simply stated, 'The body and blood of Christ are truly present and distributed to the receivers.' But this exclusion of the mention of bread and wine, being understood by some to admit the doctrine of transubstantiation, the article was afterwards altered thus: 'With the bread and wine, the body and blood of Christ are truly and substantially present.' These words expressed Luther's doctrine, consubstantiation.

Besides the Augsburg Confession, two others were presented to the diet,—one, drawn up by Bucer, from the four cities, Strasburg, Constance, Menningen, and Lindau; and the other by Zwingle. In the former, Bucer, who believed with the Church of England that the body and blood of Christ are received by faith in the Lord's Supper, earnestly pleaded that, as the point of difference did not appear very essential, it should not be too obstinately contended for, but that, in a spirit of mutual love and forbearance, all should join in one confession. To this Melancthon objected, and refused to acknowledge as brethren those who rejected his views upon the ordinance. Zwingle considered the sacrament merely as a memorial, 'a sign by which the receiver gives to the church a pledge of his faith;' while Calvin admitted the 'spiritual presence of Christ,—the presence which "comes from faith, and exists by virtue of the Holy Spirit."'

In the hope of healing this breach, Calvin, in 1545, wrote to Luther, and sent his letter by Melancthon, who, unfortunately, fearing to make matters worse, did not deliver it.

Shortly after the death of his wife, in 1549, Calvin met Farel at Zurich, and established conferences, which were blessed as a means for restoring peace. With joy he wrote, 'We are agreeing.' His late work, The Harmony of the Helvetian and Rhetian Churches,' to which all parties agreed, united Calvin and Bullinger, Zurich and Geneva, more closely.

This agreement appeared to Farel one step towards the long desired union with the Lutherans, especially as Calvin had not been condemned by Luther, or any of his party. But, unfortunately, the controversy was renewed with much bitterness in 1551, by Joachim Westphal, a preacher in Hamburgh; and in some places intemperate language led to acts of open violence.

About this time Farel published a tract upon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, rather with the object of stating its real value than to enter into controversy upon it. That to which he looked as the great means for restoring peace, was a union of the Swiss churches themselves, combined with a conference between the most judicious and peaceably disposed men of both parties. But Berne steadily refused to sign Calvin's defence of 'the agreement' with the church at Zurich; and Farel looked to Bullinger, who had succeeded Zwingle at Zurich, to support him. 'The more appearances are against us,' he wrote to him, 'the more we must hope and attempt everything in dependence upon God. May He give us power to act wisely in this sacred matter. Then shall we come forth as conquerors, and be instrumental in leading all those to the Lord who are at all disposed to embrace the truth.' Hope deferred often made his heart sick, but at length, with Calvin's aid, he prevailed on the churches of Neuchâtel, Schaffhausen, St. Gall, and Bâle, to sign 'the agreement,' to which also the ministers of Berne gave a verbal assent. Bullinger sent the articles of this union to England, and, through Calvin and Farel, they were communicated to France, where they were gratefully received.

In 1560, the Vaudois, in the Piedmontese valleys of Lucerne and Auvergne, were severely persecuted by the Duke of Savoy. Above 4000 suffered death, under cruelties too horrible to relate. The survivors sought assistance from Geneva and Neuchâtel, and Farel and Beza undertook a journey, to entreat the Protestant cantons of Switzerland to intercede for them with Francis II., king of France. For this object they visited Berne, Zurich, Schaffhausen, and Bâle, and in a few weeks an embassy from these four cities was despatched to France. From Bâle, Farel and Beza went to Montbeliard, Strasburg, and the Palatinate. They were on the whole well received, but felt that the sacramental controversy had produced a coldness in the manner of some of the Lutherans towards them.

'No historical topic can be more instructive to every class of readers, and especially to those whose opinions may have weight in a revival of religion, than this lamentable discussion. The only question on which Luther lost his temper, betrayed his cause, injured the progress of the Reformation, grieved the Spirit of grace, and split the infant church, was that in which he was most clearly wrong. Let those who are in danger of magnifying points in dispute be warned by this example; let them see how prone to error are the greatest and purest minds; let them be slow in committing themselves beyond the exact proscriptions of revealed truth; and, above all, let them dread erecting such points into terms of communion and creating a lasting division in the affections of Christians.'*

A few months after this mission, Farel and Beza again visited Zurich in behalf of the persecuted Protestants in France. The king, under the belief that the loss of the battle of St. Quentin, in Henry the Second's reign, had been occasioned by the indulgence shown towards heretics, determined to wipe off that reproach and show them no mercy.

Although his time was so much occupied, Farel now revisited parts of the diocese of Bâle. At St. Leonards the people heard him gladly, also at Pruntrut; but the bishop summoned him before the council, and thus addressed him: 'You came here formerly to sow your tares, and having been sent away by the late bishop, have not hitherto renewed your attempt; you are now advised in a friendly manner to retire before any mischief befall you.' In reply, Farel said, 'That the subject of his preaching was Christ and Him crucified, and that to call that "tares" was a grievous sin against God, and contrary to Scripture.'

Fearing that the Reformer's preaching would make an impression upon the people, the Archbishop of Besançon sent a grand vicar, accompanied by a monk, to counteract it. A tumult followed, in which Farel and his old friend Emer Beynon, the minister of Serrieres, were violently attacked by the priests. Still, however, the people of Pruntrut manifested a regard for Farel, and the reformed doctrines; but the prior of the Dominicans at Besançon, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and an inquisitor, reviled Farel, Calvin, and Viret, as 'deceivers, heretics, and false prophets.'

To the great surprise of his friends, Farel, at the advanced age of seventy, married the daughter of Alexander Torel, of Rouen. He had one son, who did not long survive him.

Soon after his marriage, Farel visited his native land, after an absence of forty years. About the middle of November he reached Gap, and the Sabbath after preached. The church was too small for the multitudes that crowded to hear him. There was no disturbance of any kind; and Farel, hoping to conciliate the civil authorities, called on the mayor after service, who asked him by what authority he had preached, reminding him that the royal edict had forbidden such meetings upon pain of death. Farel justified his conduct by an appeal to Scripture, and also by the fact, that since the edict was passed the gospel had been openly proclaimed at Lyons. This the mayor could not deny; but requested Farel to refrain from preaching until he should procure instructions from the governor. Farel was then conducted back to the inn, and that evening he baptized a child.

* Christian Observer, 1827.

The next morning, as he was leaving church, a servant of the mayor handed him a written paper which forbade all public meetings, and the use of the churches to the reformed party. In the evening the friends of the gospel united together in prayer for guidance in so trying a moment. As they rose from their knees, they declared their determination to continue stedfast in the profession of that faith for which so many had joyfully laid down their lives. They then requested the mayor to give them a written statement of what had occurred, that they might forward it, with an appeal from themselves, to the king.

While he remained at Gap, Farel visited the neighbouring parishes, and observing the fields 'white already to harvest,' it grieved him to leave them; and yet he must return to his charge at Neuchâtel. In his perplexity he wrote to entreat Calvin to seek a suitable preacher for Gap. At Grenoble he found many faithful servants of Christ. Pichon remained there as minister.

For some time Calvin's health had been failing; intense labour of mind and body had worn him out. On the 6th of February 1564, he preached for the last time. From that day his public ministrations ceased, except that, from time to time, to the last day of March, he was carried to church, and spoke a few words to his people, but not in any continued address. For three months he endured great suffering; but no murmur or impatient word escaped his lips. Raising his eyes to heaven, he was sometimes heard to exclaim, 'How long, O Lord?' or, 'I held my peace because Thou didst it.' When tolerably free from pain he wrote, or dictated to others; and in reply to his friends' entreaties to spare his strength, would ask, 'Would you have my Lord find me idle when He cometh?' Calvin 'went to God' the 29th of May 1564.

When Farel heard of his death, he exclaimed, 'Oh that I might have died for him!' He did not long survive him.

The Reformation made progress in Louvaine, particularly among the nobility. A longing desire once more to visit Metz seized Farel, and he set out with the energy of former days. The senate, anxious for his safety, sent one of their number with him. His arrival at Metz caused great joy. All classes of the people treated him with the utmost respect. The day he arrived he preached a sermon with such power, that renewed strength to fight the fight of faith seemed given to his hearers as they listened to his fervent eloquence. But the exertion was too much for his feeble frame, and upon his return home he lay down to rest, and never rose from his bed. During the few remaining days of his life many visited him, to whom he spoke the old truths, never weary of warning and encouraging his brethren to approve themselves worthy of their calling by a faithful discharge of the duties entrusted to them.

Feeling death at hand, he repeated a similar confession of faith to that recorded in his will, and on the 13th of September 1565, having finished his course with joy, he departed to be with Christ. His body lies in the churchyard of Metz, there to await the morning of the resurrection.

A few weeks after his death, Viret was selected to be his successor; but he declined the post, and it was given to Fabri, respecting whom Farel, some time before, had borne this testimony: 'During the one and thirty years in which he has been my companion and colleague at Geneva, Orbe, Granson, Thonon, and Neuchâtel, no misunderstanding has ever arisen between us.'

The people of Neuchâtel long remembered their beloved pastor with affectionate reverence. Many a disputed point was arranged by, 'So it was in our Father Farel's time,' or, 'So Father Farel would have ordered it.'

Beside the dark grave standing,
We sow in silent tears,
The seed of incorruption!
The pilgrim full of years!

His home is reached already,
We still are on the road.
Death was the gate of heaven,
It took him to his God.

He sees what we but look for,
He hath what we still lack;
The foe no more can spoil him,
Who still besets our track.

His disembodied spirit
Is with the Lord at rest.
And while we still are weeping,
He is supremely blest.

We still, poor weary pilgrims,
In this dark valley roam,
Until again we see him,
And share his happy home!

He wears a crown of glory,
And lifts the palm on high,
And swells, with saints and angels,
The chorus of the sky.

Readings for the Young.

THE BATTLE AND THE VICTORY.

THE shades of the setting sun were casting their shadows along the crowded thoroughfares of the capital, which the December fog enveloped in its dreary folds. It was Christmas eve; and all who had a home to go to, pressed eagerly forward,—thinking, perhaps, of the bright fires, the joyous welcome, and the merry faces that awaited them. The lights shone forth in the shop windows, the sun went down, and evening fell on the city.

But not to all did the Christmas eve bring gladness or mirth; to many it left no sign that its joyous presence had hovered around their dwellings. When the evening was far advanced, a boy walked slowly forth from an abode, in which no Yule log was blazing on the hearth. He had gone a few steps down the narrow alley; but turned, as the sorrowful tones of a pale, pretty little girl, who had followed him to the door, fell upon his ear:

'Oh, Charlie, are you going out, and leaving me all alone?'

'I must go, Alie dear. I want to try if I can't get money some way or other, to buy you something nice, that it may be to you a little more like the Christmas eve of long ago.'

'Poor Charlie!' answered the little girl, 'you look so tired. Oh! I wish that we were rich; you would not then have to work so hard.'

'Oh! hush, Alie; there's no use wishing. Good-bye.'

Charlie turned quickly, and walked down the alley, passing into the next street. He stood under a lamp, and watched the lighted shops. He knew it was impossible to get work at that time of night; he had often tried it, but in vain; and all day long he was hard at work earning the weekly pittance, which provided scarcely food enough for his dying mother, Alie, and himself. Alie was not his sister. Charlie's father had been a country labourer; and one morning he had brought Alie, a child two years old, to his cottage, and told his family she was their orphan cousin, and they were to treat her as if she were their sister. The next day they had come to London; and now all were dead except the little cousin and Charlie's mother.

'We will both be orphans soon,' he murmured to himself. 'Oh, how hard it is! Poor mother! her last Christmas eve!' He walked on briskly, to hide from any idle passer-by the sobs he was unable to suppress. The shop windows looked so charming, that he lingered every now and then, gazing in on those most alluring to his eyes. He stopped at last before one, a long, long time. A gentleman was making numerous purchases; and the boy became so interested in watching the proceedings, that he almost forgot his hunger and his grief. But the gentleman could not buy for ever; and far too soon for Charlie's enjoyment, he laid a bank-note on the counter. The shopman took up the note, and, placing a sovereign before his purchaser, turned to another part of the shop, in order to give some directions about the gentleman's parcel, as well as many others that had to be sent home that Christmas eve.

The gentleman had turned away also, to examine some articles on a shelf behind; and to the gold piece lying on the counter Charlie's eyes were riveted. He saw nothing but that one bright spot in all the shop. The thought of the comforts it could procure for his mother and cousin swept through his heart like a mighty wave, overwhelming all scruple, all better, nobler feeling, leaving no thought in his heart but the burning desire to have that sovereign. In another moment he is standing unperceived within the shop, and his hand is on the gold. Another moment, and the hand that might one day have been raised in some foul midnight crime, would have committed its first dark deed; but a merciful God intercepted it, while it was yet time, and spared the child of many prayers; for, as vividly as a flash of lightning, a scene, which the boy would never forget, came before his eyes. In the London home, on his deathbed, lay his father; and that father's last words rung in Charlie's ears, and filled his heart with a strange thrill: 'Promise me, through all your life, my child, to live honestly and honourably.'

The boy flung the gold on the counter, and, unconscious of and unheeding the eyes that were now watching him, cried aloud: 'Never! I will be true to my promise,' and bounded into the street.

Terror then lent him wings; for he heard, as he thought, the shopman calling after him, 'Stop, boy!' At last, wearied out, he leant against a wall at the corner of a lonely street, and burst into a flood of passionate sobs and tears. Some minutes passed, and he was quieter, when he heard a voice close beside him, saying gently: 'Poor child! will you tell me your grief?' He looked up, surprised; and oh! horror! he saw the gentleman who had been in the shop. Charlie would have fled again; but the gentleman laid a detaining hold upon his arm, and walked on with him.

'Tell me,' said he, 'about your promise; what was it? To whom was it given?'

'To my father; but oh! do not put me in prison; I never stole before. And oh! sir, my poor father! Oh! have mercy; and—'

'And you have not stolen now,' interrupted the gentleman; 'you have been spared that misery. Now tell me about yourself. What was your father's name?'

'Charles Lacy,' answered the boy; 'and he used to live in E——.'

The gentleman started; for the name brought to his remembrance a beautiful village girl, with whom his son had fallen in love; and when the stern father had forbidden the marriage, the impulsive youth had left his father's house, and married the girl.

From that hour the father had forbidden him ever again to cross his threshold. But when, two years later, repentance had come to the lonely father's heart, and he sought his son, he found only the graves of that son and his village bride. He heard, indeed, that a child had been born to them; but that the girl's relations had taken it away with them when they left that part of the country. Alas! all his endeavours to discover them had proved unsuccessful.

'Boy!' cried the gentleman eagerly, 'tell me, had your father a sister named Alie? Did she marry above her station? Did she leave a child? Have you a cousin? How long is it since you left E——? and does your father still live? Quick! answer! take me to him!'

Wonderingly Charlie answered the eager questioner; and when he heard the gentleman exclaim, 'Thank God, I have found her at last!' the truth burst upon him, and he knew he stood before Alie's grandfather.

'Oh! come to my mother, sir,' he cried; 'she will tell you all you wish to know.' The two—the boy leading the gentleman—hurried along the crowded London streets, until they came to Charlie's poor abode. The boy knocked; and, when the door was opened, burst into the room exclaiming: 'Oh, Alie, I knew you were born a lady! Alie, your wish is granted; you will never know sorrow nor want any more; you will never spend another unhappy Christmas!'

What more need be told? Alie went to live with her grandfather; but, to that benevolent gentleman's disappointment, Charlie would not accept more from him than his interest in procuring him a situation, where he received liberal payment, and, through honesty and industry, won himself a road to independence. His mother did not die just then; she lived to bless her son, in his own comfortable home, on the next Christmas eve, and then 'she passed to where, beyond these regions, there is peace.'

And what would it have been had Charlie Lacy not found grace to resist temptation?

Many years had passed away, when one day a splendid carriage drove up to a house, in one of the most fashionable parts of London, and a lady and a gentleman alighted. It was Charlie Lacy; and he led into his home his newly married bride—his cousin Alie.

'COME WITH ME FROM LEBANON.'

Ah! fiercely blows the wind
From Hermon's snow;
Through mists that chill and blind,
Sadly I go!
Oh! who amid these rocks a way can find?
See, from his lair
How wild eyes glare,
Of the gaunt lion, hungry for his prey!
Amid the clouds expires the trembling ray.
Hark! on the mountains how the thunders roar
Still more and more!
Now fails the little strength I had before.

So mourns the weary one
Lost on her way;
Quickly the sinking sun
Bears off the day.
Well may the prudent shepherd shun
So sad a path
Of threatening death.
Amid these hills how many an unknown grave!
Bewildered here, oh, who can help or save!
Well may the wanderer fail
Upon her course,
Without resource!
But hark! a voice, a voice
Restores her force.

'Come from these gloomy heights,
My love, with me;
These horrid sounds and sights
Forsaken be!
To yonder valley, teeming with delights,
Let us descend,
Where wild-flowers blend
Their gentle breaths into one rich perfume,
And where pomegranates shine in scarlet bloom,
And not an angrier sound is heard
Than note of bird,
Or plash of stream, or leaves by zephyr stirr'd.

'Come, come, my love, with me;
I am thy guide.
Fix thy moist eyes on me,
Close at thy side.
Lean on mine arm, for weary must thou be,
And faint and cold;
But I will hold
Thee safely up, and in yon shining dell,
Far, far below, thou soon shalt rest thee well;
And I beside thee tender watch shall keep While thou shalt sleep;
And waking, love, thou never more shalt weep.

E. A. W.

Miscellaneous.

Have Something to Say.—When a man speaks, not because he has something to say, but because he has to say something, it is not surprising if he fails in producing any practical result. He strikes at the air; and, though the blow may be admirably delivered, it is difficult to see that it has any effect. There is a great consumption of powder, a great flash, and a loud explosion; but as the discharge is irregularly and loosely delivered, and as there is no mark aimed at, the display amounts to little more than a letting off of fireworks.

Pleasure Seeking.—There is a growing tendency to blend amusement and religion. In their very fine building, the New York Young Men's Christian Association propose to put up bowling and billiard rooms; and other rooms for recreation are to be added, it is said. It is estimated that half a million pounds were spent in New York last year in attending places of amusement. How much the above seems like the filling up of some of the outlines of the dark picture of the last days, as drawn by an inspired penman eighteen centuries ago! 'This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come: for men shall be lovers of their own selves . . . proud . . . high-minded; lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. From such turn away.'

The Rapids of Time.—The reader may have stood by the Falls of Niagara. A short distance above the cataract the waters become very rapid; hence that part of the mighty stream is called 'The Rapids.' So it seems to us that we are in the rapids of time; and the cataract of eternity is just before us! The eye of enlightened faith sees it; the ear of faith hears its dreadful roar; and the voice of wisdom says to all men everywhere, 'Prepare to meet thy God.' 'Be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh.' 'Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth.'

The Best Classics.—The best classics are the word of God. I will put the story of Joseph against any narrative in any language. The oldest epic is not that of Homer, but the book of Job. It is full of scientific truths, of beautiful imagery. If some of his expressions were found in Aristotle, they would be canonized by the philosophers. Take the narrative of the raising of Lazarus from the dead, as recorded in the New Testament—could it be amended? I think not. There are twelve verses in the 12th chapter of Romans, which a little girl could commit to memory before breakfast, that contain more true principles to put us through this life than all the writings of heathen philosophers or sages.

Responsibility.—It is said that Michael Angelo saw a block of marble, and said to his servant, 'Go, bring me my tools. There is an angel chained here, and I will knock off his chains and set him free;' and he soon wrought out a beautiful angel form for the world to admire. Behold the children we are to mould, not into lifeless angel forms for the inspection of a gazing world, but living angel characters to be presented at the bar of God. Angelo's work must be defaced, and finally ruined, by the finger of time; but ours must be for ever improving along the cycles of eternity.

Division.—'I am of Paul; and I of Apollos; and I of Cephas; and I of Christ.' To set aside this uplifting of man, and the making Christ the head of a party—of a few, and not the whole—Paul proposed three questions: 'Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? Or, were ye baptized in the name of Paul?' Are not these questions deeply important for our times also? If rightly understood, they would unite the saints around the cross; for an undivided Christ admits not of a divided body. If due preference were given to the cross, a thousand elements of division would be abandoned; fathers, young men, and babes, would at once meet around the cross, on one common level, to hail together their common salvation. If Christ is not divided, should his church be so? If Paul was not crucified for us, why be called after any other name, badge, or distinction, save that name which is common to all? If we were baptized in Jesus' name, why take another? What distinctions do Christian people require? Is it not that they are not separated from one another, though they are from the world?

The Difference.—Mrs. G—— was one day visiting an aged man, a friend of her father, and one who was associated with him in early life. Though differing widely in sentiment, the two old men still felt a deep interest in each other. Mr. S—— had been one of those who run after the world and overtake it. All that it can give, he had obtained. Now he inquired of the state of his friend, whom he knew to be in circumstances of far less external comfort than himself. As he listened to the story of his patience in suffering, and of the cheerfulness with which he could look forward, either to a longer pilgrimage in this world, or to the hour of death, his conscience applied the unexpressed reproach, and he exclaimed, 'Yes, yes, you wonder I cannot be as quiet and happy too; but think of the difference; he is going to his treasure, and I—I must leave mine.'—Tract Journal.

The Name of God.—I had in my regiment several men who were called 'preachers' by the coloured people, because they always took charge of their meetings, and exhorted a great deal. One of these was about fifty years old, with grey hair, and wrinkled face, and somewhat enfeebled constitution; for he had been a hard-working, much abused man. He was very anxious to learn to read, and with great effort he made considerable progress in a short time. He had learned the alphabet, and was reading words of two or three letters; and one day, as I sat by his side, going over the words with him, and pointing out to him the objects which they stood for, we came to the word, written in large letters—'God.'

'That is the name of the Being you preach about sometimes,' said I.

He dropped his book, and held up his hands in surprise, and exclaimed, with deep emotion, 'Is that the name of God? and that the way it looks when printed?'

'Yes,' said I, 'that is the name of your heavenly Father;' and I picked up the book, and found the place for him; but his eyes were full of tears of joy, which he had to brush away before he could see the blessed name again.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

REV. XXII. 14.

THE last three chapters of Revelation correspond with the first three of Genesis. Creation, and new creation; the Paradise of man, and the Paradise of God; Paradise lost, Paradise regained; man expelled, man brought back again. This 14th verse fits in with the 24th verse of the third of Genesis. Let us look at its parts:

I. The city.—It is the New Jerusalem. At the first creation there was no city, only a garden with one man in it; now, there is a city in the midst of the garden, and the citizens are the multitude that no man can number. It is a glorious city; well-built, well-watered, well-founded, well-paved, well-lighted—altogether perfect. 'God hath prepared for them a city,'—a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

II. The gates.—These gates are twelve, each one a pearl; gates for redeemed men to enter by; gates never shut; gates for both men and angels; gates which lead into the palace of the King; through which the sons of the second Adam can enter into the New Jerusalem. They are made by God's own hands. They are the everlasting gates or doors, sung by David, at which the King of Glory enters. They are the gates through which there is the 'abundant entrance' into the everlasting kingdom. Not 'strait' now, but wide; not painful to pass through, but pleasant and glorious. Divine gates, for a divine city, in the midst of which there is the palace of the King.

III. The tree.—It is the tree of life, spoken of in Genesis, and also specially noted in the promise to the church of Ephesus. It is the life-giving tree; not only now in the midst of the earthly Paradise, but the Paradise of God; nor only in the midst of Paradise, but in the midst of the city; for Jerusalem and Paradise are now one. The tree, which no doubt symbolizes Christ himself (as does the water of life), is doubtless a real tree, only more heavenly, more spiritual, than that which grows on earth. The tree is laden with fruit; it has twelve kinds of fruit; it has a monthly harvest; its leaves are for the healing of the nations. As there is the bread of life, and the hidden manna, so is there also this tree of life—this true plant of renown.

IV. The blessed ones.—It is God who calls them blessed, and they must be so whom He calls such. Throughout this book there are several noted by this name. 'Blessed is he that readeth;' 'blessed is he that watcheth;' 'blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.' But here there is something more. There are three points of blessedness.

1. They keep his commandments.—This carries us back to the 119th Psalm, and reminds us of the blessedness in which David rejoiced. In keeping of these commandments there is great reward, and great peace. We are called and forgiven, that we may keep these. It is to a life of such keeping that we are called. By such a life we partake of blessedness, as well as glorify God. We are redeemed that we may be holy—that we may walk in the commandments of the Lord our God, and delight in his law after the inner man. This delight is blessedness. In so keeping them, we are to remember that we are called to shun all sin, to abstain from all appearance of evil; to be truthful, honest, kind; not slanderers, not backbiters, not deceivers; to remember such exhortations as: 'Let him that stole, steal no more;' 'be not filled with wine;' 'flee fornication;' 'not purloining, but showing all good fidelity;' 'speaking truth one with another;' attending to all the 'minor morals' of the Christian life; setting before us the commandments of the Lord daily. For no commandment is small or trivial. Thus, one of the names of a Christian is a keeper of the commandments of God.

2. They have a right to the tree of life.—Not by merit, only by grace; yet still a right—something which they can claim. The reception of pardon is simply in believing; but the reward is the result of good works. This statement as to keeping the commandments and its fruits, is no more inconsistent with a free salvation than such an expression, 'holiness, without which no man can see the Lord;' nor with our Lord's 'beatitudes,' each of which gives expression to the same kind of thought as here. What joy to have access, rightful access, to the tree of life! Adam's expulsion and forfeiture reversed, and we introduced into the better Paradise, with the conscious certainty that we cannot fall or be driven out! No flaming sword to guard the way! All open and free! To feed on that tree for ever; and, in feeding, find ourselves nourished and invigorated in every faculty! No death, nor disease, nor weakness, nor weariness, in sight of such a tree as this. All life and health for ever!

3. They shall enter in through the gates into the city.—They are blessed in a threefold way: as doers of the commandments; as partakers of the tree of life; as triumphant conquerors, entering in procession through the gates into the city.

(a.) The city is their city.—Its name is the New Jerusalem. It is not for angels, but for men. God has built it for them; and so He is not ashamed to be called their God. The 'fire' into which the unrighteous are cast is 'prepared for the devil and his angels;' but the city is wholly prepared for these redeemed ones. They belong to it just now—their citizenship is in heaven—though they shall not enter it till their Lord returns as the King of glory. As Paradise was Adam's garden, so is the New Jerusalem their own city.

(b.) They shall enter through the gates into it.—Not over the wall, not by stealth, but as conquerors in triumphal procession; their Lord, as King of Glory, at their head. They are the conquerors so often mentioned in this book; and they shall be seen as such in the day of their entrance.

(c.) They shall possess it for ever.—This is evidently implied. Eternal possession! They shall go out no more. They are citizens of no mean city—of the joyous city. They shall not be driven out. No sword of fire to fence the gate. They, as the true cherubim, shall occupy the true Paradise, in which not only shall the tree of life be accessible, but the tree of knowledge shall be no more forbidden.

THE BOOK OF ALL AGES.*

IF the Bible is the book of the Spirit of God the Eternal, it must be a book for all ages. It cannot possibly be merely a record of the past, or a guide for the present. Emanating from Him who is, and was, and is to come, the Scripture also must be a book for all generations. All God's acts, as well as words, are in accordance with his counsel, and stand in relation to that whole plan which shall be fully manifested in the age to come. The Bible is therefore an eternal book. We breathe here the atmosphere of eternity. The author is He who is Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. Hence we find in every Scripture narrative, and in every successive revelation, limited and individual as it may be in its form, an element which is universal; it contains a lesson for every period of the church's history, even as it is connected with the whole economy of God's dealings with men. The Scripture is a whole in every part, a mirror of the world, and a picture of all ages. The words of Scripture are according to the all-comprehensive view of God; and though often very limited and local, everything is of the widest application.

Hence it is, also, that Scripture does not merely contain prophecy, but that it is throughout prophetic. It is a superficial though not uncommon view, that prophecy does not constitute one of the general features of the Bible, but is limited to a few portions of the word; this opinion is refuted by a single view of the facts. We have not merely the books pre-eminently prophetical, and thus designated by common consent, as Isaiah, Daniel, Zechariah, etc., and the Revelation; but looking at the historical books, we find in the Pentateuch, and in the subsequent historical portions, continual prophecy. In that first gospel, by which the Lord himself broke the silence which sin had introduced, and opened the gate of heaven, even before He banished man from the garden of Eden, we have the most comprehensive prophecy, which still awaits its final fulfilment, when Satan shall be bruised under our feet, and the kingdom of righteousness be established. In the words of Noah, in the promises given to Abraham, in the blessing of Jacob, in the predictions of Balaam, in the song of Moses, by the mouth of Hannah, by the Lord himself to David, etc., we have prophecy. In the Gospels we have the prophetic discourses of the Lord Jesus (as well as the parables, which most probably have a secondary prophetic meaning); in the Epistles (for instance, Romans and Thessalonians), prophecy about Israel, the Antichrist, the return of Jesus. In the book of Psalms (where we would least expect it), we have, almost throughout, prophecy of the Messiah, his sufferings, his glory, and his kingdom. Scarcely a single book of Scripture which does not contain prophecy. And how could it be otherwise, when Jesus, his first and his second coming, God's kingdom, the struggle with the great enemy, and the victory, form the substance of the book?

We have also Scripture authority for viewing the history and characters of the Bible as prophetic. Thus Christ views the period of Noah as foreshadowing the days before his coming to judgment; the Apostle Paul, in describing the Antichrist, uses words of Daniel which had received only partial fulfilment in Antiochus Epimanes. The history of Joseph and his brethren is a striking type of Jesus in his relation to the Jews, etc. The Song of Solomon is also prophetic, the principles and spiritual experience it contains being, at the same time, of immediate use and application.

If Scripture does not merely contain prophecy, but is prophetic throughout, does it not follow, that any exposition of Scripture or system of teaching which is without the prophetic element, must be different from the tone of the Bible, and must be defective even where it is correct? Can it be said of what is commonly called 'orthodox preaching,' that it is scriptural; that it is the same as that of the apostles, who, we find, invariably taught the people from the very outset, not merely to turn to God, but to wait for the coming of the Lord Jesus from heaven? Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, as the object of faith; Jesus, dwelling in the heart by the Spirit, as the object of love; Jesus Christ returning for us, as the object of hope,—such was the simple and comprehensive evangel.

The eternal character of Scripture may be viewed in a twofold aspect. As opposed to the limitations of time it manifests itself as prophecy.

* From Mr. Saphir's most interesting, freshly thought, and vigorously written book, Christ and the Scriptures. London: Morgan & Chase. 1867.

Scripture contains the gradual unfolding of the counsel of God in constant reference to its final consummation. But the eternal character of Scripture manifests itself also in another way. Scripture reveals not merely the things which are future, but eternal things which are not seen. 'Eternal' is that which is spiritual, real, substantial, heavenly. In nature and history, in men and nations, in conflicts and victories, there is an outward, temporary, visible element, and an inward, spiritual, and essential element. The Spirit of God deals with all in an eternal way; that is, his representation of the visible and partial manifestations of God in nature and history continually seize the hidden meaning, and unveil the real and unfading substance. Thus eternity, as a characteristic of Scripture, includes two elements, the one opposed to the limits of time, the other as showing the substance under the transitory form. Scripture has thus, if we may say so, extensive and intensive eternity.

Hence it is that Scripture is throughout parabolic. It views the visible as corresponding to, and showing forth, the unseen. It explains the silent language of nature; it beholds the principles of the spiritual world shadowed forth in the manners and experiences of men. When Jesus speaks in parables, it is in accordance with the whole method of Scripture. He is the true Son of David, who read the two books of nature and of the written word (Ps. xix.); the true Son of Solomon, who saw in earthly prudence the mirror of heavenly wisdom, and who uttered proverbs—i.e., parables, dark sayings—clear in their primary meaning, but suggestive of higher lessons. Jesus spake in parables, not merely because He was the Son of David and Solomon, the Israelite trained in God's school of revelation, but also because He was the Son of man. Man ought to have an eye for the beautiful works of God, for the light and the innumerable hues of wondrous beauty; he ought to have an ear to hear the thousand voices around him of deep solemnity and exquisite tenderness, even as his mouth should show forth the praises of God in response to God's message of love and power at sundry times and in divers manners. But there is a separation, through sin, between heaven and earth; and it is faith only that can see the things which are not seen in the things which do appear. Jesus was in heaven while He lived on earth (John iii. 13); the essence of all things lay before Him. God and his kingdom, Satan and his kingdom, He beheld and traced throughout. He opened his mouth in parables.

He spake of nature. He had watched the clouds and the red sky at evening; the sun in his glory; the fowls of the air in their blithe carelessness; the flowers of the field in their gorgeous beauty; the wisdom of serpents, the guilelessness of doves; the eagle's keen eye and sudden descent; the hen gathering her chickens under her wings; the wind blowing where it listeth; the vine and its branches; the trees good and bad; the fig-tree and its leaves; the mustard-seed and its development;—all this became to Him a picture of heavenly things.

He spake of man; of the relationships and occupations of human life; of the eye as the light of the body; of the eye and hand which endanger life and health, and require to be cut off; of the sick, who need a physician; of the father giving good gifts to his child; of the mother rejoicing that a child is born into the world; of the friend showing himself friendly to his neighbour; of the shepherd and the flock; the king and his nation; the master and his stewards; the merchant seeking goodly pearls; the sower going forth to sow; the fishermen casting out the net; even the little children playing in the market-place;—and in all this He beheld pictures of eternal truth and spiritual relationships.

He noticed also the foolish and the evil ways of men: the unrighteous judge, who feared not God, neither regarded man; the rich man trusting in his earthly possessions; the unmerciful servant, who will not forgive, though himself a debtor to mercy; the unjust steward; the man who begins to build without counting the cost; the thief and robber; the hireling;—and here also He sees spiritual principles, eternal results.

He noticed the common objects and events around Him: salt; the light and candlestick; the house and its foundation; the door; bread and water; the ways of the good householder. He spake of the marriage feast and the wedding garment;—in all He beheld the things that are real and are for ever.

And how constantly does He use the Scripture symbolism—speaking of the temple as his body, the manna in the wilderness, the brazen serpent, the water drawn at the feast, the vineyard which bare no fruit—according to the way in which God had spoken of them to his people!

This parabolic teaching is not for the purpose of making difficult truth more easy to a passive intellect or an inactive conscience. It has for its object to conceal the precious jewel from the eye of the sluggard and worldly, and to rouse the mind and to prepare the heart of the sincere. The chief purpose, however, is, according to the spirit of parabolic teaching, to impress on us that we are even now in eternity; that everywhere we are surrounded by the same God; that the invisible kingdom is manifested in the visible; that God, and his truth, and his righteousness, are the true reality and substance.

The meaning of symbolism is based on the great fundamental fact that God is the Creator, and that Christ is the beginning of the creation of God. Thus there must be a great parallelism between the realm of nature and that of spirit. And as all things are upheld for Christ's sake, in Him and unto Him, there must be a great parallelism between history—the events and relationships which arise in providence—and the history of grace in redemption. There is only one Word of God, who expresses himself in nature and in the spiritual world. Hence we have such striking resemblances. 'Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.' This mysterious law is true also in the spiritual world, finding its most wonderful and perfect fulfilment in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Thus we are prepared to find in all the realms of God's kingdom, from the lowest to the highest, symbols of Christ. In the lowest we have Christ represented by the Stone, the Rock—the emblem of strength, of firmness, of never-changing stability; the foundation which cannot be moved. But He is also like the Plant. His is life, even as He gives life. He is therefore called the Branch (or ZEMACH), simply and most generally representing the idea of organic life. And this in its highest and noblest form, for He is the Vine; and in its loveliest and most beauteous manifestation, for He is the Rose. But He is symbolled forth in a higher kingdom than that of the plants. He is strong and royal as a Lion; He is meek and gentle, attractive and patient, 'made for suffering,' like a Lamb. But yet higher we rise. He is called 'the Son of Man;' for whatsoever is truly human (according to the idea of God)—wisdom and love, strength of purpose and gentleness of submission, concentration in God and expansive benevolence to all, work and energy, and meditative rest and festive Sabbath,—all that is truly man finds in Him its perfect exponent and fulfilment. And above all, He, the true Microcosm, in whom and by whom all things were created and are upheld, and who is the very Spirit of All, in so far as it is,* is the Lord of glory, the Son of the Father, God of God, and Light of light. The Father beholdeth all things in Him, who is the beginning of the creation of God; and we, to our unspeakable joy, with adoring hearts and light-filled eyes, learn to see all things in Him and Him in all things.

Jesus speaks of himself as the King, the Shepherd, the Friend, and the Bridegroom; while the Spirit is spoken of under the emblems of Wind, or Breath, Fire, Oil, Water, and the Dove.

* Sin is not substance.

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER III.

PILGRIMS TO THE JORDAN—MOSLEM PILGRIMS TO NEBY MOOSA.

PALM SUNDAY was a clear, fresh, beautiful morning; the air light and buoyant; the sun bright, but not hot. As we walked to church, we met multitudes, both of the pilgrims and of the Jerusalem Christians, carrying palms, a few of which were left as they had been gathered, simple, natural branches; but by far the greater number had been woven into ingenious patterns. Some had two or three, doubtless, to carry home to their friends in distant countries.

'There is something very impressive,' remarked Walter, 'in this commemoration of an event which occurred nearly two thousand years ago. Very few of these people look as if they could read, and yet they have been made familiar with most of the great facts of the gospel history; and now they are carrying their palm branches along the streets of the very city which our Lord entered in triumph, as on this day.'

'True, Walter; but I was just thinking of the wonderful effect upon the non-Christian nations, if the Oriental churches, while keeping up these celebrations in Jerusalem, were to give their children the more complete teaching which we have in our Church of England.'

'No doubt. Yet one would suppose that the reformation of the Greek, Armenian, and other Oriental churches, might rather tend to the gradual discontinuance of these commemorations.'

'Oh, I don't know, Walter. If they could be rid of the gross superstitious part, there is something very fine in the idea of these yearly Christian festivals here in Jerusalem,—gatherings of the nations, as they might be, and are even now.'

'Just so; but I doubt that the lower classes of any country would undertake so long, so painful and expensive a journey, unless they felt that their salvation in some sort depended on it. Take that away, and no other motive would be strong enough to bring them here. Yesterday, in passing the Church of the Sepulchre, two Kamschatdales were pointed out to me. They had been two years on the journey hither. Then look at the aged women we see among the pilgrims, and the peasant women, with infant children. Would anything move our English artisans or peasantry to save up their money for years, in order to make such a journey to Jerusalem?'

'At any rate, nothing does move them, Walter. I suppose you are right. They would come like the rest, if they were taught that it would do their souls any good. But English travellers do come.'

'Yes they do; and we shall find our chapel pretty full this morning, for I saw a large party arrive last night. But I am afraid, Emily, in most cases they only come as sightseers, because the journey to Egypt and Palestine has taken the place of the grand tour.'

'But surely, Walter, there are many in our country who long to come to Jerusalem, and would do so at Easter if they could, though all the sights, as you call them, were done away with!'

'There are some, of course; but, I fancy, chiefly of that class who cannot afford the expense.'

We entered the church ground, and our conversation ended. There were many travellers there, and very devoutly did they all join in the service. Yet Walter was right; the greater number were young men, travelling after leaving the university. One, however, was a clergyman, and I could see by the way in which he read the service, that Palm Sunday spent in Jerusalem would be a day never to be forgotten by him.

The bustle in the city that evening was extraordinary. Mules and camels, and horses and donkeys, pouring in from the surrounding villages, or picketed, ready saddled, in the streets, their owners sleeping beside them on the stones. Numerous as were the animals belonging to the pilgrims, they were not enough to convey so vast a multitude. Most of the Greek and Russian pilgrims had come by sea to Joppa, and had no animals of their own. The hum of preparation filled the air, and was distinctly heard even at our quiet end of the town.

In the evening, Constantine came to say that a relation of his mother's had arrived as pilgrim from Damascus, and he wished to go with him to the Jordan to-morrow.

'And your work, Constantine?'

'Haj Omar will do the marketing, and Um Habeeb the house-work.'

He was, in fact, ready to start; all had been arranged before our leave was asked. We afterwards found out that his mother was very unwilling he should go, for fear of accidents; but, nevertheless, he went; for in Jerusalem it is more usual for a son to control his mother, than for the son to obey. They are treated like men while yet children, and are soon beyond all restraint. However, many of them afterwards become attentive and dutiful, even deferential; though they will say, and feel, if the mother says anything foolish, 'Is she not an old woman? what can she know?' The mixture of contempt and reverence is very curious, utterly different from the affectionate regard with which an English son looks up to his mother.

Early, early did we both get up next morning. It was not daylight, yet the bustle and stir of the evening before had been nothing to the noise, the cries, the mule-bells, and firing of guns which filled the air. Large parties were coming down the Via Dolorosa towards our end of the town, that they might go out at the St. Stephen's gate. We swallowed our cups of coffee. Haj Omar had shod the horses, after their recent grazing holiday, and we made the best of our way down to the Damascus gate, so as to avoid the living stream pouring out at the others. Here, again, we met numbers who had come round from the Joppa gate; but, once out of the city, it was easy, by getting into the fields, to keep clear of the crowd, and we cantered round to a point whence we could overlook the valley of Jehoshaphat and the road up the Mount of Olives.

It was then only fully daylight; but, early as it was, all the paths on Mount Moriah, especially those from St. Stephen's gate, were hedged with white sheets, each sheet containing a woman seated on the ground; and, between these white hedges, the pilgrims were passing in an unbroken stream.

Far over, on the Mount of Olives, was a detachment of soldiers, in marching order and great-coats. Certainly, a guard would be needed for maintenance of order, if not for protection, of this irregular host.

'Do let us get across the valley, Walter, and march some distance with them. I should so like to get a nearer view of this extraordinary scene.'

'It will not be easy, Emily; and you must beware of those huge wooden panniers. You might get a broken leg if one of them passed you too closely.'

We crossed the bed of the Kidron with difficulty, and were soon hedged in among the rest. But where shall I begin to portray the persons, groups, and humours of the motley scene?

The first sensation was that of dizziness, produced by the ceaseless onward movement before the eyes, the hum of voices, the jingling of mule and camel bells, the neighing of horses, and occasional musket shots fired at random, here, there, and anywhere.

The languages spoken were those of Babel.

Rich and poor were all together. Some pedestrians, carrying tin cases slung over their shoulders, for the purpose of bringing back Jordan water; others crawling in abject misery, or begging scraps of food, with squalid insolence, from those well off.

The animals looked all the better for their recent feasting on green barley; the majority of the riders, on the contrary, pale and worn from the long Lenten fast.

There were numbers of women and children of all ages, singly, or in families. Sometimes a lady was seen astride the vast pack-saddle of a mule, covered by her white sheet; the toe points of her yellow boots turned nobly outwards, enabling her to kick the beast with her heels. Some were veiled; others, the Greeks, chiefly dressed in deep blue, had nothing over their faces.

Then came two elderly ladies, widows, and equals in misfortune in more senses than one. They were sitting, each in a pannier, slung across one camel, and holding fast by a short upright pole in front of their pen-like receptacle; the extended umbrellas giving shade to one and the other by turn, as the camel's step see-sawed them up and down. This pitching and rolling of the huge animal was often alarming, especially where children were concerned, and reminded us of their name—'ships of the desert.' Most of the riders had cruses of water hung within reach, and most seemed to have provisions with them, while some were actually eating. Sometimes a camel would be halted and brought to his knees, to enable a mother to descend and nurse her baby with some degree of comfort.

There was a good deal of family happiness visible. In one place, the father was leading the donkey upon which his wife and child were mounted—resembling the pictures of the Holy Family escaping to Egypt. In another place, a father rode one donkey, with a child behind him, clinging to his waist, while the wife rode another, with other children in her lap; the bedding followed on a mule, led by its owner, who was singing in Arabic, at the top of his voice, and professionally indifferent to the destination of his employers; the dog keeping up as he could, and sometimes losing his master among the bewildering crowd.

There were sick, halt, and blind, mounted and led. There were negroes, Russians, Abyssinians, and Franks; several of the latter wearing red umbrellas, to protect them from the sun. Comparatively speaking, the Latins are few in numbers; still there were representatives from all the Roman Catholic countries of Europe; there were American travellers from beyond the Atlantic, and pilgrim subjects of the Czar from the farthest limits of Asia.

Occasionally a Bedouin Arab mingled with the crowd, bearing a long lance, with ostrich feathers, in a tuft, just under the iron head. He belonged to some of the Moslem companies who were wending their way, in town and village parties (each company having its banner), to the annual sacrifice at Neby Moosa, this being also the season for pilgrimage to the supposed tomb of Moses. There were groups from Damascus and Gaza, Nablus, and Hebron, and Aleppo; negroes from Africa; and wealthy-looking pilgrims, austere and fanatic, from Algiers and Morocco; dark, swarthy men from Persia and Bokhara; and others, again, whose lithe limbs, as well as their complexion and their dress, bespoke the Hindoo race.

The Moslems mixed freely with the Christians upon the same road, and sometimes enlivened the scene by scuffles amongst themselves, in which they employed the butt ends of their guns, and their clubs. Many were leading sheep for the sacrificial fulfilment of their vows at Moses' tomb, and some of the beautiful mares on which the Arabs rode, were followed by infantile colts on the trot.

It had not been possible for Walter and me to converse; we could not turn in the least aside from the path without risk of being crushed by some passing animal. So we went on, and the sun had risen before we reached Bethany. At last, about half an hour beyond Bethany, we got off the road, and crossed the valley above the fountain of the Apostles (so called), and took up a position on the opposite hill to survey the long torrent of humanity rolling forwards in graceful undulations among the hills. The soldiers, about 300, piled arms, and rested for half an hour. It was said they were waiting for some one.

'What a spectacle it has been, Emily! Oh that I could have drawn some of the groups! I got a few scratches down in my pocket-book, just to remind me. If this place were not so hot, I would sketch now. But it is not safe for you to stay—the sun is high already.'

We returned, keeping up the road among the fields. For some time the stream continued; but at the foot of the Mount of Olives we met the interpreter of the Greek patriarch and his party, admirably mounted (Greek monks always ride good horses), closing the general procession. Last of all came the Pasha's deputy, and the chief of the police, Jornhim Aga, and some irregular cavalry, with silk banners, a professional jester, and kettle drummers, whose drums (about four inches in diameter) echoed among the hills. With these was a large party of English travellers in various costumes and head-dresses—from the turban to a straw hat—chatting or laughing gaily. I recognised the clergyman who had read prayers on Sunday. He looked perplexed, as if he was at a loss to reconcile the solemn recollections and associations of the Mount of Olives and Bethany, with present circumstances, and the scenes of the moment. No wonder!

A little farther on, we found some fellahhâl (peasant women) employed in gathering the young green almonds from the trees. They offered me a handful, and Walter gave them backsheesh; but we neither of us liked the almonds as they seemed to do, crunching the green shell and all. They were gathering them for the market; and Um Habeeb considered them excellent additions to her fasting fare. In passing by the monument of Absalom, we saw two Moslem men and a woman throwing stones at it; but they could not, or would not, tell us why.

One would have expected Jerusalem to be very quiet, and the streets almost deserted, after the departure of so large a body of people. By no means. At the St. Stephen's gate we met a fresh procession of Moslem derwishes and rabble, on their way to Neby Moosa. They had just come from the temple enclosure, with drums, flags, and clapping of hands. The drums were very large, and, much as our horses had already endured that morning, they could scarcely be got to face this party, which was accompanied by dancing derwishes and conjurers—evil-looking fellows. They stopped just within the gateway, where, not being able to pass them, we were obliged to witness the performances, which they repeat every hundred yards or so, during their progress through Jerusalem. After writhing about in an extraordinary manner, by way of dancing, and waving a naked sword, one of the conjurers suddenly stabbed himself in various places, to my horror, but did not hurt himself. Then they pretended to eat fire, and licked red-hot iron, in a manner that looked terrible; the music of the drum and copper symbols continuing meanwhile, and a large copper basin was beaten by a club, stuck with nails, to which dangling chains were attached, the men singing in chorus, and the women screaming in between!

At last they moved on. 'That is the most heathenish sight I have seen in my life, Walter; and they were a villanous-looking set.'

'It would be very interesting if one could trace back some of these customs, and find out their origin. There must be many a remnant of heathenism lingering among these Moslem villagers.'

'What a different-looking set those were, to the peasantry of this district!'

'Yes. I should like to find out where they came from. Here, Emily, if we had nothing else to do, would be a most interesting task, to seek out and identify the remnants of ancient nations still existing in Palestine. They call them all Arabs; but there must be Canaanites, and Philistines, and Ammonites, and Syrians, and others beside, all mixed up together.'

'I had not thought of that before; but it is not impossible.'

'It seems to me very likely, if not certain. What else could have become of all these nations? We know that they were not annihilated.'

'Look, Walter! it must be very late, there is Nathaniel coming up the street for his lesson.'

The boy looked pale and agitated.

'What is the matter, Nathaniel?'

'Oh, sir, I met so many of those Gentiles—Turks with swords and music, and they wanted to beat me; and one man had a great, large serpent, and I was very much afraid, and ran away.'

'This won't do, my boy. You must not come any more this week, until the Neby Moosa people are gone away. Come in now, and we will have our lesson, and then I'll take you home myself.'

My brother heard him repeat what he had learned, while he was breakfasting, and then took him home. On his return, he told me that as he was coming back through the streets, it was extremely hot. He met another of these processions, and the dancing derwish fell from exhaustion, and was found to be actually dead; and, only a very little farther on, in the square, another missed his aim in the pretended stabbing with a sword, and also fell dead. The indifference of the bystanders was extraordinary. They did not seem at all shocked, only a little surprised. True, the music stopped a while; but there was no semblance of grief. I forbade Nathaniel coming again till all this is over; it is not safe.

'Did you see Rachel?'

'Yes, she sends her "duty" to you. She was sewing, and hearing her cousin Judah read English. The young fellow has quite spoilt himself.'

'Why; what has he done?'

'Changed his Jewish dress, that became him so well, for a mean-looking English suit.'

'What a pity! Yet, I dare say his English suit will be safer for him walking about the streets. Rude, rough people will be more afraid to touch him in that, than in his Jewish costume.'

CHAPTER IV.

PASSION WEEK—THE HOLY FIRE.

THE next evening, Um Morkas, Constantine's mother, came to me, pale, trembling, and frightened. She had heard that a person had been drowned in the Jordan, and was afraid, lest of all the thousands present, it should prove to be her son. I tried to reassure her, and asked how the news had come. 'From Siloam.' Some peasantry had come back and told the news; but she had not seen them. I sent Haj Omar down to Siloam to inquire. He brought back word that a person had been drowned, but that it was an old woman, who could not swim. So the poor mother was comforted; and early next morning her son returned safe, but scarcely sound. He had been thrown into the river during the rush of the pilgrims, and though he had succeeded in scrambling out again, got very severely bruised, in fact, trampled upon. However, there were no bones broken, which was a mercy.

What a strange bustling Passion week this was! All Wednesday morning, the popping of guns over the Mount of Olives announced that the pilgrims were coming back—not in dense masses as they had gone, but in straggling companies of tens and twenties. The drums and the discordant music of the derwish processions filled the streets of the city during the week.

There was service in our little chapel on that day, and Thursday, and Good Friday, quite serious, and befitting the solemnity of the season; but the crowds that beset every street made it very difficult to get to church, and the bustle, the buying and selling, jarred painfully on our feelings, when we recollected the stillness and solemnity in England's busy thoroughfares on Good Friday.

On the evening of Thursday, Walter joined me on my terrace, at the top of the house, and there we enjoyed the quiet.

The hum and murmur of thousands in the city below, seemed to enhance the repose and silence which brooded over the Mount of Olives. Was it not so on that night when our Saviour and his disciples quitted the city, crowded to overflowing, and the splendours of the temple courts, all lighted up for the festival, and sought the retirement of the Garden of Gethsemane?

Now the sacred precincts are shrouded in darkness,—the Moslem has no sympathy with either the Jewish Passover or the Christian Easter, both are alike meaningless to him,—and the cold, calm, moonlight, falls on the marble pavement, and just touches the edge of the gilded crescent on the great mosque.

It must have been as on this day that our Lord sat on yonder mount with his disciples, and prophesied against the temple, and all its new buildings. The season was the same; Olivet must have been green then, as now; the age of the moon the same; the city, as now, thronged with rival sects, vying with each other, hating each other.

Where is now the religion of Pontius Pilate—the religion of imperial Rome? Gone for ever.

But yonder on Zion are the beams of the Passover moon playing over the walls of a new and beautiful building, raised in honour of that very Jesus of Nazareth, by messengers from the then scarcely known island of Britain.

Strange, to look on such a night as this upon the fabric of Christchurch standing on Zion, on the very verge of the crowded quarter, where thousands of still unbelieving Jews are celebrating their Passover between it and the site of their once holy and beautiful house!

The interval between Peter's denial and the second crowing of the cock must have been very short, for we heard the cocks around crow several times in a very few hours, and this is common in Palestine.

Walter had been distressed at the noise and confusion of the last few days. This was the first quiet moment we had found, and we lingered upon the terrace till the moon rode high over head. What a wonderful thought it is, that that very moon, each one of those very stars, were silent witnesses of the events of that night,—shining now, as then,—shining then, as they had done on the night of the first great Passover in Egypt, and lighted on their way the departing hosts of Israel!

I was awoke early on Good Friday morning by the incessant firing of guns and pistols; the Moslem pilgrims were returning in joyous crowds from Neby Moosa. Before I had quite finished dressing, Um Habeeb, my woman-servant, came running up to my room in great agitation.

'The fellahheen have entered the Church of the Resurrection. Oh, lady, may God shorten their days. They will take all the jewels, and kill the Christians, accursed Moslems that they are.'

'Hush! hush! Don't curse—Christians ought never to curse.'

'But they have entered our church. They are thieves, and the sons of thieves, and they will kill the Christians. Woe is me! woe is me!'

'Who told you that they had gone into the church? There are soldiers there; they could not do so.'

'My daughter, Safieh, has come running to tell me her aunt's husband was passing by, and he saw them,—five hundred men, with guns and flags. Woe is me! They will kill us all.'

I finished dressing as quickly as possible, and went in search of Walter, for the tale seemed too wonderful to be true. But he was out; however, Haj Omar was coming in, pipe in hand, with a bundle of green barley on his shoulder, for the horses; so I asked him, but the woman drowned my inquiry in a torrent of mingled questions and lamentations.

'Be dumb, thou foolish woman,' was Haj Omar's contemptuous reply. 'It is nothing—only a few fellahheen making a fantasia; they are all gone home now.'

'And did they go into our church?'

'No, they only went to the door. But why should they not see the show as well as thou, O thou of little sense?'

'Because they are Moslems. Do the Moslems let us go and look at their churches? Be ashamed, thou old man, for speaking the words of a child to the lady and to me.'

Haj Omar laughed, and turned on his heel, saying: 'Women have always but little sense.' Which Um Habeeb retorted, as soon as he was gone, by, 'All Moslems are liars.'

Walter, however, gave a more serious account of the matter, on his return. 'I was passing by the crowded entrance to the Holy Sepulchre, and stopped to look at the motley scene, when a troop of Moslems, firing guns all the way through the bazaars and streets as they came, did attempt to enter the outer court of the Sepulchre, perhaps only to pass out by the opposite door; the priests, fortunately, saw them in time, and got the guards to send them away quietly, before the pilgrims were fully aware of what was going on. But those nearest to me, among whom were some desperate-looking fellows, had begun to handle their knives and sticks ready for battle, and I was thankful to see the Mohammedans turn quietly down another street. Really, it will be wonderful if this Easter passes off quietly. It must be an anxious time for the Pasha.'

We took a long round in going to church, in order to avoid the principal thoroughfares; and after the service, passed out at the Zion gate, preferring to make the circuit of the walls, in hope of some quiet. But it was not to be; for we met several noisy parties of Moslem pilgrims, who, however, did not molest us.

Much as Constantine had been hurt at the Jordan, he insisted on accompanying his mother to the church of the Holy Sepulchre, for the Good Friday evening service.

We had finished breakfast next morning before Um Habeeb and he came to their work, fatigued and warm, by the crowd and pressure, as well as by the length of the service. The church had been scarcely able to contain the vast congregation, and many a one had been in imminent danger of both life and limb.

'It was very pretty, O lady,' said Um Habeeb; 'our Patriarch, and the Fire Bishop, and all the other bishops and priests, wore all their jewels. The Franj (Latins), what have they got? Not anything, after (i.e. compared with) the Dair en Room (Greek convent).'

'Was there any disturbance?'

'None. The church was full of soldiers, and the Pasha stayed till three hours after midnight. The soldiers searched every one on going into church, to see if they had sticks or arms, because of the lies of the Franj. Who would think of taking pistols to prayers? It is like their lies. And then they had their prayers first. The Pasha put wood over our altar, that they might pray first, and spread their covering there, and they kept us waiting. And now, O lady, I am going to prepare the dinner, and Constantine will lay the table; for in two hours we must go to the fire.'

'You will be ill, Um Habeeb; you are tired already.'

'No matter, I must go to the fire.'

'What is the fire?' (I wished to hear her account of it.)

'Come and see it, O lady. It is very beautiful. It comes from the Holy Tomb.'

'But how does it get there?'

'Do I know? The priests say God makes it; the priests know, but I am ignorant.'

'It must come from God, O lady,' added Constantine; 'for it is not like other fire—it never burns nor hurts any one. Last year I saw the pilgrims put it to their faces, and hands, and beards, and it did not burn them at all.'

'Why did not you try it yourself?'

'I was afraid.'

'Did you try it, Um Habeeb?'

'Why should I try it? It is so; it does not burn people. Every one says so.'

The servants soon finished the work which they thought necessary to be done, and hurried off to the church. Walter went out for a solitary ride, and I remained at home, having some work to do. The quiet of the city was as wonderful as the noise of the past week had been distressing. The Moslem pilgrimages seemed to be over, for the drumming and screaming had ceased, and the hum and bustle from the Christians was suddenly hushed. The effect was extraordinary; and so great was the stillness, that the voice of the muezzin, on the minarets, had an almost startling effect, when they cried the noontide hour of prayer. The city was silent. The vast multitude had congregated in the church. The streets and convents were deserted.

My work finished, I went up to my dearly-loved terrace, that I might look abroad upon the city, and think. It was nearly two o'clock, and the intense sunshine only appeared to enhance the stillness. The domes of the Holy Sepulchre, the minarets near them, and the castle, stood clear and sharply defined against the blue sky. Suddenly I fancied I perceived some thin smoke rising from the grating at the top of the huge black dome over the sepulchre. No, it must be a mistake. Yes, here surely was smoke now; the fire must have appeared. In two minutes there was a volume of black smoke, rising as from a furnace, towards the pure blue of the heavens above, and the faint breeze carried it across the city, towards the Temple ground. This lasted for scarcely ten minutes, and then the hum began to be heard again; vaguely at first—a low murmur; then stronger, and more distinct, till the sound of many voices again filled the air, and I knew that the mighty congregation was dispersed.

Um Habeeb was the first to return. Not only her white sheet, but her clothes had been torn, completely spoilt by the struggling, scuffling crowd. Constantine also had a battered appearance; but they said that no lives had been lost. Each of them carried the taper which had been lighted at the holy fire.

'Have you tried the fire, Constantine?'

'I have tried it, O lady, here,' pointing to his moustache, which I then saw was half singed off.

'Then it does burn like common fire?'

Um Habeeb interrupted, angrily, 'O lady, it always burns people who have little faith. Constantine did not believe with his whole heart, and therefore it burnt him.'

'Then how came the holes in your own vail?'

'Can I know? perhaps some child burnt them in. Here, Constantine, if thou art going to be a farmason (freemason, alias Protestant, alias infidel), give me thy taper to keep for my funeral.'

'I will not give it thee; but keep it for my own funeral. I am no farmason.'

The sound of Walter's horse-hoofs at the door stopped the dispute, and they set about preparing dinner.

'Why, Emily, I have met some of the pilgrims actually leaving Jerusalem for Joppa. They have not come for Easter; but are going off now that the holy fire is over.'

'Is it possible?—the very day before Easter?'

'Yes, I met several scores; and there were others at the Joppa gate, just loading their mules.'

'I had no idea that the people attach so much importance to this fire.' I then told him about the conversation with the servants.

'Well, though I was out in the country, I saw something of the holy fire too, Emily. As I was coming by the Bethlehem road just now, I met two peasants, running with all their might, carrying the sacred fire in lanterns to Bethlehem; and, immediately after, there was a man on horseback, going for the same purpose, at full gallop. I also heard a good deal of firing over the hills, towards the west. I am afraid the Aboo Goshites are fighting again. They don't seem to have been frightened a bit by the Pasha's review last week, nor by all his expenditure of gunpowder. I suppose they know that he and his soldiers are busy just now, keeping the pilgrims from breaking each other's heads, and think it a good opportunity for them to fight it out.'

Haj Omar, our newsmonger from the bazaar, confirmed this. The Aboo Gosh faction had taken advantage of the moment, and had fallen upon the Christian village of Ain Karim, the day before, while the people were at church, and thus the fight was renewed, and several more lives were lost.

In the afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. Wells asked us to join them in going to the Sepulchre Church that evening, and see it when lighted up for the great Easter service, which begins at midnight. They told us that there was very near being a tumult in the church the night before;—that the Pasha, however, had a strong military force; and not only had the pilgrims been searched for arms and clubs, but that some clubs and knives had been taken from them, and even the English lady travellers were examined as they passed in.

'Can you explain to me the cause of all this disputing, Mr. Wells?'

'Yes, it is simply this: During the processions the Greeks and Latins each place a crucifix in the hole in the rock of Calvary. The marble slab is always covered by a Greek altar cloth of silk and wool; according to the Latins, it ought to be one of plain linen. Neither party choosing to give way, the Pasha had a wooden plank laid over the Greek altar cloth, upon which the Latin one was placed, and when their service was done, he took it away with his own hands. There were symptoms of a disturbance at one time; however, all has passed off well.'

'I suppose the Pasha deserves credit for that?'

'Indeed he does. It is believed that there are some fifteen thousand pilgrims here just now, and a riot must have had fearful consequences. We had an alarm yesterday morning, about a collision between the Moslems and the Christians at the church.'

'Yes, I happened to be there, and saw what passed. The guard behaved well, and with much tact; but some of the Christian pilgrims are quite ready to fight. What a ruffianly set many of them are!'

(To be continued.)

AN EMINENT STUDENT;

OR, SKETCHES FROM THE LIFE OF JAMES HALLEY.

BORN in Glasgow, on 17th January 1814, James Halley 'inherited from his parents neither rank nor wealth, yet he obtained through their means a more substantial portion—an early education.' When a boy, he was distinguished by high attainments in scholarship, and seldom has one who entered college at the early age of twelve made a more brilliant appearance throughout the whole of his curriculum. The highest honours which the University of Glasgow had it in its power to bestow were won by him—all the more creditable to him, as during his course of study he was obliged mainly to support himself by his efforts as a private tutor, teaching 'always four, and sometimes five hours a day.' In illustration of the versatility of his talents, his biographer tells us that during his attendance on the Divinity Hall, he, in the summer of 1834, enrolled himself as a student in the class for botany. Sir William Hooker, through the kindness of an anonymous friend, was enabled to offer a gold medal for the best essay on the natural history and uses of the potato. 'A treatise extending to 172 closely written quarto pages was given in by Halley. Though out of his usual line of study, it was pronounced the best, and the interloper carried off the medal, fairly won from the medical students on their own proper field.'

The same pen which could write on a botanical theme with such precision and power as to carry off the palm from numerous competitors, was wielded with equal vigour on those subjects which were more akin with the work of the ministry, to which he had devoted himself. He was a valued contributor to some of the leading Christian periodicals of his time; one of his articles in particular, communicated to the Presbyterian Review, being regarded as eminently distinguished by 'exact erudition and conclusive argument.'

Being a very superior Greek scholar, many of his journals and notes of Christian experience were penned in this language. Among his papers was found a solemn personal covenant, wholly written in Greek, apparently as a more certain means of ensuring secrecy, for at this period he was not at all willing to speak of his own religious state. Letters written at this period to friends, and numerous entries in his diary, show, however, the intense inward workings of a soul with whom God himself was dealing. Leaving Glasgow for Edinburgh University, towards the close of his studies, he soon gained the esteem of all his fellow-students, as well as his professors there. He gave attendance to reading, gathering up every fragment of time. 'I have hit,' he says, 'on a new plan of redeeming an odd corner of time. I infuse my own tea, and it stands by the fire fifteen minutes before I drink it. During that short space I have begun committing passages of Scripture to memory.' How he could write in the way of counsel to others, appears from his statement to a near relative on the subject of attendance at the Lord's Supper: 'He may give us in the ordinance a comfort which we could not bring to it. And the great question to settle in going is, whether we see ourselves to be utterly lost without Christ, and are willing now to commit our souls to Him in well-doing. If we are not willing to do this, we have no right to assume the badge of discipleship. But although we have not warm affections,—although we have many doubts and fears,—yet, if we have hungering desires after Christ and salvation, and a real willingness to be the Lord's in covenant, we may come, and the larger the expectations we come with the better.'

Again, to another friend: 'You say you do not despond enough. I would rather say, you are not humbled enough; and therefore you despond too much. You are out of humour that you can find no righteousness in yourself, and have not learned against hope to believe in hope—to submit yourself to the righteousness of Christ. Yet to this submission we must come. "Lord, help me, or I perish." . . . Your expression that you are hell-doomed pierced me through with many sorrows. Believe me, it was the result of pride: hell-deserving was the right word. I want the fact expressed by this last word to be deeply impressed on you. "Father, I have sinned, and am not worthy to be called thine;" but remember the Father's answer. To use the other word is to blame your Maker. Far be this from you.'

How fully he was alive to the danger of reading the Bible merely in a professional way, comes out from the following remarks: 'Fifty times in a single sitting at practical and experimental works, I find myself reading for others rather than myself. Meantime my own soul is starved, while I am filling my barns with the choicest of the wheat for my neighbours. The same evil appears in a different form at other times,—in an attempt to get up some state of feeling which is proper to me as a minister, rather than to cultivate it as a thing necessary for me as a sinner seeking salvation.'

Overstudy, which, alas! ruins the health of so many a promising student, told on that of James Halley with fatal power. Unmistakeable symptoms of pulmonary consumption having developed themselves, he was advised to try a residence in Madeira. The expenses of such a remedy were generously defrayed by a few gentlemen in Glasgow, who came nobly forward, 'not so much to save the life of a friend, as to preserve for labour in the vineyard one to whom the ten talents had been committed by our Sovereign Lord.' Two years and nine months were spent by him in Madeira; and though the disease ultimately ran its wonted course, and he returned to Britain merely to bid farewell to weeping friends, and then fall asleep in Jesus, there can be no doubt that his residence in that highly favoured island of the sea was a means of prolonging his life, while opportunities of usefulness were opened up to him even in the land of strangers.

Of the progress of his inner life, the following sketches, gleaned from his correspondence while abroad, will be sufficient evidence, while the sentiments to which they give expression may be comforting and quickening to many who peruse these lines.

On the eve of sailing, he writes: 'My prevailing feeling is, that if ever I return, it will be under tremendous obligations to labour more abundantly.' On the subject of Christian joy, he says: 'So far from having any tendency to throw a shadow over the mind, it is the native property of divine truth, when fully received, to minister peace and joy. If Christians, then, are under the dominion of habitual and prevalent dejection, it is not because they have too much religion, but because they have too little. Indeed, if our Christianity has never been to us the spring of a sensible satisfaction, there is too much reason to suspect it of spuriousness—at all events, to conclude that it has but a very broken and imperfect sway.'

On 11th February 1838, we find him making this entry on the sad preaching to which British invalids had to listen: 'Heard Mr. Lowe this forenoon from Gen. i. 31. About two sentences of Christian doctrine, in which were contained the two errors of baptismal regeneration, and the sinfulness of our Lord's humanity.' Again, on the same subject, at a later date: 'Was confined in the forenoon; but heard a sermon in the afternoon on Jude 11—the character of Balaam—a moral discourse with various delineations of character, but scarcely a reference to the cross of Christ.'

Later notices record how heartily he joined with a few evangelical ministers and members of the Church of England, as well as some fervent Christians from Scotland, to whom he was introduced in a weekly meeting for prayer, to which he had ultimately to be 'carried' through inability to walk owing to a swelling in his leg. The arrival of the Rev. Dr. Henderson of Glasgow, on account of his wife's health, and the public services which he conducted on Sabbath, were peculiarly refreshing to James Halley, as they were among the first steps to the formation of a Scotch church in Madeira.

Amid all the depressing influences which the peculiar trials through which he was passing might naturally have on him, he delights to sing of mercies, as he surveys the goodness of God during his past pilgrimage. In a record of these, dated 7th April 1838, he makes mention of the countless comforts, social and domestic, with which he has been surrounded, and then winds up with the following enumerations:—

'Deliverances at various times, in particular at Loch Frochy, where I was nearly drowned from a fishing skiff in 1826; in Rutherglen, where I fell unhurt from the dickey of a coach; at Glasgow, where I lost my eye, but had my life saved in 1827; and at Cramond, where I narrowly escaped death by an unguarded leap; this sickness, which has thrown me inward (I hope in mercy) on my own soul; Dr. Watson's providential advice to come to Madeira; the generous and prompt offers of Messrs. ——; the kind sympathies of all; our short voyage; our location in a small boarding-house;—these make a sum of mercies which I cannot compute. And to these must be added another—infinite, something far above and beyond our poor conceptions, in the hopes and promises of the gospel.'

The buoyant hopes of the consumptive patient are familiar to all. Recovery is often anticipated and talked of at the very time when the pale horse, with its rider, Death, is approaching. James Halley underwent many alternations of feeling regarding his ultimate recovery to health. Severe, indeed, was the blow when, in consequence of the advance of disease, it was pronounced 'physically impossible that he should ever be a preacher;' yet, reeling and staggering under this trying announcement, he has the Lord's own promise to cling to. He draws comfort here, and endeavours to make his father a partaker of the same, in a long letter he writes on the occasion, in the close of which he says:

'What He may be pleased to do for me yet, we do not know; only let us wait with patience, and pray without ceasing, that whatever He does with our hopes of usefulness or happiness here, He may at least, through Christ, give every one of us one hope—and that a better—even the hope of an inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled.'

There are many questions of Christian casuistry, on which light is shed when they are viewed from the borders of the eternal world. The following extracts from a letter by Halley, on the education of a younger brother, speak for themselves, and need no comment of ours:

'I should wish that he learn no more dancing. It is but furnishing him with the means of temptation. . . . All other acquirements are quite secondary, indeed, as the small dust in the balance, compared with bringing him up for eternity in the knowledge, and, as far as precept, and prayer, and example will go, in the practice of true religion. I would rather have my brother the veriest dunce that ever was, if so be the spirit of Christ dwelt in him, than the most learned and distinguished of men without it. . . . It is quite wonderful how much better one's commonest pursuits will prosper, how much more cheerfully and completely common duties will be done, if they are done under the impression that every one of us must give an account to God.'

The duration of his stay in Madeira had been a very difficult question with him. He felt he had the sentence of death in him; he had ardent longings for home, he wished fervently to return to Scotland; but he was now in such a state of bodily weakness, that it became a serious question whether he could stand the fatigue of the voyage home. In a letter to his father on 1st June 1840, we find him balancing all the pros and cons of the subject, going into the medical details of his case, and all the varied considerations naturally suggesting themselves to one in his position, with the most perfect calmness, of which his biographer remarks: 'It is a calmness chastened, not ruffled, by the fear of God, sweetened and hallowed by the hope of the gospel.' Towards the close of this interesting document, he announces, as the result of his deliberations, that it is his purpose to start in the next packet for London. 'So then,' he says, 'I mean, God willing, to attempt going home; but you must not be too sanguine in expecting us, there is so much between the cup and the lip. My disease may take some sudden bad turn, and stop us here, or, in spite of Dr. Renton's hopes, it may please the Lord to remove me on ship-board; or I may be so ill when we get into channel as only to be able to land, and go to bed. So don't expect us too confidently.' On the 30th of June he sailed from Funchal, and on the 28th of July arrived in Glasgow.

During the remaining summer months he rallied considerably, and survived the months of winter, but spring proved fatal to him, and, in the twenty-eighth year of his age, he died on 16th March 1841. His closing months were occupied in penning letters to beloved friends, full of hints as to their growth in grace, and the right discharge of their work in the different spheres of duty in which they were placed. When he felt he was nearing the valley, of his approach to which he spoke, if not with the ecstatic joy of some, at all events with the triumphant calmness of one who had through Jesus gotten the victory, he made many little arrangements as to the disposal of his books and money. A few days before his death he said, 'I am not able now, and I don't perplex myself with any laborious attempt to settle or ascertain my state. I simply look to Jesus.' On observing his sister weeping, and being told that it was on account of the prospect of parting with him, he said, 'Ah! my heart was long rebellious; but I trust it is not so now. Ah! I trust it is not so. "Be still and know that I am God." It was long ere I could be still; but since I attained it, I have never been shaken from it.'

On a later evening, he complained that he could not look to Jesus so firmly as he wished, on which his sister quoted one of the Olney hymns, ending with—

'For never needy sinner perished there;'

when he remarked with much calm satisfaction, 'Ah! yes, and we have his own words: "Whosoever cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out."'

Eleven hours before his death, he inscribed the name of a dear friend in the ministry on a small Greek concordance which he had frequently used in Madeira, having two days before dictated a bequest to another friend of his Greek Testament, 'the book which, beyond all question, I have handled most during the last three and a half years.' Shortly before he breathed his last, he was overheard by his sister saying, 'Emmanuel,' on which she said, 'God with us.' Emphatically he replied, 'Yes, with us,' and shortly after fell asleep in Jesus.

R.

HOW TO RETURN A BLOW.

Mr. Marsh, of Morsul, relates of an Armenian, named John, that, when living at Constantinople, he was hired by persecuting Armenians to strike a watchmaker. The latter, upon receiving the blow, nobly prayed, 'May God bless you!' This remarkable answer was effectual; 'for,' said John, in allusion to the affair, 'I could not strike again; and at night I said to the money, "Instead of my eating you, you will eat me."' John soon gave occasion for friends and foes to say of him, 'Behold, he prayeth.' Thus was the power of a soft answer strikingly illustrated.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

GEN. IV. 10; HEB. XII. 24.

THIS cry of Abel's blood reminds us of the 'How long' of the martyrs (Rev. vi. 10), and of the injured widow's 'Avenge me.' It was a cry from the ground, where it had been hidden from every eye but God's; a cry to God; a cry which brought down a curse.

The 'blood of sprinkling' is, first of all, that blood which was sprinkled in the tabernacle; which, with all its imperfections, spoke better things than Abel's. But it is especially the blood of the Lamb of God, as sprinkled on the conscience, in believing.

In one aspect, the cry of Christ's blood is the same as that of Abel; for it is that blood that now rests on Israel. Through it the long curse has come upon the nation. But this is not the direct and proper meaning of the blood. It speaks better things than that of Abel.

I. It speaks of love, not hatred.—It was to Cain's hatred—a brother's hatred—that Abel's blood bore witness. The blood of sprinkling speaks of a brother's love,—the love of Christ, the love of Him who loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood. Thus it speaks better things than that of Abel; for it speaks both of a Father's and a Brother's love. 'God is love,' is its message. Of the love which passeth knowledge it bears witness to us,—love unto death; love stronger than death.

II. It speaks of grace, not of wrath.—Because of Abel's blood God was angry. It was divine wrath that spoke out in his words to Cain. But it is divine grace and mercy that speak in the blood of Christ. The blood of sprinkling propitiates God and draws out grace. It says, 'Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound;' grace abounding over divine wrath and human sin; riches of grace; exceeding riches of grace.

III. It speaks of forgiveness, not condemnation.—The blood said, 'Father, forgive them.' It was not condemning blood. He who heard of it, and believed God's testimony to its meaning, was assured of forgiveness. The blood showed the true basis and way of pardon; pardon through the condemnation of another; pardon through the blood-shedding, for the blood-shedders themselves; righteous, true, holy, unchangeable, eternal pardon. 'No condemnation;' nay, justification through the great transaction on the cross.

IV. It speaks of comfort, not of terror.—Abel's blood was dreadful to all who saw it; full of terror to the murderer; alarm to his conscience, remorse to his spirit. Not so with this better blood. Its voice is comfort. It soothes the sinner's terrors. It does not palliate his sin; yet it so speaks to him concerning it, as to let him know that the blood-shedding, which brings him in guilty, and deserving of a murderer's death, assures him at the same time of the removal of all his fears. It is indeed nobler, richer blood, the blood of God, and so bringing on the shedder more awful guilt; yet, by its propitiatory nature, its expiatory power, it announces with divine certainty the deliverance from the infinite danger under which they who had shed it had brought themselves.

V. It speaks of peace come, not of peace gone.—The blood of Abel said, 'Peace is gone; peace has forsaken the earth; it has left man and the families of man. All is now hatred, variance, murder, separation between man and God, between man and man, between brother and brother.' The blood of Jesus tells that peace has returned. He is our peace. His blood has brought it back to earth. He has made peace by the blood of his cross. It has come. It has come down from heaven. Heaven and earth are meeting. God and the sinner are being reconciled. There is yet hope for man and man's earth. We need not despair, as if peace had fled away for ever.

VI. It speaks of the blessing, not of the curse.—Abel's blood spoke wholly of the curse; it brought the curse on Cain, and on the earth. It doubled the curse which Adam's sin had brought to the world. Christ's blood blesses, and curses not. Its voice is the voice of blessing. It means blessing in every drop. It meant blessing when first shed; it means blessing still. There is no curse in it, saving to those who reject it. In it is the fulness of eternal blessing.

VII. It speaks of nearness, not of distance, between man and God.—Reconciliation, friendship, communion, nearness,—all these are contained in it. 'We who sometime were afar off, are brought nigh by the blood of his cross.' No separation, no darkness, no uncertainty of relationship; but re-cemented union, on the basis of a purged conscience and an everlasting righteousness. Every hair-breadth of the distance which sin had produced is for ever swept away. Perpetual nearness! Eternal fellowship! This is our portion, secured to us by the righteous removal of all that intervened between us and God, either on God's side or ours.

VIII. It speaks of the purged, not of the pricked and despairing conscience.—Abel's blood spoke to Cain's conscience; it must have been a perpetual pricking and wounding. Christ's blood speaks of purging, healing, soothing. No more conscience of sins! A conscience purged from dead works to serve the living God,—every wound in it healed, every trouble laid to rest, every shadow resting over it dispelled! Not despair, but hope.

IX. It speaks of life, not of death.—Abel's blood seemed the seal set to the death of the race. Brother murders brother: what is to be the end of this? But Christ's blood speaks of life; the reversal of the sentence by the payment of the penalty. There was no life through the blood and death of Abel. There is life through the blood and death of the Son of God. Life from the dead is the voice of the blood; life to the slayers of the Prince of Life.

X. It speaks of restoration, not of expulsion.—It was Abel's blood that made Cain a fugitive and vagabond. Christ's blood brings us back from our wanderings; restores us to Paradise; delivers us from exile; gives us possession of the Paradise of God, the heavenly city, the new heavens and earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. It is the blood of the Son of God that makes us friends, children, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ.

Let us receive God's testimony to this blood, this better blood, this blood of the everlasting covenant. The reception of this divine testimony is life, and peace, and holiness.

CHRIST, NOT THE CHURCH, THE SAVIOUR.

BY THE EDITOR.

ONCE, in talking with some High Church friends, we were told that there could not be authentic ministry in the church to which we belonged. Thinking it worth while to pursue the inquiry, we asked, Could there be no ministry amongst us at all? No. In setting up a ministry we were acting like Korah, and were guilty of his gainsaying. But Korah belonged to the priestly tribe and family; he was Aaron's cousin, and therefore his rebellion could only find its likeness in some of those that belonged to the 'true church,' not in us who at no time had connection with it. It did not matter. If we were not guilty of Korah's gainsaying, we were chargeable with something very like it. Could there then be no ministry amongst us? None. The thing is impossible. Why impossible? said we. Because you have no succession from the apostles. Granting that we have not, is there nothing that can supply its place? Is there nothing that can give to us all that succession is believed to confer on you? Nothing. But we pretend at least to something which supplies the lack—something which more than makes up for the want of personal succession. What is that? It is the direct derivation of our ministry from the church's Head. We hold that ministry is not successional, but direct; not mediate, but immediate; that Christ alone can make a true minister; that He does so by giving him the Holy Spirit, directly from his own hand; that as no man can be Christ's minister who is not in possession of the Spirit, so that Spirit is not bestowed by any ecclesiastical mechanism or successional process, but straight from the hand of Him who has the seven spirits of God, and the seven stars—the universal Spirit, for his universal church, to be communicated solely by and through himself. We say, that every true minister of Christ gets his ministry direct from the glorified Son of God at the right hand of the Father, without any intervention of man; that ordination is not the church's bestowal of ministerial gifts, but her recognition of the previous existence of these in the individual, as already conferred by the Lord himself,—her solemn judgment on the individual as one already set apart by the Head of the church above. And, just as on the one hand, no succession, however perfect in all its links, can supply the lack of this direct commission; so, where this commission exists, there is no need of succession at all. It may or may not be true, as a historical fact, but there is no need of it; it is anticipated by something more perfect and divine.

Just so does the matter stand in the great question of a sinner's salvation. Romish or semi-Romish objectors say to us: 'There cannot be salvation in your church.' We answer, God has taught us to connect salvation, not with a church, but with the Lord Jesus personally; and, without waiting to decide the question as to which church is apostolic, and which is not, we go straight to the Lord himself as the Great Fountain-head of blessing. If I can connect myself with Him at once, then all other connections must necessarily be subordinate and unessential. A direct connection must be a far truer and more blessed thing than a successional one; and if I, a sinner, am at liberty to go directly to the Lord Jesus, and get the life eternal at once from Him, then, even granting that there may be another way, this surely is the more excellent; and is it possible that I should prefer the indirect to the direct, the ecclesiastical to the spiritual, the successional to the immediate, the uncertain transmission of the gift through mysterious channels, the labyrinths of which no man has ever threaded, to the simple, the conscious, the direct reception of it from the hands of Him who hath said, 'Come unto me, and I will give you rest;' 'Him that cometh to me I will in nowise cast out?' What! is the uncertain better than the certain? Is the far off better than the near? Is the human better than the divine?

I do not mean to set aside the question of what is a true church; nor do I think it unimportant that we should determine aright upon this point. But I deny to it the place which has been assigned it by some. I do not mean to say that a true church will not help us on our way, or that a false church will not sadly hinder us; but I say, that our salvation does not turn on our connection with a true church, nor our doom on our connection with a false one. A man may be lost in spite of all that a true church can do for him, and he may be saved in spite of all that a false church can do against him. The question may indeed arise, 'Am I not suffering loss from my not being connected with a true church?' but the question cannot be raised, 'Am I not losing my soul?' So long as I confine myself to the former question, I am keeping Christ and the church in their proper relative position and level; but when I have put the latter, I have begun to substitute the church for Christ, the crucifix for the cross, materialism for spiritualism, an ecclesiastical salvation for the salvation of the Son of God, ecclesiastical righteousness instead of the righteousness of the Eternal Word, ecclesiastical absolution instead of forgiveness through the blood of the Lamb.

It is this direct and real connection with the Lord himself to which we lay claim as sinners, who have known the free love of God, and in knowing it have found the life of our souls. Is it not through intermediate steps, or agencies, or links, whether one, or ten, or a thousand, that we are trying to make good a relationship with God's Incarnate Son? Links such as these, of material texture and ecclesiastical fabrication, may establish a material union, an ecclesiastical relationship; but the living oneness which alone can satisfy the soul in quest of life, the living oneness which teaches us to say, 'I am my Beloved's and my Beloved is mine,' is something higher far, something with which the material bonds have nothing to do, something in which ecclesiastical appliances are of no avail. They may be wrong or right, they may be comely or uncomely, they may be venerable with age, or a mere new invention; nay, they may perchance be profitable in other ways;—it matters not;—on this point they are wholly useless; nay, they are barriers, not bonds; they cut off instead of conducting the descending current of the heavenly life.

It is on personal acquaintanceship with the Lord Jesus that my relationship to Him is formed. And hence my communication with Him must be direct and immediate in everything save the visible and the audible,—as direct and immediate as when He was on earth saving the lost; as direct and immediate as in the case of Matthew the publican, when it was said to him, 'Follow me;' or in the case of Zaccheus, when it was said to him, 'Come down, for to-day I must abide in thy house;' or in the case of the woman that was a sinner, when it was said, 'Her sins, which are many, are forgiven;' or in the case of Lazarus, when the Lord said, 'Come forth;' or as in the case of the beloved disciple in Patmos, when the Lord laid his right hand on him, and said, 'Fear not, I am He that liveth and was dead.'

In this direct connection of the sinner with the Saviour lies salvation. Where there is this connection there is salvation, whatever else may be awanting; where there is not this connection there can be no salvation, whatever else may be present. Thus, in so far as salvation is concerned, we need not name the name of any church. That great question, 'How shall I be saved?' ought to be argued independently of the question of churches; for it is not till it has been settled that we are at leisure to attend to any other.

We do not therefore mean to raise any discussion as to the truth or falsehood of churches. Our subject does not force this on us, and the real point at issue admits of being legitimately determined upon other and more stable grounds. Nay, more, we must try the case on the hypothesis of a true church. We put it thus: Granting that the church is a true one, rightly founded and built up, will connection with it save us? or, at least, is connection with it so indispensable that we cannot be saved without it? does non-connection with the true church infer damnation? or is it not the case that eternal life comes to us in a wholly different way, and through another channel?

In arguing this point, the position that we take up is twofold, a negative and a positive one. We maintain, first, negatively, that Scripture nowhere ascribes salvation, either directly or indirectly, to the church. We maintain, in the second place, positively, that Scripture ascribes salvation, both directly and indirectly, to something else.

I. First, then, we maintain, negatively, that Scripture nowhere ascribes salvation, either directly or indirectly, to the church.

It may be necessary to advert here to the scriptural meaning of the word church. Its wrong meaning has often contributed to mystify the question, and its right meaning will materially elucidate as well as facilitate our argument. The word church (ἐκκλησία) means simply those who have been called or gathered out. The church is the company of called-out ones, the company of the redeemed from among men, the company of those who have been called out of a world that lieth in wickedness. The word congregation or assembly would come nearer the true sense of the term than the word church; and the use of this word congregation, in the course of a discussion, would often be quite sufficient of itself to unravel a perplexity, or to tear in pieces a whole web of sophistry. Taken in its widest circle, it comprises the whole family of the redeemed. 'The church of God' is literally God's congregation, the chosen and called of the Father. 'The church of the first-born' is the congregation of those who have received the privileges of the elder sons, or of the Elder Brother. This is the great congregation of which Christ speaks. 'My praise shall be of thee in the great congregation' or church; and again, 'I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the congregation (or church) will I praise Thee' (Ps. xxii. 22).

Taken in its narrower circle, 'church' denotes that part of this great congregation that may exist at a particular place, or in a particular land, as if this great congregation were composed of innumerable lesser congregations, of all climes and ages. Connection with any of these churches or congregations below is the result of our professing Christ. Connection with the great congregation above is the result of our really receiving Christ, in other words, of our profession being a reality.*

Using the word church in either of these senses, we are prepared to maintain our thesis or position, that Scripture does not ascribe salvation to the church.

That the church or congregation is not the original fountain-head of blessing, will be admitted by all. What is contended for is, that she is a sort of cistern or reservoir of blessing here below—a subordinate fountain; so that just as no blessings can be had, save from Christ as the original Source, so no blessing can be obtained, save from and through the church as the secondary one. Now, what we affirm is, that the church or congregation is not, either primarily or secondarily, the fountain-head of blessing, save in the sense and in the way in which each member of it is a source of blessing, as it is written, 'He that believeth on me, out of him (not out of the church) shall flow rivers of living water;' 'Ye are the light of the world;' 'Ye are the salt of the earth,'—words spoken, not of the church, but of single members. In this sense, or in the sense of two or three being gathered together in Christ's name, and so increasing their individual power of blessing by prayer and by union,—in this sense we admit the church to be a well of blessing to the earth. But in any mystical sense or way, arising from priestly virtue residing in its ministers, or saving influence emanating from its sacraments, or some vague indescribable effusion of grace, issuing forth like fragrance from it as a body; in any such mystical way Scripture does not warrant us in looking to the church for blessing.

Nowhere does Scripture speak of the church as the bestower of salvation, either directly or indirectly. Nay, it assumes the opposite, for it shows us that a man is saved before he joins the church or congregation. He is to connect himself with the church, not in order to be saved, but because he has been already saved. It is as one who has got salvation that he unites himself to the saved company. He is admitted into their number, not in order that they may exercise their saving influences upon him, but because he has already been made partaker of these saving influences. Yes; let us proclaim the momentous truth. The church does not save, it only receives the saved ones; the sacraments do not save, they only seal and comfort the saved ones; ministers do not save, they only guide and teach the saved, and warn or invite the unsaved. He who affirms that the church saves, ascribes to it what Scripture does not. He reverses God's order; he misleads the soul; he dishonours the cross; he subverts the gospel; he puts into the hands of the church both the work of Christ and the work of the Holy Ghost; he identifies himself with the great essential falsehoods of the Mystery of Iniquity.

But it is objected here that the apostle speaks of the 'Jerusalem which is above,' as being the 'mother of us all;' and this seems to imply that it is by the church that we are born to God. To this we answer:

1. This is the only expression of the kind in Scripture. Men talk of 'our mother church,' as if it were a scriptural as well as a common term. It is neither. Let us beware of it.

2. This 'mother' is no earthly church, it is 'Jerusalem above,' the heavenly city, and can therefore apply to no church or churches here.

3. Jerusalem above is the mother of those who are 'free,' in the same sense in which Jerusalem below was the mother of those who are in bondage. Now, the earthly Jerusalem did not actively and directly infuse its bondage, so neither does the heavenly Jerusalem infuse its liberty. In both cases, it is the model or pattern that is spoken of, not the active potency belonging to either.

4. Abraham is called the father of them that believe; and in the same sense in which Abraham is called our father, in that sense is Jerusalem our mother. As to Abraham is not meant to be ascribed any direct or active paternity; so neither is any such maternity meant to be ascribed to the heavenly Jerusalem. Abraham does not beget, neither does Jerusalem bear children. In following the footsteps of that believing patriarch, and of the great congregation above, we become children both of the one and of the other.

(To be continued.)

* Nowhere does Scripture speak of there being but one true church on earth. The one church catholic, or universal, is 'the great congregation' of all the called ones, of all places and times.

Maggie Morris:

A TALE OF THE DEVONSHIRE MOOR.

CHAPTER V.

LIFE AT THE FARM.

THE funeral was over, and Maggie's time of service had begun. It was a very different life from the one she had led in the cottage, and the active stir and constant occupation did her good.

She was obliged to be up, oh, so early. I wonder if any of my little readers have ever spent any time at a farmhouse; if so, they will understand how early the work of the day begins there. With the first streak of dawn, the cock with his shrill clarion note wakens the surrounding sleepers. Then, as it gets lighter, the noises increase. The ducks quack loudly, as if to remonstrate with those who still sleep; the fowls cackle lustily, the deep low of the cows is heard coming nearer, and the pigs enliven the whole by a grunting chorus, while the farm servants bustle about their several occupations.

Maggie soon grew accustomed to all this, and used to be down-stairs as soon as the rosy milk-maid Polly, who was always singing at her work.

Maggie soon found there was plenty for her to do. She had first to feed the pigs and the poultry, then to sand the kitchen floor, and spread the table for breakfast, besides helping her mistress in the dairy and back kitchen. At seven o'clock they were all summoned to breakfast, and after that it was Maggie's work to wash up and put away. She was awkward and slow at first, and many a sharp slap and word she received from Mrs. Wilton; but she went bravely on, and was soon quite expert in farm work. But if she had hard work, there were also pleasures for her. Mabel would often look in, and give her a word and smile of encouragement; and when the days grew long and bright, she was allowed to go long rambling excursions with the young ladies, by the river and through the thick wood, and Mabel would give her words of advice and counsel which were treasured up in her heart through the rest of her life. But she liked her evenings best of all, when Mabel would send for her into the little parlour, and teach her to read, and write, and sew. I wish every little orphan child could have as kind a friend.

To poor Mary Wilton also it seemed quite a new life; for Mabel would be constantly providing her with some simple amusements, such as cutting out figures on paper, painting pictures, pressing flowers and ferns, etc., which the poor girl used to take the greatest delight in.

Oh, if people only knew what a number of hearts can be won by little kindnesses; how blessed it is to be shining as a light in the midst of this dark world! Mabel was this; but the secret was, she had first got that light from the Sun of Righteousness, and it was his image she was trying to reflect on those around. She felt she was his servant, that the work she was doing was his, and therefore it was a work and labour of love. We cannot work for Christ until we have first given our hearts to Him. It is only then that 'the love of Christ constraineth us.' May all my young readers early choose this better way, for it is the only secret of true happiness in this life.

But to return to Maggie.

One day the Miss Harcourts had gone to make a call at the castle; for Dr. Harcourt knew Lord Rivers well, and therefore Mabel and Alice went often to see him.

Maggie sat in the ivied porch doing some sewing for Mrs. Wilton. She wished they had taken her with them, for she felt idle this afternoon. By degrees the work dropped upon her lap, the needle got unthreaded, and Maggie's eyes intently watched the gambols of two spaniels. Then she wished she had Miss Alice's new book with the pretty pictures to look at, and no sooner had the thought entered her head than she rose to put it into execution.

Softly she crept into the cool parlour, where, on the table, lay Mabel's half-finished sketch and paints. She looked up at the book-shelves, and there spied the red and gold back of the desired book. Being out of her reach, she mounted a chair and seized it. 'It will be no harm,' thought she, 'to look at it; and I can put it back again before they come home.'

Alas, no sooner had she turned to come down than her skirt swept over the table, upsetting a bottle of ink over the pretty sketch.

What was to be done now?

She flew to the back kitchen and got a basin of water and a cloth, and wiped the ink from the tablecloth and carpet as well as she could; but the unfortunate stains could not be got out. She felt very miserable, and crept up to her room to hide herself. Soon after she heard the young ladies come in, and Miss Alice's voice calling to her to bring some water to put her wild-flowers in. She dried her eyes and ran down, just in time to see Mabel's look of dismay, when she beheld the state of things.

'How did this happen, Maggie?' said she.

'If you please, ma'am,' said Maggie, with a very guilty face, 'I—I was dusting the table and the ink upset.'

Mabel sat down, and drawing Maggie towards her, said: 'Is that quite true, Maggie?'

The child looked for a moment into those deep truthful eyes, and then burst into tears, confessing between her sobs the whole truth.

Maggie had expected a severe scolding and punishment to follow, and when, instead, she was answered by sad looks and words of gentle reproof, her heart melted, and she stammered: 'Oh miss, if you will only forgive me, I will never tell a lie again.'

Then Mabel showed her that the sin against a fellow-creature was small compared with what it was against God. To Him therefore she directed the penitent child for forgiveness; and it was a life lesson that Maggie never forgot.

In this way did Mabel teach and train the orphan girl during her short sojourn at the farm; and the quiet influence thus exerted over her, had a powerful effect for good, which she never lost.

But the months sped on, and the time came when Maggie must part with her kind friends.

It was on an evening in the beginning of August, and Maggie had done her task of reading, when Mabel said:

'Maggie, I have rather bad news for you.'

The child looked up, and Mabel continued:

'We are going away, little Maggie, far, far away, and we shall have to say good-bye for many years, I fear, for papa is going to take us abroad to live.'

The tears came into Maggie's blue eyes as she said: 'Shall I never see you any more, miss?'

'Nay, we will not say that, Maggie,' said Mabel; 'never is a long time. But you must try and remember all I have told and taught you. And, Maggie,' she added, taking a parcel from the table, and giving it into the child's hand, 'here is the most precious gift you can ever receive; will you keep it in remembrance of me, and promise to read it every day?'

Maggie untied the paper, and looked with delight at the beautiful Bible inside. She opened it, and there on the fly-leaf read her name:

'MAGGIE MORRIS.
The gift of her friend, Mabel Harcourt.
3d August 1842.
"I love them that love me, and those that seek me early shall find me."'

Maggie was too much overpowered to say much; but Mabel saw how grateful she was.

Then Alice came forward and put the neatest little workbox into Maggie's hands, containing cotton, needles, scissors, and thimble.

'Now, Maggie,' said she, 'you will be able to work as much as you like.'

Maggie's delight knew no bounds, and she felt she was in some fairy dream, and after more thanks she ran off to show her treasures to Mrs. Wilton and Mary.

A few days after this, the sisters might be seen going through the hamlet into each cottage to say good-bye. Many were the regrets that followed them; for they had twined themselves round the hearts of these poor people by their winning ways.

One old farmer brushed away a tear from his weather-beaten cheek, saying: 'Well, you see, miss, we had all got so used to ye, we don't like to part.'

And on the day the carriage drove past, taking them away, each inhabitant in the hamlet stood at their cottage doors to wave their farewell, and 'see the last of the dear young ladies.'

CHAPTER VI.

HARVEST HOME.

SOME busy weeks followed the departure of the Harcourts; for it was harvest time, and Farmer Wilton was anxious to make the most of the glorious weather.

Then Maggie knew what it was to be really busy. She had to carry the men's dinner and tea to the different fields; and as she was not able to take it to them all at once, this gave her many a trot to and fro to the farm. Then she followed among the gleaners, and of an evening would return laden with her sheaf, and many a handful did she gather for the aged women who would be slowly gleaning there; for Maggie had a kind little heart, which never refused help to another if it was in her power to give it. She thought of the pretty Bible story Mabel had told her, about Ruth among the cornfields; and the bundle of heavy golden stalks she carried on her arm, made her think of the good seed which sprang up and yielded fruit an hundredfold.

Then after the reaping, the noisy flail did its work, separating the chaff from the wheat, which was then sent to the mill to be ground; for Mrs. Wilton always made a batch of bread with the new flour, and the farmer gave a great supper to all his labourers and neighbours in the hamlet, and great were the rejoicings.

But the good farmer and his wife did not forget to thank God for all his benefits. They remembered He was Lord of the harvest; and together on Sabbath, in the church of Chagford, they offered up their praises and thanksgivings, and heartily did all join in the doxology: 'Praise God, from whom all blessings flow.'

Thus the days flew past—long and busy ones; but Maggie felt happy because she was useful; and whatever time Mrs. Wilton came across her, she never found her idle. Maggie remembered that Mabel had told her that God's eyes were in every place, and that He was not pleased with eye-service, but with duty done in singleness of heart, fearing Him. And the little Bible she esteemed her greatest treasure, and it proved a lamp unto her feet, and a light unto her path.

When the harvesting was over, the rosy and golden laden apple-trees had to be robbed of their fruit. Maggie thought this fine fun; for she would climb among the old gnarled and curiously twisted apple-trees to reach some of the largest apples. Then there was the sorting; they were all put into different heaps; some were to be stored away carefully among straw in the apple loft, for winter use, but the greater part were sent to be crushed and squeezed in a great machine to make cider, and the pigs were regaled with the refuse ones.

Mrs. Wilton never forgot the poor in these ingatherings, and many a basketful of fruit found its way to the surrounding cottages.

In those long summer evenings, when her work was done, Maggie loved to stand at the farm door, and look across at the beautiful hills of Dartmoor, as the evening breezes blew refreshingly over them. Or perhaps she would saunter down into the cool and shady wood for a ramble, and Mary Wilton would generally go with her, who was often a source of great trouble to poor Maggie, by her mischievous ways and bad temper. Mrs. Wilton would never allow her to be crossed or thwarted in a single wish or desire; for if she was ever made angry she would go into such a wild ungovernable fit of fury, that it quite terrified all around her.

One day Mary had watched Maggie weed and water her garden, and carefully fasten the little gate in the wicker pailing, which Ben, the farmer's son, had kindly made for her. No sooner was she gone on an errand to the castle, than Mary turned the pigs into the tiny plot, who soon did a great work of destruction. She watched them with greedy delight; and, when Maggie returned, burst out laughing when she saw the poor child's grief at the wilful destruction of her property. This roused Maggie's passion, and she said some naughty words, which so enraged Mary, that she had almost succeeded in pushing Maggie into the pond, had not Mrs. Wilton come to the rescue. When Maggie had recovered from her passion, she was very sorry; she determined to forgive Mary, and from that time patiently bore with all her childish whims and fancies; and so gentle and kind was she, that at last Mary grew quite fond of her. One Sunday evening, as they were sitting in the ivied porch, Mary said: 'Sing me one of my young lady's hymns—that one about the little children.'

So Maggie sang:

'Around the throne of God in heaven,
Thousands of children stand;
Children, whose sins are all forgiven,
A holy, happy band,
Singing, Glory, glory, glory.'

Then Mary asked Maggie to tell her some Bible stories, to which she gladly assented; and Mary sat listening until it began to get dark, when Mrs. Wilton's voice was heard from within, telling them to come inside.

Maggie's little Bible proved a blessing to the whole household; for, as the farmer and his wife were neither of them good scholars, she read aloud. And so peacefully closed each day of rest.

---

CHAPTER VII.

A MERRY CHRISTMAS.

AUTUMN was past, and the dark winter evenings grew longer and longer; but they were bright ones in that warm and cheerful kitchen. The log-fire on the capacious hearth crackled and blazed, sending showers of sparks up the wide chimney. Rover, the shepherd dog, would be stretched before it, while the cat cuddled in Mary's arms, as she sat beside her father in the great settle. The whirr of Mrs. Wilton's spinning wheel was heard; but her merry voice rose above it. The son Ben netted nets for the fruit-trees, or spelt out of an old primer with Maggie's help; while she knitted stockings and socks with coarse Scotch yarn, for the farmer and his son.

One day, just before Christmas, Mrs. Rokes was seen making her way across the meadow to the farm.

'It does one good to come here,' said she, stepping into the kitchen and taking the chair Maggie had put forward for her. 'You all look so busy and happy.'

'Ay,' said Mrs. Wilton, 'we are never at a loss for work here. Idleness is misery, I always say.'

In the course of Mrs. Roke's conversation, her errand came out. 'My master,' said she, 'wishes to give the usual supper to all his tenantry and poor neighbours on Christmas Eve in the great hall, and he bade me invite all on the estate. And ye must all come,' she added, 'and bring the child, Maggie, too.'

The bright colour rushed into Maggie's cheeks when she heard her mistress accept for all, as she had made up her mind she would be left at home. She timidly thanked the good housekeeper, who, having many other places to visit, soon took her leave.

What a day and night dream this coming festivity was to Maggie; and the days seemed to pass so slowly!

On the much-wished-for day, Maggie rose earlier than usual, and was down-stairs first. It was bitterly cold, but she set merrily to her work. The snow lay deep over everything, and Maggie could hardly get to the cow-shed to do her milking. But at eight o'clock the warm, bright sun came out, making the snow all dazzling and sparkling, and tinting the icicles with gorgeous colours, for all nature seemed to be sharing in the Christmas rejoicings.

In the afternoon the expected guests might be seen wending their way towards the castle, some by the woodland path, others by the road, and all meeting at the great iron gates, which were thrown wide open to receive them. And amongst the number, was the party from the farm, dressed in their holiday best; and the Christmas greetings sounded on all sides.

At five o'clock the great bell sounded, and all sat down in the well-lighted hall to supper, Mrs. Rokes presiding, as mistress of the ceremonies, at the head of the table. A goodly feast it was, to which all did full justice. Roast beef and plum-puddings, crowned with holly; soups and tarts, cakes and buns, besides various other dishes; and above all, plenty of home-made bread and ale. And hanging from the middle of the ceiling was a great 'bush' of holly, fir, laurel, and mistletoe, decked with paper roses, flags, and streamers of every colour, with pendent apples and oranges.

When the supper was concluded, and the merriment growing higher, the oaken door at the end of the hall opened, and Lord Rivers appeared, leaning on the arm of his son, and followed by Mr. Middleton, the young clergyman who had not long succeeded to the vacant living of Chagford.

A murmur of welcome ran round the tables, and all rose, bowing respectfully, as Lord Rivers entered. His steps were tottering with age, and his cheeks pallid with suffering; but there was the same kindly light in his eye as of yore, and he spoke cheery words of welcome to all.

'Friends and neighbours,' said he, 'right glad am I to see before me once more so many familiar faces at merry Christmas time. Such meetings are pleasant things, and may God grant us, if it be his will, many more of them. But, my friends, we must ever remember that this is not our rest; "here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come." God grant that we may all have our faces set Zionwards, so that, when Jesus calls us, we may enter into "the rest that remaineth for the people of God." "May the good God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy, bless you, one and all." And now, young ones, proceed to the sports.'

Quickly, at this signal, were the great tables cleared away; and, when this was done, three or four of the strongest youths fetched in the huge ashen fagot, bound with its wooden bands—the pride of all Devonshire Christmas hearths. Then, as the fire snapped each band, all joined in singing some curious old rhymes, dancing a peculiar, mazy dance to the tunes—while, in one corner, the children were gathered round Mr. Herbert, scrambling for sugar-plums, oranges, and nuts. Then he exhibited his magic-lantern, to the great delight and astonishment of all.

At the close of the festivities, Mrs. Rokes went round to each, and distributed the usual Christmas gifts of flannel garments, and packets of tea and sugar, and a shilling to each child.

So all departed to their several homes, and prayers were breathed from every heart on behalf of the good and kind old lord; and in the night, Maggie heard 'the waits' singing, and it mingled in her dreams with the story of the angels' song on the plains of Bethlehem.

And a pleasant sight it was the following day, to see the well-filled parish church, gaily decorated with evergreens and holly, and to hear proclaimed from the pulpit 'the glad tidings of great joy' by the lips of their beloved young minister. And, as all met and parted in the church porch, it was universally agreed they had never spent a happier Christmas.

---

CHAPTER VIII.

A TEA PARTY.

Six years have rolled away since the events related in our last chapter. Let us see if time has made any changes at the farm. Peep into the spacious dairy, and I think you will hardly recognise in the tall buxom lass of seventeen our little Maggie. A picture of neatness is she, in her plain, dark stuff gown and white apron.

Follow her into the kitchen, and you will find the seat in the window is vacant. Mary lies in the churchyard at Chagford, having died peacefully, in simple trust in Jesus, about three years ago. Long and bitterly had the poor mother grieved for her, and the old farmer was quite bowed down with his grief; but it drew them to Jesus, to give their whole hearts to Him, and become thoroughly his. He had taken their lamb into his fold, and they sought now to follow where she had gone before. Mrs. Wilton had always lived an honest and upright life, and feared God in her way; but her heart had been too much set on the things of this life, and her religion had been a thing almost entirely restricted to Sabbaths and church. But now she had learned to 'glorify God in her walk and conversation,' and 'to do all things as unto God, and not unto men.'

Maggie had been indeed as an angel in the house, for God had made her a blessing to the whole family. She had been 'trained up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;' and Mabel's instructions had been carried on by Mr. Middleton, who, on coming to Chagford, had established a Sabbath school, where, ever since, Maggie had been a regular attendant. She was quite as a daughter to Mrs. Wilton, who loved her as if she were her own; and often did she bless the day when the orphan was brought under the shelter of her home.

But Maggie seems unusually busy to-day—let us see what she is doing. She has just put the thick layer of cream on the top of a large junket, and away she carries it to the parlour, and places the great bowl in the centre of the table, which is covered with a white cloth, and spread with the best china. Mrs. Wilton is to have a tea party, and the little guests are expected from the castle; and, as Maggie arranges the spring flowers among the dishes, her thoughts go back to the time when, as a timid little girl, she once peeped into that same parlour when the Harcourts were expected.

In the midst of these recollections, the merry shouts of children come up from the wood below, and Maggie runs out to meet them. She sees, here and there, white frocks and straw hats appearing between the trees, and presently the six children emerge from the wood and run up the field to the farm house. They are Lord Rivers' grandchildren, the children of his married daughter, Lady Edith Somerville. They are followed by Mrs. Rokes, and the nurse carrying the baby.

It was a great pleasure to see the delight of these little Londoners, as they chased one another over the beautiful park slopes, selecting the rocky points for castles, and peopling them with the knights and ladies they read of in their fairy tales.

It was one of their greatest treats to come down to Holne Farm; and Farmer Wilton said to his wife, as he watched them, 'It seems but the other day Master Herbert and Miss Edith were playing under those trees.'

When the children caught sight of Maggie, carrying her bright milkpails, their games were forsaken, and they clustered round her as she entered the shed. How they enjoyed those warm, frothy tumblers of new milk! and, as soon as this ceremony was over, they all went into the farm to tea.

When this had been duly discussed, and the children had run off again to their play, Mrs. Wilton and Mrs. Rokes settled themselves in for a good long chat.

'I want to know,' said Mrs. Wilton, 'if the report we hear going about is true, that Mr. Herbert is going to be married?'

'Ay,' answered Mrs. Rokes, 'it's true enough; and my Lord Rivers is going to London next week to be present at the wedding. But who the young lady is, we cannot find out; and all I know about her is, that she is of a good family and very pretty; and I don't like to ask too many questions, as the matter is kept so close.'

'I thought there was something,' said Mrs. Wilton; 'for Mr. Herbert has not been down here for so long.'

Their conversation was suddenly interrupted by the sound of wheels; and looking out, they saw the castle carriage and greys at the foot of the avenue. It was occupied by Lord Rivers, Lady Edith Somerville, and Mr. Herbert. The latter jumped out quickly, and ran to look for his little wandering nephews and neices, leaving the others to talk about the visit to London, as the farmer and his wife stood by the carriage. But who the bride was to be they did not hear, only that she would be in every way worthy of the love and esteem of all who knew her.

Mr. Herbert soon reappeared, carrying a child on his shoulder, while two or three of the others were struggling for possession of his other hand. He was much amused at the homely congratulations with which the farmer and his family greeted him; and, after packing as many children into the carriage as it would hold, they drove off, leaving the nurse and Mrs. Rokes to follow with the rest.

CHAPTER IX.

A SURPRISE.

THE wedding was over, and Lord Rivers returned to Holne Castle; and the good news spread through the hamlet that in a few weeks Mr. Herbert would bring his bride among them, and anxiously were they looked for by the villagers. Great was the excitement when, late one Saturday night, a close carriage and pair drove quickly past the outskirts of the hamlet towards Chagford; and, as Maggie had been up at the castle that day, and heard the bride and bridegroom were expected, they knew it could be no other. It was raining fast, and too dusk for any one to see distinctly into the carriage, which was a great disappointment. However, they had not long to wait.

Sunday dawned—a beautiful June morning, with every leaf sparkling and glittering in sunshine, and the merry bells in the church tower summoned the worshippers at the hour of prayer.

The congregation had nearly all assembled, and Farmer Wilton, his wife, Ben, and Maggie were in their pew as usual. Maggie had turned many a wistful glance towards the castle pew, with its crimson cushions, wondering who should occupy it that day; when, just as the service was about to commence, the little side-door opened, and there was a rustle of silk and a glimpse of a white bonnet. A few minutes after, and Maggie could hardly believe her eyes. The white veil was raised and the face turned towards her—the calm, sweet face of Mabel Harcourt, now Mr. Herbert's young bride, and the future Lady Rivers.

A bright blush overspreads her features when she sees she is recognised, and her eyelids droop over her book.

At the close of the service, they walked down to the principal entrance, where they were greeted and welcomed by all. 'Only to think,' said they, 'Mr. Herbert should have brought back our young lady!'

'And this is Maggie,' said Mabel Rivers, as she shook hands with her. 'I think if you had not been sitting in the old farm pew, I should not have known you.'

Maggie felt so bewildered at the unexpected meeting, that she hardly knew what to say in her gladness, and blamed herself afterwards for not having inquired for Dr. Harcourt and Miss Alice. But she soon had plenty of opportunities for so doing; for, during her visit of some weeks, Mrs. Herbert Rivers paid many a visit to the farm and cottages of Eaststone.

It was a long story she had to tell of what had happened during the years she had been away. They had lived in the south of France for two or three years, and had been travelling to many different countries since. On their return to London, they had again met Mr. Herbert Rivers at his sister's, Lady Somerville, and, after a short engagement, Mabel had become his wife.

Dr. Harcourt was now in London, and had promised to bring Alice down the following year.

Till then, we must take leave of Mr. and Mrs. Rivers, who, as soon as their visit had expired, returned to London.

CHAPTER X.

CONCLUSION.

A YEAR, with all its changes, has sped away, and Lord Rivers has his family once more around him, and the castle walls resound with the pattering of little feet and merry voices. But the great attraction to the little ones seems to be in the nursery, where their baby cousin is being dressed for his christening. I don't know how many times in the course of the toilet they pronounced him a lovely darling, and the sweetest little baby they have ever seen, nor how many kisses are imprinted on his soft cheeks! Hardly was the lace robe on, when the carriages drove up to the door, and soon after deposited the party at the church, which was well filled by the tenantry.

Mrs. Rokes swept majestically in, carrying the infant; and round the font were gathered Lord Rivers, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert, Lady Somerville and her children, Dr. Harcourt and Alice, the latter now grown into a pretty girl of sixteen.

Mr. Middleton came forward, and the service commenced. The name, Herbert Harcourt Rivers, was falteringly pronounced by grandpapa, and prayers were offered from every heart, that the beloved infant might indeed 'be a soldier of Christ, and fight manfully under his banner.' And as the blessing was being pronounced, a rosy sunbeam streamed in through the painted window, followed by a flood of golden sunshine which lighted up the whole church. It was a solemn and a happy service, and it proved to be the last christening Lord Rivers was to witness, for, before that year closed, he was gathered as a shock of corn fully ripe into the heavenly garner, lamented by all, and leaving an honoured name to be handed down to posterity.

After this, Maggie's time was divided between the farm and the castle, and she spent several weeks in the Rivers' family when they visited London in the winter months. Lady Rivers offered her a permanent situation as her own personal attendant; but she would never consent to leave the farm home, and, in the course of time, the worthy farmer and his wife had the happiness of seeing her united in marriage to their only son, Benjamin. Here we will leave her in her quiet home, diligently fulfilling her humble duties, and being the comfort and stay of her parents' declining years. They who had sheltered her in her helpless childhood, now received a tenfold blessing in the daughter they possessed in her, and Maggie found the beautiful promise sweetly fulfilled, 'Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive.' Hers was a heart at peace with God; and in the enjoyment of this sweet rest and confidence in Him, she was able to go on her way rejoicing, comforting others 'by the comfort wherewith' she herself 'had been comforted by God.'

R. M. L.

Readings for the Young.

LITTLE YELLOW-THROAT.

IT is said that we have over forty different species of the warbler, that flit among the branches of our northern forests. In a certain garden, surrounded by trees, there was a nest of these songsters. Among the thick leaves of the linden-tree the little nest was built, and there the tiny eggs were laid, and there hatched. The nestlings were very small at first; but at length they grew till the four little birds, all together, weighed just one ounce. No mother could be more anxious and careful than the parent bird, or more joyful than she, on the day when they could leave the nest and try their wings. At first they could only flutter a little way before falling on the ground; but by degrees they gathered strength and courage, till they could flit from tree to tree anywhere in the garden. Here they had their home, and here most of them were very happy. The old bird taught them how to sing, how to fly, and where to find the best food. But the youngest of her family, whose name was 'Yellow-Throat,' perhaps the fairest and most beautiful of all the young brood, seemed to have a discontented spirit. She was difficult to please; her food was seldom right, the dews of the morning were too cool, the heat of the day was too great, the songs of her sisters were not in chord, or something was always wrong. Of course this spirit grew upon her, till her life was unhappy, and her presence made others unhappy. At length she gradually withdrew from society, and lived more and more alone. In vain her friends tried to draw her back into society, but poor Yellow-Throat had made up her mind that she ought to be unhappy, and she would be. She now began to fly to the tops of the trees, and look out over the wall to see how the world looked beyond the garden. One day, as she sat thus peering about, she saw, apparently not very far distant, a large lake, and a beautiful-looking island in its centre.

'Oh! what a beautiful lake!' cried Yellow-Throat; 'how delightful it would be to fly over that smooth water and see one's self reflected from it, as from a great looking-glass! And how delightful to be on that island, all alone, there to sing a song so sweet that even the mermaids would come up from the lake to listen! How I wish I was there! I can be there! I will be there!'

She then laid her plans how she would get up early next morning, and without stopping to eat, would fly away to that sweet island. The morning came, and as soon as the sun was well up, little Yellow-Throat turned her back upon mother and home, despising her beautiful garden; and without a farewell word to any one, or even a kind look, she lifted herself up on the wing, and in a few minutes was on her way to the lake. Alas! when she got to it, instead of being smooth as a mirror, the waves were tossing and dashing; the wind blew hard from the island, and it looked a great way off. But the poor thing was ashamed to go back; for she knew that ere this they would all know her folly, and so she flew forward. Cold and strong blew the wind, and on darted little Yellow-Throat, till at last, almost dead with fatigue, she reached the island, and dropped down on it, panting for breath. But instead of finding the beautiful spot she expected, she found its shores all rocks, nothing on it but clumps of Norway pines, through which winds sucked and whistled. Not a bird nor a happy thing lived on it. Poor Yellow-Throat! how different from what her imagination painted! So she nestled down in the crevice of a rock, and waited and waited till the next morning should return. At last it did return, but the wind had shifted, and now, to get back to the mainland again, she had to go far from the place she came from. But she felt that she must get there, or die here. And so, picking up a few sour ants that were creeping over the rocks for her breakfast, she again made for the shore. The wind helped her now, and she was not so much exhausted by the journey. She entered a large orchard, where the trees were large, and it seemed like going into the very land of plenty. But on the first tree on which she alighted she came near losing her life; for, on going to sleep a few moments to rest her, she barely awaked soon enough to escape the spring of a monster cat creeping towards her, with his great gray eyes wide open.

'Oh,' said the poor bird, 'how I wish I was again at home, with my dear, dear mother, and brothers, and sisters! But I don't know which way the garden lies, and cannot find it. What a foolish thing I was! And now I must die with hunger, for I find none of the sweet millet seed so abundant at my home.'

At length she noticed a large flock of little birds coming and going to and from a farmer's granary. They had found a place where they could enter and steal as much food as they pleased. Yellow-Throat knew it was wrong to steal, but thought she might do as others did. So in she rushed with the rest, and filled her crop; but, alas! just as the great flock were coming out, a farmer's boy fired his gun, loaded with very fine shot, directly among them. One shot struck poor Yellow-Throat, and she had strength only to fly and drop over the fence to die. And these were her dying words:

'Alas! I am dying here, away from home and friends, and all for my folly. Oh that I could warn every bird, and every boy, and every girl to be contented with what God hath given them, and not try to better their condition by wishing and longing for change.'—Rev. John Todd, D.D.

---

IT STINGS.

'How pretty!' cried little Sam, as his little fat hand grasped a bunch of white lilac which grew near the gate of his father's mansion. The next moment the child's face grew red with terror, and he dashed the lilac to the ground, shrieking, 'It stings! it stings!'

What made it sting? It was a bright, beautiful, and sweet smelling flower. How could it hurt the child's hand? I will tell you.

A jolly little bee, in search of a dinner, had just pushed his nose in among the lilac blossoms, and was sucking nectar from it most heartily when Sammy's fat hand disturbed him. So, being vexed with the child, he stung him. That's how Sammy's hand came to be stung.

Sammy's mother washed the wound with hartshorn, and when the pain was gone, she said, 'Sammy, my dear, let this teach you that many pretty things have very sharp stings.'

Let every child make a note of this—Many pretty things have very sharp stings. It may save them from being stung if they keep this truth in mind.

Sin often makes itself appear very pretty. A boy once went to a circus because the horses were pretty, and their riders gay; but he learnt to swear there, and thus that pretty thing, the circus, stung him.

Another boy once thought wine a pretty thing. He drank it, and learned to be a drunkard. Thus wine stung him.

A girl once took a luscious Bartlett pear from a basket, and ate it.

'Have you eaten one?' asked her mother.

Fearing she should not get another if she said, Yes, she said, 'No,' got another pear, and then felt so stung that she could not sleep that night.

Thus you see that sin, however pretty it looks, stings. It stings sharply too. It stings fatally. The Bible says, 'The sting of death is sin.'

If you let sin sting you, nothing can heal the wound but the blood of Jesus. If you feel the smart of the sting, go to Jesus with it, and He will cure. After that, never forget that many pretty things have very sharp stings, and be careful not to touch, taste, or handle such things. —S. S. Advocate.

---

THE THREE BARGEMEN'S DAUGHTERS OF PADDINGTON:

A PLEA FOR SERVANTS' INSTITUTIONS.

PREVENTION is, at all times, and under any circumstances, better than finding remedies for evils already existing; and this must be apparent to any one who has taken an interest in the management of Reformatories, or who has occasionally visited our prisons.

Many young creatures, of both sexes, are at present inmates of such places of discipline, who, if helping hands had been held out to them as they entered life, might now be earning an honest livelihood, instead of living for months, or even years, at the expense of their country, or of private benevolence; in too many cases returning to society, at the expiry of their allotted term, far more hardened in wickedness than they were at first.

Want of education, and the entire absence of early training, are the primary causes of much of the wickedness that surrounds us; and the writer, who, through divine mercy, has been privileged for the last seventeen years to take a part in the management of one of the oldest and largest of the Female Reformatories in London, trusts, by relating a few of the distressing applications for admission, which come before the committee at their weekly meetings, that some of the readers of the Christian Treasury may be stirred up to provide a remedy for the ignorance that so largely prevails.

Before relating these, it may be stated, that these Reformatories are established for the reception of young women who have strayed from the paths of virtue; that they are there trained in everything that may fit them for domestic service; that they are taught to read and know the Scriptures; and, after two years of this training, situations are found them in some respectable family, where, under God's blessing, they may in future lead decent and godly lives.

There are other institutions to which females may be sent, who have been criminally convicted before a magistrate, where they are subjected to a similar probation.

Both these classes of Reformatories are of a most comfortable, nay, to what many of the inmates have been accustomed, almost of a luxurious description, thus holding out a positive premium to do wrong; while those applicants who are guilty of no other crime than that of being poor and ignorant, are, alas! sent adrift, until they are actually qualified by their sins to be received into one or other of these houses of mercy.

Very recently two young women applied on the same day for admission into the institution referred to. The applicants are seen separately, and in the order in which they come. Neither of them could read, or had been at school; but their previous mode of life having made them perfectly eligible for admission, they were at once received, and are now undergoing the training to which I have referred, which, we trust, by the blessing of God, to be instrumental in yet making them useful members of society.

As a contrast to this, I shall relate the following.

A fortnight later we had an unusual number of applicants for admission. The first whom we saw was a girl aged seventeen. She was neither ragged nor depraved looking: her tale was simple enough. Her father was a bargeman on the Regent's Canal at Paddington; her mother died when she was young, leaving one brother older, and two sisters younger than herself. The children grew up as they could; not one of them could read, never having been at school; not one of them had ever been within the door of a place of worship. This poor girl only knew of God's holy name by having heard it taken in vain; had heard of Jesus Christ, but did not know who He was; in short, was as ignorant as a heathen: yet she had not strayed from the paths of virtue, and had never been in prison.

The next case was almost similar. A stout, nice-looking girl of eighteen presented herself. She was equally ignorant; she had a drunken mother; her father, too, was a bargeman, who was often away for days at a time, navigating his barge through the canals which intersect the interior of the English counties; she had never been brought up or taught to do anything, but 'worked about,' as she termed it. She also was not qualified for the benefits of the institution.

The third case which I will describe, was the most distressing of the three. She was a pretty, innocent-looking girl of sixteen, wearing tolerably decent mourning for her mother, only recently dead; but she had been taught no more than the others. She had not done wrong, she said; her father worked at the canal wharf, also at Paddington.

We detained these three girls till the close of our business, and had some further conversation with them. They were all three friends and neighbours; and, as they expressed it, being tired of running about idle, they had set out with the intention of trying to get something to do.

What could we do for them? They could not be admitted to the benefits of an institution, for which a terrible qualification was necessary. There were Servants' Homes, it is true; but these poor girls had, from their ignorance, no claim for admission into any of these; and, being utterly untaught, it was very unlikely that they could obtain service in any respectable family. We gave them some pecuniary assistance, and much good advice; the address of one or two Homes in which they might possibly find a vacancy (though not at all sanguine of their reception), and begged them to go, at all events, to a ragged school, where they would gain some instruction, and perchance find some kind friends to help them. All of us present felt very, very sad; and many a trembling prayer was offered up in their behalf, that they might not fall into such temptations as would entitle them to be received into such homes as even our comfortable asylum.

Cases such as these three poor girls are not confined to our busy London, with its three millions of inhabitants; poverty and ignorance are to be found, alas, in all our large cities, and even our villages. Children are born and grow up to years of understanding, without training, without education, without the knowledge of a gracious God and a loving Saviour. There are many industrial homes, training ships, and other institutions for boys, though by no means so many as are needed; but it is a lamentable fact, that for destitute girls there are few such asylums available. Means of employment for them are scarce; the introduction of the sewing machine is fast depriving many of the scanty pittance they were wont to earn as sempstresses; and the state of matters loudly calls for some energetic measures to provide employment for this interesting class.

A supply of good domestic servants, especially for families of moderate means, has been long felt to be a great desideratum. How many hundreds of girls and young women (were the means of sufficiently training them for domestic duties to be obtained) would be enabled to occupy a position in life, which would not only qualify them for service, but fit them for those orderly home duties which their present position as daughters, and their future prospects as wives, so urgently demand! In this way many a miserable dwelling would be made a comfortable home, and the evils which we have attempted to describe, would, in an incalculable degree, be remedied, to the great social advantage of our beloved country, and to the growth of vital godliness in the land.

May God grant that this humble suggestion, springing from a heart terribly sensible of the growing evils around, may have the effect of inclining some of the great and good of the land to haste to the rescue of girls as poor and as destitute as the three bargemen's daughters of Paddington.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'Er, the first-born of Judah, was evil in the sight of the Lord, and He slew him.'—1 CHRON. II. 3.

HERE we have, in one brief sentence, a statement of the way in which God deals with sin and the sinner. It is the repetition of a verse in Genesis, in a very unlikely place—in the midst of names and genealogies; God thus giving us to know the stress He lays on it. It is not for nothing that He thus repeats it. Such clauses as this, flung in apparently by chance, or what is called the transcriber's taste, are full of meaning. This certainly contains a very distinct and awful utterance.

Looking at it generally, we may say that it brings out, in a very outstanding and unambiguous form, such things as these:

I. God's estimate of sin.—It differs widely from man's. It is the Judge's estimate; not the Physician's merely, or the Father's. It is one of condemnation. It is not simply disease, or misfortune, or an accidental deviation from the straight line; but guilt, which must be reckoned for according to inexorable law. Sin, in the divine judgment, is not something vague, and loose, and shadowy, but well-defined and substantial. It is not a thing of sentiment or feeling, but a thing to be determined by the sharp test of unchanging law,—law interpreted by an inflexible tribunal, and applied by an infinitely righteous Judge, without respect of persons; without fear, or favour, or partiality; without the remotest risk of mistake, or possibility of miscarriage of justice.

II. Gods treatment of sin.—He does not merely pronounce a sentence or verdict, without meaning to carry it out. His deeds correspond with his words. He hates sin; He tells us this; He treats it accordingly. His treatment of it is—

(1.) Prompt.—Though He does bear with the sinner, yet this patience is not at variance with the promptitude. He is both patient and prompt; yet is He not hasty. It does not take Him unawares, nor show Him as if at a loss how to deal with it. He is always ready to meet it and deal with it, whether open or secret, greater or lesser.

(2.) Decided.—He does not trifle with it, as if undecided how to proceed, or hesitating as to what sentence to pronounce. There may be, for wise and gracious reasons, some delay; but the delay does not arise from any want of decision, any changeableness or instability. He is altogether decided in words and ways. 'He is in one mind, and who can turn Him?'

(3.) Severe.—'The Lord slew him;' that is, struck him down, cut him off by a violent death. He did not die the death of men, but perished like Korah. God made a fearful example of him before the eyes of his brethren; though what it was we know not. When God arises to smite, He is infinitely terrible in his vengeance. He is in earnest; and He punishes in earnest, when his wrath is kindled but a little.

(4.) Watchful.—His eye is on the wicked, his eyelids try the children of men. Nothing escapes Him. No sin, however small, is overlooked. Though fury is not in Him, yet He is watchful. His eyes are as a flame of fire.

But it is not sin merely that God would have us consider here. It is the sinner specially. For this non-information as to the sin (we are not told what the sin was) seems to be for the purpose of making prominent the sinner. And then the reticence as to the personal history of the sinner, fixes our eye on the other circumstances thus brought out in relief.

He is a first-born son.—To him would pertain peculiar honour, and in him would centre peculiar expectation. Yet he is slain—slain by God. How often do we thus find the natural order broken in upon, and human hope frustrated! It was so in Cain; it was so in Esau. Sin breaks up all order, and disappoints all hope. Were it not for sin, the river of human order (family and social) would flow on undisturbed.

He is the first-born of Judah.—'Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise.' Judah, in God's purpose, is already the royal tribe; and this sinner, slain by God for his wickedness, is the first of the royal line, the first link in Messiah's royal chain. As Esau and Reuben had been set aside because of their sin, so is Er. Sin breaks the line; and the blow that severs it is dealt by God himself. 'Jehovah slew him,' because 'he was wicked in the sight of the Lord.' And if any one say, 'Why doth He yet find fault, for who hath resisted his will?' our answer is: 'Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?'

Yes, God is not afraid to break Messiah's line. He can rectify the breakage in his own way. But rather than that sin should go unpunished, He does not hesitate to break that line—to set aside Judah's first-born. So infinitely does God hate sin!

But there is something yet more remarkable. The broken link was to be re-fastened by the permission of sin as great as that which had broken it; the triple sin, first of Onan, then of Judah, then of Tamar! How mysterious! 'How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!' What a strange fragment of human history is this breaking and this mending of Messiah's royal line! 'Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!' See how He hates sin; how He smites the sinner; how He does not spare even the first-born of Messiah's tribe! Yet see how his purpose stands! And see how He can make use of sin for remedying the breaches which sin makes! What a God is ours! So righteous, so wise, so powerful, so loving and gracious!

But how terrible the lesson regarding sin! God cannot pass it by. On whomsoever found, it must be punished. Even when God's purpose is to remedy it, it must be punished; first punished before it can be remedied, lest men should make light of it, or think that God is trifling with it.

Yes; and when sin is at last found (though but by imputation) upon his well-beloved Son, it must be punished. He must die. Yet He dies only to live; and He lives that we may live also. Judah's royal Son, David's Lord, is our Redeemer from sin.

CHRIST, NOT THE CHURCH, THE SAVIOUR.

BY THE EDITOR.

(Continued from page 279.)

IT is the habit with many, in different communions, to speak of 'our mother church,' thus designating that particular church with which they are connected. I do not judge others in this respect; but for myself, I feel no liberty so to speak. Our mother church is above; and it is one which may be far more fitly gloried in than any here below; not wrinkled and grey, not scarred and seamed, not torn and bleeding, not broken and disordered, not divided and discordant, but truly one; 'a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing.' And not till we are caught up into the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, shall we look upon our own mother's face, the face of the true Sarah, the princess; mother, not of the bond, but of the free; mother, not of Ishmael, but of Isaac—Isaac the child of gladness; mother, not of those who pass along with gloomy aspect, and unassured, uncertain footstep, trying by prayers, and penances, and sacraments to earn a hope of deliverance from hell; but of those who, having tasted that the Lord is gracious, and having learned the love that freely pardons, and having known the blood that washes the conscience, are hastening on with bonds broken, and darkness dispelled, and sin forgiven, and gloom exchanged for gladness, to the inheritance of the saints in light.

But it is objected that Scripture assigns salvation to the church: 'The Lord added daily to the church such as should be saved' (Acts ii. 47); and no less a person than Bishop Pearson quotes it in support of his statement, 'That Christ has appointed the church as the only way unto eternal life.' To this I answer—

The true rendering of the words is, 'Such as were saved,' or 'The Lord added daily the saved ones to the church;' thus proving the very opposite, and showing that it was as those already saved that they were added to the church, taking that word as meaning either the church at Jerusalem or the whole church of God. There is no other passage of a like nature to be found; nor does the above-named author cite any other, merely placing alongside of it one which seems to have no bearing at all upon his assertion, save to confute it: 'There is no other name given under heaven whereby we must be saved.'

But it is asked, perhaps with some surprise, Can a man be saved who does not belong to a true church, or the true church? I answer, a man might be saved though there were not a true church on earth at all, nay, though there were not another believer but himself. To what church was Abel indebted for salvation? By what church was the thief upon the cross saved?

It may be said, This only proves that a man may be saved without connection with a church on earth; but can he be saved if not belonging to the one great congregation—the church of the first-born? I answer, there is a fallacy in this question, if not sophistry. I will show you how. If I affirm, a man is not saved by his prayers, would you turn on me and ask, What! is a prayerless man to get to heaven? Or, if I affirm, a man is not saved by his holiness, do you taunt me with denying that 'without holiness no man shall see the Lord?' No. We maintain that neither the prayerless nor the unholy shall enter the kingdom; and yet we affirm that a man is not saved by his prayers or his holiness. The things that accompany salvation are very different from the things that purchase and secure it. Or take another illustration. Noah's sons were saved in the ark; now, was it their being alongside of Noah, or their being in the ark that saved them? Was it their connection with Noah, or their connection with the ark that saved them? Or, in other words, was it Noah, or was it the ark that saved them? We may say, that unless they had been with Noah they could not have been saved; yet, still it is no less true, that it was not to Noah but to the ark that they owed their deliverance. And just as we would say, not Noah, but the ark; so we say, not the church, but Christ. To say that I belong to the true church, is simply to say that I am one of the saved multitude; no more. To hold, then, that I cannot be saved unless I belong to the true church, is merely to transmute into ecclesiastical phraseology the plain statement, that I cannot be saved unless I am one of the saved company. Let those who love such ecclesiastical verbiage use it if they prefer it. But let them know what it is worth. In using it they mean to propound to us this singularly original and profound proposition, worthy of Mediæval scholasticism: that a man cannot be saved unless he is saved; and that in order to obtain salvation, you must be one of those who obtain it!

II. We now come, in the second place, to maintain, positively, that Scripture ascribes salvation, both directly and indirectly, to something else than the church.

Directly, Salvation is ascribed, (1) To the Father: 'God, who hath saved us and called us with an holy calling' (2 Tim. i. 9); (2) To the Son: 'In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins' (Eph. i. 7); 'Out of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace' (John i. 16); (3) To the Holy Spirit: 'renewing of the Holy Ghost,' 'sanctification of the Spirit,' 'born of the Spirit.' Such are some of the passages which show how directly each person of the Trinity has to do with our salvation. But it is specially the Son, Christ Jesus, the Word made flesh, that is spoken of as saving us —saving us himself—saving us, not by proxy, or through the intervention of another, but by his own right hand. Take such passages as the following: 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.' 'In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified and shall glory.' 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ' (Rom. v. 1). 'Found in Him,' 'rooted and built up in Him' (Col. ii. 7). These are a few out of the many passages which present salvation to us as the result of direct connection with the Saving One. They show us Christ and the sinner brought together, without distance, or medium, or veil, as closely and directly as in the days of his flesh, when He sat beside the woman of Sychar, and said, 'If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of Him, and He would have given thee living water' (John iv. 10). It was thus that He ever presented himself to the sinner when here. 'Come unto me, and I will give you rest' (Matt. xi. 28). 'Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life' (John v. 40). 'Him that cometh to me, I will in nowise cast out' (John vi. 37). From declarations such as these we learn the nearness and the directness of those communications with Him which result in salvation. In the great question of the soul's immortal welfare, there must be this personal intercourse with the Saviour. We must deal with Him face to face. We must deal with Him directly, we must deal with Him alone. We cannot too often or too strongly proclaim the mighty truth, that salvation is the result of direct and personal dealing with the Lord. It is a transaction in which no man, no priest, no church, can have a part. Christ and the soul must meet, all others standing apart, as in the case of the woman taken in sin; and in the absence of all other ears and eyes, it must hear his own gracious voice saying to us, 'Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more.'

While salvation is thus ascribed directly to the Lord, so as to be a personal and private transaction between Him and us, it is indirectly or mediately attributed to other agents and agencies.

1. It is ascribed to grace, as it is written: 'Being justified freely by his grace;' 'By grace ye are saved;' and how can the church interfere with this grace, so as either to add to or take from it?

2. It is ascribed to faith, as we read: 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God' (Rom. v. 1). So that salvation is the simple result of receiving God's testimony concerning his Son; and we are saved in believing that testimony, even though we stand wholly alone, and there be not on earth a church at all.

3. It is ascribed to the word: 'Of his own will begat He us with the word of truth' (Jas. i. 18). 'Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God;' so that the word is God's channel for pouring in salvation; his instrument for begetting us again. What additional virtue can the church infuse into that word, what saving efficacy?

4. It is ascribed to the gospel. 'I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand: by which also ye are saved.' In which words salvation and the glad tidings are so linked together, that to believe these glad tidings is to be a saved soul. The church may, or may not, be the instrument of bringing us into contact with them, it matters not; whoever or whatever may have brought them to our ear, we are saved in simply believing that glorious gospel.

5. It is ascribed to individual saints, sometimes ministers, and sometimes not. In 1 Cor. iv. 15, Paul speaks of himself as the spiritual father of the Corinthian believers, and adds, 'In Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel.' But while individual ministers are thus spoken of, the church, as a body, has never this language applied to her. Nowhere do we read that the church begets us; nowhere are we said to be born to Christ by the church; and yet this very begetting, this better birth of the soul, the Bible does attribute to the one individual through whose instrumentality the change was effected. It is remarkable that the apostle should take to himself the very names and offices which some ascribe to the church—father, mother, nurse. Father in the verse already cited; mother, when he says, 'My little children, of whom I travail in birth again' (Gal. iv. 19); nurse, when he says, 'We were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children' (1 Thess. ii. 7).

Thus, then, salvation is ascribed to such instruments or agencies as the above; but nowhere, either directly or indirectly, to the church, as if to prevent the possibility of such an idea arising, as that connection with a church, or with the church, could save. In the prophets, indeed, Zion is said to beget children; and this has been interpreted of the church, and used as an argument against us. But (1) if Zion is figurative, it must be a figure of the church universal, above and below, which would destroy the argument. (2) The passages referred to point forward to future times, and are, as yet, unfulfilled. (3) It is the literal Jewish nation that is spoken of, and its enlargement in the latter day. In no way can such predictions be so contorted as to furnish even the shadow of an argument for salvation by or through the church, instead of salvation by and through the Lord Jesus Christ alone. Everywhere we find salvation ascribed directly to Him who is 'mighty to save'—'able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him.' He is the Giver, we the receivers; no one coming between. He is the Quickener, we the quickened ones; no church interposing between Him and us as the channel of life. He is the Enlightener, we the enlightened; no priesthood being needful to dispense that light to us. In knowing Him we are saved; for the knowledge of Him who was dead, and is alive, is truly life eternal. Receiving the Father's record concerning Him, we take our place in the family of God as his adopted sons and daughters. In believing we have joy and peace; in believing we have righteousness and acceptance. In continuing to believe we are purified and made to grow in likeness to Him who is the object of our faith. No church can pardon, or justify, or quicken, or purify, or secure our acceptance. All these blessings are ours as the immediate and assured result of believing in the Son of God.

It is then Jesus Christ that saves! It is HE that quickens, and pardons, and justifies, and heals, and blesses. Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name, be it church, or priesthood, or sacraments, given under heaven whereby we must be saved. Hence such messages as these: 'Look unto ME and be ye saved;' 'Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus;' 'I counsel thee to buy of ME gold tried in the fire.' There is salvation for the lost, not in the church, not in sacraments, not in apostolic succession, not in priestly power, but in the Son of God alone. He openeth, and none can shut; He shutteth, and none can open. He justifieth, who can condemn? He sets free the captive, and who can forbid the liberated one to go forth in the joy of his heavenly freedom? What church on earth shall grudge him his liberty, or seek to reimpose the broken chain? He speaks peace, who then can disquiet? What earthly priesthood shall attempt to mar or stint that peace, measuring it out in scanty meagreness, or casting clouds of gloom above it, as if envious of the joy, or as if the peace of God, 'the peace that passeth all understanding,' were too rich a boon for man? When He says, 'Draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith,' what church, even the most apostolic, shall step in and say, Nay, you cannot have assurance, that would be presumption; you must be content with a vague uncertainty, a mere peradventure, and even that peradventure you cannot have without me? as if assurance were too bright a flower to blossom on such a waste as this—too rich a gem to sparkle on the forehead of any sinner on this side of heaven.

Yes, it is Jesus Christ that saves! Not the church, either in whole or in part. It is connection with Christ, not connection with the church, that saves! Anything whatsoever, either in the earth beneath, or in the heaven above, whether saints or angels, church or priesthood, brought in between us and Christ, subverts and frustrates salvation. At the best, in such a case, we get an uncertain instead of a certain, an incomplete instead of a complete salvation. But in truth, where anything comes between, where we get salvation at second hand, through an imperfect medium, where an earthly priesthood undertakes to save us by its ecclesiastical magic, by the electric potency of the apostolic fluid transmitted by a chain or wire of eighteen centuries; then we say that God's free love in the gift of his eternal Son is set aside; eternal life becomes the result of a mere mechanical process, and the certainty of our divine adoption depends upon the endless genealogies of lying traditions, and the very possibility of salvation becomes a question of historical research, instead of being what Scripture represents it, a matter of simple faith in God's testimony concerning Jesus and his cross. By processes such as these, which men have devised, we may easily become sons of 'the church.' But to be sons of the church is one thing, and to be sons of God is another.

Oh, if the church of God had a voice, and could speak to us as it has often been supposed to do (as we often are told, 'hear the church'), it would say, 'Do not magnify me, magnify my glorious Head; He must increase, but I must decrease. What am I that I should be able to absolve or to condemn, to kill or to make alive? Look not at me, but to Him on whom I am looking; lean not on me, but on Him on whom I am leaning; admire not me, but Him whom I am admiring; and, losing sight of every other being, making no mention of any other name, join with me in ascribing "salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb."'

ENTERING INTO LIFE:

NOTES FROM THE DEATHBED OF A BELOVED FRIEND.

EARLY in December of 1846, about three months before her death, a beloved sister came from a distance to attend upon her sick-bed. Regret having been expressed that some such arrangement had not been entered into at an earlier stage of her illness, she did not acquiesce in the remark, but said: 'I did not miss them. I had every temporal comfort; and I have for six months past, with my weak, diseased body, enjoyed so much of the sweet companionship of the blessed Jesus, that I would not have given it for the sympathy of all my friends together, dearly though I do love them.' About this time the appearance of certain favourable symptoms encouraged her friends to hope that she might yet be restored; and on this fond expectation being expressed to her, she replied: 'Well, I am quite willing to live or to die. I love the service of Christ for its own sake. I have felt it delightful to serve Him on earth.' By the end of the second week of December, however, she again became worse; and on referring to the hope of her recovery previously expressed, she acknowledged 'having felt somewhat better,' and as 'well enough pleased to live for the sake of others; but,' she added, 'at that very time these words came to my mind with so much power: "For ever with the Lord;" "For ever with the Lord." And when I considered what was implied in being for ever with the Lord, it seemed to me I should be such a fool if I did not grasp at it.'

On the Saturday morning of this week, after a sleepless night of great suffering, she said, 'I can get no other passage this morning but this: "Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away."' Again and again did she repeat the words, as if deriving the sweetest refreshment and support from what she saw comprehended in them. On the following Sabbath morning also, after having passed a night no less distressing as to bodily suffering, she said, 'It's rather strange my mind cannot take hold of another word this morning than that again: "Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away." I do not say,' she continued, 'that believers should not in this world attain to the comfort which is conveyed by such words, when spoken to the heart by the Redeemer; but I feel as if now they were to me an invitation to go beyond death.'

One day, about this time, she remarked: 'I have at times, when under acute pain, experienced wonderful reality and power in that passage: "Fear not, for I am with thee: I will help thee; yea, I will strengthen thee." It conveys to my mind the idea as if I were oppressed with a great load upon my shoulders; and a kind hand coming behind, raising and holding it up, relieves me of the greater part of my burden.' The same blessed consciousness of divine strength and consolation imparted to her spirit, she frequently expressed in the most significant terms. 'The blessed Redeemer,' she would say, 'is ever near me to comfort and to help me. Without an effort, I am comforted with his rich promises. They come to me with a power which often makes me feel as if they were audibly addressed to me. The world may characterize my illness as sore trouble, but I do not feel it to be so. My mind is so graciously upheld, that I cannot say my severe pain is distress.'

Her medical attendant on one occasion, kindly sympathizing with her ailments, spoke of them as 'miserably bad.' She answered, 'Oh no, doctor; few of the miseries of this life have ever come my way.' And on another occasion: 'Were it not that it might be selfish in me to choose what I would like, I might truly say that, notwithstanding all my pains, I have had such blessed experience since I came to this bed, as might make me very loth to leave it.'

The lines sung by Bunyan's Christian at the cross, when he had there been relieved of his burden, she often repeated, as appropriately descriptive of her own experience:

'What a place is this!
Must here be the beginning of my bliss?'
Must here the burden fall from off my back?
Must here the strings that bound it to me crack?
Blest cross! blest sepulchre! blest rather be,
The Man that there was put to shame for me.'

And when means were multiplied, with the hope of effecting a change for the better, she would not unfrequently say: 'What great trouble you put yourselves to, only to keep me a little longer from languishing into life!'

In the beginning of January, her sister was obliged to return home. On her place being supplied, in a day or two after, by another sister, she said to her: 'The evening that M—— left, I thought I should miss her much, not having been without one of you for five weeks; and at first I felt a little dull; but very soon the Lord Jesus drew so near to me, manifesting himself in a way so attractive, that all night I could miss nobody.' During this month her sufferings were much increased. She was now altogether unable to recline in bed; and not unfrequently she required to be upheld in a standing posture, as the only one she could occupy. But amid all her sore distress of body, the consolations of her Lord abounded towards her yet more and more. That blessed sense she experienced of his gracious presence with her in all her afflictions, continued to sustain and strengthen her spirit; and the brighter manifestations now borne in upon her mind, of the fulness of grace and glory which dwells in Him, replenished and satiated her inmost soul. Often, about this time, were these words repeated by her with touching emphasis and solemnity:

'The God of glory down to men
Removes his bless'd abode;
He dwells with men, his people they,
And He his people's God.'

When those who ministered to her could not refrain from frequently tendering expressions of sympathy, she would answer: 'Oh yes; but I just feel this:

"The God of glory down to men
Removes his bless'd abode;"'

repeating the whole verse with indescribable emotion, and adding, 'In such company, what about suffering!' On one occasion, when a messenger had been sent to procure some medicine which had been prescribed to alleviate the severity of her pain, she remarked with much feeling: 'When a cure of man is recommended, it requires to be sent for; and sometimes, in my extremity, I have had to send for a friend; but I never need to send for the consolations of his word, for it is in me like a well of water, springing up into everlasting life.' On another occasion, when her distress was great, she said to her sister: 'Oh! when one thinks what is to be the end—the glorious issue of all this pain—that it is nothing less than to be conformed to the image of God's own Son, although the poor body should be brayed, as it were, in a mortar—who would not submit to it?' Referring one day to the effects which disease had produced in certain parts of her body, she remarked: 'My poor body, it is quite a deformity; but I am assured that it will yet be quite fair in the resurrection morning. I feel as if I shall then be quite fond of it.' After a night of extreme distress, she said to her sister: 'This is scourging, M——; this is scourging. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." We are in danger of not attaching the proper meaning to the words of Scripture. Scourging is a mark of sonship, and it can never be an easy process. How awful a thing sin is! It is the cause of all suffering; but it is only in this life that God can let a believer feel any of the effects of sin.' And, addressing her servant, she continued: 'When you look on me, you should think how awful a thing sin must be, when you see its effects to be so dreadful in one who has every reason to conclude that she is a pardoned sinner. Oh! how poor should I be this morning, if I had salvation to seek, and had not a God I can call my own!'

The dropsical accompaniment of her disease had now increased in a very great degree; and all other means having proved ineffectual, it was resolved that her limbs should be punctured. From certain special causes, this painful operation involved in her an unusual amount of suffering—indeed, such as she was scarcely able to endure; and while it was being performed, her cries were most piteous and heart affecting. When her sister entered the room, however, immediately thereafter, the first words which fell upon her ears were these: 'Still I can say, "The Lord our God is merciful," and it is his own sweet hand.' On being asked how her mind had been supported during the distressing process, she looked up and said, with chastened meekness: 'At first I was rather stunned, not having anticipated that I should feel it to be so dreadful a thing; but immediately, when the pain became so awful, I felt that saying: "The plowers plowed upon my back; they long their furrows drew. They pierced my hands and feet." And this: "Then Pilate took Jesus, and scourged Him: and the soldiers platted a crown of thorns, and put it on his head;" and I just thought, if these things were done to the blessed Surety, what about the piercing of my limbs!'

A little after she said, with impressive earnestness: 'Oh! it is stupid nonsense for believers to think that they will be dandled into life; to fancy they will be conformed to a glorified Saviour in heaven, if they are not conformed to a suffering Saviour on earth!' And when receiving the little kind offices so affectionately rendered by those around her, she said: 'I wonder what the poor do in my circumstances, without my comforts; and I wonder what the rich do, with all their comforts, when without my portion. How differently am I treated from the blessed Surety in the hours of his deepest agony! All his disciples forsook Him and fled. "They gave Him vinegar to drink, when as his thirst was great."'

In the evening, referring to the suffering during the operation, and the cries which had been wrung from her, she remarked: 'The women in the kitchen would be alarmed to-day when they heard my cries; but oh that it would be the means of making them consider how precious my portion is, which can support and uphold me in trouble like yon!'

(To be continued.)

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

LIVE.

Words by HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. Music from HANDEL.

With vigour. Met. 80 = ♩

TREBLE.
Make haste O man, to live, For thou so
ALTO.
TENOR.
Make haste, O man, to live, For thou so
BASS.
ACCOMP
soon must die; Time hur - ries past thee like the soon must die; Time hur - [ries past thee like the

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

To breathe, and wake, and sleep,
To smile, to sigh, to grieve;
To move in idleness through earth,
This, this is not to live!
Make haste, O man, to live!

Make haste, O man, to do
Whatever must be done;
Thou hast no time to lose in sloth,
Thy day will soon be gone.
Make haste, O man to live!

Up then with speed, and work;
Fling ease and self away;
This is no time for thee to sleep,
Up, watch and work and pray!
Make haste, O man, to live!

The useful, not the great,
The thing that never dies;
The silent toil that is not lost,
Set these before thine eyes.
Make haste, O man, to live!

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XVI.—GEORGE AND HELLEN PARKER.

IN the following sketch of George and Hellen Parker, the happy-looking couple mentioned in the December paper, were I to relate the history of their early life, it would be simply a repetition of the old story—the danger of tampering with strong drink. For both had been respectable, and began their downward career by taking a little—just enough to do them good,—and ended in complete thraldom to a passion for strong drink. There were, indeed, points of interest in their sad story; but waiving them, I turn to the more pleasing theme of their reformation.

When I called on them for the first time, their home was in a large building, swarming with tenants. The men seemed brutalized by vice and ignorance, most of them being Roman Catholics; and if their stolid looks were relieved by any other expression, it was that of low cunning. The women, equally coarse and low, drank, smoked, and quarrelled to perfection.

The Parkers occupied a small room to the back. It was extremely miserable. The week before I found them out had been one of unusual debauch. Everything was sold. The last available article was a small loaf; and Hellen having tucked it under her arm, marched through the street in which they lived, seeking a purchaser.

The day I called, George had begun to work, and sat busily plying his needle, for he was a tailor. Hellen was in bed, 'not very well,' he said; in reality, not very sober.

There was little of importance that day. My only object was to get into his good graces. In that I succeeded. Next visit, Mrs. Parker was out. Intentionally, or otherwise, I forget which, her character was spoken off; and George assured me that she had only one fault,—she was not, as he phrased it, a teetotaller.

I knew very well that he was not one either. But without seeming to notice that, I suggested that it might do her good, were he to take a more decided stand on the subject.

'I would be willing to do anything to get her richt,' he assured me. So, in the most friendly manner possible, we formed our plans for her reformation, all of which necessarily included his own.

This over, drink and its consequences formed the subject of our conversation. While thus engaged, Hellen came in.

'Do not let me interrupt you,' she said, drawing towards us a rickety stool, seemingly quite anxious to listen.

'That is the truth,' she said, after some time, with evident feeling. 'God knows that's true enough in my experience!' Then she began to tell me something of her past history,—what a slave she was now to drink, and how she longed to be delivered.

'Only this morning,' she said, 'it was my earnest cry to God to send some one or something, to help me out of this terrible condition, for I seem to have lost all power to help myself.'

It was arranged that she was to take the pledge. 'And, George,' I said, addressing her husband, 'you of course will not stand in the way,—you will take it too?'

'With all my heart,' replied George. 'I'll do anything for her sake!'

In getting such people to give up drink, I always endeavoured to prevent them looking upon that as an ultimatum, merely a single step in the right direction, but one absolutely necessary, as it removed an insuperable barrier between them and God.

I promised to call with their cards in the afternoon. On doing so, I found three men waiting for me,—two of them prepared to take the pledge,—the third one also; but as he was still under the influence of drink, I could not have anything to say to him until he was perfectly sober.

It was a scene of no trifling interest, as these four persons—George and Hellen, and the two men,—moved by strong impulse, took each other by the hand, and solemnly vowed, as in God's presence, never again to touch intoxicating drink; and then, as if deeply conscious of their inability to perform their vow, they did most humbly and earnestly implore help to keep it.

The work of reformation went on in good earnest. To my surprise, I found they were unmarried. There was a reason for this. Hellen was in the receipt of a considerable sum of money yearly, while she remained single. That was at once put right; and henceforth they became regular attenders at church, and every other means of grace. And what was still better, they did not rest until they became really possessed of 'the pearl of great price.'

Soon after, they applied for admission as members; and now, for a series of years, they have proved themselves to be worthy ones. Willingly do they contribute of their hard won earnings for its support. They also labour earnestly, by personal effort, to further its schemes of usefulness. George has not, indeed, the courage to address a meeting; but he is indefatigable in his efforts to bring people to hear those who can. As for Mrs. Parker, she has become a power in the neighbourhood where she lives; and to me she was invaluable for the efficient help she rendered, while endeavouring to raise other sunken ones.

It is not to be supposed, that while this was being accomplished, their path was a very smooth one. On the contrary, they met with much opposition from their neighbours, who evidently expected that their reformation would not continue; so they did not spare persuasions and blandishments to win them back to their own ranks. One evening George was seized, carried into a public-house, and offered anything he would drink. He stood firm, however, and determinately refused to taste anything. A struggle ensued; and the poor man could only get out of their hands by leaving a considerable part of his coat. Foiled in this attempt, they resorted to other measures. One night shortly after, a number of them, infuriated with drink, attacked their door with a hatchet—an old Irish crone holding a candle. Their intention was first to break open the door, and then murder the Parkers. But the God whom they now served interposed. It was put into the heart of a visitor to call upon them. Help was procured, and they were delivered.

This hostility on the part of their neighbours was overruled for good; for, while it brought out their new principles most manifestly, it made them, at the same time, walk very circumspectly; and in more than one instance, hatred was turned into love.

After a considerable time of passive endurance, their spirit acquired a degree of momentum that would no longer be kept in check; they began, therefore, aggressive operations on their neighbours. Still there was a degree of wisdom in their efforts, not usual to such zeal.

There was one woman in particular, on whom Mrs. Parker set her heart. Several things marked her out as the most eligible person to begin with. She was a hard drinker; the only Protestant in the tenement; and Mrs. Parker, having in many ways been helpful to her, could with the better grace seek her spiritual improvement.

For a long time there were no favourable results—quite the reverse indeed; for a spirit of rancour seemed stirred at what she termed 'meddling.' Self-interest only kept her in any degree friendly, as she afterwards stated in so many words, when God was pleased, through Mrs. Parker's persistence, to touch her heart.

'Oh, but it was me that hated you!' Bridget would say; 'an' if it hadna been that ye were the only one that would do me a turn, I would have never come near you. There was always something that galled—a bit of this tract, or a bit of that lecture, or a poke about my own ways, —wasna I angry at ye? But now,' she would add, with softened voice, 'I come because I love ye.'

Mrs. Parker's powers of repartee were of a high order. That, among such a people, added much to her influence. Of that the most ample proof could be given; but one example may be sufficient. I may first state that, after giving up drink, she never passed the door of a public-house if it was possible to avoid it, but invariably crossed to the other side of the street. 'I could not,' she said, 'pass the places where I so debased myself, without shuddering and wondering also at the grace which rescued me.'

But on one occasion she had to pass a hard ale shop. The mistress, an Irishwoman, stood in the door, and thus accosted her:

'Well, well, Mrs. Parker, how beautiful you look to-day! With your new dress and your new cap, you do look so nice!'

'Thanks be to God for that, Mrs. Dougherty, and not to the public-house. I thought I was long enough helping to put the new dress and the new caps on you; so now I'm trying to put them on myself.' And, without another word, she walked off.

'Touch not, taste not, handle not,' was now truly her motto, acted out on the most trivial as well as great occasions.

Being much pressed for time one morning, she went for breakfast rolls to the nearest provision shop, where drink was also sold. The shopwoman had just been serving out whisky to another customer. In handing the rolls, a drop either from her hands or the measure had fallen upon one of them. Mrs. Parker noticed it, and asked another. The woman refused, laughing at the same time at her strictness; but Mrs. Parker insisted, and ultimately gained her point.

By persisting in such a course, she unconsciously became a power among the people; for she was equally fearless in the avowal of her principles, as she was strict in maintaining them. I remember asking her one day if she never felt ashamed speaking like that.

'Ashamed!' she said, 'no. I was not ashamed to be the devil's scut, and why should I be ashamed to be Christ's servant, whose work is honourable?'

I have often heard it remarked that the poor are ungrateful, that they are even incapable of gratitude, that their dislike, etc., to their benefactors increases in proportion to the benefits received.

There is much truth in these remarks, especially when the efforts to benefit them are confined to their mere physical wants. But only succeed in stirring their spiritual nature, and they prove themselves capable of the most genuine gratitude and devoted affection.

Of this, Mrs. Parker and her husband afforded very pleasing examples. After being privileged to bring them into the good way, and having helped to guide them for a considerable time, I went to reside in another part of the country. Though they had acquired strength sufficient to stand alone, they were extremely sorry when I left them; and, as nearly as I can remember, expressed themselves in the following manner:

'Had you gone sooner, what would have come of us? for we leaned upon you, our trust was in you. It is not so now. Our trust is in the living God, and He will make us to stand; but we love you as we love no other human being, because you were the means of leading us to Him, and we will never cease to pray for you,' etc.

This was no mere passing feeling. On the contrary, as years pass away it only seems to deepen. As I could not but feel interested in their welfare, I wrote them occasionally. These letters were quickly responded to, although writing a few lines was no easy matter to them. To me their simple, unaffected heart utterances were always welcome. And I think you will not be displeased to see a few of them here.

'December 23, 1863.

'MY DEAR ——,—I would have written to you sooner; but Bridget has had a great brash of illness, but is now better. The temperance meetings are re-opened on Friday night. George and Bridget and I still go to the Sabbath evening meetings. We would not think the Sabbath night blessed to us if we did not hear Mr. ——, the dear man that God has sent. We always think and pray for you, especially on Wednesday night (a few of them meet then for prayer), that the Lord may bless your meetings where your lot is now cast. Although absent in the body, you are still present to us in spirit.

'George joins with me in kind love to all your staunch teetotallers. May the Lord keep them on the evil day that is drawing on! I hope you will tell them from me, that I will pray night and day for them that the Lord may strengthen them.

'I am happy to have to tell you that I had the honour upon yesterday of putting a temperance bill in that hard ale shop of ——, which is now a provision shop. What a blessed contrast—a temperance bill instead of a whisky bottle and hard ale! I wish you were here to see it; how I would rejoice! Tell your people to be firm, and they will bless the Lord for sending you among them as we do. The first meeting you have, read those few lines to them. I wish you a happy Christmas. God bless you.—I remain, your humble servant,

'HELLEN PARKER.'

'December 18, 1864.

'MY DEAR ——,—It is with much pleasure that I write these few lines to you. I am happy to let you know that my boy is keeping better; but George is ill with rheumatism, and not able to work at the present. I am not well myself since Wednesday, by a great fright I got with . . . .

'. . . I prayed to God that He might send somebody to comfort us; when Mr. —— rapped at the door and came in. Never did the Lord send one more needed, only yourself when you came.

'I have not spoken to Mrs. —— about her evil speaking on us. I thought it would be the best way to leave it to God. I have no more to say at present, but wish you a happy Christmas. That God may bless you and your people is the earnest prayer of your faithful servants until death,

'GEORGE AND HELLEN PARKER.'

'August 8, 1865.

'MY DEAR ——,—George and I are still keeping well; thanks be to God for all his mercies to us. But Bridget is keeping very poorly, but holding out in every other respect faithfully.

'Our meetings are all closed at present. Tell as many staunch people as you have, that we send our kind love to them, and hope that they will be faithful until death. And God bless you also! Long may you be spared to go out and come in among your people, and win many souls for Christ, is the earnest prayer of your faithful servants! Bridget and Dolly join us in their kind love to you.—We are your faithful servants until death,

'GEORGE AND HELLEN PARKER.'

'February 22, 1866.

'MY DEAR ——,—We were sorry to hear that you were not so well; but trust you will soon get better. My dear ——, I return you many thanks for your kindness, and Bridget also; she prays earnest for you. George and I is in good health, and still holding out as usual, and intends to do until death, with the help of God. The boy also gets on well. All the rest of the servants use table beer at dinner-time, but my boy never. His master is very kind, and gave him a shilling to buy stamps to be writing me, and other kindnesses besides.

'I send my kind love to all your people. God bless you and them. If they prized you as I do, they would always pray for you. God bless you! George and Bridget joins me in their kind love.—Your obedient servant,

'HELLEN PARKER.'

'March 30, 1867.

'MY DEAR ——,—It is with pleasure I write you these few lines, hoping they will find you well, as we all are at present. Bridget is still keeping firm, and often prays for you. I hope you will remember me to all your faithful people. God grant that they may prize you as an instrument in God's hand, of winning souls to Christ! My dear ——, I feel a greater loss for you this day, than the day you left us. Mr. —— is going to leave us; and you away too—we feel lost. But our hope is in the Lord. I ask your prayers, and your people's, for us.

'We had a sorrowful meeting last night, both for speaker and hearers. Mr. —— had to stop several times. There was hardly a dry eye in the meeting, when he spoke of those who opened the meeting, and had done so much good, but had been removed from us by providence. You must think what my feelings were, and George's, when you were thus brought to our minds. Mr. G—— was at the meeting, and felt grieved too. Please write as soon as you can; I would wish to hear from you. God bless you.—From your faithful servant,

'HELLEN PARKER.'

There is one other phase of Mrs. Parker's character which I may briefly notice—that of a mother. She had an only child, 'the boy' mentioned in her letters; and very anxious she was indeed to instil her own principles into his mind. I cannot enter upon the details of her training; but may glance for a moment at their results, so far, at least, as the following incident brought them out.

They were all at church together one Sabbath. Before the services were concluded, Henry rose and went out. They went home, expecting he would be there before them; but no Henry was there. They inquired at most of the neighbours; but no one could give them information.

They became very anxious, as he was never allowed to go out on Sabbath. At last they resolved to inquire at one neighbour, whose door they had passed—the old woman who held the light when their door was broken to be open. A drunken, besotted creature she was, and a most virulent Roman Catholic. And, to their utter astonishment, there sat Henry, Bible in hand, reading to Kate.

The scene in the temple suggested itself strongly to both the parents. George, quite overcome, went to their own room and wept for joy.

It is time, however, to bring this sketch to a close. This I may do by giving some account of my last visit to them, at a somewhat recent date.

Our meeting was a happy one. I could not help inwardly contrasting their condition this afternoon with that on which I first found them.

Then, the walls were bare, except when begrimed with smoke and adorned with cobwebs. Everything else was quite in keeping—not a vestige of comfort. In every respect it was a fair sample of a drunkard's home.

Now, it was a seat of neatness, comfort, and taste. It was about their tea-time. A small table stood in the middle of the floor, covered with a cloth, coarse enough, but pure and clean. Then there was a tray, with all the requisites for tea neatly arranged. As for the tea itself, it seemed for the time forgotten.

'Do not let me keep you from your tea,' I said after a while.

'There's no hurry for tea.'

'Of course not; but it will spoil. So, unless you take it, I'll go away.'

There was no more hesitation. But, as Mrs. Parker went about it, I observed peculiarly intelligent looks pass between her and George. I did not at the time understand their purport; but all was soon explained by Mr. Parker asking if I would take a cup with them. But it was done in a manner that showed his consciousness of taking a liberty.

'No, thank you,' I said, without thinking, and really feeling unwilling to deprive them of their tea.

The shade which passed over their bright faces revealed the disappointment I had given; but I at once corrected it by saying:

'The reason why I said no, was that I did not wish to deprive you of your tea, otherwise I should enjoy a cup very much.'

Then sundry packages were produced; and when the wrappings were undone, a goodly display of cake, etc., made its appearance. And, as slice after slice was cut down, I could not help laughingly saying:

'Now, I know that is for me; but do you really expect me to eat all that?'

Both joined heartily in my laugh, for the quantity was not a small one. Then Mrs Parker said most feelingly:

'Who should it be cut down for but you? Who has a better right to it? But for you, it would never have been there. To you, under God, we owe all the comfort we enjoy to-day; and I am sure that your heart does rejoice as well as ours, to see what God has made you the means of doing. And I can tell you something more: not one day has passed since you left us, but, morning and night, we have prayed that God would bless and reward you.'

Some time after, I learned that Bridget and they had met for the same purpose on the last night of the year.

'And had we not good reason,' said they, 'to bless God for sending you? for at such a time we used to be just like the rest, behaving like devils; and how could we forget the one that was the means of saving us? You should be happy,' she continued, 'for God does not despise the prayers of the humble.'

Soon after, I left those happy and grateful ones to the enjoyment of their comforts, wondering at the amount of happiness that could be condensed in the home, however humble, when God's presence and blessing were really engaged.

A CHRISTIAN MOTHER.

A YOUNG man in California, whose mother resided in Maine, wrote pressing letters to him, urging his attention to the salvation of his soul, until he wrote to her requesting her not again to mention the subject of religion in any of her letters to him. She then wrote: 'My son, if you will acquit me when we stand in judgment before the throne of God, I will not trouble you again upon the subject of religion.' This letter was the means of melting his hard heart; and he sought and found forgiveness from God, and is now a devoted Christian.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Sam. xvi. 14–23.

Of Saul we may say, 'Thou didst run well, who hath hindered you?' He began well, but ended ill. His first days and works were better than his last. So with Demas; so with the church of Ephesus; so with the Jews, whose following Jehovah at first was belied by their last apostasy. So is it still with souls, churches, nations, ages.

I. Saul's sin.—For the root of all was sin. This sin was simply disobedience to a command of God. He was bidden slay Agag and his people. A cruel command, some would say, to which the disobedience was better than the obedience. But it was a divine command, whether the wisdom, or the justice, or the mercy were visible. God had his reasons for it, and that was enough. Saul's sin was not misrule, nor oppression, nor wickedness, but simply disobedience to a command which some might call arbitrary, if not harsh and stern. Such stress does God lay on obedience, simple obedience, unreasoning obedience. His will must be done; for He is Sovereign, and He is the God only wise. Saul's sin was the preference of his own will and wisdom to God's. Let our consciences be tender as to this; and let us beware of acting on our own reasons or ideas of fitness, or doing our own will. 'To obey is better than sacrifice.'

II. The consequences.—(1) His crown is taken from him; he is rejected from being king. (2) Samuel leaves him (1 Sam. xv. 35). But the two special things mentioned here are these:

(1.) The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul.—I do not take up the question as to whether Saul were a true child of God; this passage does not determine the point. He might be so; and these words might be like Paul's: 'Whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme' (1 Tim. i. 20); 'deliver unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh' (1 Cor. v. 5). But certainly 'the Spirit which departed from Saul' was good, not evil. It was the reversal of what is said: 'God gave him another heart,'—a heart for governing, which He now takes away. The good Spirit is grieved, and departs. Saul's last act of disobedience has quenched Him; he is left without heavenly guidance.

(2.) An evil spirit from the Lord troubles him.—He is not left alone; for as one Spirit departs, another enters. a. He is troubled.—His soul is now the abode of darkness and fear. He becomes moody and sad; he is vexed, perplexed, despondent. This is the fruit of sin! b. He is troubled by an evil spirit.—The clean spirit goes out, and the unclean spirit comes in,—comes in to torment, and sadden, and vex. c. He is troubled by an evil spirit from the Lord.—God lets loose Satan upon him. The unclean spirit returns with others more wicked than himself, and his last state is worse than his first. These words are very awful: 'I will choose their delusions;' and, 'God shall send them strong delusion!'

Thus is his chastisement double—negative and positive; a departure of the good, and the arrival of the evil. And this infliction is Jehovah's doing. Not chance, nor disease, nor natural depression of spirits, but a visitation from God: judgment for disobedience; judicial punishment.

III. Human appliances.—Here it is music, religious music,—the music of the harp, the harp of David. This was soothing; but it did not reach the seat of the disease. It is something human, something external, something that man can originate and apply. It is effectual to a certain extent; it drives away the evil spirit, and restores temporary tranquillity—thus possibly deceiving its victim. In like manner we find the human spirit afflicted in every age, sometimes more and sometimes less. And in all such cases man steps in with his human and external appliances. I do not refer to the grosser forms of dispelling gloom,—drunkenness and profligacy,—in which men seek to drown their sense of want, and make up for the absence of God. I refer to the refined appliances—those of art, science, music, gaiety, by which men try to minister to a mind diseased. What is Romanism and ritualism, but a repetition of Saul's minstrelsy? The soul needs soothing. It is vexed and filled with the world; its conscience is not at ease; it is troubled and weary. It betakes itself to forms,—something for the eye and ear; to chants, and vestments, and postures, and performances; sweet sounds and fair sights; sentimental and pictorial religion; which is all a mere refined form of worldliness. By these the natural man is soothed, the spirit tranquillized; the man brought to believe that a cure has been wrought, because his gloom has been alleviated by these religious spectacles, these exhibitions, which suit the unregenerate soul so well. They but drug the soul, filling it with a sort of religious delirium.

IV. The results.—A partial and temporary cure. It is said that the evil spirit departed, but not that the good Spirit returned. Saul's trouble was alleviated, but not removed. The disease was still there. The results of David's harp were only superficial and negative. So is it with a soul. There are many outward applications, which act like spiritual chloroform upon the soul. They soothe, and calm, and please; but that is all. They do not reach below the surface, nor touch the deep-seated malady within. Men try rites, sacraments, pictures, music, dresses, and the varied attractions of ecclesiastical ornament; but all these leave the spirit unfilled, and its wounds unhealed. They cannot regenerate, or quicken, or heal, or fill with the Holy Spirit. They may keep on the self-satisfaction and self-delusion of the soul, but that is all. They bring no true peace, nor give rest to the weary. They do not fill; they merely hide our emptiness.

Our age is full of such appliances, literary and religious, all got up for the purpose of soothing the troubled spirit of man. Excitement, gaiety, balls, theatres, operas, concerts, ecclesiastical music, dresses, performances,—what are all these but man's appliances for casting out the evil spirit, and healing the soul's hurt, without having recourse to God's one remedy? These pleasant sights and sounds may 'take the prisoned soul and lap it in Elysium;' but what of that? They do not bring it nearer to God; they do not work repentance, or produce faith, or fix the eye on the true cross. They leave the soul still without God, and without reconciliation. The religion thus produced is hollow, and fitful, and superficial, and sentimental. It will not save nor sanctify. It may produce a sort of religious inebriation, but not that which God calls godliness; not that which apostles pointed out as a holy life, a walk with God.

THE WORLDLINESS OF RITUALISM.*

THIS love of the sensuous and the pictorial is evidence of the growing power of the senses and the fancy over the intellect. The religion of the gospel is as far removed as possible from a sensuous system. Water to represent the purity of Christian life, and bread and wine to represent the source of its nourishment, are the only elements of which the senses can take cognisance. The religion of Jesus has no place for 'art or man's device:' there is nothing for art to imitate. Water as being applied in baptism, bread and wine being eaten and drunk, are incapable of being painted or sculptured. And these are the only objects of sense in Christianity. To change their natural appearance, or to use them in a way which their own nature does not suggest, is, under whatever pretence, to dishonour the institution of Christ, and to overbear his authority as sole Head of the church. The religion of the New Testament appeals to the human intellect, and engages its highest powers. An unseen Saviour engages the love of the heart, its deepest reverence, its purest sensibilities. The aids to faith come by the understanding, and not by the fancy. No symbols appeal to the senses, except those of water, and bread, and wine, of familiar everyday use, and, therefore, in themselves having nothing imposing or impressive about them to captivate the senses. It is manifestly the design of the gospel system to discourage the material and the sensuous in divine worship, appealing to the higher nature in man. When our Lord was on earth, by attracting and attaching the hearts of men to himself, He drew them from all other visible objects of religious significance and reverence. And after his resurrection He was seen of his disciples only occasionally, and under such changed conditions as must have made them feel that the same kind of intercourse which they had enjoyed with Him before his death would not be resumed. He taught them that it was expedient for them that He should go away, that they might not be dependent upon any visible object of reverence or trust for the maintenance of their faith or of their religious affections. Christ is to be no longer 'known after the flesh.' They must realize the truth that 'God is a Spirit,' invisible; that hereafter, when Christ withdrew himself, no sensible manifestation of God would be made to man, and that 'the true worshippers must worship Him in spirit and in truth.' When our Lord ascended, He left no visible representation of any divine thing; He was the last as well as the greatest and best, and by man the most intelligible, of all manifestations of God. 'He hath declared Him,' his nature, and character, and will, in image and action, in operation and effect, in a manner best suited to the intelligence of man, best calculated to convey true ideas of God, and to exalt Him in the estimation of man. And upon this knowledge of God, testified in written record, man's religion must now rest. The Shekinah no longer glorifies a golden mercy-seat. No pillar of cloud or flame indicates a present God. The whole 'law of commandments contained in ordinances,' the symbolical ritual of worship which maintained religion among the Jews, has passed away never to return. And nothing of similar sensuousness has been instituted to replace it. There are now no helps to devotion which are not first helps to thought. With Christ all visible objects of religious reverence have disappeared from the earth. There is nothing for the world to gaze upon. Christ promised to send a substitute for his own presence,—a substitute whose presence was more expedient for the condition of his people than his own continued in bodily form. That substitute is the invisible 'Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him.' The world's religion, a religion conformable to the world's taste, must present a visible object of worship, and its worship must be elaborate bodily exercise in the midst of the ornate devices of artistic genius, in gorgeous symbolic robes of symbolic forms, and symbolic colours, in a symbolic structure fragrant with symbolic perfume. All is symbolic, nothing real. Any object of worship, material and visible, since the ascension of Christ, is an idol, and its worship idolatry. The true object of worship is invisible. He must be worshipped in a way suitable to his nature, that is, 'in spirit and in truth,' with the understanding and with the heart. The day of Pentecost, following immediately upon the ascension of our Lord, introduced the dispensation of the Spirit. A new era of religious life was then solemnly inaugurated. All sensuous display was henceforth to cease. 'The beggarly elements,' 'the rudiments of the world,' the pictures suited to childhood, were to be put away and to be replaced by the intellectual and the spiritual, as became the manhood and maturity of the human mind. For some centuries before the coming of Christ, the speculative philosophy of Greece had stimulated the human mind, and trained it to the highest pitch of intellectual culture, so that there was a constant thirst for new themes of abstract thought in all the great centres of mental activity. At no former period in the world's history, could a religion appealing directly to the intellect of man, and challenging the severest scrutiny of the human mind, find such entertainment as was prepared for it when 'the desire of all nations' at length appeared. The Jewish mind had largely partaken of the prevailing cultivation, the dispersion of that people having brought them into contact with the speculative philosophy. Before their dispersion they were shut out from intercourse with the rest of mankind, from collision of thought, maintaining a typical existence in religious seclusion, to preserve the knowledge of the true God, when the nations of the earth had forgotten Him, because they did not like to retain Him in their knowledge. The system of religion committed to their keeping permitted no speculation. Every observance was rigidly prescribed; and whatever was needful for the people to know was authoritatively taught by living prophets. They had one great hope, almost the only stimulus to imagination, to cheer the burthensome round of ceremonial, the coming of the Messiah. This hope, kept alive by the sure word of prophecy and promise, was to every thoughtful Israelite a proof that his religion was not perfect or complete in itself, but provisional; that it was not suited for universality if the God of Israel were also the God of the whole earth. While God was preserving the knowledge of himself by depositing it in the custody of a single people, hedged within narrow limits, He was preparing, by a different process, other nations to receive the precious deposit in another form, a form fitted for universality. When the Messiah should come, He would be 'a light to lighten the Gentiles,' as well as 'the glory of his people Israel.' The true religion for mankind was not to be enshrined in temples made with hands, but in human thought and in human hearts. And a temple of loftiest thought was being raised, in the providence of God, in the cultivation of the human mind by learning and philosophy, by speculation upon all things in heaven and earth, so that, when Christ came, the human mind seemed to have reached the utmost limits of speculative thought. And a descent from the high altitude of attainment would have been inevitable, had not the new element of the religion of Jesus come at once to sustain and to purify the noble capabilities of the human intellect. And now, let any thoughtful man, capable of appreciating the Gospel of John, and the argument of the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews, say whether a return to the Jewish ritual would not be a descent in the scale of thought. The mind which has held high converse with Paul, would feel itself condemned to a lower level of intelligence, to be tied to a religion of ceremonies, making serious account of places, and of points of the compass, and of furniture and dresses. It could not have imbibed the teaching of Paul respecting sin and righteousness, grace and truth, condemnation and justification, carnal-mindedness and spiritual-mindedness, with all the manly sentiment of a mind habituated to high and reverent reasoning upon themes involving the nature, the character, and the ways of God, and the nature and the destiny of man, without a recoil from 'the beggarly elements' of copes, and chasubles, and cottas, and crossings, and thuribles, and incense boats and spoons, and smoke, and palls, as an insult to the human understanding, and a dishonour to the religion of Christ. Nay, would not such a religion render useless and abortive the whole training and culture by which the mind had been strengthened and elevated in its natural powers, to receive and entertain thoughts having their origin in the mind of God himself? Would it be possible for the mind which had been liberated from the control of mere sense and materialism, and had attained a noble manhood, expanded and invigorated by speculations upon life and mind, their origin and end, upon truth and the nature of morals, upon eternity and God, to accept a religion which cast dishonour upon thought, and mental aspiration, and progress, and doomed human life to a round of dramatic pantomime with such scenic accompaniments as are only adapted to the lowest stage of human thought? There may be minds whose previous cultivation and strength may be able to withstand the deteriorating force of a mechanical ritual for a time; but to the common mass of minds, untrained in the invigorating gymnastic of high and conservative thought, the influence is enfeebling and corrupting. To such, the profound contemplation and intelligent apprehension of the great doctrines of the truth are impossible; and apart from these, religion is an æsthetic delusion, an indolent non-belief, or a corrupting superstition. It must be regarded as a significant fact that no ritual finds a place under the gospel,—that in the New Testament it is only referred to with condemnation, as the antagonist of the system of the grace of God. All religious ceremonial professing to be symbolic, can only claim the authority of 'the doctrines and commandments of men;' but are but 'will-worship' without authority from God.

* From an able work entitled Representative Responsibility. By the Rev. HENRY WALLACE, Londonderry. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA.

No. VI.

UNCERTAINTY.

THERE is no denying it: uncertainty is a great trial. Of course, there is a sense in which everything is uncertain; in which the most carefully and wisely arranged plan—one which has succeeded in hundreds of cases—may fail, through some little event occurring, which no one could either have foreseen or prevented,—the uncertainty, in fact, which is common to man at all times, and in all positions.

It is not of this, however, that we are thinking, but rather of times of special uncertainty, when we cannot, as we say, see one step before us,—when making a plan for even to-morrow would be impossible; for we cannot form any idea of what our condition or our circumstances may then be.

Yes, as we said before, uncertainty is a great trial, and a very humbling one. It makes us feel our ignorance, our powerlessness, our dependence. For these reasons, very probably, it is a trial constantly sent by Him, who sees the exact discipline that we need, in order to make us 'stand perfect and complete in all the will of God' (Col. iv. 12).

If, however, uncertainty is a state of trial, is it not also a state of blessing? Does not the knowledge of our ignorance teach us to rest more simply on Him, 'in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge' (Col. ii. 3),—of our powerlessness, on 'Him to whom has been given all power in heaven, and on earth' (Matt. xx. 18),—our dependence, on Him who has said, 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee' (Heb. xiii. 5)? And are there not precious promises, into the depth of whose meaning we can but dimly penetrate, until we read them by the light of uncertainty?

I think, also, that our gracious God often sends the trial of uncertainty to prepare us for the yet greater trial that may lie beyond it. In times of uncertainty we do not realize this, and are apt to think, 'it is this uncertainty that is so hard to bear: If I only knew the worst, I could make up my mind to endure it.' But is it really so? One very dear to us is ill—very ill—hovering, in fact, between life and death, and neither friend nor physician can tell how it may end. The suspense is very trying, very hard to bear; but if it pleases God to take that friend home to Himself, will not the trial of suspense have lightened, not the sorrow, it may be, but the shock, which it would have been, had we known, in the first moment of his illness, that he would not recover?

Or the uncertainty may last much longer. There has been a panic about the banks, such a panic as there was in May 1866. At that time, some persons knew at once that everything they had was gone. In affluence in the morning, they were in poverty in the evening. May God help and comfort all such! With others it was different: for weeks, nay, for months, everything was uncertain; they might be as well off as ever, they might be penniless. No one could even guess how matters would end. Oh, it was a great trial!—how great I am sure none knew but He who permitted it, and the sufferers themselves. They could not form any plan, they could not decide on any course of action; the wisest friend could not advise, the most loving could only lighten the burden by sharing it.

It was indeed a trying, searching, solemn time. Those to whom others had been wont to turn trustfully for help and guidance, were then utterly unable to help or guide themselves. They could not tell what a single day might bring forth (Prov. xxvii. 1). That night of trial was a very dark one; but to those who looked for them, many a bright star of hope and promise appeared, lightening its gloom, and constraining them, though perhaps with faltering voice, to say:

'And sorrow touched by Thee grows bright,
With more than rapture's ray,
As darkness shows us worlds of light,
We never saw by day.'

Yes, there was much to comfort them. Did they feel, 'We can do nothing but wait?' Could they do anything better, provided that they waited on the Lord; for is it not said, 'Blessed are all they that wait for Him;' and again, 'Wait on the Lord, and He shall save thee?' (Isa. xxx. 18; Prov. xx. 22.) Did they say sadly, 'We cannot see a step before us; we are utterly blind as to the future?' What matter, when He 'who is light, and in whom is no darkness at all' (1 John i. 5), has said, 'I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known; I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight: these things will I do unto them, and not forsake them?' (Isa. xlii. 16.) Ah! they need not fear to follow where the Lord Jesus brings and leads them, making darkness light, and crooked things straight, lest they should stumble and fall. Has not man's inability to help, made them trust the more simply in God's power? How home to their hearts come the words, 'Have faith in God' (Matt. xi. 22); for, 'with Him nothing is impossible!' (Luke i. 37.) They must look to Him for strength, or they would faint; but they now learn that those who do wait on Him 'shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint' (Isa. xl.

31). Their continual need requires continual prayer; and the constant intercourse with the Lord Jesus that this involves, keeps them living so near Him, that, imperceptibly indeed to themselves, but very perceptibly to others, their hearts' desire is being granted, and they grow like Him,—so like, that all who come in contact with them, 'take knowledge of them that they have been with Him' (Acts iv. 13).

And do not the precious lessons they have learned, and the experience they have gained of the love, and the patience, and the power, and the faithfulness, and the all-sufficiency of the Lord Jesus, in this sore trial of uncertainty, help and comfort them in the endurance of the poverty, or comparative poverty, in which the uncertainty may end? May they not have found that they can do or bear all things through Christ, who strengtheneth them? (Phil. iv. 13.) May they not have learned to count all that they have lost but as dross, in comparison of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus their Lord (Phil. iii. 8), which, through their trial, they may have gained?

Their happy home may be broken up, and many a pleasant thing may pass into the hands of others. It troubles them little; they know that they are but strangers and pilgrims; they desire a better, that is, a heavenly home, in that city which hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God (Heb. xi. 13, 16, 10), and where Jesus has gone to prepare a place for them (John xiv. 2). The home is certain; so it does not make them uneasy, that the path by which they are to reach it is unknown. Trustfully and simply they can say:

'I know not the way I am going,
But well do I know my Guide;
With a child-like trust I give my hand
To the mighty Friend by my side.'

But there are other cases, again, where uncertainty seems to be the appointed discipline, it may be, for life. I knew a lady who, although a great invalid, could yet reckon upon the future almost as surely as a person in health could do. At particular times of the year, she used to be more or less ill; and when she rallied, it was so slowly, yet so steadily, that she could generally tell pretty accurately, a long time beforehand, how she would probably be, and what she would probably be able to do, at such a time.

She had a great delight in arranging plans in all their minute details, a long time before they were to be carried out. And many a plan which she suggested, and which, from her state of health, seemed wild and visionary to her friends at the time, was afterwards really carried out, just as she had arranged it should be.

But a new symptom was added to her illness, which completely changed its character. She could no longer look forward a month, or a year, nay, not even a day, for she might be as well as usual in the morning, and, before evening, might be most seriously ill. It was a great trial, and one that she keenly felt. It entirely broke up all her ways and habits. She could no longer say, I will do this at a certain time, and that at such another. She had thankfully to do things when she could; but it was very long before she turned to do them thus thankfully: she liked her own way much better than God's. How often she used to say, 'If I only knew how I would be, I would not mind it half so much; if I knew that I should always be a great invalid, then I could arrange all my plans for an invalid life, and I dare say I should be very happy; or if I knew that I was to get well, it would not be nearly so trying, having to be so idle now,—I would only do the more when I got well; but now, I cannot even ask a friend to pay me a visit on a particular day, lest I should not be able to see him.'

But God loved her too much to give her her own way. One night she was pondering this change in her life, and the thought occurred to her, 'Is not this uncertainty as much appointed by God as any other part of your illness? Is it not just the discipline you require, to subdue your own strong will, and make you yield it up to God, a willing sacrifice? Take the uncertainty as your certainty, and ask God to teach you to live by the day, and to leave the future to Him.'

It was, indeed, a message from God to her soul. Strange as it may appear, she had never thought of the uncertainty as being in itself a trial sent by God as chastening, but only as being, as it were, the natural result of a trial. Now she saw her mistake—saw that it was a trial, for which, indeed, there was a 'needs be' (1 Pet. i. 6); and most earnestly did she pray that God would give her grace and strength to 'take up the cross daily' (Luke ix. 23), and learn the lesson He would teach her through its instrumentality.

Very imperfectly, I am sure, has she as yet either done the one, or learned the other; but I am also sure that, in proportion as she has done so, she has been possessed of a peace, and a calmness, and a rest, to which she was a stranger in the days when the trial was comparatively unknown; for she can feel and say:

'Wherever in the world I am,
In whatsoe'er estate,
I have a fellowship with hearts
To keep and cultivate,
And a work of lowly love to do
For the Lord on whom I wait.'

But, independently of the lessons that may be learned in times of uncertainty, and the blessings that may be gained through it, is there not even, while it lasts, wonderful comfort in knowing that, although all is uncertainty to us, all is certainty to God? He sees not only, as we do, the end of our journey; but every step of the way is mapped out before Him in unerring distinctness. When, therefore, we do not know our way, let us remember that 'He knoweth the way that we take' (Job xxiii. 10); and not only knows, but has ordered it, for we read that 'the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and He delighteth in his way' (Ps. xxxix. 23). Would He have ordered them if they were not right? Would He delight in them if they were not safe? Not a snare, not a pitfall, not a precipice lies in our onward path, that is not known to Him who has said, 'I will guide thee with mine eye' (Ps. xxxii. 8). But in order to take advantage of this promise, we must look, not down on our path, but up to our Guide. A lady was once walking with a friend on the top of the ruins of Carisbrook Castle: suddenly she felt quite giddy. 'Give me your hand,' said her friend, 'and look up:' she did so, and passed the dangerous place in safety. But when we look up with the eye of faith, we see, not the blue sky, but the face of our wise and loving Guide, the Lord Jesus Christ.

There is no uncertainty with Him. He says, 'Certainly I will be with thee' (Eph. iii. 12); and that, not now and then, or for a short time, but, 'I will guide thee continually' (Isa. lviii. 11). Through all places, too, however painful or trying, He will be with us; for He says, 'When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee' (Isa. xliii. 2); and again, 'This God is our God for ever and ever; He will be our Guide, even unto (or over) death' (Ps. xlviii. 14). And even then, in heaven itself, we do not lose sight of our Saviour in this blessed character of Guide; for we read of the great multitude whom no man can number, who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, that there 'they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; FOR the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them beside the living fountains of waters.'

'I BELIEVE . . IN THE FORGIVENESS OF SINS.'

Yes, I am sure you do, for you do not doubt the inspiration of the Bible; and there it is so plainly declared, that none who profess to believe the Bible can deny that they believe in the forgiveness of sins.

But how do you believe in it? As a mere abstract truth with which you are not in any way concerned? or as a blessed, living truth with which you have so much to do, that whenever you hear or repeat the words, your heart thrills with thankfulness and joy because you can say, 'I believe in the forgiveness of my sins?'

Ah! there is all the difference in the world between these two beliefs. For if you only believe in the forgiveness of sins in the former sense, you are either still dead, 'dead in trespasses and sins,' or else so fainting and trembling a child of God that you dishonour Him, and are miserable yourself. Whereas, if you believe it in the latter sense, on the infallible authority of God's word, then you 'have passed from death unto life,' a life that can never end, because it is a life which is 'hid with Christ in God.'

But perhaps, although you cannot truthfully say, 'I believe in the forgiveness of my sins,' you are longing to do so; you know that you must be a stranger to the 'peace that passeth all understanding, and the joy with which the stranger intermeddleth not' (Phil. iv. 7; Prov. xiv. 10), until you can say it; and as you read of God's power and God's willingness to save and to forgive, you wish you could appropriate the promises, and take them home to your heart. But you cannot; you dare not: it would be presumptuous.

Stay a moment; would it be presumptuous? A friend tells you that there is £50,000 in the Bank of England. You do not doubt it, but you do not take any interest in the intelligence; it is not of any importance to you; you do not care or think about it.

But he tells you that there is £50,000 in the bank for every one who wishes for it. That is quite a different thing; that concerns you. £50,000! You ask if he is really sure that the promise was made in good faith, and will be kept? Yes, he is quite sure, for he has got, actually got, the £50,000 himself, and many of his friends also; in fact, he does not know one single person who has applied at the bank since the promise was made, who had not got it.

Still it seems too good news to be true. Why should the banker do so? And to that there is but one answer, 'Because he pleases.' And surely not any other reason could be so satisfactory. It does not depend on your merits, ay, or your circumstances. No; it depends simply and entirely on the banker's power and willingness to give, which has been proved in thousands of cases already; and on your willingness to receive, which you can now prove, by going to the bank and asking for the money.

Would the banker upbraid you for your presumption at coming? Would he not rather be gratified at your trusting his word? If you yourself had promised a gift to a friend, would you like him to refuse it on the ground of presumption or unworthiness? Would you not much rather that with thankful heart, and sparkling eye, and beaming face, telling of the joy within, he accepted the gift you had offered, not because he was worthy, but because you loved him?

And can we possibly imagine that it pleases the God of love when we refuse to appropriate the promises He has so freely made, because we feel that we are utterly unworthy of them? Is not this pride, rather than humility? Humility forgets self; and, thinking only of the greatness, the goodness, the power, and the love of God, gratefully accepts the gift. Pride would fain be worthy; but if worthy of forgiveness, then forgiveness is not any longer a gift; and truly, except as a gift, a free gift, it can never be enjoyed. It is promised, not because of any merit or worth on your part, but for the very same reason that the promised land was given to Israel of old, of whom we read, that 'they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them, but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because Thou hadst a favour unto them.'

Do not, then, trust God less than you would trust man. Do not dishonour Him by doubting his word. Do not say you are willing to be forgiven, but that you do not know if God is willing to forgive you. What! do you think it possible that of his own free will He sent his only-begotten, well-beloved Son to die for sinners, and should then be unwilling to save them? Such a possibility is too absurd to be entertained for a moment. Or do you say, I know that He sent his Son to die for sinners, but only those whom He effects in his sovereign love shall be saved; and how can I know that I am one of the elect?

I will tell you. God, who cannot lie (Tit. i. 2), has said, 'Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely' (Rev. xxii. 17); and again, 'I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely' (Rev. xxi. 5). Are you willing to drink of that water of life? Are you athirst for it? Athirst, with a thirst that nothing that earth can give, be it health, or wealth, or fame, or joy, can satisfy? If so, then you have the only proof you can have as yet that you are one of the elect. The willingness to be saved from your sins did not arise from the promptings of your own evil heart. Your thirst for the water of life had not its source from within. No; they are only proofs, blessed proofs, of the truth of the words, 'My people shall be willing in the day of my power' (Ps. cx. 3).

But it may be that you who are now reading these pages might once, by the grace of God, have been able, in most full and well-founded assurance, to say, 'I believe in the forgiveness of my sins,' and yet may not be able to say it now. No; there is a thick, dark cloud between you and your Saviour, and you go on your way sorrowfully, saying, from the very depth of your heart, 'Oh that I were as in months past!'

There may be various reasons for this. Perhaps the lamp of faith may burn dim, because you have not fed it so constantly as you were wont to do with the oil of the promises. Perhaps Satan is taking advantage of physical infirmities to add spiritual depression, and make you think, that because you cannot enjoy communion with God in prayer, or in the reading of his word, as you used formerly to do, that therefore you are not, and cannot be, a child of God! Or, again, perhaps you have yielded to temptation and fallen into sin—grievous, wilful sin—such sin as you had not perhaps ever committed before you knew the Lord; and Satan tells you that if you were his child, you could not have so sinned.

Suppose that any or all of these reasons are true in your case, you need not, nay, you must not, therefore, despair. Suppose, for a moment, that all the past, with its hope, and joy, and peace, was a deception, and that you have not any right to take comfort from the recollection of past experience: be it so, our past experience may deceive us, but God's word never. Come to his 'exceeding great and precious promises' (2 Pet. i. 4), as if you had never come to them before. Listen to the thrice blessed assurance, 'He is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him' (Heb. vi. 25). No amount of sin, no aggravation of the circumstances under which you have sinned, can place you beyond the boundary line to which that 'uttermost' extends. Yes, 'though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool' (Isa. i. 18).

And do not let the words, 'that come unto God,' make a difficulty, for 'coming unto God,' 'believing on Him,' 'looking unto Him,' 'thirsting for Him,' are all included in the being willing. He who is willing to save you has made you willing to be saved, and nothing more is necessary. Take, then, the cup of salvation, and drink of the fountain of the water of life, freely, fully, abundantly, and as often as you please; you will never exhaust the spring whence that water flows.

And when you have done so, fear not that your sins shall ever rise up in judgment against you. Image after image is used to show how entirely, once and for ever, forgiven sin is put away. True, if we have sinned against earthly friends, even though they may forgive, do we not all know how hard it is to forget? Do we not all know how often, when we are with them, the thought that they may be thinking of and remembering what we have done, wounds and pains us?

But it is not so with God. He not only forgives, but forgets; for does not He himself say, 'Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more?' (Heb. vii. 12.) Nay, further, it is elsewhere said, 'Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depth of the sea' (Mic. vii. 19). And that is a sea so deep—the sea of God's sovereign, unchangeable love—that Satan has no plummet-line that can sound its depths, and bring up our sins again to view. There is yet another image. You have watched a white cloud sailing along the sky; presently the sun shone out brightly, and you looked again, and the cloud was gone; not a trace of it remained; the sun had blotted it out. And so God, 'the Sun of righteousness,' says, 'I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins' (Isa. xliv. 22). But best of all, I think, it is said, 'Thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back' (Isa. xxxviii. 17). Oh trembling sinner, with the Lord Jesus Christ himself as a strong and impregnable tower between you and your sins, how could they ever come back to you again?

Fear not, then, to trust yourself to Jesus. Do not come as if it was just possible that you might be saved, saying, as so many have faithlessly and foolishly done, 'I will come to Jesus, and if I perish, I will perish at his feet.' You know well that no one ever perished there, for is He not 'faithful and true?' and He himself has said, 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out' (John vi. 37).

Come, then, and take fresh courage from the fact, that the very faintest desire to come must have been implanted by that Holy Spirit, from whom proceed 'all holy desires,' quite as much as 'all good counsels and all just works.' From the first step in the salvation of a sinner to the last, all is of free, sovereign, unmerited grace. And well that it is so, or I should not have any hope or any comfort to offer. But now I have both; for 'the Lord retaineth not his anger for ever, because He delighteth in mercy' (Mic. vii. 18). And it is as true of God's people now as it was in the days when Moses said, 'The Lord did not set his love on you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people, for ye were the fewest of all people; but because the Lord loved you, and because He would keep the oath which He had sworn unto your fathers' (Deut. vii. 7, 8). And again, 'I, even I, am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins' (Isa. xliii. 25).

Blessed, most blessed reason, for He himself says, 'I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed' (Mal. iii. 6).

'FOUR NEGLECTED DAYS.'

IT was a calm still evening in the spring of 1849. The almost horizontal rays of the setting sun lit up a small but neatly furnished apartment. We approach; but ah! tread softly, it is the chamber of death. Can it be? Yes, that emaciated form reclining there is fast nearing that 'bourne whence no traveller returns.' And you ask, How does she face death? Come and see: those beaming eyes, that radiant countenance, bespeak no familiarity with death as the King of Terrors. Worldling, come and see how a Christian can die! Look at that scene—at those uplifted eyes, eagerly, joyously, gazing into futurity,—and tell me, does not your inmost soul echo the words, 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his?' But hark! she speaks! Round her dying bed stands a group of friends; an aged mother, bending, with a heart wrung with grief, over the form of her dying child; beside her, two young fatherless children, soon to be deprived of a mother's tender care, and thrown as orphans on the wide world. On them the dying mother's eyes are riveted. 'William,' at last she murmured, and the boy eagerly bent forward to catch the faintest whisper. 'William, have you done it?' What was it in these words that visibly thrilled the boy's whole frame, making it quiver and tremble? Ah, my reader, it was a mother's request, neglected and forgotten! Four days before that widowed mother had called her boy to her bedside, and charged him to meet her on the last great day at the right hand of the Judge. She implored him with all the earnestness which nought but a mother's love could prompt, to put off the concerns of his immortal soul no longer, but to consider his state, and examine how he stood in the sight of a holy God. Then, as his mother's last gift, she had given him her Bible, and a small note-book, in which she asked him to transcribe his own feelings as to how it stood with God and his soul. The lad took the book; but grief for his mother's loss had absorbed every other feeling. He had neglected her request, he had not surrendered himself to Christ. And now, when gazing with tearful eyes on his loved mother's dying agonies, what would he not have given to have been able to cheer her last moments with the assurance that he had obeyed her injunction, that he had renounced for ever the world's vain pleasures, and that he would follow her to the home above? But alas! he could not, he dare not answer in the affirmative; he was silent.

'William, my son, have you done it?' was repeated.

'No, mother,' burst from his lips. A shade of deep sorrow passed over her dying features—hitherto so radiant and unclouded—painful indeed for the lad to witness. A death-like stillness again pervaded the apartment, till, once more turning to her son, she said: 'William, bring me the book and a pencil.' The lad hastened to obey, though fearful of quitting his station at the bedside. He came back, and put the book and pencil into his mother's feeble hands. 'Raise me up,' she said to her sister who stood by. It was done; and as the boy bent over her, he saw his mother's dying hand trace, tremblingly and with difficulty, the scarcely legible words, 'Four neglected days!' Silently, but with a look of deep meaning, she handed the book to her son, and sank back exhausted with the effort. But ah! the boy's bitter sorrow at receiving his mother's last reproof, may be better imagined than described. The closing scene approached. Death's icy hand was already upon her. Her eye rested once more lovingly, lingeringly, on her darling boy and his weeping sister; then, upraised to heaven: '"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace,"—perfect peace,' she murmured, and death sealed her utterance. All was over. Reader, has it ever been your lot to stand by a dying bed, to witness the swift progress of the ravages of disease, to watch the advance of the waves of the river of death, rolling onwards, whilst life is swiftly but noiselessly ebbing away; to hear the last sigh heaved, to feel that the pulse has ceased to beat, and that the soul of the loved one has winged its flight to the land where sorrow and sighing are unknown? Ah! what is the world, with its store of pleasures, at such a moment as this? Reviewing the past pilgrimage of one who now has reached the goal, and entered into the city of habitation, into the many mansions, what does life seem, with all its fitful fever, but a vapour which appeareth for a little while, and then vanishes away? There and then all veils are torn aside, and things are seen as they are. Then what has been your life since you witnessed that solemn scene? Have you been dragged back again into the whirlpool of sin, gaiety, and worldliness? Has the prince of this world regained his ascendancy over you, and led you to think of death, judgment, and eternity as mere phantoms of the brain, and unwelcome thoughts? Have you placed your portion and your all on that which is passing away? Then, ah! remember once again these awful words: 'It is appointed unto men once to die.' It is appointed, it is fixed; your dying day is already fixed, you know not when; but you do know that every day, every week, every year, as it rolls its onward course, is bringing you nearer to it.

. . . . . .

It is a Sabbath eve; and after the lapse of years, we revisit the same apartment. There is but little change in the old-fashioned furniture; all is as we left it. The externals are the same. But ah! time has not been idle in its course! That tall, manly form, pacing restlessly to and fro, is with difficulty recognised as the slender boyish frame we once before saw in the same chamber. Heavy voluminous tomes are piled on his table; but for the present they are pushed aside. He is evidently buried in thought. At last he stops in his feverish walk, pausing before a chest of drawers, and hastily, nervously unlocking it, he takes out a Bible, and a small note-book. We recognise them—his mother's dying gifts. Handling them gently, and as it were with sacred awe, he lays them before him on the table, and opens the note-book. The solemn words, the last his mother wrote, were there on the fly-leaf, and caught his eye: 'Four neglected days!'

Thoughts and scenes of other days were crowding through his memory. That bed—he sees his mother there—he sees himself a boy standing by her side, hearing her warning words, receiving her parting counsels, and listening to her solemn injunction to meet her at the right hand of the Judge. And then the last closing hour passes before him, when his mother's heart was wounded in her last moments, by the thought that her warning voice was still unheeded, neglected, and despised.

And the young man bent his head and wept bitter tears of agony. Catching up his pen, he wrote on the first page: 'Four neglected days—ay, four neglected years, since my mother's dying hand traced these trembling letters here.

'Four neglected years! Oh how much is in these words! How many sermons profitlessly heard! How many offers of mercy let slip! How many good impressions faded away! And still the hard heart—the deadened soul—conscious of nothing but its own deadness, and scarce conscious of that. Oh that my head were waters! Oh that I but felt what I write, and felt it not for a passing hour, but felt it as one should feel in the thought of eternity! Afflictions unimproved; death of friends and relations unfelt; visited by all but bodily sickness, and by all unmoved. O Lord, have mercy! Nothing can save me, nothing can awaken me, but such power as can raise the dead. But, bless God, the dead have been raised; and He who raised Lazarus and the widow of Nain's son, can raise me from a deeper death than theirs.

'Four neglected years! Oh how that will sting in time, and God grant that it may not sting in eternity! 1853! To think that it is 1853, and me unsaved,—without hope and without God in the world.

'1849! 1850! 1851! 1852! Oh, are they all but shadows of the past years of memory, and not of anticipation? And yet they seem but as yesterday! Alas! alas! but they will never return; but their remembrance shall meet me at the judgment-seat of Christ. Ah me! they are recorded in the book of God's remembrance, as well as in mine; and, alas! it is a record of debt, a record of sin, a record of unbelief, and yet, strange to tell, scarcely a record of misery! How sad that the soul should so delight in sin, should find such pleasure apart from its God! Not so much a record of particular and outward sin, as of heart-sinfulness, practical ungodliness; less the life of sin, than its deadness and powerlessness. Lulled as it were in a trance, busied with the things seen, and heedless of the unseen.

'And, oh, the years before! Oh for the solemn Sabbath evenings, when the sun shone bright through the window on the polished drawers as we sat at our mother's feet and learnt the things of salvation! Oh! that recollection can never part, that sunshine I can never forget. Linked with my mother's image and my mother's voice, it must live in my memory for ever. Oh to hear that voice again! But, oh! rather to hear the Saviour's voice and to obey it. O Lord, forgive me! And, oh! have mercy on my poor Sabbath class, doomed to the instructions of a prayerless teacher. Oh I have tried to arouse them with such views as arouse myself; would that it were more earnestly! But what blessing from God can be expected to descend on the godless class of a godless teacher? But, Lord, in the midst of wrath remember mercy. Oh remember thine own words: "I was found of them that sought me not." O Good Shepherd, seek and find us! And, oh, grant that these impressions—that irresistible influence that made me, even unwilling, to record this here—may not pass away without accomplishing some higher end! Oh grant that these words may not stand against me in judgment to aggravate my condemnation; but may be remembered as the beginnings, the first droppings, of thy mercy. Oh let them not be as the morning cloud and the early dew, that pass away, as they have hitherto been—springing up in a night, and withering in a night! Lord, begin the work and finish it! Oh may the wind of the Spirit blow, cleansing, purging, renewing, and breathe into my nostrils the breath of life. Oh! write my name in the book of life. O Father! Father! Thou hast been my earthly Father—the orphan's God—and well hast Thou performed a father's part. Oh be my heavenly Father! As such, I dare not call Thee Father; but Thou hast been my earthly Father,—the Guide of my youth, unseen and unacknowledged! Oh be my Guide still; but not in the shadow of the cloud! Let me see Thee as my Guide—my spiritual Guide!

'Oh may thy word be a light unto my feet and a lamp unto my path!

'Give understanding, give feeling, give life! Above all, give life! Oh the dry bones are rustling; but they are but dry, dead, fleshless bones. Once it seemed as if they were marrowy and full-fleshed; but, ah! there was no breath there, no life there, only the heavings and convulsive beatings of natural feeling, not of spiritual life. And all that semblance of inward godliness has wasted away, and the bones are dry and dead, as of one who hath been long dead! Oh for the power that can raise the dead! Oh for the Spirit to excite, and strengthen, and stimulate natural feeling by supernatural grace! Lord, create a right spirit within me! I can do nothing; but help me to be found in thy way, as at the pool of Bethesda, waiting for the troubling of the water. Let me be as the blind man by the wayside, begging as Jesus passes by! Lord, let me be no more prayerless, no more a mere hearer of the word, no more a heedless listener in thy courts, a lounger at thy gate! Oh give earnestness to seek the things that belong to my peace! Lord, I thank Thee that Thou hast not yet hid them from mine eyes! Even this hour of contrition, this hour of feeling, I would regard as a token of good from Thee, that the gate is not yet closed, that Thou hast still another knock to give at the door of my heart. Lord, open the door thyself; or help me, enable me, give me power to open it! Lord, give the will and the strength to stretch out the withered arm! O Lord, then hear! Bring me by thine own way, though it be a way that I know not, and by paths which I have not trod; but bring me to thyself; and to Thee be all the glory, for Christ's sake, who died on the tree. Amen.'

The young man's eyes were opened. He saw himself under the wrath and curse of a righteous Lawgiver. His whole life rose up before him—a lifetime wasted; his energies expended on objects of time and sense; no preparation made for eternity, for standing at the bar of God, for giving in his account of days, years, and opportunities. He reflected on his position: the head and pride of his university; the favourite of his professors; beloved, admired, and envied by his fellow-students. But such thoughts could yield him no complacency now—to him, a sinner, guilty, and condemned in the sight of the God of holiness. Well might he tremble—and you, too, unconverted reader—at the yawning abyss at his feet. But God had purposes of mercy in regard to him. A mother's prayers, which, long years before, had ascended to the throne of the Majesty on high, were about to descend in showers of blessing on his head.

After a hard conflict—fightings within, and fears without,—he was led to lay down his intellectual treasure at the low footstool of the Crucified One, and accept pardon, peace, and salvation, as a free gift of divine love. And now, henceforth, the whole bent of his life would be changed. His studies, hitherto prosecuted for selfish ends, and for self-gratification, would now be consecrated to higher and nobler purposes, stimulated by higher and holier motives. Such were the hopes for the future which he entertained, as he rejoiced in his new-found happiness, and as the change became manifest in the bosom of his family. Christian friends were wont to look forward to the time when he would shine as a bright light in the church. But ah, they were again to learn the lesson, that God's ways are not as man's ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts.

William was not privileged to work in the vineyard here below. Just as he was entering on life's work, with new aims, new aspirations, and new vows of devoted service in his Master's cause, his heavenly Father, who doeth all things well, summoned him to a more glorious work in the church triumphant on high.

Now, reader, this is no fanciful sketch. The writer has seen and handled that sacred little book, gazing on it, as on a precious relic, containing the record of the thoughts and feelings of one who now has passed away; and the solemn words on the fly-leaf and subsequent pages, traced by hands that have long been mouldering in the dust, still speak to us. 'Four neglected days! Four neglected years! Ay, a neglected lifetime!' Such was the remorseful exclamation of William. And he was not permitted to enter upon a career of active service here below, to undo and redeem, if that were possible, the past. No, a neglected lifetime would doubtless embitter his dying moments, though standing securely and safely on the Rock of Ages. And so will it be to you, reader, whose hands are hanging down, nursing yourself in the lap of death. Though saved, as it were by fire, at the last moment, a neglected and misspent lifetime will be a rankling thorn and a pang in your dying pillow. Are you a Christian? If you are, what are you doing? What are you living for? What is your aim in life?

Are you content to journey on alone to your home beyond the sky, without bringing in one precious soul, to be your joy and crown of rejoicing, to lay down at the feet of the Lord who bought you? Will you be content to wear a starless crown? Do you not reflect that the opportunities He gives you of working for Him are so many priceless gifts, for which you will have to give an account? Oh, then, be up and doing! By the shortness and uncertainty of time, by the love the Master bears you, by his love for perishing souls, be up and doing! Do not trust and look to an uncertain future for opportunities of serving your Master.

CHRISTIANS AND AMUSEMENTS.

Respecting amusements, we are not inimical to all kinds, nor to the most of them. We cheerfully accept the principle of recreation. But, in this world of sin, we know there must be restraint. In some things we must touch not, taste not. There are many evils that cannot be converted to good. Amusements are of three kinds: such as are positively sinful; secondly, such as have evil tendencies, and therefore ought never to be practised; thirdly, those that are harmless in themselves, but which cannot be sinlessly used as an end, only as a means; for all things should be done for the glory of God. It is not the chief end of man to be amused, though it may be the chief desire of some. While some in this day may lack in taking sufficient recreation, some weary, distract, and exhaust themselves more over amusements than anything else. Such are transgressors.

Theatres contain positive impurities and cor-ruptions, and therefore should never be visited. No matter though the moral corruption be excluded from the first or the second play, if introduced in the third or the last, the theatre is positively condemned. No matter, even if the evil be shut out for a single night or week, the institution that will ever foster corruption, that will rehearse or insinuate any impurities, that will for once descend to the excitement or gratification of base and sinful passions, should be utterly forsaken. It can never be patronized without violating that divine injunction: 'Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness.' Besides, there seems to be something in the theatre or histrionic art itself that tends to debasement. A Christian theatre never existed. We lament that some professed Christians bring reproach upon the cause of Christ by attending the theatre; we are pained ever to see the name of a church member in a call for a benefit to an actor or actress. The opera we condemn on the same general ground that we do the theatre.

Dancing, we hold, has evil tendencies, and therefore should not be practised. Even parlour dancing tends to frivolity and dissipation, which are utterly opposed to that sobriety which is especially enjoined upon the young in the gospel. It also sanctions the dance in other places and among all classes,—even among those where, it must be admitted by all, it is used as the occasion and means of downright crime. Dancing, even of the most select kind, supposes a frequent personal contact (if no more than that of the hand), and an attention of the opposite sexes to the physical rather than the mental being, which sooner or later results in more or less evil, wherever allowed in society. Besides, it is our deliberate conviction, formed after much observation, that they who practise the dance, will not at the same time attend to the highest spiritual religion. This of itself utterly condemns that amusement.

Card-playing we condemn on the ground of evil tendencies, and because it is especially the tool of the gambler, and fosters the crime of gambling.

In regard to lotteries and raffling, we rejoice that they are forbidden by the laws of our State, the spirit of which also condemns gift concerts and gift-book stores; but we lament that our laws are not executed. We hold that all churches, orphan asylums, soldiers' homes, and other benevolent institutions, that permit the sale of their articles by raffling, sanction the principle of gambling, and by a righteous God will be held more or less accountable for that vice; and in our opinion, if they continue the same, it will be the duty of the Christian public to withhold from them their patronage, and seek other institutions for the promotion of benevolence and religion.

'BE OF A GOOD COURAGE.'

Two young men had gone to spend their fortnight's holidays, with other two companions, in one of the most beautiful parts of Perthshire. They spent the day in fishing or driving, and the evenings in merry conversation and singing; but during all the time of their stay there, they never once had evening or morning worship, although each was accustomed to have it regularly at home with their parents.

On the morning of the second Saturday, according to agreement, those two set off to see the Trossachs, and night found them cheerfully recounting the sights of the day in one of the Glasgow hotels.

Before going to rest, one of them took his Bible and said, 'Shall I read a little?'

'Certainly,' said the other; 'we should have had a chapter every evening.'

What a home thrust this was! for, during all their stay at C——, he had striven to overcome his backwardness, but could not, from a false fear. And yet, now he found how gladly such a proposal would have been received. For a careful observer would have seen the one remaining behind, while all the rest had retired, in order that he might read from an old pocket Bible, a loved legacy of a but lately departed mother; and the other, retiring earlier, that he might pray to Him who had but a short time before taken away a loving and beloved father. So that the two were at the same time supplicating a common Father, while neither dared to acknowledge their common relationship to Him.

Reader, do you ever refrain from a known duty, from a false fear of others? Refrain no longer; for there is a happiness springing from the duty performed which more than repays the overcoming of the obstacle. At first you will find it as difficult to acknowledge God before your brothers or companions, as it was for that little boy, whose example reformed his ship's crew; but there remains the same promise to both, 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God.'

FEED MY LAMBS.

The celebrated Gerson, although Chancellor of the University of Paris, and the theological leader of the reformatory councils of Pisa and Constance in the early part of the fifteenth century, felt that he had a greater work to do. After taking a prominent part in all the leading questions of the age, he retired to a convent at Lyons, and found his chief delight in the instruction of little children, saying that it was with children that the reformation of the church should commence. And on his deathbed he sent for the little ones, that they might pray for him.

Miscellaneous.

Purer Air.

This is my attic room. Sit down, my friend.
My swallow's nest is high and hard to gain;
The stairs are long and steep; but at the end
The rest repays the pain.

For here are peace and freedom; room for speech
Or silence, as may suit a changeful mood:
Society's hard by-laws do not reach
This lofty altitude.

You, hapless dwellers in the lower rooms,
See only bricks, and sand, and windowed walls;
But here, above the dust and smoky glooms,
Heaven's light unhindered falls.

So early in the street the shadows creep,
Your night begins while yet my eyes behold
The purpling hills, the wide horizon's sweep,
Flooded with sunset gold.

The day comes earlier here. At morn I see
Along the roofs the eldest sunbeam peep;
I live in daylight, limitless and free,
While you are lost in sleep.

So all who walk steep ways, in grief and night,
Where every step is full of toil and pain,
May see, when they have gained the sharpest height,
It has not been in vain,

Since they have left behind the noise and heat;
And, though their eyes drop tears, their sight is clear:
The air is purer, and the breeze is sweet,
And the blue heaven more near.

—Elizabeth Akers (American).

Genuine Sabbatarianism.—It happened, one Sabbath, that King Olaf sat in his high seat at the dinner table, and had fallen into such deep thought that he did not observe how time went. In one hand he had a knife, and in the other a piece of fir-wood, from which he cut splinters from time to time. The table servant stood before him with a bowl in his hands; and seeing what the king was about, and that he was involved in thought, he said, 'It is Monday, sire, to-morrow.' The king looked at him when he heard this, and then it came into his mind what he was doing on the Sabbath. Then the king ordered a lighted candle to be brought him, swept together all the shavings he had made, set them on fire, and let them burn upon his naked hand; showing thereby that he would hold fast by God's law and commandment, and not trespass without punishment on what he knew to be right. Does not this record, taken from an old Saga, show that Sabbatarianism did not come into the church with the Reformation?

The Sheep know his Voice.—Not long since, a man in India was accused of stealing sheep. He was brought before the judge, and the supposed owner of the sheep was also present. Both claimed the sheep, and had witnesses to prove their claims, so that it was not easy for the judge to decide to which the sheep belonged. Knowing the customs of the shepherds, and the habits of the sheep, the judge ordered the sheep to be brought into court, and sent one of the two men into another room, while he told the other to call the sheep, and see if it would come to him. But the poor animal, not knowing the 'voice of a stranger,' would not go to him. In the meantime, the other man, in the adjoining room, growing impatient, and probably suspecting what was going on, gave a kind of a 'chuck,' upon which the sheep bounded away toward him at once. This 'chuck' was the way in which he had been used to call the sheep; and it was at once decided that he was the real owner. Here is an illustration of John x. 4, 5: 'The sheep follow him; for they know his voice. And a stranger they will not follow, but will flee from him; for they know not the voice of strangers.'

A New kind of Tract—What I was, and what I am.—Dear reader, I once resided with 2 Tim. iii. 4, and walked in Eph. ii. 2; and my continual conversation at that time is still recorded in Eph. ii. 3. I heard one day that an inheritance had been purchased for me, and a description of it reached me; you will find it at 1 Pet. i. 4. One who resides in Heb. iv. 14 had purchased it, and paid an extraordinary price for it; but, to say the truth, I did not believe this report, as I was entirely unacquainted with this Man; and long experience had convinced me that strangers never gave favours through love alone, and friends seldom gave any favours that cost much. However, I called at 2 Tim. iii. 16, as my own prospects at Eph. ii. 12 were as bad as they could be. I found the house I sought for at 2 Cor. v. 1; and the invitations to it, which you see put up at Isa. lv. 1, 2, and by John at vii. 37, are wonderfully inviting to the poor and needy. The house has only one door; and it was some time before I saw the door at John x. 9. My permanent address will now be 2 Cor. v. 1; but if you call any day at Heb. iv. 16, you will meet me and many others; we are daily in the habit of meeting there. If you call, attend to what the servant says at Luke xiv. 22, and you may depend upon what the servant says.

The Image of Christ.—Four men, who loved Christ with a love stronger than death, wrote his life, but left no hint of his height, complexion, features, or anything that could help the mind to a personal image. Others wrote long epistles, of which He was the Alpha and Omega; but his form was as much kept secret as the body of Moses. The Christian relics of the first centuries show no attempt to make an image of Christ. Too deep a sense of the divine rested upon the church to permit any attempt to print the human as it appeared in Him.

Madagascar.—I do not think there can be any fear respecting the future of Madagascar. It is true there are some members of the Government who would be glad to see all the Christian churches razed to the ground, and all Europeans sent out of the country; but there are others who take the Christian's part; and the fact that there are not less than 4400 Christians (members of churches) in and around the capital, besides others at a distance, together with the important fact that nearly all the young men, sons of the highest officers in the capital, have either been baptized or are regular attendants at our services, is sufficient ground for believing that the days of heathenism are numbered, and that, after a few years, Christianity will be the ruling power in Madagascar.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

GEN. v. 28, 29.

THIS is the utterance of faith; it is the voice of a believing man that we hear in Lamech's words. Lamech speaks because God had spoken to him. It is not mere parental yearning; it is not mere selfish weariness crying out under toil; it is not the expression of a dark and vague hope; it is faith speaking out the revelation which God had made to it regarding creation's deliverance; and it is the first intimation we have as to the removal of the curse—as to the 'rest' and 'consolation.'

It is a double prophecy. By this I do not mean a doubtful or a conditional prophecy. There is no such thing as a conditional prophecy. If it be prophecy, it is not conditional; and if it be conditional, it is not prophecy. A double prophecy is one which takes in two events, or persons, or places, in one description—the near and the far; predicting both, while seeming to predict only one. As David, in the 72d Psalm, points both to Solomon and to a greater than Solomon; as Isaiah points to the Babylon of his day and Babylon the great. The prophet sketches a scene or person before his eye, but in language which intimates that a far greater is coming. The near or miniature sketch is so drawn as to bring out the full features of the larger and more distant.

So is it here with Lamech. God reveals to him the future of two persons and two things: (1) His own son, and a far greater, of whom his son was but the shadow; (2) The alleviation or removal of earth's curse, partially under Noah, fully under the greater than Noah. There are two remarkable prophecies before the flood: first, that of Enoch, concerning Messiah's coming with his saints to destroy the wicked,—which was a double prophecy, relating both to the deluge and to the judgment at the Lord's coming; the second is that of Lamech concerning the rest of the saints and the removal of the curse. Let us look into this second prophecy.

I. The curse on the ground.—When man sinned, the first stroke of the curse fell. It had now lasted about fifteen centuries unabated. It was something real; its results were both barrenness in what was good, and fruitfulness in evil. The whole creation groaned; the blight and sadness were felt everywhere. It was a record of human sin; God's visible testimony to the greatness of the first sin,—the one sin of primal disobedience. 'Cursed is the ground for thy sake.' It is not yet removed. Creation is still subject to vanity. Corruption, mortality, decay, death, are here. It has been a long curse, yet it is the memorial of a single sin.

II. Man's toil and weariness.—The whole verse breathes weariness and heaviness of spirit—almost despair. The world was growing more wicked and more luxurious. It was increasing in population. Men were not allowed to eat flesh, nor to kill animals, save for sacrifice. These animals, increasing rapidly, would require an immense pasturage. Man's toil would thus be greatly on the increase; it would become quite oppressive and overwhelming. He knew not what to do, nor which way to turn. Toil, toil, toil! This was his daily lot. In the sweat of his face he was made to eat his bread. The curse on the ground grew no lighter, and his labour grew heavier. What with barrenness in good, and fruitfulness in evil, it presented him with endless labour and weariness. He groaned under it, along with a groaning creation. He was compelled to sympathize with the groaning and travailing creature. Such ought to be our feeling. Our toil may not be quite so oppressive; we do not so wholly depend on our toil; the appliances of art, and the permission to eat animal food, have alleviated our labours. But still creation groans, and man eats his bread with the sweat of his face.

III. Man's longing for comfort.—The words of the verse are those of the hireling looking for the shadow, and longing for the rest. These patriarchs were aged men; some nearly a thousand. One thousand years of toil! What a life! If threescore and ten be so wearisome, what would a thousand be! Lamech, when he uttered these words, was 182. Surely he had known toil and weariness beyond what we can! Do we wonder that he longed for comfort, that he sighed for rest, and that he breathed out these deep longings for deliverance? Are we not longing too? Is toil so sweet, that we wish its continuance? or is rest so terrible, that we do not desire it, and say, 'How long?'

IV. Man's expectation of deliverance.—He knew that the case of earth was not hopeless. He would gather, from the first promise, that God meant, some time or other, to undo the curse; and while he sympathized with the 'groaning and travailing' of creation, he joined in its 'earnest expectation.' He sustained himself under his toil by the expectation of rest. He was not satisfied to remain for ever toiling and sweating. It was part of his creed to look for rest—to grasp the coming consolation. Man laboured and was heavy laden; but he heard the voice of the true Noah saying, 'Come unto me all ye that labour, and I will give you REST.'

V. Man's expectation was connected with some one individual to be born in due time.—Lamech had been taught of God to expect something in connection with his son, whom he named Noah, in consequence of this expectation. And in his time relief was granted—the alleviation, though not the removal of the curse and the toil. (1.) Noah received a confirmation of the first blessing given to Adam before he fell. (2.) In his time man's life began to be shortened. (3.) Permission was granted to kill animals and eat their flesh. (4.) Special attention was directed to husbandry: 'Noah began to be a husbandman.' These partial alleviations, given in connection with Noah, were figures of the complete deliverance of creation in connection with a greater than Noah; and in the day of the Son of man,—in the day of the manifestation of the sons of God,—of those of whom Enoch prophesied: 'The Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints.'

Thus we anticipate the deliverance of creation, the removal of the curse, in the day of the Son of man, when He shall say, 'Behold, I make all things new.' The greater than Noah is at hand; and with Him the manifestation of the sons of God; and with that the rest which remaineth for the people of God,—the times of the restitution of all things, when barrenness shall be exchanged for fruitfulness, and the wilderness rejoice and blossom as the rose; 'for we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Seeing, then, we look for such things, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness!'

READY TO FORGIVE.

BY REV. J. COX, IPSWICH.

THIS is a certain fact concerning God. HE who is the great, the holy, and the just ONE, is ready to forgive. He has said that it is so, and He has proved it. Millions can testify to its truth, and we may confidently depend upon it as a 'faithful saying.' It is more true of Him than of any other being in the universe besides. It is true of Him as regards those who have sinned against Him for many years, who have done nothing else but sin, and who have committed sins of a most aggravated nature.

But, though this glorious declaration is so true, so largely revealed, and so plentifully confirmed, it is a fact but little known, and, when heard, generally doubted. Men do not believe that God is 'ready to forgive.' Yet this fact must be known and believed before sinners can be safe and happy. It may be known now. It should be believed and acted on this very hour, by every one who hears it. If you, reader, have hitherto neglected this great truth; if you have done so for forty or fifty years, yet if you will believe it now, this hour will be to you the birth-hour of eternal happiness. Come then, and study right earnestly the forgiving love of God. Cry to Him to open your heart to receive his own testimony. Do not say, 'It cannot be true.' Do not think of God as such an one as yourself; do not measure his thoughts by your thoughts. He says, 'Return unto me, and I will abundantly pardon;' and then adds, 'My thoughts are not your thoughts.' 'My thoughts in this great affair of pardoning sinners are not like yours; but above them, as the heaven is above the earth.'

You must know, if you think at all on this subject, that God and you are unlike in some respects. You are a creature; He is the Creator. You are sinful; He is holy. You are weak; He is almighty. You are dark and ignorant; 'God is light, and in Him there is no darkness at all.' There is another contrast, which is quite as true as the rest,—true of all men by nature, and so true of you: you are at enmity against God, and 'God is love'—love towards you. As a proof of this, He says that He is 'ready to forgive.' You think that He is not; God says that He is. You may be wrong in your thoughts; God must be right in his; and his words must be true, for He always speaks as He thinks.

23.—27.

Sometimes we mistake our fellow-creatures, and imagine that they are against us when they are not. We get, perhaps, into a miserable state of mind, and look at every one through a wrong medium; our evil and harsh hearts judge others by ourselves; and thus we commonly judge of God. We feel wrong towards Him, and we think that He must feel the same toward us; and we shrink from Him as from a being to be dreaded. But if our fellow-creatures are sometimes better and kinder than we expected, how much more is it so with God! And if it is so, should we not think so, and act upon such thoughts?

A kind Christian man, who knew this full well, who realized in his own heart the forgiving love of God through simply believing God's words, and who, because he was forgiven, loved much, found, in one of his visits of mercy, a young female, about twenty years of age, living in sin, wretched beyond all description. He soon learned her history. She had left her home some months before, fallen into sin, and had ever since been sinking down lower and lower. 'Oh,' she exclaimed, with bitter grief, 'that I was at home once more! but my father will not receive me. I am sure that he will not; he cannot love me now; he will never forgive me. I am quite sure that he must always hate and despise me; I have lost his affection for ever!' 'Have you ever tried him?' inquired this Christian friend. 'No, I have not.' 'Does your father know where you are?' 'No; I have never written to him since I left home.' 'Then I will write to him at once.' 'It is no use, sir—no use.' 'Well, we shall see about that; we can but try.' A letter was written, and well prayed over. By return of post there came such an answer back as made the good man greatly rejoice, and the wanderer weep abundantly. 'IMMEDIATE,' was written largely on the outside; and the substance of all within was 'ready to forgive.' 'This,' said the father, 'is what I have been earnestly praying for. I have longed to know where my poor wanderer was, and yearned to hear that she was willing to return. Let her come back at once; I will forgive all and love her still.' Now, observe that the readiness of this father to forgive his child, and to receive her back, was a fact before any letter was written to him; a fact, all the while the sinning child thought so hardly of her father, and judged his heart by her own deservings.

I have known several such cases; but this and all other proofs of human kindness, fail to set forth how ready God is to forgive, and how rich He is in mercy to all those who call upon Him. He is an infinite Being; none of his perfections can be measured, or their actings limited. The eye of man may as easily take in at a glance all God's works of power, as the thought of man conceive the extent of his mercy. The enemy of God and man is constantly labouring to contradict this precious truth. Sin is Satan's work, and forgiveness is God's great prerogative and most glorious act. If Satan can magnify his work above that of the Most High, by inducing delight in sin, or despair of pardon, his end is answered. But we should remember that God is a jealous God,—jealous of the honours of his mercy as well as of his holiness. Let us ever fear to sin against so holy a God; but let us also fear lest we provoke Him by denying or doubting his words of mercy.

Yes; we are not left to comparison and inference to learn the greatness, tenderness, and willingness of God's mercy. In his word He repeatedly tells us how He feels, and what He thinks; and thus this fact, that He is 'ready to forgive,' stands out above all others in the Bible. God has taken infinite pains to reveal this, and to assure us of its truth, so that not the shadow of a doubt might rest upon it. If He had only said so once, we ought to believe it and be very thankful; but who can count up the number of his declarations of pardon? Do not let us be like a young man described by Dr. Hamilton, who, in sickness and misery brought on by his sins, on receiving a letter from his father, only read half the first page and then cast it aside. The letter began with a little faithful reproof; but further on it was full of love, containing an invitation to come home, with a promise to pay all debts and expenses. In his guilty haste and anger, all these loving words were overlooked, till a friend pointed them out to the astonished youth. Thus many treat God's book. Let us take God's letter of love, search it well for ourselves, and see whether God is not ready to forgive, and ready to forgive us.

To bring forward a tenth part of the proof which the Bible furnishes of this blessed fact, would make a book of some considerable size. Invitations, expostulations, arguments, promises, crowd upon the mind. Individuals stand up to bear their testimony; they increase till they become a great multitude; and some of them were the worst sinners that ever lived. We can hear the voices of David, Manasseh, Paul, and Peter, shouting above the rest, 'GOD IS WILLING TO FORGIVE.'

When Christ came into the world to save sinners, his declarations, his parables, his actions, all proclaimed and revealed God's mercy. His last actions on the cross, in breathing out 'Father forgive' on behalf of his murderers, and in pardoning the dying thief; his first words and acts after his resurrection; and his direction, just before He went to heaven, to begin the good tidings of mercy at guilty Jerusalem,—all prove that the God who sent his Son to say and do all this, is indeed 'ready to forgive.'

A sufficient reason may be assigned for all this willingness on God's part. God is willing to forgive, because Christ hath died. Not that the death of Christ made God merciful, or first moved his love to sinners—no; but it opened a channel whereby that mercy could flow down honourably to guilty man, and thereby love and embrace him with delight. God can now get to himself eternal glory, by 'forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin.' Those, therefore, who reject God's mercy in Christ, rob themselves of salvation, and rob God of his glory. This makes unbelief such a damning sin.

And now, what say you to all this? Can you deny it? Surely, not in the face of so many witnesses to its truth. Do you desire this mercy, and yet doubt whether it can be extended to you? Do you say: What! will God forgive all, forgive freely, and forgive now? Yea, yea! If God were only to forgive some of your sins, what would you do with the rest? If He required something at your hands as a plea for his mercy, what have you to give? If not now, then when better than now? You will never have less sins than you have now. Therefore God says 'NOW.' A full, free, present pardon, is what God proposes to give you now. Are you willing to be forgiven? Surely, you will not, after this, say to God: 'Depart, I desire not the knowledge of thy ways!' God is near to you; He reveals himself. Seek to know Him, then you will be sure to love Him, and, loving Him, you will be happy. But, if you persevere in saying 'Depart,' He will at length take you at your word; and woe unto you when He departeth from you. 'There is a remedy for everything but the loss of God's favour.' To lose that, and lose it eternally, is to lose eternal life and find the second death.

Ponder, I pray you, one solemn scripture: 'God is angry with the wicked every day. If he turn not, He will whet his sword: He hath bent his bow and made it ready.' But, even while doing this, He proclaims mercy; but if the arrow is once launched from his dreadful bow, then mercy will plead no longer, but will stand aside, and let judgment be laid to the line, and righteousness to the plummet; and then the 'despiser of God's goodness,' the neglecter of his mercy, will find it to be 'a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.'

If God is so ready to forgive, surely He must be also ready to give his forgiven children an assurance of the same in their own souls; nor should those who hope in God's mercy go on without this comfortable persuasion of 'acceptance in the Beloved,' and that their sins are all forgiven them, for his name's sake. We must be careful lest we make our pardon seem to hang dependant on something which we feel, rather than on God's testimony; but, on the other hand, it is desirable not to mistake knowledge of a doctrine for possession of a blessing, or to rest satisfied with mere conviction and weariness, without finding rest. He who really depends on Christ's power to save, and simply clings to God's loving warrant, though he may sometimes doubt God's willingness to save him, shall not be left to perish. 'The acting of faith in Christ,' says an old writer, 'is no other than suitable thoughts on Christ, and a hearty choice of Him as God's appointed way of salvation.' With this agree the words of Dr. Owen: 'There may be a saving persuasion, a discovery of forgiveness in God, when there is no assurance of particular interest therein, or that our own sins in particular are pardoned. This is that which hath a promise of gracious acceptance with God, and is therefore saving.' But these doubts and fears dishonour God, and rob the soul; and therefore the writer last quoted, while not treating such harshly, or putting them among unbelievers, does not fail to reprove the unbelief, and to point out a more excellent way than a life of doubting:

'For the most part we are, as it were, ready rather to steal forgiveness of God, than to receive it from Him, as one that gives it freely and largely. We take it up, and lay it down, as though we would be glad to have it, so God did not, as it were, see us take it, for we are afraid He is not willing we should have it indeed. Go with your half-forgiveness, limited conditional pardons, with reserves and limitations, to the sons of men, it may be it may become them; it is like themselves: that of God is absolute and perfect, before which our sins are as a cloud before the east wind and the rising sun.'

In another place he says: 'To take up mercy, pardon, forgiveness, absolutely on account of Christ, and then to yield all obedience in the strength of Christ, and for the love of Christ, is the life of a true believer.'

There are two things which should constantly engage the attention of distressed souls: these are, the character of God as rich in mercy, ready to forgive; and the infinite efficacy of the blood of Jesus. Forgiveness has been frequently considered in three points of view: as grace in God, propitiation by Christ, and remission in us. If, then, we would realize the last, it must be by the belief of the two former, as set forth in the free proclamation of that 'word which is nigh unto us.' The Psalmist was brought up from the depths by the precious consideration, 'There is forgiveness with Thee.' He could not say, There is pardon in me, and the enemy might question whether it was for him; but this one thing he knew and firmly grasped: 'THERE IS FORGIVENESS WITH THEE;' and here his troubled, tempest-tossed soul resolved to look. Fixing his soul's gaze intently on this glorious fact, he rose from the depths, he gained the heights, his hope soared up toward God and glory, and, exulting in God's forgiving love and fatherly favour, he sent a glad song of praise down the ages of sorrow, which tens of thousands have helped to swell.

It should be our aim to be fully persuaded of the fact that 'God is love,' that He is 'rich in mercy,' and delighteth in exercising forgiveness. This is his prerogative (Dan. ix.), and He will act in character; let us expect it. 'It is,' says one, 'to no purpose for him to strive to fly, who cannot yet go; to labour to come to assurance in himself, who never well believed forgiveness in God.' Again, let the soul who is tried with such perplexities, think much on the channel through which mercy flows: 'Through this man is preached unto us the forgiveness of sins;' and God does not intend to mock us by making this exhibition, nor will He fail us if we take Him at his word. In the preaching of the gospel, the name of Christ is laid as the foundation of our immortal hopes; dependence on that name gives the worst sinner an interest in all the glories which it contains. His voice to the ends of the earth is: 'Look unto me, and be ye saved.' On Jesus, on God in Him, and on the free invitations and promises of God's word, let the hopes of mourning souls rest, and they shall not be ashamed nor confounded, world without end.

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER V.

EASTER—A JEW IN THE CHURCH OF HOLY SEPULCHRE.

IT was nearly eleven o'clock at night when we left the Consulate, to go to the Sepulchre Church. The streets were silent, dark, and empty, until we got very near to the great centre of interest. There all was bustle and life. Blazing cressets of pitch fire lit up the approaches, and cast a lurid glare upon the strange scene. Everybody was hurrying to the church.

Within the great court the square was occupied by soldiers in great-coats, sitting and lying, smoking and gossiping around their piled arms, which gleamed in the red light thrown over them by the dancing, flickering flames, flung high upon the buttresses and turrets of the quaint old pile of buildings.

Venders of hot coffee and tea, and even spirits, were busily plying their trade. In every corner, and at the foot of arch and buttress, lay human beings, snatching a few moments of repose before they should be summoned to the service.

On a bench at the entrance of the church sat the Pasha and his train of officers and Effendies, laughing, drinking coffee, scanning each passer into the church. His Excellency half rose to return the salute of Mr. Wells. But for the Consul's kawasses, we should scarcely have got into the church, it was already so crowded.

The scene which now met our eyes was the most extraordinary that I had ever beheld. Not only was a mob of all sizes and ages pressing into the church; but within the building, even around the sacred tomb itself, were innumerable multitudes of the pilgrims lying on the pavement, fast asleep, evidently tired out by the ceremonies and watchings of the past week. Not all the noise of the crowds coming in, and literally stumbling over them, nor the Pasha's kawasses and single soldiers going about, nor, every now and then, the tramp and clank of the guard marching with fixed bayonets around the church, —nothing of all this, nor all this put together, moved the weary sleepers. There they lay, old and young—men, and women, and children, even infants with their parents. In many places the people were actually piled upon each other. Where there was not room for one to stretch himself, he could lie or half sit upon his neighbour. Very many held in their hands the long tapers which had been lit that morning at the holy fire, and we saw not a few who appeared, like Constantine, to have been wanting in faith, when they had tested the virtues of the flame. Their beards and moustaches were singed unmistakeably. But they were asleep and unconscious of our remarks, and deaf to the tumult around them.

The noise was fearful. All the bells of the adjoining convents seemed to be ringing; then two or three bells in the church itself were furiously rung all at once. Up above, in the Armenian gallery, a huge wooden nakoos (plank used as a bell), and somewhere else a metal one, were being beaten with hammers.

The Copts and Abyssinians seemed to have begun their service in the little chapel adjoining the sepulchre itself, and were clanging brass cymbals with festival energy.

During and amid all these noises, the organ in the Latin part of the building pealed forth music which scarcely appeared to be sacred—I think it was from some secular composition. And when that subsided a little, the chanting of the Latin clergy mingled with the other sounds; and processions of Greek monks passing by added their fearful nasal chant to the confusion and din.

Meanwhile, the lighting of the great dome was being rapidly completed by an army of deacons. The effect of this was magnificent. Besides the blaze of jewelled lamps around the shrine itself, and of countless wax tapers in every direction, there were hung from the top of the dome lamps, both coloured and white, in beautiful festoons round the galleries to the very summit, and in long swinging lines to gallery and pillar, —wreaths of light from the ground, across and across, up to the very top of the vast rotunda.

But the most gorgeous display was in the Greek church, whither we made our way with difficulty. By this time the congregation was nearly assembled. The sleepers were waking, shaking themselves, and preparing to take their part in the coming ceremonial, and many a poor child cried on being aroused from its rest. Small tapers were being lighted and distributed by the Greek priests at the stone called the Centre of the World. These tapers were devoutly received with many crossings by the worshippers.

The profuse gilding of the Greek church shone with redoubled splendour in the light of the many lamps; and just as we got there, the procession of the patriarch and clergy entered, in the full magnificence of their grandest robes, richest velvets, gold and silver tissue, and crowns blazing with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds.

The patriarch—a fine and venerable figure—stood on the steps of his throne, and gave his blessing to the congregation, with the three fingers of the right hand lifted up in such a manner as to be emblematic, according to Greek doctrine, of the persons of the Holy Trinity. The congregation, many of whom are Russian pilgrims, bowed with touching and reverential devotion to receive the blessing.

The Pasha and his train were now about to take their places—a narrow lane being kept by the troops for his passage. As we did not intend to remain the whole night, it was a good opportunity for us to retire, and we made our way towards the entrance, just as the Pasha was coming in.

Walter was keeping the pressure and crowd off me as well as he could, and I was taking in as much as possible of the strange spectacle, when I felt him start. 'Emily, look! There is Judah! What has brought him to such a place? Is he mad?'

I looked in the direction my brother pointed, and caught a glimpse of a face that might certainly be Judah's; but his beard and Jewish cap were gone, and I should scarcely have recognised him in the red tarboosh he had on his head.

'Is he mad to come here?' repeated Walter. 'What has brought him?'

I was going to answer, 'Curiosity,' when there was a sudden sway of the mob towards him. Walter cried, 'They have recognised him as a Jew!' and tried to force his way in that direction, just as I caught the words, 'Yahoodi! yahoodi!' from some of the pilgrims.

Mr. Wells turned his head, but could not move, being wedged in by the crowd. However, he took my hand, and dragged me forward. I saw the glitter of knives being aimed at the unfortunate Judah; and Walter was in danger of receiving the blows.

'Oh, Mr. Wells, my brother! he will be killed!'

Mr. Wells made signs to his kawasses, who were already trying to reach the spot; another was making a way for us.

What frightful, demoniacal expressions I saw on the faces of some of the Greek pilgrims! The Pasha was near enough to perceive the tumult; and while he and his suite pushed us ladies and Mr. Wells out of the church, some officers seemed to be rescuing Judah from the mob. In another moment we were in the open air, and instantly afterwards Judah was dragged out, half dead, by Walter. I was so glad to see my brother's face again! The furious pilgrims were rushing out after them; but the soldiers in the square closed round and drove them back into the church with their bayonets, while others surrounded Judah, and hid him from sight in an instant. He was unhurt; but Walter's hand had blood upon it.

'It is nothing, Emily—at least not mine. A soldier got a stab from the knife of one of the pilgrims. He threw himself over Judah and saved him. Here he comes.'

The poor fellow was not seriously injured—a slight cut in the arm was all; but he had risked his life, and saved Judah's in parrying the knife aimed at him.

'Are you surgeon enough,' said Walter, turning to Mr. Wells, 'to bind up this wound? I must go and see after that mad fellow Judah;' and then, in a low voice to me, he added, 'Rachel will be frightened to death if the soldiers carry her cousin home in that state. Get Mr. Wells to take you home. I'll come when I can,' and he ran off.

The officers and other soldiers did not allow Mr. Wells to bind up the wounded arm, they did it themselves; but he stayed to see it done. The wound happily was not serious.

The fresh air and a cup of coffee did away with the effects of our fright. I happened to cast my eyes up towards the old belfry tower: the cool, beautiful moonlight fell upon it in such blessed contrast to the red blaze in the court below.

Next day the sober, refreshing Easter service in our own church reminded me of this: calm gravity after the ostentation, noise, riot, and evil passions we had seen displayed the night before.

But I must not forget Judah. It was almost three o'clock before Walter came home; and the silent hours appeared very long to me after the exciting scenes we had left. At last the barking of the street dogs announced his arrival.

'Is Judah much hurt?'

'No—not half so much as he deserves. He got a good beating and shaking, that's all. What business had he there?'

'I suppose he would say he had as much right to be there as we had.'

'No, certainly not. The Greeks and Latins don't allow Jews into that church; and he ought not to have risked his life for mere curiosity.'

'How did they find him out to be a Jew? I should not have known he was one unless I had known him before; and, as it was, his dress changed him so, I could scarcely believe it was Judah when you said so.'

Abraham explained that when their first fright was over. 'Did you think a red tarboosh and a Frank coat would disguise you when you kept your peahs? (i.e. ringlet curls on each side of the face). Why, you are dressed exactly like a Smyrna or Stambool Jew. Do you think the Greeks never saw any but Polish Jews, you foolish boy; and that leaving off your kaftan and fur cap would hide you from their knowledge?'

'Then they recognised him by the ringlets?'

'Of course. Vain fellow! he did not like to cut off his handsome curls, and they nearly cost him his life. He might have at least got rid of them before going among a mob of Easter pilgrims.'

It was odd, certainly, that Judah should have kept these ringlets while adopting European dress, and wishing to be regarded as a Christian. However, this also was explained by Rabbi Abraham on his next visit.

'We are so glad for Judah, my nephew. He will now be able to earn his own living. He is going to stay at the English hospital, and they will teach him to be a doctor. He has had to give up watchmaking. He is too old for that trade; his hands are heavy, and he breaks the pieces; but now he is to learn to make the medicines at the hospital.'

'You mean, to become a dispenser?'

'Yes. I am so glad; for he is clever, and he is like a son to me. And he is going to be married.'

'Indeed! Has he so soon forgotten his wife and child?'

'Oh no! He is to marry her; and for this he kept his curls.'

'His own wife! Where is she?'

'In Russia I suppose.'

'Then how can he marry her?'

'You know, Miss Russell, when the Rabbies made him divorce her, they sent her away to Russia; but she contrived to send him a message from Jaffa, to say that she would never marry any one else until after she hears that he had cut off his curls; and this is the reason that he keeps them. Judah says he can be a good Christian and wear curls also. Mr. Anderson (the clergyman) at first wished him to cut them off, because the law about them is only from the Rabbies;* but when he heard the reason, he said he would baptize him even with curls.'

'How will his wife know about it?'

'He sent her word to Odessa by a friend. I think she will soon come back, for she loved him very much.'

'Poor young thing! What a journey to make all alone!'

'Oh, my dear lady, that is nothing. The people of our nation know how to make long journeys.'

This was true enough; but it was a strange story. The next morning, though Sabbath, was full of noise and bustle. It was Eed el Kabeer, the Great Feast—Easter day,—and all Jerusalem was astir from an early hour. In fact, the Christians had scarcely slept at all.

As soon as we made our appearance in the breakfast room, our servants came to kiss our hands, and wish us a happy year. Um Habeeb offered me a basket of Easter eggs, tastefully marked in patterns of white on a crimson ground. Haj Omar, Moslem though he was, had donned his scarlet jacket and best yellow turban, and offered his congratulations with the rest. Sarah, the Jewess, came also, bringing flowers, stocks and bunches of sweet basil; and her son Gershon, all clean and handsome, in his festival suit, came to thank Walter anew for his help when Yakovieo was threatened by the pilgrims, while the child himself brought me a huge pot of clove pinks, covered with buds and blossoms. Their brilliant tint contrasted well with his little jacket of turquoise blue, and white trousers. 'Cad'año mechorādo' (may your every year be better), was their form of salutation, and after receiving our little present, 'May you live many years—may all good things be yours.'

In passing through the streets to church, we caught the primitive salutation, as it was exchanged by Arab friends meeting each other: Kâm el Messeehh (Christ is risen), Hhokkan kâm (He is risen indeed); and Walter heard both Greeks and Russians salute each other with the very same words in their respective languages.

Everybody was in holiday dress. Everybody looked bright and cheerful. The gloom of Lent was past. The feast had brought gladness to all hearts. Their church services for the day were over, and nothing was now to be done or thought of but visiting each other, feasting together, or going out into the country to sit under the trees and enjoy the spring sunshine.

We had no small difficulty in getting through the streets; and the square was worse—the throng of pilgrims leaving Jerusalem on horses, camels, mules, and asses, made it almost impassable. Each one carried, slung over his shoulder, vessels of Jordan water, or long tin cases, containing palms and the tapers which had been kindled at the holy fire. One man was rolling up a rude painting of St. George and the dragon.

As we endeavoured to return after church it was almost as bad. Departures seemed to be over for the day; but every available spot was occupied by beasts waiting to carry away fresh multitudes at early dawn on the morrow.

There is no need for me to describe our quiet happy Easter Sunday. How we heard in our little chapel on Zion the well-known story of Mary and the disciples at the sepulchre; how we joined in the familiar psalms; and how the Easter hymn, 'Christ the Lord is risen to-day,' was sung with heart and soul by our little congregation, until the words arose as with a shout:

'Thee we greet triumphant now,
Hallelujah!
Hail! the resurrection Thou,
Hallelujah!'

CHAPTER VI.

SHOPPING IN THE BAZAAR.

How quiet and pleasant Jerusalem had now become! Moslems, Christians, and Jews had fasted and feasted, made pilgrimages and departed, and everything returned to its usual routine.

Walter resumed his painting. My Jewish acquaintances came to me as before for employment. They had spent every para in celebrating the feast, though guilty of no manner of excess, poor creatures, and they were now reduced to greater poverty than before. However, the cold and rain had disappeared, and thus their sufferings were not so distressing as in the winter.

Gershon, the pedlar, supplied materials for my work-women, and took a pleasure in getting them as good and as cheap as possible. My sale of dried flowers had been very successful, and I soon converted the money into stout calico and knitting cotton.

One day I required something which Gershon had been unable to procure. It being Friday, he could not come for three days more; and as I was in a hurry, I sallied forth myself on a shopping expedition. Um Habeeb recommended a shop near the entrance of the bazaars. Constantine being busy, I took Haj Omar as my escort. He walked before me, pipe in hand; but out of respect to me kept it down close to his side, making believe it was a stick, only now and then taking a stealthy whiff—of course to keep it from going out.

I could not help thinking of the lady in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments going out to make purchases, only I was unveiled, going about an unromantic errand, and had Haj Omar instead of the porter she hired; but we passed by plenty of shops containing the very sort of wares which she bought, and porters were lounging about, any one of them an exact counterpart of her porter, speaking the same language, and likely to have done just as he did under similar circumstances. There were also among the throngs which, as it was Friday, crowded the bazaars, plenty of one-eyed people, to remind one of the three brothers.

* The Rabbies teach that the command of Moses, 'Thou shalt not cut off the corners of thy beard,' is to be obeyed by every Jew in letting long ringlets (peáhs) grow from the temples.

True, one's ancient ideas of the 'gorgeous East' were inconsistent with some of the sights around—for instance, the dirty, unhealthy men, fagging away in the braziers' and dyers' bazaars. But yet kettles and lamps must be mended; and some of the huge copper vessels were most orientally covered with beautiful arabesque inscriptions and verses from the Koran. Then there were kabâb makers, cutting up and frying their dainties over little charcoal fires, for it was now noon, when people must eat.

A year ago I had passed through the bazaars, understanding nothing of the language. Multitudes of eager people were talking around; but it was only so much noise to me. Now all was different. As when light is suddenly poured into a dark room, which had before been empty, suddenly one sees it is furnished with a variety of pleasing objects. Thus it was to me. All the buyers, and sellers, and passers had been transformed into living people, instead of so many moving dolls; and the broken sentences and disjointed phrases which continually reached my ears, gave so many glimpses into the circumstances and history of the speakers.

Here came a man selling variously formed cakes, crying out, 'Delicate morsels; buy, O ye children!' next a seller of liquorice water, crying, 'Damascus ware!' or, 'Liquorice water, come and see!' A woman, sitting on the ground with some roses before her, the first of the season, cried, 'Roses, roses of many odours!' A man sitting cross-legged at his fruit-stall, cried, 'Dates, dates of the heart, but not for the avaricious —"daughters of Damascus"' (i.e. stoneless raisins). Another, 'Cucumbers, cucumbers from Engeddi.'

Meeting Mr. Anderson in the bazaar, I remarked to him upon the poetical cries of the vendors around. 'Yes, but last summer, in the grape season, I heard one which struck me more than all these: "Lovely grapes, lovely grapes. Oh how often have the doves made their nests among them!" And then he said, "Look, they are as good as those of Damascus, which men call, 'Maidens' cheeks!'" 'See,' added he, 'that Moslem selling his Jericho Nebik fruit in exchange for bits of old iron and brass. There, did you hear what that Holâweh-seller* was crying:

"Oh! how sweet must that night be,
When a man is at peace with his friend?"'

Before I could reply, a peasant woman, who had a heap of first ripe mulberries spread out before her, took up the word, 'Sweet, sweet and black are my mulberries! Now shall Holâweh-sellers die!' i.e. because no one would care to buy Holâweh when mulberries were to be had.

A man with a wooden tray, full of fresh-baked loaves, now pushed his way through the crowd, vociferating: 'O Thou All-bountiful! O God! Fresh bread! O Thou Bountiful!' and a beggar woman, asking alms, cried: 'Charity, charity! God will repay it!' and then, 'May thy throat be always filled with sugar!' to which Haj Omar replied, according to the form usual in refusing a beggar: 'Pass on! God will give thee!'

The shop I visited was, like all the rest, a mere stall, and while buying we had to stand in the street. Ceremonious compliments were exchanged before we asked for what I wanted.

The shopkeeper was an elderly man, with grey beard, immense turban, and wearing a pair of goggle spectacles large enough for three.

The bargaining commenced. 'What will this cost, ya sheikh?'

'Two and a half piastres the draa' (literally arm, i.e. cubit).

'I bought such as this for one and three-quarters a month ago.'

'For thy favour's sake, I give it for two and a quarter.'

'I will only pay one and seven-eighths.'

'God increase thy prosperity, say two—'

Here Haj Omar interrupted, 'Ya sheikh, kilmet Ingleeze yeh. It is the English word; thou knowest they won't change when they have spoken it. Wilt thou sell the stuff or not?'

'Patience, O Haj. Haste is from the devil; but patience comes from the All-merciful. For the lady's sake I will sell;' and he measured off the required quantity.

The paying was as curious as the buying. I offered an English sovereign. The Arab knew the coin well; but then came a dispute as to its value.

'I changed one yesterday for one hundred and five piastres.'

'Truth, O lady! but to-day it is only one hundred.'

'Why?' cried Haj Omar.

'Because the Pasha is going to cry down all the coins.'

'Wait till he cries them down, O thou greedy man; and now take this at one hundred and five piastres, which is its value, or I will complain of thee to the sheikh of thy quarter, and thou wilt have to give him a large backsheesh before thou shalt be able to finish with him.'

Haj Omar was not to be trifled with. It was not every day that he escorted ladies shopping. The shopkeeper submitted, and drew out of his bosom a little bag, whence he poured out a collection of Spanish, French, and Austrian dollars, some Egyptian silver, and a few Turkish piastres and paras.

Then came a fresh argument as to the value of each coin, until our patience was exhausted; and I got less change at last than I ought to have got. It was pleasant, however, to notice how my groom had stopped the bargaining at once, by telling the shopkeeper that I had given the unchangeable 'kilmet Ingleeze yeh,' or English word.

Presently I heard the expression again. Two Arab women were wrangling over a pair of fowls, and one of them cut the dispute short by naming a price, and saying, 'That's the English word.'

* Holâweh, a sweetmeat made of honey, resunce seed, etc.

The other actually ceased disputing and began to count out her piastres.

A gay green and red inscription, painted in flowing characters, outside one of the shops, caught my eye. It was: 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom;' and presently another: 'In God, my Creator, have I put my trust.' They were shops belonging to Christians.

In going home, I passed round some quiet streets in the Christian quarter, where I wanted to buy some Damascus silks. Very respectable little places were the shops, mostly rooms on the ground floor; the door open, for there were no windows; and the grave, sober-looking merchants sat cross-legged among their wares. In some of them were small looms at work, weaving plain stuffs to sell to the peasantry.

In the Moslem quarter, near our house, we met a stout, jolly-looking man, carrying home his child pick-a-back, with a couple of cucumbers stuck in his girdle beside the inkhorn; and then a Durweesh, clad in plain undyed stuff, a tall sugar-loaf cap upon his head also of undyed wool, and ornamented with cowrie shells, below which streamed ragged locks of uncombed hair. Three pieces of chain and a guard were hanging from his girdle. He was very devoutly eating raw herbs, and looked as if he might have been uncivil to us but for Haj Omar's presence. Haj Omar thought he might be from Bokhara, from his appearance, and because the Tartars' convent was not far off. Another one, but dressed rather differently, was carrying a skin of water and a cup, crying: 'Drink from God for the thirsty; for the sakes of Hassan and Hassein!' (Moslem martyrs specially reverenced by Persians and the Sheijah sect.)

I wished to see Rachel about something, and therefore took her father's house on my way home. I met Mrs. Wells near the door, and she accompanied me. The house was very small indeed, but beautifully clean and neat. Mrs. Wells was delighted.

'How active Rachel must be to keep it so, all by herself! What lovely flowers—a myrtle, and those glorious stocks, and the blue larkspur! How is it that flowers grow best in broken pots and shabby jars?' I have often noticed it in England. The cottage flowers—geraniums and auriculas—were sure to be finer than the carefully arranged flower-stands of the rich people; and here were Rachel's stocks and pinks ten times more luxuriant than mine, and yet mine were in good pots and carefully tended, while hers grew in a broken water jar. The heavy masses of blossom seemed to like this contrast with the miserable potsherds that held them. So it was with Yakovieo's carnation; and I often noticed it in the Jewish quarter—beautiful flowers thriving in wretched vessels. We made our way to the little sitting-room, and there found Rachel, her cousin Judah, and—Mrs. Smith! The latter very important, and fussy, and grand; but Rachel looked flushed and uncomfortable. Judah also looked annoyed, but timid and rather puzzled, as if their visitor had been too much for him. Our arrival was evidently a relief. Mrs. Smith scarcely gave time for us to exchange good mornings before she began: 'You know, Miss Russell, I think we ought not to have any unpleasant feelings towards people who do wrong; therefore I came to see Rachel, and I brought her the wages which she was too proud to fetch herself. You know it is very unchristian to be proud.'

'There are many things which are unchristian, Mrs. Smith; certainly pride is one of them.'

'I meant it all for the young woman's good when I spoke to her at my house. You know, Mrs. Wells, truth always offends people, as I said yesterday to Mr. Anderson.'

'I think Mr. Anderson can speak the truth sometimes without giving offence.'

'Then it makes no impression, Miss Russell; people must be made to feel. But I did not come only for that. I am sure Rachel must be a great burden to her father, and it would be so good for her to learn to make herself useful. I thought of taking her to help my Arab cook. The Arab woman I had left me yesterday, and I was willing to let Rachel take her place. She would have to make the beds, and sweep the rooms, and wait at table, and help the cook, and sew in the evenings. So very nice for her, you know, to get into a respectable family. But I have not explained all this to her yet, for—'

Rachel was going to interrupt and say something, but checked herself, and Mrs. Smith went on, addressing Mrs. Wells and me:

'I was very much astonished to find a young woman in her position sitting with a visitor;' and here she looked at Judah. 'Of course she is ignorant; but I was explaining to her that it is not proper. And reading, too, at this time of the day, when active employment is so much more suitable! When she comes to me I could not think of encouraging her to spend her time so unprofitably.'

At last Mrs Wells got in a word: 'Perhaps, Mrs. Smith, you don't know who this young man is? He is a nephew of Rabbi Abraham's.'

'Indeed! Then you see, my dear, it is very improper of Rachel to keep up acquaintance with her father's Jewish relations. Now, Rachel, I am willing to engage you; but you must give up reading and visitors.'

Rachel's colour mounted to her very forehead, and her voice trembled, but she said quietly: 'I thank you, Mrs. Smith; but I am needed in my father's house, and therefore I can't go anywhere else.'

'Your father must learn that he cannot keep his children in idleness about him. You will do him more good by leaving him.'

I could keep silence no longer.

'Really, Mrs. Smith, permit me to say that people can usually judge best for themselves in such matters. Rachel is necessary at home. She keeps no servant. You see how beautifully neat the house is. It does her infinite credit. Rabbi Abraham and his family could on no account spare her.'

'But it is for her good.'

'We may differ about that, Mrs. Smith. Her duty to her father is the first thing; and his society is likely to be more profitable for her than that of Arab servants.'

'But she is doing nothing,' persisted Mrs. Smith; 'she is idling her time. Look at those books.'

'I cannot bear it,' exclaimed Rachel, rising; she had tried hard to keep her temper till this moment.

'Come here, Rachel,' said Mrs Wells, and she drew her out on the terrace. I turned to Mrs. Smith, but, before I could speak, Judah broke out in his imperfect English: 'Madame, when Rachel shall be your daughter, you will teach her; but now she must hear her father—that is the commandment, and she is a very good daughter.'

'Oh, I have no doubt that is your opinion. No, Miss Russell, allow me to say that if these people are encouraged in such mistaken notions, they must end in beggary. I would have provided for the young woman in a respectable manner; but as it is, she must be left to herself. She is too young to marry, and a useless wife she will make.'

So saying, Mrs. Smith swept out of the room, no doubt to tell her friends that Rachel and Judah were getting up a match.

(To be continued.)

THE LAST DAYS OF A WORKMAN IN THE VINEYARD.

CHRISTIANS journeying through this wilderness towards the promised land, should delight in conversing one with another about the way. The experience of those whom it has pleased God to afflict is particularly valuable to us all. 'Born to trouble as the sparks fly upward,' we are sure sorrow must come to us one day; and we should desire to hear how the love of Christ has supported his tried servants in the 'cloudy and dark day.' 'Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened, and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name' (Mal. iii. 16).

It is good to encourage one another by the way; it is good to tell of the mercy which meets us continually upon our daily path; it is profitable to speak of the sorrows God sends, and of the comfort He affords us under them. We discern Christ's love in all the circumstances of our Christian course; and our cold hearts are quickened by telling our neighbours what that great love has been to us, and hearing how it has supported them. We recall our miserable backslidings, and remember how often we were on the point of deserting our Lord, but He would not let us go; and we trust Him to hold us still throughout our prosperity and our adversity. And in the time which must come to each of us, when we shall lie down in our last sickness, and every earthly support must fail us, we trust He will be our stay.

Since it is so good to hear what Jesus has been to others, I am going to relate what He was to one whom I knew and valued. I knew him in his great suffering: he is now among the happy multitude of the redeemed. If I follow Christ as he followed Him, I shall meet him again, and we shall rejoice together. I cannot think, without deep emotion, of the short time I was privileged to know him, and witness his noble testimony for Christ.

It was on a beautiful evening in May 1861 that I first went to see Robinson Crockett, having accidentally heard that he had been a long time ill. The road leading to his home lay through a very fertile country, bounded on the left by a line of far-away blue hills, corn-fields, and meadows, interspersed with snug farmsteads lying between. To my right was a rising ground, also highly cultivated. There was a carpet of white clover on either side of the road; it was coming into blossom, and filled the air with a delightful perfume. Woodbine and gay wild roses were coming out in the hedges. I traversed that same path on many subsequent evenings. I love to recall the time.

The sufferer was a young man, apparently about twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age, of most interesting and intelligent appearance. His face bore the impress of long suffering—hope deferred through weary days and nights; but I shall never forget the patience and resignation stamped upon it. We talked for some time, he and I, about the beginning of his illness; and he told me how strong he used to be—how his leg grew very bad, and he was obliged to take to his bed, which he had never been able to leave since. Now, he said, he could not move in the very least, as the slightest motion gave him severe pain.

'How long,' I asked, 'have you been lying here unable to move?'

'Nearly fifteen months.'

'Poor fellow, what a time! How have you been able to bear it? you must have suffered so much.'

'Yes, I have suffered, especially at night, when they are all sleeping; and I have had such racking pain the last three weeks; but I do not complain, for I have so sure a stay.'

'Have you? What was it?'

Robinson looked at me for a moment in surprise before he replied, 'The love of Christ. He has supported me through all my pain in a wonderful manner, and has given me so many kind friends; I would ha' fainted many a time if He hadna sustained me. The Lord afflicts in love. "Whom He loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." Oh! I trust my Saviour loves me. There was a little hymn the children used to learn in the Sabbath school,' he continued, his clear blue eyes brightening as he spoke, 'and every verse ended with the words, "Oh, how He loves!" It's gone out of my memory, all but those words; but I've often tried to mind the rest of it, for that part is so true—"Oh, how He loves!"'

'And have you found his dealings with you to be all love, Robinson?'

'Yes, all love; but at times I do find it hard to be resigned as I ought. Our Lord never changes; I find Him very merciful. When He scourges with one hand, He upholds with the other.'

I listened with ever-increasing wonder. How far was this young man before me in the heavenly race! I had never even imagined such sufferings as seemed to have fallen to his share; yet he not only bore up patiently under them, but could extol his Saviour's love in them. Even while he was speaking, a look of sharp pain spread over his poor face.

'Oh, Robinson,' cried I, 'you have taught me a lesson to-day. You are glorifying God by your cheerful submission to his holy will, more than you could do by years spent in speaking for Him in the world.'

He answered me very earnestly: 'I would gladly suffer ten times as much as I have done, if God could be glorified thereby.'

Poor sufferer! No—I am wrong; rather let me write, happy saint! His hours of pain have been long since swallowed up in the exceeding and eternal weight of glory. I asked him if I might come again to see him.

'Please do come,' he replied; 'I like so well to have any sensible person to speak to. But you cannot have any pleasure in coming here; it can only be mercy that brings you to visit me.'

'I assure you it gives me great pleasure to come. I have no greater pleasure than visiting the sick; besides, there is that to be learned here which, with God's help, I shall not forget.'

'Mother,' said Robinson, 'do you hear? This young lady says she likes nothing better than visiting sick people.'

'Well, son, you will be glad to see her when she comes to you.'

I think it was on this first visit that I pointed out the lily of the valley among some flowers I had brought him. He said he was glad to see the flower, for he had always wished to know what it was like, since he heard a sermon preached by Mr. Guinness, in which he spoke of our blessed Lord as the Lily of the Valley. Robinson admired my lilies, and said they smelled very sweet.

'Their fragrance,' I observed, 'is pleasant to our sense, as the sweet love and forgiveness of Jesus to the penitent sinner's soul.'

'Oh that love!' cried the sufferer; 'oh that pardon! How sweet it is! He to whom much is forgiven, should indeed love much.'

Robinson told me he had spent many peaceful days lying in that bed. He had been able to read to himself nearly the whole day before the pain became so excessive; and as his kind minister kept him well supplied with books, the time was not heavy on his hands. The neighbours, too, were so kind to him; he thought no one had so many kind friends as he. God had surely been very merciful to him: were not his ways wonderful?

I walked slowly homeward by the same flowery path; but the sunny summer's evening had lost all its brightness for me. Here, at no great distance from my home, was one who had languished for fifteen months in dreadful suffering, whom I might have cheered and comforted in various ways, and I had never even heard his name! For some time I gave way to the sorrowful murmuring occasioned by this thought; but at length I remembered that God had ordered this event, as He orders all things for his people, wisely and well. His afflicted servant was dear to Him. He had upheld him during the trial with the light of his countenance, and had given him so many faithful friends that he had not needed me; and, for myself, should not my regret be soothed by the remembrance that it was God's will?

We have the blessed assurance that 'all things work together for good to them that love God.' Robinson loved God. I trust I love Him too. Let Him do as seemeth Him best, He does all things well. Do we desire any earthly thing very ardently? What we wish for most is often withheld, because our Lord knows that very thing would be injurious to our souls if granted. Dear friends, is it not a delightful thought, that the least thing which happens to us is decreed by our wise Father in heaven? Worldly people talk of chance and fate: Christ's people recognise neither chance nor fate.

I was interested now in learning all I could about Robinson Crockett. I learned that he had been a follower of Christ from his earliest years. He was first a pupil, then a teacher in the Sabbath school attached to the Presbyterian church to which he belonged; and at the time of the Revival, which was so great a blessing to many among us, he began to speak of Christ to all who would listen to him. He was in the habit of assembling his young companions and engaging with them in prayer; and, from the time of his illness, the prayer-meeting was held in his sick-room, and he talked to them and prayed from his bed. Robinson had also borne reproach for Christ's sake. Some said a poor uneducated man should not set up to teach them; and others were offended because, they fancied, he thought himself better than they were; but his answer to all was, that he had found Jesus, and he could not rest until the neighbours found Him too.

For some time I was privileged to visit him nearly every day. Sometimes he was well enough to enjoy a little reading; but in general he was not able to listen to more than a very few verses of Scripture, or a hymn. He delighted to speak of the work going on in the country. I recollect his saying one evening, that they must indeed be happy who could help in the work.

I knew he was thinking how gladly he would help to advance our Lord's kingdom; and I asked him if he remembered how St. Paul, at the time of his conversion, when his love to his Master, whom he had persecuted, was beginning to glow, asked Him, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' (Acts ix. 6.) It may be that the apostle, in his great zeal, thought only of work to be done by him for the beloved cause. His Lord required more from him than work. We read in the 16th verse of the same chapter, how the Lord spoke to Ananias concerning Saul: 'I will show him what great things he must suffer for my name's sake.' 'Your Master knows that you would work, Robinson, if He permitted you; but He has been pleased to give you the far harder part of suffering for his sake.'

'Oh that I might glorify Him! How gladly, how gladly should I endure! his tender mercy towards me has been so very great.'

'Think, Robinson, when the pain ends, what joy begins! They that suffer with Christ, shall also reign with Him.'

'What a promise is that! My minister was here this evening, and he spoke a long time to me upon that verse, "If ye suffer with Christ, ye shall also reign with Him." He gave me great encouragement to endure unto the end.'

'What a comfort it must be to you to see him!'

'Yes, oh yes! I have a good right to love him; for he it was who first, through God's blessing, led my feet into the way of salvation.'

The next time I saw poor Robinson he was very ill; but his face brightened a little when I came into the room. 'My dear friend,' he said, 'death will soon be swallowed up in victory. It has been a long, long pain; but I think it will be over in a few weeks more.'

'Will you be sorry when the call comes?'

'Oh no; I do not care how soon it comes. I shall leave this world without a regret or a tear. I wish it were to be to-night.'

He was sadly changed since my last visit. I saw it would not do to let him talk much.

'My breast,' he cried, 'my breast, it's pained, mother. If you felt the burning heat that's here!'

He called to her to raise him a little, for he felt as if he were suffocating; and a terrible fit of coughing shook his poor tortured frame. His mother held him against her breast until the paroxysm subsided; then laid him, faint and gasping, upon the pillow.

'Oh, my son, my son!' she cried, 'that is dreadful! Does it hurt your poor leg?'

'Rather ask where it does not hurt me, mother. I'm all one pain.'

I repeated the third verse of the 23d Psalm: 'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me: thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.' 'The Lord Jesus will be with his own people in the dark valley, and his love will make it bright.'

'I have not found it dark hitherto,' he replied. 'It has been a rough valley to me, but not dark.'

It had indeed been rough; but his dear Saviour, who had borne yet greater pain for him, had sustained him by the way.

'Oh, how He loves!' continued Robinson. 'He must have loved me through my affliction, for He has sent me so many mercies, and I am so undeserving.'

'Dear Robinson, which of us can say we are deserving?'

'Oh, no, no! I do not mean that. But surely the Lord has given me more comforts than He gives others. I know I have no righteousness of my own.'

'But you will be clothed with Christ's righteousness.'

'Yes, that is my hope—my hope! "an anchor of the soul, sure and stedfast."'

As I went home, I turned at the top of the hill where his cottage first comes in sight, and (wiping away my tears, which gathered fast at the thought that our earthly friendship was so near an end) took one more look at the little window of the room where lay this afflicted Christian, this heir to the kingdom, this bright jewel which was being polished for Jesus' crown. Some lessons had been taught me in that room by the voice which would soon be no more heard there, but would be joining in the sweet anthem: 'Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, and has redeemed us to God by his blood.'

(To be continued.)

THE RIVER AND THE TIDE.

On the bank of a river was seated one day
An old man, and close by his side
Was a child, who had paused from his laughing and play
To gaze at the stream, as it hurried away
To the sea, with the ebb of the tide.

'What see you, my child, in the stream, as it flows
To the ocean, so dark and deep?
Are you watching how swift, yet how silent it goes?
Thus hurry our lives, till they sink in repose,
And are lost in a measureless sleep.

'Now listen, my boy! You are young, I am old,
And yet like two rivers are we;
Though the flood-tide of youth from Time's ocean is rolled,
Yet it ebbs all too soon, and its waters grow cold
As it creeps back again to the sea.'

'But the river returns,' cried the boy, while his eyes
Gleamed bright as the water below.
'Ah! yes,' said the old man; 'but time, as it flies,
Turns the tide of our life, and it never can rise.'
'But first,' said the boy, 'it must flow.'

Thus, watching its course from the bank of the stream,
They mused, as they sat side by side;
Each read different tales in the river's bright gleam—
One borne with the flow of a glorious dream,
And one going out with the tide.

—Anon.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

JOB XXVII. 8.

THE word 'hypocrite' here means the 'ungodly;' and corresponds to the 'wicked' and 'unrighteous,' of whom Job was speaking. To this passage, probably, our Lord refers when He asks, 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his soul?' Job asks, What becomes of the vain hopes of the ungodly when this life is done? Whatever they may have of gain here, all is loss hereafter. This may be their 'time to get;' but that shall be their 'time to lose.' And their loss is not for a day, but for ever.

It is not all gain with the godly here. Paul says, 'For whom I have suffered the loss of all things.' He who casts in his lot with the people of God, must prepare for loss as well as gain. He must count the cost beforehand, and be ready to pay it when the day comes for payment. There is the taking up of our cross, and the denying self, and forsaking all. He loses, (1.) This world.—Whatever may be in it of pleasure, or satisfaction, or pomp, or gaiety, he loses; for he cannot have both worlds. (2.) His name.—Perhaps he stood high in reputation with the men of the world, and had a name for many things. This he loses, for his name is cast out as evil. (3.) His religion; for the likelihood is, that he had a sort of religion, or religiousness, like Saul of Tarsus. All this past religion of his must be left behind; it will serve him no more. (4.) His goods.—This may not always be demanded to the full extent, as in days of persecution; but still he must be prepared to part with everything—counting it no more his own.

But his 'hope' is never lost. He is 'saved by hope;' his eye is on the 'things hoped for;' he 'abounds in hope.' This well never runs dry. This treasure-house is never exhausted. Whatever of darkness there may rest on his present, his future brightens with 'hope;' and that hope 'maketh not ashamed;' it contains the incorruptible and everlasting. And even now he has abundant compensation for loss and trial.

Not so the 'ungodly.' He has, indeed, a 'hope;' a hope of being saved, or at least of not being lost; a hope of going to heaven, or at least of not going to hell. But his hope is not 'the good hope through grace.' It is a self-originated hope; an unscriptural hope; a groundless and unreasonable hope; a fallacious hope; a hope that will not be sickness-proof, or deathbed-proof; or, if it be so, it perishes at death; it is wrapt up in his shroud, and buried in his grave; for it there is no resurrection.

Thus the one thing which seemed gain to him, goes from him at death, and all is loss,—utter, infinite, irreparable, eternal loss! For him there is no morning, but only night; night without a star, or even a meteor-gleam. His losses cannot be enumerated or estimated, they are so many and so terrible. He loses such things as the following:

I. His soul.—I might say his body too; for if the man be lost, then soul and body are gone. But it is the soul that is the special and supreme loss. The loss of that which moulders in the grave is, after all, subordinate; but the loss of that which cannot die is great beyond measure. He who has lost his soul is poor indeed. Yet, in the case of the ungodly man, that fearful loss is incurred. He loses his soul. Not that the soul perishes or is annihilated. That would be some relief to the poor doomed victim of sin. The soul is lost, but cannot die. The loss of the soul consists in eternal condemnation and ruin. All is gone for which the soul existed. It exists now, only for woe. Life is no longer life, for the soul cannot enjoy it. All that constituted life, true life, in time or eternity, is gone. Life is now become worse than death, for the soul is lost,—lost in darkness, woe, anguish, and an endless hell,—lost from God, and goodness, and blessedness, and from all holy beings, for ever and ever!

II. Heaven.—The future state and place of blessedness has many names: a kingdom, an inheritance, a city, a new heaven. All of these are names of joy. 'Heaven' is a noble and glorious name, embodying in it all that is excellent, and divine, and perfect. Its joy is perfect, its light is perfect, its holiness is perfect. Its songs are perfect, its service is perfect. It is day without night; it is the blessing without the curse. All this is lost by the ungodly. What a loss must a lost heaven be! To be shut out from such a kingdom, dispossessed of such an inheritance, nay, made the heir of such sorrow and darkness—how infinitely woeful! Think, O man, amid all thy losses, past or prospective, what a lost heaven must be! A lost kingdom, a lost city, a lost inheritance,—who can measure such a loss?

III. Christ.—Yes, Christ is lost; and this is the heaviest loss of all. None like it, so infinite and so irreparable; the loss of losses, the woe of woes! A lost Christ! what can equal that? This is the loss of the ungodly. This loss is great—(1) Because of what Christ is in himself—the glorious Emmanuel; (2) Because of what He has done on the cross; (3) Because of his love; (4) Because of his sympathy, and fellowship, and consolation; (5) Because of his reward. This loss is indeed unutterable. Men do not see this, or think of it. Yet it shall one day be felt. In hell it shall be realized as the loss of losses; that which makes the place of woe so unutterably awful. 'I might have had Christ,' will the lost sinner say, 'but I would not have Him; and now He is gone for ever. I cannot have Him now. Instead of Christ, I have Satan; instead of heaven, hell!'

Consider your losses, O ye ungodly! They are unspeakable and eternal. Look at them now, and prevent them. There is some little compensation now, for such losses, in the world's pleasure, or lust, or wealth. There shall be no compensation then. It will be unmitigated woe; a cup of undiluted, unsweetened gall and wormwood.

What a disappointment to you who have been hoping and hoping! To lie down with a false hope, and go up to the Judge expecting to be received! How dreadful the agony of such a disappointment!

It is not too late. Your soul is not lost; heaven is not yet lost; Christ is not yet lost. All may yet be won. The gate stands wide open; go in, go in! God's record stands still true concerning his Son; believe it, and be saved!

THE RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

'But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets.'—ROM. iii. 21.

IT is of sin and righteousness that the apostle speaks so fully and so minutely throughout this whole epistle. Up to the verse from which our text is taken, he has been settling this point, that man is a sinner, and needs a righteousness, else he cannot stand before God. Circumcision cannot give a righteousness; it merely tells us that a righteousness is needed, no more. The law cannot give a righteousness; it is merely a declaration of what righteousness is, and that the unrighteous shall not stand before God. It condemns, it cannot justify. By the law is the knowledge of sin, and thus every mouth is stopped, and the whole world brought in guilty before God. But notwithstanding this, there is a righteousness—a righteousness which meets the case of the unrighteous in every part—a righteousness which can reverse even the verdict of the law against the unrighteous—a righteousness on the footing of which we can stand with boldness in the presence of the holy God without either shame or fear. It is of this righteousness that he proceeds to speak in the words of our text. Let us hear what he affirms regarding it.

I. First of all, he shows that it is the righteousness of God. It is a divine, not a human righteousness. That righteousness which we had lost in Adam was, after all, but a human thing, finite like him who lost it; but that which we gain is a divine righteousness, and by being divine forms an infinite compensation for that which Adam lost for us, and we, in receiving it, are made partakers of a most glorious exchange. It is called the righteousness of God, because it is a righteousness provided by Him; a righteousness which was conceived by Him, set on foot, and carried out in every part by Him, entirely and by Him alone; a righteousness, in the providing of which we had nothing to do, even in thought or in desire, far less in execution; a righteousness, the origin and accomplishment of which are wholly and purely God's, not man's at all. Again, it is called the righteousness of God, because it is a righteousness founded on the sufferings of the Son of God. It behoved Him who is the only-begotten of the Father, to take flesh and suffer, ere the very first step towards the providing of that righteousness could be taken. And He has suffered, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God; and thus the foundation of a divine righteousness has been laid.

Again, it is called the righteousness of God, because it is a righteousness made up of the doings of the Son of God. It is not merely with his sufferings that this righteousness has to do, but it is with his doings as well. These two things enter into its composition, so that, without both of them, it would be imperfect. What He did on earth in magnifying the law and making it honourable—what He did on earth in obeying the Father's will in every jot and tittle, makes up this righteousness. These doings of his were infinitely pleasing to the Father, infinitely glorifying to the Father's holiness, and infinitely honouring to that law which our unrighteousness had violated and dishonoured.

Further, it is called the righteousness of God, because it provides such a compensation for human unrighteousness, that it not only takes it all away, but brings in a new and far higher and surer footing for the sinner to rest on. It introduces a new standing of acceptance, so that the man who becomes a partaker of this provided righteousness becomes divinely accepted, divinely righteous, divinely blessed. It is not a mere simple righteousness that God sets forth; it is a superabounding one, an infinite one, one which can leave no room for doubt on our part at all, one that is most amply sufficient to meet our case were we the very guiltiest on whom the sun has ever shone. Such, brethren, is the righteousness of God.

II. The second thing which the apostle affirms respecting this righteousness is, that it is a righteousness without the law. He does not mean that it is in any sense an unlawful righteousness—a righteousness not based on law—a righteousness, in providing which law has been set aside in any sense; but it means a righteousness which, in so far as we are concerned, has nothing to do with law at all. It is not a righteousness which asks any doing, or working, or obeying on our part in order to complete it, in order to make it what it is—'the righteousness of God;' for did it require anything of this kind on our part, it would cease to be what it is here represented to be, 'the righteousness of God,' and would become, to a large extent at least, 'the righteousness of man.' This righteousness does not send us to the law in order to be justified; it does not throw us upon our own works, either in whole or in part; it proceeds from first to last upon such principles as these, announced elsewhere in this epistle, and in the Epistle to the Galatians: 'By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified.' And again, as it is written: 'To him that worketh not, but believeth in Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness.' In no sense, and at no time does it say to us, 'Do this and thou shalt live; do this and thou shalt be saved.' In no sense does it give us the idea of a thing far off, but of a thing nigh at our very side; not of a thing to be toiled for, a thing to be waited for on our part. In no such sense has this righteousness anything to do with law, or with our doing of the law. And what, brethren, is the whole of the Epistle to the Galatians but a protest against the idea that this righteousness of God has anything to do with the law in so far as the sinner is concerned? In so far as God is concerned, in so far as the Son of God is concerned, it had everything to do with law; but in so far as we are concerned, it has nothing to do with it—it is a righteousness without the law. Let us, brethren, hold fast then this truth of the gospel, this foundation truth—righteousness without law, righteousness founded in no sense upon our keeping of the law; but wholly and absolutely upon this fact, that another has kept the law for us, and that other no less than the Son of God himself.

III. The third thing which the apostle affirms regarding this righteousness is, that it has been 'manifested.' 'Now,' he says, 'the righteousness of God is manifested;' it has been clearly brought to light, so that there can be no mistake concerning it, and no mystery in it. It is not a thing hidden, wrapped up, reserved, held back, veiled from our view. It is a thing clearly brought out to-day, and shone upon by God's own light, so that the difficulty seems to be not how to see it, but how to miss seeing it, how to keep ourselves from apprehending it. It has been clearly manifested. God has been at infinite pains to bring it forward to view, both on our own account, and on account of Him whose righteousness it is. In every way He has sought to guard it against the possibility of being mistaken by man. In every way has He taken precautions against this being hidden from view, or darkened by the words of man's wisdom. He has set this righteousness as a star in the firmament above us, that every eye may see it, that no mountains of earth may come between us and the heavenly vision; He has made it peculiarly bright, that every eye may be attracted to it. He has removed other stars from around it, that it may not be mistaken, but stand alone in its brilliance. It is to this star we point the eye of each sinner here; the Star of Bethlehem, the brightest in God's firmament, the bright and morning star, the star which God has set there as his light to the world. He presents it to each one of you, that on recognising it you may not walk in darkness, but have the light of life, and that, knowing it as it has been manifested, you may no longer stand in doubt as to your relationship with God, as to your personal acceptance. He so puts this righteousness at your disposal that you may come to Him in confidence, using it as if it were entirely your own.

IV. The fourth thing which the apostle affirms regarding this righteousness is, that it is a righteousness 'to which the law and the prophets bear witness.' By this expression we understand the whole of the Old Testament. It is not something (he means to tell us) now come to light for the first time, not understood in the ages gone by; it is something which has been proclaimed from the beginning hitherto. To these oracles the eye of every saint, from Abel downward, has been directed; on this righteousness the feet of every saint from the beginning have stood; of this righteousness every prophet has spoken; to this righteousness every type has borne witness; and this righteousness every sacrifice has set forth. It is this Star which shone down upon the pilgrimage of all Old Testament worthies, and in the light of which they walked. It is this Star which sheds light on every page of their history; it was to this Star that they, with one consent, age after age, pointed the eye of all around. They knew none but this; they cared for none but this; to them, as to those who believe now, Christ was 'all and in all.' On this righteousness they rested, in it they rejoiced. It is no new righteousness which we preach. It is no new foundation of which we tell. It is the old one, the well-proved one. It has been abundantly sufficient in past ages, and it has lost none of its efficiency now in these last days. It was enough for the saints in former ages; it is enough for us now. They who found salvation ages and generations ago found it here; and he who finds salvation now finds it also here.

(To be continued.)

MADAME ELIZABETH.

'The perfect victory is,
To triumph over ourselves.'
THOMAS A KEMPIS.

AUTHENTIC memoirs of the great Revolution having of late become subjects of deep and increasing interest to the people of France, letters and papers have been brought to light, which have tended to redeem more than one noble character from obscurity.

There are few of our readers who are not well acquainted with the private life and public misfortunes of Louis XVI., and his beautiful, highly gifted queen. Pens without number have dwelt on the touching story of their many virtues and their cruel woes; but, until very lately, another member of the royal family—one who suffered with them, and suffered for them—has been allowed to remain comparatively unnoticed. A little while ago a beautiful memoir of her life emanated from the French press; and from it we venture to make a little sketch, just to show how the grace of God, and the influence of his sanctifying Spirit, may so act upon a disposition by nature apparently untractable and rude, that, even as the delicate tints and glowing colours that lie concealed beneath the pebble's rough outer surface, may be brought out by the skill of the polisher; so imperfections vanish, hidden by the new beauties that become revealed, when once the Holy Spirit commences its workings in the human soul.

When Marie Antoinette, scarcely sixteen years of age, left her Austrian home, and the tender care of her wise and loving mother, to become the wife of the young French Dauphin, among the many relatives whom she found ready to give her welcome, was one of whom the beautiful young bride writes: 'She attracts me particularly.' Was it the finger of destiny? Say, rather, it was the hand of God that led the Dauphiness to discover traits of character in a little girl, only six years of age, hitherto remarkable only for her want of personal attractions, her brusque manners, wilful temper, and impatience of all control; indeed, to ordinary observers, she was utterly void of those charms which naturally attract a stranger to admire a child. Yet the heart of this little untamed being was a casket of priceless gems,—uncut, indeed, and unpolished, but on that account all the more ready to receive quick and vivid impressions; and, from the moment that the little Elizabeth first gazed with childish admiration on the rare combination of beauty and grace which presented itself in her new relative, she conceived for her the most ardent and devoted attachment; while, no doubt, Marie Antoinette's lively, affectionate disposition, together with her quiet firmness and decision of character, must have done much to rivet that bond of affection which was destined to last for life.

The Dauphiness, carefully and religiously nurtured by a wise and virtuous mother, found herself, in the early morning of her spotless youth, suddenly placed in an atmosphere of moral impurity, of the extent of which, in the innocence of her nature, she was for a long time utterly unconscious. The life in her new home was (like her marriage-day) at first all flowers and sunshine; but very soon dark clouds loomed over her head, and the foreigner found she had many enemies in the French palace. Their ways were not her ways; they were jealous alike of the beauty (which was her least attraction) and the perfect decorum which uniformly marked her conduct. They contrived to annoy her in many ways; and even for a time succeeded in alienating her husband's affections from her. Those were dark days for the young queen—days in which she must have often thought of her mother's words: 'My daughter, in adversity remember me.' But, alas, the mother was far away, and the daughter, surrounded as she was by court intrigues and petty court cabals, must have often turned with pleasure to the child, on whose sincere affection she could rely. Probably she and the little Elizabeth were then more than ever drawn together; and Marie Antoinette herself, imbued with the deepest sense of religious duty, may, in that season of heart-sorrow, when 'though no murmur escaped her lips, the tear oft fell from her eye,' have led her sister's thoughts to the source of her own comfort, and shown, by her example, the beauty of ardent charity and self-denial, and so, unconsciously perhaps, increased the intensity of that religious feeling that seems to have grown with the child's growth, and strengthened with her strength.

In brighter days, when the queen had become a happy mother, and from that time a happy wife, for ever secure in the possession of her husband's love, all the long-repressed gaiety of her disposition returned, and we find her led, by the buoyancy of her spirits, to mingle with (perhaps blameable) eagerness in the gay amusements of the court. For these gaieties the young Elizabeth never seems to have had any taste; she only cared to accompany her royal brother and sisters in their missions of mercy to the poor and afflicted. Perhaps, too, the strictly religious lives of her aunts may have had an influence over her; for, when her sister Clothilde married, she, then fourteen years of age, began to feel herself lonely and out of place in the gay French court. Conceiving the most ardent desire to devote her life wholly to the service of God, she believed that she could only do so by entering a convent, and there, apart from the world and its temptations, giving her every thought to the duties of religion. In all sincerity she believed this idea to be a right one; but He who shapes for each of us his path in life, had chosen her for a far higher, holier mission than could ever be found within a convent's walls. Happily for themselves, Louis and his queen used all their influence to prevent their young relative from carrying out her intention; and inasmuch as she then, yielding to their entreaties, gave up the cherished desire of her heart, so, in after years, when, at the approach of danger, they besought her to leave them and go with her aunts to Rome, she refused to listen, though flight at that time would have ensured not only her personal safety, but the gratification of her strongest religious instincts. 'No,' then she cried, 'entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go, where thou lodgest I will lodge, and where thou diest I will die.' Right nobly she kept her word, clinging to them through all the changing fortunes of their eventful life, to be their sustaining comfort and support even to the end. Surely the ways of Providence are wise as they are mysterious. It was not his will that the Princess Elizabeth should live out her life shut up in a convent; He chose her rather to be one of his favoured instruments, sent into the world as a witness of his grace in the human heart, and as an angel of consolation to a suffering family, whose trials have scarcely a parallel in the history of nations.

As a child, the subject of our sketch had an obstinate, determined temper, impatient of control, and wanting in docility. Perhaps her sister-in-law first discerned, and then drew out the germs of feeling that lay hidden in her nature; then, when the Holy Spirit shone into her soul, those very traits that were faults in the child, became developed into all the beauties of an active, energetic mind, and an almost masculine courage, combined with everything that is most lovely and loveable in woman's tender nature. To us, one of the most brilliant gems in her character is her total abnegation of self—self-forgetting, self-sacrificing, having a humble opinion of herself, and a conviction, even to the last, that nothing in her could ever win the favour of God. She tells us this in one of her letters, when she says: 'I know not how God will save my soul, I do nothing towards it.' When the clouds of misfortune rose around the royal family, when the storms of the Revolution—that seems to have been presaged by the terrible thunderstorm that darkened the sunshine, and shook the palace on their ill-omened wedding-day—burst over their devoted heads, Elizabeth might have found safety with her brothers, by sharing their flight to foreign lands; but her simple, yet brave, determined, yet gentle character, found itself incapable of such a 'barbarous desertion.' She was too loyal, as well as too loving, to forsake her friends in their distress; indeed, loyalty is a prominent feature in her character, for she loved Louis, not only as her brother, but as her king. And though her energetic, courageous disposition, would have urged him to wield the military power, which he had in his hands, for crushing the revolutionary outbreak while it was yet capable of being crushed, still she could not have the heart to blame him—nay, she loved him all the better for those very virtues of tender humanity and good nature, which, though admirable in the man, became faults in the king, combined as they were with a torpor and indecision of character, that lacked the courage of a hero, even while it possessed all the firm resignation and enduring patience of a martyr.* On that terrible 20th of June 1792, we find the Princess Elizabeth not only refusing to leave, but willing to sacrifice her life for those she loved. Having friends in the palace—men whose lives she had saved in 1789,—she might have easily escaped to a place of safety, but she would not; and when, in a moment of extreme danger, she, clasping her arms round the king, was mistaken for the queen, loaded with reproaches, and threatened with instant death, which was only averted by some one crying out, 'Hold, it is Madame Elizabeth,' instead of expressing joy at her deliverance, she turned a mildly reproachful countenance on the speaker, saying, 'Why did you tell them?—their mistake may have saved the queen.'

An affectionate relative, Madame Elizabeth was no less true and loving as a friend. She had two friends to whom she was sincerely attached, showing her attachment by the interest she took in their happiness and prosperity. To one of these ladies she secured a position by marriage, making herself responsible for the marriage portion; and to raise the required sum, she induced her royal brother to advance five years of her own allowance, or rather of a gift, which she was accustomed to receive from him on every New Year's day. As year by year came round, she only of the royal family received nothing; but none looked happier than she did, while she gaily remarked, 'But I have my friend.' Alas for that tender loving nature, born to suffer in every fibre! Having through her influence obtained a court appointment for her other friend, she felt happy in the thought that she should have them ever near her; but by and by the days of trouble came, the tide of emigration bore them away, and then the loving heart found itself deserted and alone. Yet Providence causes good to spring from the very circumstances that to us appear the most untoward; and it is to the correspondence between Madame Elizabeth and her absent friends, that we are mainly indebted for an insight into those secret thoughts and feelings which show the beauty of her well-ordered mind. That mind left its impress on her countenance. In childhood, we read that she was considered plain and unattractive; but when her heart was touched, and her soul awakened, the light of her spirit shone over her face, and she became lovely, not so much in feature as in the habitual happy serenity of her expression. Those who do not know the secret of her happiness, may wonder that one so afflicted could be anything but miserable. But let us follow her, as she rises day by day to greet the opening morn with earnest prayer, humbly, trustfully placing herself and all connected with her in his hands who must do all things 'well;' then tuning her spirit by the study of her favourite volumes: Gospel, containing the story of his life and sorrows; Tribulation of Christ, Lives of the Saints. No wonder, with such glorious ensamples continually in her mind, that she should feel well fortified to do and to suffer,—in short, to enact any part that might be hers in the changing drama of her daily life. Whenever a ray of light seems to break through the dense clouds which darken her horizon, we find her spirits rising with the occasion,—she is cheerful, almost gay. But hers is not the mirth that, like the lightning, flashes for a moment, to leave a deeper gloom behind; it is rather a warm 'daylight of the soul,' shedding a serene and steady light around her. This perpetual cheerfulness under all circumstances can only be attributed to one cause, —her habitual reliance on, and sense of, the divine presence, which gave her the satisfaction of feeling that even when surrounded by cruel foes, even when alone in the midst of enemies, she was still in the company of her dearest, her best of Friends. Of herself she never thought, for herself she never sorrowed; but her gentle heart ached for the woes of others,—for her royal relations, deprived of their throne and liberty; for those sweet children, whose weary captive hours she cheered by her lively instructions; and above all did she grieve for the insults offered to religion by the infuriate infidels of the democratic mob. She could sometimes afford an amused smile at the slights put upon worldly titles and prerogatives; but she was filled with horror and distress when she heard of the desecration of the Sabbath, of the churches—in short, of the complete overthrow of all religion. Then, indeed, did she earnestly, and with tears, wrestle in prayer, humbling herself before God, for the sins of her wretched, but still beloved country, from which the Almighty seemed to have turned away his countenance, leaving it a prey to reckless ambition, depravity, and bloodshed,—to rulers who disdained even the outward form of religion, and who, neither believing in God nor regarding man, had nothing to restrain them from those mad, brutal excesses that have stained every historic page wherein the story of the French Revolution is recorded.

* 'There were many epochs,' says Alison, 'during the sitting of the first assembly, after its dangerous tendency began to be perceived by the great body of the people, when an intrepid monarch, aided by a faithful army and resolute nobility, might have averted the tempest, turned the stream of innovation into constitutional channels, and established, in conformity to the wishes of the great majority of the nation, a limited monarchy, similar to that of the British Empire.'—Alison's History of Europe.

Through all the sorrows that followed the royal family, we find Madame Elizabeth ever present, though seldom prominent; always the same quiet example of humble virtue and sustaining piety; strong-minded, but always womanly; having such a happy influence on those around her, that, in the year 1790, in the midst of deep distress, Marie Antoinette says: 'The serenity of Elizabeth sustains and raises us all.' Kind and forgiving even to her enemies, in that fatal drive from Varennes in 1791, during which the cruel, perfidious Pètion, together with Barnave, occupied a seat in the royal carriage, we find her offering him wine, though she knew him to be her deadliest, most implacable foe. Then her uniform gentleness, her wise, touching, noble remarks on the woes of France, together with the melancholy, sorrowing majesty of the queen, made an impression upon Barnave which was never effaced, and which so worked upon his generous feelings and enlightened intellect, that he had afterwards courage openly to espouse the royal cause, and to plead for the captive king, in that able speech which he made to the assembly on the 17th of July in the same year.

From the first moment that Louis XVI. fell into the hands of his enemies, he seems to have had a conviction that he was destined to follow the same fate as that which befell Charles I. of England; so also Madame Elizabeth had an early presentiment that she, too, was doomed to wear a martyr's crown. She does not profess to glory in the thought; she is not ambitious for public distinction, either in life or death; she says, 'I am undesirous to become a martyr.' Yet she is resigned to the inevitable, and talks calmly of what she believes to be her 'destiny.' Who can read unmoved of the daily, hourly trials to which this noble woman was subject? Yet in the midst of all she is able to say, 'The thought of God prevents my murmuring;' and again (when anticipating the worst), 'God will give me strength, He is so good, so good.' When her royal brother was gone—when as yet in ignorance of her royal sister's fate, though enduring all the agonies of fearful suspense—she subdues her own feelings, and bravely continues to devote her time to the loving task of educating her little fellow-captives—the unfortunate Dauphin and his sister (who lived to become known to many as the Duchess of Angoulême). Her sole remaining object in life was to cheer and comfort those dear children, and to that end she even mingled music with her other instructions; and surely their stern jailers' hearts must have sometimes felt a qualm when those gloomy Temple walls echoed the sweet, childish notes of the little royal captives. Though the spirit may 'be willing, the flesh is weak;' and if Madame Elizabeth sometimes felt inclined to be cast down at the contemplation of her misfortunes, surely we cannot wonder at it. In reference to such feelings, when pouring out her thoughts to her friend, she says: 'There are times when I feel my position more acutely; but, on the whole, God gives me grace to bear it very well.' At another time, when fully enjoying the sustaining help of that grace, she is able to write: 'I am not at all unhappy.'

When the world seems to be fading from her—when her own inevitable doom seems to be drawing near—she kindly prepares her friends for the sad event. Then she writes her farewells, makes her touching little bequests. To one dear friend, she says: 'I leave thee my hair. Make not thyself unhappy by regretting me.' To another: 'Make thy little ones pray for me. God tells us their prayers are pleasing to Him.' Again: 'I must tell thee myself—pray for me.'

Alas! while consoling others, her tender heart never had the satisfaction of receiving those touching farewell words of appreciating love, penned to her by her royal sister at half-past four o'clock of the last morning of her life, October 16, 1793: 'You, my good and tender sister, you who sacrificed all to remain with us, in what a position do I now leave you!' Then, again: 'Adieu! my good and tender sister. May this letter reach you. Think ever of me. I embrace you with all my heart, as well as those poor, tender infants.' Such are a few sentences selected from that loving, farewell letter, the last written words of Marie Antoinette—words that never reached her for whom they were intended.*

At last we come, unwillingly indeed, to the closing scene of this brief and lovely life. It was on a night in May—May, that charming month of singing birds and flowers — that Madame Elizabeth, sleeping the peaceful sleep of innocence, was aroused from her slumbers, and ordered to make ready to appear before the revolutionary tribunal. Her little niece was sleeping beside her; and we can well imagine the terrified grief of the child, suddenly awoke to the knowledge that her tender protectress was about to be taken from her. There was little time allowed for parting words. Madame Elizabeth tenderly embraced her beloved charge, and soothed her with a promise that she would soon return. If angels are indeed allowed (as we would fain believe) to watch over those they loved on earth, no doubt that promise was faithfully kept; but Madame Elizabeth's mortal form never again embraced her niece, and the eyes of the young princess never again rested on the sweet face of her good and loving aunt. It is the remark of a learned historian,† that when she was brought before the tribunal, the judges and jury showed an unusual degree of impatience for her condemnation. Probably they dreaded the effect that a long trial might have, in allowing such an example of virtue and saint-like courage to appear too often before a people who were already beginning to repent the murder of their king and queen.

Few were the accusations that the malice of her enemies could contrive against her, and even they were of a nature that tended rather to exalt than to sully her character. The first offence laid to her charge was her having assisted some men who had been wounded in the Champ d'Elysées, on the occasion of the revolt in 1789. To this she replied: 'Humanity alone led me to dress their wounds. I needed no inquiry into the origin of their sufferings to feel the obligation to relieve them. I never thought this a merit; but I cannot see how it can be considered as a crime.' 'Admit at least,' said the president, 'that you have nourished in the young Capet the hope of regaining the throne of his father?' 'I devoted myself,' said she, 'to the care of that infant, who was the more dear to me as he had lost those to whom he owed his being.' When accused of being an accomplice of the tyrant, she, with calm nobility, replied: 'If my brother had been a tyrant, neither you nor I would have been where we now are.'* Her death being already determined on, innocence availed little with those before whom she stood. She was condemned to die, with several others of high rank and exalted virtue. When taken to the room where those sentenced with her were assembled, her noble courage never forsook her, —nay, rather then did she let the light of her calm faith and holy hope so shine before her fellow-prisoners, that they, seeing the beauty of holiness, were encouraged by her counsels and exhortations to meet death without fear; and many a one in that crowded prison room learned from her to > 'Raise the hands and pray

> To Him who smooths the way
> Through the dark vale.'

Even when sitting bound in that wretched vehicle which bore her to the place of execution, the granddaughter of a king could not feel herself degraded. Even then she felt that the King of kings was beside her; and happy in that thought, self-forgetting as ever, her heart was 'at leisure from itself to soothe and sympathize' with the woes of others. Twenty-three persons, beside Madame Elizabeth, occupied seats in that death chariot. Of these, by right of rank, she of course ought to have taken precedence in the last sad hour; but (if possible) to increase her punishment, it was arranged that she should be the last to suffer. We can well imagine what that tender heart must have felt while compelled to witness the cruel death of twenty-three of her fellow-creatures; yet, through all, her courage never gave way. As she stood on the scaffold her countenance had a glorified expression of high and holy hope; her lips moved in prayer for those who were about to take her life. Already her thoughts were in heaven; already, 'in the red morn,' she heard the 'angels' song,' and, with the serenity of an angel, she awaited the death-stroke. The graceful elegance of her form, the placid beauty of her countenance, had such an effect on the assembled spectators, that many tears fell, and words of pity were heard, when that vast revolutionary crowd became aware that their vengeance was sated, their savage work accomplished, and the pure spirit of their victim far beyond their reach, winging its way to eternal rest. 'The Reign of Terror' had many victims; hundreds of the noble, the great, and the good, had ascended the steps of the gory guillotine; yet among them all we cannot find one more worthy than Madame Elizabeth to be selected as a witness of the all-sufficient grace of God, and the power of his Spirit for consolation and support, both in the thorny path of life, and in the dark vale of death.

M. B. B.

* This letter was taken as soon as written to Robespierre. It was found after his death among his papers by Courtois, and discovered among the latter's papers in 1815, when they were searched by order of the Government.

† Sir Archibald Alison.

* See 'Trial of Madame Elizabeth.' Alison's Hist. of Europe, chap. xv.

ENTERING INTO LIFE:

NOTES FROM THE DEATHBED OF A BELOVED FRIEND.

(Continued from p. 293.)

ON the Wednesday preceding her death, she felt as if her end was very near. Towards the evening of the day, she said: 'His word to me now is, "The Master is come, and calleth for thee."' During the night she was much distressed in body, and seemed to be deeply exercised in mind. Early in the following morning, she said that 'the accuser of the brethren' had been with her all night, and that she had obtained discoveries of the being and tyranny of Satan which were quite new to her; 'but,' she added, with touching emphasis, 'he is gone; and the language of the Redeemer to me now is, "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away."'

In allusion to the severity of her bodily trouble, she soon after said, 'It is well it is driving homeward.'

On the Thursday, when her medical attendant was standing by her bedside, she opened her eyes upon him, and, with deep solemnity, said: 'Dr. ——, it is a blessed thing to be able to look eternity full in the face, and feel, when about to enter it, that one is going home!' She continued: 'When —— was dying, I remember of hearing that these words, "The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth from all sin," were all she got to rest on in going into eternity. I have all the comfort of them this day.' In reply to an inquiry, addressed to her soon after, as to how she felt, she replied: 'I feel just as if I were entering into life.'

During this week—her last on earth—she expressed herself as having had much precious experience of the faithfulness of God,—remarking, that since she had come to her sick-bed, she thought that every word of God, on which she had been made to hope, had been made good to her; adding, 'I would willingly tell you how this has been done, but I am not able.' 'When you remember me,' she said again, 'bear in mind that, although I have suffered a great deal of pain, it has been made the sweetest blessing that ever was sent to me.'

On the Friday she spoke but little. Once or twice she expressed her views on passages of the word, on which her soul seemed feeding. In the evening, on being asked whether she felt some cordial refreshing which was being given her, she said: 'Oh yes; but if I were not even now getting draughts of the river of the water of life, it would be very little to me. His love is better than wine.'

Early on Saturday morning, her sister having said to her, 'I fear you are soon to be taken from us,' she replied: 'I don't feel as if I were dying at all. You know it has been my life, for some years past, to serve Jesus; and that work is not at an end, for it is written, "His servants shall serve Him." Serve you Him on earth; and if I am now going to serve Him in heaven, it will be all the better for me.' When asked by a very dear friend, as the morning advanced, whether she thought she should now be long with her friends here: 'Do you know, I am never asking myself about that. I feel it is so sweet to be in his hands, that I am quite contented, if it is to be for your comfort and that of the others, to remain here for some days yet. I don't need to depart to be with Christ; for my gracious Lord has come to be with me, and spends with me all the day. When I depart, it will only be a change of place, not of company.' At one time, when lying perfectly still, she suddenly burst into tears. On a dear friend gently inquiring what so moved her—whether it was a sense of her sin and unworthiness,—she replied, in the midst of sobs: 'It is not so much that, as the thought that He should have set his love upon such a one as me.'

In the evening she was told that her brother and sister had arrived. 'It is all very well,' she said; 'but I must go through the dark valley alone; and yet not alone, for his rod and staff they shall comfort me.'

On Sabbath she lay calm, but spoke very little,—the highly inflamed state of her mouth and throat rendering every attempt at articulation very painful. On the words being repeated to her by a friend who had called, 'In my Father's house are many mansions,' she, in broken accents, replied: 'That's not just what I am thinking of. The presence of Christ makes heaven, and I may enjoy that on this sofa.'

In the evening she suffered much from the accumulation of phlegm in her throat,—the discharge of which, from the state of her mouth and her exhausted strength, was accompanied with much pain and difficulty. On one occasion, when this was particularly the case, her sister, who stood by, looked alarmed. On observing this, she looked up tenderly in her face, and meekly said, ''Tis the voice of my Beloved; behold, He cometh!' This was the last sentence which she was enabled distinctly to utter.

And it is now only necessary that we refer for a moment to the closing scene.

On the night of Sabbath her much-valued minister called,—one who, from the time of his first appointment as her pastor, had been to her an object of the highest interest and regard, and whose intimate friendship and confidence she was, from the first, permitted in large measure to share. On her indicating a desire to know the subjects on which he had addressed his people during the day, these were mentioned, and she remarked upon them, although in a manner that rendered it impossible to ascertain her meaning. Her minister repeated part of Zech. iii.,—a passage of the divine word which had for long been to her peculiarly dear and precious,—and asked whether she remembered the portion. With much earnestness she replied: 'Do I not?'

It has already been mentioned that, from the greatly enfeebled state of her nervous system, she could not bear conversation or reading of any description in her room. The invariable result of listening even to the reading of a few verses of the word of God, was to excite violent action at the heart; and it often happened that the repeating of a single verse, even if immediately connected with the train of thought with which her mind was at the time engaged, disturbed rather than soothed her spirit. As she now seemed in no way disturbed by being spoken to, another Christian friend repeated verses of a hymn which she thought suitable to her case. The verses she expressed a wish to have again repeated; and, shortly after, signified a desire to hear others also. Indeed, from this time on Sabbath evening, till the final release of her triumphant spirit, she seemed unwilling that any interruption should occur in her hearing of the word of life, which so often solaced her soul. Passages the most fitted to sustain and strengthen her spirit were, with but the shortest intermission, repeated in her ear; and the avidity with which she relished them, as well as the support and consolation which they imparted to her soul, were shown in the imploring looks she gave when any cessation occurred in the exercise. Frequently, when such passages as those addressed in Rev. ii. and iii., 'To him that overcometh,' had been read, she would indistinctly utter, with peculiar earnestness, the words, 'Again, again!'—thus intimating her desire that the portion should again be read to her. And in this way many of the most precious and suitable of the words of Christ were several times in succession repeated. This continued till about six o'clock in the following morning (Monday, February 8, 1847), when her ransomed spirit was introduced into the unclouded presence of her Lord.

THE CURSE, THE COVENANT, THE CROSS.

OF all dreadful things, nothing is so terrible as the curse of a holy God, when realized by lost souls in eternity. To be shut out from all good, to be shut in with all evil, and that for ever and ever, without help, and without hope; how fearful even to contemplate! And what will make this doom all the more terrible is, that this heavy and eternal curse will be a righteous curse. This will be felt by those on whom it abides. The miserable soul will have nothing really to lay to the charge of God, but will feel that his awful doom is his just desert. He chose the path which led to all this misery; loved those sins which had God's curse plainly appended to them; and refused again and again to be saved from them in God's appointed way.

God has also shown in his dealings with men, occasionally even on earth, what a terrible thing his curse is; that He means all He says, and can do all that He threatens. A deluge has swept our globe, fire has fallen from heaven on wicked cities, the earth has opened its mouth, and swallowed up those who defied God. Thus men are not left in ignorance as regards God's curse; they have warnings both in words and acts; and if they will go on in sin—go on rejecting a Saviour, and meet God's curse in eternity, after all the warnings and invitations of time,—they must be left 'without excuse.'

There is nothing so blessed as God's covenant. It is a covenant of peace and grace; it is full of blessing, overflowing with the favour of God. The Lord Jesus, who is the Mediator between God and man, is also the Mediator of the everlasting covenant, 'and He will give out all blessings to those who first come to Him to be reconciled to God, and then come by Him to God.' Peace with God, the friendship of God; to have all sin forgiven and remembered no more; to have God's laws written in the heart, and for God himself to become the soul's portion, are some of the blessings of the wondrous covenant of grace.

All men deserve the curse of God; not one can merit the blessings of the covenant. How then can any of the lost family of man pass from one state to the other—from the curse to the covenant? The simple and sufficient answer is, 'BY THE CROSS.' There the curse of God was borne, as it is written: 'Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree.' On the cross, Christ, who knew no sin, was 'made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him.' On this ground, the gospel, as the ministry of reconciliation, says to God's worst enemies, 'Be ye reconciled to God.' 'He who bore sin in his own body on the tree,' now says, 'Incline your ear and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David.' What a blessed change takes place as regards those who give heed to this gracious call! Only those will do so who really believe God's testimony respecting the curse and the covenant, who see their danger, and fly to the only refuge.

Have we not often seen in the height of summer, after a long season of fine weather, a dark cloud overspread the sky, and everything betoken a heavy thunder storm? The ground around is parched, the pastures are all bare. That dark cloud contains the needed showers, but it also contains the arrowy lightning. If those arrows strike, they are fatal. Trees are riven, rocks are splintered, and man is crushed by the terrible bolt. If those showers fall, the earth will smile in beauty, and fruitfulness will soon follow. But how many, under such circumstances, look up and say, We are afraid of that bolt? There are many things round us likely to attract it. Oh for something that shall bring down the lightning harmlessly to the earth, that shall touch the clouds and make them discharge their 'showers of blessings!' Science has its lightning conductors for ships and buildings; but science is impotent to bring down rain upon the earth.

These lightnings may represent to us the curse of God; and those waters floating under the firmament set forth the blessing of his covenant. The cross can save from that curse, and bring down that blessing. Christ crucified is the averter of wrath, and the channel of blessing to all who believe in Him. But there is this point of difference between the natural figure and the spiritual fact. The lightning-rod is not shattered by becoming the conveyer of the destructive fluid; but Jesus was smitten, stricken of God, and afflicted. 'He was wounded for our transgression, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with his stripes we are healed.' Whatever of penal evil He took away from us, He had first himself to bear; and whatever of good He bestows, was at an amazing cost to himself; yea, 'He gave himself for our sins,'—gave himself even to the cross and the tomb for us. But He rises—He ascends! All things are now in his hands; all power in heaven and earth. All stores of blessings for sinners who have merited the curse. He says to such, 'Come unto me and rest. Come unto me and drink.' His blood is the seal of the everlasting covenant; his resurrection and ascension to glory the full proof that God has accepted his sacrifice; and to all who believe in Him, his cross shall be the shelter from wrath, and the fountain of blessedness. Then let the heirs of the curse hasten to the cross; trust in Him who died; trust in God as revealed in the death and resurrection of Jesus,—and they shall become heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ.

Ere long shall the voice be heard: 'It is done.' 'There shall be no more curse;' 'but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it, and his servants shall serve Him.' Who shall enter into all these blessings? Those 'who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in his temple.' J. C.

THE YOUNG MAN'S LESSON.*

IF you search the records of all history, I believe it will be found that the noble army which have fought the good fight of faith with the valour of giants, and won the most glorious victories, are not the men who have spent their early days in indolence and vice, serving divers lusts and passions, and only surrendering themselves to Christ when their mental powers were enfeebled, and their earthly course was drawing to a close. Such men, like comets, may have startled the Christian world, either by their erratic movements, or even by the blaze of sudden light which they have put forth ere passing away; and I do not deny that the conversion of a sinner in the decline of life, and the good which he has thereby been enabled to accomplish, are to be reckoned amongst the greatest miracles which it is possible for divine grace to achieve.

But I maintain, notwithstanding, that the men who, of all others, have been most eminently useful, are those who have been born from above in early life, or who, by the Holy Spirit, have been sanctified from the very womb. These I reckon to be the great magnitudes in the spiritual firmament; the lights that have been shining from the very outset of their Christian course; shining continuously, unobscured by any dark clouds, and shining onwards and onwards, with increasing lustre, till they have gone down, and passed within the veil. That, I believe, was the case with James Nisbet. He died full of years, and full of good works; and he has left behind him a noble name and a fragrant memory. But his heart was given to the service of Christ when he was very young; and all the habits by which he was distinguished were formed, not amid the decrepitude of age, but in early life. Everything in his character that was excellent or praiseworthy, had its origin in habits that were begun amid the brightness and freshness of his youth. His prayerfulness, both in the closet and the family; his rising at an early hour in the morning; his strict observance of the sanctity of the Sabbath; the regularity of his attendance on the services of the sanctuary; his distribution of tracts, and of good books; his love for the fellowship of godly men; his tender care for the widow and the fatherless; his warm and passionate love for little children; his close and faithful attention to the business of life; his exemption from the gross vices of a world lying in wickedness; his genuine and large-hearted liberality; his temperance and moderation in the use of the bounties of God's providence; and his earnest zeal for the salvation of souls, and for the extension of the church of Christ,—in all these we discover the distinctive features of his character, and the prominent movements of his everyday life. But he did not need to learn them when his business transactions were crowned with abundant success, and, obtaining a name and a place amongst the saints, he was chosen and set apart as an office-bearer in the church of Christ. The little seeds which yielded so large a harvest, were all sown in the days of his youth; and the first lessons, which have led to results that have made thousands to wonder and admire, were all carefully learned when he was little more than a mere boy.

What a lesson does this teach to the young! May the impression of it abide for ever in your hearts; and, instead of wasting your earliest days in idleness and frivolity, may you have grace given from above to learn, amid the brightness and freshness of your youth, the lessons I have been seeking to draw from the life of James Nisbet, that, emulating his holy example, and consecrating your every talent to the service of the Great Redeemer, your path through life may be like the light of the morning sun, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day; and that, when your earthly course is finished, and you go hence, the lustre of your holy example, and the memory of your righteous deeds, instead of sinking into endless oblivion, may long remain lingering with their blessed influences behind you; even as the great sun, when it passes out of sight, and the eyelids of the evening are closed, still continues to gild the gathering clouds with glory, while the dark earth and the heaving sea are made radiant with the light, all pure and undefiled, that comes down from the golden gates of heaven.

* From Lessons from the Life of the late James Nisbet. By the Rev. J. A. WALLACE. Edinburgh: Johnstone, Hunter, & Co.

WHAT THE LORD JESUS DID NOT REVEAL AND TEACH.

It has been often said that the very silence of Scripture is suggestive. May we not profitably apply this thought to the words of Jesus when He was on earth? The four Gospels are selections from what the Saviour said; but let it be observed that they are selections made by the Holy Spirit himself. No doubt they contain the substance of all that the Saviour taught. No important truth is omitted; yet, what a silence is there concerning many things which have, in all ages, caused much contention and controversy!

We will just refer to a few things, about which all must agree. There are persons who will find baptismal regeneration in John iii. 5, and others who think they see a complete system of church order in Matt. xxviii. 20; and these make Christ say things contrary to his usual teachings, or else beyond his design.

But we do not refer to such things as these. The points we mention as specimens of the silence of Christ are beyond debate.

Christ was silent respecting the sublime science of astronomy. What the stars are; whether inhabited, or to be inhabited, He never says. He ever aimed to carry his auditors far beyond the stars, up to the heaven of heavens.

He is silent as regards the origin of evil. How many have disputed on this point age after age! Christ does not utter a single sentence on this awful theme.

He is silent as regards any attempt to reconcile man's responsibility and God's sovereignty. He freely and fully preached them both, and would have us believe both, and imitate Him in loving and fearless testimony and filial submission.

These remarks are not made with a view to deter from contemplating God's works with an admiring eye, or to hinder from scientific investigations. No book encourages devout meditation on creation more than the Bible, and happy are those who study the book of nature and the volume of revelation together. We are all deeply indebted to science, and some of her best sons have been humble learners at the feet of Jesus; but, certainly, the silence of the Lord Jesus on the points referred to, and other similar ones, teaches some important lessons.

We learn how much more important things invisible are, than those which are seen. The heaven beyond the stars is much more to us than the starry heavens. It is much more desirable that we should acquaint ourselves with God's thoughts and purposes, which were before the foundation of the earth, than to know exactly how and when the foundations of the earth were laid. We should do well to learn to turn a deaf ear to the utterances of professed scientific persons, when they not only leave out Him by whom all things were made, but contradict that book which is full of Him.

How sadly does such scientific and often contradictory garrulity contrast with his silence; and how silent will such hasty impugners of revelation be when brought into his presence! Surely, too, we should learn from Jesus to be silent more frequently than we are; yea, let us even aim to realize silence in the very thoughts, when the wisdom of God declares divine doctrines and human duties.

Oh for more of the silence of adoring love, and then may come humble asking in faith. 'The meek will He guide in judgment; the meek will He teach his way.' Look, listen, learn, while the wisdom of God acts and speaks. 'Jesus called a little child unto Him, and set him in the midst of them, and said: Verily, I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever, therefore, shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven.'

Miscellaneous.

The Cracked Clergyman.—There was a farmer's wife in Ystradffin, in the county of Carmarthen, who had a sister living in the vicinity of Llangeitho. This woman came at times to see her sister; and on one of these occasions she heard some strange things respecting the clergyman of the parish—that is, Rowlands. The common saying was, that he was not right in his mind. She, however, went to hear him, and not in vain; but she said nothing then to her sister, or to anybody else, about the sermon; and she returned home to her family. The following Sabbath, behold, she came again to her sister's house, near Llangeitho. 'What,' said her sister with great surprise, 'what is the matter? Is your husband well, and are your children well?' 'Oh yes,' was the answer, 'nothing of this kind is amiss.' She asked her again, 'What is the matter then?' She replied, 'I don't well know what is the matter. Something that your cracked clergyman' (meaning Rowlands) 'said last Sabbath has brought me here to-day. It continued on my mind all the week, and never left me either day or night.' She went again to hear him; and she continued to come every Sabbath, though her road was hilly and mountainous, and her home more than twenty miles from Llangeitho. After having continued to come there about half a year, she felt a wish to ask Rowlands to come and preach at Ystradffin. She made up her mind to try what she could do; and so, after service one Sabbath, she went to Rowlands, and saluted him somewhat in this manner: 'Sir, if what you say to us is true, there are many in my neighbourhood in a most dangerous condition, going fast to eternal misery. For the sake of their souls, come over, sir, to preach to them!' The woman's request struck him with surprise; but, without a moment's hesitation, he said in his usual quick way, 'Yes, I will come if you can get the clergyman's permission.' This she obtained. Next Sabbath she went very joyfully to Llangeitho, and informed Rowlands of her success. According to promise, he went over and preached at Ystradffin; and his very first sermon there was wonderfully blessed. Not less than thirty persons were, it is said, on that occasion converted. —Owen's Life of Rowlands.

Looking Upward.—Pray frequently, and wait quietly, and the Lord will make your way plain. Jesus trains up all his servants to waiting; and if you are called to the ministry, He will exercise your soul beforehand with sharp conflicts. Joseph must be cast first into a pit by his own brethren, then into a prison by his master, before he rules the kingdom; and David must be hunted as a flea upon the mountains before he gets the sceptre. How can you tell what others feel, unless you have felt the same yourself? How can you sympathize with a prisoner, unless your own feet have been fast in the stocks? How can you comfort those who are cast down, unless you have been often at your wit's end? Expect nothing but conflicts, day after day, to humble and prove you, and teach you to speak a word in season to every one that is weary. This is, indeed, the high road to the kingdom for all; yet a minister's path is not only narrow and stony, like others', but covered also with bushes and brakes; and if you labour to remove them by your own hands, they will quickly tear your flesh, and fill your fingers with thorns. Let your Master remove them at your request; and remember it is always his work, as it is ever his delight, to clear our way and lead us on, till sin and death are trodden down. Undertake nothing without first seeking direction from the Lord; and when anything offers that is plausible and inviting, beg of God to disappoint you, if it be not according to his mind. You cannot safely rely on your own judgment, after God has told you, 'He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool.' This advice relates to all important changes in life. Go nowhere, settle nowhere, marry nowhere, without frequent usage of this prayer.—Berridge.

Christmas Evans' Poverty.—It may not be generally known that Christmas Evans, during a large part of his pastorate in Anglesea, received for all his labours only seventeen pounds per annum. During the later years it rose to thirty pounds—a miserable support for a man who gave himself up with such singleness of heart to the work of the ministry. His biographer, himself a Welshman, says: 'It must be numbered among the anomalies of Welsh religious life, that it combines an insatiable appetite for sermons with a marvellous disregard for the temporal comfort of the preacher.' It is a pity that this anomaly is not peculiar to Welsh religious life. It too often characterizes American religious life also. On one occasion a woman said to Mr. Evans, as he came out of the pulpit: 'Well, Christmas Evans, bach, I hope you will be paid at the resurrection; you have given us a wonderful sermon.' 'Yes, yes, Shan, fach,' was his quick reply, 'no doubt of that; but what am I to do till I get there? And there is the old white mare that carries me; what will she do? for her there will be no resurrection.' This was a richly merited rebuke of a sanctimonious niggardliness. We trust that it was not without some effect. But he might have said more, and with great justice. He might have added: 'Yes, yes, I know that for my labours and sacrifices I shall be paid there. But what will you do? What pay will you receive then for your stinginess now?' That is the practical question which should come home to the hearts of all who combine an appetite for the labours of the servant of God with a marvellous disregard for his temporal wants and comforts. There are two ways in which congregations sometimes display this niggardliness. (1.) In their shabby contributions to their minister during the days of his activity. They take all they can get from him, and give as little as possible in return. (2.) In their miserable provision for him in the days of his infirmity and old age. An 'infirm ministers' fund' claims generous support from Christian men; nor can anything be more heartless than the pittance on which he is often left to starve. The pretext of leaving him to be repaid at the resurrection, as in the case of Evans, is a barefaced hypocrisy, which must be utterly abominable to God.

To a Young Minister.—Count the cost, and give thyself wholly to thy work. One calling is enough for such a war; and half a minister is almost worse than none, for the devoted half is never but little better than a quarter.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'Go in and possess the land.'—DEUT. x. 11.

ISRAEL passed through many changes in their history; but here we have its termination or culmination—the possession of the land. They were bondsmen, wanderers, outsiders, borderers; but they were not to remain such; they were to possess the land. Here their earthly history, which began with Abraham, comes to a point. Let us learn from this something as to ourselves and our history.

1. We are not to be without a land.—We are to have a country and a city. When in the world, we have these in a certain way, but they are all carnal; they pass from us, and we from them. The world's cities and possessions will not do for us. They will not fill us, nor satisfy us, nor abide with us. Hence, even when in the world, we are truly strangers; landless, cityless, homeless. And after we have left the world, we are strangers, though not as before; for now a land, a city, and a home have been secured to us. Sinners, God offers you the better Canaan as compensation for this present evil world!

2. We are not to be dwellers in Egypt.—The house of bondage is not for us. Pharaoh cannot be our king. We must, like Moses, refuse to be called the sons of Pharaoh's daughter. We must go out, not fearing the wrath of the king; counting the reproach of Christ greater riches than Egypt's treasures. Egypt may do for an Egyptian, but not for an Israelite, a son of Abraham.

3. We are not to be dwellers in a barren land.—The wilderness may do for a day, but not for a permanent abode. Ishmael may have the desert, Israel must have the good land—the land flowing with milk and honey. Esau may have Seir, Israel must have Jerusalem.

4. We are not to be borderers.—To be out of Egypt is one step, to come up to the borders of Canaan is another; but that is not to be all. We are not outsiders, never crossing the boundary; or borderers, belonging to neither region, ever crossing and recrossing the line, as if we had no wish to stay, or no portion in the land. The border-lands are not for the church, or for any one calling himself a Christian—an Israelite indeed.

5. We are to go in and possess.—Out of Egypt, out of the wilderness, across the borders,—into the very heart of the land—Judah's hills, Ephraim's vales, Issachar's plains, Manasseh's pastures, Naphtali's lakes and fertile reaches. We go in and take possession, leaving all other lands and regions behind. It is the God-chosen, God-given land; let us possess it. It is rich, goodly, well-watered; let us possess it. Not merely let us survey it, or pitch our tents in it; but build our habitations there, to dwell in it for ever.

What I gather specially from our text is, that we are not to be borderers; not merely not Egyptians, nor Ishmaelites, but not borderers. The place to which God invites us is the land, the kingdom, the city. Just now, of course, it is but the promise, for the kingdom has not yet come. But I speak of the promise as if it were the thing itself, for the promise is God's, not man's.

There are many borderers in our day; half-and-half Christians; afraid of being too decidedly or intensely religious. They are not Egyptians; they are not, perhaps, quite outsiders, for they occasionally seem to cross the line, and take a look of the land from some of its southern hills. But they are borderers. They have not decidedly taken up their abode in the land; they have not entered in nor possessed it. They are hoverers, vacillators, worshippers of two Gods,—trying to secure two kingdoms, and to lay up two kinds of treasures. Let me speak of and to these. Why should you be borderers?

1. It is sin.—It is not your misfortune merely, it is your guilt. That half-heartedness and indecision is about the most sinful condition you can be in. Borderer, you are a sinner; a sinner because a borderer! You are a despiser of the pleasant land and of the glorious city; nay, a despiser of the King of that land and city.

2. It is misery.—You cannot be happy in that half-and-half state. You don't know what you are, nor whose you are, nor whither you are going. You are sure of nothing good—only of evil. Were you dying in that state—were you cut off on the borders—you are lost; and does not that make you truly wretched? Your border-ways may save you some outward trouble or reproach, but they make you an unhappy man.

3. It is danger.—You think, perhaps, that because you have gone a little way, that all is well, or at least that you are out of danger. No; the danger is as great as ever. Were you to die on the borders,—only almost a Christian,—you are as sure of hell as if you had died in Egypt. Do not suppose that to be half-way to heaven is to be but half-way to hell; it is to be whole-way to hell.

4. God abhors it.—It is abomination to God. It is an insult to Him. It says that you do not care for Him or his goodly land. That half-heartedness is abominable to God. It is like Laodicea, or perhaps worse. Borderer, beware of thus provoking and insulting God!

5. It is loss to yourself.—Even just now, how much you lose! You might be so happy! If decided and sure, you might have such peace! And then the prospect of such a land! What a loss! Yes, your own interests, as well as God's honour, demand decision. It is such a goodly, glorious land! It is so foolish and so cowardly to hold back! Oh, decide! Be a borderer no more. Enter in and possess the land at once. Love not the world. It will do nothing for you. It will only mock you, and land you in eternal woe. You may try to enjoy its pleasures now, but they pass away. There are no sin-haunts, no lust-chambers, no theatres, no ball-rooms, no revellings, no voluptuous music, no ungodly mirth, either in heaven or in hell. If you lose Canaan and Jerusalem, you lose everything, and you gain nothing. Tarry not on the frontiers. Cross over. Enter in. Press on to Jerusalem.

THE RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

(Continued from p. 326.)

V. THE fifth thing which the apostle affirms respecting this righteousness is, that it is a righteousness which is by the faith of Jesus Christ: 'Even the righteousness of God, which is by the faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference.' He means to say by this expression, that it is a righteousness which comes to us by believing in Jesus Christ. It is not our faith that is our righteousness; it is not our act of believing that justifies. If your faith were your righteousness, then faith would be just reduced to the level of all other works, and would be itself a work. If it were our faith, our act of faith, that justified, then should we be justified by our own acts, by our own deeds. The expression, then, 'the righteousness of God, which is by faith of Jesus Christ,' means simply this—it is a righteousness which passes over to us and becomes available for us by believing in Him whose righteousness it is; that is, by believing the Father's testimony concerning Jesus Christ. It is by believing that we are identified with Him, so that his doing becomes our doing in the eye of God, and in the eye of the law; his suffering becomes our suffering; his fulfilling of the law becomes our fulfilling of the law; his obedience to the Father's will is our obedience to the Father's will. Such is the position into which we are brought by being made, in believing, one with Him. Thus 'the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ,' is presented to us, that in believing on Him, He might become ours. Righteousness is here laid down at our feet. It is there, whether we receive it or not. It is there, whether we believe it or not; whether we reject it or receive it. Your receiving it does not create it; your receiving it does not complete it; it is all created, it is all completed, it is all free, it is all at our feet, whether we take it or thrust it away; and our condemnation hereafter, if we be lost, will be not that there was no righteousness, not that we refused to complete the righteousness which had begun, but that we rejected the righteousness which was completed, and which was so presented to us by God himself. It is in believing, or, as the apostle expresses it, by faith in Jesus Christ, that this righteousness with all its privileges, and with all its results, passes over to us. For in believing, what are we saying but just this: 'I have no works to bring to God; I am a sinner, but I take this work of the Son of God, and I ask to be dealt with by God according to its value, and just as if I had done the work, and not He.' Or, it is just as if we were saying, 'I have no righteousness, seeing I am wholly a sinner; but I take this righteousness of the Son of God, and I draw near, expecting to be treated by God, just as if I and not He were the righteous person. I cannot present any suffering to Him in payment of penalty; but I take this suffering of the Son of God, and I claim to have it reckoned to me as payment of my penalty.' Thus it is, 'Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.'

VI. The sixth thing which the apostle affirms regarding this righteousness is, that it is a righteousness for the unrighteous. It 'is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference: for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God.' It is righteousness for the unrighteous. It is not righteousness for the good, but for the evil. It is not righteousness for the worthy, but for the unworthy. It is our unrighteousness that fits us for this righteousness. It is the evil that is in us that fits us for the excellency that is found in it. How foolish, then, to say as men, when convinced of sin, or when going back into former iniquity, are sometimes found saying, 'I am too great a sinner to be forgiven.' Why, if you were not such a sinner, you would not need such a righteousness. It is the extent of your unrighteousness that is the very thing that fits you for a righteousness so infinite, so divine. If the righteousness were not the righteousness of God, if it were a human and not a divine righteousness, if finite and not infinite, your fear would be natural; but seeing it is divine not human, infinite not finite, can anything be more foolish, more presumptuous, more profane, than to say, 'My unrighteousness is too great for the righteousness of the Son of God?' This righteousness for the unrighteous is said by the apostle to be 'unto all.' It is a righteousness which is like the sun in the heavens. It is one sun; yet it is enough for every one, it is free to every one. God works out a righteousness, and then sets it down on this fallen earth, that every one may avail himself of it. We are, therefore, not to say, Is this righteousness provided for this one or for that one, for many or for few? but there it is, there is the righteousness, go and take it. That is the gospel. Looking at the natural sun, do you ever think of asking, Is it for me, for this man or for that, the many or the few? you open your eye and enjoy its beams without asking any questions. Your making such inquiries would indicate a very unhealthy state of body; and so your asking such questions regarding God's intention as proposed in this righteousness, indicates an unhealthy state of mind. To every sinner here, we preach the good news of this righteousness; a righteousness not only suitable and sufficient, but glorious and free—righteousness for the unrighteous—righteousness for the most unrighteous of the children of men. 'It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which is lost; for the whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.'

But then, again, it is a righteousness which is 'upon all them that believe.' It is 'unto all;' but it is only 'upon' them that believe. The moment that we believe through grace, we are accepted in the beloved—redeemed from condemnation and from wrath. Till then the wrath of God abideth upon us. It is in believing that this righteousness is put upon us; and in believing—what? In believing what God has testified concerning this righteousness, and concerning Him whose righteousness it is.

But again, the apostle affirms regarding this righteousness for the unrighteous, that 'there is no difference, for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God.' There is no difference as to its fitness for the sinner, whatever his sin may be; and there is no difference as to the fitness of the sinner for the righteousness. There is this twofold fitness: the fitness of the righteousness for the sinner, and the fitness of the sinner for the righteousness. 'There is no difference;' there is no one man more fit than another—all are equally fit or equally unfit, equally qualified or equally unqualified, for 'all have sinned;' and it is this that brings down all to the same level, and down to this level it is that the righteousness comes. For it is not a righteousness which has only come down to a certain level,—which has lighted upon earth, but only upon some of its highest peaks; it is a righteousness which has come down to the very lowest valleys, a righteousness which may be found out without climbing, and even beside our very dwellings. No one then can say, 'I deserve it, therefore it is for me;' and no one, on the other hand, can say, 'I do not deserve it, therefore it is not for me.' There is no difference, for 'all have sinned and come short of the glory of God.' Thus it suits the case of all; so that no one can put it away and say, 'It does not suit my case, but it may suit others.' Nay, friend, if you are not an unrighteous man it will not suit you, I grant; but if you are an unrighteous man, it must suit you. There is no question as to the kind of your unrighteousness, the length of time, the amount, or degree—there is no question about that, the simple question is, Are you an unrighteous man? Then it suits your case. And it is a righteousness near to each one of you; it is not afar off: it is not in heaven above, so that you have to climb to the seat of God to obtain it; and it is not down so low that you must dig to earth's centre to find it: it is near, it is at your very side; and if you reject it, it cannot be because of its distance. God has brought it near. He tells you it is near. 'I bring near my righteousness.' God says that; and who are you that you should say, It is far off? Nay, more, it is free—'Without money and without price.' There is no payment asked; no payment can be taken. The very idea of payment is insulting to the righteousness, and insulting to Him whose righteousness it is. Yet many seek to buy it,—not by their gold and silver; some would buy it by their penances and fastings, some by their confessions; some would buy it by their repentance, some by their prayers, some by their self-mortification and privations. In these ways do men who profess to believe the gospel seek to buy that which cannot be bought—to buy that which is free. And this righteousness, so suitable, so near, so free, we proclaim to each one of you now, that those of you who do know it may understand and realize more fully the acceptance with God into which that righteousness has introduced you, and that those of you who know it not may receive it and be blessed. It is righteousness for the unrighteous we proclaim to you, the very righteousness of God, a righteousness which has come down from heaven to earth on very purpose that it may be presented to you and pressed home on you. It is God's wish that you should take it. Do you refuse it? He hinders not. Where then lies the hindrance? In you, not in Him. The refusal, my brother, will not be on his part, it must be on yours; and if you perish, you perish not because He would not be reconciled to you, but because you would not be reconciled to Him; not because there was not a provided righteousness, but because you rejected it; not because there was not sufficient love in God to give you that righteousness, but because you wilfully put away from you both the righteousness and the love.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA.

No. VII.

FRAGMENTS.

'Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.'—John iv. 12.

IS it not very wonderful, or, as I should rather say, is it not very blessed, the way in which God the Holy Spirit—He whose office it is to guide us into all truth, and to take of the things of Jesus, and show them unto us (John xvi. 13, 15)—brings a passage or a verse of Scripture to our remembrance, at times when any human teaching would be utterly impossible, and when we may be altogether incapable of using our own powers of memory?

Can we not all recollect such times, when, with the freshness and the vividness of a message direct from heaven, a verse has, as it were, been given to us,—the very verse in the whole Bible that most exactly suited our need,—though not at all, perhaps, the one we would have selected as suitable, had it not been interpreted for us by the Spirit, in a way, and with a power, that not only makes it fresh as if we had never known, or heard, or read it before, but also makes it seem ever after to be especially and peculiarly our own?

The verse that I have chosen as the motto for this paper was once thus given to a lady, and it has since then been so associated with her in my mind, that I never meet the passage without recollecting the circumstance. She was very ill, indeed seriously so, and her head was so much affected that thought was impossible; almost intolerable thirst sorely aggravated the other symptoms, and brought the sufferings of our blessed Saviour on the cross very vividly before her.

He not only suffered far greater thirst for her; but, great as that suffering was, it was as nothing compared with the anguish of his soul, as He hung there on the accursed tree, and endured all the punishment her sins deserved, even to the hiding of his Father's face, that in her hours of suffering, He might lift up the light of his countenance upon her, and give her peace—the full, deep peace she now enjoyed.

The sense of his marvellous love, in thus suffering for her, was almost overwhelming, as one feature of it after another was revealed to her by the Holy Spirit. She could not understand how it was done. She said afterwards that it was not as if she thought about it, but as if the love was brought before her like a picture, so that she could see it with her heart.

Most fervently did she long that she could do even a very little for Him, who had done all things for her. But what could she do,—a great invalid, with so much of life already passed, and her powers of service so feeble and so few? Then it was that these words were brought to her remembrance: 'Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.' And very full was the comfort they brought to her heart. True it was, she had nothing but fragments to gather. But Jesus would accept them—nay, more, He wanted them; how blessed, then, it would be to gather them for Him! The almost impatient desire to go quickly to her heavenly home was taken from her; and she felt as if life had become so precious, that it would no longer seem hard to live on, as long as it pleased God, if only she was given grace to obey her Saviour's command, and gather up the fragments that remained, that nothing be lost.

Are we—any of us—I wonder, watchful as we ought to be of our 'fragments,'—careful, as we ought to be, to gather them up? Fragments we certainly all have, whatever may be our position or our circumstances. Fragments of life, fragments of health, fragments of intellect, fragments of time, of influence, of opportunities, of money. Have any of us ever proved to the uttermost, what Dr. Chalmers used to call 'the power of littles?' And, surely, the very fact of our only having fragments, if such is the case, so far from disheartening us, should only make us the more carefully watch that not the smallest particle be lost. The loaf of bread that would not be missed in the castle of the rich, might make all the difference between hunger and plenty in the cottage of the poor.

'What if the little rain should plead,
So small a drop as I
Can ne'er refresh the thirsty mead;
I'll tarry in the sky!

What if the shining beam of noon
Should in its fountain stay,
Because its feeble light alone
Cannot create a day!

Does not each rain-drop help to form
The cool refreshing shower?
And every ray of light to warm
And beautify the flower?'

As I write, my thoughts turn involuntarily to one who certainly did, in no ordinary degree, gather up the tiny fragments that remained to her, and use them to her Saviour's glory.

She had been suddenly stricken with paralysis; for a time the power of speech was entirely withdrawn from her, and afterwards only so far restored, as that sometimes, with great difficulty, she could make those around her understand her wishes. In the beginning of her illness, the chintz valances had been taken off her bed. One day she pointed to the place where they had been laid, making a sign that she wanted something out of it. One thing after another was shown to her; but she shook her head to each. At last, pointing to the side of the bed, she said 'Valance.' It was brought to her, and, taking it in her feeble fingers, she was able to make it understood that she wished it to be made into frocks for the children of an infant ragged school, in which she was deeply interested, and for which she had been working but a few hours before she had taken ill.

Was not that fragment, gathered up so carefully, more precious to the Lord Jesus than £50 given without an effort would have been?

'Be sure you meet me in heaven,' said a dying mother to her only son. They were the last words she ever spoke. God brought them home with power to his heart. He felt that he must be changed indeed, or he could not meet her there; and he sought his Saviour and found Him. Thus that little 'fragment' of speech was 'gathered up,' and then blessed by God to the saving of a soul.

Many years ago, there lived in one of the southern states of America an emancipated slave, who had been brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and longed very earnestly that others should share her joy. But what could she do, a poor, despised old woman? Had she any fragments to gather up from the banquet to which the King had brought her? (Song ii. 4.) We shall see.

She lived near one of the gates of the town, through which large gangs of slaves used to pass every morning and evening, on their way to and from their work. Could she not persuade some of them to listen to her, as she told them of Him who has said, 'Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest?' (Matt. ix. 28.) She would try at all events. So she bought a little wooden stool, and every morning and evening she took up her position close to the gate, before the hour when the slaves used to pass. Then she would anxiously watch, and when she saw any of them look very sad, or weary, she would tenderly ask them to rest a little on her stool. Often and gladly was the offer accepted; and then in simple words, but with all the earnestness of one who knew that there was none other name under heaven given amongst men whereby they might be saved (Acts iv. 12), she would tell them of a Saviour's love, and that in his precious blood all their sins might be washed away.

Some only laughed, and some mocked; but some listened. And in the great harvest day, that poor woman 'shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing her sheaves with her' (Ps. cxxvi. 6).

To invalids, especially, I think the thought that the Lord Jesus not only accepts the fragments they gather up for Him, but actually wants them, must be most comforting and encouraging; for they rarely have anything but fragments that they can gather. But surely they need not fear that He who commanded the fragments of bread, left after He had miraculously fed the five thousand, to be gathered up, will despise the fragments of time, or thought, or health, which may be all his suffering children can use for Him.

The earnest wish, that comes from the depths of a loving heart, spoken to one whom we long to see 'following fully,' may be listened to, where a long talk would not be tolerated. The simple story of a Saviour's love, told to the little child who comes to see you, may sink down into that young heart, and bear fruit unto life everlasting. Instead of fruitlessly mourning that, on your sick-bed, or in your invalid life, you can do so little, thank God for being permitted to do anything. Love does not measure service by the actual intrinsic value of that service, but by the motive from which it springs, and the feeling by which you are actuated in performing it. To those who are faithful in a few things, the blessed words are spoken: 'Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord' (Matt. xxv. 21).

It is quite true that, in one sense, the Lord Jesus does not want your fragments. He could do all He wants without them. But in another sense He does want them—want them all—want the very least of them; and He would be grieved if you withheld or wasted them.

'Mother,' said little Caroline one morning, as she saw her mother take out her work-basket, and sit down to work; 'Mother, may I hem that handkerchief for you? I should like so much to help you.'

Her mother hesitated for a moment. Caroline could not work very well, and she could do it herself in half an hour; but then she was glad her little daughter wished to help her, and she would learn to work better by degrees, so she said, 'Thank you, darling, I should like your help very much; but I want the handkerchief to be finished at once. I think it would take you fully two hours to hem it, and I am afraid you would be tired. Would you not rather run and play in the garden with Charlie and Ernest?'

'Oh no, mother,' answered the little maiden, 'I am sure I shall not be tired; and I shall be much happier helping you than playing in the garden. You will watch how I do my work; and if you just talk a little to me now and then, I shall not mind how long I have to sit quiet.'

Very happy were both mother and child that morning, as they sat in the window at their work,—the mother rejoicing in her child's love and self-denial; and the child rejoicing in her mother's approbation, and the thought that she was helping her. Patiently and carefully did she hem the handkerchief; and though not as well done as her mother could have done it, that mother valued it infinitely more. When her father came home in the evening, the handkerchief was shown to him, and his tender kiss and loving words were the crowning joy of that day's happiness.

And need you fear that the Lord Jesus will value less than a mother his children's efforts to serve Him, and to help his work, however feebly and imperfectly they may be able to do.

so? Remember, too, that a fragment will often answer a purpose, when a larger thing would be useless.

I have often watched a mason building the wall of a house, and almost trembled lest he should be hurt by the large, heavy stones that he so carefully laid in their places. But see—he stops for a moment as he is going to raise another. No, it will not do, it would not fit into that corner; so he looks at the heap of small stones or fragments that lie at his feet, ready for use, and quickly selecting one which his practised eye tells him is the right size, he places it in the vacant corner, puts the cement over it, and then lays down the large stone, which is now exactly what he wants, but which could quite as little have supplied the place of the small stone, as the small stone could have supplied the place of it.

Will you not then gladly and gratefully gather up your fragments, and lay them at the feet of Him who wants, and asks for, and values your help in building up that temple, of which his people are the 'lively stones?' (1 Pet. ii. 5.) Silently and noiselessly, as for the temple of old (1 Kings vi. 7), are those stones being hewn out, polished, prepared. From the north and from the south, from the east and from the west, they are being gathered. How soon the great Master Builder may bring forth the head stone with shoutings, we know not (Zech. iv. 7); but when He does, there will not be any further opportunity left for us to gather up our fragments, and thus add to the size or the beauty of the building. Oh, may God grant that neither you who read, nor I who write this paper, may fail to obey the command, and thus lose the blessed joy of being workers together with Him, in the building of that temple which shall last throughout an endless eternity!

THE MOTHER'S JEWELS.

THE dreamy night draws nigh;
Soft airs delicious breathe of mingled flowers,
And on the wings of slumber creep the hours;
The moon is high.
See yonder tiny cot,
The lattice decked with vines; a tremulous ray
Strolls out to where the silver moonbeams lay,
Yet pales them not!

Within, two holy eyes,
Two little hands clasped softly, and a brow
Where thought sits busy, weaving garlands now
Of joys and sights
For the swift coming years.
Two rosy lips with innocent worship part:
List! be thou saint or sceptic, if thou art,
Thou must have ears:
'Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take.'

Doth it not noiseless ope
The very floodgates of thy heart, and make
A better man of thee, for her sweet sake,
Who, with strong hope,
Her sweet task ne'er forgot
To whisper, 'Now I lay me,' o'er and o'er?
As thou dost kneel upon the sanded floor,—
Forget them not!

From many a festive hall,
Where flashing light and flushing glances vie,
And, robed in splendour, mirth makes revelry—
Soft voices call
On the light-hearted throngs
To sweep the harp-strings, and to join the dance.
The careless girl starts lightly, as perchance,
Amid the songs,
The merry laugh, the jest,
Come to her vision songs of long ago,
When, by her downy couch, she murmured low,
Before her rest,
That single infant prayer.

Once more at home, she lays her jewels by,
Throws back the curls that shade her heavy eye,
And kneeling there,
With quivering lip and sigh,
Takes from her finger white the sparkling rings,
The golden coronet from her brow, and flings
The baubles by;
Nor doth she thoughtless dare
To seek her rest, till she hath asked of Heaven
That all her sins, through Christ, may be forgiven.
Then comes the prayer:
'Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take.'

The warrior on the battlefield,
After the battle—pillowing his head,
Perhaps, upon a fallen comrade dead—
Scorns not to yield
To the sweet memories of his childhood's hour,
When fame was bartered for a crimson flower.
The statesman grey,
His massive brow all hung with laurel leaves,
Forgets his honours while his memory weaves
A picture of that home, 'mid woods and streams,
Where hoary mountains caught the sun's first beams;
A cabin rude—the wide fields glistening,
The cattle yoked, and mutely listening;
The farmer's toil, the farmer's face, and, best
Of earthly luxuries, the farmer's rest.
But hark! a soft voice steals upon his heart:
'Now say your prayer, my son, before we part;'
And clasping his great hands—a child once more—
Upon his breast, forgetting life's long war,
Thus hear him pray:
'Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take.'

—Anon.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

LINKS.

Words by HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. Music from SPOHR.

With tenderness. Met. 80 = ♩

TREBLE.
Are there not voi - ces strange - ly sweet, And tones of ALTO.
TENOR.
Are there not voi - ces strange - ly sweet, And tones of BASS.
ACCOMP.
mu - sic strange - ly dear; So lov - ing - ly the mu - sic strange - ly dear; So lov - ing - ly the

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

We know not why they strike so deep,
We cannot tell the secret spring
Within us, which they wake from sleep,
Nor how such thoughts their notes can bring.

We ask not why nor how they thrill
So keenly through the inmost soul;
And why, when ceas'd, we listen still,
As though they yet upon us stole.

We feel the sweetness of the voice;
We love the richness of the tone;
It makes us sorrow or rejoice,
Compelling us its power to own.

Are there not words, too, strangely sweet,
Thoughts, musings, mem'ries, strangely dear?
So lovingly the soul they greet,
So gently steal they on the ear.

Common the words may be and weak,
The passing stranger owns them not;
To other ears in vain they speak,
Unknown, unrelish'd, or forgot.

Rich in old thoughts, these words appear,
Part of our being's mighty whole;
Link'd with our life's strange story here,
Knit to each feeling of our soul.

Link'd with the scenes of days gone past,
With all life's earnest hopes and fears;
Link'd with the smiles that did not last,
The joys and griefs of faded years.

Link'd with old dreams once dreamt in youth,
When dreams were gladder, truer things;
When each night's vision of bright truth,
Lent to each bouyant day its wings.

Link'd with the whisper of the trees,
When summer-eves were fair and still;
Set to the music of the breeze,
Or murmur of the twilight rill.

Link'd with some scene of sacred calm,
Of holy places, holy days;
Link'd with the prayer, the hymn, the psalm,
The multitude's glad voice of praise.

Link'd with the names of holy men,
Martyr, or saint, or brother dear;
Some parted, ne'er to meet again,
Some still our fellow-pilgrims here.

Link'd with that name of names, the name
Of Him who bought us with his blood;
Who bore for us the wrath and shame,
The Virgin's Son, the Christ of God.

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER I.

THE Harleys of Chelsea Place resided in the centre of a dull, sombre-looking row of brick houses. There was a large, heavy freestone portico over the door, which was gained by going up three broad steps, and on the greeny-black door was a lion's head of brass, with a great ring in his mouth for a knocker. Indeed, the lion's head was the only bright thing visible on the outside of 6, Chelsea Place. When the front door was opened, you stepped into the hall upon a pavement of black and white diamonds in marble, and exactly opposite you was a wide oak staircase, with a handsome painted glass window at the top of the first flight of stairs. There were carved oak chairs in the hall, and two marble slabs, and red baize doors, and everything very beautiful and grand; but such a stillness seemed to pervade the house, that you almost fancied it was as dull within as without. Such was not, however, the case really. True, the lower part of the house was kept perfectly quiet, because Mr. Harley was an invalid, and was annoyed at the least bustle or noise; but if you went up the stairs to the third story, and unfastened a wooden gate, across an archway to your right, you became conscious of little people being in the vicinity; and if you had, unobserved, thrown open the middle of the three doors facing you, you would scarcely have been able to hear your own voice for the din and chattering of the inmates of that room. We will now beg our readers to enter it (the day nursery) with us, on the fine spring afternoon when our tale first commences, and as they do, their ears will be assailed with—

'You naughty, bad, wicked, cruel boy! Oh! you are so bad! I won't love you any more. My dolly! my poor dolly!' and, as she spoke, little Dora Harley made a dart at a big boy of about twelve, and snatching her doll from him with one hand, administered to him a not very gentle cuff with the other.

'Did she love her dolly? A big baby,' sneered the boy in a most tantalizing manner. 'Did her baby suffer from bad eyes, and have to undergo an operation by Dr. Thomas Harley? Poor little thing!'

''Twas you did it!' shricked Dora, making another dart at Tom, who, by a dip and a bend, eluded her.

'Oh! fie for shame, Miss Dora!' interposed the nurse, coming up to the disputants. 'Aren't you ashamed to be fighting your cousin, Master Tom?'

'He pushed one of my dolly's eyes in,' sobbed Dora, hugging her dolly as she replied.

'I was only operating on her, nurse. Didn't you ever notice that Miss Felicia Ajestina had a bad eye?' he inquired.

'None of your nonsense, Master Tom. And don't you let me catch you teasing Miss Dora; nor you fighting again,' said the nurse, shaking her finger at the little girl, 'or I tell Mrs. Harley of you the first time she comes up.'

Dora made no further reply, for her heart was too full, and, turning her face to the wall, she sat down on the floor and wept over her mutilated doll. Presently Johnny—another of her cousins—a little fellow about six years old, crept up to her, and putting his arms round her neck, said:

'Poor Dora! poor dolly! Don't cry, Dora dear!'

Dora dropped the doll upon her lap, and drawing Johnny down by her side, whispered, as she gulped down a great sob:

'Oh Johnny, I was so angry, and I struck Tom! I did, indeed I did. I was so wicked. Oh dear! oh dear!'

'But you did not hurt him, Dora?'

'No, Johnny, I don't think I did; but I wanted to do it. I could have killed him when I saw him push my dear dolly's eye in. It was so cruel; but that ought not to have made me wicked.'

'But you are not wicked, Dora. No, you are not wicked,' said little Johnny, nestling up against Dora, ready to cry.

'Yes I am, Johnny. I am vexed for dolly; and I am angry with Tom now; and I was dreadful angry just now, that I was;' and the tears gushed anew from Dora's eyes.

'Don't cry, Dora; please don't cry,' pleaded Johnny, wiping away her tears with a corner of his pinafore, whilst his own trickled fast down his cheeks.

'I ought to cry; I ought to be real sorry, Johnny, for I am a very naughty girl. What would mamma say! Oh! mamma, mamma, why did God take you away from Dora?'

'Hush, Dora dear! Auntie is up with the beautiful angels, and we will go to her some day, that we will—won't we?'

'Not if I get angry and naughty, Johnny. Oh dolly! and, oh Tom! I am so sorry;' and Dora took up her dolly from off her lap, and putting her in Johnny's arms, said, 'Please hold her a bit, Johnny. I must do what mamma told me, when I had done wrong to anybody.'

'What was that, Dora?'

'Ask them to forgive me,' replied Dora, as she got up off the floor, and crossed the room to where Tom was sitting making a boat by one of the windows.

'Tom,' she said, putting her hand timidly on his shoulder.

'Well, what is it, Miss Cry Baby?' asked Tom, without looking up from his work.

'I am very sorry.'

'Sorry for what?' inquired Tom. 'For Felicia Ajestina's fatal operation?'

'Yes—very, and for being naughty, and striking you,' stammered Dora. 'Please to forgive me this once, dear Tom,' she would have said; but Tom had dropped his boat before she could finish her petition, exclaiming, as he caught her in his arms:

'Why, Dora, 'tis you that have got to forgive me, not I you. Why, I plague you half out of your life.'

'Yes, Tom; but I oughtn't to be angry wicked with you.'

'Angry wicked!' cried Tom, laughing. 'What's that, little cousin?'

'Trying to hurt you, because you hurt my dolly,' sobbed Dora.

'There, don't cry any more, Dora. If you forgive me I'll forgive you, and we will cry quits—won't we?'

'Yes, if you please, Tom,' replied Dora, holding up her lips for the kiss of peace.

Tom kissed her and called her a silly little thing, though, to tell the truth, he felt very much ashamed of himself for having vexed her; and as he resumed his boat-making, he inwardly determined to try and not do so again. Dora returned to Johnny somewhat comforted; and taking her doll, began to think what she could invent to hide her dolly's disfigurement.

Dora Harley was the orphan child of Mr. Harley's youngest brother. She was quite an infant when her father died; and when she was only seven years old, her mother died also. Her Uncle James was her sole guardian; and she had been living with him ever since her mother's death, which took place a little more than a year before our story commences. No one could be kinder and more considerate than her aunt and uncle were to their orphan charge; and she shared with their own children in their affection; indeed, none would have known that she was not their own child, from their manner to her. She was a great favourite with all her cousins, not omitting Tom, who, though he never lost an opportunity of teasing her, nevertheless loved her with all his heart. Besides Tom and Johnny, who have already been introduced to our readers, there were Constance, Agnes, and Guy Harley. Constance was about a year younger than Tom, and Agnes and Guy came next to Johnny, Guy being but two years old. Constance and Tom went to schools in the neighbourhood; but Dora and Johnny received lessons from a lady who came daily to them for that purpose. Constance had accompanied her mamma somewhere on the afternoon of Dora's and Tom's fracas, and had consequently missed witnessing Miss Dolly's misadventure.

That night, when Dora knelt beside her little bed, she prayed God to forgive her for having shown such naughty temper towards her cousin Tom, and, in child's language, told her heavenly Father that Tom had forgiven her, and she hoped He would forgive her also, for Jesus Christ's sake; and when she lay down upon her bed, she called to Johnny, who slept in a tiny cot in a little inner room, that she was very happy, for she had told God everything, and she knew that He had heard her.

Long after Dora was fast asleep, the nurse and Tom stole softly into her room to look for her doll, which they had vainly searched for in the day nursery. Tom's heart had smitten him ever since she had made peace with him; and he was anxious to see if, by any possibility, he could replace the eye which he had so mischievously pushed into the doll's head, by taking off the head, and, with a pair of pincers, refixing it. But no doll was to be found, until nurse gently moved back the bed-clothes, when, fast folded in Dora's arms, they discovered her dear damaged pet. Dora's eyelashes were still wet with tears; and Tom felt more ashamed of himself than before, when he remembered he had caused them.

'She is a precious darling, Master Tom,' observed the nurse, as she left the room; 'and I do hope you won't tease her any more. If she is a big girl to love a doll so, you ought to recollect she hasn't got anything else, like you've got, to love; and her own dear mamma dressed and gave it to her, poor little thing!'

The next morning Tom was up as soon as Dora; and, by dint of great persuasion, the doll was at last entrusted to him. He found no difficulty in taking off the head; but the refastening the eye was quite a different matter; and it was not until he was nearly despairing of being able to achieve his point, that he succeeded in his efforts, and then it was chiefly attributable to his mamma bringing him some gum-lac to stick the eye in with. Dora was highly delighted when Tom returned her her doll, though the reset eye bore manifest tokens of the damage sustained; but Dora was content, and Tom tried to be content also, though, it must be confessed, it was a long time before he could; for he felt he had wantonly defaced one of his little cousin's greatest treasures.

Later in the day Dora was missing from the nursery for some time; and upon Johnny's going to look for her, he found her in her bedroom weeping over an open drawer.

'Oh Dora!' cried the child, rushing up to her, and throwing his arms about her.

'Hush, Johnny,' said Dora, in a faltering voice, 'and I will tell you what I am doing. You know, Johnny, I am putting away my dolly; for nurse and Constance say I am too big to play with dolls; and I suppose I am, for I am past eight years old. So I am going to put her in this drawer (auntie said this was to be my very own drawer), and when I want to look at her very badly, I can come and take just a little peep, and nobody know it but you, Johnny. See, she is very comfortable!'

'Yes,' replied Johnny, standing on the tips of his toes, to be able to look into the drawer. 'But what will you do without her?' he asked.

'Oh Johnny, I am going to be a young lady like Constance, and learn games, and read story-books, and do needlework in play hours; but oh, Johnny, I would rather be a little girl, and nurse my dolly;' and fresh tears trickled down her cheeks, and dropped upon her favourite in the drawer. After a few moments' silence, Dora wiped the tear-drops away, and kissing her doll, covered her over with a sheet of silver paper, which she had previously begged of her aunt; and shutting the drawer, said, with a forced calmness, 'Come along, Johnny, and let us look at your picture-book.'

'Oh yes,' cried Johnny, eagerly running towards the door, and dragging Dora after him. But all at once he suddenly stopped, and inquired in a low voice, 'When I am as big as you, must I put away my beautiful book?'

'Oh no, Johnny, people don't ever get too big for books,' replied Dora; and Johnny being satisfied, returned with his cousin to the nursery.

CHAPTER II.

Of all her cousins, Dora loved Johnny the best; and though he was two years younger than herself, yet he was her especial friend and confidant. Tom teased and fretted her, and Constance, on the strength of her three years' seniority, patronized her, but Johnny sympathized and clung to her; therefore Dora loved him, and was never happier than when he was by her side. For some time after the affair of the doll's eye, Tom desisted from teasing his cousin; for he was not only ashamed of his conduct, but he had been surprised at the violence of temper she had manifested. She was usually so timid and gentle, that he had not had the least idea before that she could put herself in a tantrum, as he called it, and she was raised considerably in his estimation through it: he little knew, child though she was, how she had fallen in her own, and with what a subdued, humble spirit she thought upon the occurrences of that afternoon.

Mr. Harley was a nervous invalid, and sometimes would not see the children for two or three weeks together; but when he did, it was a source of great pleasure to them, particularly to Dora, who, having been brought up by a sick mother, felt quite at home in his presence, and, by her pitying eyes and quiet movements, won upon his affections. She and Johnny were the most privileged of the family, and were often admitted to his room when the other children were excluded. Mrs. Harley was kindness itself; but she was so devoted to nursing and attending on her husband, that, excepting a regular morning visit to the nurseries, she frequently did not enter them again all day. Fortunately she had a most trustworthy nurse, and could leave the children to her care with the greatest confidence; for she had been her own nurse when a little girl, and had lived with her nearly ever since her marriage. 'Old nurse,' as she was called by the children, to distinguish her from the under nurse, was a really excellent woman, and passionately fond of them; indeed, in heart she believed they could not be matched anywhere; and her delight was to walk behind them to church, and compare their appearance with those of the other children who passed her; and as Mrs. Harley could seldom accompany her family there, old nurse generally enjoyed that pleasure. Mr. Harley usually slept in an afternoon, so Mrs. Harley always took that opportunity of gathering her little ones around her on Sabbaths; and the mother and children counted the happiest time in the week that which they spent together in the old oak dining-room.

Johnny had been having a fine game of play with Dora and Agnes one morning, when his mamma came into the room, bringing his Uncle Bennett with her, and said:

'Johnny, will you go back with Uncle Bennett to see Aunt Jenny?'

Johnny was very fond of his aunt and uncle; but then he was a little fellow, and equally fond of his home and Dora; so he pondered over his mamma's question a moment or two, and then archly asked:

'Why doesn't Aunt Jenny come to Johnny?'

'Because Aunt Jenny is not well, and she wants to see her little godson at her own house,' replied his uncle.

'Oh,' said Johnny, in his quaint, wise little way, 'then, Dora, I suppose I had better go.'

'Yes,' answered Dora, drawing in a deep breath and turning very pale at the thought of parting with him; 'I suppose you had.'

'That's right, Johnny and Dora,' cried Uncle Bennett. 'Johnny shall have a nice horse to play with on the lawn at Aunt Jenny's, and he shall soon come back strong and well.'

'But he is strong and well,' gasped Dora, frightened at the supposition that anything was the matter with Johnny.

A meaning look passed between old nurse and Uncle Bennett, and Dora fancied there were tears in her aunt's eyes; but she could not understand why there should be, nevertheless they pained her. So it was decided that Johnny should return the following day to Leighton with his uncle, and that Mary, a steady girl who assisted the nurses, should go with him to attend to him.

The rest of the day Johnny and Dora kept close together, and held long conversations on the coming visit. Johnny informed her that his horse should be fed on nothing but daisies, and that he hoped Uncle Benny would buy him a beautiful white one, with a black mane and tail.

That night, when old nurse and Mrs. Harley went into the sleeping-rooms to take their nightly farewell of the children, they found Dora sitting up in her bed wide awake, pale and trembling.

'Miss Dora!' cried nurse, when she spied the little white figure perched up in the bed.

'My darling!' exclaimed Mrs. Harley, folding the trembling child in her arms; 'what is it?'

'Oh, why did they say Johnny was not strong?' sobbed Dora, throwing her arms round her aunt's neck as she spoke. 'And why did you cry, auntie?'

'I cry, my precious?'

'Yes; the tears were in your eyes. I saw them there; indeed, I did,' she said, passionately.

'Hush! hush! my darling, we shall wake Johnny. Do not you know that mothers cannot bear to part with their little ones, Dora?'

'Was that why you cried?' inquired the child, still clinging to her aunt.

It was Mrs. Harley's turn to tremble then, and she knew not what to reply. Her own heart was sad; but ought she to sadden Dora's? she thought. Yet she felt she dared not deceive her by letting her believe what was not true; so, sitting down by the side of her little niece, she said gently:

'Dora, you are but a little girl, but I will make you my friend. You must be very good, and not fret, if I tell why the tears were in my eyes. Johnny is not ill; but he is not well, and I am very anxious about him. He was never strong like your other cousins. I have always seen he was more delicate than the rest; and that is why I want him to go to be with Aunt Jenny a few weeks, though I cannot bear to part with him.'

'Then he is not ill?—not bad ill?' questioned Dora, earnestly.

'No, Dora, he is only weakly.'

Dora relaxed her hold round her aunt's neck, and lying back in the bed with a sigh of relief, said: 'God can make him strong, auntie. I will ask Him to please to.'

'Yes, darling, God can do everything. Good night, don't fret;' and Mrs. Harley tucked the clothes about her.

'Oh no; good night,' said Dora, as she nestled down in peace, when she had kissed her auntie.

He was delicate and weakly; and so Mrs. Harley and old nurse felt, as they stood beside Johnny's cot, and watched the little sleeper. There were no rosy tints on the pretty cheeks, and the closed eyelids were dark and shadowy; the blue veins, like threads on white marble, were clearly visible on his temples, and his arms lay as if powerless without the coverlet.

'My Johnny,—my poor husband,' sighed Mrs. Harley, as she turned away from the cot, and, with streaming eyes, left the room.

'God can cure them both, ma'am,' interposed old nurse. 'He can strengthen Johnny, and make master well again.'

'Oh that I could believe He would!' said her mistress.

'"According to your faith so shall it be unto you," the Bible says, my dear lady,' replied the old woman.

'But I have no faith, nurse, it seems to have died within me;' and Mrs. Harley, with an aching heart, returned to her husband's apartments.

Johnny was awake betimes in the morning, and was out of bed, peeping from the window to see whether it was wet or dry, long before Dora had waked. Having satisfied himself that it was very fine, he paid his sister Constance a visit in the adjoining room, and having been immediately ordered out, as 'a teasing young monkey,' he took refuge in Tom's bedroom, where, perched on his bed, he watched Tom dress, and wondered when he should be old enough to wear a jacket and trousers. Tom was very fond of his little brother, and listened patiently to all Johnny had to tell about Uncle Benny and the beautiful horse he was going to buy him; though he rather scared him by inquiring who was to pay the horse's fare to Chelsea Place when Johnny left Leighton? Johnny thought a minute or two, and then said, he dared say he could carry it on his lap—a plan which Tom protested against, saying, if all children brought little wooden horses to nurse, it would be very inconvenient, and that people were not even allowed to take little dogs in a railway carriage without paying for them. Johnny looked very vexed and puzzled when he heard that; so Tom bade him cheer up, and take a morning ride to the nursery, presenting his own back in a very tempting manner for the purpose. In a moment Johnny had vaulted on Tom's back, and the little bare arms were round his neck, and the naked little feet were pressed against his sides, and Tom set off at a round trot, never stopping until he had deposited his charge safely in old nurse's lap, who inveighed loudly against the naughtiness of Johnny, in running about with only his night-gown on, and Tom's encouraging him to do it. But old nurse's wrath was usually as shortlived as snow in sunshine, and that Tom and Johnny knew, and consequently they did not take her scolding to heart that morning; but Tom went back to his room to look over his lessons, and Johnny splashed away in his bath, doing his best to sprinkle her well with water.

Towards the middle of the day, a carriage arrived at No. 6, Chelsea Place, to convey Uncle Bennett, Johnny, and Mary to the station; and in a few minutes the little fellow had bidden all 'good-bye' and was ready for starting. Such an event as one of the children going away from home without the others, brought all the family to the door or windows; even Mr. Harley ventured into the breakfast-room to take a last look of Johnny, and wave his hand to him. Dora stood on the lower door-step, and watched the carriage until it had disappeared; then noiselessly slipping by her aunt and cousins, she ran upstairs, and shut herself into her bedroom.

Mrs. Harley was the first to miss the little girl from the noisy group around her; and hastening them off with the nurses, lest they should annoy their papa with their chattering, she went in search of Dora. She found her pale and motionless, kneeling at the foot of her bed; and lifting her up, she took her on her lap, and with tender words tried to comfort her, by saying Johnny would not be long away, and, perhaps, he would come back very strong and well.

'Yes, auntie,' whispered the child; 'but they said mamma would come back well; and oh! she never came to Dora. She went up to God instead.'

'But your mamma was very ill; Johnny is not ill, you know—he can run about and play. Your dear mamma could scarcely cross the room. Do not you recollect how ill she was before God sent for her to come to Him?'

'Yes; oh yes,' she answered with a shudder, resting her head upon her aunt's bosom as she spoke; 'but oh, auntie, 'tis so very hard to part!'

Dora was only a little more than eight years old; but, young as she was, she had learned one of life's sternest lessons, she had learned by painful experience that 'it is so very hard to part.' Blessed be God that, through his Son Jesus, there is a home provided for his redeemed, where there will be no more parting.

(To be continued.)

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

ISAIAH VI. 1–13.

LET us take up the chapter thus:

I. The vision.—It was a temple-vision—a vision of glory; the glory of Jehovah of hosts, as such; the glory of the King and the Priest, of the throne and temple; and all this when Uzziah the king lay dying, or was dead,—the earthly king passing away, the heavenly King showing himself. It was truly a royal and glorious vision,—Jehovah himself the centre of it,—King of kings, and Lord of lords, —true King of Israel and of the earth,—true Melchizedek,—a Priest upon his throne. In connection with this King are the seraphim. Probably these are the same as cherubim; they are almost identical with those described in Ezekiel and John. In Genesis and in the historical books they appear as cherubim—'figures;' in Isaiah as seraphim, or 'burners;' in Ezekiel and John as 'living creatures.' Here they stand upon the 'train' of the royal robe, which filled the temple. They have six wings. Two cover the face—as if the glory were overwhelming them (as Moses hid his face, Ex. iii. 6); two their feet—to hide their whole person, body ('their bodies,' Ezek. i. 23) and feet, from the brightness; two they fly with—as if ready to go forth on the errands of this mighty King. Is not this the true posture of every saint of God?—solemn awe in presence of the Divine Majesty, as unfit to look upon the Glorious One; profound self-abasement, as unfit to be looked upon by One so holy; readiness to do the work of God, to go forth on his service on the wings of faith and love.

II. The voice.—It was the voice of the seraphim —a responsive song: 'One cried unto another.' Their song was—(1) Of Jehovah of hosts and his threefold holiness; (2) Of earth—the whole earth —earth filled with his glory. Thus the voice interprets the vision. It is a vision of latter-day glory,—when the Lord alone shall be exalted; when 'Holiness to the Lord' shall be seen and heard everywhere; when the glory of the Lord shall fill the world;—a holy glory in connection with Jehovah of Hosts, as King of all the earth, in the times of restitution of all things.

III. The shaking.—The posts of the door, or foundations of the threshold, shook at the voice of the seraphim; and the temple was filled with smoke;—that which symbolizes Jehovah's holy anger against sin (Ps. xviii. 9). The vision seems to be that of God coming down in his holiness to shake the earth, to express his hatred against sin, and especially against Israel's sin, in his own sanctuary (Isa. lxv. 5). He is spoken of as arising to shake terribly the earth; beginning at his own temple, but not ceasing till He has shaken all that can be shaken, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. When God's anger waxes hot against sin, then all the earth shall be as Sinai,—when the mountain shook, and was covered with smoke from the presence of the holy Lord God.

IV. The prophet's alarm (ver. 5).—His cry is, 'Woe is me!' nay, 'I am undone.' The reason of his alarm is a new and deeper view of his own sinfulness, from a new view of Jehovah's holiness. 'A man of unclean lips am I;' nay, 'among a people of unclean lips do I dwell.' He gives the reason: 'The King, Jehovah of Hosts, mine eyes have seen.' Thus, the nearer God comes to us, the more are we made aware of our uncleanness (even that of our lips), and feel the uncleanness of a world of unclean lips in which we dwell. The vision of earth filled with holy glory, and with the presence of its glorious King, has overwhelmed him. The more we realize a present God, and an earth filled with his glory, the more shall we feel our own unholiness, and cry out in fear. We feel the contrast between our unholy lips and the holy lips of those who are singing, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts.' It was Israel's 'unclean lips' that cried, 'Crucify Him;' and for the words of their unclean lips they are suffering the woes of God.

V. God's cure for this alarm.—A live coal from the altar applied to his lips,—that special part which he felt impure, and which, as a prophet, he needed to be pure. A prophet is a man like ourselves. God must purify his lips, that he may speak. He does this by fire and blood; for the live coal was from the altar of burnt-offering. Thus the blood makes clean, and the fire purges—'the spirit of burning.' This peculiar application of fire and blood to his lips removes—(1) His fear; (2) His personal uncleanness; (3) National uncleanness; for the fire and blood was meant to apply to 'the people of the unclean lips,' as well as to himself. Thus the sense of uncleanness is removed. Thus that terror which the nearer presence of God produces, is removed by that which assures the sinner of pardon and cleansing. The man's terrors are dispelled; he feels that he can now act and speak for God.

VI. God's inquiry for a messenger.—Jehovah's voice is heard. Its utterance is twofold: (1) 'Whom shall I send?' (2) 'Who will go for us?' It is an errand of hardship, painfulness, danger, shame, from which flesh and blood would shrink—as did Moses, Jeremiah, Ezekiel. Still God, in every age, is looking round and asking for a messenger,—for evangelists, for missionaries, for ministers; Spirit-called, Spirit-filled, Spirit-sent messengers. The work is great, the field is large, the message is judgment as well as mercy.

VII. The prophet's answer.—'Here am I; send me.' He answers the second question first; but he answers both, explicitly. He does not shrink. He is ready for shame, for prison, for death,—as indeed he found at last. The spirit is willing, and the flesh has overcome its weakness. The fire and blood have removed the terror, and made him bold. Thus it was with Whitefield.

VIII. The message.—It is one of judgment, (1.) For the people.—The worst of judgments: hear on, and understand not; look on, but see not. A hard heart, an insensible and impenetrable soul, a seared conscience, given over to a reprobate mind. (2.) For the land.—To lie waste, its fields untilled, its cities forsaken. This is the message of double judgment—complete and terrible ruin. This is the end of the people of 'unclean lips.'

IX. The promise.—All Israel's judgments have a promise mixed up with them—a hope appended to them. They are not for ever. There is a holy seed, or root, in which the blessing lies hid, even in the midst of the curse; and out of this seed, or root, or stump, the future tree is to arise, more glorious than the first. But how terrible the history through which Israel passes to this! How fearfully God avenges unbelief and rejection of his grace! Yet the day dawns at last! The King comes in his glory.

TAKE HEED TO THYSELF.*

THE work, my brother, is indeed momentous: to be an 'ambassador for Christ,' a 'leader' of his hosts, a 'shepherd' of his flock, an 'overseer' in his church, a 'watchman' over the house of the Lord, a 'builder' of his spiritual temple, and a 'steward' of the divine mysteries to his heritage. And this renders it so important to contemplate anew the nature of a service so precious in itself, and infinitely precious or awful in its eternal results.

There are duties which you owe to yourself, for your people's sake as well as your own; duties which you owe directly to them; duties in the pulpit and out of it; and all for the glory of the great Head of the church, in the salvation of lost souls. Our remarks will then relate to you as a Christian, a preacher, and a pastor.

I. First, and above all else, be a faithful Christian. Piety is the mainspring of the whole work of a Christian minister. It gives harmony, beauty, and efficiency to every part of his professional service. It is indispensable. You may dispense with scholarship and rhetoric in the pulpit, and even with common sense out of it, rather than with the 'life of God in the soul.' Look for the greenness and fruitfulness of the tree without the sap, rather than a prosperous ministry without the vitalizing power of spiritual religion. Look as well for a building to rise and stand without a foundation, as for usefulness here without personal holiness. Our Lord's testing of the fallen but 'converted' Peter, must be the touchstone of us all: 'Lovest thou me more than these? Yea, Lord; Thou knowest that I love Thee. Feed my lambs. He saith to him again the second time, Lovest thou me? Yea, Lord; Thou knowest that I love Thee. Feed my sheep. He saith unto him the third time (thrice tested, perhaps, in view of his threefold denial), Lovest thou me?' (John xxi. 15–17.) With a heart tenderly impressed and suffused with shame and grief, he again submits: 'Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee. Jesus saith unto him, Feed my sheep.' The Apostle Paul applies the same severe test in those searching words: 'Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity (love), I am become as sounding brass, and a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; . . . and have not charity (love), I am nothing' (1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2). Happy, thrice happy, is that minister who can make that appeal which Paul did: 'God is my witness, whom I serve with my spirit in the gospel of his Son' (Rom. i. 9). Without some measure of this spirit of grace in the heart, my brother, your public prayers, and preaching, and pastoral intercourse with your people, will lack that heavenly unction which gives zest and glow to them all. A servant of Christ, doing his work, should be baptized into his Spirit. Whom He sends He surely qualifies. 'How shall they preach, except they be sent?' (Rom. x. 15.)

Then, it well becomes you to be a genuine disciple of Christ, a faithful Christian, for your own sake, and for your people's sake.

1. As for yourself, you need personal piety in order to sustain you. There is great danger of an official or professional piety. It is commonly thought that ministers ought to be the best examples of piety, and we believe that, as a class, they are. (Yet, as has been faithfully presented in the sermon on this occasion, we know of but one standard of piety for minister and people.) And the reason assigned for it is, that they have so much to do daily with religious things. And yet in this very fact lies the tendency to a dull formality in official duty. Says a charming author: 'It is indeed difficult to determine whether our familiar intercourse with the things of God is more our temptation or our advantage.' If this be true, then special grace is requisite to guard us from this wily, unsuspected source of danger.

And then, too, you must 'endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.' There are personal conflicts with sin, as pride, ambition, love of the world, social ease, and indifference to the heavenly mission of the ministry. Such temptations we must meet, when nothing but sterling piety will suffice us.

Moreover, we must daily grapple with carnal men, who are opposed to the truth we preach. Deep-seated prejudices, and strongly rooted by age, must be encountered; the simplest truths of God's word will be perverted; the preaching of the cross will be foolishness to some, and a stumbling-block to others; as men love their sins, they will dislike the ways of God; and even Christian professors will offer a premium on innocent wrongs by covering them with the garb of religious charity, calling evil good and good evil. What shall sustain the faithful servant of the Lord in the discharge of his duties in such circumstances, if 'his heart be not established with grace?' Nothing but love for souls, and faith seizing and applying the promises of God, can encourage the trembling soul. Truly, if there were not sympathy with our gracious Saviour, the hands would hang down in indifference and despair. Therefore, for your own sake, it is of first importance that you study to maintain a solid, fervent, Christian piety.

* From a stirring and striking Charge, delivered by the Rev. Geo. Van Este, of the Reformed Dutch Church, America.

2. You should do this no less for the sake of your people, always having in view the honour of our Lord. Without it no reasonable amount of success can be anticipated. Our people must take 'knowledge of us, that we have been with Jesus.' The savour of godliness must go forth with the truth preached in order to commend it. Thus Paul teaches in his first letter to the Thessalonians (i. 5): 'Our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake.' The Christian character carries power with it in the ministerial work. Then that character must be possessed and diligently maintained. In order to do this, my brother, let me entreat you—

(1.) To be prayerful. Prayer is the soul of Christianity in any individual. Without it we are withered branches, separated from the source of spiritual life in Christ, the true Vine. We are fruitless in the Lord's vineyard, and 'cumberers' thereof. We have no right to expect good. Then let all of your work, and every part of it, in the pulpit and out of it, be begun and continued in the very atmosphere of prayer. Let your study be a consecrated spot of sacred 'fellowship with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ.' In pulpit preparations to the minutest particulars, in pastoral labours and social intercourse, and everywhere, be armed 'with all prayer and supplication in the spirit.'

(2.) With this join the study of God's word for the sake of spiritual improvement. The soul lives upon the aliment of revealed truth. It must therefore be sought and applied for our personal growth 'in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

(3.) We add, cultivate the graces of the Christian, and improve the gifts which our Lord has bestowed for 'the furtherance of the gospel.'

And thus, by seeking to maintain a faithful Christian character, 'take heed to thyself and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseer.' 'Study to show thyself approved unto God' in your spirit, and manner, and decent habits of living, 'a workman that needeth not to be ashamed.' 'Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord.' 'Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity.'

We have dwelt thus long on this part of our counsels as it is the prerequisite of all else. Preaching, and praying, and private toil are all worthless without being true disciples of Christ, and called by Him and his church to this most responsible of all offices.

II. We exhort you to be a faithful preacher. 'The pulpit' has been tersely called 'the throne of the minister.' If he exerts a controlling influence over his people, as his office requires, here is its source. And so 'the preaching of the pulpit is the grand lever of the ministry.' Indifference to this, and a neglect to suitably adjust it to times and places, and the real necessities of men, will discover itself in an ill-trained and uncontrollable people. It is not the only way of doing good; but it is the master spring of permanent usefulness; and for the plain reason that it is God's ordinance for this end.

Be careful, my brother, lest you weaken your power here, without perhaps a suspicion of it, in order to gratify the well-meant but often unadvised wishes of a fond people. You are the ordained expounder of the 'lively oracles' of God, for the full salvation of perishing sinners, —the careful, stately, 'edifying of the body of Christ.' To this end you must feed them, not only with the 'sincere milk of the word,' but also with the 'strong meat' of divine truth in its varied fulness of adaptation, in doctrine and precept, in promise and threatening, for instruction, for direction in duty, for reproof, for comfort and encouragement, that 'the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.'

It is not necessary to attempt a specification of the various topics which should make up your pulpit discourses. You are an accredited minister of the Reformed Dutch Church, and have solemnly vowed to teach and defend her forms of faith and order of worship, which we believe to be in accordance with the word of God. These systems of truth are known to meet the experienced wants of sinful man. And, as such, the truth they embody commends itself to the consciences of men. This is the reality of past history. Therefore preach it, and preach it again, as condensed in these excellent and long-preserved summaries of the Christian religion.

The two great themes which form the substance of all revealed truth are, man a sinner and Christ Jesus the Saviour, or, sin and salvation. These bind together all other truths. Without them, others are fragmentary and incoherent. And both are centred in the cross. Both evolve eminently from Christ and Him crucified; the one for ruin and self-despair, and the other for recovery and hope. Then preach Christ crucified, to one 'foolishness,' to another a 'stumbling-block,' and to some 'the power and the wisdom of God.' As Paul did, so do you. 'Glory not save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ,' as the only efficient means of destroying human pride, lust, and sin in every form. It is the remedial power for sin in the abstract, and for every development of human evil. Preach it as such, as cutting at the root of the upas-tree of depravity in the soul of man, and preach Christ in your own way.

The apostles had their idiosyncrasies, their individual peculiarities in teaching the truth, as we may discover them in their public discourses recorded in the Acts, or in the more didactic forms in the Epistles. There are now, as there were then, 'diversities of gifts.' If you have the power of Paul's strong reasoning, use it; if Peter's fearless, experimental, terrible warning, use it; if you possess John's tender, loving, and yet often bold spirit, as a 'son of thunder,' utter it forth as wisdom dictates; or, better still, if you combine most of the characteristics of an 'able minister of the New Testament,' employ them as the wants of your people and the providence of God may require. One may emulate a venerable Livingstone, or an Alexander, in probing the Christian heart with the sword of experimental truth; or another, the powerful Bethune, as he wields the hammer of the word in its doctrinal and practical character; or a third may follow the popular Brodhead, who loved to preach Christ in history and biography, in parable and miracle. Each one must study his gifts, and use them to the very best of his ability. But whatever may be the form of truth, preach Christ always. Ringing changes ever upon the name is not necessarily preaching Christ. Christ need not be the immediate subject of every sermon. Yet He is the sun of the whole system of truth, the relative centre of all evangelical sermons. Probably the best directory to guide us in the path of duty is found in the Epistle of Paul to the Romans and to the Corinthians. He begins with Christ crucified, and with his hand and eye upon the cross, he ramifies truth, doctrinal, practical, promissory, and hortatory, on almost every duty flowing from our various relations, as ministers, church officers, and church members, as parents and children, as masters and servants, as rulers and subjects, as Christians and citizens, in peace and in war as well. Following Paul, and remotely imitating our Lord as the great Teacher, you need not fear to preach the whole gospel of Jesus, while you gaze stedfastly upon, and hold strongly with the grasp of faith to Christ, the life of all. Then, let every sermon you preach, from whatever part of the Bible you may select (for all of it contains substantially the gospel), be irradiated with the life and glory of our Divine Redeemer, whose ambassador you are. Feel that Christ is 'all in all' for all sinners that receive Him, and you will hold Him forth accordingly. Be a faithful preacher in preaching the whole truth, only the truth, and nothing less than the truth; preaching it wisely and in due proportions; preaching it in faith, in love, in meekness, in much patience, honestly and boldly, 'not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.'

How great and responsible the work! 'Who is sufficient for these things?' Faith replies, 'Our sufficiency is of God.' We are accountable, not for success, but for faithfulness, and success as God may be pleased to connect it with our fidelity.

Then, my brother, let me exhort you—

1. To make the inspired word of the Lord, everywhere, and at all times, first and last in your ministrations.

2. Be a daily, diligent student of that word. As a mine, you must delve it and bring out the ore of precious truth. It is not a system of truth; but you are to be a systematist for the people; and for this purpose prayer, and pains, and time saved, are essential.

3. Be a skilful student of man. Study his material nature, but especially his spiritual constitution, and both in their close and delicate relations.

You here become a ministerial philosopher, versed in the science of the mechanism of man, as a physical, intellectual, and moral being; for the gospel is designed to influence and control the whole man. And hence it must be wisely adapted to his complex nature in its multiform conditions, especially as under the dominion of sin. An instrument of so nice construction must be touched with skilful hand to evoke harmony. Then study man as man, as a sinner, and learn his real wants, which only the gospel of Christ can fully meet. A careful attention to these simple suggestions will enable you to be the more faithful preacher.

III. It remains briefly to exhort you to be a faithful pastor. The Christian preacher and pastor are happily blended in the same person. Of the apostles it is written that, 'In every house they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ' (Acts ii. 46, v. 42, xx. 20). Pastoral work is involved in the very nature of the office. The terms watchman, overseer, steward, and particularly shepherd or pastor, strongly enforce the idea. The wants of the flock of Christ must be known before they can be satisfied with the bread of life. The various states and exercises of the Christian, as well as the subtle devices of the unbelieving heart, must be understood before the gospel remedy can be brought to bear effectually upon individual consciences. Phases of Christian experience are as various as human countenances, though essentially the same in their joys and sorrows, their hopes and fears. The faithful preacher, then, will aim to be the faithful pastor. If he desires the heart sympathies of his hearers in the pulpit, he must in some degree awaken them at the fireside and wayside, in the chamber of sickness, at the couch of the dying, and in all the walks of life. Deep-laid and strong are the affections thus engendered and cherished between a pastor and his beloved flock, as your late experience assures you. Hence, it becomes a prominent means of usefulness, and the good pastor is made the better preacher. And so the language of Dr. Watts is verified: 'He that has the happy talent of parlour preaching, has sometimes done more for Christ and souls in the space of five minutes, than by the labour of many hours and days in the usual course of preaching in the pulpit.'

Then, my brother, be dutiful in exercising the office of a shepherd over this entire flock now committed to you, and the officers associated with you in its government. Look after every part of it—the aged and infirm, the care-stricken and the afflicted, the careless professor and the hypocrite in Zion, the wanderer and the backslider, the worldly and deluded, the self-diffident and trembling, the convicted and sin-burdened, the gospel-hardened and self-righteous. Seek the souls of the young, the source of strength and hope to the family, the church, the nation, and the world. Neglect not the rich, for they need your aid and moral light, amid the pressing cares and earnest strifes of life. Remember the poor, who 'are always with you.' Go down into the humble dwelling of poverty, and gather thence the brightest jewels for your Lord's crown. Be a faithful friend to all for Jesus' sake, and an enemy to none. 'Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them.' Be the builder of a spiritual house, under the Divine Architect, of 'lively stones,' composed of sinners, once dead, but quickened to a life of holiness and fervid zeal. Lift up your people in all active efforts for Christ's cause, to the high and holy standard of his word. Level upwards. Never be satisfied with a drift-wood church, floating along with the easy current, where the tide waters may chance to bear it. But stem the current of wrong, and that firmly when needs be, and, with a steady faith, go where the compass and chart of heavenly truth guide. In a word, 'be faithful in all things;' 'make full proof of thy ministry.' 'And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, then shall you receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.' May the King in Zion set his seal to this union!

THE WALDENSES IN 1866.

BY THE REV. A. H. R. HEBDEN, EAST FARLEIGH.

WE set out to visit the valleys of the Waldenses, in Piedmont, the second week in September, and arrived at Turin on the 11th. September 12th was spent at Turin, where we called on the Rev. Mr. Meille, minister of the Waldensian or Vaudois congregation in that city. He received us very kindly, gave us all the information we wished for, with a view to our tour in the valleys, and showed us his church and schools. It is a fine church, nicely situated in a wide street, with rows of trees down the middle of it, called the Corso del Ré. There is room in the church for 600 or 700 persons, and comfortable seats, with a large pulpit, and nice organ. This was the first Protestant church erected in Italy out of the valleys; and there is an inscription, in Italian, over the door, from Jer. vi. 16: 'Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls.' The argument from antiquity is on the side of the Vaudois church, against the Church of Rome; for the majority of the population of 'the valleys' has adhered to the word of God, and rejected the superstitions of Rome, from time immemorial, as allowed even by writers of the Romish church—the bitterest enemies of the Vaudois. At the back of the church there is a room where prayer-meetings are held on Sabbath evening and on week-day evenings; and in this room English service is held twice on Sabbath by a minister of the Church of England. Mr. Meille is pastor of the Vaudois congregation, consisting of Protestants originally from the valleys, who now reside in Turin. There is also an evangelist—an ordained minister—who labours among the Roman Catholic population of Turin, and acts as the pastor of a congregation who were formerly Roman Catholics.

Mr. Meille preaches in French every Sabbath morning at eleven o'clock; and there are also two services in Italian, besides the evening prayer-meeting. These duties are divided between Mr. Meille and the younger minister. The schools—held in four or five different rooms, boys and girls separate—contain a considerable number of children, intelligent-looking, respectful in their manners, and clean in their appearance,—half of them the children of parents who are still Roman Catholics. No catechisms or formularies are taught in the schools; but all the children alike receive religious instruction from the Scriptures.

We arrived at La Torre, in the valley of Luzerna, about 10 A.M. on the 13th. There is a railway as far as Pinerolo, and an omnibus the last eight miles. A village, called Briqueras, is passed between Pinerolo and La Torre. In old times there were many Protestants here; but the Vaudois of the plain of Piedmont, and in the lower parts of the valley of Luzerna, were more exposed to the frequent and violent persecutions than their brethren who inhabited the higher Alpine districts. So it came to pass, in course of time, that the territory within which liberty of conscience was permitted, and Protestant worship tolerated, became confined within narrower and narrower limits. The people of Briqueras were denied the liberty to attend Protestant worship, or profess the Protestant faith, and compelled to forsake their homes, or go to mass. Thus Briqueras is no longer a Protestant parish.

The first Protestant church seen from the road in approaching La Torre, is the church of San Giovanni. It is on the right hand side of the road, about two miles from La Torre. San Giovanni is the most fertile parish of the country inhabited by the Waldenses, being at the bottom of the valley of Luzerna, and nearest to the plain of Piedmont. The church bears the date 1806. Although the great majority of the people are Protestants, for many years they were not allowed to have a church in their own parish. A church was, therefore, built for them in the adjoining parish of La Torre, just beyond the boundary which separates the two parishes. This church is called Chabasse; and although now out of repair, is still used in summer time to hold prayer-meetings for the people of the neighbourhood. The three clergymen of La Torre, Angrogna, and San Giovanni, whose parishes here border on one another, take part in these prayer-meetings.

Shortly before arriving at La Torre, there is seen on a hill, at a short distance to the left of the road, the village of Luzerna, which gives its name to the valley. Close to it is the mansion of the Countess of Della Roca. There were formerly many Protestants in Luzerna; but, like Briqueras, it is now a Popish village. The Protestants at Luzerna were denied the liberty of attending Protestant worship, and afterwards the liberty of residing within the parish. The little river Pellice, which runs through the valley of Luzerna, divides the parishes of Luzerna and San Giovanni; and at this part of its course formed the boundary, until 1848, between benighted Popish Piedmont and that part of the country in which the pure worship of God was tolerated. Luzerna and Luzernetta, on the right bank of the Pellice, were Popish villages, in which no Protestant was allowed to take up his abode; La Torre and San Giovanni, on the left bank, Protestant parishes.

La Torre is a busy, thriving little town. It is little more than a village, with one street, a number of shops, and a little square, or market-place, in the centre. At the entrance of the town, on the right, is a large Roman Catholic church, with a building attached to it, in which five or six priests—so-called missionaries—reside. The Vaudois church is a neat building, at the other end of the little street, with a text of Scripture, in Italian, inscribed on the wall over the door. Close to it are the residences of the minister, Mr. Malan, and of the professors of the college at La Torre. Very near the town, a number of manufactories have been established, which have added greatly to the population. Cotton, silk, and wool are manufactured here. The people employed in the factories are chiefly Roman Catholics, whom the establishment of factories has attracted from other parts. The number of Protestants employed in the factories is but 300. The Vaudois are an agricultural people, and feel a great repugnance to this kind of employment. They will engage in it only when driven to do so by absolute necessity. The parish of La Torre includes, besides the town, a large rural population in the neighbourhood. It extends some distance up the valley, including the slopes of the mountains on both sides. The clergyman often has long fatiguing walks up the mountain sides to visit his sick. The Papists of La Torre were in former times only one-sixth of the population; but their numbers have been greatly increased by the establishment of factories. They are now 1800 in number, whilst the whole population is 4000—leaving 2200 under the care of the Protestant minister.

Soon after our arrival at La Torre, we took a walk to Roras, one of the localities most celebrated in Vaudois history. Knowing the direction in which Roras lies, from a map we had of the valleys, we found the way for ourselves. We crossed the Pellice by a small bridge, and ascended by a steep path the ridge of mountains to the south of La Torre. It was midday when we began the ascent; and, with an Italian sun over our heads, we found the heat excessive. There were so many tracks on the mountain side, that we often were puzzled which we ought to take; but we came right at last. There is an Italian proverb, that 'all roads lead to Rome.' We scrambled up some very steep places, where there was no path, and then struck into a track again. From the top of the ridge we had beautiful views of Alpine scenery to the south, the valley of Luzerna immediately below us; and, looking across it to the north, we saw the crag of Castelluzzo, Mount Vandelin, and the valley of Angrogna. After nearly two hours' walking, we followed a path through some woods, which brought us to an open space, with fields and houses—a part of the parish of Roras. Some peasants, at work in the fields, told us to descend the mountain a little on the other side, in order to find the church and village. The village consists of farms and houses scattered along the mountain side, on the southern slope; and, in the midst of them, the church, school, and parsonage, with also a Romish church, and dwelling for the priest. It is a pretty spot. Though very elevated, there are smiling meadows; a great number of walnut and chestnut trees; fields of maize, corn, and potatoes. The peasants were then employed in digging up their potatoes. The harvest was over; but, after the potatoes were got in, there would be the gathering of chestnuts—an important part of the produce of this district. Chestnuts are not here merely a luxury for dessert; they are a crop, on which the people depend in part for their subsistence. The parish of Roras is of considerable extent, including three or four villages; but the population is not large—from 750 to 800. The church is a nice, neat church, with a text of Scripture, in French, on the wall over the door, after the usual custom of the Vaudois. The people of Roras are nearly all Protestants. The priest, a sallow, disagreeable-looking man, has very few adherents. The clergyman was not at home. In seeking his house, we misunderstood what was told us by a little girl, and went by mistake to the priest's house. An old woman, his housekeeper, received us rudely, not caring to inform us where the pastor lived. A peasant invited us to his house, and refreshed us with milk and bread. When we offered payment, he laughed at the idea of receiving anything for it. He hunts the chamois, and had a fall on the mountains a short time before, by which he hurt one leg and one arm, and was still lame. This man was very friendly, and apparently delighted to see and converse with English people. It is the case among the Vaudois generally. They look upon English people as friends, and are always glad to meet them. He told us that the people of Roras are strong Protestants. He said he had been once as far from home as Marseilles; and when there, was pleased to see that the finest ship in the harbour was a Protestant ship (English), and that there was a chaplain, and divine service held on board on Sabbath. We had some conversation also with the schoolmaster, an intelligent man.

The work of education is carried on principally in the winter. There were now only a few little children in the school, who were too small to do any work. Happily, schools have been multiplied very much in the Protestant valleys, so that the people are now pretty well provided with the means of educating their children. A great deal has been done through the exertions of General Beckwith, who, being dead, yet lives in the hearts and memories of the Vaudois. Pictures of him are seen in many of their houses, with his wooden leg (he lost a leg at Waterloo), and the title added to his name, 'Benefactor of the Vaudois.' In order to educate the people effectually, each little hamlet, scattered about the mountains, needs to have a school of its own, on account of the difficulty of communication in winter time, and the impossibility, for little children, of going long distances through the snow to school. Some parishes have as many as ten schools, of which the central school only is under the care of the certificated master, or regent, as he is called. The elder children attend as much as possible the central school. During the summer months, schools are, for the most part, closed, as the children are nearly all at work out of doors, either tending cattle on the mountains, or assisting to get in the crops. In one place we saw an inscription on a small school, to the effect that this school was founded by the kindness of an Englishman (General Beckwith), and that all who are educated there will owe respect and gratitude to his memory.

There are still living at Roras some descendants of Captain Joshua Gianavello, the Vaudois hero of 1655. His house was in this parish. We returned from Roras to La Torre by Luzerna, —a much easier road than that by which we had come up,—leading down a little narrow valley, which branches out from the valley of Luzerna southward, near the village of that name. There is only a mule track from Roras to Luzerna. It was on this road that Captain Gianavello defeated the troops sent by the Marquis of Pianessa to destroy Roras.

September 14th.—We walked up the valley of Angrogna, as far as the upper part of it, called the Pra del Tor. The valley of Angrogna is a part of the valley of Luzerna, branching out from it, near La Torre, to the northward. Angrogna may be considered as the heart of the three valleys—Luzerna, Perosa, and St. Martin. Some of the most memorable struggles of the Vaudois, in defence of their religious liberty, took place in Angrogna. The lower and most agreeable part of the valley, for habitation and culture, is not so easily defensible, and was often devastated by the Papists in their inroads. But the upper part, the Pra del Tor, was held by the peasants of the neighbourhood against an army attacking it from three different directions, and the assailants repeatedly repulsed, with severe loss. This occurred during the violent persecution of the year 1560, by an army under the Count of La Trinité. Whilst the combatants fought, the old men, women, and children were engaged in prayer to God for help against their persecutors.

The valley of Angrogna contracts at one particular spot, and becomes so very narrow, that there is scarcely more than sufficient room for the torrent to make its way between two rocky cliffs. This entrance to the Pra del Tor was formerly strengthened by artificial defences, and called the Barricade. The Pra del Tor is a narrow valley inside the Barricade, surrounded on all sides by mountains. Numerous conflicts have taken place in former times on the mountain range called La Vachera, on the eastern side of the Pra del Tor; and the high mountain, called the Vandelin, on the western side of Angrogna, has also been sometimes a refuge for God's persecuted people.

At the Pra del Tor was situated the humble college of the 'Barbes,' or ancient pastors of the valleys, ruins of which still remain. It was burnt by the Papists during the massacres of 1655. One room remains, in which we were shown the writing-table used by the Barbes—consisting merely of a slab of stone, resting on a stone support. From this spot, during the middle ages, missionaries were sent throughout Italy, and into other countries—to Switzerland, Germany, and as far as Bohemia. The 'Barbes' were lowly men, and their college for training ministers a very humble institution. But they had the fear of God in their hearts, and God's blessing accompanied their labours. There may be more splendid ecclesiastical organizations with less real piety. As external pomp and splendour in religion increases, spiritual life generally declines. With no gorgeous ceremonies and theatrical displays did the ancient Barbes of Piedmont recommend the gospel to the acceptance of their hearers. Types and symbols, which served their purpose under the Mosaic dispensation, are out of date now. The pure word of God was the weapon used by the 'Barbes.' They did their work faithfully during the night of the middle ages. They gathered small congregations of faithful men in many parts of Europe; they preserved for God, in those dark times, the seven thousand who bowed not the knee to Baal; they, in some measure, prepared the way for the glorious Reformation. They went forth, like the apostles, 'two and two,' aware of the dangers to which missionary zeal exposed them; they were 'as sheep in the midst of wolves;' many of them were faithful even 'unto death.' The enemy could destroy their bodies; but the truth, for which they lived, and toiled, and suffered, was indestructible. All honour to those faithful soldiers of the cross! 'They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever.'

A woman at the Pra del Tor told us that she had a son employed as a colporteur in Calabria. The colporteur is always the pioneer of evangelization in Italy. He sells Bibles and religious books, thereby creating a spirit of inquiry, and a desire in the minds of the people for instruction from a living preacher of the gospel.

We much enjoyed our walk up the valley of Angrogna. The scenery is delightful: in the upper part more grand; in the lower part more smiling and beautiful. We called on the minister of the parish, Mr. Duran, who resides in the lower part of Angrogna, close to the Vaudois church at St. Lawrence. He was pleased to see us, and we rested awhile at his house. It is a comfortable parsonage. We were told elsewhere that he has a little private property, and is the only one of the pastors of the valleys who keeps a horse. It was remarked to us at the same time, that his somewhat larger means do not prevent him being 'a good apostle.'

This parish contains 1800 Protestants, and 700 Papists—the largest proportion of Papists in any of the Vaudois parishes, except La Torre. The whole population of the valleys is 22,000 Protestants and 5000 Papists. Besides the church at St. Lawrence, there is a chapel-of-ease at Serré, higher up the valley, more convenient for the people of the Pra del Tor. Mr. Duran holds divine service on Sabbath, once at each church. The church of Serré is in a pretty, retired spot. The inscription over the door is: 'Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths' (Micah iv. 2). There is also inscribed on the wall an appeal to travellers for funds to keep it in repair, which runs thus: 'O you who travel through this beautiful country, give to repair the church of these parts; and the God who has protected this people of the mountains, will bless you from heaven.'

The Vaudois are, as a people, extremely poor, because persecution has driven them from the most pleasant and fertile parts of the country they formerly inhabited, into higher and comparatively barren districts. The population increased beyond the resources of the country, and yet the Government would not allow them, until the last few years, to leave the three valleys. The taxes are very heavy; and the diseases in the vines and mulberries have greatly impoverished some of their best parishes. It is urged against them, as a reproach, by the Romanists, that they receive assistance from England, and cannot provide the funds necessary to support church ordinances and education out of their own resources. But this poverty is a result of the oppression to which they have been subjected for centuries; and surely it is no reproach to the church of Christ, that the wealthier members of the body should assist the poorer. The churches of England and Scotland do well to give out of their abundance to aid the impoverished churches of Piedmont,—impoverished chiefly through the long series of Popish persecutions. Property in the valleys has become divided into such small portions in many parts, as will scarcely suffice to support a family. But the mountains are cultivated with the greatest care, and every available inch of ground is made use of. Poverty is not here the result of idleness, but of oppression.

The principal modes in which the Vaudois have received assistance from England, are three. 1. Their ministers' stipends are paid from a fund raised in England in the time of Cromwell, immediately after the massacres of 1655. 2. Schools have been established, for the benefit of many scattered hamlets, and a great deal done for the cause of religion and education, through the exertions of General Beckwith. 3. A college, for the education of ministers and schoolmasters, was established at La Torre, through the instrumentality of Canon Gilly (of Durham), whose name is held by the Vaudois in affectionate remembrance, and his portrait seen in many of their houses.

(To be continued.)

EARLY PROTESTANTISM.

II.—RIENZI.

DANTE was still a wanderer on the earth,—compelled to taste 'how bitter is a stranger's bread,'—when three men were born in Italy, each destined to play an important part in the history of that country, and each animated by a fervid hatred of Papal corruption. Their names were Petrarch, Boccaccio, and Rienzi. The father of Francesco Petrarca, banished from his native Tuscany by the decree which exiled Dante, repaired with his family to Avignon, then the seat of the pontifical court; and it was in the dissolute society of the churchmen assembled there that the future poet first saw the monstrous evils which awakened his longings for the deliverance of his country. Boccaccio, also a Tuscan, early applied his genius to the satire of priestly licentiousness; and his writings, grossly indecent as some of them are, had perhaps a greater effect than the more chaste and elegant ones of his friend Petrarca, in fostering in the general mind that contempt for the dogmas and rites of the Church of Rome, which was shared even by many of its own dignitaries. The career of Rienzi had, however, a more immediate and decided influence than the genius of the poets, and deserves to be better understood than it has been by the cursory reader of history.

Nicolo Lorenzo Gabrini, known to history by his abbreviated name of Cola di Rienzo, or Rienzi, was born at Rome in the year 1313,—the reputed son of an innkeeper and a laundress, dwelling in the Transteverine, a quarter of the city inhabited only by the humbler classes of the people. Of his parentage Rienzi has himself left us an account, which, while designed to remove the stigma of low birth, will by many be regarded as affixing a greater stigma to his moral nature. In a series of letters, which may almost be said to constitute an autobiography, the future tribune of Rome records that Henry of Luxembourg, while on his visit to the city to receive the imperial crown, was desirous of paying his devotions in the church of St. Peter. But that portion of Rome in which the tomb of the apostle was situated, continued in the hands of his enemies, the Guelphs; and the emperor, disguised as a pilgrim, was pursued by them, while on his devout mission, and compelled to take refuge in the albergo of Gabrini, where he lay concealed for several days. The fair wife of the innkeeper became acquainted with the rank of her guest, and, according to her son, scrupled not to 'minister to him' in a manner fatal to her conjugal fidelity. The secret amour was only disclosed after the birth of Rienzi, and in the deathbed confession of the mother. The offspring of it was, meanwhile, brought up as the son of the humble innkeeper; and it was not until he had attained his twentieth year that his imperial parentage was discovered to him by his mother's confessor.

This extraordinary story rests solely upon the authority of Rienzi himself. It is related by him in a letter addressed to the Emperor Charles of Bohemia; and although he avers that he had protested against it, as a scandal, and an imputation on his mother's honour, he confesses his thorough belief in it. It is evident that the first and most reliable biographer of Rienzi—a Roman, whose name is unknown—was not acquainted with this account of his hero's parentage; and it may be presumed that the secret was not known in Rome during Rienzi's career. It may be implied that the tribune had sufficient reasons for concealing his real paternity during his enjoyment of power; yet, on the other hand, he was a vain man, who would scarcely have scrupled to take advantage of this accident of birth; and, moreover, it is difficult to suppose that the secret would not have been disclosed by those who knew it—for we are led to infer that it was known to some. Whether the story was invented by Rienzi in order to strengthen his case with the Emperor Charles, at a time when he was professing to urge the restoration of the imperial authority, or had been suppressed by him during his tribunate out of regard for his family, and the republican, anti-German sympathies of the Romans, must, we fear, remain a matter of doubt.

The earlier years of Rienzi's life, spent at Anagni, the favourite retreat of many of the Popes, were devoted to the study of the old Roman historians, from whom he learned the ancient greatness of his native land, and imbibed sentiments which strengthened as he attained to manhood. While yet a youth, he had contrasted the forlorn state of Rome with its former power and magnificence. A student of the Bible and the early Fathers, he had combined deep religious feeling with his patriotism; and his fervid eloquence had already given him considerable influence over the masses of the people.

The accession of Clement VI. to the papal chair induced the Romans to send a mission to Avignon, to entreat his Holiness to return to their city, and to appoint, for every fiftieth year, the jubilee which brought the wealth of devout pilgrims to the shrine of St. Peter. Rienzi was chosen as one of the representatives of his fellow-citizens in this embassy; and such was the effect of his eloquence, seconded by the influence of Petrarch the poet, that the Pope consented to the alteration of the jubilee year, and promised to return to Rome so soon as the affairs of the Papacy would permit. Rienzi's success served to increase his popularity. He returned to Rome with the appointment of notary for the Pope, and called upon the city to rejoice that the day of its prosperity was at hand. But Clement had no intention of leaving his luxurious indulgences at Avignon, to risk himself among a discontented people, and a turbulent nobility, who had erected fortresses within the city, from which they ever and anon sallied to commit deeds of murder and rapine. Rienzi's hopes were doomed to remain unrealized; and his hatred of aristocratic domination was deepened by the murder of his younger brother, in an affray between the followers of the Colonna and Orsini, two of the most powerful of the Roman nobles. In despair of any reform through the agency of the Papacy, he declared that 'the Pope, in contempt of the people's petitions, had placed the sword of civil power in the hands of madmen, and invested tyrants with the title of senators, that the Roman flock, thus preyed upon by ravening wolves, should not have strength or courage to demand the residence of their pastor in the seat of his episcopate.'

Rienzi seems from this time to have conceived the idea of attempting, by his own influence, to achieve the independence of Rome. At Avignon he had secured the friendship of Petrarch, who, charmed by his eloquence and patriotism, had continued to correspond with him, and doubtless encouraged his aspirations after freedom. Still, the power of the barons was so great as for a time to intimidate him; and, emulating the conduct of the elder Brutus, he concealed, under the guise of flippancy and folly, the serious projects which were forming in his mind. 'I confess,' he says, 'that to persuade the people to union, I often feigned and dissembled—made myself a simpleton and an actor. David danced before the ark, and was a madman before King Achish. So I, when I took up the cause of the people against their tyrants, had to deal with no open adversaries, but with men of shifts and wiles, the craftiest and most deceitful.' Warned by the failure of more than one appeal which he had made to the slumbering patriotism of his countrymen, he endeavoured to arouse it by means of pictorial allegories representing the fallen state of Rome. These he set up in public places throughout the city, leaving them to produce their effect upon the minds of a people among whom allegory had been often employed to convey the most momentous truths. On the sites or amid the ruins of ancient temples and palaces, he discanted on the glories of the old republic. The bronze tablet, on which was recorded the decree by which the senate conferred the imperial title upon Vespasian, was brought from its obscurity in the church of the Lateran, and publicly exhibited, as an evidence that the power of the empire was the gift of the people. By such means as these, Rienzi succeeded in drawing around him a strong party of the citizens, animated—though, perhaps, in a less degree—by sentiments and hopes akin to his own. Hatred of the nobility, from whom neither life nor honour were safe, induced many to cast in their lot with the ardent champion of popular liberty; and all to whom his plans were disclosed, took an oath of fidelity to the people's cause. In his capacity of notary for the Pope, Rienzi had gained the friendship of the Bishop of Orvieto, the vicar of his Holiness,—a man of easy temper and weak mind, who saw in the projected revolution a means of gratifying his vanity, by enhancing his personal importance. Many of the poorer barons, too, unable to cope with their powerful neighbours, sought refuge in Rienzi's schemes from the indignities to which they were daily subjected by the unruly followers of the arrogant nobles. The priesthood were gained over by the prospect of increased influence; and, in a word, the conspiracy embraced men of all orders of the people.

Rienzi had been so long known as a popular orator, and the leaders of the powerful factions in Rome had become so familiar with his harangues, that his preparations for the great event which was to restore his country's freedom, passed almost unnoticed by those who could have easily arrested them. At length the day of action came. On the festival of the Effusion of the Holy Ghost, the Roman people were summoned to appear before the Capitol; and when public expectancy was at its height, Rienzi, accompanied by the Bishop of Orvieto, and surrounded by a band of his most trustworthy followers, left the church of St. Angelo, where mass had been said, and ascended the Capitol, preceded by three banners, on which were represented Rome, seated on a lion, and bearing the globe and palm-branch, St. Paul with the sword of justice, and St. Peter with the keys. Loud acclamations told that the revolution had been already accomplished. On the day chosen for the execution of this bold and brilliant project, Stephen Colonna, with the great body of his troops, was absent from the city. The other barons were either unable to disperse the popular assemblage, or affected to despise it. The people were triumphant; and the constitution of the Buono Stato—the good estate of Rome—was adopted without a word or gesture of opposition. The new laws prepared by Rienzi show him to have been possessed of no ordinary penetration; they were well adapted to the spirit of the times. The senatorship, which had for many years been hereditary in the families of the Colonna and Orsini, was abolished. The defence of the city was provided for by each of the thirteen municipal quarters maintaining a force of one hundred footmen and twenty-five horsemen. The strongholds, prisons, bridges, and gates were no longer to be guarded by the soldiers of the barons, but held by the captains of the people. The treasury was charged with the support of the convents and the poor; while the revenues of the city, long reduced by the peculation of those who farmed the taxes, were to be administered by a commission of the people for the public good. Prompt justice; the punishment of death for all cases of murder; the preservation of the houses, many of which had been destroyed or converted into fortresses by the nobility; the establishment of public granaries, and the security of the roads around the city,—were all provided for by the new laws. No baron was allowed to possess a stronghold within the walls of Rome. Those which existed were to be at once surrendered; while their former occupants were held responsible for the peace and security of the country around their castles in the Campagna. Rienzi was at once invested with full power to execute the laws he had made, and shortly afterwards publicly received the title of Tribune,—the papal vicar being nominally associated with him in his office, obviously for the purpose of securing the tacit sanction of the church to the new order of things.

A feeble and abortive attempt at resistance was made by some of the nobles. The haughty Stephen Colonna replied contemptuously to Rienzi's summons to appear and take the oath of fidelity to the constitution; but the power he could at one time have so easily crushed, was now too strong for him. He was forced to evacuate his palace in Rome, and take refuge in his strong castle at Palestrina. Not only he, but all the nobles, were ultimately compelled to swear obedience to the Tribune and the laws. Knowing that the support of the people was his best defence against the barons, Rienzi strenuously exerted himself to reform the financial and social state of the city. Many who had hitherto successfully defied all attempts to levy the taxes upon them, and had set at nought the authority of those who farmed the duties, were now brought to obedience. The result, of course, was a rapid increase in the pecuniary resources of the state. The rapacious nobles felt that they could not resist the inexorable justice of the Tribune. An Orsini was publicly executed, although he was the nephew of two cardinals; another was thrown into prison for non-payment of a debt; a Frangipani was heavily fined; a Colonna arrested for disturbing the peace of the city. No one escaped the hand of the law; rich and poor, churchmen and laymen, were alike compelled to bow before the impartial tribunal of the Republic.

Never, perhaps, was a revolution effected more simply and completely. The will of a single man, who had hitherto been regarded as at best an eloquent enthusiast, was sufficient to control a turbulent aristocracy, supported by strong bands of daring followers, to restore peace and prosperity, and to transform Rome from a den of rapacious oppressors into something like the glory of its brightest days. Rienzi made no vain boast when, in one of his letters to the Emperor Charles, he wrote: 'Did I not restore real peace to a city torn by factions? Did I not decree that all the citizens banished by party violence should be re-admitted? Had I not begun to extinguish the party names of Guelph and Ghibelline, for which innumerable victims had perished, and to bring all Italy into one harmonious, peaceful, and holy confederacy?'

Inspired by the idea of Italian unity, Rienzi sent ambassadors to the several states of Italy, inviting them to enter into a federal union. Florence responded by appointing representatives at Rome, and contributing both men and arms. All Italy looked with hope towards the founder of the new Roman Republic; and before his tribunal the case of Queen Joanna of Naples, openly accused of the murder of her husband Andrea, was solemnly pleaded by noble envoys. The ambassadors of nearly thirty Italian cities attended Rienzi in one of his processions; and pious pilgrims carried the fame of his justice and his patriotism all over Europe.

It was scarcely in the nature of things that such fame, honour, and apparent power, should not have an intoxicating effect. Naturally vain of his personal appearance, which was very noble, Rienzi too often made use of the festivals, by which he sought to gratify the people, for purposes of ostentatious display. He wore magnificent apparel, gave luxurious banquets, and placed his wife, the daughter of an humble citizen, at the head of the stately and haughty Roman ladies. Nor did his vanity content itself with these comparatively harmless gratifications. He aspired to the honour of knighthood; and, on the night preceding the day on which that honour was to be assumed, he ordered that the porphyry font, in which, according to tradition, the Emperor Constantine had been baptized, should be prepared as a bath for him in the church of the Lateran. A great festival marked the day of his knighthood. The bronze Aurelian horse in the Capitol poured wine from its nostrils; banquets were spread in the streets; dances, tournaments, and processions delighted the crowds; while gifts of gold, silver, rich raiment, and precious stones, were laid, by the representatives of many Italian cities, at the feet of the Tribune. In the midst of this jubilant festivity, Rienzi publicly proclaimed the sovereignty of Rome over the world, and the liberty of all to whom the rights of her citizenship were extended in the days of the Empire. Nor did his ambitious patriotism stop here. He summoned all who contested the right of Rome's universal supremacy to appear before him; and specially called upon the competitors for the imperial title to submit their claims to him for adjudication, as the representative of the Roman people.

Rienzi had now reached the height of his power; but he was surrounding himself with enemies. The Pope looked on from Avignon with more than distrust of a popularity in which he had no share; while the French clergy at the papal court dreaded the efforts made to induce his Holiness to return to Rome. The Tribune had gone so far as to hint that the people might, in time, refuse obedience to a pontiff who showed so little regard for their welfare as to absent himself from his episcopal seat merely that he might enjoy the amenities of life elsewhere. The Roman nobles had been curbed, but not subdued; and by a weak attempt to gain their support, Rienzi increased their enmity towards him. He had been secretly informed of a conspiracy entered into, by the more hostile of them, to procure his overthrow; and resolved, by a show of magnanimity, to gain their friendship. At a banquet given in the palace of the Lateran, the heads of the great family of Colonna, of the Savelli, the Orsini, and the Frangipani, were suddenly arrested, and charged with the crime of conspiracy against the good estate. Some of them were innocent—and, indeed, altogether ignorant of such a conspiracy having been formed; yet all were ordered to prepare for death. Rienzi then condescended to pardon them; and, notwithstanding the warnings of his best friends, restored them to their honours, and showered upon them tokens of his favour.

But the offender never pardons; and the Tribune's strategical clemency served only to illustrate the proverb, that to show favour to an enemy, is but to show him your weakness. The proud barons of Rome—some indignant at the arrest, which their innocence of the conspiracy had made an outrage and a wrong, others mortified by the exposure and defeat of their schemes, and all chafing under their humiliation—were henceforth united by a common bond of hatred. The Tribune's ill-devised and ostentatious display of generosity had alienated those among the people who had suffered from the tyranny of the nobles, and who had loudly demanded their punishment. The too frequent recurrence of costly festivals had, moreover, affected the finances; and, amid growing difficulties, Rienzi was called upon to resist a formidable attack made upon the city by the barons, who, retiring sullenly to their castles, had gathered their forces and combined them, with the view of driving him from power. Though possessed of a courage which had been found equal to great occasions, he was no soldier; the defeat of the invaders was the result of their own precipitancy, and the fortitude of the citizens, rather than of any skill on the part of the Tribune. He failed to reap the fruit of the victory, but rather tarnished it by his insults over his fallen foes. Ambitious of military fame, yet destitute of the genius to acquire it, he endeavoured to strengthen the defences of the city by raising a permanent force from among the people, while at the same time he allowed the barons to hold the surrounding fortresses, and cut off the supplies of provisions. So long as his festivals and expensive display added nothing to their burdens, the populace were more than content; but now that he was compelled to raise the duty on salt, and spoke of the necessity of imposing new taxes, the luxury in which he lived, and the magnificence in which he indulged, were regarded as worse than mockery.

(To be continued.)

A SUPPOSED HEBREW TRADITION.

When in his youth David sat upon the plains of Bethlehem, the Spirit of Jehovah passed over him, and his soul was open to hear the songs of the night. The heavens proclaimed the glory of God, and all the stars united in a chorus. The echo of their hearts reached the earth—to the ends of the earth rolled on their silent song.

'Light is the countenance of Jehovah!' said the descending sun, and the crimson twilight answered, 'I am the fringe of his garment.'

The clouds towered above them, and said, 'We are his pavilion;' and the water of the clouds uttered in the evening thunder, 'The voice of Jehovah moves upon the clouds: the God of glory thunders; the God of glory thunders on high!' 'He rides upon the winds!' murmured the rustling wind; and the silent air responded, 'I am the breath of God—the tissue of his quickening presence.'

'We hear songs of praise,' said the fainting earth, 'and must I be still and speechless?' 'I will bathe thee,' answered the falling dew, 'that thy children, newly refreshed, may rejoice—that thy suckling may blossom like the rose.'

'We blossom gladly,' said the enlivened field; and the full ears of grain rustling, replied, 'We are the blessings of God—the army of God against the extremity of hunger.'

'We bless you from above,' said the moon; 'We bless you,' answered the stars. The grasshopper chirped and whispered, 'He blesses me also with a little drop of dew.'

'And quenches my thirst,' answered the hind. 'He refreshes me,' said the bounding roe.

'And gives us food,' dreamed the deer. 'And clothes our limbs,' bleated the flock.

'He heard me,' croaked the raven, 'when I was forsaken.' 'He heard me,' answered the goat. 'When my time came, I went out and brought forth.'

The turtle-dove cooed, and the swallow and all the birds afterwards, slumbering, said, 'We have found our nest our habitations; we dwell upon the altar of God, and sleep under the shadow of his wing in silent rest.'

'In silent rest!' answered the night, and prolonged the lingering tone. Then crowed the announcer of the morning dawn: 'Lift up the gates—the doors of the world. Let the King of Glory enter in. Awake, ye men, and praise the Lord; the King of Glory is come!'

Up rose the sun, and David awoke from his dream so rich in psalms; and, so long as he lived, the tones of this harmonious creation lingered in his soul, and were daily breathed forth from his harp.—Herder.

RESIGNATION.

Carlyle says, 'One may lose happiness, and find instead blessedness;' but I take this as applying to nothing outside of the peace of God—that is, saintly blessedness, or the comfort of entire faith and hope of the sanctified Christian. It comes always from the casting of the soul upon God after a great sorrow has swept over it and left it desolate—desolate as to earthly hopes I mean; for no soul is utterly desolate which clings fast to the border of Christ's seamless robe—that robe which covers all human nakedness.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'So did not I, because of the fear of God.'—Neh. v. 15.

When Joseph was dealing with his brethren, he said, 'This do, and live; for I fear God' (Gen. xlii. 18). Such was Joseph's motive. When Colonel Gardner was challenged to fight a duel, he answered: 'I fear sinning; you know I do not fear fighting.' Such was his motive. So, when Nehemiah kept aloof from the evil ways of others, he gives his reason: 'So did not I, because of the fear of God.' Here, then, is Nehemiah's principle of action, both in what he did and in what he did not do—the fear of God. This was the one thing that kept him right, and prevented his turning aside to the right or left. Of the unrighteous it is said, 'The fear of God is not before his eyes;' of the righteous, 'The fear of God is before his eyes.' This is the great feature of difference between the two. It was this that operated and influenced all his proceedings—that moulded his life. He was, as we say, a God-fearing man; and he showed this in what he did, and in what he did not do.

Here, then, we have true conscientiousness; not merely natural uprightness of character, but the desire to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man. It is conscientiousness arising from the sense of God's presence,—the wish to please Him, the fear of offending Him, the desire to do all that is well-pleasing in his sight. As the love of Christ constraineth, so the fear of God makes conscientious.

Are we thoroughly conscientious? Is our conscience constantly at work,—not in the spirit of bondage or terror, but in that childlike gentleness and tenderness of conscience, that desires to have God's approbation in everything we do, and every word we speak? What a regulator to our life and conscience would be this fear of God! Let us consider the different spheres and operations of conscience. There is—

I. The religious conscience.—By this I mean the conscience exercising itself in the things of religion—in religious beliefs and actings. In our dealings with God,—in the service of God, in our testimony for God,—let us be thoroughly conscientious; not formal, superficial, perfunctory, but conscientious. If I act religiously simply because others do so, or because it involves my good name, or because of habit, I am not acting conscientiously. Let our religion mould our conscience, and let our conscience pervade our religion. I do not merely mean that a religious man should be a conscientious man, but that he should carry his conscientiousness into all that concerns religion.

II. The secular conscience.—Though not of the world, we are still in the world. We are hourly coming into contact with the world in public and private. Every movement of our daily life comes, more or less, into contact with the world: it may be collision, or it may be intercourse and mutual help in common things. Let us in all these be thoroughly conscientious,—in what we do, or in what we abstain from doing. Never let the world say of us, in reference to either word or deed: 'There goes a religious man without a conscience!' In all secular and social things let us manifest a conscientious spirit, and show to others that the fear of God is before our eyes. Let that fear regulate our daily intercourse and walk. Let a sense of responsibility toward God and our fellow-men be ever on edge.

III. The commercial conscience.—By this I mean conscience throwing itself into all our business transactions,—our buying or our selling, our giving or receiving; our bargains, our speculations,—whether merchant, lawyer, banker, farmer, tradesman, mechanic, or whatever our worldly calling may be. Let us take counsel with conscience continually. Let the fear of God be before our eyes in the counting-house, the shop, the warehouse, the market, or wherever our calling may place us. Hard-driven bargains, advantage taken of men's necessities, grinding of the poor, over-charges, unjust measures, dishonest statements as to goods sold or purchased,—these are not things into which conscience can enter. Let every man of business, on whatever scale, be out and out conscientious.

IV. The family conscience.—Into each circle of life, outer and inner, conscience must enter. The fear of God must reign in the family. We must be conscientious in our family dealings, making each member of it feel that we are acting in the fear of God. Let us be conscientious in our family circle, at our family table, in our treatment of our children, and in their education. Be conscientious with them and before them. Never let them see you do an unconscientious deed. Conscience says to each father and mother, 'Train up your child in the way he should go.' Oh! be conscientious with your children. They know what conscience is; how conscience operates and shows itself. Let the fear of God be stamped on all family arrangements. Servants, be conscientious to your masters, and masters to your servants.

V. The private conscience.—I must make conscience of all my individual, my private actings; when alone, unheard, unseen. I must be conscientious in my closet as well as in my family. I must be conscientious about my solitary, hidden actions. The fear of God must fill every chamber of my heart. I must be upright before myself and before God.

VI. The local conscience.—I must be conscientious everywhere, at home or abroad. I must carry my conscience with me when I travel, just as when I was at home. I read sometimes of Christian travellers spending their Sabbaths in sight-seeing! I find that some think it no evil to climb Mount Sinai or Mount Hermon on the Sabbath, because these are sacred scenes. They would not climb Snowdon or Ben-Lomond, but they would climb these foreign mountains! What sort of local conscience is this? Ought not a Christian to carry his conscience into every place; and when tempted to do abroad on the Sabbath what he would not do at home, to be able to say, 'This did not I, because of the fear of God?'

Cultivate a tender conscience—an enlightened conscience—a conscience void of offence; not morbid, or diseased, or crooked, or one-sided, or censorious, or supercilious, or proud; but simple, and bold, and sensitive. Beware of a blunted or seared conscience. Let the fear of God reign in you always and everywhere. Beware of the fear of man; cultivate the fear of God. The gospel, as well as the law, makes demands on your conscience. Conscience speaks to you in the name of Jesus Christ, as well as in that of God.

GALES OF THE SPIRIT.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

SONG OF SOLOMON IV. 16; V. 1.

'AWAKE, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out.' These are Christ's words. He is stirring up his people to seek communion. He regards the church as his garden, each saved soul as his garden. This is full of meaning. There is no garden on earth by nature, since Eden passed away. If we wish to have a garden, we must make it; we must break up the fallow ground, gather out the stones, build a wall or enclosure, sow and plant. Thus it is also with the soul of man. Since the image of God was effaced, it has been a dry, waste howling wilderness, yielding only hurtful or useless things. When Christ wishes to make it a garden, He must use great pains—be at unspeakable cost. The whole Godhead must take part in this great work of making an Eden—a garden of delights for God. When the soul is lying dead in trespasses and sins, the Father, in his rich mercy, must visit it, and quicken it with the powers of a new and better life. The Son must water it with his precious blood, to kill the roots of bitterness, and to prepare it for yielding new and better things. The Holy Ghost must come upon it, as the Spirit of grace and supplications; and so, instead of the brier there comes up the fir-tree, and instead of the thorn there comes up the myrtle-tree. The heavenly Husbandman sows it with the incorruptible seed of truth, and plants it with plants of righteousness. Yea, He stirs up the saved soul itself to take part in this work,—adding to his faith virtue, and knowledge, and temperance, and love; learning useful lessons from all the trials and events of life; following those who follow Christ fully; and seeking after all that is true, and honest, and holy, and of good report. Christ calls it his garden. He takes delight in it. See how He speaks of it here: 'A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse.'

Thus it should always be, thus it would always be, if it depended only on the Lord. He encamps around it, cares for it, as for the apple of the eye; He waters it every moment, and keeps it night and day. But the saved, converted souls, who form his garden, are not equally thoughtful, equally careful. The spirit is willing, the flesh is weak; and so they slumber and sleep. Grace is not in lively exercise; it is not stirred up. Thus it often happens that, when Christ comes, He finds things not as He would desire, not as He reasonably expects. He finds covetousness in the ascendant,—men eagerly seeking the present world, while heavenly things are little thought or spoken of. He finds evil tempers, pride, passion, discontent, censoriousness, flourishing; while meekness, gentleness, lowliness, thankfulness, scarcely appear. There is little to distinguish his garden from the world which surrounds it. He knows that grace is really there; but it is torpid, inactive, unproductive. There is no fragrance, no pleasant fruits. This is very trying and disappointing; and if He came in the spirit of Moses, He would condemn and punish. But grace and truth came by Jesus Christ, and in this spirit He seeks to heal and restore. He has the remedy in his hand: with Him is the residue of the Spirit. Oh, how largely and constantly we are indebted to this blessed Being, though we so little know and acknowledge it! Christ says, 'Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden.' The wind is ever the emblem of the Holy Ghost. He has manifold operations and influences; He convinces and He comforts; He blights and He cherishes. In every country there is some wind which has a killing, withering influence on vegetation. In our country it is the east wind; in Palestine it is the north wind, which, blowing over the snowy tops of Lebanon, chills and withers wherever it comes. And so here Christ calls for the north wind to blow, and kill the weeds and noxious things which are luxuriating where none of these should be. Awake, put on thy strength, and do thy work effectually! But this is only part. In all countries there is some particular wind which is favourable to vegetation,—genial, kindly, making all to spring, and grow, and blossom. In our country it is the west, or south-west; in Palestine it is the south; and so Christ calls on the south wind to blow, that thus all the fruits of the Spirit may begin to bloom and flourish. Come, O south wind, and blow, that the spices may flow out, and my garden become fragrant, pleasant, and useful. How quickly this divine agent, who garnished the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth, can revive and quicken the church of God, making it again like Eden,—making its beauty like that of Carmel and Sharon, and its smell like Lebanon! Christ has power and authority to do this. 'Awake, and blow upon my garden;' it is dear to me—dearer than life. It is my witness on earth, my representative, my masterpiece, my chief delight. Put away all in it that grieves and dishonours me, and make it yield all that pleases and glorifies. This is the Spirit's special work. He has come to mortify the flesh, which will not be subject to the Lord. He has come to implant and nourish grace, which is the new creature of God.

'Let my Beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits.' This is seeking communion. Here grace is working. Mere nature could not say this. It is grace; and not weak, cold, languid grace, but warm, fervent, strong. This is the fruit of the Spirit. The north wind and south wind have blown, and the spices are flowing out. There is here a cluster of precious grace: 'Let my Beloved come.' Mark this word 'Beloved.' Often there is such a contention and intermingling of earth and heaven, self and Christ, idols and God, in our hearts, that we are at a loss to say what we really love. But here there is no dubiety. Christ stands out supreme; He overtops all his competitors. He is 'as the apple-tree among the trees of the wood;' He is the Beloved. Mark also appropriation—'my Beloved.' He has given himself to me, and I have received Him; and I have given myself to Him, and He has received me. We are joined together for ever; we are betrothed, married to one another; and it is in judgment, mercy, and faithfulness. It can never be broken. He will never repent, neither shall I. 'Let Him come into his garden,'—not his word merely, though it is sweeter than honey; not his gifts merely, though they are very enriching; not his ordinances merely, though they are very feeding and refreshing; but himself, his very self. Let Him come nearer—nearer to my heart of hearts. This is strong, lively grace. Nature keeps the door barred against Him. Weak grace lets Him stand at the door, while it is debating what it should do: 'I have put off my coat; how can I put it on? I have washed my feet; how can I defile them?' Let Him come, but not yet, not now. But lively grace stands on tiptoe, looking out, listening. It cries, 'I have opened the door; I am waiting, longing, ready to welcome. "Come into thy garden, and eat thy pleasant fruits." Lord, I am thy garden; by thy grace I am what I am. My fruits are thine; take what Thou wilt; take all, for I give all; I withhold nothing. It is my honour, privilege, delight, to please and minister to Thee.'

But the flesh and Satan, who uses it as his organ, try to check and chill this fervent love and expectation. Something seems to say to the happy soul: 'Take heed; He is the Judge; his eyes are as a flame of fire; He requires and expects perfection; and it is neither with you nor your house as it should be.' But there is no fear in love; 'perfect love casteth out fear;' and so the happy soul goes on its way, saying, 'Iniquities prevail against me; but as for our transgressions, Thou wilt purge them away.' Let Him come. I know that I have many defects. There is much that is wrong and out of order; but I bring all to Him, and He will not despise me, will not cast me out. I am sure that there is far more evil in me than I know; but He will perfect that which concerneth me. 'I will hear what God the Lord will speak.' He will dig about me, and prune me, and not leave me untended. Happy confidence of love! it knows that the Lord is ready to be pleased, that He takes the will for the deed, and that his very presence will make a plentiful feast. 'Let Him come and eat his pleasant fruits.' Such a desire is never neglected, never overlooked. Confidence in Christ is never misplaced—can never be too great. Hear his own words. He says, 'Before they call, I will answer them; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.' And so it is in this place: 'Let Him come;' and the answer is: 'I am come into my garden.' Wherever his people meet in faith and love, He is in the midst of them; but often his presence is unseen, unfelt. But here He fulfils his word: 'I will manifest myself to you.' I will make you know that I am with you, and that the place is Bethel—Jehovah Shammah. This is an experience which the world cannot know. 'I am come; I am here.' He looks around. It is a garden to Him; it is his garden. Each tree has interesting memories. He thinks what it once was; the pains He bestowed upon it; the state in which it now is. His heart is full of love and thankfulness as He walks in his garden. This is conscious fellowship; and we should oftener have it, if we oftener sought it, and hearkened for his reply. See the appellation which He here uses: 'My sister, my spouse.' The first of these terms, 'my sister,' He can use to all. It is our common birthright; for He took our nature, and became our Brother. But the second term, 'spouse,' He can only use to those who have accepted Him; who have closed with God's offer, and made Christ their own sister by nature, spouse by grace,—sister, by his act of taking our human nature; spouse, by our act of taking Him by faith, and resting upon Him for salvation.

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER VII.

OUT IN TENTS.

'EMILY,' said Walter, as he rode up beside me one afternoon in June, 'you don't look very well. We must encamp again, and I have found a good place. Let us turn off here to the left, and I will show it to you.'

'But your painting?'

'Oh, I shall go into town every day. I have found a place just the right distance from town; and the ride will do me good, and my horse too.'

The place was considerably to the left of the Jaffa road, in the direction of the tombs of the Judges. Winding in and out among lanes, crossing fields, climbing over terraces, we reached a most delightful little nook among rocks and olive-trees, and a delicious green plantation of sumach bushes.

'Here, Emily, is not this charming? Your tent shall be down there between the rocks and olives. I will put mine on the terrace above. That cave will just do for your kitchen; and there, yonder, is a place shady and fit for the horses; and here, oh! delightful—stop—don't come a step farther; guess what I have found, Emily!'

'Something very sweet, I can smell that. It is honeysuckle.'

It was honeysuckle, in wild luxuriance and full blossom, festooning the grey rocks.

'This is delicious. How comes it we never saw this place before?'

'It is hidden down in the hollow. Now then, Emily, home, and out in tents by Saturday evening.'

My heart danced at the idea of more tent life, and our preparations were soon made.

On Friday morning, Constantine came to me. 'O lady, Um Habeeb says she cannot go out to tents, because she must stay and marry her daughter.'

'When does she want to leave me?'

'This evening; the wedding will be on Sabbath.'

Here was a difficulty; but Constantine was ready with advice.

'If it please thee, Haj Omar will go to Bethlehem this evening, and bring back Katrina tomorrow at sunrise.'

'Will she come?'

'She will come; I asked her when I met her in the bazaar yesterday. And Sarah will come every day and take care of the house.'

The servants, then, had arranged it all among themselves; but there was no better plan to be devised. So Haj Omar went to Bethlehem, and Um Habeeb kissed my hand that evening and left us, and Katrina came next morning and entered upon her duties, making her presence known by a great splashing, and clashing, and washing of court and terrace, with a vigour of style totally unknown to her town-bred predecessor, as brisk as if she had not walked barefoot from Bethlehem to Jerusalem, between early dawn and sunrising, with a huge basket of fresh figs on her head; the said figs having been gathered, all sparkling with dew, from her own trees before peep of day.

She came up to kiss my hand, and then, throwing her veil across her mouth, stood waiting, tall, upright, and statuesque, in the long folds of her blue and white drapery.

'What may thy name be, in peace?'

'Katrina; thy slave, Katrina.'

'What canst thou do, O Katrina? Canst thou cook?'

'I can cook, and I can knead, and I can wash, under thy favour.'

'What canst thou cook?'

'Everything—meat, and peppered rice (i.e., pillaff), and mahhshy (stuffed vegetables), and stews and rice milk. El Hamdulillah, I can cook everything!'

'Canst thou do Frank cooking?'

'If the lady will teach me.'

'What is thy religion? Art thou a Greek?'

'God forbid; I am a Latin.'

She was a comely, active woman, with fair complexion. Constantine vouched for her being honest, and I engaged her at once.

She was very fond of proving her Latin dependence, by using all the Italian words she could, and would never say anything but 'Buon giorno,' 'Come stre?' and other such phrases, instead of the Arab salutations; and she wore round her neck a little gilt cross of the Latin form. I did not see it the first evening, and think she must have put it on to satisfy me that she could be no Greek. At first I found a little difficulty in understanding her country dialect after the Jerusalem Arabic; but that soon wore off, and it was easy to perceive that hers was far richer in words as well as more sonorous.

She had a good voice, too, and would chant by the half hour over her work, provided Walter was not within hearing. Once or twice I caught the subject of her songs—a sort of recitation about the incidents in the domestic life of St. Amne (the mother of the Virgin Mary), Joseph, her betrothed, and the Virgin herself. Most curious it was in its Arab complexion—in the allusions to Arab manners, and customs, and incidents. Most assuredly, in Katrina's mind, the Virgin Mary was nothing but a Bethlehem woman exalted into a blessed saint.

The owner of our new ground brought his mules—two strong, wicked-looking animals—to fetch our baggage and tents, and by sunset we were fully established at the honeysuckle rocks, as we named our new abode, the horses picketed under their several trees, and Haj Omar, smoking the pipe of contentment, while the others prepared our supper in the cavern kitchen, which turned out to be the portico of an ancient sepulchre. The entrance to the interior burying-places was in one corner, and choked up with stones and earth.

There was a similar grotto in a lower terrace; and here the family of our landlord had established themselves—wives, children, donkeys, chickens, and all,—that they might be near the threshing-floor of smooth rock, where the old white-bearded patriarch of the family and his sons were threshing out the grain but lately reaped from their own fields.

Long before dawn I was awoke by a heavy rumbling sound. Two women were at the mill, grinding some of the newly-threshed wheat. They went on grinding till about sunrise, and then, kneading the flour in a wooden bowl, left it to ferment, while they gathered thorns and sticks to heat their primitive oven, viz. an earthenware vessel half sunk in the ground. The fuel was heaped round, the dough spread out into thin cakes, cleverly thrown into the oven (which had a narrow mouth at the top), so as to adhere to the sides, and in a quarter of an hour the bread was baked, and all the working done for the day. This bread, a few onions, or figs, or a cucumber, were almost their only food. I think I only twice saw them stewing a mess of rice for their supper during the whole time of our encampment.

They brought us milk from their goats, and figs, and pears, and plums, greengages and apples from their own trees, and their chickens supplied us with eggs. One of the boys used to bring spring water every day from the village, half an hour distant. They did not molest us in any way, and seemed very glad to have us among them.

One evening Walter and I were sitting under a tree in the twilight, and overheard the old sheikh and his son talking after their day's work was done. They were discussing politics—the interests of the Aboo Gosh faction, to which they belonged, and the recent doings of their rival, Othman the Butcher, and his clan in the south-west. Hostilities were evidently impending between them. Then they talked over the presents they should make to an Effendi, who had been in exile, but was lately returned from Constantinople with the new Pasha. One was for giving the best she-goat of his flock, which abounded in milk. The father objected; waving his hand majestically, said he, 'A lamb, the son of a year, fat and tender, would it not be much better?' Walter was reminded of the shepherds in one of Virgil's Eclogues; but then there was the Oriental idea of backsheesh here, the object being to propitiate favour with the great man, and enlist him on their side in the dispute with some village rival.

One evening we went down in the moonlight to watch them threshing; usually they worked from early dawn till about ten o'clock in the day, and then, after a sleep of two or three hours, would go on till sunset. It was very pleasant for me, sitting at work, when Walter had ridden off to town, to watch them driving the cattle round and round, calling to them cheerfully as they went, sometimes singing; and to see the winnowing done, the grain tossed up to the breeze with a shovel, so that the chaff was blown on one side, while the heavier corn fell in a heap at the feet of the husbandmen. They were all generally asleep every evening as soon as it became dusk. But this beautiful night was not one for sleep. The moonlight poured down in a flood upon valley and plain,—the nearer hills marked the massy forms of the distant mountains, and revealed the Moab range, trembling like a shadowy curtain of blue in the far east,—silvered the leaves of the olive-tree, illumined our tents with snowy brightness, and cast deep heavy shadows from the ancient rocks.

There was almost the brilliancy of day, and yet the coolness of night. The very animals seemed to understand that it would be a shame to be idle, and cheerfully pursued their monotonous round—a white horse, two cows, a donkey, and a mule all yoked together. We perceived that they were muzzled.

'Knowest thou not, O Sheikh, that Neby Moosa forbade men to muzzle the cattle when they thresh? It is harâm (unlawful, a shame implied).'

'Do I know, O Bek? I am a Fellahh.'

'But thou knowest who Neby Moosa was?'

'Certainly. He was a prophet, a great prophet. Do we not go on pilgrimage to his tomb?'

'He lived very long ago,' said Haj Omar, who had followed us. 'Who can tell how long ago? Praised be He who alone knoweth.'

'Before Ibrahim Pasha?' said a boy, who was goading the cattle round with a long stick.

'Before Ibrahim Pasha!' cried Constantine. 'Ignorant that thou art, Neby Moosa lived before the flood!'

'What dost thou know of Ibrahim Pasha, thou child?' said an elder brother. 'He died before thou wast born.'

'Liar!' cried the young one. 'I was born before he died. O my uncle, bear witness that I speak truth.'

'I know not when thou wast born.'

'Thou knowest the red cow?'

'I know her.'

'Well, her grandmother bore her mother three days before I was born.'

'Sabheebh, it is true,' gravely said the uncle, and stroked his beard.

Then asked I, 'How old is the boy?'

'Do I know, lady? It was before Ibrahim Pasha left this country; for the red cow's mother was taken to pay my taxes in his time.'

Haj Omar laughed. 'They are Fellahheen, O lady. Fellahheen are like cattle. Can they tell how old they are?'

Haj Omar himself could not tell his own age, Egyptian, and grown though he was.

One evening the Consul and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Wells, called upon us; the post had come in from England, and they kindly brought us our letters.

Good news is easily despatched, and often leaves as little mark behind as the smooth flowing river. The presence of our guests did not prevent our glancing inside the letters to look for the words, 'All well,' which are sure to come somewhere in a good letter. That done, we were ready and glad to show them the wonders and beauties of our encampment. When all had been seen, and we were sipping our coffee, I grew bold, and invited our visitors to come and spend a day with us. Mr. Wells's business would not allow of this, but Mrs. Wells was delighted at the idea; and so it was settled for the day after next, that she was to come to breakfast, and Walter was to call for Mr. Wells on his way out to dinner. 'Dinner!' that was an alarming word. Had I really invited any one to DINNER? Yes, it was done. And now Katrina and I must provide a dinner as well as our joint abilities might allow, and hope that Mr. Wells was not one of those unhappy Europeans who came to these countries, and are unable to touch any but European dishes; for my teaching had not yet made a Frank cook of Katrina.

I gave Constantine his marketing orders the evening before, with directions to bring none but 'lamb mutton;' on no account goat's flesh, however young or tender (though really young kid is savoury enough); to bring the finest of musk melons for breakfast, and the largest of water melons for dinner; besides tomatoes for stuffing, and purple egg-fruit for frying. Chickens, to be stuffed with rice, had been furnished by our Fellahh neighbours, as well as new-laid eggs for breakfast; and Haj Omar took such an interest in the great event of the English Consul's lady visiting us, that he actually got up at daybreak, and walked off to town to fetch a dish of the earliest prickly pears in the market, and was back again before the sun had risen high enough to rob this delicious fruit of any of its icy coldness.

Mrs. Wells arrived in due time, escorted by her groom and red-coated kawass.

My domestic anxieties were not called forth on account of breakfast, for Katrina made excellent omelettes and coffee.

Constantine arrived soon after, driving a little donkey, with an ear and a half, hired for the occasion from the threshing-floor, and laden with the various eatables. He looked rather sad, and my heart fluttered lest the marketing had been unsuccessful. Perhaps the soldiers or the Pasha's cook had bought all the mutton, and there was none left for us. No, it could not be that, for Katrina was disentangling a charming leg of mutton and its bobbing tail of fat from the basket of tomatoes, and on the ground lay a prodigious water melon of above thirty pounds weight. The dinner was safe, so far, though Constantine had had a squabble with one of the soldiers for the leg of mutton, and only rescued it by the help of one of the Consul's kawasses, who happened to be passing. The butchers had only killed two sheep that day.

'What is the matter, Constantine?'

'O lady—the money won't pass.'

'Why not?—is it not good money?' (a Spanish dollar and a Turkish dollar, and various small coins, all usually current.)

'Nobody would take it at the price, because the Pasha has sent criers into the bazaars, that every dollar is to be three piastres (one-sixth) less, and small pieces one piastre less.'

'But why is not the money good?'

Katrina and Haj Omar interposed. 'It is on account of the taxes. After the Fellahheen have paid the taxes the money will rise again.'

'Then everybody must lose now?'

'Of course,' said Haj, 'that the Dowleh (Government) may gain. What else are governments for?'

'True,' chimed in Katrina ruefully; 'I shall lose more than one hundred piastres in paying the taxes of our family.'

Walter was chatting all this time with Mrs. Wells; but I bethought me that I ought to go to them. 'Well, Constantine, what did you do if nobody took your money?'

'I went to everybody; and at last I left the dollars in pledge with the butcher till to-morrow. He said, for your sake he would take it; but he is afraid of the Pasha; if he pays it at that price to any one, they will imprison him. I spent the small money, and lost upon it; but what could I do, Sitti? You wanted the dinner.'

Poor Fellahheen, thought I, what an unjust extortion this is! Over and above the amount of their taxes, they lose upon each coin, whose value has been arbitrarily raised for the moment, that the Pasha may gain upon the transaction.

Mrs. Wells told me that everybody was talking of this, because everybody was inconvenienced and a loser. 'Mr. Wells was speaking only yesterday to an Arab gentleman about improvement of the country, and bettering the condition of the peasantry, and got for answer: "O Bey, with your Government and with your Queen (may her days be prolonged) such things would be possible; but the Fellahheen and we here are like a frog in a birkeh (pond), who was asked by a man to sing him a song. 'Willingly,' cried the frog, 'only the water chokes me.' These Pashas who come for a year, and are very poor, and want to be rich, and all these greedy, hungry Effendis, they choke us and the Fellahheen, and all the country, in the name of the government. How can we improve anything?"'

. . . . . .

Our dinner was a perfect success—a triumph of Arab cookery, slightly modified à l'Anglaise. Mr. Wells was as easy to please as his wife; and my anxious flutterings vanished before Katrina's excellent soup, her boiled and roast—not to speak of her 'sheikh el mahhshy,' which may be translated 'prince of stuffed meats,' i.e. egg-fruit filled with mince-meat, and her dish of 'cats' ears,' i.e. little affairs of paste (so called from their shape) filled with cheese, and immensely savoury. We were seated around the camp table, under our olive dining-tree; the gentlemen, as usual, talked politics, corn laws, free trade, Cardinal Wiseman, Louis Philippe, and the Oregon question—all from a Jerusalem point of view. Then they turned to subjects nearer home—the depreciation of the currency, the new Pasha—allowed by all to be the very opposite of his vigorous, unscrupulous predecessor; a little effeminate man, wearing kid gloves and exquisite boots, his very name, Zareep, signifying 'pretty.'

'How will such a man govern the country?'

'Not at all. The very people who suffered most from the severity of the late Pasha, are now praising his firmness in keeping down the peasantry. We have had a specimen at Nablûs already. This new "pretty Pasha," in passing through, put in, as tax farmers, some ignorant pipe or slipper bearer of his own. The town rose against him, and the Pasha gave way at once. The peasantry down here in the south won't be quiet long—only till their harvest is over.'

'Do you mean that they will fight then, Mr. Wells?'

'Yes, I do. Have not all the guns and swords reappeared from their hiding-places? There is not a man or boy without them, now that the old Pasha is gone. But don't be alarmed, Miss Russell, they won't molest English people.'

'By-the-bye, Mr. Wells, is it true,' asked Walter, 'that an immense body of the wild Bedawan have crossed Jordan, near Tiberias? I was told this morning 5000 men, of whom 500 wear chain armour, are encamped thereabouts.'

'It is true; but my accounts add that a large body of the Sultan's regular cavalry, under Mohammed Pasha, is also there, and that the Bedawan are treating with him about the escort of the Haj to Mecca. It is said that they want to settle down near Jordan, and are willing to pay tribute to the Sultan of a hundred horses of pure breed.'

'Ah,' cried Walter, 'I have seen nothing of Bedaway life yet. I must try and get among some of these great tribes some day.'

---

CHAPTER VIII.

RACHEL'S VISIT TO OUR CAMP.

At last Rachel spent a day with us at the tents. She had long been invited; but somehow there was always something to prevent her coming. However, she came at last, and a delightful day it was.

We had lately got a camel load of pine branches from the Hebron hills, and made a bower under an old olive tree, with the help of its drooping boughs. It was on the uppermost terrace of our domain, and from it there was a lovely view of Olivet. Here Rachel and I passed the hours of Walter's absence; for he, not guessing who was coming, had gone to town very early, being at an interesting part of his picture. So she and I had the quiet hours all to ourselves.

The cool north-west breeze brought us not only sweet odours from the distant hills, but, as it played through our shady bower, mingled the perfumes it had brought with the aromatic fragrance of the pine.

A pomegranate tree, on the terrace just below, was the favourite resort of all the goldfinches from the fruit-trees around; and it was delightful to watch the tiny, beautiful creatures perch on the topmost twigs and pour forth their varied song.

We were happy, and we read, and worked, and conversed. The day flew swiftly by; and I was surprised, on raising my head for something, to see the groom walking my brother's horse up and down.

'Walter is come!'

'Yes, it is time; it is past three o'clock.'

The flow of colour had not entirely faded from Rachel's cheeks before Walter appeared, bending, as those needs must who would enter my lowly bower; and his eye brightened in a most satisfactory manner at the sight of my guest. Of course it was necessary for me to see that Katrina was sending the dinner to table with all due decorum; but afterwards Walter told me a part of the conversation which I had thus missed, for it concerned me indirectly at least.

Dinner was over when Abraham made his appearance, just as Constantine was putting on the table a dish of grapes—the first we had had this season.

'I have come,' said he, in his dry way, 'like the twelve spies, to see the land at the time of first ripe grapes.'

'But not to be frightened at the inhabitants?'

'No; they are not giants in my eyes; and I hope I am not a grasshopper in theirs.'

'By-the-bye,' said Walter, 'it never occurred to me before that it was in the middle of summer that the spies came up from the desert. They must have had hot work of it.'

'Not at all, my dear sir; they would think it cool and green also in the mountains after the dry wilderness.'

'Now that we know the country and its seasons a little, we can make out how long it took them to go through it, beginning now in July at the time of first ripe grapes.'

'Yes, they finished when the pomegranates were ripe and the figs had been dried. Figs can't be carried so far unless they are dried; the grapes could, on a stick, but the figs were dry.'

'That was in October; so it took them about four months.'

'I want to ask you something else, Abraham. What does it mean in the law of Moses, when it says that the children of Israel might eat meat "like as the roebuck and like as the hart?"'

'I think in this way, Mr. Walter. They were not allowed to eat of their flocks or herds in the wilderness; for you read that they had no meat when the quails were sent; and again, in the eleventh chapter of Numbers, where Moses asks God whether the flocks and the herds should be slain for them. But they might eat the roebuck and hart of the desert; the flocks were kept for the sacrifices, and only the clean could taste them. But Moses told them that when they got to the promised land, they might use sheep and oxen for food, and both clean and unclean might eat of them. "Like as the roebuck and like as the hart;" that is, the wild gazelles in the wilderness.'

'That must be the explanation. How often those words have puzzled me! but that seems simple enough.'

Conversation then turned upon the incidents of the day, and I had a little adventure to relate. Before Rachel's arrival in the morning, I had been sitting alone reading, when I thought I saw some one come quietly up to the tent door. At first I did not look up; but when I did it, behold, an immense tall Fellahh, with villanous face, standing before me. He had a black serpent, at least eight feet long, hung round his neck. Its tail touched the ground on one side, and its neck was hanging looped up so as to allow of the head resting in the man's hand on the other. He looked steadily at me, and the snake twinkled its fiery eyes; and then the man came nearer, and lifting up a little kind of battle-axe which he held in his right hand, he stretched it out over my head, and began muttering some incantation. I was fairly frightened, though I tried to look bold, and called aloud for Katrina. She came running, and Haj Omar too. They sent the man away, and told him that such doings were all well enough for Fellahheen, but were of no use for the Ingleez. They both seemed afraid of him; at least they were very respectful in their way of speaking.

'No one else will be afraid of that poor man,' said Abraham gravely, 'he has killed himself with his wickedness.'

'Killed himself?'

'Yes; when I was coming through the Jaffa gate now, there were many people gathered to see a serpent-charmer; and he had in his bosom a large, thick red serpent, and the serpent bit him, and in one moment he was dead!'

'How dreadful!'

'He was a tall man, as you say, and he had still the black serpent round his neck.'

'Haj Omar says that those black serpents never hurt any one.'

'It is wonderful,' observed Walter, 'that in this hot climate we see so few venomous creatures. Whatever snakes and scorpions there are, they keep out of our way.'

Abraham next had news for us about his nephew Judah, who had heard something of his wife. She was in Riga, on the Baltic Sea. A young Jew, who had just arrived, and whose history was a romance in itself, had sought out Judah, to inquire, by desire of his wife, whether Judah still wore his 'peahs.'

Judah could get no information about his child. The young man either did not know, or would not tell him, what had become of the infant. But one thing was certain, that Mariam had not married again; and poor Judah's hope, so long deferred, might not be in vain.

'She will come back, Miss Russell. I am quite sure she will come back; she loves her husband too much to marry any other. Perhaps she also will become a Christian—who knows?'

(To be continued.)

COLUMBA, THE FIRST MISSIONARY TO SCOTLAND.

(Continued from p. 185.)

IT has been sometimes alleged that there were priests or emissaries of Druidism in Hy, at the period of Columba's landing. But if this supposition be not altogether borne out by evidence, it is certain that that most baleful superstition was dominant in Caledonia, and that Brud, the king of the Northern Picts, whose palace was situated on the banks of the Ness, was, at once its energetic patron and abject slave. It was therefore on Caledonia, and Castle Phadric, and Brud, that the eye of our Irish missionaries is fixed; and for our fathers scattered throughout that wild region, his bowels yearn in deep compassion. They have fasted, and prayed, and meditated, that their spirit might be chastened before God. But this is not for what they came out, and they cannot rest satisfied with their own spiritual advancement. Columba is not a recluse, but an evangelist; he is an apostle, not an ascetic; and as one thirsting to do battle with the great enemy, he determines at once to challenge the priests of idolatry in their strongest fastness—under the very shadow of the court. It could not be an easy thing in those days—twelve hundred years ago—to travel more than a hundred miles by sea and land; it is not even every brave man who is brave enough to confront the magians of Druidism, the Jannes and Jambres of the Caledonian Pharaoh. But the love of Christ and souls is deep in the heart of Columba; and 'the loudest groans,' it is said, 'that ever broke from his lips, were those to which he gave vent when told of the death of an impenitent sinner.' Accordingly, with two chosen and trusty friends, he sets forth on the errand of dispelling the shadow of death from this unhappy kingdom, and giving light to them who sit in darkness.

The three heroic men cross to Mull, and, passing through it, they land at Oban. Among the Scots of Argyll—their own countrymen from Ireland—doubtless they would declare a faithful message, and seek to win souls from death. It is almost certain they would find relatives and kinsmen on these coasts, and would not their meeting be one of tenderest affection? But having refreshed their brethren after the flesh, and being refreshed themselves, they go upon their way. As yet there were no military roads, nor wayside inns, for the weary and benighted. On the contrary, wild beasts infested some of the forests which they had to wind through; on one occasion the village where they slept was set on fire, and at another place a man rushed furiously on Columba with a spear. Nevertheless our intrepid missionaries, staff in hand, and wallet strung across the shoulder, traverse Appin, and Lorn, and Lochaber, and Glengarry, until at length, reaching Loch Ness, they stand before the gates of the palace. To the joy of Columba, he is the means of bringing into the light of Christ a whole family, consisting of a father on his dying bed, with all his children, in the sequestered vale of Glen Urquhart, which lies not far from the royal residence where he was going; but the tidings of what he had done being carried to the court, an unfavourable impression was in all likelihood produced. At all events, whatever might be the reason, it turned out that when Columba sought an audience of the monarch, it was peremptorily refused, and it would seem as if the darkness of our native land were about to settle into impenetrable night. The apostle of Iona, however, was not the man whom opposition could discourage, and with his companions he sang the forty-sixth Psalm: 'God is our refuge and strength, a very present help,' under the palace walls, and within earshot of Brud. Nevertheless the king still repelled the heavenly envoy, and the magi, led by Broichan, the Elymas of his day, urged and demanded that Columba be instantly sent off. In spite of this sorcerer and his sorceries, however, the mind of the sovereign, after a little while, underwent a singular change; and, whether he were savingly converted or not, Brud was now willing that Columba should prosecute the errand on which he had come, and from this time evinced an affectionate interest in his operations. There seems every reason to believe that the monarch proceeded so far as to make over the island of Iona to our missionary at this time, and thus gave him formal possession of what was his only by sufferance hitherto.

Columba had thus won an easy but effectual entrance for the truth of salvation into the heart of Caledonia; and from this date Paganism, with its manifold evils, fell into rapid decay, whilst the knowledge of Christ rose like the morning star over the darkness of the northern forests. Yet was it little that a single voice could do in waking up the land which had lain so long asleep and frozen in spiritual apathy; and who shall uphold the triumphs that have been secured when the first conquerors are gone? Columba realized the dilemma, and, a shrewd man as well as an eminent saint, not more an enthusiastic missionary than a true statesman, he at once determines that he will train converted natives as ministers, he and his associates still going forth on all sides to preach the gospel, and add saved ones to the church. With this view he returns to Iona, and in A.D. 568 he founds a monastery, as the grand means by which he hoped ultimately to evangelize and regenerate Scotland.

With a monastery we generally associate asceticism and Popery—a monk and a Jesuit. So the first idea of many will be that Columba was, after all, an emissary and tool of Rome, equally with Ninian and Palladius. Let us explain, then, that what, with reference to Iona, we loosely or inadvertently call a monastery, was in substance, and form, and purpose, nothing else than a theological academy or evangelistic institute, and framed after models which Columba had seen in Asia Minor, long before the Papacy had debased them into instruments of impious domination. The inmates were not there immured, as in a dismal prison, for all the years of a life, which was no better than a tardy death; but as in a well-equipped gymnasium, with erudite masters, and rigid discipline, and animating fellowship, they were laboriously educated for the church during a curriculum which lasted seven years, though in the case of St. Munn not fewer than eighteen years was the period of study. 'Monk,' no doubt, in its literal meaning, signifies alone, and 'monastery' has come to denote solitude. But from all that can be gathered from documents or tradition, it may be affirmed that 'the monks' of Iona were alone in no other sense than Moses was alone, and Paul was alone, and John was alone, and Christ was alone, when they were withdrawn from the world for a time, ere they entered on their field of enterprise. And 'the monastery' of Iona was a solitude only as Midian, and Arabia, and Patmos, and Nazareth were solitudes. Mediæval ecclesiastics may call the graduates of 'I' monks, and its college a monastery, if it suits them; but it is not by any means clear that these designations were used by Columba; and the presumption is, that they were attached in an after age by Rome, with the hope of irradiating its own discreditable institutions with the halo of our apostle. At all events, it cannot be too well understood, that the monks of Columba's monastery were at no time men who had renounced by vow the living world for ever; but were ingenuous youths who had it in their heart, as the end of their life, to sally forth, when they had got their armour on, to face the world, to challenge the world, to do battle with the world, to spend their days in the world, and retire not from the conflict until they had covered the world with the truth as it is in Jesus.

The title of abbot is lavishly given to Columba, and this is redolent enough of the Italian pontiff, one is apt to think. But the name was, in all probability, derived from Egypt, and not from the Romish hierarchy; and this at least is certain, that Columba obtained his diploma, whatever be its value, neither from Italian pope nor Egyptian patriarch. He assumed it at his own hand; and though 'abbot,' he is neither what in a later age was called a mitred abbot, nor a crosiered abbot, but was simply the principal, the rector, the president, the patron, of the hall. It is not denied that Columba exercised jurisdiction over affiliated societies which had sprung from his own; but his jurisdiction was academic, not ecclesiastical, and consisted, during all his own reign, less in positional authority than personal influence; for nothing is better established than the fact that, though surnamed 'abbot,' Columba was never a prelate, but only a presbyter—'abbas et presbyter,'—a pastor as related to the church, a principal as presiding over a college. An individual has recently called himself 'Bishop of the Isles,' and seems to imagine that by this talisman he serves himself heir, not merely to Iona's historical interest, but to Columba's ecclesiastical dignity. Unhappily, however, for this ambitious dream, it is indisputable that at no stage of his course was Columba ever more than an ordained minister. And though we read of Saint Columba, an epithet given to him whilst still a boy, we nowhere read of Bishop Columba. The Scottish Episcopal Church may, if they choose, trace their Orders in lineal succession through Ninian up to the See of Rome, but by no invention can they make Columba a link to connect them either with the apostles or the early church. 'One thing,' says J. H. Burton, 'is clear, that no bishop had authority in Iona,' . . . 'and no bishop was connected with the island in the days of Columba.'

We have seen what an 'abbot' is, and what a 'monastery' is; let us now pass into that bare quadrangle of uncouth huts, which accommodates the college over which Columba presides. And we enter no cell of broken hearts, or useless lives, or quivering slaves; we meet there no cloister devotee counting his beads, no sanctimonious Eremite scourging his flesh. It is a Christian academy, with its calm retreat, and devout regularity, and earnest studies, and heavenly worship; where we find, on this hand, the saint in his closet, for the morn has just broken; and on that, the scholar in his library, for it is now midday. Columba could not indeed have any printed books in his hall, for it was not till A.D. 1440 that types were cast; but he had manuscripts, rare and choice, both classical and patristic, which he had collected when travelling in foreign parts; and either to peruse or transcribe these works, was his ardent delight as a man of literature and refinement. It is no other than Gibbon who throws out the idea that there was a library of classic authors in Iona; and he even goes the length of fancying that a complete manuscript of Livy was once there. Columba possessed the Bible, and he studied it with every help he could command; he appealed to it as his rule both of faith and duty, and he had no greater pleasure than writing it over with his own hand. It is rumoured that a copy of the four evangelists, which himself had made, was in existence last century; and it is certain that he would spend whole days in exploring a single passage which was difficult or profound. Ever ready to submit himself to Scripture, Columba was well acquainted with all that apostles had taught of the way that leads us back to God; and, like the Waldenses, he was a Protestant many centuries before the Edict of Spires was issued and disclaimed, holding that the blood of Christ alone takes sin away. For it is thus he sings his faith and hope, in a hymn to 'The Redeemer,' which happily has come down to us:

'Jesus! may all who trust in Thee,
Experience thy love!
That Thou art God for evermore,
By our salvation prove.

Thou art the refuge of the just:
Our souls have life in Thee!
Thou art our God omnipotent,
And endlessly shalt be!

Thy glory shines above the skies,
Where Thou art God and King:
And to that New Jerusalem,
Thy people Thou wilt bring!

The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
While I have life, I'll praise:
And after death, in other worlds,
My song again I'll raise!

Gracious Saviour of mankind,
The pure are thy delight:
Oh! give me wisdom from on high,
To guide my feet aright.

As Thou didst suffer on the cross,
To save a guilty race;
Show me thy power and love,
And glory add to grace.

Protect us, O Thou God most true!
Until we reach the place,
Where endless anthems we shall sing,
And see thy blessed face.'

The Sabbath was honoured at Iona; and though he taught that works of necessity or mercy were on no plea to be neglected, Columba loved and revered God's day of holy rest. At home he kept the season devoutly with all his students; and when on a journey, he always remained wherever the sun went down upon him on Saturday night, till it rose on Monday morning. The abbot of 'Hy' was a man of prayer; and prayer alternated with study in his mission-house. It was neither by rosary nor service-book he conducted his devotions; but just as the heart prompted the tongue spoke, and the breath of his life was prayer. He prayed when he went into his little chariot, and when he saw the milk brought from the field, and when the wind blew adversely, and when the corn was ripening, and when he fell asleep he still continued to pray. Among his little band of catechumens, our patriarch kept up worship according to the rule of Christ; and though he may have exaggerated fasting, and used the sign of the cross almost as a charm, and made too much of tonsure, and observed without enjoining celibacy, it is satisfactory to know that his only sacramental rites were baptism and the Lord's Supper.

Such was the system pursued at Icolumkill under the rule of its founder: its doctrine evangelical, its worship Protestant, its government not episcopal, its literature extensive. And in this divinity hall there was a light kindled which shed its radiance over many regions, and across many ages. Much study was there promoted, and various learning acquired. Much truth was here inculcated, and deep holiness unfolded. Many a saint was here reared up for strenuous activity; and from this they went out as the legates of Christ to all lands. From the day when first his expedition was set on foot, Columba had coadjutors of like spirit to his own, such as Kiaran, and Kenneth, and Colman, who simply preached the gospel as the Scriptures reveal it, and who have left their name in the places where they wrought. But in addition to these veterans, who belonged to Ireland, younger men from Scotland, bred and moulded within the walls of Iona, such as Cornac and Ronan, became the heralds of the cross; and whilst the pioneers of Rome never failed to select for their settlements the richest vales of England, it was Tiree, and Rona, and Oronsay, and St. Kilda, and the Flannans, and the Orkneys, and Iceland, which the licentiates of our abbot chose as the scenes of their labour. In due time, however, they spread over all the domain of the Picts, as well as the territory of the Scots; so that, ere he rested from his labours, Columba could point to one hundred monasteries, or seats of learning, and three hundred churches for the true worship of God, rising over all this northern land.

It was a great work for one man to have achieved; chasing away the demons of superstition, breaking in pieces the idols of Paganism, and raising a temple of Christ on the ruins of Satan's altars, over the face of an entire kingdom. But this great work Columba did; and no greater work was again done for Scotland till, a thousand years after Columba, Knox, and Chalmers three hundred years after Knox, planted schools and churches in every parish, to meet the increase of our growing population. When he first landed on Iona, Columba's prayer was, that he might be allowed to promote the interests of knowledge and truth in our land for thirty years; and when that term had expired, he foretold that he would continue four years more, in answer to the supplications of the faithful. Nor were his desires refused; but from year to year, never idle, nor resting, nor sick, throughout all this long interval, the man of God held on his way, and tilled, and sowed, and reaped, and garnered with most cheerful zeal.

But the ploughman cannot always be in the furrow, and even in the bright morning he thinks of sunset and of home. Columba has laboured and fainted not during a hot day, and his rest is at hand. The veteran is now seventy-six years old, and he is as full of labours as of days. If it were needed, he is not unwilling to break the stiff clods, and brave the wind and rain a little while longer; but on the morning of June the 9th, A.D. 597, Columba felt that his end could not be distant, and being helped into the open air by Dermit, his servant, he spent a short time in pleading for Iona and Scotland. As the evening drew on, and the stars shone feebly through the lingering brightness of a summer day, he occupied himself with transcribing the Psalter; and having reached so far as the eleventh verse of the thirty-fourth Psalm, which runs, 'Come, ye children, hearken unto me; I will teach you the fear of Jehovah,' he laid aside the parchment, saying, 'These words will better suit my successors.' At midnight he heard the summons to prayer, and, frail as he was, he succeeded in reaching the chapel. The exertion had shaken out the last sands of life more rapidly, and sinking on that floor he had so often trod in his vigour, beneath that roof which had so long echoed to his voice, close by that communion-table where his soul had been used to refresh itself, and amid the fast-flowing tears of his students, who by this time were gathered around him, the abbot of Iona went from earth to heaven.

It was a great and a good man who died at the monastery of Icolumkill on the 10th of June A.D. 597. And had the nation whom he served ere he fell asleep, gone into mourning when Columba was taken away, it would have been no unfitting tribute to one who, amid the saints, and warriors, and princes that were raised up in our land after him, stood alone in his grandeur for a thousand years!

'O Colum-Mac-Phelim of a hundred graces,
Thou art a prophet, a poet indeed.
Thou art learned. A scribe, perfect and happy!
A priest, accomplished and devout!
Thou art a king's son, of reddened valour;
Thou art a virgin and a pilgrim!'

—Contemporary Sonnet.

Three days after he had breathed his last, they prepare to lay the venerable man in the dust. There is a wild storm on the waves, and no stranger can approach the island. He is buried without procession or pomp, amid the silent weeping of those who loved him best. A hundred years afterwards they carried his costly shrine to Ireland; but long ere this his dust had been mingled with the dust of Iona, and though, since that date, the ashes of Scottish, and Irish, and Norwegian kings have been deposited around his tomb, it is the ashes of Columba which have given its sacredness and renown to the little island where they lie, waiting for the first resurrection at the coming of Jesus Christ.

TRUST IN GOD.

WESLEY, in a sermon at Doncaster in 1790, related the following circumstance: 'A poor woman, of the Romanist persuasion, having had the misfortune to break her china crucifix, immediately went to her priest to inform him, mourning greatly on account of the sad occurrence, and frequently crying out, "Now I have broken my crucifix, I have nothing to trust in but the great God."' When Wesley repeated these words, he appeared to feel strongly, and, in a manner peculiar to himself, exclaimed, 'What a mercy she had a great God to trust in!' A respectable Romanist, who occasionally visited the chapel, was present, and was powerfully affected. 'The great God to trust in' touched his heart. He was very deeply convinced of his need of salvation, and joined the Methodist Society, became an ornament to religion, and to the day of his death was an ardent admirer of Wesley.

'ENTER YE IN AT THE STRAIT GATE.'

I SLUMBERED, and dreamed, and behold! a gate,
At whose shining portals a thousand wait;
Yea, countless hosts to that gate repair,
But few there be who find entrance there.

One there was who travelled along,
Until she stood in that wearied throng:
If I might tell, from her childish mien,
Few were the summers the maid had seen.

She, as she stood in that crowded place,
Earnestly peered in each sullen face,
Whispering: 'Oh! let me pass, I pray;
I seek the gate of the narrow way.'

'What! you, Little Faith?' they scornfully said;
'Scarce have you stept from your cradle-bed!'
'True,' she replied, as she passed them by;
'Yet are there angels as young as I.'

Said one: 'The Warder, who keeps the gate,
Cares not that thousands before it wait;
Hears not our angry voices, nor heeds
When often we reckon our righteous deeds.

Say, then, how will you admittance gain,
When we have waited so long in vain?'
'Nay,' she replied; 'if I kneel and pray,
He'll open the gate of the narrow way.'

Short was the prayer; from her heart it sped;
Lo! the Warder hath turned his head.
Smiling, He looks on her infant brow;
See how the hinges are moving now!

Vainly they told how rough was the track;
Many an one would have held her back;
But the Warder's voice was loud and clear:
'Forbid not the children to enter here!'

She passed through the gate; she did not stay,
And wistfully gaze up the narrow way,
And wish she could tread it; she longed to depart,
And thanked the Warder with grateful heart.

'Come back!' cried the World; 'come back! for thee
Pleasure, and beauty, and wealth shall be;
Joy in thy heart, and gold in thy hand:
All I have is at thy command!'

'World!' she replied, 'your pleasures die;
Your riches take wing, and away they fly;
Soon is the beauty of youth decayed;
Heavenly treasures can never fade.'

'Come back!' cried the Flesh, 'nor endure in vain
Thirst, and hunger, and cold, and pain;
You cannot tread where the Master trod;
You are a mortal, and He was God!'

With humble voice she was heard to speak:
'The spirit is willing, the flesh is weak;
Christ is my strength, in Him I trust;
He will remember I am but dust!'

'Come back!' cried the Devil; 'why enter there?
Is not the broad way passing fair?
It leads to heaven; 'tis smooth and gay;
Thousands are smiling along the way!'

'Satan, I know thee!' she replies;
'Get thee behind me, father of lies!
Thou who art longing to sift me as wheat,
Soon shall be trampled under my feet!'

'Come back!' cried they all; 'beware of the storm:
How strong the thunder, how frail thy form!'
'The tempest,' she said, 'will pass me by;
I'm under the Rock that is higher than I.'

'Return to the world!' again they repeat;
'Thorns have entered thy weary feet!'
The sunlight of joy beamed on her brow,
As she said: 'But I'm near the Physician now!'

'Sit by the wayside, and rest awhile!'
'Nay,' she returned, with a peaceful smile;
'E'en as I journey, He gives me rest;
The peace of God is within my breast!'

'Return, ere too late!' they cry; 'for, hark!
The vesper bell, the night will be dark!'
'Yes,' she said; 'but when daylight is o'er,
I shall be e'en at my Father's door.'

So onward she travels, until at last
The sorrow, the care, and the pain are past.
How fair the city! the saints how bright!
Her eyes are dazzled with heaven's light.

Who sitteth upon the great white throne?
Who claimeth the empire for his own?
From whose shining lips doth the mandate go—
Of eternal life, of eternal woe?

One angel the maid in white arrays;
One gives her a harp to sound his praise;
She covers her face with her seraph-wings;
Her Friend, the Warder, is King of kings!

Yes, He hath closed—He hath left the gate:
They pray to Him now, but they pray too late.
The World, and the Flesh, and the Devil groan
In vain for a glimpse of the great white throne!

But Faith eternity's reign shall spend
In joys of heaven, which never end;
She thinks no more, in the perfect day,
How strait was the gate, how narrow the way.

—Augusta L. Dawson.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

GEN. XV. 1.

THE full meaning of this 'word of the Lord,' which 'came unto Abram in a vision,' can only be understood by reference to the events narrated in the preceding chapter. Never had such an unequal battle been waged, as between Abraham and these mighty kings. With his 318 servants, he had pursued, conquered, spoiled, thousands—perhaps tens of thousands. Truly he put his life into his hand, and with marvellous courage encountered the peril. On the back of this, God comes to him with 'I am thy SHIELD.' He had, moreover, given up the spoil to others, reserving nothing to himself; and God comes in with his 'I am thy exceeding great REWARD.' He had done both of these in simple faith,—having no previous command, or promise, or assurance of success; and God, having thus tested his faith, comes to him with a blessed word of assurance. Let us mark—

I. The word of cheer.—'Fear not, Abraham.' It is God who speaks. He calls Abraham by name, as one on familiar terms with Him; and no doubt Abraham recognised the comforting voice and cheering words. How frequent, throughout Scripture, are the divine 'Fear nots!' how ready God is to utter them, even as a Father to his trembling child! To Isaac He said, 'Fear not, for I am with thee' (Gen. xxvi. 24). To Jacob He said, 'I am God, the God of thy father: fear not to go down into Egypt' (Gen. xlvi. 3). Frequently to Israel He said the same words: 'Fear not, for I am with thee' (Deut. xxxi. 6; Isa. xli. 10). And in many cases, as here, He names the name of him whom He is cheering: 'Fear not, Zacharias;' 'Fear not, Mary;' 'Fear not, Paul!' God takes for granted that his servants may have cause for fear: that at times their hearts may fail them; fightings without, and fears within; sorrows, storms, dangers, burdens, troubles, enemies. To meet and counteract the influence of these upon the soul, He says, 'Fear not.' Yes, it is God, our God, who thus speaks. He 'knoweth our frame, and remembereth that we are dust.' He knows the world in which we live, that it is all hostile. He knows that Satan rages, and that his legions are all abroad. He knows that the spirit may be willing, yet the flesh is weak. And so He says to us, 'Fear not; be of good cheer.' Thus Jesus spoke on earth, and thus He speaketh still from heaven.

II. The word of security.—'I am thy shield.' This is truly a divine form of expression, full of force and point. God does not say, 'I shield thee;' but, 'I am thy shield.' This latter is far stronger than the former; just as the expression 'He is our peace' is far stronger than 'He gives us peace;' or 'He is our righteousness' is stronger than 'He justifies us;' or 'He is our treasure' is stronger than 'He makes us rich.' Here God proclaims HIMSELF to be Abraham's shield. So is He the shield of all who are Abraham's seed. Past, present, and future, are all included in this.

(1.) I WAS, or have been, thy shield.—He had been so in Abraham's case; memorably and marvellously so, in the recent conflict with those invaders of the East. Had God not been sword and shield to him, how could he have come safely out of a conflict with such superior forces? So has He been to us, as every day of our past lives has testified, a perpetual and impenetrable shield.

(2.) I AM thy shield.—It is not the past alone that is witness to this protection. Each day we need the shield; each day we have it. Each day brings up a new battle-field, a new enemy, a new assault. But God is our perpetual shield; round and round us, above and beneath us, our complete panoply, our high tower. This is our daily security.

(3.) I WILL be thy shield.—Abraham dwelt among enemies—dangers on every side. He was a stranger in a strange land, without a friend but God. He gets the assurance of perpetual protection. No evil shall assail, no weapon shall prosper, no enemy shall overcome or wound. God says to his church, 'I will be thy shield.' Her dwelling is among enemies; she is a lily among thorns, a sheep among wolves. The world is against her, hell is against her. If God were to permit it, she would be swept from earth in an hour. She has no might, no skill against such an array of deadly foes. Her sufficiency, her security, is only of God. He is her shield. Not only does He defend her, but He is her shield. Yes, each of us may say, 'God is my shield, I am safe; I can defy the world; I can shake my hand at hell. I shall be more than conqueror through Him that loved me. Safe now, safe in days to come, safe in conflict, safe in evil days, safe in sorrow or in joy, safe on a sickbed or a deathbed, safe for evermore. God the Lord is my sun and shield; who shall make me afraid? This is more than even the "shield of faith" and the "breastplate of righteousness;" it is a divine shield and breastplate, behind which I am absolutely and entirely secure. Jehovah himself stands between me and danger. His omnipotence compasses me about. Am I not safe for ever?'

III. The word of recompense.—Abraham had given up all, and left Chaldea; he had refused to lay his hand on the spoil of the invaders whom he had defeated; he had parted with everything of earth; and now God comes in and promises to make up for all, by giving HIMSELF. He does not say, 'I will recompense thee;' but, 'I am thy recompense.' How forcible are the words! (1) I am thy reward; (2) I am thy great reward; (3) I am thy exceeding great reward. How full and rich are these words of promise! Here is present, and here is ETERNAL reward. God does for us exceeding abundantly, above all we ask or think. Not pardon—we have that already, it is far beyond that; not salvation—it is far beyond that; not heaven, nor glory—it is far beyond these. It is God himself,—He whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain! He is our reward; He—HIMSELF!

In all this we find—

(1.) Strength for work and duty.—What encouragement, comfort, invigoration is here! How can we weary in well-doing, or shrink from peril? Jehovah is our shield and recompense!

(2.) Motive for self-denial and self-sacrifice.—We are called to these. But God gives more than a command or call; He presents with a motive,—protection, and recompense. Shall we grudge the surrender, seeing the recompense is so great?

(3.) A reason for calmness and stedfastness.—God is with us. We are on his side, He on ours. Let us not be ruffled. Let no opposition, vexation, defeat, triumph of evil, annoy us. Our shield is Omnipotence. Our reward is the fulness of God.

WHY SHOULD WE PRAY TO JESUS?

SOME have lately been questioning whether we should pray to the Lord Jesus Christ. I have been asked to give a 'reason of the hope' (or faith) 'that is in me' on this head. I should, indeed, be most miserable if I could not, 'with meekness and fear,' give scriptural authority for this my practice, after more than twenty years of humble converse, communion, fellowship with our Divine Lord and Master, in prayer and praise, and endeavours of obedience, by his grace and mercy. As that has been a joy at all times, so is it a joy to be able to invite the attention of others to the grounds and invitations for such communion with our common Lord and Saviour. To the eye of faith, the Scriptures abound with such invitations; but some of them are now cited under the following heads. Why should we pray to Jesus?

I. Because He is our God.—When 'God was manifest in the flesh, seen of angels' (1 Tim. iii.); when 'God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law' (Gal. iv.), the angel announced his name as 'Emmanuel, God with us' (Matt. i.; Isa. viii.), according to the utterance of the Holy Ghost by the prophet: 'For unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace' (Isa. ix.; Luke ii.).

What glorious titles are these of Him in whom 'dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily!' (Col. ii.). Well may 'all the angels of God worship Him' (Heb. i.), 'by whom were all things created in heaven and in earth, and for Him, and by Him all things consist' (Col. i.; John i.). And shall we not, too, worship Him, in prayer, and praise, and loving service, seeing that 'at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father?' (Phil. ii.; Rom. xiv.) He who is 'Lord of all' (Acts x.; Rom. x.), and 'head over all things to the church' (Eph. i.), the 'Alpha and Omega,' the 'I am' of Moses, Jehovah-Jesus, the 'God of Bethel' of Jacob, the 'Angel who redeemed him from all evil' (Rev. i., xxii.; John viii.; Gen. xxxv., xlviii.),—is He not wonderful in counsel, and wisdom, and working, in holiness and loving-kindness to usward, 'who is our Peace' (Prov. viii.; Phil. iii.; Ps. xvii.; Col. ii.; Eph. ii.); and shall not adoration melt into prayer and praise: 'O Lord, Thou art my God; I will exalt Thee, I will praise thy name: for Thou hast done wonderful things; thy counsels of old are faithfulness and truth?' (Isa. xxv.; John xx.) 'Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear Thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for Thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before Thee; for thy judgments are made manifest' (Rev. xv.). Without doubt, therefore, may we at all times come to our ever-present Lord in prayer; for He is 'God with us,' as well as 'over all, God blessed for ever' (Rom. ix.); and has promised, 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them' (Matt. xviii.); and, 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world' (Matt. xxviii.). We may cry to Him: 'Thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer; thy name is from everlasting.' 'Mighty to save' (Isa. lxiii.; Rev. xxi.; Heb. ii.). 'This is the true God, and eternal life' (1 John v.).

II. Because He is our Redeemer.—'Our Redeemer is the Lord of hosts, the Holy One of Israel' (Isa. xlvii., xliii.; Mark i.; Acts iii.). His name is 'Jesus, for He shall save his people from their sins' (Matt. i.). 'Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved' (Acts iv.). When on earth, He said: 'The Son of man is come to save that which was lost,' and 'gave his life a ransom for many' (Matt. xviii., xx.; John iii.; 1 Tim. ii.). Again we hear: 'Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us' (Gal. iii.; 1 Pet. i.). 'In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins' (Col. i.). And shall we not 'put Him in remembrance' of all this, and plead, for ourselves and others, with Him who has 'obtained eternal redemption for us,' saying: 'Thou hast redeemed us to God by thy blood;' 'Save now, I beseech Thee, O Lord: send now prosperity;'

for 'with Thee is mercy and plenteous redemption;' and 'Thou art not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance?' (Heb. ix.; Rev. v.; Ps. cxviii., cxxx.; 2 Pet. iii.). Let all, then, call upon this Saviour; 'for whosoever shall call on the Lord shall be saved' (Acts ii.; Rom. x.). And what should the 'redeemed of the Lord,' who are 'looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ: who gave himself for us, that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works,'—what should they do but wait continually on Him for this very thing, and 'pray without ceasing,' that He would 'fulfil all the work of faith with power' in them, that his 'name may be glorified in them, and they in Him;' 'that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things' (Tit. ii.; 2 Thess. i.).

He, too, is 'the Lord of the Sabbath' (Matt. xii.), and of Sabbath services; for 'Christ, as a Son over his own house' (Heb. iii.), says, 'My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer' (Mark xi.); and He wills 'that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands without doubting' (1 Tim. ii.). He is the object of worship in prayer and praise, as well as the virtue and sweet savour of all true worship: 'Thou shalt call, and the Lord shall answer: thou shalt cry, and He shall say, Here I am. . . . If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words: then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it' (Isa. lviii.). Thus 'the four beasts and four-and-twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odours' (or incense), 'which are the prayers of saints. And they sang, Thou art worthy: for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation. . . . And the voice of many angels round about the throne, thousands of thousands, saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, for ever and ever. And the four beasts said, Amen. And the four-and-twenty elders fell down and worshipped Him that liveth for ever and ever' (Rev. v., viii.). Let us then 'come boldly to the throne of grace,'—to the one 'throne of God and of the Lamb' (Rev. xxii.),—'to obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need' (Heb. iv.); for thus 'coming, as unto a living stone, chosen of God, and precious, ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ' (1 Pet. ii.); so that 'prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour, who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth' (1 Tim. ii.). 'When ye are gathered together, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Cor. v.), 'who hath loved us, and hath given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour' (Eph. v.); who is our 'sanctification,' and 'sanctifies his people with his own blood' (1 Cor. i.; Heb. x., xiii.).

Is the Lord Jesus thus the 'Saviour of sinners' and 'the good Shepherd,' and shall not his saved ones tell Him all their wants and cares? (Ps. xxiii., xxxiv.; 1 Pet. v.; Ps. xxxvii., lv.; Phil. iii.), their griefs and sorrows, their joys and happiness? (Isa. lxiii.; Acts ix.; Ps. li.; Isa. lxv.; Ps. xxvii.; John xv.; Heb. iv.), their longings, hopes, and fears? (Ps. xxxvii., cvii., cxix.; 2 Cor. v.; Ps. cxlvi., lvi.; Isa. xli., xliii.; Luke xii.)

> 'To tell the Saviour all my wants,
> How pleasing is the task!
> Nor less to praise Him when He grants
> Beyond what I can ask.'

III. Because He is our King.—As 'the King of kings, and Lord of lords' (1 Tim. vi.; Rev. xvii.; Zech. xiv.; Isa. xxxiii.; Ps. lxxxix., ii.), and especially as the 'King of saints' (Rev. xv.; Ps. cxlix.), He is the royal Giver, and we his needy subjects: shall we not present our petitions to Him—shall we not ask Him for his gifts? He is 'exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins' (Acts v.; Ps. lxviii.): shall we not seek of Him 'remission of our sins,' and 'repentance unto life,' to endow us with his Spirit and his grace? (John xv.; Phil. i.; 1 Tim. i.; 2 Tim. i.). 'He must reign' (1 Cor. xv.). So He said: 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth' (Matt. xxviii.). 'Angels, and authorities, and powers being made subject unto Him' (1 Pet. iii.), shall we not approach Him, and say that we will 'that He should reign over us' (Luke xix.; Eph. v.), even so that our 'every thought may be brought to the obedience of Christ' (2 Cor. x.), and ask Him to 'enlarge our hearts, that we may run the way of his commandments?' (Ps. cxix.) Shall we not wait on Him for his royal will, that we may show our loving loyalty in fulfilling it? for our Lord said: 'If ye love me, keep my commandments.' 'He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him' (John xiv.; 1 John i.). Beset on every hand by temptations and enemies, 'principalities and powers, rulers of the darkness of this world, spiritual wickedness in high places' (Eph. vi.), shall we not cry to our King, and 'Captain of our salvation,' who was 'manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil' (1 John iii.), to defend and 'deliver us from every evil work, and to preserve us unto his heavenly kingdom' (2 Tim. iv.); to 'keep that which we have committed unto Him against that day' (2 Tim. i.); and to give us an 'entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' (2 Pet. i.; Heb. i.), and an 'inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God?' (Eph. v.)

(To be continued.)

DR. JOHN EDGAR.*

THIS well-known philanthropist was the son of a Secession minister named Samuel Edgar, who preached and kept a grammar school, in the beginning of the present century, at Ballinahinch, in the county of Down. He was born in 1798, the year of the Irish Rebellion; and may have been startled, as an infant in his cradle, by the rattle of musketry and the cries of the combatants in the famous battle of Ballinahinch. He was educated by his father, and excelled both in classics and mathematics. He entered the University of Glasgow, in company with his father's usher, James Thomson, afterwards professor of mathematics at the same seat of learning. At an early age he manifested a desire to enter the ministry; and often, in after life, he would allude with deep solemnity to the day on which his father, aware of his early choice, took him aside into a grove near his dwelling-house, and there, kneeling down on the grass, commended him in fervent prayer to the Lord.

In the year 1820, he received a call to a small and newly organized congregation of Seceders in Belfast, the town which was to be the scene of his incessant labours for more than forty years. If the test of influence be success, and the test of success be influence, the future professor realized in this respect, at a very early period, the ardent hopes of his friends. He was exceedingly homely in his personal appearance, very uncouth in his manners, abrupt and grotesque in his gestures, with a voice harsh and strong, which sometimes, however, trembled with a strange tenderness; but the public soon came to discover in him a peculiar piquancy of character—not by any means unpleasant,—which one could recognise as a direct birth of nature, as well as a high and well-toned capacity, a nature rich in all the elements of human feeling and moral aspiration, a deep and often stern consistency of purpose, a grand impatience of all prudential meanness, and a rock-fast faith, with a blunt and homely directness of speech, which might sometimes offend the fastidious, but indicated, above all things, the singleness of his aims and his regardlessness of mere popularity. The nice people, who were affected by his brusqueness, did not take the trouble to discover how well the robust and hardy texture of his nature was set off by a most simple affectionateness, a buoyant humour, an exquisite tenderness of feeling, and a deep but unaffected piety. Strange to say, women were the first to find him out. Their finer instincts helped them in the search; and there was something, perhaps, even in his rough but kindly individualism, that attracted them to his side, and they followed him unswervingly in all his projects, with a singular devotion and zeal, to the very end of his career.

There were but few incidents in his life. He succeeded his father as professor of systematic theology in the Secession body in 1826, and became, at the union of the two synods, joint-professor with the late Rev. Dr. Hanna. He made a very good professor; but the character of his mind was rather practical than speculative, and he had none of the habits of the scholarly recluse. He was remarkable for a memory, at once retentive and susceptible. He could repeat, after two days' interval, whole paragraphs verbatim of a student's discourse, as if he held the very manuscript in his hand; and whole volumes of poetry seemed to lie in his head. His mind, too, was highly imaginative. Often, throwing himself back in his professor's chair, he would expatiate for twenty minutes, in a fine Ossianic strain, upon some touching aspect of human life, or paint, with infinite tenderness and pathos, the anguish of a lost joy, the struggles of a burdened heart, or conjure up the ghastly spectres which only conscience can create, when the soul feels the poverty of its scalding tears, and the nothingness of its bitterest penitence.

He never wrote a book. He wrote countless pamphlets and tracts.* His Cry from Connaught, and his Jamie, a True Story, were two of the most powerful and touching things in Christian

* Memoir of John Edgar, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology for the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. By W. D. Killen, D.D. Pp. 335. Belfast: C. Aitchison. Edinburgh: A. Elliot.

* His Memoir is to be followed by a volume of 'Remains,' which he had himself carefully edited before his death.

literature. If Dr. Edgar wrote no book, we may console ourselves with the saying of Michelet—very applicable in the present case—'The true products of popular genius are not books, but brave deeds.'

The true place of John Edgar was in the ranks of philanthropy. He was the father of temperance in Ireland. He inaugurated the movement one morning by opening his parlour window, and pouring out into the court before his house in Alfred Street, the remainder of a gallon of old malt whisky, purchased some time before for family consumption. Some years after a wag sent him a jar of brandy for his use. 'What did you do with it?' he was asked. 'I watered my flowers with it.' Such was the man. It is needless to speak of his labours in this cause, his journeys, his speeches, his sermons, his letters, and his tracts. He had an enormous appetite for work and talk. He was an inexhaustible letter-writer, and his letters were always uncommonly short, pithy, and pointed. He seemed to have a hundred hands and a hundred eyes. He possessed a constitution of iron. To my mind, the labour exacted from him in the cause of general religious benevolence, must have been overwhelming to any mind less simple in its motives.

It is needless to do more than specify in a sentence the sum of his labours. Besides the temperance reformer, he was the founder of a home in Belfast for fallen women, the builder of fifty or sixty churches over the length and breadth of Ireland, and the zealous and energetic director of Roman Catholic missions. He raised £16,000 during the famine years for his miserable and perishing countrymen. He established industrial schools in Connaught, which at one time turned out work to the value of £25,000 a year in wages alone. He was himself remarkably liberal in his subscriptions, and generous in his private charities, considering the fact that his income never exceeded £320 a year. Christian people, too, placed large sums in his hands for distribution. He was mainly instrumental in raising £20,000 for the building of churches, manses, and schools. The first meeting of the founders of the Presbyterian Orphanage Society, now happily established, with nearly four hundred Presbyterian orphans under its care, was held in his house little more than a year ago; and the last letters he wrote to the newspapers, within a month or two before his death—and with death hourly awaiting him—was an urgent appeal for the foundation of an asylum for idiots. His whole career was, in fact, consistent from first to last. Had he not been the Christian, he would not have been the philanthropist. He had heard, if ever man did, the words, 'Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others.'

Dr. Edgar was a really pious man, though he was slow to speak of his spiritual experience, and he left no diary illustrative of the phases of his spiritual life. His public prayers were always distinguished by deep humility and contriteness of confession. His sermons breathed a spirit of deep experimental devotion. He was particularly happy in exposition. He shed the greatest amount of light upon a selected portion of Scripture, discovering its hidden riches, unfolding its connections and harmonies, and bringing the most abstruse doctrines of revelation to bear upon the conduct and the life. He luxuriated in the Psalms of David. In point of fact, we find, under his great geniality, his exuberant humour, his deep human sympathies, a still deeper well-spring of personal piety, directing, impregnating, hallowing, purifying all.

At the end of the year 1863, his health began to fail; but he continued to work with all his usual vigour and heartiness. He was still in the professor's chair; his pen and his tongue were as busy as ever; his interest in Christ's cause was unabated. But his constitution seemed undermined. He might have said, with Andrew Fuller at one time, that he had once a very large portion of being; but a visible change was now upon him. He became hoarse, and almost lost his voice. A polypus had formed in his throat. For the sake of better medical advice, he removed to Dublin in the spring of 1866, and remained there till the end. When he understood that recovery was hopeless, he arranged his temporal affairs with the greatest calmness and deliberation, labelled his papers, sorted his books, and wrote farewell letters to a large number of his personal friends. Writing to a widow lady whom he had greatly befriended, he said, 'And now I draw to a close, and other scenes are pressing around closer every day. Before the one word eternal, what is all here? Before the Sun of Righteousness all is pale. Live to Him and for Him. For Him train your children. Gentle, and loved, and amiable one, keep me in memory. Farewell! JOHN EDGAR.' He was surrounded by nearly all the members of his family. He dwelt much on his mercies, and never ceased talking of God's goodness and mercy. After recovering from a severe spasmodic attack, he would say to himself, 'This light affliction—this very light affliction.' His daughter read to him, 'God is our God for ever and ever, and He will be our guide even unto death.' He remarked, 'I am perfectly sure He never will disappoint me.' In repeating, 'Having a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better;' 'Far better, far better,' he repeated. When the account of Stephen's martyrdom was read, he said, 'Oh, that was a glorious end—a glorious end!' and then he began to speak beautifully about the expression, 'he fell on sleep.' He often lamented that he had not done more for Christ. After praying for his family, he said, 'Oh, dear me, God's wonderful goodness on earth; his unbounded, infinite goodness in heaven! I wonder what it is. What a change! what a great change! In a moment! I am departing to be with Christ, which is far better. That's what dying is—to be with Christ.'

On Saturday, the day before his death, he was better than usual, though still suffering. When his son read the sixth of Hebrews, he said, 'I put my seal to that. I sometimes seem to see the length, and breadth, and height, and depth of the love of Christ. Can it be the effect of the opium? It cannot be; for I have been for twenty-four hours without it; and yet I still feel the same perfect assurance.' During the last night of his life, he was continually repeating the Psalms, and especially the passage, 'The Rock that is higher than I—higher than I.' In the morning they tried to rouse him; but the sleep of death was upon him, and at eight o'clock, on the morning of the 26th of August 1866, he fell asleep in Jesus, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Dr. Edgar died in the plenitude of his fame and usefulness. His life will tell upon the Irish Presbyterian Church for generations. He seemed ever to keep before his mind that noblest of sentences: 'Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy Him for ever.' Popularity was not his idol, and he never was anything like a popular man. With a withering contempt for all public baseness, with a fearless disregard for public opinion when it opposed the supreme law, and a burning jealousy for the honour due to truth, he was perpetually in collision with some established interest, and, being no man of conditions and compromises, and hating hair-splitting, and the manner of those who are always qualifying and guarding their speech, he called things boldly by strong names, and did not always care to modify or qualify his speech. This roused opposition and passion; but the very directness and practicalness of his way gave him decision and strength, and was one of the chief elements of his success. There is a sensitive optimism which would desire more blandness and softness of piety than he displayed; but it is the glory of divine grace that it can grasp the strongest individuality of human character, and make it subservient to its glorious ends. John Edgar would have been nothing, had he not been a Christian. He was a real Puritan in the pedigree of his mind and heart. He rests in honour. There let him rest.

T. C.

WILL THE WORLD MISS YOU WHEN YOU DIE?

I THREW a pebble from the shore
Upon a gentle wave,
And silently it sank away
Into a quiet grave;

And ere the ripple which it made
Had died upon the shore,
Another pebble filled the place
Which that had filled before.

In vain its former bed to trace,
With curious search I tried;
Another pebble filled the place
Which that had occupied.

I plucked a rosebud from its stem—
The hurt stem bled awhile;
But other rosebuds opening there,
Still made the summer smile.

A little songster of the grove
Lay stricken at my feet;
But still the grove seemed full of birds,
Whose songs were just as sweet.

A merry boy was borne away
By death—his tasks all done;
But other boys so filled the streets,
I did not miss that one.

To read the history of the great
And mighty sons of men,
'Twould seem the world had come to naught,
Unless those men had been.

But when they died, the world swept on,
With all its rush and roar,
As if those great and mighty men
Were pebbles on the shore.

Let not the vain and beautiful,
Let not the sons of song,
Nor let the great and mighty think
The world will miss them long.

They'll only leave their places here
For others to step in,
And all the world will pass along,
As though they ne'er had been.

Some hearts will bleed, some houses mourn,
When they shall pass away;
But 'twill not clog the wheels of time,
Nor cloud one shining day.

To man, his schemes are all the world;
But to the world, poor man
Is but a drop in its huge sea,
An atom in its plan.

And yet he thinks—O vanity!
That all the world will stop
Without this atom—and the sea
Will dry without this drop!

So may we live, that, though the world
Won't miss us when we die,
Another, and a better land,
Will welcome us on high;

That from our mouldering dust shall spring,
Like fruits from buried seeds,
The harvests, ever ripening,
Of good and deathless deeds!

—Rev. Edward Hopper.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

HE IS COMING.

Words by Horatius Bonar, D.D. Music from Himmel.

Met. 82 = ♩
Treble.
He is com - ing; and the ti - dings Are rol - ling wide and Alto.
Tenor.
He is com - ing; and the ti - dings Are rol - ling wide and Bass.
Accomp.
far; As light flows out in glad - ness, From yon fair morn- ing-
far; As light flows out in glad - ness, From yon fair morn- ing-

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

-star. He is com - ing; and the ti - dings Sweep through the wil - ling
-star. Sweep through the wil - ling air, With hope that ends for e - ver Time's a - ges of de - spair.
air, With hope that ends for e - ver Time's a - ges of de - spair.

Old earth from dreams and slumber
Wakes up and says, Amen;
Land and ocean bid him welcome,
Flood and forest join the strain.
He is coming; and the mountains
Of Judea ring again;
Jerusalem awakens,
And shouts her glad Amen.

He is coming, wastes of Horeb,
Awaken and rejoice!
Hills of Moab, cliffs of Edom,
Lift the long silent voice!

He is coming, sea of Sodom,
To heal thy leprous brine,
To give back palm and myrtle,
The olive and the vine.

He is coming, blighted Carmel,
To restore thy olive bow'rs:
He is coming, faded Sharon,
To give thee back thy flow'rs,
Sons of Gentile-trodden Judah,
Awake, behold, he comes!
Landless and kingless exiles,
Re-seek your long-lost homes.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA.

No. VIII.

SAFETY FROM THE STORM.

A BRIGHT and sunny morning had suddenly changed into a wet and stormy afternoon; and many and wistful were the glances cast towards the window by Mrs. Wilton and her daughter Marjory, as they sat at work in the drawing-room.

A younger daughter, wild and wilful, and, as some thought, winning too, had gone out in the morning, laughing at her mother's fears lest the day should change, and find her unprepared.

'Oh! mother,' she said, 'love makes you anxious. I see no signs of rain, and I do not know why the weather should change to-day; it has been lovely all the week.'

'The gardener told me this morning that we were near a change,' replied Mrs. Wilton, 'and that, when the weather did break, it would come heavy and sudden, as he expressed it. Take your waterproof with you at all events, my child.'

But Elsie interrupted her with a merry laugh. 'Why, mother mine, every one would think me crazy if they saw me with a waterproof in a hot, dusty day like this; and I don't like to be laughed at. Besides,' she added, 'I have an idea that the weather always accommodates itself to my convenience; so you will find that the rain will not come until to-night, when it has my free permission to pour away as long as it likes.'

Mrs. Wilton knew that it was useless to urge the matter further; so, with an unspoken prayer for her safety, she kissed her lovingly, and the light-hearted girl set off, without a thought of anything but sunshine gladdening her path.

But, as we have said, the day suddenly changed, the rain fell in torrents, the storm beat furiously against the house, and the anxious mother trembled for her child, who, she knew, was far from shelter or protection. About an hour after the storm began, she made her appearance, changed, indeed, from the morning—wet, and cold, and dripping, and utterly weary and exhausted from her efforts to reach home as fast as she could. Mrs. Wilton and Marjory hurried her to bed as quickly as possible, hoping, though scarcely expecting, she might possibly escape the cold they so dreaded she might take.

When they returned to the drawing-room, after having seen her comfortably settled, Mrs. Wilton said, 'I am glad you had not set off to Mrs. Grant's, Marjory; it is impossible for you to venture in such a day as this.'

'But, mother,' she replied, 'the storm would not have done Elsie any harm, if she had been prepared for it. I do not think that anything short of an impossibility ought to prevent me from going to see Mrs. Grant this afternoon. Papa said yesterday that he did not think she would live through another day, and she told him that she had something on her mind to tell me. You know, mother,' she continued, seeing Mrs. Wilton still look grave, 'the storm and rain cannot harm me if I am prepared to encounter them; but you shall judge for yourself when I am equipped.'

So saying, she left the room, but soon returned with her waterproof cloak wrapped closely round her, and the hood drawn over her head. 'Now, mother, are you not satisfied?' she said, as she turned round to be inspected; 'an umbrella would be useless, it would be broken to pieces in a moment; but the storm can't come inside my cloak.'

'I am quite satisfied,' replied her mother, 'it is just as you say: the storm cannot injure those who are prepared for it. I have no fears for you, my child; I can see you set off without an anxious or uneasy thought; and may God bless you, and make you a comfort to Mrs. Grant.'

As you read these words, has your heart trembled at the thought of the storm that is so surely coming on the earth?—how soon, we know not. Such a storm as earth has never yet seen or felt, for it is the storm of God's wrath. A storm so terrible, that when it is described in the book of Revelation, in terms that might well make the most stout-hearted tremble, the apostle asks, 'Who shall be able to stand?' (Rev. vi. 17.)

But take courage; for, blessed be God, terrible as that storm shall be, there are some who shall be able to stand, and stand fearlessly,—even they who have 'put on the Lord Jesus Christ' (Rom. xiii. 14), and are clothed in the righteousness of Him who, under a beautiful and forcible image, is represented to us as 'a refuge from the storm' (Isa. xxv. 4), and who has purchased the right to give us such a refuge, by having braved the fury of the storm on our behalf. As we read in the hymns:

'The tempest's awful voice was heard,
O Christ, it broke on Thee!
Thy open bosom was my ward,
It braved the storm for me.
Thy form was scarred, thy visage marred—
Now cloudless peace for me.'

From the time that our first parents sinned, and shrank from appearing before the presence of a holy God unclothed, every human being has needed some covering in which they might venture to approach Him; and from the time that Adam and Eve hid themselves behind the trees of the garden, hoping to escape detection, no sinner has ever really heard the voice of God speaking to him, without feeling that he needed a something to come between him and God, before he could venture to appear in his presence without fear.

Every effort, however, that man has ever made to provide such a covering, has been utterly and altogether useless. Why, our very best efforts—our very righteousnesses—He considers to be as 'filthy rags' (Isa. lxiv. 6). And who would dare to appear in the presence of a king clothed in filthy rags? Would not the very attempt to do so, be considered an insult to the dignity of the court?

What, then, do you ask, are we to do? Are we to watch in despair for the coming storm, without a hope of escaping, and crying in vain to the rocks and to the mountains to fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb?

Oh no; not so. You are to 'put on the Lord Jesus Christ,' and to accept the spotless robe of righteousness which God has so graciously provided for you; and clothed in which, you shall fearlessly encounter that storm which shall indeed 'shake terribly the earth.' Thus clothed, may you not take up the song of the Jewish church, and sing with exulting gladness: 'I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels' (Isa. lxi. 10)? It is this very robe of righteousness which, we are told elsewhere (Rev. xvii. 7, 8), is 'the righteousness' (or, as it would be more correctly translated, 'the righteousnesses;' see the contrast to Isa. lxiv. 6) 'of the saints,' and in which they shall not only escape the fury of the storm, but shall sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

It is by putting on this 'fine linen,' so freely provided for us, that we 'put on the Lord Jesus Christ,' and 'are made the righteousness of God in Him.' Are you, who are reading these words, weary with the effort of trying to weave a robe for yourself? Oh! lay aside these vain and fruitless endeavours, and, just as you are, come—come now—now, even as you read these lines, to the gracious Saviour, and accept his full and free invitation. He says now to your weary, trembling, fearful heart: 'I counsel thee to buy of me fine raiment, that thou mayest be clothed' (Rev. iii. 18). That white raiment, like the wine and milk of which we are told in Isaiah (lv. 1, 2), may be bought 'without money and without price.' The Lord Jesus only wants you to give Him your sins, and, in exchange, He will give you his righteousness.

But do not delay. There are many tokens that that storm will soon sweep over the earth; and even if it were not so, would the days pass less brightly, or would your sleep be less refreshing, if you rose up and lay down, 'quiet from the fear of evil,' and knowing by happy experience that 'blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, and whose sin is (thus) covered' (Ps. xxxii. 1)?

THE QUEEN'S VINE.

You are beginning to feel disheartened, I am afraid, at your long trial, or rather, I should say, at the succession of trials which follow each other so quickly, that your poor heart almost fails, and you imagine that you must be a fruitless branch, or that you would not give so much trouble to the Husbandman, obliging Him so continually to prune you, and to cut off one little shoot after another, that to you looked fair and green.

Yes; that is the point. To you they looked fair and green; but to the Husbandman it was different. The value of the vine is its fruitfulness, and his experienced eye saw that these shoots would never bear anything but leaves—pretty, it might be, to look at; but, not merely useless, they would be positively injurious to the tree, because they would absorb the nourishment required for the fruit: therefore they have been cut off.

But, so far from constant pruning being a sign of God's anger, it is exactly the reverse. Were you a fruitless branch, would not the Husbandman say to you, as He did to Israel of old, when He compared her to a vine, which, after the most watchful care, brought forth wild grapes: 'I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up; and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be trodden down. And I will lay it waste: it shall not be pruned nor digged; but there shall come up briers and thorns: I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it' (Isa. v. 5, 6)? Would you not rather bear any amount of pruning, than have so terrible a sentence passed upon you?

Now, look at the contrast. 'Every branch that beareth fruit, He (the Husbandman) purgeth it that it may bring forth more fruit' (John xv. 2). As an illustration of this, will you come with me to Hampton Court, where I spent a most happy day with some dear friends, a few years ago. Of course we went to see the great vine—the Queen's Vine; I believe it is called the largest and the finest in the whole kingdom. It has a hothouse all to itself, and is under the constant care of a skilful gardener.

The afternoon that I was there, he was mounted on a ladder, pruning the vine, and I was actually amazed at the quantity both of leaves and blossoms that were cut off. After a time the floor was thickly strewn with them; and when he came down, and was taking the ladder a little further on, I could not help asking him if it was really necessary to cut away so much. He almost smiled at the question, and looked as if he was inclined to say, Don't you think I understand what I am doing? but in reality saying, 'Yes, ma'am, it is quite necessary. This is the Queen's favourite vine, and, by her express command, I send her grapes for her own table from it, every day during the season. So, what I have to look to is the fruit, and how it ripens. Just at this time what it wants is plenty of light, and plenty of room. To give it light, I cut off all the leaves that are not necessary; and to give it room, I have to take off blossom after blossom, and whole clusters of them sometimes.'

'But is not that a pity?' I ventured to say.

'No, ma'am,' he answered decidedly; 'if I left too many blossoms on a bunch, none of them could grow to their full size, or ripen properly. If Her Majesty did not care so much about the tree, or that it was not so noted a one through the country, I suppose I would not take so much trouble; but I look after it myself continually; and even after the grapes are formed, I have to take off large quantities of them, that those that are left may be of full size. The only thing we think about in a vine is the fruit, and everything that does not help that, off it goes.' So saying, he mounted his ladder, and set to work again.

Do you think he would have left a fruitless branch on that vine? Oh no; it would not have found any mercy, but would soon have fallen beneath the pruning-knife; while, at the same time, he did not appear to think it the least trouble so patiently and carefully to prune the fruitful ones. The Queen's enjoying the fruit when it was ripe, would be reward enough for all his labour.

And shall the Husbandman of the true vine be less wise, or less patient? If you were not a fruitful branch, He would not prune you. He would cut you off, and take you away as worthless. But because you are already fruitful, He does not spare any trouble or pains in pruning you. Not to punish you,—oh no; but only that you may bring forth 'much fruit to the glory of the Father' (John xv. 8). Everything He does to you has reference to this; for 'much fruit' is alike his glory and his reward.

HAVE I GONE TO JESUS?

CONSTANTLY is the question being put, by preaching, conversation, tracts, and other ways, 'Have you gone to Jesus?' The question, in most instances, is just borne with, easily evaded, or put by for consideration at some future time. Few put the question to themselves. It is a step in advance, and a hopeful sign, when a soul asks itself questions on this all-important point.

If a person, suffering from a painful disease, could get cured by travelling a few miles to a physician; or if a poor man could get enriched by travelling a long distance to a rich relation; little need be said to induce such to undertake the journey. If temporal need or bodily pain are felt; if a testimony concerning help and supply is believed, that testimony is sure to be acted on; and if this is done, and things turn out according to the expectations excited,—if health is gained, poverty relieved, riches taken possession of,—all doubt about the truth of the testimony is set at rest.

Reader, you and I, by nature, are sick unto death with a fearful and tormenting disease. We are also destitute of all good—yea, justly condemned by a holy God; deserving of eternal death. Yet is there healing and supply: a free pardon, true holiness, heavenly blessings, and divine relationships, are all to be found in Jesus, and nowhere else. You cannot have these much-needed blessings without going to Him. If you have not really gone to Him, you ought to go at once. You need no title, but your diseases and poverty, your deep woes, and utter wickedness. Soon it may be too late for you to go. If you pass into eternity without having gone to Christ, the heaviest charge of all that will be brought against you will be: 'Ye would not come to me that ye might have life.' This, you will then feel, is quite true; and it will be your saddest reflection for ever. See, then, the importance of urging this point upon your soul now: 'Have I really gone to Him?' Do you 'ask what it is to go to Jesus?' M'Cheyne observes: 'I suppose it is almost impossible to explain what it is to come to Jesus, it is so simple. If you ask a sick person, who had been healed, what it was to come and be healed, he could hardly tell you. As far as the Lord has given me light in this matter, and looking at what my own heart does in like circumstances, I do not feel that there is anything more in coming to Jesus, than just believing what God says of his Son to be true. I believe that many people keep themselves in darkness by expecting more than this.' Much that is blessed, wonderful, and holy, follows in the soul's experience, after thus receiving God's record concerning Christ; but this is the first and great point. There will be effects follow, or rather go along with, this receiving of God's testimony, which will witness to the reality and power of this simple act. Such an one will give up a course of sin; will renounce the world as a portion and chief object of pursuit; will have no confidence in himself; will burn with hatred against sin, and glow with love to holiness; in short, will leave his former position and standing, and come over to Christ, and take his stand alongside of Him. Those who thus take Christ as a Saviour, will also take Him for a Friend and a Master. Clinging to his cross for salvation, they will desire his company, love his person, delight in his character, desire his glory, espouse his cause, and aim to promote its prosperity.

How blessed is the position, how noble the relationship, how glorious the prospects, of him who has really gone to Jesus! What Christ has done satisfies God; and when I am satisfied with what Christ has done, then God is satisfied with me. Thus the sinner's conscience is pacified, his soul is set at rest, he finds himself 'accepted in the Beloved.' 'All his sins have passed away from him; Christ has taken them, and borne them himself. Healed by his stripes, comforted by his sorrows, made alive by his death, and soon to be saved completely and eternally by his life,—how blessed is the man who has really gone to Christ!'

If any one reading these lines says, 'I know nothing of such things as these,—this soul-motion toward Christ, this soul-rest in Christ, this supply of all blessings for the soul from Christ,—so I have not really gone to Him. I have heard about Him much and often, and have had some convictions. I have gone to the place where He is preached, and mingled with those who say they have gone to Him; but I am not one with Him; I have not gone, and "I cannot come."' Why not? Who has set up a barrier between you and Christ? Has Christ done so? Does not He point to you when He says, 'Come unto me;' 'Whosoever will, let him come?'

Has God made your coming to Christ an impossibility? What! that God who 'so loved the world, that He gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life?' Has the Holy Spirit put up a barrier—that Holy Spirit who has written so many earnest and loving invitations? It cannot be. It is yourself that has put up the bar, the fatal bar which keeps you from Christ. You say that 'you cannot come.' This means that you will not; and so God understands it, and writes it down against your name. You love sin best; you want to enjoy the world; you do not like the thought of that separation for God and holiness which coming to Christ is sure to draw after it. And do you really believe what a danger you are incurring, and what a blessing you are forfeiting? Do you really believe that all who are found out of Christ must soon hear the words, 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire?' Do you believe that this will be your portion, if you do not come to Christ, instead of that heaven, that life and glory, to which you are invited? There is no time to trifle; no wisdom in putting the great question off for a single minute. Christ has come to you, speaking, seeking, knocking. Hark to his voice; think of his earnestness; study his character; and go to Him now. Be willing to give up everything to be saved by Him. He will not save you in your sins. He will not give you himself, and let you still keep the world; but He will save you from your sins, and deliver you from this present evil world; yea, He will save you to the highest happiness that can be enjoyed here, and to the highest glory hereafter. Will you not say:

'Behold, I come; and Thou, blest Lamb,
Shalt take me to Thee as I am;
My sinful self to Thee I give;
Nothing but love shall I receive.'

Go really—not in pretence—and you shall soon have to say, 'I have gone to Christ, and He has saved me!'

WHY?

I ASK the reason why
He makes me no reply,—
I pause, but hear no sound;
I look, but sight is dim;
It cannot reach to Him,
And all is dark around.

'My Father,' then I cry,
'I know that Thou art nigh,
Yet would I hear Thee call;
Behold thy gracious hand,
Receive thy kind command,
Nor fear again to fall.'

In vain I look and sigh;
He gives but this reply:
'My ways are kind and just;
A father's love is sure,
My children are secure;
'Tis theirs to wait and trust.'

On Him I thus rely;
And though I know not why,
I wait his time and way.
I cannot read his will,
But bid my heart be still,
And listen, to obey.

REPLY.

A CLEARER light revealed,
My senses hath unsealed,
And sight hath wider scope.
I look from earth away,
To where eternal day
Illumes the realm of hope.

No more I ask in vain—
Time makes the answer plain,—
I feel that God is wise;
Good, though He good withholds;
Kind when He most controls,
And gives when He denies.

Oh, voice so kind and calm,
That drops from heaven like balm,
My sad distrust to heal:
Oh dull, slow heart to learn,
Unskilful to discern,
Insensible to feel!

Such is the school of time,
And this the truth sublime,
God teaches in his way:
The sceptre He must wield;
I joyfully will yield,
Love, trust Him, and obey.

—Anon.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

MARK VI. 53–56.

WE may take up the topics of this passage thus: (1) The landing; (2) The recognising; (3) The gathering; (4) The touching; (5) The healing.

I. The landing.—They had been on the east of the Jordan, near Bethsaida; they had taken ship and crossed the lake; and now they draw to the shore of Gennesaret, which was a well-watered plain on the north-west side of the lake, where Magdala and other towns lay. It was no common landing this. History records many a landing,—of conquerors, liberators, benefactors, heralds of peace or war. But here is a landing which surpasses all. Wherever the Son of God landed, there was blessing, peace, liberty, health. He carried all these with Him; and wherever He landed, He dispensed them. We may say that his first great landing was at Bethlehem, when He arrived from heaven. After that, He had many a lesser landing at other places; and wherever his heavenly vessel touched, there He distributed its heavenly freight. He is still landing in our different cities and villages, and still dispensing his stores of health. Wherever the good news is proclaimed, there He is landing; He is drawing to the shore, proclaiming his grace, and showing himself the distributor of pardon, and life, and blessing.

II. The recognising.—'Straightway they knew Him;' 'He could not be hid.' They recognised Him at once,—Jesus of Nazareth, the healer of the sick. It is specially as such they recognise Him here and now. It is not as the teacher, but as the healer, that He approaches the shore of Gennesaret. No doubt He teaches also, but specially He heals. The first thing He does is to heal. Their first felt want is the need of healing; and He does not despise this, but owns it, responds to it. It was then as the healed that they recognised Him, when He came on shore. They knew Him. This is the Man we need! Thus they met Him—not as others, praying Him to depart out of their coasts, but as those who were eager to bid Him welcome. 'If thou knewest,' He once said to another; and so He speaks to us. If thou knewest Him and his gifts, O sinner, wouldst not thou hasten to Him, and partake of his fulness? He comes to thee; wilt thou not go to Him?

III. The gathering.—The news spread. The Healer is come! They run—run through the whole region round about; they tell the tidings; they bring the sick. Wherever He goes in this region—country, cities, villages,—it is the same. He goes to them, they come to Him. The whole region is stirred. What a gathering! what a time of healing! what a casting out of evil spirits! what a removal of disease from the land! The centre of the gathering is the Son of God. Here, as elsewhere, Christ is all. He is the great attraction for the sick and needy. They hear of Him, and they flock to Him; as was written of old: 'To Him shall the gathering of the people be.' It was the want that was in themselves, and the fulness that was in Him, that was the reason for all this gathering. He had what they lacked, and they came to Him for it. So round Him the publicans and sinners gathered, feeling that He had just what they needed. Thus sinners gather unto Jesus still. They hear of his grace and truth, of his love and his fulness; they learn how He has been in the habit of receiving sinners—how many millions have in ages past gone to Him, and been blest. They hear the report of what He is, of what He has spoken, of what He has done. They go to Him; they crowd around Him; they say, 'This is the Being who suits us, whom we need, who has all for us, who is willing to give us all.' They make the discovery that distance from Him is the cause of all their want and wretchedness. So they draw near. They form the one great universal circle, of which Jesus is the centre.

IV. The touching.—'They besought Him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment.' It was nearness to Him, in any way, in any shape,—this was what they sought. Contact with Him,—nay, with his garment,—nay, even with the border of his garment,—this was what they desired. He could have healed them at a distance, without a touch, by a word; but He did not, that He might teach them that it is nearness to Him that is the thing so infinitely desirable; that there might be no mistake as to where the healing came from. There are many ways of contact. He looks on us, we look on Him; He speaks to us, we speak to Him; He touches us, we touch Him. It matters not which of these it may be; only there must be contact or connection of some kind or other,—communications opened between us and Him. Then all his fulness flows out, and our want disappears. It is not some meritorious act of touching, some laborious effort skilfully put forth. It is contact in any way. They who touched Him and his garment were not particular as to the manner. To touch Him was enough. He does not stand on ceremony with the sinner, saying, 'Touch me in this way or that, else you cannot be healed.' All He wants is, that you apply to Him. You will soon experience his welcome, for He is love.

V. The healing.—'As many as touched Him' (or it) 'were made whole.' The cure was immediate and complete. No uncertainty, no failure. All who applied were received, all who touched were healed. The medicine was all-efficacious, the Physician was all-skilful and all-powerful. Disappointment there was none, and could be none. The kind, or the virulence, or the obstinacy of the disease mattered not; the healing power was irresistible. How much more healthy must Judea have been during these years! What an amount of sickness taken away! We have the same Healer still to deal with; all his old skill and love. Time has not weakened Him, nor hardened his heart against our sorrows. Our sins have not produced unwillingness on his part, nor placed us beyond his power as incurables. He does not now say to any one, 'Touch me not, for I have not yet ascended.' He says rather, 'Touch me, for I have ascended;' as if the very fact of his ascension made Him more accessible, more easy of touch. 'Touch me, look to me, hear me, follow me,'—these are his gracious words. Shall we remain afar off? Shall we continue unhealed, unsaved? He is in earnest; shall we not be so? He is disappointed if we do not come. He wants an opportunity of blessing us. We need Him, and He needeth us. Let us go to Him.

THE UNCLEAN SPIRIT.

BY THE EDITOR.

MATT. XII. 43–45.

WE may view this statement of our Lord either personally or prophetically. It concerns, in the first place, the individual man, being a description of the beginning and end of a reformed, but still unconverted soul. It concerns, in the second place, the Jew, the world, the church,—being a prediction as to their first and last condition.

But before taking up these three last, let us interpret the Lord's words with reference to the first, by which we shall better understand the statement in all its applications.

1. The man possessed of the unclean spirit.—The 'spirit' is the devil, or rather, a devil,—such as we so often read of in the Gospels and elsewhere. There seems a reference here to the miracle performed by the Lord just a little before (Matt. xii. 22): 'Then was brought unto Him one possessed with a devil, blind and dumb.' These spirits, or devils, are said to be without number: in one single man they were 'legion.' They not only have access externally, so as to tempt; but internally, so as to possess and occupy the soul, as guests or tenants do a house. Their presence in a man at times is the cause of disease, of madness, of dumbness, of blindness, and the like; for they act as the agents of him who inflicted disease on Job, and who, when permitted, inflicts like disease on others; of him who has the power of death as well as of disease. How fearful to be, in any degree, at the mercy of Satan and his legions; to be thus surrounded with them—nay, and when God permits, delivered over to them, to be inhabited by them! How terrible that first sin of Adam, which brought him and his race under the power of such a tempter, such a destroyer! It was Satan's object to get access to us, to get us under his power. He could only do so by bringing us under the power of sin. He was before this, indeed, the angel of death, the potentate of death, for all death seems to have come from him; but he had no power or right to use his awful office, as executioner, till we had incurred the sentence, 'In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.' Since that, we and our world are subject to his sway. His power is universal over earth, for he is its prince; and it is great indeed over each of us personally,—so great that none but God, the Almighty, can save or deliver. How pressing an argument with the sinner, to escape a power so terrible as this,—to rid himself of the yoke of this strong man, by taking the yoke (light and easy) of Him who is stronger than he!

The spirit here is called (as elsewhere) 'unclean.' This is the one solitary epithet applied to it by God. He does not heap word upon word, expressive of the devil's wickedness and cruelty. He does not exaggerate even his character, nor draw it in darker colours than is needful. He simply calls the spirit 'evil' or 'unclean;' that is all. This is that which makes it so hateful to God. It is 'unclean;' and this is that which makes its dwelling, even hell, so hateful—it is the 'unclean' place; and this is that which makes the sinner so hateful—he is 'unclean.' This spirit is in itself defiled, and wherever it comes it defileth,—just as the devil's emblem, the serpent, is unclean, and wherever it comes it leaves its slime, its defiling trail. How terrible for the sinner, not merely to be himself unclean, but to be the prey, the haunt of an unclean spirit! How infinitely terrible will it be to be unclean for ever; to be the unclean temple of unclean spirits for ever; to dwell with them in their unclean abode for ever!

2. The man dispossessed of the unclean spirit.—The possession was by permission of God, and the dispossession is by his mighty power. It is He that alone can cast out devils. Beelzebub, their prince, does not turn against himself, and cast out his own agents, his own spirits; the man himself has no power to cast out. He is the helpless victim of one far stronger than he. He may cry out, by reason of his bondage; he may 'champ the bit, and foam in fetters;' but he cannot free himself. The deliverance must come from Him who is the Master of Beelzebub, the Lord of devils. It is He who is, ere long, to cast him out of earth, and to chain him in the bottomless pit; none but He can rid earth of its great oppressor. So it is He, even God the Son,—Messiah,—who casts him out of the soul. He is the woman's Seed, sent to bruise the head of the serpent; He is come to destroy the work of the devil; He made Satan to fall like lightning from heaven; He fought with him on earth in the wilderness; He led captive him and his principalities and powers, when He ascended on high; and it is He who fights for us, who wins our battles for us; who, as the Lion of the tribe of Judah, slays the roaring lion who goes about seeking whom he may devour; or rather, we should say, as the chief Shepherd of the flock drives off this roaring lion from the fold, round which he prowls in search of wanderers, and who will finally chain him up, so as to hinder his coming nigh at all. The expression, 'When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man,' marks distinctly the reality of the Satanic or diabolic possession. There is a 'coming in' and a 'going out' of the unclean spirit. The possession and the dispossession are not mere eastern figures. They are simple statements of fact. The mode of entrance and departure, the way of indwelling, we know not; but the Lord's expression shows us how true and real the thing is in itself. The devil goes about the man, watching for entrance; he enters into the man, he dwells in the man, he afflicts the man. These are awful realities. Then he is made to hear the word of One whose authority he cannot dispute, and he obeys; he 'goes out.' This is as blessed as the other is appalling. And this 'going out' at the word of Christ is a result secured in two ways, both of them irresistible. The first comes from Christ's power over the devil as his Conqueror and Master, the second from his power over the sinner as his Saviour and Redeemer. He casts him out because He is stronger than he; He casts him out because He has a right to that soul in which he has made his dwelling. Unwillingly does the devil leave his house. Yet go he must. Christ compels him. His word is irresistible. What consolation is this to the saint! what encouragement to the sinner!

To what extent such possessions are permitted in our day, or in what ways these comings in and goings out are carried on now, we cannot say. Satan is still the same, these evil and unclean spirits are still the same, their access to us on earth is still the same. It is not want of malignity that keeps them from showing themselves in the same way as formerly. It may be they are restrained; or it may be that they can carry on the plots and operations of hell against the sinner more effectually by working less visibly, less palpably, in ways more fitted to conceal their malice, and, with a deeper subtlety of device, to lead men captive at their will. It suited the purpose of Satan, in former ages, to work openly, and as the prince of darkness; it suits his purpose better now to transform himself into an angel of light, and to send forth his spirits under the mask of what is fair and true,—showing themselves not as evil, but as good; not as unclean, but as clean. In this way he hopes, not merely to seduce the world, but to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect. His last grand revelation of himself is yet to come, and it will be something which the world has never seen. His last grand onset on Christ and his church, just before his binding, will be something for which the world is not prepared; and it will, in all likelihood, be the most visible, as well as the most terrible of all. But, meanwhile, he works in secret; he disguises himself under various forms, the comeliest, the most attractive, the likest to religion, and goodness, and Christian excellency that can be put on. For he is 'the prince of all knowledge, where God is not known; of all power, where God is not acknowledged; the bright archangel of the natural man, who is now revealing himself in his angelic glories of natural knowledge, natural beauty, natural wisdom, natural freedom, and natural humanity.' . . . . 'O my God, what a subtle fiend is Satan, thus to gather together all the ruins of the natural man; his sense of beauty and loveliness, his imagination of glory and excellence, his conviction of truth and righteousness, his desire of mercy and benevolence, his capacity of wisdom and goodness,—all these the surviving fragments of thy goodly handiwork, which Thou hast sought, by the revelation of power and love in Jesus Christ, to build again into a spiritual and glorious temple, for thine own spiritual glory to inhabit; to have possessed himself of, and out of them to have formed, a house for pride, glory, and ambition, and other forms of self-idolatry, to dwell in! And how daring is this subtle spirit, to have ventured into the sanctuary of thy holy word, and stolen thence the fire with which to offer up the daily sacrifice in the temple of human self-sufficiency, which He had builded unto himself! . . . Oh, how art thou entrenched, O Satan! how art thou entrenched in thy beautiful deceptions! Thou hast played thy part well in this last age. Thou art all but the Holy One, thou consummate deceiver!'

And why does Satan deal so subtilely in these days? He finds that the old open warfare, which sufficed in ruder ages, will not do. His object is to draw men away from God and Christ, and he cares not by what means this is done. He will, in the last days, pretend to be Christ himself—to be God himself, in order to do this, and to obtain man's homage and service. Now he works more covertly, assuming the appearances which man's intellect, man's fancy, man's taste, man's benevolence, and man's natural conscience admire. By means of this disguise, he lures men away from Christ, away from God, away from the verities of spiritual life and religious truth,—giving them the shadow for the substance; a statue of Christ, instead of the very Christ himself; a picture of the tree of life, instead of the very tree itself. Thus it is that he deceives; leading men on a certain length, so that they may think they are really on the way to the kingdom, and then leading them astray into devious paths, so like the true, that the delusion is hard to be detected. Thus it is he makes men come short of that city, to which he professes to be leading them, and to mistake some religious ideas, or forms, or feelings of their own, for the true knowledge of the living God, and of Jesus Christ, his incarnate Son.

Oh, what a testimony is this to Christ and to his glory,—a testimony from the great enemy of Christ and God! For why should Satan thus imitate Christ, if the Christ he imitates be not unutterably glorious? And if the imitation be so attractive, what must the very person be? If the shadow be worthy of admiration, what must be the substance? If these various parts of the broken features of the Son of God, thus given to man in Satan's poor reflection, be so beautiful, what must be the very countenance of the Son of God, in all its marvellous and divine comeliness?

3. The condition of the unclean spirit thus cast out.—The words that follow evidently refer to the 'spirit,' not the man, and should be read 'it,' not 'he;' it walketh through dry places, etc. When Christ casts out the unclean spirit, He does it wholly. He does not leave it in the man's dwelling, or in his city, or among the habitations of living men. He does not, indeed, cast it out of earth, for its day of being shut up in the abyss is not yet come. He leaves it still on earth, but He sends it out into the desert,—into 'dry places,' unvisited of man, and unwatered of the rivers of earth or the streams of heaven; a land of drought, and of darkness, and of the shadow of death; a land on which the eye of God does not rest, on which his blessing does not come down; where no fruitful field indicates his present favour. No flower of the garden, nor tree of the wood, nor bird of the air, warbling its pleasant song, reminds us of his love; but all is barren, and dreary, and lonely, and without one token, one sign of life, one ray of beauty,—the likest thing to hell which the mind can possibly conceive! Such is the place into which Christ sends the unclean spirit,—as if to intimate to it that such was its only fit abode; the place to which love comes not, where verdure is not, where water flows not, where man treads not,—foretaste of the eternal wilderness, the lake of fire!

For on that spirit is sin—unpardoned and unpardonable sin; sin that casts out the sinful being from the presence of God—from all that is living, and lovely, and excellent, either in earth or heaven. There the unclean spirit is to make its dwelling: the unclean place and the unclean being thus meeting together in fit society. It was Paradise that the unclean spirit once entered,—Paradise, man's proper home, made for him by God; and it is now into the wilderness that this spirit is cast, to teach it that with Paradise, either unfallen or fallen—nay, with the green earth at all,—such a spirit has nought to do. Paradise is not for Satan, though he entered it. This earth is not for Satan, though he dwells in it. He is, ere long, to be utterly cast out, both out of man and of man's happy earth. The wilderness is all that he can claim,—those regions of earth which he, by his craft and power, has brought into barrenness and death. How awful the lesson to the sinner here! Is he to have his part with Satan? Is he to have his abode with the unclean spirits, or with the redeemed and the unfallen angels? Is his home to be Paradise regained, the abode of Christ and his saints; or the eternal wilderness, the abode of Satan and his fiends,—far from the tree of life, and the living water, and the everlasting pastures?

(To be continued.)

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER III.

'NOW, Dora, how I do wish you were a boy!' observed Tom Harley, a few days after Johnny's departure.

'Do you, Tom? I think I would rather be a little girl,' replied Dora, advancing to the table where Tom was sitting, resting his face upon his hands, with his two elbows on the table, and a lot of books before him.

'Then you are downright silly, Dora. I did think you had more sense, or I should not have wanted you to be a boy. Girls are always poor silly things.'

'Constance is not silly; she is very clever,' said Dora.

'Oh, is she though?' sneered Tom.

'Yes, and so is your mamma.'

'Well, yes; of course mamma is clever. I don't believe there ever was anybody like mamma; but then, Dora, you know mamma is —well—I don't know what to call her;' and Tom, puzzled for a word expressive of his mother's qualifications, terminated his speech with the right one—'a lady.'

'And why cannot I be a lady some day, Tom?' inquired Dora.

'Why? of course you can't. A little brown thing like you would never make a real lady. Ladies ought to have beautiful light hair, and blue eyes, and to be tall like a queen, and to have straight noses like mamma's, and not a nose the shape of yours—like nobody else's.'

'But, Tom,' said Dora, putting her hand up to feel her objectionable nose, 'are you sure nobody ever had a nose like mine?'

'There, don't tease me, Dora. You would have made a capital boy; and I am very sorry you are not one.'

'But, Tom,' persisted Dora, creeping up close to him, 'if I had been a boy, would you have loved me better than you do now?'

'I should have liked to play with you better.'

'Could not I learn to play with you?' she inquired.

'You play!—a girl like you play with me! Why, Conny cannot do that; but then she never would try.'

'I will try, Tom, if you please. I should like you to love me. Don't you think you could, though I am a little girl? I would do anything if you would please to love me.'

'I do not see what you could do. You might catch a ball, or play marbles; but you could not join in foot-ball, or cricket, or leap-frog—your stupid dress would keep you from that; besides, I do not think mamma would like you to, if you could, because girls never play boys' games.'

Dora glanced down at her dress as Tom alluded to it; but when she heard there was a probability that her aunt would not approve of her playing at boys' games, she observed quietly:

'I would not vex auntie, Tom.'

'No, of course you would not; but, you see, if you had only been a boy, it would have been all right.'

'Yes; but you know I could not help it, Tom,' replied Dora, apologetically; 'though I would rather be a little girl, if you would not object to it. Johnny does not mind my being one; he loves me,' and tears rose in Dora's eyes.

'There, do not cry, Dora!' exclaimed Tom, ashamed at having caused them. 'I do love you very much, and I will teach you to play draughts with me; and you shall come and find words out for me in the dictionary, to help me in my exercises. So, come here every evening, and see what you can do.'

Dora's eyes glistened through her tears, as she expressed her delight at Tom's proposition; and, taking the dictionary, she sat down on the carpet, to be in readiness to look out any word Tom might require. Constance and Tom prepared their exercises in what was used as the schoolroom by Dora and Johnny; though, after Miss Mills had finished giving the little ones their daily lessons, they seldom entered it until that lady arrived for the same purpose the next morning. Tom and Constance dined at school, and, excepting at holiday time, were only home in the mornings and evenings. Dora was very pleased at being invited to stay in the room with Tom, and determined she would do all she could to help him. Constance made several objections, when she came in and discovered 'the child,' as she called Dora, in the schoolroom; but Tom immediately silenced them, by declaring that he would go and ask his mamma's leave to have her there, if Constance did not hold her tongue.

'I will be very quiet and good, Conny, if you will let me stay,' pleaded Dora, as she listened to their contention. 'I only want to help Tom a bit.'

'You help Tom!' replied Constance, contemptuously, 'the idea of it! But please yourselves, I do not care;' and, sitting down to her lessons, she took no further notice of either of them.

Tom finished his exercises without requiring any aid from Dora, who sat patiently waiting for his commands; and when he had put away his books, and got out his tool-box, he gave her some tools to hold, and then went on with his boat-making. He was particularly kind and communicative that evening; and Dora had explained to her the difference between a ship and a schooner — a piece of information which was conveyed to nurse whilst Dora was undressing that night.

'What,' said nurse, 'do young ladies want to know about ships?'

'Oh nurse,' replied Dora, 'I should like to know all that Tom knows; and I will not forget a schooner has two masts, and a ship three, or he will never teach me anything again.'

'Well, I don't see that to know about ships can hurt you; but Master Tom must not be teaching you all his nonsense; 'twouldn't be pretty for a little girl, Miss Dora.'

'Is it naughty nonsense, nurse?' inquired Dora, looking up very innocently.

'Why, you see, Master Tom is a very good boy; only he is so full of fun and tricks, which I should not like you, Miss Dora, to play, because nobody would love you if you did.'

'Well, nurse,' said Dora, 'I will learn about ships and all that, and will tell him he must not teach me tricks at all.'

'What a queer little thing she is!' observed nurse to old nurse, when she returned to the nursery, after putting Dora to bed. 'I do believe it would nigh break her heart to tell her you did not love her. I never met with anybody who wanted so much to be loved.'

'She is a precious darling,' replied old nurse, who was very fond of her. 'They'll be proud of her one of these days, if she lives to grow up. She thinks of every one afore she does of herself. Mark my words, Jane: she'll be a blessing to this house, let whoever live to see it.'

Old nurse's words were true; Dora did think of every one before herself. She only thought of herself, as she could be of use or pleasing to others. From her infancy she had been brought up close to her mamma's sick-room, and taught to consider her in everything. Young in years, she was old in thoughtfulness; and it was the habit of reflecting upon whether she must, or must not do a thing, that made her appear so frequently quaint and unchildlike. Her lively, rattling cousins had quite overpowered her when she first came amongst them; and, excepting when with Johnny, she felt more lonely than when playing quietly alone in a corner of her mother's room. Gradually her admiration of Tom drew her more and more to him; and it became one of her most ardent desires that he should like her, which his love of teasing had led her to suppose he did not. She had admired him at a distance for a long time; but that evening, when Tom, for lack of better society, had condescended to impart to her his wishes regarding her, she could no longer control her feelings, and had let him know how very much she wanted him to love her; and Tom, who really loved her a great deal, had graciously given her to understand that her desire was granted, and that, notwithstanding she was a girl, they were henceforth to be friends.

Dora never offered up her prayers aloud like the other little ones at old nurse's knee, for she had not been brought up with them to do so; but, kneeling at the foot of her bed, in an inaudible tone, she prayed in the words taught her by her mother, adding her own petitions and thanksgivings to them. Had she given distinct utterance to her thoughts that night, nurse would have been surprised at hearing her thank God for having made dear Cousin Tom love her, and would have considered her the strangest child that ever was. Dora had been well instructed by her Christian mother, and the good seed had early taken root in her young heart. She had been the child of many prayers, and its evidences exemplified themselves in her daily life. She could read very nicely; her Bible and Bible story-book were her delight, and she would spend whole hours over them if left to herself. She looked upon God as her best Friend, and accordingly told Him, with childlike confidence, all her joys or sorrows.

Dora thought the evening was long in coming the following day. She never saw much of Tom in the mornings, for, as soon as he had finished his breakfast, he was off to school; but he was always back again to tea, and played about until half-past six, when he went into the schoolroom to prepare his lessons, and sometimes she did not see him again until the next day. But now Tom had told her to come regularly to the schoolroom of an evening, saying she could help him; and she was so pleased at the idea of being useful to Tom! She had been useful to her mamma, and after she came to Chelsea Place, she was useful to Johnny; but since he had gone to Uncle Bennett's, she could not feel she was of any use to anybody, and the thought had grieved her. Now she was going to be of use to Tom, and she was so happy!

Before lesson-time arrived, Dora discovered that Tom was not nearly so amiable as he had been the preceding evening. He had been very snappish at tea; and, after tea, had amused himself teasing Agnes and little Guy, until old nurse told him that, if he could not behave himself, he should not remain in the nursery, and he had gone off in a pet, and Dora felt half afraid to follow him to the schoolroom, whither she knew he had gone. It was several minutes before she could really summon up courage to go in after him; but when she did, how was she astonished at seeing her big brave Cousin Tom leaning his head on his arms on the table, crying! For some moments she remained motionless, then springing forwards, she exclaimed:

'Oh Tom!'

'Who sent for you? Who wanted you?' shouted Tom, jumping up in a passion at having been caught weeping by Dora. But Dora, nothing daunted, drew nearer to him, saying:

'Dear Tom, don't be angry; I am sorry—'

'What about? You don't know anything; girls never do.' And he plumped down on his chair again.

'What is the matter, dear Tom?' pleaded Dora, creeping closer and closer to him. 'Do tell me; you said you would love me;' and she put one of her little hands upon his shoulder.

'Why, I've lost my place in Latin, Dora,' cried Tom, softening, as the thought of his trouble again came over him. 'I've gone down three in my class, and examination will be next week; and I shall not get up again all that, and I shall lose the prize—that I shall.' And a deep sob escaped from Tom's breast.

'Poor Tom! I am very sorry. But are you quite sure you will not get up to-morrow?' she inquired.

'I do not think I could beat all three, Dora; they are not all three likely to miss answering. I have worked so hard, Dora; and it was not fair either, at least with Long, for he'd got the answers written down. I saw him slip the paper into his desk.'

'Why did you not tell, Tom?'

'What! turn sneak, Dora?'

'Sneak, Tom! What is that?'

'Why, to peach or tell tales. I'd rather have gone to the bottom than done that.'

'But, Tom, how did you get down three?'

'Why, you see, Dora,' said Tom, growing confidential and easier as he unburdened his mind. 'I was so put out and vexed when I lost the top, that I did not feel as if I knew anything. All seemed to go out of my head, as if I had not learned it a bit: and there was just like a great ball of something in my throat choking me, and I could not speak a word.'

'I know that is very bad,' observed Dora, soothingly. 'I always get that great ball in my throat when I want to cry, and cannot. But, Tom, do you know, God saw that naughty boy? and I would rather be you than he.'

'I should think I would. I would not be a cheat for the world.'

'Of course you would not, for you are our own dear Tom;' and Dora looked so proud of him that Tom gave her a kiss, and called her 'a dear little thing,' which Dora considered a great compliment, and probably would have told him so, had not Constance's voice been heard outside the door, when Tom silenced her with—

'Don't say a word to Constance about my losing my place.'

'Oh dear me!' cried Constance, as she entered the room. 'Are you coming here every evening, Dora?'

'Yes, if you please, Constance,' replied Dora, meekly.

'Then I shall ask mamma to ask Miss Mills to give you lessons to learn with us.'

'But I have learned my lessons—half a column of spelling and a verse of poetry—Constance.'

'Then you must have longer lessons that you cannot learn so quickly,' observed Constance; 'we do not have idle children in here.'

Dora flushed; she never could bear to be called idle, and that Constance well knew; but she wanted to get rid of Dora from the schoolroom, that she and Tom might have it all to themselves.

'You be quiet, Constance,' called Tom. 'Dora is to stay here, and she is coming every evening; and I am going to take her everywhere with me when I can, because you are so disagreeable and bumptious.'

'And you are as conceited as a peacock, and as foolish as a goose,' retorted Constance, looking very red and angry.

'Please do not quarrel,' cried Dora; 'I will go away. I am very sorry, Tom; but I do not want to make Constance angry, nor anybody—indeed I don't.'

'You shall not go,' shouted Tom; 'you've got as much right here as anybody.'

'You need not go on my account, Dora,' said Constance, with a slight toss of the head; 'I do not care for children.'

Dora accepted the ungracious permission, and aking a little stool near Tom, with the dictionary on her lap, and a story-book of her own to read, waited to be made useful. A deep silence prevailed in the room: Tom was vexed, and Constance angry, and things did not go on smoothly with either of them. Presently Constance remarked—

'There, how provoking! if I have not forgotten my geography book.'

'Glad of it,' said Tom.

'I dare say you are, Mr. Spiteful,' was the reply.

'Hope you will lose your place, Miss Cross.'

'We've no places to lose, Mr. Charitable.'

'Poor things: what a pity!' sneered Tom.

Whilst this bickering was going on, Dora had slipped unperceived from the room, and in a few minutes had returned with a red covered book, which she took up to Constance, asking—

'Is this what you wanted, Conny?'

'Why, yes, to be sure it is. Where did you find it?' inquired Constance, forgetting her bad temper in her pleasure at having what she wanted found.

'Up in your room, by one of the chairs,' replied Dora.

'I must have dropped it, Dora. Oh! thank you for looking for it. I should never have thought of going upstairs to see after it. I fancied I had left it at school. I am so glad!' and the cloud vanished from Constance's brow as she resumed her lessons.

Dora looked at Tom: she wished she could find or do something for him; but her wish remained ungratified, and the lessons were concluded without her services having been required.

'Come and have a game at steeple-chase, Dora,' cried Constance, as she put away her books, her ill-humour having quite flown away.

Dora would have preferred remaining with Tom, but did not like to offend Constance; but before she could give up the dictionary, Constance turned round to Tom, and asked which horse she should keep for him.

Tom muttered something about he did not care.

But Constance replied, 'Yes, you do care, Mr. Tom, and I shall bring the board in here, and then you can choose for yourself;' and tripping off, she soon returned with the box and board.

Tom could not for shame be out of temper any longer, and selecting 'Fly-catcher,' the black horse, he soon forgot all his grievances in his desire to arrive at the goal before Dora and Constance.

After Constance had gone up to her room, and Dora was waiting for nurse to put her to bed, she crept up to Tom, saying:

'Tom, dear, if you and Constance quarrel about me, I would rather not come in here. I make you wicked. God won't love you.'

'But Constance shall not have all her own way, Dora,' said Tom, firing up. 'I am the oldest, and she shall not manage me.'

'But, please, do not quarrel again, Tom; it vexes me so. Please, promise me not to do it any more.'

'Well, if Constance does not grumble, I won't.'

'I do not want you to say that, Tom. You must promise you will not be cross if she does.'

'But I cannot promise that, Dora.'

'Why not?'

'Because I cannot help getting angry if she says teasing things.'

'God will help you not to, if you ask Him, Tom.'

'I should not like to ask God that, Dora; the idea of it—'

'Oh! Tom, you must ask Him for everything good, if you want to do good.'

'Do you, Dora?'

'Yes, Tom, I try to do it; mamma told me so. But sometimes I forget, and then I say and do naughty things—like when I struck you. My heart is very bad sometimes; oh, so naughty bad, Tom!'

'What do you do then, Dora?'

'Why, I ask God to forgive me for his Son Jesus Christ's sake, and to make me a better little girl. But here is nurse coming. Do promise me, Tom.'

Tom could not resist her pleadings, and giving her an affectionate kiss, whispered, 'I will try, Dora; for you know I would rather please you than the best boy going. You are a first-rater, and no mistake. Yes, I will really try.'

CHAPTER IV.

DORA'S FIRST SUMMER HOLIDAYS.

JOHNNY'S return was a source of great pleasure to all the children, for they had missed him so much in their games. Dora's faith in her aunt was also quite confirmed; for Johnny had come back, as Aunt Harley had told her he would. The mistaken untruthful kindness of the persons who had taken her from her mother's room, telling her that her mamma was going away, but would come back again, had shaken her trust in those about her in illness; but in Johnny's safe return she found her hoped-for confidence in her aunt was not misplaced, and she knew most certainly that what her auntie said was truth.

Ship and boat-making became a favourite pursuit in the schoolroom in Chelsea Place—Constance making the flags with coloured ribbon, and Dora hemming the sails for them; and it was settled a regular little fleet of ships should be made against they went to the seaside, when they were to be launched. Tom had somewhat got over his disappointment in losing the prize for Latin, for he did lose it, never having been able to regain his place in class; but he won a prize for history, which turned out to be a book on boats, and it proved a great help to him in his shipbuilding.

When they were tired of sitting still, chipping wood, and flag and sail-making, they played at 'Court.' Constance, with her long light hair, being the judge; Dora, the culprit; and Johnny, the crier; whilst Tom, in a paper wig, and old nurse's short black cloak over his shoulders, acted as counsel for and against the prisoner. Tom had already decided upon being a barrister when he was a man; and in his zeal to sustain the character he some day hoped to fill, he flourished his papers and argued away, sometimes so very loud, and then so low and pathetically, that Dora frequently forgot she was only playing a make-believe part, and quite cried with fear at what was coming upon her. Then Johnny strutted about with a stick in his hand, crying 'Silence! silence!' so grandly, making them all burst out laughing in the midst of their mock gravity, that Constance would adjourn the court for an hour or so.

Occasionally Dora pleaded that if she was to be tried, it might not be for dog-stealing or jam-pot emptying, for she never did do such a thing; but her desire was generally overruled, and poor Dora heard of whole rows of pots having been emptied, and stains having been discovered upon her pinafore and dress, leaving no doubts on the mind of judge and jury but that she was guilty. Tom, with a boy's curiosity, had so often pushed his way into the Guildhall, in the city, with his schoolfellows, that he was pretty well up in the manner a trial was carried on, and managed their mock court capitally. Then they read and told stories; and Tom's were usually of such a thrilling, marvellous description, that Dora and Johnny were glad to run away to the nursery, to inquire of old nurse if they could be true. On the whole, the Harleys of Chelsea Place enjoyed their holidays thoroughly. Sometimes, however, there was an outbreak amongst them, and they wished school would begin, to be rid one of the other; and they considered each other very disagreeable, which they really were, when in their naughty moods. It was a great misfortune for them that they were so little with Mrs. Harley, and a cause of deep regret to her; but whilst Mr. Harley continued an invalid, there was not a possibility of her making any alteration in their mode of bringing up. Many a little quiet talking to did Tom get, when his mamma had the opportunity of leaving his papa a bit, about preserving gentlemanly habits and language. She could not endure vulgar ejaculations in conversation, or unmeaning epithets; and Tom was constantly picking up amongst his schoolmates something objectionable in her ears, which, for want of being more frequently with him, she could not fully check. Constance was also very high-minded; and being naturally clever, gave herself all manner of airs about her self-supposed superiority, which cost her mother many an anxious moment. Dora really, young as she was, was what nurse had said she would be at some future day—the blessing of the house. Her tender mind had been so early imbued with religious impressions, rendering her thereby so keenly alive to a sense of right or wrong, that she imperceptibly influenced her impetuous elder cousins. The 'Oh! it is so wrong,' would effectually stop Tom in a foolish if not rash proceeding; and the timid, meek, 'If you please, Constance, I would, or I would rather not do such a thing,' did much to soften Constance's overbearing disposition, where direct and determinate opposition would only have ended in a violent fit of passion. There must be two to make a quarrel; and Dora very seldom, if ever, became one of the necessary two—not but she had an evil temper to control, as well as her cousins, but the remembrance of past givings way to it, and the fear of offending her heavenly Father, gave her strength to resist the promptings of her wicked heart, and usually to overcome her enemy.

People thought the little Harleys must be very dull in the large, sombre-looking old house with a sick papa always at home; but could they have beheld them in the nursery or schoolroom, they would have pronounced them the merriest of the merry. Their mamma was so thoughtful and considerate, and their papa, though he could not bear a noise, so anxious that they should enjoy themselves, that they had many out-door treats in the summer. Very frequently they spent the whole of a day in the woods or fields, donkeys being hired to carry the little ones and the provisions to the spot where they were going to pic-nic; old nurse and nurse presiding over the party. Then in the evening they returned home with such an abundance of treasures, consisting of moss, flowers, pebbles, and stones, and were so very tired, that they were glad enough to kneel down and thank God for their happy day, praying Him to take care of them during the night, and pop into their nice, comfortable beds. One thing Dora missed very much, and that was, some poor people to visit and carry little presents to. Before her mamma died, she used to be constantly sent with the servant with nice things to persons who were old or ill; and she used to make aprons and pinafores to give away, while sitting by her mother's side. Now, near Chelsea Place there appeared to be no poor people, or at least she never heard of there being any, and consequently her pocket-money accumulated in her money-box, anything but to her satisfaction. She thought a great deal about it, and at last came to the conclusion that the city she then lived in must be very grand indeed, not to have any poor people but the beggars and crossing sweepers, and wished that her poor friends, near her old home, could come and live in it as well as herself. This wish being conveyed to nurse one day, she was thoroughly upset at hearing there were lots and lots of poor people who had scarcely bread to eat, living but a few streets off, and that there were poor people to be found everywhere; for God had said in the Bible, 'The poor shall never cease out of the land' (Deut. xv. 11).

'I wonder why God makes people poor, nurse?' observed Dora, after a few minutes' reflection.

'Why, I don't think as how God makes them poor, Miss Dora; but He lets them be poor, to see who will trust Him, and what rich people there are in the world who will do good to them for his sake.'

'Does Aunt Harley do good to them?' inquired Dora.

'Yes, miss, she gives lots away; she is kind to everybody.'

'I love God, nurse; I should like to do some good too,' said Dora.

'And so you can, and so you shall, my darling,' replied nurse. 'We will ask old nurse if you could not help her; she is making some clothes for a poor child or two. Your aunt gave her the stuff to make them out of.'

Dora was delighted, and could scarcely wait for nurse to finish dressing her, she was so very anxious to hear what she could do. After that Dora spent more time with old nurse in the nursery, and less with Tom and Constance in the schoolroom, until Tom declared 'it was too bad of her to leave them.' But finding she did not care for his remarks, he began to listen to her reason for doing so; and, being a kind-hearted boy, applauded her for them, and finally became so interested in the poor little children for whom she was working, that he set to and made a little wooden box to put the clothes in when they were completed. Constance also did not like to be left alone, and joined 'old nurse's working party' as they chose to call it; and both Tom and Constance felt much happier in having followed Dora's example, in trying to be useful and do good. Sometimes old nurse threatened to turn Tom out, he was so full of fun, and made such a din with his hammering; but her threat was never carried into effect, for Tom would perch himself cross-legged upon a chair, and sit some minutes so still and demure, that she could do nothing but laugh at him. Johnny usually assisted Tom in his carpentering, considering he was perfectly necessary to his brother in the construction of the box; for he kept the tools, gave out the nails, and held the wood when it required to be steadied. Quickly the time passed by, and the holidays drew to a close; but all the little Harleys pronounced them to be the happiest they had ever spent, and Tom and Constance said it was Dora who had helped to make them so—their own little cousin Dora.

(To be continued.)

JESUS, MY REDEEMER, LIVETH.

JESUS, my Redeemer, liveth,
I shall enter into life;
Soar to where my Saviour dwelleth,
In heaven's own glorious fields of light.
Then shall life-long tribulation
Buried be in his salvation:
Death is lost in victory's song.

O death! where is thy bitter wave?
Where's thy victory, 'boasting grave?'
Our God from death hath ta'en the pang.
Praise to Him, the victory's given,
Through Jesus Christ, our Lord in heaven!
Hallelujah!

—From the German of Herder.

THE WALDENSES IN 1866.

BY THE REV. A. H. R. HEBDEN, EAST FARLEIGH.

(Continued from p. 355.)

SEPTEMBER 14*th*.—In the evening we had a visit from Mr. Malan, the pastor of La Torre. He gave us interesting information concerning the Vaudois, and the state of religion in Italy. He has lived a good deal in some of the large towns of Italy; and was expelled from Florence, along with Mr. Geymonat, in the time of the Grand Duke. His experience of evangelization in Italy is encouraging. He says he is confident that in almost any of the towns an evangelist, who is suited for his work, may collect a small congregation. The great difficulty, he observed, is not now Popery, but infidelity. He thinks the doctrines of Rome, such as purgatory and invocation of saints, are now very little believed. The principal doctrine of Rome is mother church—her unity and universality. This doctrine is exalted, so as to depress the individual conscience and sense of responsibility. When priests join the Protestants, they have been so long accustomed to a blind, servile obedience, that they have almost lost the feeling of personal responsibility. The church has been everything, the individual nothing. They are sometimes willing to believe, without inquiry, what the Protestant church teaches, even as they had before yielded implicit and unreasoning obedience to the decrees of Rome.

Since the distress occasioned in the valleys by the diseases in the vines and mulberries, two schemes of emigration have been set on foot, and carried into effect. There are now about 2000 Vaudois at Marseilles. This emigration Mr. Malan does not consider a very happy thing, in a religious point of view. The people get mingled amongst an ignorant and superstitious population, and are, he fears, more in danger of learning their ways, than likely to exert a good influence among them. The other colony is in South America, near Monte Video. This project was got up among the people themselves, and greatly encouraged by the then pastor of Roras, who is now chaplain to the colony. The other pastors held aloof from the movement, because they had not sufficient confidence in the stability of the governments of South America. There is reason to hope that the Vaudois colony of Rosario may be useful in promoting the evangelization of South America. There are good openings for enterprising evangelists, preaching the gospel in Italian and Spanish. These languages should be used principally by pastors and evangelists in South America, and the use of the French language among the Vaudois comparatively dropped. Mr. Malan very much wishes, on account of the poverty of his people, that they could spread themselves out a little by colonization, so as to exert a good influence on Romish populations around them, rather than remain always pent up amongst the rocks of the Alps, where so many of them can barely keep body and soul together. Colonization is not a new thing in the history of the Vaudois. An industrious, moral, and healthy population naturally increases. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the valleys of Piedmont sent colonies to Provençe and Calabria, to cultivate lands in those provinces which had before lain waste. The Vaudois of Provençe were exterminated by persecution in 1545, those of Calabria in 1560.

Mr. Malan has four services on Sabbath, first, at the chapel-of-ease at Coppiers at 9 A.M., next at the parish church, La Torre, at 11 A.M., a prayer-meeting at Chabasse at 4 P.M., and a prayer-meeting at La Torre at 7 P.M. He often has the assistance of candidates for the ministry, who are licensed by the synod to preach; and the prayer-meetings at Chabasse, where he is assisted by the ministers of Angrogna and San Giovanni, are held only during the summer.

Divine service is held in the valleys always in the French language. The people can, most of them, speak three languages, viz. the dialect of the district, French, and Italian. Their own patois, I was told, is somewhat similar to the language used in ancient times by the Provençal bards. Divine service was formerly held in the valleys in the Italian language. The plague in 1630 destroyed all the pastors except two. A fresh supply of pastors was obtained from Switzerland and France; but these could not preach in Italian, so the use of the French language in worship was adopted from that time. The pastors ordinarily speak French; but in conversing with the peasants often use their patois, as the peasants can converse with more freedom in their own patois.

There are Romish priests, paid by the Government, in all the Protestant parishes. In some parishes the priest has only a congregation of two or three persons; and it has sometimes been the case, that the priest's servants were the only persons in the parish who attended mass. The Romish church, we were told, claims to be mistress of the soil; and it would appear to the Papal authorities a dreadful thing to acknowledge that, in any part of Italy, the population is Protestant.

September 15*th*.—We took a walk up the valley of Luzerna as far as Bobio, the parish at the head of the valley. There is a parish between La Torre and Bobio, called Villaro. It was here that an event in the Vaudois history occurred two hundred years ago. Some missionary monks, established at Villaro, had so effectually annoyed the people, though they could not convert them, as to provoke their own expulsion from the parish, and the destruction of their convent. The outrage was the act of very few persons, and those women; but it was eagerly seized upon by the Papists at Turin, as a pretext for a general massacre. Count Tedesco, a valiant Italian colonel, at the head of 1200 cavalry, was sent in great haste to surprise and burn Villaro. An extraordinarily heavy rain fell as he rode through the valley, and when he reached Villaro, it was discovered that none of his men's carbines would go off. Twenty-five villagers had armed themselves to defend their homes; and Tedesco was compelled to retire as quickly as possible, for fear the people of La Torre and San Giovanni should rise to cut off his retreat. Just before entering the village, we noticed a spot where the road winds round a corner, and being commanded by rocks above it, appears capable of defence against cavalry. It may have been here that the quiet villagers stood behind a rude rampart to resist Count Tedesco. There is a good road along the valley from La Torre to Bobio, leading to the pass called Colle Della Croce, or Col de la Croix, which may be crossed to enter the French province of Dauphine. We bathed in the clear stream of the Pellice, which winds about prettily amongst verdant meadows. There was very little water in the stream at this season, and our difficulty was to find a place where the torrent was deep enough. At Bobio we rested at the house of the minister, Mr. Davi. He had vines growing over the wall of his house, and bunches of grapes hanging from his verandah. He is not rich, however. In Italy one need not be rich to eat grapes. There are vineyards all through the valley of Luzerna, from San Giovanni to Bobio. Mr. Davi has 1500 parishioners, and two chapels-of-ease in his parish. Sometimes he has three hours' mountain-climbing to visit a sick person.

September 16th.—Being the Lord's day, we attended divine service at the parish church of La Torre at 11 A.M., and heard an excellent sermon from Matt. xii. 50. The prayers are read from a liturgy, and are short. The whole service is less than an hour and a half, of which the sermon occupies about forty minutes. A psalm and hymn are sung from a collection of psalms and hymns authorized by the Vaudois Synod. Two chapters of Scripture and the Ten Commandments are read by the regent at the commencement of the service. This custom of Scripture being read by the regent is objectionable, because the reading of Scripture scarcely appears to be a part of the service; it seems to be a secondary matter. The reading takes place whilst the people are assembling, and is much interrupted by the noise of people coming in and taking their seats. The regent also leads the singing, like the precentor in Scotch churches. The seats at La Torre are comfortable; there is width enough between them, so that the legs are not cramped; the backs of the seats slope a little backwards, so that you can sit at your ease, and your attention is not distracted by the discomfort of feeling your back almost cut in two. In the afternoon one of us attended the prayer-meeting at Chabasse, and took part in it, at the request of Mr. Malan, by saying a few words to the people in French.

With regard to the education of the Vaudois clergy, the theological college has been transferred from La Torre to Florence, immediately upon the annexation of Tuscany to the kingdom of Victor Emmanuel. There is still a college at La Torre; but the course of studies pursued there is now, in the case of candidates for the ministry, preparatory to their entering the college at Florence. At Florence they go through a three years' course, specially intended to prepare them for the ministry of the gospel, and often pursue their studies one year longer abroad, in Switzerland or in Scotland. Students are generally employed in the work of evangelization in Italy for a year or two previous to ordination. Their theological training includes instruction in such practical matters as the composition and delivery of sermons. We heard candidates for the ministry preach really excellent sermons, showing more pulpit ability than most of our English clergy. Sermons are always delivered extempore. The reading of sermons is unknown in the Vaudois churches.

There is one thing in which it is impossible to praise our brethren at La Torre. It is painful to see the desecration of the Lord's day which prevails there. The shops are open, except during divine service. Many kinds of work are performed as on week-days. There is even something of a market held (people coming in from the country with fruit, etc.), supplementary to the regular market on Fridays. We were told that a former minister of the parish made a stir about it, and succeeded in obtaining a much better observance of the Sabbath. Improvement is much needed. But no doubt the large number of Roman Catholics there is now at La Torre would be a great obstacle to improvement in this respect.

September 17th was spent at La Torre. In the afternoon we had a pretty walk up to Tagliaretto, returning by Coppiers, where a chapel-of-ease to La Torre was built by General Beckwith. On the way back we met Mr. Malan, who asked us to accompany him, and prolong our walk. We went with him to call on Mr. Arnaud, great-grandson of Henri Arnaud, who commanded the glorieuse rentrée in 1689. This military achievement excited the admiration of the great Napoleon, who inquired about the accuracy of the narrative when he was at Turin. Mr. Arnaud showed us the portrait of his illustrious ancestor, and the communion cup which Henri Arnaud used in administering the Lord's Supper to his soldiers. In the portrait Henri wears his clerical robes. He never ceased to perform his functions as a minister of Christ, even when the force of circumstances made him for a time a soldier in a holy cause. After the glorious return to their valleys, the first church of which the Vaudois took possession was that of Prali, in the valley of St. Martin. They purified it by turning out the Romish images and ornaments; and Mr. Arnaud preached from the 129th Psalm with such warmth, as moved his brave comrades to tears. When besieged at La Balsille by a large army of French and Piedmontese, he prayed with his garrison night and morning, preached twice a week, and administered the Lord's Supper. We were shown the fort which Henri constructed at the back of the house where his descendant now resides. There is a vineyard in the fort, belonging to the present Mr. Arnaud. At one corner of the vineyard there is something like a watch-tower. When the grapes are ripening, it is customary to watch the vineyards at nights for fear of thieves. The factory people at La Torre have not a good reputation for honesty.

Henri Arnaud died in Wurtemberg. He was of French extraction; and on this pretext the Government of Turin compelled him to leave the valleys as being a foreigner. But through his holy courage and skilful generalship, under God, the Vaudois were re-established in their native valleys, from which they had been for a short time exiled. The circumstance which made the Duke of Savoy willing to let them settle again in their old homes was, that war opportunely broke out between him and the king of France. He then needed the assistance of the Vaudois to defend the passes of the Alps against the French. Although the people of the valleys of Piedmont were so often persecuted, the dukes of Savoy repeatedly acknowledged that they had no more faithful and loyal subjects in all their states. In the frequent wars with France, they could always count upon their courage and fidelity. The cruelties practised in Piedmont were instigated by the court of Rome.

(To be continued.)

'THE DEATH OF ST. LORENZO IN THE CATACOMBS.'*

'How beautiful! how very beautiful!' say we,
As on the glorious work of art we gaze in ecstasy.
Speechless, it speaks: 'Life's storms all past,
Repose, long crav'd, is mine at last.
The Master's call came not too soon;
His work was finished ere life's noon.'
Methinks, as on the canvas we Rivet our minds so earnestly,
We see the real being there,
And not the canvas, 'tis so fair!
And, wandering back to that dark year,
When he lay dead upon the bier,
Before us passes in review
The living scene; and we say too:
'He lies at rest; we'll not distress him;
But silently, in passing, bless him,—
Breathing a prayer that our toss'd soul,
Like his, may early reach the goal;
May joyful soar from realms of night,
To dwell in heaven's eternal light.'
Genius is stamp'd upon the brow,
So early yielding to death's vow;
And peace transcribed upon a face,
Where beauty rare we love to trace.
Those eyes, so oft with sorrow's tear
Bedimm'd, no more shall waken here.
Those lovely lips, mute now for earth,
To purer eloquence give birth.

No golden circlet crowns his head,
No gems adorn his manly brow,
No pomp surrounds the martyr's bed—
Far holier are the signs of woe!
Nor placed beneath the cypress gloom,
Shall be our hero's earthly tomb.
In faithful hearts his place is kept,
Watched o'er by eyes that with his wept;
And this his sweetest monument:
'A life in acts of love all spent!'
Friends tenderly bend o'er the dead,
Subdued by sorrow's chast'ning hand;
Meekly they bow the rev'rent head,
As priest and kinsfolk form one band.
That peace which only Jesus gives,
Illumes each sweetly radiant face:
'Though dead to time, our brother lives,'
They say, 'in fullest happiness.
No shade of trouble mars that smile,
So pure, so calm, so blest;
Angels may bend in awe awhile,
To view such perfect rest!
God's love hath plucked the sting away
From that which we name Death;
'Tis glorious immortality
Surrounds him—heaven's breath!'
O ye who, wrapt in awe, stand near
The painter's holy theme,
The end of Christian faith revere:
This is no idle dream.

A. J.

* One of the most beautiful on view at the Dublin Exhibition of 1865.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

HEB. XI. 7.

HERE are six things in the life of Noah: (1) The warning; (2) The fear; (3) The ark; (4) The salvation; (5) The condemnation; (6) The righteousness.

I. The warning.—The word is the same as is used regarding Joseph and the young child in a dream (Matt. ii. 12, 22); regarding Simeon (Luke ii. 26); regarding Cornelius by an angel (Acts x. 22). The warning was a divine one; how given, we know not—whether by voice, or vision, or dream, or angel. As the sons of God still worshipped in front of Paradise, where the shekinah rested, it might be from the glory that 'the God of glory' spoke to Noah, as afterwards to Abraham. The warning was explicit and unconditional, regarding coming danger and destruction. God announced that He meant to bring a flood upon the earth, for total destruction,—'whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished.' There has been a warning sounding through the ages: 'Behold, the Lord cometh.' It is the warning of a more terrible deluge than that of Noah,—a fiery deluge, in the day of 'the vengeance of our God.'

II. The fear.—The word does not mean dread or terror, but pious, reverential awe, at the prospect of divine judgment. God's words, 'The end of all flesh is come before me;' 'I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth,'—have sunk deep into his soul. He was not alarmed, but he was solemnized. He had heard God's verdict on the earth and on man; he knew how God hated sin; he saw the wickedness around; he knew that God would fulfil his word; he knew also that he and his family were safe, for God had said it; he thought of the calamity that was coming; and solemn awe took possession of him. Let us be of those who 'tremble at his word.' Let the prospect of the great day of the Lord,—of the world's destruction, and of our own salvation, in that day,—make us solemn men. Noah's 'fear' is the contrast of the world's want of fear. He feared, they feared not; they went on in their feasting and revelling without fear, till the flood came. Let us have reverence and godly fear,—fear that solemnizes; fear that separates from the unfearing world; fear that leads to forethought, and making ready for what is coming on the earth.

III. The ark.—This was God's means of salvation in the evil day. It was his way of preserving Noah, when He destroyed the rest. It was a thing of difficulty, cost, labour, ridicule. It was to some a stumblingblock, and to others foolishness; but to the saved ones it was the power of God. It was the first intimation of deliverance in the midst of danger,—as Enoch's translation was of removal from danger. It was a vessel of God's planning, and man's making, like the tabernacle; type of Him who was made of a woman. It was a vessel of earthly materials, as was the tabernacle, and as He was who was made flesh. There was nothing supernatural or miraculous about it; yet it was meant to protect against the supernatural and miraculous—viz. the deluge.

IV. The salvation.—Its object was salvation—salvation from the flood, to Noah and his house. It did not help to save, it saved. It was effectual. Noah built it for this end. He knew what he was doing, for he acted in obedience to God. He was persuaded that it would save, because God had said so. He believed in a coming destruction, and he believed in a coming salvation. Both of these might seem dreams to the millions round him, but to his faith they were realities. The ark might seem a piece of folly to the world, to him it was salvation. It was God's ark, not Noah's ark. It is salvation, not only to himself, but to his family for his sake. God saved them because he had found favour in his sight. He is the second specimen of God's representative dealings with man: Adam the first, then Noah, and then Abraham.

V. The condemnation.—It was the world that he condemned; the seed of the serpent; they who are elsewhere called 'men,' and 'sons of men;' whom Christ calls 'the world,' the children of the evil one. That world Noah condemned. He did so—

(1.) By his faith.—His faith was the condemnation of their unbelief; his walk of faith was the condemnation of their walk of unbelief. So is it that we by faith condemn the world. There is nothing so condemning to the world as the faith of believing men—that 'faith which is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.'

(2.) By his building the ark.—That ark meant both salvation and destruction. It was Noah's warning to the world, and it was God's warning. For many a year he persisted in his work of building it; and every plank laid, every nail driven in, every stroke of the hammer, was the condemnation of the world. We have no ark to build, but we have to enter one already built—Christ Jesus himself; and in doing so—in reckoning ourselves safe simply because of our connection with it,—we condemn the world.

(3.) By his preaching.—He was a preacher of righteousness. Like Paul, he 'reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come.' In him, and through him, Jesus himself went and preached unto those who were disobedient in the day of God's long-suffering. Noah condemned their unbelief, their violence, their licentiousness, their luxury, their worldliness. Let our words so condemn the world.

(4.) By his life.—He lived what he preached. He kept himself unspotted from the world. His life was a protest against the lives of all around. So let our lives be. Thus let us follow Noah, let us follow Christ; being 'holy, harmless, undefiled,' separate from the world; for 'the friendship of the world is enmity with God.'

VI. The righteousness.—He became heir, or served himself heir, to the righteousness which is by faith. Not that now he first became a justified man. He was so before. But now his faith came out conspicuously, and exhibited him as one of the great company to whom belongs the righteousness which is by faith. To him it might be said, 'Thy faith hath saved thee.' His life and actings proved him to be an heir of the righteousness. He acted out what he believed. He lived and spoke in faith. God testified of him that he had found favour in his sight—that he was a justified man.

Are we of this blessed company—the company of the justified? Do we believe, and, in believing, find favour with God? Do we stand by Noah's side as justified men, condemners of the world, witnesses for God in a godless world?

THE UNCLEAN SPIRIT.

BY THE EDITOR.

(Continued from p. 387.)

IT was to the wilderness that Christ went to be tempted of the devil,—as if that were the devil's special residence and seat. It is when Babylon is turned into a wilderness, that it is specially described as the haunt of unclean spirits. It is in the midst of desert-scenes of ruin and desolation that they are said to have their abode; and both in the Old Testament and New, we find the same gloomy association between the desert, or the ruined city, and the spirits of evil. And when there was not a desert at hand, we find the spirit taking the possessed to the tombs, as if there he found something liker hell—something more congenial than among the abodes of living men.

But the description of the unclean spirit's condition is not yet complete. He wanders through these dry places, seeking rest, but finding none. These are words of awful import, even when not applied to a sinner of earth, but to a fiend of hell. Seeking rest, but finding none! Oh, awful doom! Do we sometimes think of the doom of these lost spirits, as well as of the doom of lost men? Do we try to realize their misery? We have so associated them with sin, and malice, and evil, that we have ceased to remember that they are beings, with capacities like our own for joy or sorrow. They were made to be filled with joy; they are now filled with sorrow. They have not become familiar with that sorrow, so as to cease to feel it. They feel it with the same profound bitterness that we can do. They would fain shun it, if they could. They do not love the torment, or the fire, or the desert, or the abyss. They have not their desire for happiness, or their shrinking from anguish. They are still 'seeking rest.' Seeking rest, but finding none! How terrible the doom described in these simple but most sorrowful words,—seeking rest, but finding none! Seeking rest for ever! finding none for ever! Weary for ever! sad for ever! tormented for ever! O sinner, is this to be your portion too?

4. The unclean spirit's return to his house.—Though driven into the wilderness, it is not chained there; though cast out of the man, it is not debarred from return. It bethinks itself of its former abode, and feeling it better than the wilderness, it resolves to try if there might not be re-entrance for it. It calls the man 'my house!' Awful words to come from a devil's lips respecting a man—'my house!' As if it had a right to the man—a right to make him its dwelling! O man, art thou the devil's house? At first it seems like one merely walking round, to observe,—looking in at doors and windows, in order to discover in what state is the interior, and to see if there were not some chance of re-admission. If it be occupied with other guests, it has no chance; if not, it may. The discovery is made, that it remains as empty as when it left. No other guest has come in. Its chambers are unfilled. Nay, it is not merely empty, but carefully swept and adorned, as if inviting every passer-by to enter.

Here it is that the narrative brings us back to the individual man, and shows us his state,—the state that prepares him for a second and more terrible visit of the unclean spirit. That spirit has been cast out, and so far it is well. He is delivered from a certain amount of the hindrances that keep out God. Having got quit of his guest from hell, he is now free to invite a guest from heaven. But here he stops short, and this stopping short is fatal. He gets quit of the devil, but he does not get the Holy Spirit. The grosser evil is purged out, but nothing brought into its place. There is no longer the blasphemy, the drunkenness, the lasciviousness that prevailed before. His words are clean, his hands are clean, his steps are clean. The house is swept and adorned. He is reformed, but not converted. He is no longer openly irreligious, but he is not born from above. He has got the dust swept from his floor, and ornaments hung all round his walls. He is a man of refinement, of literature, of rational religion. There is a decided improvement upon the morality of his character, and many fair features are now displayed, which formerly were unknown. But God has not been invited in. Christ has not been made welcome. The Holy Spirit has been grieved away. The natural man has been wrought up into its best estate. The natural heart has been made as good, as kind, as religious as it is possible to be, without the new birth, and without the indwelling presence of Jehovah. He is now just in the very state most suitable for a return of the unclean spirit: for that spirit can dwell amid decencies, and moralities, and natural goodnesses, quite as well as amid profligacy, and lust, and blasphemy, and every evil thing. It can dwell anywhere, where God is not. Any heart will suit, provided God be not in it. It may be the heart of a Pharisee or a publican, it matters not. The wickedness of the latter is not more congenial than is the self-righteousness of the former.

Our peril in the present day, in these respects, is extreme. We call our century an enlightened age, and in some respects this is true. Satan, as an angel of light, is preaching up the refinements of morality and the adornings of science, for the purification of the inner man. He is preaching against vulgar lust, and repulsive profanity, and open crime. And, in so doing, he is engaging the feelings of the natural heart, and winning them to something else than God and Christ; to something that will be a substitute for regeneration; something that will make a man think himself religious and moral, while he has passed through no spiritual change,—having not yet received the Spirit, nor having died and risen with Christ. Beware of this danger! Let not your feet be entangled in this snare of the evil one. Beware of any change that is not conversion: of any reformation that leaves you without Christ; of any religion, however refined and beautiful, that is not the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and that does not transform you into the image of God's own holy Son. If you rest content with anything short of these, you are only hardening your hearts, searing and stupefying your consciences; rendering yourselves more and more insensible to the power of divine things, and bringing yourselves into a state which will not only exclude God, and repel his Holy Spirit, but will invite the return of Satan, and all Satan's legions of darkness, into your miserable souls, making you twofold more a child of hell than ever.

There is something inconceivably terrible in the idea of preparing yourselves for the devil's re-entrance into you. Yet this is just what millions in our day are doing; and the manifold refinements of the age are the undoubted preparations for such a re-entrance of the evil one. Not that the things may be sinful in themselves. Possibly they are not. The house is swept, and the old deformities cast out. Adornings of all kinds are introduced, against which no exception can be taken on the score of morality or decency. The whole thing is most carefully done, so as not to offend the most fastidious eye or ear. The amusements are harmless, the pleasures are innocent, the pursuits are intellectual, the mental occupations are on a scale of high refinement. But all this may be: and yet, if the house, thus "swept and garnished," is left "empty," all these improvements are just so many preparations for Satan's return, so many invitations to the unclean spirit to re-occupy its dwelling. The sweeping and the garnishing would have been all very well, if after that it had not been left empty: if the Great Guest from heaven had been invited in to occupy his own dwelling. But when, after being thus improved and cleansed, it is left unoccupied, it presents not merely an open door to every passer-by, but it actually hangs out a sign, calling on every unclean spirit in hell to enter.

Our great cities are held up to view as the vast dens of crime and lust. Pictures, not too darkly drawn, have been given us of their Sodom-like abominations. In these, most assuredly, the unclean spirit has his dwelling, and Satan reigns as the prince of darkness,—the angel, or rather the fiend, of death and ruin. In God's sight, however, there is a condition sadder, darker still. You will not find it in these haunts of profligacy, drunkenness, and all abominations. You will find it in civilised, refined, literary, perhaps even religious society. The publican was a specimen of the former, the Pharisee of the latter. The publican stood before the eye of Christ a sinner, a man with an unclean spirit—hateful enough, indeed. The Pharisee stood before Him as the man delivered from the unclean spirit,—his house swept and garnished, but empty! In Christ's days, the most hateful spectacle was among those who were reckoned to possess no ordinary amount of the most refined religion of the age. And will it not be found so still? Does not Christ's eye see something darker and sadder than even these city dens of wickedness can furnish? In our best circles,—where fashionable sin is recognised, where vulgar sin is cast out, where all is politeness and refinement, where science and literature adorn the men, where the Bible is acknowledged, where the name of Christ is honoured,—there is the house swept and garnished; there the eye of Christ discerns that which is viler and more hideous than the coarser abominations which have been so emphatically discarded.

O man, beware of the 'swept and garnished house!' Beware of that which would lead thee to be content with the mere dismissal of the old guest, without the reception of the new. Beware of the shows, and delusions, and devout sentimentalism of our day, by means of which many a soul is beguiled into the idea of being religious, when all is hollow and unreal. Beware of any amount of feeling, or refinement, or amendment that would leave you short of God—an indwelling God. Remember the danger of mistaking morality, or mental culture, or intellectual elevation or refinement in taste, for religion itself,—for the living worship of the living God.

Say not, the unclean spirit is gone out; my habits of grossness and offensive sin are all abandoned. That may be true, and yet your state be only more perilous to yourself, more hateful to God. Is it a matter of great congratulation that you are now going to hell in decent raiment, and not in rags and filth, as once you were? What can this avail you? Is it a cause of thankfulness that you have got quit of one devil, when you are decking and enlarging your house, to make room for a legion?

Beware, O man, of an empty house, an empty soul—a soul unfilled with God and Christ! Let God this day come in and fill you. Let Christ come in and sup with you. Let the Holy Spirit come in, and make you his temple. Then will there be no room for unclean spirits more, either one or many; no room for sin and lust; no room for vanity and lies. God will satisfy thee. Christ will be all, and in all.

I might enter at length into the last verse; showing the greater amount of evil and Satanic influence introduced; showing also the evil spirit's permanent indwelling in the man; showing also the more terrible condition of the man at the last. But, having taken these up generally, I shall not enter on details; simply proclaiming these awful words: 'The last state of that man is worse than the first!'

I take up the subject now in its collective and prophetical aspects.

I. Its collective aspects.—The individual is but a specimen of what takes place in a church and a nation.

(1.) A church.—It is, perhaps, reformed—evils purged away. But no Holy Spirit comes to dwell in it. It remains in this reformed but empty state for some time; then the evil spirit returns, and it becomes worse than before. Perhaps Christ's words to the seven churches produced temporary improvement. But that was all. Laodicea became worse than before. What a warning to the churches of our day!

(2.) A nation.—There are eras in a nation's history when it improves. Outward evils are swept away. Civilisation rises, morality increases, religion becomes fashionable. But there the regeneration stops. Soon the evil spirit returns, and the condition of the nation becomes tenfold worse. Let Britain beware!

II. Its prophetical aspects.

(1.) Israel.—Our Lord specially refers to them. Their last end is to be worse than their first. After every amelioration, they became worse. After the captivity they improved; but, in the time of our Lord, they were coming into their worst condition. A worse still: just before their conversion, they receive Antichrist!

(2.) The church at large.—The professing church, Protestant or Papal, is to have its last end its worst. Improving a little, and then worse than ever—ripening for judgment!

(3.) The world.—It has improved in some respects, and will improve outwardly. Then Satan returns, re-occupies it, and it becomes more thoroughly his than ever.

The development of Satanic power in the last days will be very terrible. Watch! Resist! He is about to make his last effort. 'Put on the whole armour of God.'

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XVII.—MRS. PETRIE.

THE following sketch of one whose life had been a constant warfare with poverty, may possibly teach us this lesson: that happiness neither depends on, nor can be measured by, the amount enjoyed of external comfort.

Mrs. Petrie, after many years' faithful discharge of the high duties of wife and mother, became a widow. Left thus alone, she felt it not only her duty to live on, but to make her existence as pleasant as possible. To this end her unwavering trust in Him,

'Who doth the ravens feed,
Yea, providently caters for the sparrow,' did in no small degree contribute; while it also stimulated and encouraged the employment of her few remaining faculties, to save herself from the heavy infliction of want.

The poorhouse, as in many such cases, was recommended. But there is, among the respectable poor, a feeling stronger than even the fear of want. In the solitariness of age, they cling to that place which, in earlier years, was a home of gladness; and the old things surrounding them there are dearer by far than the strange, though more comfortable, appliances of the poor-house; for around them cluster associations and recollections of the past, and, it may be, also aspirations of the future, which no other place could afford.

Those interested in Mrs. Petrie did not deal harshly with feelings which so truly belong to the higher parts of our nature. They did not tear the sapless trunk from the soil on which it once budded and blossomed. A small sum was allowed her weekly by the parish; and on this, with the help afforded by some ladies, whose discriminating charity served as a stimulus to industrious effort, she and her invalid daughter lived.

By one of those ladies I was asked to pay them a visit. On doing so, I was much pleased with the cleanliness of the apartment they occupied; and though poverty was everywhere apparent, yet an air of comfort pervaded the dwelling, not usual in such circumstances.

The old woman, in earlier years, must have had a somewhat prepossessing appearance. Of this there still remained evident traces. But her originally handsome features—handsome, at least, so far as correctness of outline merits that designation—were crimpled into innumerable wrinkles, and by their lack of expression gave no high idea of her spiritual or intellectual attainments. Seldom, indeed, had I seen a more meaningless countenance.

She said so little during my first and subsequent visits, that, had I not been told that she was a good woman, I would have felt quite at a loss how to get on with her. But, though assured by others of her piety, so far as my own observation went, I could not positively have said more than that she was the veriest babe in grace,—one of those half-awakened, mazy sort of minds that sees, as it were, without perceiving. As I found it vain to attempt conversing, I generally read suitable portions of Scripture, and, as I thought, instructed her from them. But it was all guess-work, for anything I could get her to say regarding these exercises.

This state of matters continued for months. One day, however, I had taken the second chapter of Hosea, and made some remarks on it. What I said soon passed from my mind. Not so quickly, however, did these remarks pass from that of Mrs. Petrie.

Next visit, I found she had been speaking to her daughter of them, and wishing that she could recollect more fully the passage read, and the remarks made upon it. All this was communicated by Betty, her daughter. The mother, as usual, did not speak. As they could only tell me a few broken sentences, I could not recollect what I had either read or said; so the matter was laid aside.

If I remember right, she was suffering more than usual that day; and, unconsciously, I chose the same chapter of Hosea which had formerly interested her, as I thought it afforded a very consolatory as well as instructive glimpse into the reasons why afflictions were so often permitted to fall very heavily.

I had reached the verse, 'I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness,' etc., when Betty interrupted me by saying:

'That's jist it; that's the very thing my mither was speakin' aboot,' etc. This, with another little incident, considerably altered my opinion of them.

It was Christmas day; and, as I purposed paying them a visit, I took a small quantity of tea in my pocket. On giving it, I noticed a very expressive look pass between Betty and her mother. I was curious to know the cause of it; and from the daughter, who was pretty talkative, I had the following account.

Mrs. Petrie was very fond of tea, and also so very forgetful, that sometimes, ere she had it half an hour or so, she would ask for it again, and of course, from their very straitened circumstances, had to be denied. So, the night before I had taken them the tea, there was the usual call:

'Betty!'

'Weel, mither, what is it?'

'I'm maist feart to tell ye, Betty,' she said, laughing.

'Oh, but I ken; it's the drap tea.'

'Oh ay, ye aye ken; ye are a guid Betty no to be angry at me!'

'Na, mither,' said Betty, 'I'm no angry at ye. I aye gie ye it when I ha't. So I was jist pittin' in a wee pickle, when she said:

'"Hoots, woman, dinna be feart; pit it in, an' ye'll see that we'll sune get mair."'

This simple relation not only accounted for the looks which puzzled me, but served as a sort of key, by which her mind was opened up to me in a measure, yet not so much as to alter my opinion that her spiritual, but especially intellectual, status was very low,—exactly the opposite of what her imposing profile led one to expect.

Some time after this, my health prevented me visiting as formerly; and, after recovering, I had so little idea of being useful to her, that I was in no hurry to resume my visits. But by this negligence I was taught a very useful lesson. I had too readily judged after the outward appearance; and now, through that dear old saint, the Lord made it strikingly manifest that He looked to the heart.

One Sabbath evening, a young woman called to say that an old woman in her district was very poorly—dying, she thought—and that she would be very glad if I would call and see her.

On inquiry, I found it to be my old friend Mrs. Petrie, so I called early next day. A change had evidently come over her. What it was I could not exactly define. There were traces of suffering; but it was not that. A sort of film covered her eyes, giving them a very peculiar appearance. Neither did that account for it.

Had not her eyes been open, from the perfect repose of her features, I would have thought her asleep; and though she did not sleep, her daughter and I involuntarily lowered our voices, that we might not disturb her.

She noticed my entrance, however, and asked Betty who had come in. When told, in a manner and spirit beautiful beyond description, she expressed her pleasure at again seeing me; while the face, that I had thought so vacant and unexpressive, was lit up, as the poet has well said, with 'The dazzling earnest of unuttered joy.'

'How glad I am to hear that you are so happy!' Betty had just told me she was.

'Oh ay,' she said, laughing; 'I'm happy, HAPPY. No creature could be happier,' etc.

'You have had that promise made good to you: "At evening time it shall be light."'

'Oh yes!' she replied; 'for it's a' licht,—licht, and such licht—such licht!' and a low gurgling sound of joy came welling up from the very depths of her spirit.

I was amazed at the vast experiences of her spiritual nature. Her spirit seemed responsive to the slightest touch, and did melt and flow out, in a very remarkable manner, when the least reference was made to the great facts of redeeming love.

I regret that I cannot narrate circumstantially the conversation that ensued on this and several other occasions; only a few incidents and expressions, which at the time made the deepest impression on my own mind, and noted down shortly after.

At one time I remember saying: 'David, on one occasion, said, "Come, all ye that fear God, and I will tell you what He hath done for my soul." I suppose, if you had strength, you would do that too?' She looked up in a way that seemed to say, 'I see that you understand my feelings;' and then said, with a voice and manner which I cannot adequately describe:

'I would do that; I would tell what He hath done for me. Oh, this is wonderfu', wonderfu'! Ay, and it's but the beginnin', jist the beginnin' of eternal joy—of the weight o' glory!' Then shutting her eyes, she continued to pour out the exuberance of her joy, but in a voice so weak and low, that though I strained my ear to the utmost, I could only catch an occasional word, such as, 'Precious—wonderful—love—Saviour—glory—mine,' etc.

At another time I said, 'You have the glory now in prospect, and you will very soon enter upon its realities. You will be far from a world of grief and sin, with God eternally shut in.'

'That's it—that's it! Far from a world of grief and sin.'

'But that's not all,' I continued; 'you will be with God eternally shut in.'

'Oh! oh!! oh!!!' she repeated, as if oppressed with the wonderful idea.

After some further talk, I proposed reading the account given in Revelation of the glories of heaven. Often before have I been privileged to read that wondrous description of coming glory to dying people about to enter upon it, and have witnessed their triumphant joy; but never before did it seem so precious, or so instinct with power and significance, as while this poor frail creature lay listening to them, and occasionally intoning a word or phrase, producing an effect like the most exquisite music.

So I read: 'And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God.'

'And be their God,' she repeated, with a freshness and power indescribable.

'And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away.'

'Have passed away.'

'You have begun to realize the truth of this verse; God has already wiped the tears from your eyes. You could not cry now, could you?'

'No!' she replied with a smile, which seemed to flash back upon us some of the gladness with which her heart was filled; 'I am too full of joy for that; I couldna cry noo; I've naething to cry for!'

Again I read: 'And He that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And He said unto me, Write: for these words are true and faithful.'

'True and faithful.'

'And He said unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end: I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely.'

'Freely, FREELY!' she breathed.

'He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son.'

'Shall be my son,' was the sweet response.

'And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb.'

'The name of the Lamb!'

'The foundations of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones.'

'Precious—PRECIOUS!' she repeated.

'And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it.'

'Ay, they are the temple of that city.'

'And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.'

'No, no,' she repeated, 'no need of the sun, for the Lamb is the light thereof.'

'And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day; for there shall be no night there.'

'No, no,' she again repeated, 'no night, no night!' and, taking the initiative, went on with the next two verses; and having come to the words, 'But they which are written in the Lamb's book of life,' added, in a manner altogether indescribable, 'And my name is written there!'

As I went on reading the next chapter, she kept intoning the words occasionally, as before; and the low, sweet laugh that often accompanied, seemed only the natural overflow of a heart drinking its fill of the living water of the fountain of life.

After reading the fourth verse, 'They shall see his face, and his name shall be on their foreheads,' etc., I said, 'This verse is already made good to you. His name is even now written on your forehead so legibly, that we cannot help reading it.'

'Yes,' she replied, 'I'm sealed;' and then began to repeat the fifth verse: 'And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light: and they shall reign for ever and ever,—for ever and ever,' she repeated.

When I read the sixth verse: 'And He said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true: and the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to show unto his servants the things which must shortly be done.'

'They are faithful and true, and will shortly be done,' she added; while there was a power in her words of calm, deep joy, that penetrated the depths of one's very being, and, in a most incomprehensible manner, made us partakers of her bliss.

Soon after this she fell into a sort of doze, and I took the opportunity to inquire of her daughter when this change took place in her experience.

'It was three days ago. Phemie —— and me was sittin' at the fireside, speakin' quietly, no to disturb her. It was just about gloaming, for the licht wasna lichted; an' as we were speakin' awa', she cried out—

'"Oh, what a beautiful day! Oh, how beautiful! Oh, what a licht!" She cried again, "Sic a licht!"

'Whatna licht is't ye'r seein', mither?' I said, a kin' o' feart; 'there's naething here but the fire burnin'; the can'le's no lichted yet.'

'"It's God, Betty; I'm just surrounded wi' Him. He's before me, and behind me, and at every side," etc. That was the beginning,' added Betty, 'and it's been just the same ever since. I'm so glad that you've come to see it!'

In the evening I called again with some wine, as I found that was needed. She was very thankful, but quite in distress that I should be at the expense. I begged her not to think of that, and assured her that I not only felt it a pleasure, but considered it a privilege to supply her with it. I reminded her also that it would only be a little while that she would need it, as she would very soon be drinking the new wine in her Father's kingdom,—which remark, like every allusion to future blessedness, always produced that low ecstatic laugh which affected one so strangely.

As the candle was glaring in her face, I asked if the light did not disturb her.

'No, not the licht,' she replied, 'but the expense does.' Their circumstances were very straitened; and as all extras had to be supplied by others, that caused the uneasiness.

'Oh,' I said, 'surely you are forgetting Him who says, "The silver and the gold is mine." Do you not think He is able to give you a candle or two, for all the time that you'll need them?'

'That's to me noo; that's a richt bit. That is comfort to me,' she said, laughing. 'Hoo could I be so stupid as no to think o' that?'

Soon after, she fell into a dozing sort of sleep. On awaking up, a few minutes after, her mind reverted to things which had taken place in her earlier years; and, in the most easy and natural way possible, began to tell me how she used to find out the place for her father, when he was to read at worship; and also what a good father he was,—how he commanded his family, and made them do what was right, so far as he could; and how unwilling she was sometimes to be controlled by him. Now her mind dwelt on these things with the greatest pleasure.

Some time afterwards, when making some remarks on the wondrous manifestation of love and goodness which the Lord was making to her, she said:

'Ay; but there was a time when it was not like this. I was in darkness. I read my book, but I understood very little; but I did the best I could, according to the light I had, an' noo it's a' licht.'

Her appearance and manner forcibly reminded me of the words, 'Perfect love casteth out fear;' so I asked, 'Have you any fear of God now?'

'Fear!' she replied, with such a look of amazement; 'hoo could I be feart at Him? He's my Faither. I couldna be feart. I've nothing to be feart for fra Him.'

Speaking, at another time, of her love for music, I reminded her that she would soon have better music than anything she had heard on earth, and not only listen, but take part in it.

'Ay,' she said, 'an' there's some of the songs that we ken already.'

'Yes,' said Betty, 'they sing, "Worthy is the Lamb."'

'That's ane o' them,' she said, looking very much pleased; 'but there's a lot o' them, an' they're a' new.'

'There is something in that one worth noticing,' I said; 'for there is a measure in it that none but the redeemed can sing. Angels can only sing, "Worthy is the Lamb that died;" but the redeemed can add, "For He was slain for us."'

'It's wonderfu', perfectly wonderfu'! It's a wonderfu' salvation! I'm sure there was little enough in us to deserve such love; an' I'm sure there was little enough in a cratur' like me: there was naething in me to cause such love!'

Next day I called, she looked so weak and low, I had no idea she could speak. Her daughter assured me she would; so I sat down beside her —Betty meantime telling her who it was.

'You are still happy?' I inquired.

Turning upon me her eyes, over which the mists of death had gathered heavily, she said, in her own inimitable, simple, and beautiful way:

'Wonderfu' happy; nae creatur' could be happier. It's jist extrordnar'!'

'I wish we could share your joy. You would be willing, I suppose?'

'I would be that, I'm sure. It's perfectly wonderfu' that the Lord should make a creatur' like me feel like this!'

Something she said led me to remark that her troubles were all over,—'Nearly over,' she said, as if correcting me; adding, 'they were a' needed, and they hae a' been mixed wi' mercy.'

'And not the least of the mercy is, that they have produced the desired result, and that through them you are now educated and prepared for heaven. You remember how you corrected Betty, and trained her so carefully. You wished her to grow up a good woman, for her own sake as much as yours. So it has been with you; you had much to be corrected, and God loved you too well to leave it undone. So, by all these trials and difficulties, He has just been preparing you for the pure and holy society of heaven.'

'Oh, that is a fine bit!' she said, laughing; 'and it's a' to me, for He has made me a' glorious within.'

'And in a little while He will make you all glorious without, too; for that poor wasted body of yours will be made like his glorious body.'

'Ay,' she replied, 'for it's a complete salvation. It's wonderfu'—it's perfectly extrordnar! To think that God would dee the like o' that to sic a creatur' as me: it's past comprehension!'

Another day, on asking how she was, she said: 'Everything's ready, and I'm jist waitin'—waitin' till He say, "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away."' 'I'll no be lang or I get haud o' the palm,' she said at another time.

'What palm?' I inquired.

'The palm o' victory; but I'm no wearying for't, for I'm jist as happy as it's possible to be. No creatur' could be happier.'

One day a missionary, whose visits she prized much, called upon her. While speaking to him, she said, among other things, that she would have a fine dream to-night. It was common for her to have very delightful dreams.

'Will you?' he replied; and, knowing her love for music, he took out his hymn-book, and sang the following hymn:

'One night, as I lay sleeping upon my humble bed,
A dream, or holy vision, disturbed my thoughtful head.
I thought my days were ended, my mortal struggles o'er,
And that I had ascended to Canaan's peaceful shore.
Hosanna, hosanna, hosanna!
I heard the ransomed sing;
Hosanna, hosanna for ever,
To our immortal King!

Just as my house was rending, my mortal house of clay,
Bright angels were attending to bear my soul away.
They cried, "Away to glory!" I answered, "Lo! I come;"
And then the next blest moment I found myself at home.

I heard ten thousand singing, "Thrice welcome to this place;
Behold an heir of glory, a sinner saved by grace.
Come, take thy harp, and join us in our immortal lays;
Sing loud, and long, and lasting, Jehovah's endless praise!"

I saw my great Redeemer, who suffered on the tree:
'Come in," He said, "thou blessed, inherit life through me;
Thy warfare is accomplished, thy work on earth is done;
Be seated, friend, be seated, on my eternal throne!"

The streets of Zion's city are all of purest gold;
Its beauty and its grandeur by man can ne'er be told.
There flows the crystal river, there comes no sin or strife;
The people feast for ever upon the tree of life.'

She was quite in an ecstasy while Mr. G—— sang this hymn. To use Betty's words, 'She jist seemed oot o' hersel' for joy.'

The early part of that night she was very ill. At length she fell asleep. Betty sat watching. 'After she had slept awhile,' said she, 'her face grew sae bonny, it wasna like my mither ava; it was sae young-like—just like a wee bairnie lying smiling. "My een's surely mirly," I said, and put up my hand to rub them; but it was just the same when I looked again. After a while, she looked up. "You've had a fine sleep, mither," I said. "Ay, I've had a fine sleep, an' I'm happy, happy. I've been wi' Jesus. Oh Betty, it was a beautifu' place that I was in! I canna tell ye what like it was, but it was PRETTY!"'

Some time before her death, she wished her daughter to lie down beside her. Betty assured her that she was not weary. She insisted, however. Then she put her arms round her neck, and said:

'Ye're no tired o' me, are ye?'

'Na, mither, I'm no tired o' ye. I dinna ken what I'll dee when ye'r ta'en awa'.'

'Ye needna be feart; the Lord will tak' care o' ye. He's showed me that; and it'll no be very lang till ye come too, and then we'll be a' thegether with the Lord.'

She suffered much before her death.

'That's sair wark, mither,' said Betty.

'Ay is't; but it'll sune be ower, an' I'll be where there's nae suffering nor pain. Na, there's nae sair banes there, nae dying pains there; for the former things are passed away.'

'Ye're going through the dark valley noo, mither,' said Betty, some hours later.

'Well,' she replied, 'it was some dark to begin wi'; but it couldna be lang that, an' Jesus here.'

'Ye're no feart, are ye, mither, noo, when death's jist striking ye?'

'No! what would I be feart for? There's naething can hurt me, when God is here, close at my side!'

'He never forsaket ony o' his people,' said the anxious daughter.

'Na, He's never dune that, an' He'll no begin wi' me. I'm sure o' that. He'll no forsake me.'

'Are ye happy, mither?' was the last question.

'I'm dooble happy; nae creatur' could be happier!'

Thus ended a life, so quiet and unobtrusive, that few suspected the deep and powerful springs that fed its noiseless current. But just as the tiniest leaf, feeding silently on the great air-field surrounding it, reaches at length a full development of its parts; so the spirit of Mrs. Petrie, planted in a rich inner field of spiritual enjoyment, and drinking in quietly deep draughts of life, attained at length such fulness of maturity, that faith seemed wholly lost in sight.

And though, to me and others, who only saw her occasionally, her knowledge and experience seemed of very little compass, yet to those of her own social standing, the testimony of her life was no doubtful one. The wish of the poet was turned to reality:

> 'A faithful witness of thy grace,
> Well may I fill my appointed place.'

And at length 'an abundant entrance was ministered unto her, into the everlasting kingdom of her Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.'

EARLY PROTESTANTISM.

II.—RIENZI.

(Continued from p. 359.)

AT this critical period of his career, Rienzi deeply offended the Pope, by appearing before the legate with the demeanour of one who came to dictate terms rather than listen to them. He treated the representative of the Pontiff with studied contempt, and ere long the papal thunder-bolts were hurled against him. These, however, the Romans had learned to disregard; and Rienzi might have defied even the wrath of the Pope, if his courage had been equal to his pretensions, or such as it had been a few months before. But the people were discontented, and saw that his energy, instead of being braced by dangers and difficulties, rapidly gave way before them. He offered to resign the office of Tribune, but was evidently anxious that this should not be accepted; and, finally, when two of the nobles marched boldly into the city, at the head of an armed force, and occupied the palace of the Colonna, he did not make a single effort to expel them. At length, feeling that his power was gone, Rienzi summoned an assembly of the citizens, laid down his authority, and, after an abortive attempt to regain it, fled precipitately from Rome. His fall was as sudden and, by the nobles, as unexpected as his rise had been. The triumph of his enemies was so easy and so noiseless indeed, that some time elapsed before they ventured to take advantage of it.

Meanwhile Rienzi found refuge with the Franciscan Spiritualists, who, waiting for the manifestation of the Holy Ghost, and the golden year prophesied by the predecessors of Fra Dolcino, lived austere lives amid the wild recesses of the Apennines. Here he assumed the habit of a lay brother, and vied with the most zealous of the stern community in self-mortification. His imaginative and strongly superstitious nature obtained abundant nourishment in the society of the visionaries whose rude homes he shared. There seems reason to suppose that, in his earlier years, he had embraced some of the doctrines of the Spiritualists, for throughout his public life he professed to be guided by the special influence of the Holy Spirit. Whether he really believed in that supernatural revolution which had been prophesied by the Abbot Joachim, and looked for by the followers of Fra Dolcino, or merely made opinions, which had obtained a certain hold upon the popular mind, subserve his own purposes, cannot be correctly ascertained. But he selected the festival of the Holy Ghost as the day most auspicious for his effort to liberate Rome. In his public documents he ascribed the changes which had been wrought through his instrumentality to the influence of the Divine Spirit; and at one of his great festivals, while at the summit of power, he assumed seven crowns, symbolical of the gifts of the Holy Ghost. A strong religious enthusiasm, indeed, pervaded the whole of his public career, and often expressed itself in a way strangely inconsistent with his personal vanity. Amid the savage solitudes of the Apennines, and the austerities of a life which he declared to be an anticipation of immortality, their superstition took still wilder forms. The vague belief in a special supernatural assistance led to the delusion of special revelations made to him as the chosen agent of miraculous changes, by which the Papacy was to be reformed, Italy united, and Rome's supremacy restored.

The true explanation of the growth of these superstitions in a mind which, though never very powerful, had applied itself with energy and steadiness to practical affairs, is, perhaps, to be looked for in the sudden changes of fortune which Rienzi had experienced, and the effect of association, for more than two years, with men whose sole bond of fellowship was a community of visionary notions. The subsequent career of the ex-Tribune seems, indeed, to leave very little room to doubt that his intellect had been to some degree impaired.

Hopeless though he might have been of a return to power, Rienzi still had friends in Rome, and with these he appears to have maintained a correspondence. He even ventured to visit the scenes of his greatness; but the Romans, carried away by the religious fervour of the year of jubilee, appalled by the terrible plague (the ravages of which both Petrarch and Boccaccio have described), or absorbed by new revolutions, allowed their former Tribune to come and go unnoticed among the crowds of pilgrims who visited the shrine of St. Peter.

It was on his return from the second of his two secret journeys to Rome that Rienzi, by his own account, was visited by an holy hermit, Father Angelo, sent as the messenger of Heaven's will to him, as the instrument of that reformation for which the devout and solitary Spiritualists had long looked and prayed. By this somewhat mysterious personage, the fallen Tribune was commissioned to repair to Prague, and, in presence of the Emperor Charles IV., to rehearse the prophecies of a civil and spiritual revolution which were about to be fulfilled. Nor was he slow to undertake the mission, of which he has himself left us a full account. He had little difficulty in obtaining access to Charles, before whom he had no scruple in avowing his entire belief in those Spiritualist doctrines against which the church had launched its thunders, and the Inquisition employed all its deadly engines. The emperor appears, indeed, to have been previously aware of his adherence to these doctrines; for no sooner had Rienzi announced himself as a herald commissioned to proclaim the approaching reign of the Holy Ghost, than he was recognised as the ex-Tribune of Rome.

The mission to Charles was, however, a political more than a religious one. Its main object was to induce the emperor to bestir himself in the affairs of Italy, and to employ Rienzi, the supernaturally appointed ruler of Rome, as his chief agent. Whether the story of the hermit's prophecies, and that of his own imperial parentage (now for the first time openly announced), were the inventions of a schemer, the delusions of a fanatic, or had in them a groundwork of truth, are points we cannot undertake to determine. Suffice it that the emperor was not moved either by appeals to his religious zeal or his personal ambition. Rienzi's addresses to him display a curious combination of sound worldly policy and visionary projects, vanity and humility, wisdom and delusion. But Charles was no enthusiast; and Rienzi next endeavoured to gain over his two most influential counsellors. One of these was, however, a churchman (the Archbishop of Prague), and the heterodoxy of the new apostle was startling. Meanwhile it became known at Avignon that the ex-Tribune and heresiarch had taken up his abode at Prague, and Pope Clement vehemently demanded his surrender. The emperor, not indisposed to get rid of one with whose projects he had no sympathy, yet whom he regarded as to some extent dangerous, forthwith gave him up to the tender mercies of the Pontiff; and Rienzi, who had first visited the seat of the papal court as the eloquent representative of the Roman people, returned to it a prisoner, bound in chains, and guarded by soldiers.

The forlorn patriot had nothing to hope for, but everything to fear, from the dissolute churchmen who surrounded the chair of Clement. He had committed the unpardonable offence of endeavouring to restore that chair to Rome; he was a heretic, a rebel, and a banished man. Even his friend and correspondent, Petrarch, who had rejoiced in his successes, and applied his genius to their celebration, had forsaken him. The poet had hailed Rienzi as the deliverer of Italy with an enthusiasm which was purely poetic, and looked for stern virtues, which he did not himself possess. He would have had the Tribune to have fallen as the Gracchi fell; and the flight from Rome was, in the poet's eyes, so poor and unromantic a denouement of a brilliant drama, that it was, in his estimation, perhaps, a greater offence than the vanity or the weakness which had rendered it necessary.

An ecclesiastical commission was appointed to try the rebel and heretic, who meanwhile had been consigned to a narrow dungeon, and denied all aid in preparing his defence. But Rienzi's strange career was not yet near its close. Several circumstances combined to give a favourable turn to his fortunes. His chief enemy, the Pope, stricken by a mortal illness, allowed the trial to be often interrupted; and the cardinal judges, engrossed with the prospect of a new election to the papal chair, were indifferent to the guilt or innocence of a man whom they thought they could now render harmless. The rigours of Rienzi's imprisonment were relaxed. He was allowed to pursue his favourite studies, and to seek in the Bible and the ancient history of Rome a solace which, he assures us, he had often derived from them amid the cares of power and the lowliness of exile. A rumour spread abroad (wholly without foundation, as Petrarch is careful to tell us), that the prisoner was a poet; and in an age which had seen a laureate crowned in the capitol, this character was a passport to public favour. A new revolution in Rome, and the excesses to which it led, had directed the notice of the new Pope, Innocent VI., to the states of the church, where the turbulent barons, and the leaders of bold bands of mercenaries, had nearly destroyed the papal authority. The celebrated Fra Moreale, with his army of free lances, held a great part of Romagna; while John de Vico, whom Rienzi had formerly subdued, had made himself master of Rome, and assumed the title of Prefect,—sharing his authority with two senators chosen by the other nobles. The Romans, chafing under the tyranny by which they had so often suffered, once and again expelled their rulers, and raised a popular leader to the rank of Tribune; but his tenure of power was altogether uncertain, and everything was in confusion, when Pope Innocent charged his legate, the bold Cardinal Albornoz, with the duty of restoring the papal influence in the dominions of the Holy See.

The knowledge which Rienzi possessed of the various factions striving for the mastery of Rome, and the communication which he was enabled to maintain with his friends in the city, gave him considerable influence with the Pope, who had not only caused him to be released from prison, but bestowed upon him some marks of favour. The eloquence which had charmed Clement on the occasion of Rienzi's first visit to Avignon, was not without its effect upon his successor, who now began to entertain the idea of making use of the ex-Tribune to gain over the Roman people. Their recent experiences had led the Romans to look back with regret to the brief but brilliant period of Rienzi's rule. They thought only of his success in subduing the tyrannous nobles, and began to long for his return. His wife and family were still in Rome; and it would appear, from one of his letters, that the former, after having fallen a victim to the licentiousness of a churchman, had entered a religious house. His son had already manifested something of the father's disposition; and Rienzi, writing during his hopeless durance, had strictly charged his friend to withdraw the youth from the perils of the world, and devote him to a religious life.

The party favourable to the exile's return were gaining strength, when the Pope resolved to send him to Rome, under the auspices of the cardinal legate, Albornoz. Rienzi seems to have entered readily into the projects of Murant,—doubtless in the belief that they would contribute to his ultimate restoration to power. The legate was, however, a stern and wary tactician, destitute of sympathy for the ambitious views of his companion; and, in all probability, Rienzi would have found that he had been liberated merely to linger inactive in the camp of the papal army, had not his patriotic enthusiasm, which his visionary dreams and his sad experiences had never weakened, communicated itself to several of the legate's immediate attendants—chiefly to two youths, brothers of Fra Moreale. Upon these young men, Albornoz had depended for the neutrality of the formidable leader of the Free Companions. By their influence Fra Moreale might be made an enemy; and there is some reason to believe that Rienzi had already endeavoured to negotiate with him through them. This would account for the boldness with which he demanded to be invested by Albornoz with the dignity of senator of Rome. He had borrowed largely from his two young friends, and by this means had been enabled to increase the number of his partisans in the city. The legate saw that, if resisted, Rienzi might be dangerous; and that, as the nominee of the church, he might be useful. There was no time to lose, for the barons were already combining to oppose the restoration of the papal authority in the districts over which they held sway; and Rienzi, with a military retinue, was sent to Rome as senator nominated by the Pope. Enthusiastically received by the people, he was speedily reinstated in the honours and power which he had formerly enjoyed. For a time he governed the city wisely and well, and it seemed that adversity had subdued his vanity. Though restored to power by the authority of the Pope, rather than the will of the people, he appeared to be actuated only by patriotic motives. The laws enacted during his tribunate were revived, again the haughty barons were compelled to submit to them, and peace was temporarily restored. His military operations against those who still resisted his authority were not, it is true, very successful, but he maintained his authority. The mind of Rienzi had, however, lost its original vigour. The fervour of his younger years had in some degree abated, but he had not learned wisdom. His sufferings, moreover, and his residence among the dissolute society of Avignon, had induced habits of self-indulgence inconsistent with his principles of strict and severe republicanism. He soon relapsed into his former luxuries and vanities. A contemporary, but anonymous biographer, says: 'Formerly he was sober, temperate, abstemious; he had now become a drunkard.' His once handsome form had become corpulent and unwieldy; and his eloquence, once so captivating, had given way to wild extravagance of thought and speech. The fatal intoxication of power had again overcome his better nature. The superstition which seemed formerly to have, as it were, brought him into contact with the spiritual world, now displayed itself in weak and groundless fears, which necessitated the constant attendance of an armed guard. His acts were dictated by caprice rather than by reason, and the people began to regard them as the mere exercise of tyrannical power. The most unpopular and unjustifiable of these was the execution of Fra Moreale, the brother of the two young men to whom he had been so largely indebted. By the laws of Rienzi's tribunate, all robbers and chiefs of free companies had been summoned, under pain of death, either to take the oath of fidelity to the republic or depart from its territory. The bold Moreale had scorned the summons, and had subsequently negotiated with Rienzi himself, whom, after his restoration, he had regarded as a friend. He had even ventured to visit Rome, for the purpose, it was thought, of offering his aid to the senator, and with the hope, perhaps, of sharing in his honours. He was arrested and put to death, in the absence of his two brothers, and the Roman populace looked on with abhorrence. Rienzi's position was now more difficult than it had ever been, and he had neither the courage nor the wisdom to maintain it. Another attempt to impose new taxes led to a popular rising. Rienzi seemed for a moment to gain strength. He threw himself into the capitol, and from one of its windows endeavoured once again to exercise the wonderful power of his eloquence. The people would not listen to him. Driven back by a shower of stones, he sought to escape in disguise, but was arrested, and dragged to the staircase, where he again essayed to make himself heard. But his hour had come. Utterly defenceless, he was thrown down, and, stabbed with many wounds, he died at the foot of the basaltic lion, which had looked grimly down on the last agonies of many other victims of the people's fury.

Such was the end of Cola di Rienzi, a man who seemed raised up to be the restorer of Rome's ancient freedom, and the champion of Italian unity. His character has been variously estimated. A brilliant English writer has thrown the light of his genius around it, and represented the last of the Tribunes as one of the greatest martyrs of Italy's independence. A great English poet has given the name of the enthusiastic but misguided republican a place with those of the sternly brave and virtuous of ancient Rome. But History, a more impartial judge, discerns in him many fatal defects. A pure and lofty idealist in his younger days, he lacked vigour of mind to give permanancy to his conceptions. Wanting the rough qualities which would have extended and might have consolidated his power, the lustre of the finer ones he displayed was obscured by vices which are supposed, not without reason, only to belong to weakness.

THINGS THAT LAST.

Let us now look at some of those things that 'will never wear out.'

I have often heard a poor blind girl sweetly sing, 'Kind words will never die.' Ah! we believe that these are among the things that 'will never wear out.' And we are told in God's own book to be 'kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another.'

The word of the Lord will never wear out. Though the grass shall wither, and the flowers fall away, the word of the Lord endureth for ever (1 Peter i. 24, 25).

The life of the righteous will never wear out. They will live in the world to come as long as God shall live; but the death of the wicked will last for ever.

The joys of the kingdom of heaven will never wear out. The pleasures of this world soon die; but the enjoyments of that world will never have an end.

The crown of glory will never wear out. The crown of the winner in the Olympic games soon faded; the crowns of kings will all wear out; but the crown of glory will never fade away (1 Peter v. 4).

The 'new song' will never wear out. We hear sometimes that some of our tunes are worn threadbare; but that will never be said of the new song.

Which will you choose? The lasting, or that which wastes away? the things of time or eternity? Will you choose wealth, honour, fame; or the joys of heaven, eternal life, the crown of glory, and the 'new song?' May God enable us to make a wise choice; and, with Joshua, may we choose to serve the Lord.

THE OLD PSALM TUNE.

You asked, dear friend, the other day,
Why still my charmed ear
Rejoiceth in uncultured tone,
That old psalm tune to hear?

I've heard full oft, in foreign lands,
The grand orchestral strain,
Where music's ancient masters live,
Revealed on earth again;

Where breathing, solemn instruments,
In swaying clouds of sound,
Bore up the yearning, trancèd soul,
Like silver wings around.

I've heard, in old St. Peter's dome,
When clouds of incense rise,
Most ravishing the choral swell
Mount upward to the skies.

And well I feel the magic power,
When skilled and cultured art
Its cunning webs of sweetness weaves
Around the captured heart.

But yet, dear friend, though rudely sung,
That old psalm tune hath still
A pulse of power beyond them all,
My inmost soul to thrill.

Those halting tones that sound to you,
Are not the tones I hear;
But voices of the loved and lost
Then meet my longing ear.

I hear my angel mother's voice—
Those were the words she sung;
I hear my brother's ringing tones,
As once on earth they rung;

And friends that walk in white above,
Come round me like a cloud;
And far above those earthly notes
Their singing sounds aloud.

There may be discord, as you say;
Those voices poorly ring;
But there's no discord in the strain
Those upper spirits sing.

For they who sing are of the blest—
The calm and glorified—
Whose hours are one eternal rest,
On heaven's sweet floating tide.

Their life is music and accord;
Their souls and hearts keep time
In one sweet concert with the Lord—
One concert vast, sublime.

And through the hymns they sang on earth,
Sometimes a sweetness falls
On those they loved and left below,
And softly homeward calls.

Bells from our own dear fatherland,
Borne trembling o'er the sea—
The narrow sea that they have crossed,
The shores where we shall be.

Oh! sing, sing on, beloved souls;
Sing cares and griefs to rest;
Sing, till entrancèd we arise
To join you 'mid the blest!

—Mrs. Stowe.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

2 Cor. iv. 10, 11.

The old warrior, who has passed through many fights, carries about with him his scars, as memorials of his battles—evidences both of danger and deliverance. So Paul said, 'I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.' He was 'in deaths oft;' 'always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake.' 'I die daily.' The old warrior will narrate to you the history of every wound. He will say, 'This was Waterloo, this was Sebastopol, this was Lucknow.' So Paul, pointing to his scars, could say, 'This was Antioch, this was Iconium, this was Lystra, this was Philippi, this was Damascus, this was Jerusalem.'

It is of this constant exposure to death that he is speaking in our text. Every part of his body bore marks of death. The rods, the stones, the chains, the stocks—these were imprinted on his body, as seals both of death and life. We can imagine, too, his lean, pale, weather-beaten face and form,—all telling of his encounters with hardship, danger, death, in an hundred forms. Did all these speak merely of his endurance and bravery, and patience and martyr-spirit? No; they told of the life which was sustaining him; a life beyond his own; a life superhuman, superangelic, nay, divine—the life of Christ; a life which sustains and invigorates, not the body only, but the soul as well. It is this life which keeps alive the spark, which a whole ocean, with all its storms, is seeking to quench. No life but that of Christ,—the mighty life of the God-man, all-sustaining, irresistible, irrepressible, unquenchable,—could accomplish this. It is only such a life that can do battle victoriously with such death as is in us and around us.

The life here spoken of is not the substitutional or sacrificial, at least not in the substitutional or sacrificial aspects. It is life as a root, or fountain, or vital power. It is not a life given for us, but a life given to us. It is the life of the risen Christ; resurrection-life; his risen life deposited, as in a vessel, for us, and showing out all its fulness in the counteraction of the death which is in us and around us. It is in reference to this life that the apostle reasons: 'If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his LIFE;' that is, If a dying Christ did so much for us, what will not a living Christ do? Let us look, then, at this vessel and its contents. Truly it has been said, 'Christ is life, others only live.' Mark this 'life of Christ.'

I. It is large.—The vessel is capacious, and its contents are commensurate with its capacity. The amount of life contained in it is infinite; and no amount of death or weakness can prove too great for it to counteract and overcome. O vastness, O infinity of life, what is there that thou canst not do for us! What is the extent of death in a human soul or body, when compared with this life divine! Good news indeed!

II. It is constant.—This life is not fitful. It does not come in tides, ebbing and flowing; nor in seasons, sometimes winter, and again summer; nor in alternations, as day and night. It is continuous, unbroken, ever flowing. It is the river which ...ses not. It is the deep, deep well, which never runs dry. It is the fresh, clear atmosphere, which always surrounds us, and which we breathe every moment. It is like himself, the unchanging One; 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' O ever-constant life! Ever full—full, and running over! that knowest no drought, no break, no change! Surely we were not meant to be the fitful, changeful beings that we are! With such a life, should we not be calm and constant?

III. It is free.—Priceless in every sense it is. Without price, and beyond price! 'Free' is the word inscribed on this divine vessel. No condition, no merit, no price! The life is a gift, and that gift is absolutely and unconditionally free. All that the vessel contains of life for the dead or dying, is as free as God himself can make it. God interposes no limitation, no restriction, no purchase. He who would clog the gift with any price or condition, is a rejecter of the gift, and a disbeliever in the love of the Giver. It comes to us without money, we come to it without merit. O life-giving energy of Christ, how free art thou!

IV. It is suitable.—It takes up every part of our being, and extends to every region, every circumstance of our life. It pours itself into every faculty, and feeling, and organ. It meets us at every point. It brings forth from its unsearchable riches the very things that we require in every exigency. In Paul's case, it was the body that it so specially suited; meeting, as by a miracle, every emergency of disease or danger; not simply like an impenetrable shield interposed to ward off some mortal stroke, but an inward virtue or power, making the man himself impenetrable and invulnerable; nay, infusing new life where death sought to come. It not merely flings off death, but pours in life; and the man at whom the deadly stroke is aimed, rises not merely unwounded, but quickened and refreshed. Who is there amongst us whose case is not met by this manifold life?

V. It is powerful.—Omnipotence is in it. It is not the mere skill of the physician, but the irresistible power of a divine vitality, which no kind nor amount of creature-death can neutralise or conquer. The power of the life of Christ was that which specially came forth in the history of the apostle, whose every step was on the edge of death; so that any one looking at him, and knowing his daily history, would say, 'His life is a miracle;' and, 'What a life must that be which keeps that man alive!' It is life-giving, comforting, reviving, healing power. O mighty life of the risen Christ! What a fountainhead of vital power art thou to us, in this daily battle between life and death!

VI. It is available.—We might say, it is placed at our disposal, and within our reach. It is nigh; as near as He is, in whom we live. How it pours itself into us, we know not. It has a thousand channels, and will make itself known in a thousand ways, being administered by the Holy Ghost. It quickens at first, it quickens to the last. It pours itself in through faith, through the word, through prayer, through praise, through the sacraments. We are surrounded by this mighty life. It is within us, it is around us, a well of water springing up into everlasting life. It makes our life a continual resurrection. Like Abraham, we lay our life (as he did Isaac) on the altar; like Abraham, we receive it again from the dead. We live in and through the living One. 'Because He lives, we live also.'

PAUL THE SAINT.*

PHIL. iii. 12.

THE apostle this day comes before us in the most blessed character which can attach to any one while yet on earth. It is as a saint that we are now to contemplate him. In other words, as one who had a deep and true experience of the life of God in his soul. And in this respect, it is a matter of the most vital importance that we should all see in him our own representative. If we are on the way to heaven at all, we must be treading in the footsteps of the great apostle, in regard to our earnest and unceasing prosecution of holiness. The title of saint is one which has often been misapplied, and sometimes even made the object of ridicule; but in its true meaning as a sanctified one, it must, in a lesser or greater degree, be descriptive of all true Christians. Little will it avail us to have our names written in the proudest roll of fame, unless they stand inscribed among such as are worthily denominated saints. This is the class of human beings that in the sight of Heaven are both most highly honoured and most truly happy. They may be found in any rank of life, in any region of the earth, and possessed of any kind and degree of talent or power; but, whether in the palace or in the cottage, whether among the natives of England or of India, whether learned as the most renowned philosophers, or unlettered as the humblest peasants —it is still they who constitute above all others our world's glory; they who have been numbered among the children of God; they whose brows are to a spiritual eye encircled by a coronet of light; and they who are advancing, under divine and infallible guidance, to 'an inheritance which is incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away' (1 Pet. i. 4). No ambition could be loftier than that which aspires to a place among such, and no question is so momentous as that which asks whether or not we are yet ranked among them. The Lord grant that we may all deeply feel the solemnity of this subject; and that, forgetting the honours, the pleasures, and the occupations of earth, our one great object may now be to ascertain whether or not we are to be reckoned with those who are on their way to the kingdom of heaven.

In looking, then, at the apostle as displaying the character of a saint, I know of no words which could more appropriately be selected as our text than those before us. They seem to include every feature that is essential to a child of God, and at the same time to contain nothing that can be deemed peculiar to him who wrote them. There may be many expressions in Paul's writings which we hesitate to adopt as applicable to ourselves, or as detailing our own experience; but there is no true believer upon earth that will not be ready to subscribe with his own name, so to speak, the declaration which Paul here makes when he says, 'Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus.'

What then, let us inquire, are the features in the character of a saint suggested to us by these words?

First, They indicate a consciousness of some spiritual progress.

It is clear that the apostle here regards himself as having at least entered on the Christian course. While he disclaims perfection, the very fact that he does so implies that he was sensible of having made some Christian attainments. And in like manner, there is no true believer but knows, or may know, that he has set out for the kingdom of heaven. Without some such consciousness, there is manifestly no ground for any one claiming a place among those who are denominated saints. Infinite are the degrees of advancement among such; but all agree in having at least entered on the way to life; and all, if they reflect, may find certain evidence that they have done so. For what is it that discriminates between a dead and a living soul—between one who is still in bondage to iniquity, and another who has become a servant to God? Is it not the earnest acceptance of Christ as a Saviour, according to these words of the Apostle John: 'He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life?' (1 John v. 12). And is it not impossible that any one who has performed this act of acceptance should be unconscious of what he has done? It consists in a deliberate choice made by the heart; it implies a fixed determination of the will; and every one, therefore, who has in reality laid hold of Christ must be sensible that such is the case, just as he is sensible of having performed any other act of his earthly life.

* From Dr. Roberts' able and interesting volume, The Life and Work of St. Paul. 1867.

The reason why some of those whom there is good ground to believe God's children never reach an assurance of their salvation, or but occasionally possess it, is to be found either in their forgetting the ground on which acceptance depends, or in the inconsistency which marks their conduct. If a believer does not keep habitually before him the great truth that Christ's righteousness alone is the foundation on which he rests, and looks to himself for hope before God, then, according to his own shifting frames and feelings, will be the fluctuations of his confidence for eternity. Or, if a believer wounds his own conscience by indulging in courses which he knows to be wrong, and by neglecting duties which he feels to be incumbent, he cannot, and he ought not to cherish that conviction of his safety which might otherwise have been possessed. But all this does not involve in any obscurity the consciousness which lies imbedded in the heart, as to whether or not that act of will has been performed which amounts to the acceptance of Christ. This is a pure question of fact, which any one can answer for himself without a moment's hesitation. Have I ever deliberately laid hold of Christ? Have I gone to Him with my sins? Do I cling to Him as my Saviour? Has the moment ever yet arrived in my experience when I awoke to my condition as a sinful and immortal being, when I felt myself exposed to the wrath of God, and trembled at the prospect of a lost eternity? Did I then listen to, and accept the offers of, the gospel? With the world and destruction on the one side, and Christ and salvation on the other, did I deliberately make the choice which implied the renouncing of sin and the acceptance of the Saviour? These are questions which every one of us should be able to answer for himself without any hesitation. And even if you do hesitate as to the past, there can at least be no doubt with respect to the present. If already you have accepted Christ, it is certain you will be prepared to do so again this day; and thus, by the response which your heart now gives to the invitations of the gospel, you may at once discover ground to conclude whether or not you are to be ranked among the saints of God.

Perhaps no violent change, such as occurred in the case of the Apostle Paul, has ever taken place in your experience. And therefore I do not ask you to be able to define, as he could, the time and manner of your conversion to God. The line between darkness and light was in his case broadly drawn, whereas in your case the gloom may have gradually disappeared, and you may have been almost imperceptibly ushered into the brightness of day. This is a kind of experience which is far more common among ourselves than it was, or could have been, in apostolic times. Then the transition had generally to be made from a state of open opposition to the gospel to a hearty acceptance of its truth. Now, we grow up all our days surrounded by its blessed influences, and more or less under its power. The children of a Christian home thus imbibe from infancy the spirit of vital piety, and the work of grace may be so gradually and gently carried forward in their hearts that it is impossible to mark the time when they were first won to God. But those who have in this way been led to Jesus, will nevertheless have the testimony of consciousness as to the choice which they have made. Again and again must they have taken hold of Christ as their Saviour, and most gladly will they repeat that act when at any moment they are urged to do so, and thus to decide between the world and God.

I appeal then with confidence to the heart of every one of you for an answer to the question, whether or not you have really entered on the path of life. If you are truly ranked among the saints, you must have some evidence that such is the case. And the one point on which I would concentrate your attention is as to your cordial acceptance of Christ as your Saviour. I do not ask you to give a lengthened description of your experience, or to set forth the conflicting tendencies which may exist in your hearts. These things will vary in the case of different believers, and cannot therefore be made a certain test of any one's spiritual state. But in respect to the rudimental point of having accepted Christ, all true believers are agreed. If you cannot say that such an act has been performed by you, and if you are not prepared to repeat it this day; if your conscience does not testify that already you have laid hold of Jesus as your Saviour, and your heart does not prompt you still to cling to Him as your Portion—then it seems impossible that you can claim even the humblest place among the saints; you are still in that broad way which leadeth to destruction, and the words of the text have no real significance as uttered by your lips.

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER IX.

FUTURE PROSPECTS.

THE day of Rachel's visit had been an important one to us all. My brother had, some time before, obtained Rabbi Abraham's leave to make his daughter Rachel an offer of marriage, but had been obliged to wait for a convenient opportunity. Walter had stipulated with her father that the secret should be kept till he himself could speak; and Rachel, who looked up to 'Mr. Walter' with great reverence, was much surprised by the communication he made to her in our pine bower.

I was not surprised; for it was many months since I had discovered my brother mysteriously engaged upon a small painting, which proved to be Rachel, as she had appeared when we were dressing our chapel with evergreens on Christmas eve two years ago, with the palm branches in her hand and drooping over her head. It was, indeed, a charming portrait, and seen by no one but myself till very lately, when shown to her father as the text of Walter's discourse. It would have been impossible for any one, with so keen an eye for beauty as my brother, to fail in admiring my pretty pupil, whose sayings and doings gained an indescribable charm from her simplicity and ignorance of the common world. She was, in truth, become a most interesting person, having made rapid progress in all I could teach her, and done infinite credit to the music lessons so kindly bestowed by Mrs. Wells.

There could be no doubt, moreover, that her fund of good common sense would easily enable her to adapt herself to any circumstances in which she might be placed; and as to affection, if Mrs. Wells and I had hitherto engrossed what was not bestowed upon her father and brother, there was no fear of Walter not receiving an ample share, in exchange for the admiration with which Rachel had hitherto regarded him as her beau ideal of a 'very learned gentleman.'

So, of course, when surprise had had its way, Walter and Rachel came to an understanding, and all was settled, and we were all very happy; only Abraham and Nathaniel felt sadly that there was separation in prospect for them, from one who had been the very life and centre of home happiness to them. And I, too, could not forget what Walter had been to me for so many years—could not be quite glad that I should no longer be all in all to him.

However, we were to have another winter together—the wedding was not to take place till spring. But after that, what was to become of me?

Walter was to go to England to show his bride to our relations, to take his paintings to London, and also to look after our property at Riverside. But I could not bear to think of leaving Jerusalem—it had become a home to me; yet how could I stay here alone? Oh, how often we make imaginary troubles for ourselves by anticipating! This and many other difficulties melted away before the wedding-day came.

But I did not then know how it would be; and the next day, as I sat at my work, my thoughts would dwell upon these things. Nobody needed me in England; yet, how should it come to pass that I might stay here in Jerusalem and yet not live a solitary life? True, I could find employment, even amusement—that is to say, what would be amusement to me; though, certainly, there were as yet neither concerts nor balls in Jerusalem. 'C'est a mourir de tristesse,' was the unvarying complaint of Madame French Consul Lannoye. But I had never been dependent on concerts and balls for happiness; and was sure that Jerusalem life would become more interesting and more varied in proportion as I became better acquainted with the languages and manners of the people, and also in proportion as the city itself grew and rose into importance. But to live alone; I could not quite make up my mind to that, and Walter would certainly not agree to it for an instant. But how could I choose to leave all these dear scenes for ever?

My eyes filled with tears as I involuntarily raised them to the Mount of Olives, now under the full blaze of the noon-day sun. There is something sad and solemn in the intense light of noon-day, and in its stillness. The birds forget to sing, the flowers droop; for is not the early dew, that gave them life and fragrance, gone? The very trees are all silent. But the tree-crickets? I forgot them; they are revelling in the clear heat, which has but awakened them into the full enjoyment of existence; yet their monotonous chirrup seems to increase the silence. The breeze was late to-day in springing up; the morning had been very hot; all our Fellah neighbours were asleep; the cattle could thresh no longer; the winnowers had lain down to rest under a hawthorn bush, for there was not air enough stirring to carry the chaff farther than the wheat. I felt depressed, and there was nothing to rouse me from anxious thought.

But soon the delicious north-west breeze was heard coming up the valley; delicately it touched the top of one tree after another along the line—just shook the utmost branches of the one I was sitting under, and wafted a breath of perfume through the pine bower. Then all was still again, more silent than before; for the shaking of the branches had frightened and hushed the crickets.

I forgot to think in listening for the next approach of the breeze. It came, rustling faintly in the distance; nearer, nearer still, now gathering strength as it rose, fanning my temples for an instant. Again it died away, and again it swept up the valley; but this time with steady force.

The branches played and danced for joy, and would not let it go again, and presently the crickets took courage, and chirrupped in concert with its music. Very soon my little friends the goldfinches in the pomegranate tree awoke, and springing on their accustomed sprays, began to sing to their little ones and to me, and my gloomy thoughts were not proof against such a host of pleasant influences. They all fled; while patience and hope began to whisper that in some unknown way all would end well for me also.

How often since have I thought of that morning! nay, even now, though many years have passed, I can still distinguish the stillness of that glowing noon-day—the faint rustle of the reviving breeze. And I can still hear perfectly a strange sound, which began to be heard after the breeze had become steady and strong. At first it puzzled me much There was a group of rocks not far off upon a bank, and from these, ever and anon, would issue a strange trumpet-like note, stronger now, now fainter, then ceasing altogether, then suddenly returning. It was the wind passing between two rocks which stood near to each other. I often heard it after this; and convinced myself and Walter that it came from this cause, and used to imagine how these musical rocks might puzzle a superstitious people, and indeed become a sort of oracle in the hands of a diviner.

That evening, Walter and I walked till very late up and down our pleasant terrace. There was little dew, but the air was deliciously soft and cool. We had talked over our plans for the wedding—the journey to England.

'Walter,' said I, suddenly, forgetting all difficulties, 'I should like to stay in Jerusalem.'

'Alone, Emily? that must not be. Have you quite given up old England?'

'No; but if Miss Brandon were here, I should not be alone; and I don't think I could leave Jerusalem, even for dear old England.'

Walter laughed, and said: 'Well, the time is not come yet; many things may happen before next spring.' And then sighing, he added: 'Indeed, Emily, I don't know how I shall make up my own mind to leave Jerusalem. The happiest days of all my life have been spent here, and the most useful to me in many ways. Thank God my Bible has become a different book to me since we have lived here; and Abraham has done me much good too. Till I saw him, I had never met any one who had suffered loss for the sake of Christianity—for the belief in our Saviour—and it set me thinking. The simplicity of his faith is very beautiful; and then, dear, I have thought seriously about my future life. I don't think I shall spend it painting pictures. Of course I can't give up painting; at least some part of my days must be spent for the good of my fellow-creatures.'

'Oh, then, come back here, Walter, and let us live in Jerusalem always!'

'I have thought of that myself, and Rachel wishes it. She calls it the land of her fathers, and so it is. Then my Arabic might be of use; it would be a pity to throw it away again.'

'Stay, Walter, don't throw away your painting either. I am sure true pictures of Bible scenes will not be useless. I am sure God has not given you that talent for nothing. And you need not paint all day long: devote a certain time to that, and do what you will with the rest.'

'I don't want to give it up, Emily; that would be a severe trial. But serious, solemn thoughts come in about the thousands of miserable human beings around us, passing away in ignorance of our Saviour, and I feel as if I could not spend my life merely painting pictures on canvas. Now, come up to the bower terrace, and let us watch the moon rise.'

My brother's thoughts about the work to be done in Jerusalem were the same as my own. He had but expressed feelings which I had not ventured to put into words, in reference to my wish to stay here.

---

CHAPTER X.

TRIP TO HEBRON.

THE last evening but one of our tent life at the Honeysuckle Rocks had arrived. Walter had decided upon taking an excursion to Hebron before winter set in, and to show me the Vale of Eshcol in all the glories of the vintage. A short stay at Hebron was, in fact, necessary for the picture he was painting; and all our preparations were made. Abraham, Rachel, and Nathaniel had spent the afternoon with us, and after bidding them good-bye, we rambled from our encampment into the fields, and then sat down under a tree to talk. Perhaps it was the cawing of the rooks—those dear home birds, as they journeyed to rest in the northern olive grove—that made us talk of England, of old scenes, of the church tower among the elm trees at Riverside, and the early chimes on Sunday mornings while the rooks were flying round and round the belfry, and the filbert trees that shaded the grass walk where, when children, we used to pace up and down and learn our collect, and the monthly roses in the verandah, and the lemon verbena that climbed up to the bedroom window, and the purple vine, and the green vine that covered the trellis on each side of the door.

A huge flapping overhead interrupted us. Two crows were flying home to a nest not far distant, their glossy black coats gilded by the slanting sunlight.

'There, Emily, the hoarse croak of our English crows is not like that rich, deep note.'

'No, indeed, this is musical as a bell.' As I spoke, a pretty little owl settled on a branch of an opposite tree. 'I wonder people don't like owls; the twitter of these little creatures flitting about is positively delightful.'

Before Walter could reply, one of Mr. Wells' kawasses came galloping up, and brought us a packet of letters from the English mail. It was too dark for us to see to read, and we hastened home, only stopping once or twice to look at a glowworm under some stone, the soft pulsations of whose fairy light reminded me of the planet we had seen that morning before sunrise. I picked up one to take home. We could see to read the addresses of our letters by its light. Haj Omar called it the Ghoul's lamp; 'for, do not the Ghouls need her light when they wander forth at night for evil purposes?'

As usual, the post brought us mingled tidings of joy and sorrow: one old friend, of whose illness we had not heard, was gone to a better world; a cousin was born to us; some of our friends were in adversity, others prospering, and we could only pray for them in general terms; for time had passed since the letters were written—nearly a whole month, and the joys might ere now have been turned into sorrows, the afflictions passed away, or the living be numbered with the dead. Alas for the distance—not so much of space as of time—which separates friends on earth!

Among the letters was one from Miss Brandon. She had made up her mind to come to Jerusalem. 'As for happiness, I can be happy wherever I am busy, and you do not seem to have found life in Jerusalem so very gloomy. You do not mention hardships, but others have abundantly prepared me for them; and one ought to be willing to bear a few hardships,' etc.

'And so Miss Brandon is to be here in March, Emily!'

'I told her she ought to be here before the heat sets in.'

'Quite right. Now you must ask her to come and be our guest till she finds better quarters.'

I wrote, and in due time got for an answer that she would be only too glad to come to us. So here were some more touches added to the dim picture of coming events.

Next day we got up very early—by starlight,—and were on horseback before sunrise. All the tents were packed up; Katrina and her kitchen furniture sent to town, for Constantine was to be cook during the Hebron trip; the last strap had been buckled, the last rope tied, and the baggage mules were trying to rub off their loads against each other, or against the trunks of the olive trees. The pine bower—no longer fresh, alas! but faded brown, and yet still fragrant in the dewy morning—had been rifled of all its little comforts, its cushions and its carpets, and stood there a melancholy memorial of past happy days.

Haj Omar led up the horses; and the Fellahheen stood round, partly to wish us a pleasant journey, but chiefly in expectation of the promised reward for use of their ground. This was paid; not all in a lump, unfeelingly, but divided into various sums—all as so many different ways of expressing kindness. There was first the principal sum, given as rent, then a gratuitous present (a backsheesh), then a present for our host's family, a trifle for his mother, a few paras for the youngest child, and so on—thus multiplying the vibrations of kindness from heart to heart.

The poor Arab and his backsheesh have been misrepresented. True, there is an insatiable craving for money common among them; but, I think, the backsheesh has its origin in something higher than the mere love of gain. How often have I seen those who understood the little kindnesses of backsheesh (the free gift) overwhelmed with blessings: 'May God increase your substance!' 'May He lengthen your days!' 'May He return it to you!'—when, in fact, they had given less money than others who, paying down the stipulated sum dryly, as a mere matter of bargain, were pursued with clamours for backsheesh; the Europeans denouncing the Arabs as avaricious, while the Arabs returned the epithets, unfriendly, stingy, close-fisted; 'Yed ho dabboos,' his hand is a club's head, that is, close knotted, like the head of their formidable dabboos clubs.

We rode away amid cries of 'Go in peace,' 'May God smooth the way before you;' though, it is true, one little urchin, instigated by his mother, did run after us till I threw him a piastre by way of backsheesh.

On reaching Hebron, after a delightful ride over the fragrant hills, we pitched our tents under the great oak tree called Abraham's oak. The fresh pure air, the perpetual breeze under its vast boughs, and the greenness of the vineyards around, were enchanting. The vines were in fullest luxuriance of bearing; every branch laden with magnificent fruit.

The work which chiefly occupied my brother during our stay, was the picture of 'Abraham buying the field of Machpelah from the children of Heth.' He also took sketches for other subjects; among them, 'The Tribes coming to pay homage to King David at Hebron,' as described in second Samuel; also, 'Sale of Jewish captives, by Romans, under the great tree at Hebron,' mentioned by Jerome.

We wandered all over the neighbourhood, sketching, exploring, and studying the features of the surrounding scenery. Not far from the great tree, we found a lovely view of the Mediterranean, visible between two vine-clad hills.

Walter took many portraits, but, of course, without the knowledge of the people sketched; for their superstitious dread of being taken down on paper would not have allowed them to sit willingly for their likenesses.

There was no one to be seen, among the Jews of the town, whose countenance satisfied Walter's ideal portrait of Abraham so well as the face of a Sephardi Rabbi, from Tiberias, who had lately been in Jerusalem. The expression of this man's face was fine, but yet immeasurably below that which must have dwelt upon the patriarch's countenance, after the experience of so wonderful a life as his.

Taking the general outline of form and feature from the face of the Tiberias Rabbi, Walter had tried to add what was wanting, so as to render, in some degree, his conceptions of the grandeur of Abraham's presence. There was much to be expressed. The natural comeliness of one who has been the ancestor of a pre-eminently handsome race; the dignity of vigorous old age, and the nobility of expression which must, undoubtedly, have been stamped upon every feature, by the consciousness of his high position, as the founder of the nation in whom all peoples of the earth should be blessed, and by long years of peculiar privilege as the friend of God. With all this, the sorrow, subdued indeed by hope and faith, yet very present while the old man, who had but just risen from 'before his dead,' was asking the favour of a worthy burial-place for his once beautiful Sarah.

My brother chose the early morning as the period of the transaction. Oriental customs favoured this idea. Sarah may well have died in the night, and the burial ought to take place before sunset next day.

The place selected as the scene of the purchase was the western gate of the city. The chieftains and elders would naturally be found there at sunrise, giving audience and dispensing justice; and many a delightful morning was spent by us together, while Walter sketched the scenes around the gate about sunrise. Arab sheikhs, bearing cruses; their followers, or passers by, looking on with keen interest; camels bringing in sacks of grain from the threshing-floors; women bearing on their heads high-piled baskets of magnificent grapes—both green and purple—the delicate bloom undisturbed on the berries, and the tints set off by here and there a pomegranate of glowing carmine colour. There were also donkey-loads of quinces and walnuts, from the fruit-trees planted everywhere among the surrounding vineyards, besides every kind of vegetable produce in season. I got little sketches of these while Walter was busy upon his own work.

My brother had been fortunate in getting a model for his picture of Ephron the Hittite in a fine old Arab sheikh, who owned a vineyard close to the great oak. He used to come and sit under its shade towards sunset, and tell me legends about the evils which had befallen persons who sacrilegiously harmed the tree, which is venerated by the Moslems. Meanwhile my brother, within his tent, and unseen of course, was busily taking the old man's likeness. He claimed to be nearly ninety years of age; and, certainly, his flowing beard, of snowy whiteness, seemed to confirm his claim. He was in possession of all his faculties, and had an intelligent, kindly face, and fine features.

Walter depicted Ephron and his companions as Arab sheikhs of high class; but he treated Abraham in conformity with the rank he had asserted, in buying not a common grave, but a rich man's rock-hewn sepulchre. He represented him in garb of costlier material, and fashioned like the robes worn by those who live in cities. 'For,' said he, 'Abraham belonged to one of the chief families of a city in Mesopotamia. He gave up the comforts of his settled home, and adopted pastoral life at God's command. But we cannot regard him as a mere Bedawy sheikh, but rather as one of the mightiest nobles of the land, who still preserved his rank and his wealth, his jewels and his retinue of servants; and to whom was naturally due the deference shown him by the great ones of the land, no less than by the kings of Egypt, of Sodom, and of the Philistines.'

The sketches necessary for his work occupied my brother very constantly; however, he found time to take me several most interesting excursions among the scenes of David's exile in the surrounding country. We visited Carmel, the home of Nabal the churl; also Ziph and Maon, where David had wandered, pursued by Saul. We even managed to spend one night at Beersheba, which is within a day's journey of Hebron. It will occupy too much space were I to recount all the varied interest of these never-to-be-forgotten days. They passed swiftly away, and our happy three weeks' visit to Hebron came to an end. It was our last evening under the great oak. Last rides had been taken; last looks at the hills, and valleys, and vineyards; last touches put to my drawings of purple grapes, golden quinces, and crimson pomegranates. Relics—stones and dried flowers, leaves and acorns from the tree—had been packed up; the evening star had set for the last time to us, behind the brow of the western hill; and Walter had put away his precious sketches for the 'Purchase of Machpelah from the children of Heth.' Mule bells were heard tinkling along the lane. They were come from Jerusalem to fetch us and our luggage. Letters? Yes, letters; and Constantine brought a lantern that we might read them. A special one, full of private matters for Walter, and a general one for me, both from the same hand.

Rachel had a grand piece of news for me. Judah's wife had actually come back all the way from Riga; they were to be remarried. 'And please come back very soon,' concluded Rachel; 'for it will be a joyful wedding, and we want you to be at it. Only poor Judah has lost his child. Miriam was obliged to leave him in Russia. They had taken him from her, and sent him to some relations to keep, because they were afraid she would go back to her husband, and they thought she would not like to go and leave her child behind. But, you see, not even for her child would she forget her best friend. Is she not the right sort of wife? And she is very pretty; but I forgot, you have already seen her. But you do not know how good she is. I am already beginning to teach her some things; and if you want another pupil, here is one, much cleverer than I was.'

Walter's letter made him happy. He was more taken up with thoughts for the future, than with regret that it was our last night at Hebron; but yet, as we bade each other good night, and stood and took one more gaze into the depths of the old tree, he sighed: 'We shall neither of us forget this last holiday together, Emily. I mean alone together,' he added hastily.

I could not sleep for a long time—thought was too busy; but even thought was gradually soothed by the voice of the wind among the branches, the flow and reflow resembling the surging as of waves upon a pebbly shore. Now and then the note of the owl rang forth, bell-like, upon the night air; but at last I fell asleep.

Sorry to leave Hebron! Yes, I had been very sorry; but oh, so glad to get back to Jerusalem! Who would not be glad, and feel a thrill of joy on looking at the grey battlements, and remembering that home lies within? And the city looks so pretty, so calm and domestic, in the evening light as one approaches it from the Bethlehem road. It is delightful to have a home in Jerusalem!

Abraham and Nathaniel welcomed us at the gate of the city; but Rachel was waiting for us at home. She and Katrina had made the house so snug and comfortable. What a cheerful tea-table they had spread for us! and the dish of grapes in the centre would not have disgraced Hebron itself.

Dear good girl! she had not only prepared the tea-table for us; but there were places for her father and Nathaniel, and for herself by my side, though Walter changed that a little, and gave me Nathaniel and Abraham on either hand, while he put Rachel between her father and himself. How happy we were! and how we talked! and how Katrina bustled about and scolded Constantine for being tired! Poor fellow, he had been up since day-dawn, and might well be tired; only Katrina never was tired, and had no patience with those who were. And now we heard the particulars about Judah's wife.

'Only think, Miss Russell, she has come back willing to be a Christian!'

'I thought it must be so, Abraham, or she would never have come back at all.'

'No; but there is more than that. Among her friends in Russia she found a young man who was a relation of her husband's. He inquired of Judah's welfare, and Miriam soon found out that he thought him in the right for becoming a Christian; and they had much conversation, and this friend explained all he knew about Christianity to her; for, some months ago, he had found a book hidden in a drawer in the synagogue, and he took it and read it, and it was a New Testament, and he believed it. And so, you see, Miriam went all the way to Russia to be taught these things; and that determined her to come back to her husband. That other friend —Moses is his name—helped her, and now he is gone to England, where he hopes to learn more about Christianity; but he told Miriam that he will certainly come to Jerusalem some day. I am so glad,' added Abraham, 'for our people are increasing here. There is only one thing; what employment will there be? and how can any new people earn their bread in Jerusalem? It is hard enough for us old ones.'

'Why not do as people do in Hebron? Plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them,' said Walter.

'Ah! if that could be, it would be a happy time for us all; but who shall help us to begin such a thing?'

'Only fancy, Walter, a village of Hebrew settlers! What a delightful idea! and we should make Abraham the sheikh.'

'Then Judah shall be the doctor. He is getting on well at the hospital. Mr. Benson says he is becoming very useful. But I don't want to be sheikh. We should all be brethren alike.'

'Some must be elders, Abraham, even where all are brethren.'

'You have not told us when the wedding is to be, Rachel?'

'Miriam is to be baptized to-morrow, and the wedding will be soon afterwards—the day is not fixed.'

Strange—the baptism before the wedding; but, of course, it must be so. We went to church next day and saw Miriam baptized. It was the very same Miriam whom we had helped to rescue from the Bedaween at Rachel's sepulchre. There were the same black piercing eyes, brilliant complexion, and finely cut features. But she looked more staid and matronly, though still very young, while strange and varied experiences had left their impress upon her. She was grave, but looked very happy. As to Judah, though the tears would trickle down his cheeks, they were tears of joy; and the painfully subdued expression which had been in his face for many months was gone. He looked at least five years younger. But his curls had disappeared. What had become of them? I could not help asking Rachel this when the service was over.

'Oh, have you not heard that? You know Judah promised Miriam that he would not cut them off, and she sent him word from Russia that she would not marry any one else as long as he wore them. But now she says that he shall not wear a Jewish mark any longer for her sake, and, yesterday, she cut them off herself.'

Mr. Anderson returned to Jerusalem just in time to marry Judah and Miriam. As Rachel had said, it was a very happy wedding. The service was in Hebrew. I had never heard a marriage in Hebrew before. How strangely beautiful and appropriate were the allusions to Isaac and Rebekah, to Abraham and Sarah, the prayer to the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob!

How delightful it was that the power of Christianity had triumphed to reunite an attached husband and wife, separated for a time by an unnatural divorce!

(To be continued.)

THE LAST DAYS OF A WORKMAN IN THE VINEYARD.

(Continued from p. 323.)

ONE evening I found a young girl, who had been one of Robinson's Sabbath scholars, sitting beside him; and before I had been long there, another of his class came to ask him how he was.

'Ah! my dear girl,' he replied, 'I am very ill; but, please God, I'll be better soon.'

He turned to me and asked, 'Don't you think me changed since the last time you were here?'

'Yes, I think your pain is near an end now.'

'He is sinking fast,' observed his mother.

'He is sinking into Jesus' arms, which are open to receive him, Mrs. Crockett. When at rest there, his trouble will be soon forgotten; it will have worked for him "an exceeding and eternal weight of glory."'

'Ah! my dear friend, those are precious words; but it is hard to realize the promises at times. I wish I could always do so. Whiles I enjoy moments of great peace and happiness; then again I can think of nothing but this racking pain, and how uneasy I am. Oh! my bed feels so hard and uncomfortable, and my back aches dreadfully.'

The violent pain to which he was subject came on while he was speaking. His features contracted, and the perspiration stood upon his brow.

'My son, my son!' exclaimed Mrs. Crockett, 'it's too bad we ha' no better way for you.'

'No, mother, it is all right: not too bad for me, when the Son of man had not where to lay his head.'

We could none of us restrain our tears. Robinson never lost an opportunity of speaking for Christ. He now most affectionately entreated his young scholars to seek their Saviour, and make Him their Friend while they were full of life and strength, and He would not desert them when they came to lie upon a sickbed.

I repeated some of his favourite hymns, and part of Rev. vii.: 'What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they? . . . . These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in his temple: and He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'

'Oh!' cried Robinson, 'I wish that were realized by me. I wish I was there; but death comes first, and the flesh shrinks from death.'

'Christ overcame death: you will be more than conqueror through Him that loved you.'

I saw he was exhausted by the conversation; so I got up to take leave, saying I knew he could not have enjoyed any reading that evening, as he was so weak.

'No,' replied he, 'I cannot attend long to anything; but I was very glad to hear the verses you recited. Must you go so soon?'

'I fear I must go. Farewell. May our dear Lord bless and keep you. It may be that I shall see you here no more, but we shall meet in the "city."'

'The "city!" he murmured; 'the "city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Yes, I hope I'll see you all coming there.'

Robinson was no worse when I saw him on the following evening; but he was still greatly tortured by the pain in his breast and side.

'I fear,' said he with a heavy sigh, 'that the deliverance may be several weeks off yet; but I desire to say from my heart, "God's will be done."'

'Renew my will from day to day,
Blend it with thine, and take away
All that now makes it hard to say,
Thy will be done.'

I repeated the last verse of the same beautiful hymn:

'And when to heaven's bright realms I soar,
These words, oft mixed with tears before,
I'll sing, triumphant evermore,
Thy will be done.'

'I wish,' said Robinson, 'that I could always say that sincerely; but there are times when resignation is very hard.'

'I am sure of that; but although no mortal can tell how much you suffer, your Saviour knows it all.'

'Yes, He knows it all. That thought, indeed, helps me to endure. We can suffer no pang that He has not tasted.'

'Robinson, have you ever considered how many, many sufferers there must be in the world, who have, perhaps, as much pain to bear as you have, but who are without any refuge or comfort because they know not Christ? I know, for my part, that his great mercy, in having led me to repentance, sometimes strikes me with fresh wonder. Were we, above others, brought to the Saviour, and wakened up to flee from the wrath to come? "Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift!"'

'Unspeakable!' cried the sufferer; 'such a gift! such salvation! and to me, unworthy, unworthy! Oh, my dear friend, I am unworthy—I have so little love to Jesus! I know that He lives and reigns, and that He died to save me; but still my heart is hard and cold, and I love Him so little.'

'Certainly,' I answered, 'none on earth love Him as He deserves to be loved.'

'But I have read the lives of some,' continued Robinson eagerly, 'who seem to have loved Him very fervently. Their love has often made me shed tears over my own coldness.'

'Dear Robinson, you do love the Lord Jesus: you could say to Him with Peter, "Lord, Thou knowest all things, Thou knowest that I love Thee;" and before very long, you will be where neither sin nor weakness can come between your love and Him.'

Having read thus far in this true tale, do you doubt, dear friends, that there is only one thing worth thinking of, or striving after, or living for in this world, and that one thing is religion? No; your minds, if not your hearts, must confess that there is but one. May the dear Lord Jesus, who alone can do it, cause your hearts to confess it also! Religion is, moreover, the only reality in this uncertain, fleeting scene. All else is but a show, a changing picture. Shall thinking beings such as we are, desire no joys but those that cannot last us—a world so transitory and subject to change as this,—and neglect to secure our title to the 'inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us?' Thoughts like these were passing through my mind that evening, as I sat by Robinson Crockett's bedside; and at length I uttered them aloud.

'Oh! Robinson, the more I see of sorrow, the more convinced I am that religion is the only real thing.'

'Yes, yes!' he cried, 'you use the right word—the only real thing. You and I are quite sure of that. Oh I wish—I wish all the neighbours were sure of it too! And all who do not know Christ must perish! How busy we should be in telling them to seek Him—life is so short for that!'

Some days passed before I again turned my steps in the direction of Robinson's cottage. I had heard nothing of him since my last visit, and was quite uncertain whether I should find him there or not. How often, on my way, had I looked around upon the lovely landscape, and thought it sad he could see it no more! I gazed upon the blue mountains and velvet pasture lands that evening, and the old regret was arising, when this sublime passage in the 33d of Isaiah occurred to me: 'Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty: they shall behold the land that is very far off.'

Robinson may now, thought I, be gazing on the glories of that lovely, far-off land—a land how much more fair than this! He may now see the King in his beauty, where they receive joy and gladness, and sorrow and mourning flee away. Not yet, not yet! I found his journey was not quite over.

'I am now,' said he, 'entering the valley of the shadow of death; but I hope Jesus is holding my hand as I go through.'

He was beyond speaking much; but he still loved to hear the precious words of life. I began to repeat his favourite verses in Rev. xxii. He clasped his hands when I came to the words, 'Behold, I come quickly,' and exclaimed, 'Oh that that were realized by me! Oh that the joy were near! Come quickly, come quickly, Lord Jesus!'

No description can give an idea of the intense longing with which these last words were uttered. A strange wistfulness in his large mournful eyes seemed to look for the coming of a Saviour who was no stranger to him, but had long been his tried Friend and very present help in trouble.

I went on with the last verses of the eighth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans: 'Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? (As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter.) Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

'I am persuaded,' repeated Robinson; 'I am persuaded! Oh, that is a wonderful word; it means a great deal. Am I per-sua-ded?' (he lingered upon the word.) 'Saviour, what does it mean for me? Could aught separate me from Thee? No, no, no! I know nothing that could make me give up my Saviour.'

He is weary, thought I; but he will not be weary long. I am only wearing him out by staying now. 'Farewell, Robinson; you have my prayers; that is all I can do for you.'

'My dear friend,' he replied, 'what can I have better? What can you do more?'

He took my hand, held it long, and kissed it; then he said, 'Farewell,' bade God bless me, and I went away. It was really 'farewell;' for although I went to see him on the following evening, he was too ill to speak to me, and the next day I heard that he was dead.

He is with his dear Master; he has heard the welcome: 'Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' He had used to the very utmost the talents committed to him by his Lord. No memories of wasted time, wasted health, or wasted influence, can have troubled him on his dying bed.

. . . . . .

I was in the room which had witnessed his long, long pain; and, as I looked at the empty bed, I wept tears of that natural regret of which religion does not forbid the indulgence.

'Ah!' cried his sorrowing mother, 'if I could hear his dear voice just once more!'

'If we could hear his voice now, Mrs. Crockett, we should hear it joining in the everlasting song of praise. No more weary sighs for him. God has wiped away all tears from his eyes.'

'Yes, I know it well. That minds me of how he told me not to be mourning too much after him. That evening, when there was no one in the house but him and me, I asked him if he hadna some little word to say to his poor mother, for her to think upon when he was gone. "No, mother," he said; "you an' me has gone over everything by ourselves here, many and many's the time." "But you'll surely hae some wee advice or other to leave me?" "Well, mother," he said, "I needna bid you not think upon me, for I know you will; but keep thinking on the Lord Jesus Christ, and then you'll think on me too, for I shall be with Him. That's the way I wish to be minded by you." The directions he gave me, to keep his little brothers constant at the Sabbath school, and to go on with the prayer-meeting; and I was to be sure that his funeral was managed in a quiet, orderly way. He talked and made his preparations, just as if it was life, not death, he was making ready for.'

'And it was life he was awaiting, Mrs. Crockett; he knew that the life everlasting would soon begin for him.'

'It was one day last week,' she continued, 'that he took leave of all his little Sabbath scholars. Oh, if you had seen that sight! I think it would have melted the hardest heart. Ellen Pearson called to see him the day before, and he told her of a happy dream he had, that he was in the school again, with the scholars round him; and he thought they answered him so well in the last verses he gave them to learn, that he was quite content; but the dream had made him wish greatly to see them once more. Ellen went and told them what Robinson said, and they all came back with her the next morning; and Robinson made them take their Bibles and read to him, and he questioned them. Then he spoke to them so beautiful, no clergyman could ha' done it better. He bid them follow their Saviour, and told them he would look for them all in heaven; and there was that sore a crying when they took leave of him, that I was forced to run out of the house.'

'Your dear son has surely not lived in vain,' I remarked. 'Many souls must have been influenced for good by his example: how many, will not be known until the last day. His patience was indeed a striking lesson to every one who entered this room.'

'I suppose he must ha' meant something like that himself, Miss, when he would say to me, "Maybe it is good for the people to come in here, mother; for you see, no matter how light or foolish they may be when they come in, they always go away thinking." "That's the good words they hear from you, dear," I used to make answer. "I think, mother," he would say, "it is well for them to see what my goodly strength has come to; and if they ask you to show them this poor leg of mine, never hide it from them. The good words I speak! No, no, my dear mother; it is the Holy Spirit makes them thoughtful, not my words." And it was all true. I ha' seen many a sick person, but I never seen the neighbours so struck with any one's trouble before. Robinson said quite right: they might come in here laughing and speaking folly, but they all went out thinking of their souls, for Robinson had aye something to say to them about the Lord Jesus Christ and his great salvation.'

'Did he suffer very much at the last?'

'Not nigh as bad as we were expecting he would. It was a few minutes before he departed that he told us he was as dark as midnight, and the candle was standing there at the bed-head. I asked him if he felt satisfied in his mind, and he said he was quite satisfied and happy. Then he called to his brother to catch his hands and raise him up; and we heard him whispering to himself, "That's like Peter." I think those were the very last words he spoke; for, after he had drawn his breath very heavy for a few minutes, his head sank down on his breast, and we saw he was away from us. We couldna wish to keep him wi' us in his sufferings.'

'No, no, my dear Mrs. Crockett; you would not keep him out of Christ's glorious kingdom, if you could.'

The tale is ended. In telling you all I knew of Robinson Crockett, I have recalled one of the most touching memories of my life; and I hope it may have proved not merely interesting to you, my dear friends, but instructive also. Robinson has been some time dead. It may be that he is not so often thought of as at first by the neighbours who so deeply mourned his early departure; for it is the lot of every earthly thing to pass away and be forgotten; and it is God's merciful appointment that it should be so, lest we should be 'swallowed up of overmuch sorrow.' But, thank God! Robinson is not now dependent upon earthly love. The joys he possesses in his Saviour's presence are fully satisfying. He is gone; but, though dead, he may yet speak to you in these pages. What does he say to you? I think he tells the young among you to 'remember now their Creator in the days of their youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when they shall say, I have no pleasure in them.' He reminds the old of the pressing necessity there is for 'redeeming the time, because the days are evil;' and methinks he bids us all to 'work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work.' And the work he would incite us to, is work for Christ.

None are too great or too humble, too strong or too feeble, to help in this work. It can be best done by each of us in the position in life in which it has pleased God to place him. The man who truly loves the Lord Jesus Christ will speak for Him, whether engaged at the daily task in the workshop or the field, the church or the home, in wealth or in poverty. A little word for Christ from the lips of one who loves Him, how easily is it spoken! Yet that little word, so easy to speak, may, with God's blessing, be the means of winning souls. Where Robinson is, Christ's love is the theme that animates every tongue. If we also hope to be there, and swell the sweet strain, let us begin to magnify his name now in the house of our pilgrimage. I believe that every effort made by us for the souls of others, returns to ourselves in showers of richest blessing; that the most feeble spark of love to Jesus which we feel in our own breasts, is wonderfully fanned and strengthened while we strive with those around us, and entreat them to seek their Saviour.

If the spirits of the blest in heaven are permitted to know anything that happens among their old companions, who have still a sore warfare to wage with sin here on earth, then will Robinson rejoice should any one of these good lessons have been learned by my dear friends. Our influence for good or for evil can never die. The deeds we have done, the words we have spoken, will be remembered by those we leave behind, long, long years after our bodies shall have returned to the dust. Oh, what an awful thought! How strong an incentive to us to speak for Christ,—so to live, that our words and works may be such as shall help, not hinder, our neighbours on life's perilous journey! 'Son, go work to-day in my vineyard.' 'The night cometh, when no man can work.'

Miscellaneous.

On Sincerity.

WOULD I could show how much of crime,
How much of sorrow here,
Were blotted from the page of time,
Would men but be sincere!
While sailing o'er life's stormy sea,
By many a tempest tossed,
The man who enter's falsehood's maze,
Is surely wrecked and lost;

While he who nobly speaks the truth,
Though it may cost him dear,
Finds, by the peace within his breast,
'Twas well to be sincere.
Oh! what a world would this become,
How changed our lot would be,
Could we but trust, without a doubt,
All men's sincerity! —Anon.

Prayer of Milton.—Come, therefore, O Thou that hast the seven stars in thy right hand! Every one can say, that now certainly Thou hast visited this land, and hast not forgotten the utmost corners of the earth. Oh, perfect and accomplish thy glorious act; for men may leave their work unfinished, but Thou art God—thy nature is perfection! When Thou hast settled peace in the church, and righteous judgment in thy kingdom, then shall all thy saints address their voices of joy and triumph to Thee, standing on the shore of that Red Sea into which our enemies had almost driven us. As Thou didst dignify our fathers' days with many revelations above all the foregoing ages, since Thou tookest the flesh; so Thou canst vouchsafe unto us, though unworthy, as large a portion of thy Spirit as Thou pleasest; for who shall prejudice thy all-governing will, seeing the power of thy grace is not passed away with the primitive times, as fond and faithless men imagine, but thy kingdom is now at hand, and Thou art standing at the door? Come forth out of thy royal chambers, O Prince of all the kings of the earth! Put on the visible robes of thy imperial majesty; take up that unlimited sceptre which thy Almighty Father hath bequeathed Thee; for now the voice of thy bride calls Thee, and all creatures sigh to be renewed.

Hints to Tattlers.—The heights and recesses of Mount Taurus are said to be much infested by eagles, who are never better pleased than when they can pick the bones of a crane. Cranes are prone to cackle and make a noise (Isa. xxxviii. 14), and particularly so while they are flying. The sound of their voices arouses the eagles, who spring at the signal, and often make the talkative travellers pay dearly for their imprudent chattering. The older and more experienced cranes, sensible of their besetting foible, and the peril to which it exposes them, take care, before venturing on the wing, to arm themselves each with a stone, large enough to fill the cavity of their mouths, and consequently to impose unavoidable silence on their tongues, and thus they escape the danger. Reader, hast thou an unruly tongue? Learn a lesson from the elder cranes, and to bridle thy tongue by watchfulness and prayer, that thou mayest say with the Psalmist: 'I said, I will take heed to my way, that I sin not with my tongue.'

Christians, help one another!—A teacher in one of the Southern States was sitting at the window of her room watching two negroes loading goods into a cart. One of them was disposed to shirk; the other stopped, and, looking sharply at the lazy one, said, 'Sam, do you expect to go to heaven?' 'Yes.' 'Then take hold and lift!'

Pray much.—Who ever knew a holy man who did not spend much of his time in prayer? Did ever a man exhibit much of the spirit of prayer, who did not devote much time to his closet? Whitefield says, 'Whole days and weeks have I spent, prostrate on the ground, in silent or vocal prayer.' 'Fall upon your knees, and grow there,' is the language of another, who knew whereof he affirmed.

Manner of Preaching.—A lady, recently, in giving her views of the preaching of a minister, to whom she had listened several times, said: 'I thought it was the business of the minister to feed the sheep. This man don't feed us; he only throws clubs and stones at us, and sends us bleating and hungry home.' Many a one might gather a useful hint from this, as to the proper mode of dealing with the flock of Christ. Harshness, severity, fault-finding, accomplish but little good in the family, the church, or the world. True, it is the pastor's duty to admonish and rebuke, to correct error and reform sin, but always in the spirit of the Master. A scolding minister never yet succeeded in anything, but in scattering the flock, and weakening his hold upon the affections of his people. There is a magazine of power in an affectionate spirit and kind words.

Dangers of the Age.—The Archbishop of York, in a recent sermon at St. Paul's, thus notices the four chief dangers of our existing high state of civilisation: First, The tendency to glory unduly in this material progress, forgetting the real littleness of man. Second, The temptation to seek and trust in riches; to enjoy our possessions, like Dives, without thinking of Lazarus lying at our doors,—a danger to which all were liable, the strugglers for wealth as well as the wealthy. Third, The sensuality of the age,—a sensuality peculiar in this respect, that it is generally united with strength and hardihood, the votary of manly exercises by day being also the votary of dissipation by night; a sensuality without softness, none the less perilous because less repulsive. Fourth, The ultimate danger consequent on all this,—of living for the present only, of substituting a blind materialism for the realization of the great verities of the eternal world.

Unstable.—Some are so unstable that they need not only to be anchored or fastened, but firmly wedged in, so as almost to deprive them of their liberty; otherwise they will be turned about with every wind of doctrine, and shift their position and their plans continually.

Experience.—Does experience teach fools? Hardly ever. It scarcely teaches the wise. One in a hundred, perhaps, learns by experience; the remaining ninety-nine go on repeating their old blunders, and following ways, or dispositions, or conceits that have already cost them dear.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'Ye have eaten the fruit of lies.'—HOSEA x. 13.

THE subject suggested by these words is, 'Lies, their fruit, and man's eating it;' or simply, 'Lies, and their fruit.' The word is used in a twofold sense,—a lie as to fact, and a lie as to doctrine; untrue report, and unsound teaching; false testimony, and false knowledge (or dogma). This falsity may be negative or positive; as, 'Ye shall not surely die,' and, 'Ye shall be as God.' The lie comes sometimes from man, sometimes from Satan, but never from God; for God is not a man that He should lie; never from the works of God, when rightly interpreted and understood.

By two great lies was man led away from God. By the same two lies has the estrangement been kept up. On these two lies the world has been feeding ever since the fall. Their fruit has been woe and death. These lies are those referred to above: the one a denial of Godhead-perfection, the other an assertion of creature-perfection; the one saying there is no such thing as sin and punishment, the other, there is no such thing as creaturehood limitation and dependency. 'Ye shall not die;' 'Ye shall be as God.'

These two lies God has written his Bible to contradict; for the whole divine word is a confutation of them. But the special confutation is to be seen in the life and death of the Christ of God. His death, as the Sin-bearer, said, 'Ye shall surely die;' and his life, as the dependent Son of man, showed that no circumstances, no progress, no knowledge, could ever make man God, the creature the Creator; but the human, however blessed, and holy, and wise, must ever be the human, and the divine the divine.

Israel's history, to which our passage refers, is the history of the fruit of lies. 'They believed not God,' is the accusation brought against them. They rejected the truth, they received the lie, and the fruit of this was judgment. Every sorrow that came on them was the fruit of a lie. Their last great sorrow,—the ruin of Jerusalem, and the slaughter of its citizens,—was the fruit of a lie. And are they not now, in their dispersion, eating the fruit of lies?

The world's history is the same. Our race has been eating the fruit of lies; not simply of sin, but of lies. The sorrows, sighs, tears, pains of our race are the fruit of lies,—the original lie of Paradise, and a thousand such since then. The sweating-toil of man, the travail-pangs of woman, the cries of suffering infancy,—what are they but the fruit of a lie? Yon tossing sickbed, yon weary deathbed ('the long day's dying'), yon swelling churchyard, yon shroud, yon coffin, yon funeral, yon open grave—what are they? The fruit of a lie. It is bitter, poisonous, long-lasting fruit. And the world's last days are no improvement upon its first, for in them comes 'the strong delusion that they should believe a lie.' What is every false religion, but the belief of a lie; and the judgments with which God has visited its professors, the eating the fruit of a lie? Anti-Christianity is the special and pre-eminent exhibition of the belief of a lie; and the doom of Antichrist will be the special and awful exhibition of 'eating the fruit of lies.'

Each soul's history resembles the above. It is the history of the belief of a lie—of a thousand lies. We begin to believe lies as soon as we can believe anything at all, and we act daily upon believed lies. The two original Satanic lies are continually coming up, and along with them myriads of others, all leading us astray. Each day brings forth the lie, the fruit, the eating thereof. Satan, or the world, or the flesh, or a friend, or a book, or a scene, whispers the lie; it is fair and specious; we believe it; it brings forth fruit; we eat of it; and the end is bitterness and disappointment. We 'feed on lies.'

What is pleasure, or lust, or revelry? It is the belief of a lie, the feeding on a lie. What is worldliness, the love of gaiety, the absorption of the heart in business? The belief of a lie, and the feeding on a lie. We persuade ourselves that this world is good, and pleasant, and excellent, and so we pursue it in preference to the world to come. But the belief of a lie is quickly followed up by disappointment, the sense of hollowness and dissatisfaction. God makes us thus eat of the fruit of lies, that we may be torn from them, and betake ourselves to the truth.

What keeps us from Christ? A lie, or lies. What makes us choose the broad way? A lie, or lies. What is unbelief, but the belief of a lie? Whence come our doubts and fears, but from the belief of lies in preference to the truth; nay, from our making God a liar, in not believing the record which He has given of his Son? Whence comes backsliding, or the loss of first love, but from our returning to the lie which we had rejected?

God in his gospel meets the lie, and all the lies which have sprung up on earth. He sends us the truth; He sends us the true One. And while He meets the lie, He does it in his own divine way. He says, 'Yes, ye shall not surely die; but not in the way you think. Death is the wages of sin; yet I bring life to the sinner,—everlasting life,—life through the belief of the truth, even as death came through the belief of a lie.' He says, 'Yes, ye shall be as gods, but not in your way. I will make you partakers of the divine nature, not by eating the forbidden tree, but by eating of Him, whose "flesh is meat indeed, and whose blood is drink indeed."'

What stress God lays on truth, and on our believing it! What sin He declares to be in a lie, and in our believing it! All untruth, all error, all false doctrine, as well as false statement, has in it the nature of a lie. Men in our day think man not responsible for the truth, and that there is no sin in the reception of error. God protests against this, and calls on men to receive truth, his truth, as expounded in his one revelation. He whom we call Lord is 'The Truth.' The anointing which we receive from Him is truth, and is no lie. The Spirit is the Spirit of truth. God loveth truth in every form and sense; He hateth a lie.

WHY SHOULD WE PRAY TO JESUS?

(Continued from p. 375.)

IV. BECAUSE He is our Prophet.—He reveals and teaches of heavenly things. Moses said of Him: 'A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things' (Acts iii.). 'God hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son' (Heb. i.), and commanded, 'This is my beloved Son; hear Him' (Matt. xvii.). Let us humbly wait on this heavenly Teacher and Revealer for his revelations and teachings in all things. 'No man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him' (Matt. xi.; Luke x.). And since He declares that thus to know is 'eternal life' (John xvii.), it is of essential importance for us to seek of Him this knowledge. He is the 'Sower of the seed:' we must ask Him to make his word effectual in our hearts, that it may make 'us clean,' and 'wise unto salvation;' and to give us his Spirit, whom, said He, 'I will send unto you, to guide you into all truth: He shall glorify me; for He shall receive of mine, and show it unto you' (John xv., xvi., xx.). Let us apply to this 'Teacher come from God,' who 'spake such gracious words as never man spake,' and 'taught, as one having authority,' the 'way of God in truth,' to teach and enable us to 'learn of Him' all the lessons of his 'doctrine' and his 'life.' 'Learn of me,' said He, to be 'meek and lowly;' learn 'the fear of the Lord,' his 'righteousness,' his 'statutes,' his 'ways,' his 'judgments,' etc., and so we shall truly be all 'taught of God' (John vi.). And with all our getting, let us get 'wisdom' and 'understanding' from Christ, who is 'the Wisdom of God,' and is 'made to us wisdom' (1 Cor. i.); and the more we feel our lack of wisdom, and know that 'counsel is his, and sound wisdom' (Prov. viii.), and that in Him 'are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge' (Col. ii.), let us ask of Him, for He 'giveth liberally, and upbraideth not' (Jas. i.). If we ask Him, He will 'open to us the Scriptures,' and also 'open our understanding to understand them' (Luke xxiv.).

V. Because He is our Priest.—'We have a great High Priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God,' 'whither, as the Forerunner, He is for us entered;' 'a Priest for ever;' 'who ever liveth to make intercession for us.' Let us 'draw near with a true heart,' and seek his intercession. He is 'a merciful and faithful High Priest, in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for our sins.' Let us obtain this reconciliation from Him. We may come boldly unto the throne of his grace; for He is 'faithful' over the house of God,' even 'as a son over his own house;' and is 'touched with the feeling of our infirmities,' and is able 'to succour them that are tempted.' He is the 'Author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him,' and is 'able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him.' Let us come by Him to God, and obtain salvation. He is 'the one Mediator between God and men;' 'the Mediator of a better covenant' for us, with 'better promises of good things to come.' 'By his own blood He entered into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.' Let us pray Him to mediate for us, and to 'sprinkle our hearts from an evil conscience,' and 'purge it from dead works,' and 'put away our sin by the sacrifice of himself;' and thus 'sanctifying us by his own blood,' 'by his one offering perfect us for ever' (Heb. ix. x.). Let us ask our High Priest for his blessing of 'forgiveness' and 'repentance' (Ps. xxxii.; Acts iii.). 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: and He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world' (1 John ii.). Shall we not confess all our sins, tell all our case, and all our needs, to our great Advocate and ever-prevailing Intercessor?

VI. Because He is our Judge.—'The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son: that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father' (John v.). Let us honour our Judge by addressing the 'Just One,' and acknowledging his justice, that all his judgments are 'just' and 'true'

(John v., viii.; Ps. cxxxvii.; Gen. xviii.; Rev. xvi.), by appealing to Him from the judgment of men,—'He that judgeth me is the Lord' (1 Cor. iv.),—and 'committing ourselves to Him that judgeth righteously' (1 Pet. ii.); entreating Him to enter not into judgment' (to condemnation) 'with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified' (Ps. cxliii.). 'Behold, the Judge standeth before the door;' let us ever wait on his judgment of our conduct, lest in anything we be 'condemned' (Jas. v.). Let us 'make supplication to our Judge,' and He will answer us (Job ix.). And as 'we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ, the Judge of quick and dead, and every one of us shall give account of himself' (Rom. xiv.; 2 Tim. i.), let us 'watch unto prayer' before Him, that we be not 'ashamed and confounded' at 'the great and terrible day of the Lord;' but seek of Him that 'preparation of heart' which will lead us 'to look for and hasten unto his coming,' so that He may 'present us unto himself holy and without blemish' (Eph. v.; Col. i.), and grant us 'the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give us at that day, and to all that love his appearing' (2 Tim. iv.).

VII. Because He invites us.—To 'come,' to 'look,' to 'call,' to 'ask,' to 'cry,' to 'seek,' to 'draw nigh' to the Lord, as well as the responsive echoes of 'holy men of old,' are so many invitations to prayer—'the heart's sincere desire, uttered or unexpressed.' A few passages are cited: 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. . . . Learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light' (Matt. xi.). Let us tell Him of the burden of our sins, and He will relieve us; and plead our readiness to learn of Him how to do well, and He will teach us. 'Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life' (John v.). 'Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out' (John vi.). 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. . . . This He spake of the Spirit' (John vii.; Rev. xxii.). Let us take Him at his promise, and ask Him for this life and Spirit. 'Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.' 'Unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear.' 'Surely in the Lord have I righteousness and strength; even to Him shall men come.' 'Seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you.' 'I said not unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain. I the Lord speak. Assemble yourselves and come; draw near and come.' 'Come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live; and I will make an everlasting covenant with you.' 'Seek ye the Lord while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near,' etc. (Isa. xlv., lv.; Matt. vii.). Let us look with that longing desire for his salvation and righteousness, which He will satisfy; for 'the Lord is nigh unto all that call upon Him: He will fulfil their desire: He will hear their cry, and will save them.' Indeed, He has promised, 'Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear' (Ps. cxlv.; Isa. lxv.). Again: 'Call unto me, and I will answer thee, and show thee great and mighty things.' 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me' (Jer. xxxiii.; Ps. l.). Now, this is the same Lord who says, 'Ye call me Master and Lord; and ye say well, for so I am' (John xiii.); and emphatically promises: 'Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye ask anything in my name, I will do it' (John xiv.). 'These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God. And this is the confidence that we have in Him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, He heareth us. And if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of Him' (1 John v.).

VIII. Because his disciples and others did so.—If, in the days of his humiliation, they had constant recourse to our blessed Lord for all earthly as well as spiritual blessings, how much more should not we now, in his exaltation! Let us then, like John, say, 'Lord, I have need to be baptized of Thee; for Thou baptizeth with the Holy Ghost' (Matt. iii.); or, like another, 'worship Him, saying, Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean,' and He will answer, 'I will; be thou clean' of the pollution of thy sins (Matt. viii.); or for a child, or friend, or servant, confessing our unworthiness, yet praying Him 'to speak the word only,' and the sick one shall be healed (Matt. viii.; Luke vii.). And so for any dear one afflicted in mind or body, and the Lord will answer us, 'I will come and heal him;' or He will commend our faith, and say, 'Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee;' or, at another time, He will give far beyond our asking, and say, 'Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee' (Matt. ix.). When like to perish, we may cry to Him, 'Lord, save: we perish!' and He will stretch forth his hand and save from sinking, or will say, 'Peace, be still' (Matt. viii.). If we have 'done or taught' anything in his name, let us tell Him all, acknowledging that we are 'unprofitable servants' (Mark vi.; Luke x., xvii.). We have also to ask Him: 'Lord, teach us to pray.' 'Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief;' for 'Jesus is the author and finisher of our faith' (Luke xi., xvii.; Heb. xii.). And we may say, 'Lord, remember me when' (or, now that) 'Thou comest into thy kingdom,' and He will answer, 'To-day' (or at such a time) 'shalt thou be with me in paradise' (Luke xxiii.). And when we ask Him to 'open our understanding to understand the Scriptures,' we shall have joyfully to confess: 'Did not our heart burn within us while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures?' (Luke xxiv.) And if He ask us, 'Will ye also go away?' we shall answer: 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life' (John vi.). And if He again ask, 'Lovest thou me?' shall we not answer: 'Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee?' (John xxi.) Then, if there is one to be chosen or set apart for the special work of the ministry, let the church pray Him: 'Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, show whether of these two Thou hast chosen (or sanctify this one), that he may take part of this ministry' (Acts i., xiv.). Or with Saul: 'Who art Thou, Lord? And the Lord answered, I am Jesus. And Saul said, Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' etc. 'Then Ananias said, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints: and here he hath authority to bind all that call on thy name,' etc. (Acts ix.). And with this same Paul, if a thorn in the flesh buffet us, we may 'beseech the Lord thrice that it may depart from me.' And He may say, 'My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness;' and we shall be enabled to say, 'Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me' (2 Cor. xii.). Ah! and at death, or if we have to suffer for his sake, may we, like Stephen, be enabled to say, as when he 'kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge.' 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit' (Acts vii.). 'He saith, I come quickly: Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus' (Rev. xxii.).

In conclusion.—If we have been baptized in the one 'name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' let us guard against conceiving the 'one' and only 'living and true God' as numerically three, by remembering the solemn words uttered by our blessed Lord, when his apostles asked: 'Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?' And then repeating that all his words and works were spoken and done in this spiritual unity of the Father and the Son (and Holy Ghost, as the Spirit of the Father and the Son, Rom. viii., Gal. iv.), He adds: 'And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it. If ye love me, keep my commandments' (John xiv.). So that we have freedom of approach to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit,—always bearing in mind that 'all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father' (John v.). This will guard us also from using the name of our Lord merely as a formula or talisman at the end of our prayers. The special relationship subsisting between the redeemed and their Lord, necessitates their special communion with Him, besides and under those glorious relations already noticed; also as their 'Master,' 'Husband,' or 'Bridegroom' of the bride the church, 'Brother,' and 'Friend;' requiring us to seek of Him to know and obey his will, to tell Him our confiding love and devotion, to express our oneness of mind and heart, and fellow-sympathies with Him in all holiness of walk and conversation.

A FRIEND IN NEED, AND A FRIEND INDEED.

'And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose and went to David into the wood, and strengthened his hand in God.'—1 Sam. xxiii. 16.

SAUL! Jonathan! David! what histories, associations, and lessons surround these names! Saul and Jonathan were much alike physically (2 Sam. i. 23), but they present a striking contrast morally considered. Saul was proud, morose, envious, and cruel; at least these things were developed in his character and conduct. Jonathan was humble, courteous, contented, and loving. The father was selfish; the son had a soul formed for friendship. But, leaving this contrast, let us consider Jonathan's character, his connection with David, and his last visit to David. In these three things we have a valuable character, a virtuous friendship, and a visit of mercy.

Jonathan was a valuable character,—a man you can but admire and love; one whose memory is fragrant, whose example is often quoted, and whose influence still acts for good. We believe that his excellences were the result of true religion, and that he was a man in whom the fear of God ruled. There are no drawbacks in his character, nothing repulsive. The proofs of piety are, we think, found in his faith in God (1 Sam. xiv. 6),—most likely referred to in Heb. xi. 34. The text before us indicates that he knew the reality of religion, and the sweetness of communion with God. The general fruitfulness of his character intimates the goodness of the root and the soundness of the tree. He acted aright in the various relations of life, and amidst very difficult circumstances.

In him we may trace the sufficiency and sovereignty of divine grace in forming, placing, and sustaining such an one in such a situation, and amidst such temptation. We also see in him the reward which true religion brings. How much happier was Jonathan than his father! He fell in with God's arrangements (1 Sam. xxiii. 17), Saul resisted them. In thus acting, Jonathan found peace, and had the smile of God. But observe the relative consequences of wrong conduct. Saul's disobedience towards God involved his noble son in much trouble, and at last brought him to an untimely grave. Thus, alas! it is still. Would that parents thought of their responsibility, and of the certainty of their influence, as being for good or evil!

But let us trace Jonathan's connection with David. Here we see him as a valuable friend. There is such a thing as friendship; it is a precious gift of God. The most beautiful specimens of friendship are found in the word of God; and, among them, that of Jonathan and David stands prominent. Their friendship was real; it was full of tenderness and delicacy. It was generous; Jonathan was ready to do anything for his friend, or give anything to him. He was not an exacting friend, or a jealous one. He gave David his armour, his heirship, his counsel, his tears. His soul was knit to David. In all these things there was a response on David's part. In them was fulfilled the ancient definition of friendship: 'One mind found in two bodies.' This tender, generous, mutual friendship was lasting. Job speaks of his friends as being like summer brooks; but in each of these two loving hearts there was a full-flowing spring, which no heat could dry up, or cold congeal. These streams mingled, made sweet music, and yielded much refreshment. It was a spiritual friendship. This crowns all, for such friendships will be eternal. Friends now often meet and mingle their tears and sighs together in woods of gloom and perplexity; but they will meet hereafter in the bowers of Paradise. One of the joys of heaven will be its sinless, its perfectly unselfish and ever-growing friendships.

The words before us refer to the last interview between those tried and tender friends. They did not know they were meeting for the last time, but so it was; and the testimony here borne is one of the most satisfactory of all, though the most sorrowful. David's circumstances at the time were truly trying. He had just escaped from the ungrateful city Keilah. Saul was seeking him every day. He was obliged to hide himself in steep rocks and forest caves. This was God's method of training him for his high destiny: first the anointing, next trials, and then honour and prosperity. Thus God acted with Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Elijah, and many others. He brings 'through fire and water into a wealthy place.'

In his solitary hiding-place Jonathan visited David. Thus God sends comfort to his people in the most trying circumstances,—sends it in a way most grateful to their feelings. He loves to surprise us with his kindnesses, and with the manner in which He does them. Surely David had reason to sing: 'In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul.'

Consider what was Jonathan's object in this visit. It was to 'strengthen David's hands in God.' This implies some casting down and sadness on David's part; and we know, both from his history and his Psalms, that he was at times cast down and disquieted, and once thought that he should 'one day perish,' and that 'there was but a step between him and death.' Jonathan encouraged him. He strengthened hands which hung down; he encouraged him still to pray, to hope, to wait, to persevere in the right path. We are even told what he said: 'Fear not: for the hand of Saul my father shall not find thee: and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee; and that also Saul my father knoweth.'

He reminded him of God's promises; pointed to his high destiny; told him to dismiss his fears, assuring him that all the efforts of his enemies would be in vain; in a word, that God was for him, and no one could really be against him to hurt him. Dear, kind Jonathan, who can help loving him! His efforts were not in vain. David was encouraged and strengthened; and the comfort which Jonathan thus administered to David, has flowed through him, by means of his sweet, inspiring Psalms, into millions of hearts. Some suppose that it was after this interview that David wrote the 31st Psalm, which concludes: 'O love the Lord, all ye his saints: for the Lord preserveth the faithful, and plentifully rewardeth the proud doer. Be of good courage, and He shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the Lord.'

We find also that, under circumstances still more trying than those we have been looking at, David encouraged himself in the Lord his God (1 Sam. xxx. 6); and who can tell the influence of Jonathan's words on that most depressing occasion!

Let us learn from all this to prize our spiritual friends, welcome their words of good cheer, and endeavour also to impart as well as receive. 'He that hath friends, must show himself friendly;' and 'there is a Friend who sticketh closer than a brother.'

Surely we should ever admire the love of Him, of whom even Jonathan was but a feeble type. Jesus loved us, not as Jonathan did David, because He saw much in us congenial; He loved us though He saw in us all that was repulsive. What sacrifices did He make—what dangers did He brave—what wrath did He endure! Truly 'his love was wonderful.' His condescension, his sympathy, his generosity, his undying tenderness, how marvellous! And still He visits us in our darkest scenes and greatest perplexities. No tangled thicket of perplexity can shut us out from his sight. He remembers his own trials and solitariness. He remembers the angel visit to Him in Gethsemane, and says, 'I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you.' May we have grace ever to realize and reciprocate the love of Christ!

THE FACE OF JESUS CHRIST.

Some of the most skilful painters have endeavoured to draw a fitting likeness of Christ. The effort is vain. There is no original visible to copy from, nor any picture of Christ, drawn when He was on earth, extant; nor can imagination now supply anything worthy of Him who is 'fairer than the children of men.'

There is one portrait of Christ, engraved very beautifully, which is said to be taken from a model, or coin of extreme antiquity; but no dependence can be placed even on this. Could we have, what we know we cannot have, a real likeness of Christ as He appeared on earth, exact in every feature, no good end would be answered by this. Curiosity might be gratified by looking at it, but no saving effects would follow such gazing as this. The owner of such a painting, who had looked at it thousands of times with the enthusiasm of an antiquary, might live and die the moral antipodes of Him whose literal likeness he had so often contemplated.

When the apostle speaks of 'the face of Jesus Christ,' there is no reference to his mere human countenance. That, doubtless, was most expressive and noble, however it might have been marred by grief, or indented with the deep lines of sorrow. It is to his character as growing out of his wondrous person, and including his saving offices, that the apostle refers in this term. There it is that 'the glory of God' is seen, even the noblest displays of himself that He ever made. Now, what is there in the face, or character of Jesus, to warrant this strong assertion? Just as the face of a man is formed to express the inward workings of his soul, so the character of Christ is exhibited to reveal God's glory,—that is, to make known and communicate those infinite excellences which are found in Him. In Jesus we trace intelligence, benignity, grandeur, compassion, and everything else beautiful and blessed. In that epistle in which this thought is introduced (see 2 Cor. iv. 6), there are three other points mentioned, to which we do well to give constant heed. The first is, that, by gazing on the glory of God in the face of Christ Jesus, 'we are changed into the same image.' Thus, and only thus, comes moral transformation (2 Cor. iii. 18). From the same verse we learn that the Holy Spirit's special office is thus to reveal and glorify Jesus, and that He delighteth to do this in the hearts and characters of all the redeemed. The third and contrast fact is brought out in the next chapter, which is, that Satan's constant aim is to prevent this contact. He ever labours to hinder sinners from 'looking unto Jesus.' He blinds the minds of his subjects, lest this light should shine into them; and we are sure that he will also labour to hinder true believers from 'looking unto Jesus.' If we would be in sympathy with the Holy Spirit, and in opposition to Satan; if we would fall in with God's design, and become more and more like Christ, there is no other way but to be ever studying 'the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.' Another great and blessed result will follow. Being transformed, by continually looking thus, we shall become reflectors of his glory, yea, through his grace, be the instruments of transforming others.

'Saviour, with thoughts of Thee,
What various feelings swell,
Thy portrait when we see,
And on its features dwell!
We wonder, tremble, trust, adore;
Are filled with awe, yet love Thee more!'

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

THE DESERT JOURNEY.

Words by Horatius Bonar, D.D. Music from Hastings.

Met. 80 = ♩
Treble.
Alto.
Tenor.
Bass.
Accomp
Safe a - cross the wa - ters, Here in peace we Safe a - cross the wa - ters, Here in peace we stand, See the wrecks of E - gypt Strew'd a - long the stand, See the wrecks of E - gypt Strew'd a - long the

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

sand, Safe a - cross the wa - ters, Foes for e - ver gone.
sand. Safe a - cross the wa - ters, Foes for e - ver gone.
Now we march in safe - ty, God our guide a - lone.
Now we march in safe - ty, God our guide a - lone.

'Tis the silent desert,
Sand and rock and waste;
But the chain is broken,
And the peril past.
Onward, then, right onward!
This our watchword still;
Till we reach the glory
Of the wondrous hill.

For the journey girded,
Haste we on our way;
The pillar-cloud above us,
Guide by night and day.

On through waste and blackness,
O'er our desert road;
On till Sinai greets us,
Mountain of our God.

On past Edom's valley,
Moab's mountain-wall,
Jordan's sea-broad rushings,
The pillar-cloud o'er all.
Past the palm-shaded city,
Rock and hill our road;
On till Salem greets us,
City of our God!

THE WALDENSES IN 1866.

BY THE REV. A. H. R. HEBDEN, EAST FARLEIGH.

(Continued from p. 395.)

SEPTEMBER 18*th*.—We left La Torre about 7 A.M., and a three hours' walk, for the most part up hill, brought us to the vicarage of Prarustin, which, together with the church of that parish, is situated at a hamlet called San Bartholomeo. The name of the parish, Prarustin, in Italian signifies a burnt field, indicating the heat and drought which prevail here in the summer. In consequence of its climate, this parish is particularly suited for the growth of the vine. Vineyards will flourish where other crops would fail from the drought. Accordingly, the mountain slopes of Prarustin, facing towards the plain of Piedmont, are entirely covered with vineyards. We had intended to continue our journey as far as Perosa, but the vicar of Prarustin, Mr. Parrender, invited us to spend the day at his house, and continue our walk to Perosa on the morrow. We accepted his kind offer of hospitality, and very much enjoyed the day at San Bartholomeo. In the afternoon he took us for a walk through some vineyards in the neighbourhood of San Secondo, where the owners, his parishioners, asked us to taste the different kinds of grapes, and gave us permission to eat as many as we pleased. Mr. Parrender was supplied with an abundance of fruit by his parishioners, who were bringing him presents every day. The sides of the mountains here command very extensive views across the plain of Piedmont. The houses at Turin can be seen, thirty miles off. Immediately below are the towns of Pinerolo and San Secondo; farther to the south, Cavour and Saluzzo.

The little town of San Secondo was garrisoned, during the war following the massacres of 1655, by 800 Irish Papists. The Vaudois took it by assault, and put the whole garrison to the sword. The wretches had massacred their wives and children, and committed such horrible barbarities that they gave them no quarter.

There is a Vaudois church at Pinerolo, and a congregation of 300, about one-third of whom were formerly Roman Catholics, the rest emigrants from the valleys. The work of evangelization, we were told, is more slow and difficult in those parts of Italy immediately adjoining the valleys, than in more distant parts. At Pinerolo there was in former days a kidnapping institution, —a convent of monks, whose business was to steal the children of the Waldenses, and bring them up Papists. The bishop of Pinerolo lately tried to hinder the building of a new church at Perero, in the valley of St. Martin, and somehow obtained an order from the government to stop the building. However, after a delay of twenty months, the prohibition was cancelled, and the building proceeded with. The church, when we saw it, was completed, and the 10th of October last fixed for the opening services.

The commune of Roccapiatta, containing 300 people, is a part of Mr. Parrender's parish, and has a chapel of ease, in which service is held once a month. This commune is the upper part of the parish, and is entirely Protestant. In the whole parish there are very few Romanists. Mr. Parrender has a congregation of about 600 on Sabbaths at the parish church at San Bartholomeo. His is a laborious parish. He has fatiguing walks about the mountains, which in the winter are sometimes dangerous as well as fatiguing. On winter days, when he has to go a long distance through the snow, his wife sometimes watches anxiously for his return, fearful, if he has been away many hours, that he may have met with some accident. Mr. Parrender and others of his brethren in the ministry, whose acquaintance we made during our short tour, appeared to be men both of real piety, and also of superior talent. Roccapiatta, being higher up on the mountains than San Bartholomeo, is not always accessible in winter, and the stated service once a month in the chapel of ease cannot be held there with perfect regularity.

September 19*th*.—We took leave of our kind friends, Mr. and Mrs. Parrender, and continued our journey. The vicar accompanied us as far as the bounds of his parish, and the greater part of the way to San Germano. It is a descent of an hour and a half. We were shown a mill in the little valley, between San Bartholomeo and Roccapiatta, where, two years ago, the people were buried under snow for three weeks. No assistance could be rendered them, and the miller's wife died of hunger.

At San Germano we dined at an inn called Albergo di cheval d'oro, where Mr. Parrender authorized us to make use of his name with the landlady. They gave us an excellent dinner at moderate cost. We called on the minister, Mr. Bonjour. He is an old man, and was preparing to remove to Pinerolo. The charge of a mountain parish is too arduous for him at his advanced age. We tried to find out a doctor at San Germano who is a great botanist, and acquainted with all the flora of the Alps, but he was not at home.

It is an easy walk of about an hour and a half from San Germano to Perosa, along the valley of Perosa. On the right bank of the river Clusone the people are Protestants, on the left bank Papists. In former times there were many Protestants on the left bank also, but persecution has succeeded in eradicating the Protestant faith from that side of the valley, which is the most fertile, as the mountain sides have a southern exposure. Perosa is a small Roman Catholic town; Pomaretto, on the opposite bank of the Clusone, a Protestant village. There is no inn at Pomaretto, so we got beds at the Albergo Nationale at Perosa.

Both at San Germano and Perosa we found that the servants at the inn did not speak French; so we were obliged always to speak to the landlord or hostess for everything we wanted, not understanding the Piedmontese.

On leaving Perosa next morning, we called at the vicarage at Pomaretto. Mr. Lantaret, the minister, is now moderator of the Vaudois church. He presides in the annual synod, held at La Torre, when the clergy and lay representatives of the Vaudois church assemble to deliberate upon church matters. The moderator's office is an annual one; but he generally holds it more than one year. At Mr. Lantaret's we saw Professor Revel, of the Vaudois college at Florence, who had been paying him a visit. The day before, they had been to see Mr. Jalein, minister of Villa Seca, in the valley of St. Martin, who had just lost his son by cholera at Genoa. The death of young Mr. Jalein, pastor at Genoa, was considered a great loss to his church. He was a young man of great talents and piety, only twenty-seven years of age. Mr. Lantaret invited us to spend the next night at his house, on our return from Massello and La Balsille. Soon after passing Pomaretto, we had a delicious bath in the little torrent called the Germanasque, which flows through the valley of St. Martin. The Germanasque, coming from the valley of St. Martin, flows into the Clusone at Perosa. We were told that a gentleman had been drowned two years ago, whilst bathing in this stream. It is not safe to bathe in the torrents in places where there is a strong current, which will suck a person under. We came to Perero about noon, and dined there; and from there to Massello there is only a mountain track, ascending through a wild valley. After passing Perero, the valley of St. Martin divides into two small valleys; and there is a road to the left, leading to Rodoretto and Prali. We arrived at Massello about 3 P.M.; and the clergyman not being at home, the schoolmaster offered to show us La Balsille. This natural fort is at the head of the valley, about one hour's walking above Massello. Here 500 men, under Henri Arnaud, defended themselves for a year (1689) against 22,000 French and Piedmontese troops, under the Marquis d'Ombraille. We were shown grooves in the rocks, which the French general had made to bring his cannon up to La Balsille. The schoolmaster took delight in describing the exploits of his countrymen, the defenders of this stronghold. There are scarcely any Papists in these parts; and of the few there are, we did not hear a very good character, for we were told that they are drunk every Sabbath.

On our way down from the Balsille, we met the clergyman, Mr. Cardon, on his way home. We walked back with him to Massello, and he entertained us at his house for the night, and showed us the greatest kindness. Nothing could be kinder than the hospitality we met with at Italian parsonages. Mr. Cardon is one of the younger ministers. His parish is called a mountain parish, as distinguished from lower districts. The younger ministers are appointed first to a mountain parish, and, after some years' service, are transferred to a lower district. Mr. Cardon has been six years at Massello. He was before employed for some time in evangelization in Piedmont and Liguria. The parish of Massello is not considered such an arduous post as that of Prali, in the other part of the valley of St. Martin, which is at a higher elevation. Mr. Cardon showed us, however, that a part of the path by which we passed in company with him, on our return from the Balsille, is dangerous in winter from the snow. At Prali, the minister has very arduous work to visit his sick in winter time. Very few horses or mules are kept about here; and when a new minister takes up his abode at Massello, his furniture is carried up from Perero on the backs of his parishioners. The people are too poor to keep horses or mules. They say these animals do not bring in the same kind of return to their owners as cows or goats. All labour is done by the hand. Mr. Cardon regretted that, when a forest was cut down near his village, the opportunity had not been taken to make a good road to Perero. He said it would have paid the people, by making their produce so much more valuable. The growth of wood has been diminished in some places, by clearing away the whole of a forest, instead of leaving a part,—in which case the wood ceases to grow to as great an elevation as before. The principal food of the Vaudois peasants is maize; and even when maize has been scarce, so as to become dearer than wheat, they have still preferred it, as they say it supports them for a longer time than wheat. Porridge made of maize, which we once ate for breakfast, is very nice. After the maize is reaped, it is hung up outside the houses, in large quantities, looking like bundles of carrots, and is dried by the heat of the sun. A large quantity of pumpkins are grown in the peasants' gardens; and, where the elevation is not too great, chestnuts form an important part of their produce. In some of the lower districts, where silkworms are kept, the mulberry-trees are of the greatest importance to the people; and the disease in the mulberries has been a serious loss. We saw many peasants storing up leaves to feed their cattle during the winter; they have not sufficient hay. We saw vineyards on the mountain sides, in very steep places, where it has been necessary to construct artificial terraces and walls to support them. In some places fields have been formed artificially with earth carried on the peasants' backs, to spread out on the bare rock. The upper part of the valley of St. Martin above Perero, and the Protestant side of the valley of Perosa, having a northern exposure, are too cold for vines. Mr. Cardon has a property at Prarustin, and vineyards. The wine of Piedmont is very pleasant to the taste; it contains very little alcohol, and is extremely cheap.

September 21st.—We made a little détour on the way back to Perero and Pomaretto, in order to visit Maneglia. Our good friend Mr. Cardon gave us an introduction to Mr. Gonin, minister of Maneglia. We rested a while at his house, and he accompanied us a short distance on our way towards Perero. Mr. Gonin is the only pastor in the valleys who has light duty. He has but 300 parishioners; for the inhabitants of some hamlets in this part of the valley of St. Martin are Papists. He told us that there is very great poverty in his parish. He complained of having too little work, and hopes to be appointed to the new church at Perero. We looked into this church on our way. It is a plain building, as the Vaudois churches always are, and contains accommodation for 300 persons. The parish of Villa Seca is far too extensive, and will be divided.

We received a hearty welcome at Pomaretto from the moderator, Mr. Lantaret, and his family. We had an interesting conversation with him about the Vaudois and the prospects of religion in Italy. The Vaudois pastors also take great interest in hearing about church matters in England. A circumstance Mr. Lantaret related, shows how the Vaudois were oppressed so recently as the present century. In 1837, Mr. Muston, pastor of Rodoretto, was exiled, and compelled to take refuge in France, on account of having published a history of the evangelical churches of Piedmont. 'At that time,' said Mr. Lantaret, 'it was not permitted to us to write, and scarcely to defend ourselves when attacked.' In speaking of the Pope and the Roman question, Mr. Lantaret argued thus: 'The Italians have had the benefit of the Pope residing amongst them for many centuries. It is time he should take up his residence for a while in some other country. If it is an advantage to Italy to have had his presence so long, other countries may well expect to share the benefit; and if the Pope's presence is considered an incumbrance, other countries ought to take their share of the burden. Spain might well give up to him one of the Balearic Isles, as a suitable residence.' The Vaudois have churches and congregations now at Florence, Pisa, Leghorn, Milan, Brescia, besides Turin and Genoa. They have missionaries in other places, and congregations worshipping in rooms. Mr. Lantaret said they cannot build churches everywhere, because they have not funds to do it. Ground is very valuable, and building is very expensive, in the great cities.

Pomaretto is one of the four parishes which are reckoned to the Val Perosa; the others being San Germano, Pramol, and Prarustin. The parishes of the Val San Martino are five: Villa Seca, Maneglia, Massello, Rodoretto, and Prali. Six parishes belong to Val Luzerna, viz.: San Giovanni, La Torre, Angrogna, Villaro, Bobbio, Roras. Thus the whole Vaudois territory consists of fifteen parishes. The church of Pomaretto has inscribed on the wall, besides a text of Scripture, the arms and motto of the Vaudois church, viz., a candle lighted in the midst of darkness, and the motto, 'Lux lucet in tenebris;' or, 'The light shineth in darkness.' There is a hospital (Protestant) at Pomaretto, and a Latin school.

September 22d.—We walked back to La Torre through San Germano, and across the mountains. From the Saturday evening, when we reached La Torre, to the following Friday, when we left for Turin, it rained almost continuously. We had intended, during these days, to have explored more thoroughly the valley of Luzerna and enjoyed its fine air and scenery, to have visited again Angrogna and Roras, and made some sketches in the neighbourhood; but the weather confined us almost entirely to our hotel.

On Sabbath, September 30th, we had the pleasure of attending Mr. Meille's church at Turin, and heard him preach a most able sermon, in French, on the text: 'To obey is better than sacrifice' (1 Sam. xv. 22).

On the following day we left Turin, to return to England, retaining in our minds many pleasing memories, and not without some profitable reflections, arising out of our visit to, and intercourse with, 'the Israel of the Alps.' May the light which shines in darkness shine more and more unto the perfect day, that the people of Italy may be delivered from superstition and priestcraft, and may be elevated morally, socially, spiritually, through the influence of the pure gospel of Christ!

THE CHRISTIAN RACE.

'Let us run with patience the race that is set before us.'—Heb. xii. 1.

THERE is meaning and power in the very wording of inspiration, which will amply repay the closest inspection, and yet which will constantly escape the mere surface reader. The apostle, having set before us the example of patriarchs and saints under the old dispensation, as a stimulus and encouragement, winds up with the exhortation: 'Therefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us run with patience the race that is set before us.' There is, in the figure here used, a combination of no ordinary nature—namely, running with patience. The very fact of running implies eagerness, and a measure of excitement; and its natural accompaniment is impatience at obstacles, or hindrances of any kind. Calmness and deliberation are qualities scarcely expected of a man engaged in a race; yet this difficult combination is the high attainment set before the Christian. He is to run, but he is to run patiently; he is to be diligent, but not impetuous; he is to be zealous, yet never eager; he is to be full of fire, yet ever calm; he is to be 'always abounding in the work of the Lord,' yet he is never to make haste; he is to be instant in season and out of season, yet all his things are to be done with charity. How wonderful was the life of our blessed Master, considered in this one particular! Of Him it was written: 'The zeal of thine house hath even eaten me up;' and He could say of himself: 'My meat and my drink is to do the will of Him that sent me, and to finish his work.' Yet, when was He ever in haste? When did any pressure of labour, or any complication of trials, find Him with a ruffled spirit? When was any amount of public service allowed to be a hindrance to private communion with his Father? When did the consciousness of the enormity of the work He had undertaken so press upon Him, as to make Him unmindful of present duty? When did He manifest any reluctance for anything, however irksome or painful, which came upon Him in the course of providence, as his Father's will? or when did He exhibit any preference as to the sphere of his labour or his external circumstances? To Him, doubtless, the exchange of communion with God for the instruction of the ignorant multitudes, or even the society of his chosen disciples, was more of an effort than the most spiritually minded of his followers can conceive. Yet, when can a movement of impatience be detected in Him, or a restless desire to be alone? Dwelling in the bosom of the Father, incessantly occupied with the noblest and grandest projects, He is yet at liberty for every cavilling scribe, every dull disciple, every poor erring woman, and even for the little unconscious child. We shall best discover our own shortcomings by comparing ourselves with this perfect example. If we are glowing and earnest in our Lord's work, how easily does our zeal degenerate, and become tainted with some form of selfishness! How impatient we become of delay! How we chafe under the lack of sympathy on the part of our brethren, or the misconceptions which may be formed concerning ourselves! How we murmur under disappointment! Are we, on the other hand, cultivating a cautious, even-spirited frame? Then how apt we are to lose somewhat of our vigour, to abate the earnestness of our spiritual warfare! How often shall we be tempted to sacrifice purity to peace! What danger of mistaking love of our own ease for Christian patience, and indifference for charity! Surely the best Christian living will find need to turn this exhortation into prayer!

SINS LESS AND GREATER.

A GREAT many of the Mosaic precepts take up the relative guilt of certain acts; and it is only by keeping this in view that we see how, while condemning one sin, they give no countenance to another that resembles it. When they announce the penalty due to a certain sin, they do not mean that all the other sins of a like class are not to be visited with any penalty. It is an awful truth, that all sin deserves the curse; but still it is to be remembered that some sins in themselves, and by reason of aggravations, are more heinous in the sight of God than others.

When God said to Israel, 'Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant that is poor and needy' (Deut. xxiv. 14), He did not mean to intimate that they might lawfully oppress one who was not poor and needy; but merely that the oppression of the poor was the greater sin—sin not to be tolerated.

When God said, 'Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger' (Deut. xxiv. 17), He did not mean to say that they might pervert the judgment of any who was not a stranger; but that the one was greater guilt than the other.

When God said, 'Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way' (Deut. xxvii. 18), He did not mean to say that they were at liberty to make anybody else wander out of the way.

When God said, 'Cursed be he that smiteth his neighbour secretly' (Deut. xxvii. 24), He did not mean to imply that they might smite their neighbours openly.

When God said, 'Thou shalt not curse the deaf' (Lev. xix. 14), He did not give them liberty to curse everybody else.

When God said, 'Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour' (Lev. xix. 13), He did not countenance their defrauding everybody else.

When God said, 'Thou shalt not take a wife to her sister, to vex her, besides the other in her lifetime' (Lev. xviii. 18), He did not intend to give liberty to take the sister after the wife's death; but merely that the one was much worse than the other; that, while the one might be tolerated, or winked at, because of the hardness of their hearts, the other could not be tolerated, but must be prohibited and punished. This is the true solution of this much contested passage. It gives no countenance at all to the unholy affinities for which some in our day contend.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'He went upon his way rejoicing.'—Acts viii. 39.

He was a heathen; he had lived among heathen; he was returning to his heathen brethren and a heathen land; yet 'he went upon his way rejoicing.' He had not become richer in earth's goods; he had not been loaded with the world's honours; he had not secured an alliance with the Roman emperor; yet 'he went upon his way rejoicing.' So should it be with us. This is the description of a Christian's life and walk on earth.

I. Where did his joy come from?—He had not brought it with him. He had come up on the mere report that went abroad through heathendom, of the temple, and altar, and sacrifices at Jerusalem. He was but groping his way to the true mercy-seat. He seems to have left Jerusalem much as he came, with but a glimmer of light. Where, then, did his joy come from? It came from what he heard from Philip, or rather, from what he read in Isaiah. But how did that statement bring him joy? It told him of a Sin-bearer, long-predicted, come at length. It was the knowledge of this Sin-bearer that sent him home on his way rejoicing. There had previously been a burden and a sorrow upon him. Sin oppressed him. Unpardoned sin made him a sorrowful man. He had come from Ethiopia to Jerusalem with this burden; he was going away with it, much as he came, when the Holy Spirit turned his eye to the Sin-bearer, the Lamb of God. He saw that the sin-bearing work was done; he accepted the divine testimony to that finished work; and, in the acceptance of that testimony, he found immediate joy. That testimony was to him a joyful sound. 'He went upon his way rejoicing.' What he read was as blessed as it was true.

II. Where should our joy come from?—From the same testimony to the same finished work. The passage of Scripture may be different,—that matters not. There are a thousand passages and a thousand testimonies, all bearing on the one cross, the one propitiation, the one Lamb of God, the one blood, the one sacrifice. Any one of these testimonies, in the hand of the Holy Spirit, can pour in gladness into the soul. The sinner is not happy. His sin comes between him and joy. The more he knows of sin, the more his sorrow increases, the heavier his burden grows. That burden must be removed ere he can taste of joy; and it can only be removed by approaching the cross. The hand of the crucified One is the only hand which can lift it off. The sorrowful soul looks to the cross, and is lightened. That which he sees there speaks peace to him, and bids him go upon his way rejoicing. The source of peace is one for former ages and for this. There is but one well of living water, one treasure-house of joy.

We are called to make use of this storehouse of joy. If we do not, we sin. We despise the provision which God has made for the sinner's joy. It is a free and open fulness, and great is our guilt if we remain unfilled. It is our sin, as well as our calamity, if we go not 'on our way rejoicing.' God means us to be joyful men. He has made provision for our being so. He calls on us to be so. He makes the refusal to be joyful one item of our condemnation.

How, then, does it happen that so few are like this Ethiopian ruler? The question is much more momentous than is generally supposed. For it is generally assumed that a Christian man may be all right, and yet have no joy. Why, then, is there so little joy among Christians?

(1.) Not because God does not wish them to have it.—It is not forbidden fruit. He has again and again bidden them rejoice and be glad. He has not left us in doubt as to what is his will upon this subject.

(2.) Not because joy dishonours Him.—Popery may say so, because her object is to keep men in bondage; but the gospel does not say so. Gloom dishonours God, joy honours Him. It speaks well of Him, and shows men what a God of goodness and grace He is.

(3.) Not because joy is not safe for us to have.—True joy is the safest of all things. It makes a man stedfast and earnest. It enables him to keep his balance in this world. It makes him strict and circumspect. It is one of God's ways for keeping us in the narrow way. It is the Christian's true ballast.

(4.) Not because God's sovereignty interposes.—God's sovereignty no more comes between a Christian man and joy, than it comes between him and holiness. It no more keeps a man sorrowing, than it keeps him sinning. It is a libel on God's sovereignty to say that it keeps a man from rejoicing in the Lord.

(5.) Not because joy was not meant for these days.—Some say it was only meant as a cordial for days of persecution, not for the church's more prosperous times. How untrue! Joy was for all times, circumstances, ages,—the last as well as the first. 'Rejoice in the Lord always.'

(6.) Not because it unnerves us for work.—'The joy of the Lord is our strength.' There is nothing so unnerving as gloom and depression, nothing so invigorating and strengthening as joy. We work with far greater success and earnestness when full of joy. Joy stimulates and strengthens.

Nay, it is one of the fruits of the Spirit; it is repeatedly recommended by the apostles; it was practised by the early churches; it is one of the special marks of a believing man, 'whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.' The possession of it makes us shine as lights in the world, and attracts men to Christ. Oh, how it cheers, sustains, strengthens, revives us from day to day!

It is joy from God, joy in God; it is THE JOY OF GOD. To all this we are called.

That which we believe is full of joy,—'glad tidings of great joy.' Should we not, then, go 'upon our way rejoicing?'

That which we possess is full of joy. The present favour and love of God; the unsearchable riches of Christ.

That which we hope for is full of joy. We hope for a coming Lord, for resurrection-glory, for an everlasting city and kingdom. Should we not go 'on our way rejoicing?'

Ah! surely we do injustice to Christ, to his grace, to his word, to his gospel, if we are not joyful. We misrepresent Him. We bring up a false report of Him, and of his pleasant land.

CHRIST'S OWN PEACE.

BY THE EDITOR.

'Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.'—JOHN xiv. 27.

SURELY 'never man spake like this man!' Well might men wonder at 'the gracious words which proceeded out of his lips.' Grace was poured into his lips, and out of his lips grace flowed forth to the sons of men. He had the tongue of the learned, that He might speak words in season to the weary; and blessed were the words He spake to such.

Never did any one enter so deeply and tenderly into our feelings; anticipating, with his words of sympathy and consolation, every sorrow and want. What love is here! What thoughtfulness and sympathy! What majesty too! For who but One who knew that He had come from God, and went to God,—that He himself was the infinite source of peace,—could say, 'Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid?' The words here uttered are certainly the assurance to us of the love and power of the Promiser. What He has promised, He is able also to perform.

The words are still fresh and new. They can never grow old; for He who spoke them is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' They were spoken for us in these last days, as for the ages past. Christ meant us when He uttered them.

Mark here—(1.) The legacy; (2) The gift; (3) The contrast; (4) The consolation.

I. The legacy.—'Peace I leave with you.' This is the parting gift of One who was about to depart. He himself was bidding farewell; but He was not to take his peace away along with Him. He brought it when He came ('Peace on earth'), and He leaves it behind Him as a heavenly relic. His presence had been the source of peace to them, and his absence was not to dry it up. That source would remain the same. Present or absent, far off or near, on earth or in heaven, He was still to be the Fountain of their peace. The world would be a blank without Him, no doubt; but He was leaving behind Him a peace which would cheer and gladden. It was not all that they had when He was with them, nor was it all they were to have when He returned; but still it was much,—enough to comfort, to bless, to shed light upon the darkness of their way. In the world there was to be tribulation, in Him peace. The peace of God was to rule in their hearts. They were to abide in peace, and peace in them.

II. The gift.—'My peace I give unto you.' This is evidently something in addition to the former clause. The peace is not merely something left, but positively given: 'I give.' It is not lent or sold, but given; it is Christ's own gift—free and unconditional. His peace is, like himself, a gift to us—unsolicited, unpurchased, unmerited. But the striking expression here is, 'My peace;' Christ's own peace; peace altogether peculiar; transcending in nature and in fulness all other peace. What, then, was Christ's peace?

(1.) It was the peace of a conscience on which there never rested the shadow of a sense of guilt.—It was pre-eminently 'a good conscience,' a conscience void of offence. Whence comes our dispeace? From a sense of guilt upon the conscience. It is an evil conscience that disquiets us. The least speck or shadow of guilt breaks our peace. Now, in Jesus there was the perfection of a good conscience. Not a shadow ever rested there. It is a blessed thought that there was once here a Man like ourselves, whose conscience was never touched with the slightest stain of guilt; who never had to regret one thought, or recall one word, or wish one action undone. What must have been the peace possessed by Him,—profound, unutterable,—even in the midst of a stormy world! It is into this profound peace of conscience that He would lead us. Of that very peace He would make us partakers. The result of our 'receiving' Him, or 'believing on his name,' is to bring us into that same state of conscience and of peace which He, who knew no sin, possessed. Our vessels are indeed small, and can contain little; his was large, and could contain much. But the kind or quality of that peace which fills them is the same. He has made peace by the blood of his cross; yea, He is our peace; and as soon as we come to know this, and take Him as our peace, we are made partakers, not merely of peace, but of that which He here calls 'My peace.'

(2.) It was the peace of One entirely obedient to the Father's will.—It was to do that will that He came, and his life was the doing of it. 'I delight to do thy will, O my God.' 'Not my will, but thine be done.' As in all obedience there is peace, so in obedience to such a will, from such a Being as the Son, there must have been a peace passing all understanding; a peace altogether infinite; a peace proportioned to the entireness and perfection of the obedience. Such an obedience had never been rendered before; and such a peace had never been possessed, either on earth or heaven, by man or angel. It is into this peace that He leads us,—peace perfect and profound; peace not springing from nor proportioned to our obedience, but to his; the peace of which his obedience to the Father is at once the foundation and the measure.

(3.) It was the peace of One, whose peculiar constitution of person made Him partaker of peculiar peace.—He was 'the Word made flesh;' Son of God, and Son of man; and, as such, He was a vessel of infinite dimensions, capable of containing a peace such as no one else could do. Into this vessel, of infinite capacity, all fulness of peace was poured by the Father; and out of this vessel this peace is poured into us,—not to the same extent, but still in proportion to our capacity. It is of the divine peace of the God-man that we are made partakers. What peace is there like this? As the grapes of Eshcol were of peculiar delicacy, and the cedars of Lebanon of peculiar beauty, and the gardens of Solomon of peculiar fertility and fragrance,—so was this peace, which filled the Christ of God, peculiarly excellent; and of this peculiar peace He gives his saints the promise: 'My peace I give unto you.'

(4.) It was the peace of One, whose peculiar relationship to the Father made Him possessor of peculiar peace.—There is something in filial peace, the peace of a son, as resulting from the connection between his father and himself, and his own peculiar standing in the house, which cannot well be described. How much more is this true of the peace of Him who is the only-begotten Son of God! His must have been peace as special as it was infinite,—the peace poured into the bosom of the beloved Son by the Father himself. This is not the peace of a servant, or a friend, but the peace of a Son—and such a Son! This divine and filial peace, the peace of the only-begotten of the Father, He makes over to us as his free gift: 'My peace I give unto you.' And this becomes all the truer and more blessed when they to whom He gives the peace are themselves sons of God. The Father pours a special peace from his paternal bosom into the bosom of his beloved Son; and that Son pours this special peace into the bosom of those who are partakers of his Sonship—truly sons of God!

(5.) It was a peace that could never be destroyed.—The peace is like himself, and like Him from whom He receives it,—eternal and unchangeable,—peace partaking of his character as the Eternal One, 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' It is peace begun now—given even here; it is peace to be perpetuated in the eternal kingdom; peace without end, or interruption, or change, for ever.

Such is Christ's gift to his own. It is precious, perfect, divine. It is like himself. It is a peace which passeth all understanding. What a treasure for earth! And what an earnest of the fuller treasure in store for us, when He comes again! For great as is the peace which He gives just now, it is nothing to the peace in reserve for us hereafter. He gives it to his own, and He bids all men draw near and become his own. 'Come unto me, and I will give you rest,' is his first message; and his second is like unto it: 'My peace I give unto you.'

III. The contrast.—'Not as the world giveth, give I unto you.' In all aspects there is a contrast between Christ and the world, with nothing of likeness or sympathy. But it is not of himself that He here speaks, but of his gifts, and manner of giving. Christ's peace and the world's are opposites, so are his giving and the world's.

As to the peace,—

(1.) Christ's peace is perfect, the world's is partial and imperfect; no depth, no greatness about it. It is and has been a poor, meagre thing at its best.

(2.) Christ's peace reaches the conscience, the world's does not. It soothes the conscience asleep, but that is all. It intoxicates, but gives no rest to the inner man. It is not the offspring of a purged and pacified conscience.

(3.) Christ's peace is satisfying, the world's unsatisfying. The peace which comes, in any way, from any region of this evil world, cannot fill. It meets none of our spirit's cravings and longings. It does not feed our hunger or quench our thirst. It leaves us as empty as before. It speaks peace when there is none.

(4.) Christ's peace is steady, the world's wavering. The world itself is unstable, and so are all its gifts, especially that of peace. This is easily ruffled, easily broken, ever changing.

(5.) Christ's peace is holy, the world's unholy.

(6.) Christ's peace is everlasting, the world's soon ended. At the longest, the world's peace is but for a lifetime; but seldom does it last half as long; more generally a day, or an hour. Eternal peace is Christ's gift.

As to the giving,—

(1.) Christ's giving is free; none of the world's gifts are such. He gives like himself, and as He gave himself. The world bargains and sells.

(2.) Christ's gift-giving is genuine, the world's is a pretence. The world wishes us peace—this is its daily salutation; but all is hollow. Christ means what He says when He wishes us peace.

(3.) Christ's giving is ungrudging. The world has no pleasure in giving—is not generous and loving. Christ gives as a King, in full-hearted love; He upbraids not.

(4.) Christ's giving is immediate, that of the world is tardy. The world keeps us waiting, Christ does not. His word is now!

(5.) Christ's giving is irrevocable; the world often takes back what it gave. His peace is sure; He does not recall it, nor shall for ever.

How vivid the contrast! Can any one hesitate in choosing? To reject the world's false peace, and to take Christ's true peace, is of all things the most reasonable that can be proposed to man. Consider the contrast well, and act accordingly.

IV. The consolation.—'Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.' There will be many things to trouble and terrify in such a world; a world where all is hatred, enmity, persecution. But against all this provision has been made, and that provision is the peace of Christ. No doubt He gives other things also for days of trial—strength, faith, hope; but it is his peace that is the special antidote,—the pre-eminent sustainer and comforter in evil times.

It is peace, and it is such a peace! It keeps the soul unmoved when the tempest is raging round. It makes us feel as if hidden in the hollow of Christ's hand, defended by his shield, embraced by his arm. It is light in darkness; it is a strong tower in the midst of assailing hosts. Let the world reproach or persecute; we have a peace within which more than meets all its reproaches and persecutions. Let Antichrist and Satan rage; the divine peace within keeps us immoveable. Let bodily pain assail us; we are sustained by the peace of Christ. Let sorrow, bereavement, losses, compass us about; we are kept calm and cheerful by the peace of Christ. Our hearts are not troubled with anxiety or trial, nor are they afraid in the midst of persecution and reviling.

Christ's peace within us, and Christ himself as our companion by our side, we go forth on our pilgrimage, as men who are in possession of a heavenly charm, which preserves them in patience and tranquillity, which makes them invincible, nay, victorious,—'more than conquerors, through Him that loved them.'

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA.

No. IX.

GOD'S ABILITY.

WHEN mourning—as, in common with all God's children, you have but too much cause to do—over your own sinfulness, and weakness, and helplessness, I hardly think you take all the comfort that you might take from the thought, or rather from the certain knowledge, of the unlimited and infinite power of Him who has himself declared, 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth' (Matt. xx. 18).

Are you not sometimes apt to dwell—I cannot say too much, but certainly too exclusively—on the love of God, forgetting that his wisdom and his power are attributes equally precious and equally important? When those dear to us are in trouble, our love makes us long to help them; but alas! how often we find that we lack the wisdom to see how it might be done, as well as the power to do it! But when, in the fulness of his love, God desired to help and to save us (I would write with the deepest reverence and humility), his wisdom suggested the plan, and his power enabled Him to carry it out.

And it is so still; for He is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever' (Heb. xiii. 8). And there is not anything required for his people's welfare that He has not the power, as well as the will, to accomplish for them.

When, therefore, doubts and fears seek to establish themselves in your heart, give them no entrance, but encourage yourself in the Lord, and rejoice in the assurance that God's 'strength is made perfect in weakness' (2 Cor. xii. 9). He who knoweth your frame (Ps. ciii. 14), knoweth your weakness, and, in tender mercy, has given assurance after assurance of his unlimited power. And there is not a danger that can threaten to hurt his children, or a trouble that may bow down their hearts, that we may not learn, from the word of God, that He is able to remove or overcome it.

It may be that, for the first time in your life, you have been just convinced that you are a sinner—that you are, in fact, 'dead in trespasses and sins' (Eph. ii. 1). You have tried to banish the thought, but you cannot succeed. Alone in the silent hours of the night—amid the happy family circle—surrounded by every joy that earth can give,—you are yet miserable, utterly and inconceivably miserable; for you know that you are lost, and you envy the dog that looks up so wistfully in your face, as if he wondered why you were so sad, because he has no eternity before him!

True, you have heard that 'the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Matt. xviii. 11), and you even know some that have been saved,—your own dear mother, for instance, and the little sister so many years younger than you are; but then they had not sinned as you have. From earliest childhood you were trained in the knowledge of a Saviour's love. Your first recollection of your mother, is the having seen her, morning and evening, praying for you, as she knelt beside your little cot. Many a time has the Saviour knocked at the door of your heart, but you refused Him admittance. In joy and in sorrow you heard the whispers of the still small voice, but you would not listen; and you feel as if the Saviour might well ask of you, as He asked of Israel of old, 'What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?' (Isa. v. 4.)

Ah! yes, it is all true. You have indeed sinned against light and knowledge. You have sinned wilfully and determinedly, and have enjoyed 'the pleasures of sin' again and again; so that now, although you tremble at the thought, you firmly believe that the day of grace is passed, and that for you there is no longer any hope.

And is there not? Listen for a moment to what God the Holy Ghost, speaking through St. Paul, says of the Saviour: 'He is able,'—oh! listen to those words again,—'He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them' (Heb. vii. 15). With this verse engraven on your heart, think of your sins to their fullest extent—in all their magnitude and enormity; and, after you have done so, you may believe, with truth, that there is a depth of iniquity which your eye has not detected, and yet—and yet—you are not beyond the boundary-line of God's ability! Come now, even now, unto God by Christ; come bowed down, and crushed, and weary with the burden of your sins, and you shall learn, by thrice blessed experience, the full meaning of those wondrous words: 'He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them.'

But perhaps you have already come to Jesus for pardon, and, like Mary of old, you can sing with a glad and thankful heart: 'My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour' (Luke i. 47); but you are trembling lest you should yield to temptation, and dishonour God. The world is doubtless very seductive, and the flesh and the devil are very plausible; and, somehow, your temptations appear to be so different from those of other people, that they seem hardly to understand how such and such things can be temptations at all. They are sure they would not be so to them, and therefore they are unable to help you; while very probably they fancy that you overrate both the danger and the difficulty of your position.

Do not be disheartened at this want of sympathy. It may be that the trial has been permitted, just in order to teach you to 'wait only upon God' (Ps. lxi. 1)—a lesson which is indeed cheaply learned at any cost. Turn away, then, from all human help, to Him of whom it is said, 'For in that He himself hath suffered, being tempted, He is able to succour them that are tempted' (Heb. ii. 18). Not his sufferings on the cross only were endured for you, but also every hour of mental and bodily anguish which He passed through, from his cradle to the grave.

We are apt to forget how prolonged were the temptations by which He was assailed, and to think only of those of which the particulars have been recorded in the Gospels. But, in truth, these form but a small part of the whole; for do we not read that He was 'forty days tempted of Satan?' (Mark i. 13.)

Think what it must have been for the holy Jesus to be obliged to listen for forty days to the horrible suggestions of the evil one! And even then, baffled and defeated as the adversary was at every point, he did not give up the case as hopeless. No; he only departed from our Saviour 'for a season' (Luke xiv. 13).

How He was tempted afterwards we are not told in detail; but all is summed up for us in these few words, wherein we are assured that He was 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (Heb. iv. 15). Yes, tempted child of God, whatever may be the form of temptation by which you are assailed, you may rest assured of the sympathy of your Saviour. That very temptation was, in some form of it, endured by Him. He can understand it all, for He felt it—felt it infinitely more horrible than you can do. Not only because his Godhead gave Him an infinite capacity for enduring suffering of every kind, but also because He was infinitely pure and holy; and you, who are sinful and unholy, both by nature and by practice, can but feebly imagine how He must have recoiled from the temptations of the devil.

Do not, then, yield to despondency. Do not dwell so much on the temptations by which you are surrounded, as on the tender sympathy of Him who is able to succour you. He has promised that He 'will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it' (1 Cor. x. 13). He will succour you by his sympathy, and He will also succour you by making a way of escape, when the temptation threatens to pass beyond the limits of your strength.

Fear not, therefore, for your 'faithful and merciful High Priest' (what a blessed combination of titles!) is able to succour you; and surely He, who knows so well what the trial of temptation is, will be as willing as He is able.

But again: it may not be the fear of yielding to temptation that is troubling you; but, remembering that it is only those who shall endure to the end who shall be saved (Matt. xxiv. 13), you tremble lest you should 'fall;' for the 'narrow way, which leadeth unto life' (Matt. vii. 14), oftentimes looks steep and dangerous. And so it may be; and if you walked there alone, you would fall. But He who came into the world to guide your feet into the way of peace (Luke i. 79), when you are in that way, 'is able to keep you from falling' (Jude 24). No matter how steep the precipice, how rugged the mountain path, how rough the stones in the valley, the Good Shepherd is able to guide the feeblest of his sheep in safety to the fold; for He 'will gather them with his arms, and carry them in his bosom' (Isa. xl. 10). And when the last step of the journey has been traversed, and the last danger passed, He will 'present them faultless before the throne of his glory, with exceeding joy.' With what deep delight must the captain of a vessel, which, through much toil and hardship, he has saved from shipwreck, see the last of his passengers safely landed on the shore! And as, one by one, the Captain of our salvation carries his people in safety to their heavenly home, He 'sees of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied' (Isa. liii. 11).

The help, however, of which you are feeling your need, may still be something altogether different from any on which I have touched. In the full vigour of life and health, you may long exceedingly to spend and to be spent in the service of your Saviour. Others around you seem to be 'full of good works,' and you earnestly desire to follow their example. But yet, when you try and work for God, you seem to do more harm than good. You get impatient at the carelessness and inattention of your Sabbath-school class. You were vexed with that invalid, because she worried you by talking so much about herself. You were cross to that poor woman, because she did not seem as grateful as you thought she ought to do for your kindness. You were selfish in not going out that wet day, when you knew your visit was looked forward to with such pleasure. More painfully still do you remember how, when you had been longing, and watching, and praying for an opportunity to speak to one whom you were seeking to win to Jesus, and that God gave the opportunity, your cowardly heart listened to Satan's suggestion that it was not 'a convenient season;' you kept silence, the opportunity was lost, and you know not if you may ever be granted another.

In fact, you have so little self-denial, so little perseverance, so little control over your temper, so little love for souls, so little of anything good, that you almost feel as if it were useless for you to try and do anything for any one. Such is the sorrowful verdict you have passed on yourself. And it is true, quite true, that you can hardly underrate your own unaided powers of doing good; but, blessed be God, it is equally true that you cannot at all overrate his ability to enable you to do good. Listen to the Holy Spirit, as He speaks through St. Paul to the Corinthians: 'God is able to make all grace abound towards you, that ye always, having all sufficiency in all things, may abound in every good work' (2 Cor. vii. 8).

How full, how rich, how plentiful is the supply here promised! Truly it is 'good measure, pressed down, and shaken together' (Luke vi. 38). It is not love only, or patience, or self-denial, or faith, but 'all grace;' and that not in small measure, but 'abounding.' Not at one time only, or on one occasion, but 'always.' Not sufficiency of one kind, or for one thing, but 'all sufficiency for all things.' And then the object for which this wonderful supply is promised exactly meets your present desire: 'That ye may abound in every good work.' Surely, with such testimony as this to God's ability to supply all your need, you will not allow the sense of your own deficiencies to keep you back from his service! Rather will you 'work while it is called to-day,' lest to you, as well as to the church in Sardis, should the solemn and sorrowful words be addressed, 'I have not found thy works perfect before God' (Rev. iii. 2); or, as it would have been more correctly translated, 'I have not found thy works filled up before God.'—(See Trench on the Seven Churches.)

Oh! think how sad it would be to miss even one of the good works which 'God hath prepared for you to walk in' (Eph. ii. 10). He who prepared the works, has provided the needed grace which you would require to perform them. Let the sense of your own inability make you rest the more simply in God's ability. You have only to lay hold on this wonderful and encouraging promise, and, taking God at his word, pray that He would 'make all grace abound towards you, that you always, having all sufficiency in all things, may abound in every good work.' To all those who so pray, and so work, shall the Master yet speak these cheering words: 'Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord' (Matt. xxv. 23).

Wholly different, however, from any of those we have been considering, may be the trouble that is pressing on your heart. It may have pleased God, in his almighty wisdom and almighty love, to afflict you with some bodily disease or infirmity, so distressing in its nature or its results, that you are obliged to forego the society of those most dear to you, and are tempted to feel as if the lonely grave were the only place fit for you.

Very tenderly, and with most loving sympathy, would I venture to touch on such a sorrow—so sacred from its very intensity. But do not weep such sad and bitter tears, as you think, almost with anguish, that the expression 'vile body' is one that exactly suits you. That word is not in the original; and the correct rendering would be, 'Body of humiliation.' Ah! we have all a 'body of humiliation.' Do we not feel it continually? But much as you may despise your body, deeply as you may feel its humiliation, our blessed Lord came from heaven to redeem it. So precious was your body in his sight, that He died on the cross to save it. Yes, He is indeed the Saviour of the soul, but He is 'the Saviour of the body' also (Eph. v. 23). Do not despise what He has purchased at so great a cost; do not mourn and weep, as if you were to be always what you are now. It is not so. Listen to the precious promise: 'Who shall change our body of humiliation, that it may be fashioned like unto his body of glory' (original), 'according to the working whereby He is able to subdue even all things unto himself' (Phil. iii. 21). 'All things,' therefore—even sickness, and infirmity, and death, humiliating and trying as they may be—form no barrier to the power of Him who is able to subdue them unto himself, and only make their ravages add to the greatness of his triumph!

Oh! when you groan beneath the burden of your 'body of humiliation,' think how soon, how very soon, you shall exchange it for a 'body of glory;' and not only a body of glory, though that were much, but a body of glory like your Saviour's own! You may not even have to pass through death, before that wonderful change is effected. 'Yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry' (Heb. x. 37). When the last moment of that 'little time' has passed, 'the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord' (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17). 'In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye,'—in far less time than you could read the verse,—'the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed' (1 Cor. xv. 52).

Changed indeed! Such a change as could only be effected by 'Him who is able to subdue even all things unto himself.' The change is from corruption to incorruption, from dishonour to glory, from weakness to power, from a natural body to a spiritual one. Oh! with the absolute certainty that God 'is able' to do this, and will do it, shall we not even now anticipate the joyful moment, and, echoing the apostle's burst of triumph, sing, with glad and grateful hearts: 'Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ?' (1 Cor. xv. 57).

And now, can we help pausing for a moment, feeling almost overwhelmed at the wonderfulness and blessedness of the varied assurances of 'God's ability,' on which we have been dwelling? We have found that He is able to save the most guilty of sinners; to succour the tempted; to keep the weak from falling, and to present them faultless before the throne of his glory with exceeding joy; to make all grace abound, at all times, for every good work. And, last of all, we have learned that He who is able to save the soul, is able to save the body also, and change it from a body of humiliation into a body of glory.

Wonderful ability! Can language express, or thought imagine, anything not included under one or other of the verses we have quoted? I believe not; yet thought and language cannot fathom the depths of God's ability, for they are finite, and that is infinite. There were depths into which even an inspired apostle could not travel; and we learn, through that apostle, that God 'is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think' (Eph. iii. 20). We have asked for much, and thought of much; but God is able to do exceeding abundantly above it all.

Will it, then, seem very strange if I say that I am not sure that the very keystone of this blessed arch of God's ability is not the fact that there is one thing He cannot do? Yes, there is one thing which He who is almighty and omnipotent cannot do; and with a thrill of thankful joy I read the words: 'God—which cannot lie' (Titus i. 2). So, then, what He hath promised He is not only able to perform (Rom. iv. 21), but will perform; 'He cannot lie!'

'Lord, increase our faith!'

RULES FOR USING THE TONGUE.

THE tongue is called in the Bible 'an unruly member.' Our own experience accords perfectly with the statement; and observations on the tongues of others have satisfied us of the fact. We think the following rules, if carefully followed, will be found of great use in taming that which has not yet been perfectly tamed.

1. Never use your tongue in speaking anything but truth. The God of truth, who made the tongue, did not intend it for any other use. It will not work well in falsehood; it will run into such inconsistencies, as to detect itself. To use the organ for publishing falsehood, is as congruous as the use of the eye for hearing, or the ear for smelling.

2. Do not use your tongue too much. It is a kind of waste-gate, to let off the thoughts as they collect, and expand the mind; but if the waste-gate is always open, the water will soon run shallow. Many people use their tongues too much. Shut the gate, and let streams of thought flow in, till the mind is full, and then you may let off with some effect.

3. Never let the stream of passion move the tongue. Some people, when they are about to put this member in motion, hoist the wrong gate; they let out Passion instead of Reason. The tongue then makes a great noise—disturbs the quiet of the neighbours, exhausts the person's strength,—but does no good. The whirlwind has ceased, but what is the benefit?

4. Look into the pond, and see if there is water enough to move the wheel to any purpose, before you open the gate; or, plainly, think before you speak.

5. Never put the tongue in motion while your respondent has his in motion. The two streams will meet, and the reaction will be so great, the words of neither will reach the other, but come back in a blinding sprinkle upon himself.

6. See that your tongue is hung true before using it. Some tongues, we have observed, are so hung that they sometimes equivocate considerably. Let the owners of such turn the screw of conscience, until the tongue moves true.

7. Expect that others will use their tongues for what you do yours. Some claim the privilege of reporting all the news, and charge others not to do so. Your neighbour will not allow you to monopolize the business. If you have anything to be kept secret, keep it yourself.

THE OLD SAILOR'S PRAYER.

Ah me! and other men have lost their lads,
And other women wiped their poor dead mouths,
And got them home, and dried them in the house,
And seen the driftwood lie along the coast.
That was a tidy boat but one day back,
And seen next tide, the neighbours gather it
To lay it on their fires. Ay, I was strong
And able-bodied; loved my work; but now
I am a useless hull. 'Tis time I sunk;
I am in all men's way. I trouble them;
I am a trouble to myself; but yet
I feel for mariners o' stormy nights,
And feel for wives that watch ashore. Ay, ay,
If I had learning, I would pray the Lord
To bring them in; but I'm no scholar—no.
Book learning is a world too hard for me.
But I make bold to say: 'O Lord, good Lord,
I am a broken-down, poor man—a fool,
To speak to Thee! But in the Book 'tis writ—
As I hear say from others that can read—
How, when Thou camest, Thou didst love the sea,
And live with fisher-folk; whereby 'tis sure
Thou knowest all the peril they go through,
And all their trouble.
As for me, good Lord,
I have no boat; I am too old, too old.
My lads are drowned; I buried my poor wife.
My little lasses died so long ago,
That mostly I forget what they were like.
Thou knowest, Lord—they were such little ones.
I know they went to Thee; but I forget
Their faces, though I missed them sore. O Lord,
I was a strong man; I have drawn good food,
And made good money out of thy great sea.
But yet I cried for them at nights; and now,
Although I be so old, I miss my lads;
And there be many folk this stormy night
Heavy with fear for theirs. Merciful Lord,
Comfort them! Save their honest boys—their pride,
And let them hear, next ebb, the blessedest,
Best sound—the boat-keels grating on the sand.
I cannot pray with finer words. I know
Nothing. I have no learning—cannot learn:
Too old, too old! They say I want for nought,
I have the parish pay; but I am dull
Of hearing, and the fire scarce warms me through.
God save me! I have been a sinful man;
And save the lives of them that still can work,
For they are good to me: ay, good to me.
But, Lord, I am a trouble; and I sit,
And I am lonesome, and the nights are few
That any think to come and draw a chair,
And sit in my poor place, and talk awhile.
Why should they come, forsooth? Only the wind
Knocks at my door. Oh, long and loud it knocks;
The only thing God made that has a mind
To enter in.'
Yea, thus the old man spake.
These were the last words of his aged mouth.
But One did knock. One came to sup with him.
I tell you that One knocked while it was dark.
What He said,
In that poor place where He did talk awhile,
I cannot tell. But when the neighbours saw
The smile the old man passed away in, they said:
'He looks
As he had woke and seen the face of Christ,
And, with that rapturous smile, held out his arms
To come to Him.' —Ingelow.

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER V.

HOLIDAYS being over, Constance and Tom returned to their respective schools, and Miss Mills resumed her duties in the schoolroom. Dora began to learn music and French, her aunt and uncle considering that it was high time she should. At first Johnny did not like Dora's being so much longer engaged with lessons than he was; but when Miss Mills told him all little ladies learned music and French, he was somewhat reconciled to the alteration, being very desirous that Dora should be a lady. Dora was equally anxious on the subject, having never forgotten what Tom had said about ladies; and she wanted him to see, though she was a little brown thing, with a nose like nobody else's, that she could be one. So she did her best to learn her lessons; and Tom and Constance of an evening were always ready and willing to help her in any difficulty she met with.

But amidst all her desires to get on with her studies, her mind ran upon the poor people whom nurse had told her lived so near Chelsea Place, until at last she seemed able to think of nothing else, even dreaming of them at night, and wondering how she could find out where they lived, and get to see them. She had seven shillings and sixpence in her money-box, and she wanted very badly to give them away without anybody knowing about it; for she recollected having heard the clergyman preach about not letting our left hand know what our right hand doeth; and her aunt had told her that it meant we were to do good as quietly as possible, and not talk about what we had given away, or intended doing. Dora had fully made up her mind to get rid of her money at the first opportunity; but she could not think how she should find an opportunity, without nurse, and old nurse, and Tom, and lots of people knowing it.

So she came to the conclusion that she had better put on her hat and slip out when nobody was about, and she could but tell where she had been when she came back, if she were asked; and if she were not missed, she need not say anything of her visits. She knew the house was always very quiet after the one o'clock dinner, and she and Johnny did what they pleased, until Miss Mills called her for lessons from three to four; so, she thought, if she could only slip out some day after dinner, she should be back again and ready for Miss Mills by three. It did not require much waiting and watching on Dora's part for carrying out her projected scheme; for Johnny and she were such steady little things, that no one ever supposed it necessary to look after them in the play-hour. So, one fine day, as soon as dinner was over, she went up to her bedroom, and, putting on her hat and cloak, prepared to go out. She had just taken her money out of her box, and was wrapping it in a bit of paper, when Johnny came into the room.

'Oh Dora!' he cried, 'where are you going?'

'Hush! Johnny,' said Dora; 'I am going to see some poor people and give them my money; but I do not want any one to know it. I shall be back in time for Miss Mills. Please don't go and tell that I am going.'

Johnny promised he would not tell nurse, if she would make haste back; and told her to give his love to the poor people, and say that he would come and see them some day, and bring them his money too.

Dora set off in capital spirits, Johnny stationing himself at the schoolroom window, to watch her as far as possible. She was not long running down the stairs, though she felt so strange going all by herself down the wide staircase, and through the great hall; and when she had opened the door she could not shut it without making a loud noise, so she left it a little open, hoping to find it so when she returned. Johnny waved his hand from the upper window, and Dora waved hers, and then walked off as quickly as she could, for she was very anxious to be back in time for Miss Mills. When she got to the end of the first street, she stood for a moment or two thinking which way she had better take; then, remembering that nurse had never gone with her and her cousins down a narrow street just opposite to where she was standing, she crossed over and went down it. The narrow street led to other narrow streets, until at last she found herself in such a dirty, miserable-looking place, that she felt quite certain she had reached the part where the poor really lived. The sight of a nicely-dressed child, all by herself, brought a number of persons to their doors and windows; and when they saw her looking about, they began to wonder who she wanted to find. She had nearly reached the end of the row, when an old woman asked her who she was looking for?

Dora immediately replied, 'Some poor people.'

'Oh! we are all poor people hereabouts, my little lady,' whined the woman. 'But what was the names of them you wanted to find?'

'I do not know their names yet. I shall know by and by, when I have found them out. I thought I had come to the right place. I have some money to give away to them if they are sick or old.'

The old woman pricked up her ears at the word money, and said, 'She was very old, and sick into the bargain.'

'Then I will come and see you first. Where do you live?' asked Dora.

'Just in here, my little lady,' replied the woman, leading the way to her abode; but by the time they had reached it, several other women had joined her.

'Who is she?' questioned one.

'What does she want?' asked another.

'Whose child is she?' inquired the third.

'Hold your tongues, can't yer!' cried the old woman. 'I'll knock your heads off in a minute if you don't.'

'Oh! please do not say that,' said Dora. 'If you talk like that, you will not be a good old woman, and I should not like to give you any of my money.'

'Money!' shouted the other women. 'Don't give her any. She's a witch and fortune-teller! She's a bad un!'

Dora did not know what a witch or fortune-teller was; but she soon came to the conclusion that it was something very wicked, for the old woman flew into such a passion, using such dreadful language, and throwing her arms about in such a furious manner, that Dora got frightened and tried to run away. But it was too late; the old woman caught hold of her by the arm and tried to pull her into her house, whilst the other women declared she should not have the child, to steal her clothes and get money from her, and pulled her the other way. And such a crowd collected about them, and there was such a shouting and screaming, that poor Dora trembled from head to foot, and prayed and entreated the women to please to take her home. But her petition was unheeded, for it was unheard by the noisy persons congregated round her, the greater part of whom did not know why they had gathered together, and were loud in their inquiries as to the cause of the row. How the matter would have ended no one can tell, if a great tall Irishman had not shouldered his way through the crowd, saying, 'Aisy, my jewels; what's the time o' day?'

'Oh, Mike!' screamed one of the women, 'you're the chap to settle her. Here's old Bet stealing a child.'

'Sure, thin, I'm the boy for yer money,' replied Mike, forcing himself through to where Dora was being tugged and pulled from one to another.

'Arrah, Bet, what are ye arter?' he exclaimed, when he had worked his way up to her.

'I ain't adoing nothing! The little lady was coming in to see me, and they stopped her!' shrieked Bet, shaking her fist at the women she designated by 'they.'

'Oh, sir,' cried Dora, wrenching herself away from Bet and the other women, thereby tearing the skirt of her frock half out of the waist, and leaving her cloak in the hands of one of them as she caught hold of Mike. 'Oh, sir, please do take me home;' and she burst into tears.

'Sure, honey, ind that's what I'm intinding to perforum,' replied the man, lifting the child up in his arms; and with 'You'll catch it, ind no mistake, Bet,' preparing to work his way through the crowd.

'I did not steal the child,' shouted Bet; 'she comed of her own accord, she did!'

'Yes,' cried Dora, who, though frightened dreadfully, could not bear to hear any one wrongly accused; 'I came to see sick old people; she did not steal me. But oh! please take me home.'

The crowd hearing Dora's reply, made way for Mike, and some of them returned to their homes, whilst others followed him up the street; a lot remaining behind to storm and quarrel with Bet. Dora clung to her protector until they were out of the street; then begging to be put down, she took hold of his hand, grasping it as tightly as she could.

'Sure, ind where do you live, honey?' inquired Mike. Dora managed to tell him that she lived with her Uncle and Aunt Harley in Chelsea Place, and that her name was Dora, and then, quite overcome, sobbed violently.

'Sh—sh—honey my jewel! Sure, ind the life's frithened out of ye entirely, ye poor little crathur,' said the kind-hearted fellow, as he tried to soothe the child. 'But ye'll soon be at the home agin; so don't yez cry, honey, we'll soon be there.'

Dora, a little comforted, tried to check her sobs and tears; but she presented a very miserable appearance. What with the fright she had sustained, and her ragged clothing, you would scarcely have recognised her to be the same little girl who had left Chelsea Place some time before. Her neat pink frock was hanging about her, being in many places torn out of the gathers; her black silk cloak was gone, and her straw hat was bent out of all shape, whilst her face was very pale, and she shook so that she could hardly walk.

In the meantime three o'clock had arrived, and Miss Mills was waiting to give Dora her music lesson; but no Dora was to be found. Johnny having been closely questioned, burst out crying for mamma; and Mrs. Harley having been summoned to the nursery, he whispered, that Dora was gone to see some poor people, and that he had promised not to tell nurse she was out, if she came back quick. 'But she is not come, mamma,' he cried; 'won't Dora never come back?' and he wept bitterly. To describe the consternation that followed Johnny's information would be scarcely possible. The idea of a little child who had never been out of the house before by herself, having gone they knew not where, set the whole family in a commotion. Servants were despatched in every direction, and Mr. Harley himself went off to the police office, to set the police inquiring after Dora. Nurse had quickly discovered that she had worn her black silk cloak and straw hat; so Mr. Harley described her at the station-house as a little dark-haired, dark-blue-eyed girl, between eight and nine years old, dressed in a pink muslin frock, black silk cloak, white straw hat with black velvet on it, white stockings, and black kid boots, answering to the name of Dora Harley; but could he have seen the tattered little trembling creature, at the moment he was describing her, walking by the side of Mike, he would have represented her very differently. A policeman accompanied Mr. Harley in search of Dora, taking him to one of the worst parts of the city, but not very far from Chelsea Place, when, just as they turned the corner of a very narrow dirty street, a ragged little girl sprang from the side of a tall man, and throwing her arms round Mr. Harley's neck, screamed out 'Uncle!'

Mr. Harley was so taken by surprise, that for a moment or two he remained speechless; but Dora clung to him with all her might until he recovered himself, when, stooping down, he raised her in his arms, uttering a fervent 'Thank God, I have found you.'

A cab was soon called, and Mr. Harley, having begged the policeman to talk to Mike and tell him where to come to be rewarded the next morning, took Dora in his arms into the cab, never letting go of her until he had placed her in her aunt's at Chelsea Place.

'You naughty girl,' exclaimed nurse, as he entered the hall with his little burden; but he immediately replied, 'Nurse, the lost is found; none but her aunt may dare to chide her.'

There was no chiding with Mrs. Harley, and so Dora felt as she was folded to that loving bosom; but tears of thankfulness mingled with Dora's tears of sorrow, for she had heard nurse call her naughty, and for the first time realized that she had done wrong.

'Oh, auntie,' she sobbed, when she had a little recovered, 'indeed I did not know it was naughty. I only wanted to give my money to some poor people, and nobody know about it,—indeed I did.'

In an instant Mrs. Harley remembered her conversation with Dora about the clergyman's sermon on almsgiving, and understood all. Dora had been so frightened, and was so bruised about the arms, that they thought it best to keep her quiet, by putting her to bed, and only Johnny was allowed to stay with her. Worn out in mind and body, she soon fell asleep, and Johnny nestling down by her side. When nurse brought in their tea, she found him asleep also.

(To be continued.)

Readings for the Young.

'I HA'E NAE SOUL.'

ON a sultry summer's day in Scotland, a farmer was resting from the toils of the morning in a great oaken chair, in which his grandfather's father had rested before him, when the click of the latch to the little gate aroused him, and, springing to his feet, he gave the newcomer a hearty welcome.

The guest was no other than the new minister, who had just come to live at the old manse; and, according to Scottish custom, the family were called together to listen to the words of the man of God. The blind old grandmother's chair was wheeled into the little parlour; the mother and daughters came from their needlework; the sons were called from the fields; the maids summoned from the kitchen; the children were snatched from their unfinished sand-pies, and soon took their places at their mother's side, or hid themselves in her gown, whence they bashfully peeped out at the minister, whom they had never before seen, except at the kirk.

After the minister had been introduced to each one, he turned to the farmer, and said, 'Are all your family here?' 'Yes, they are all here,' was the reply. The man of God did not seem entirely satisfied; and, after a little pause, he again asked if the whole family were there, and was again answered, 'Yes.' 'But,' said he, 'who was that boy standing by the window as I came in?' 'Oh,' said some one, 'that was "daft" (half-witted) "Willie;" he couldn't understand you.' However, the minister insisted upon Willie's being called, and one of the maids went for him. He soon came in, well enough dressed, to be sure, but with a vacant look on his face, revealing his mental darkness.

Then the good pastor catechized the children, and instructed and admonished all; and he was listened to with reverence, for the family had been brought up in the fear and admonition of the Lord.

At last he came to poor, half-witted Willie, and with him he took a different course.

'Willie,' said he, 'do you know that you have a soul?'

'Na, maister, Willie has nae soul!' was the poor boy's reply.

'Listen to me, my boy. It is your soul which makes you unhappy when you have been naughty.'

'I ha'e nae soul, maister!' was again the thrilling response.

'But, Willie, did you never feel a wish for anything? Had you never a fear? Ah! did you never love anybody?'

'Yes, maister.'

'Well, Willie, that was your soul that loved.'

'Aweel, maister, I ha'e had a soul aince, but I ha'e nae soul noo. It was sae very bad, I couldna do naething wi't, and I gaed to the Lord Jesus, and I gie'd it to Him, and it is his, and He keeps it; sae Willie has nae soul noo.'

Truly the way of life is so plain, that 'the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.'

A NICE HIDING-PLACE.

ONE morning I went to my pleasant schoolroom, and found many vacant seats. Two little scholars, who had been with us a few days before, now lay cold in death, and others were very sick. The diphtheria had entered our village and our school. The children were weeping bitterly as I went in; and some of them ran quickly to me, saying, 'Oh teacher, Minnie and Georgie are dead! What shall we do? Do you think we shall be sick and die?'

I touched the bell gently, as a signal for the opening of the school; and when they had all taken their seats, I said:

'Children, you are all alarmed at the approach of this terrible disease. You sorrow for the death of your mates, and fear that you too may be taken. Many of you have asked me, "What shall we do?" I know of but one way to escape this trouble, and that is, to hide from it. If you will listen, I will read you of a hiding-place.'

All listened eagerly, while I read the ninety-first Psalm. I made no comments, but, in a few words, asked that the Comforter would carry his message to their hearts. They all seemed hushed by the sweet words of the Psalmist, and the morning lessons went on as usual.

At noon, a sweet little girl, named Lizzie, came to me and said, 'Teacher, are you not afraid of the diphtheria?' 'No,' I answered. 'Well, wouldn't you, if you thought you would be sick, and die?' 'No, dear, I trust not.' Lizzie stopped her questioning, and looked me full in the face for some minutes, with thoughtful, wondering eyes; then her face brightened a little. 'Oh! I know now,' she said. 'I know why you are not afraid: you are hiding under God's wings. Oh, what a nice place to hide! I thought of that as you read the chapter. I wish I could hide there too; then I should not be afraid of the diphtheria, or anything else. Is there room for me too?'

'Yes, Lizzie,' I said, 'room for you, and for every one who wishes to come. Oh, He longs so much more than you can think, to hide you in his arms, to clasp you to his heart, to wash out your sins in his own blood! Used as He is to the music of heaven, with its choirs of ten thousand of thousands, yet it will be far sweeter in his ears to hear your childish voice whispering, "Jesus, Thou art my hiding-place." Will you not say, with your whole heart, those precious words?' A soft 'I will' was her only answer; but I trust, at that glad hour, Lizzie sought and found the shelter of her Saviour's wing.

WELL-LIGHTED LANTERNS.

GROPING my way along as best I could, on a very dark night not long since, as I turned a corner of the street, I saw, but a short distance ahead of me, a well-lighted lantern. At first I could not see who was carrying it; but it proved to be a boy, who was whistling merrily as he walked along.

Now, that lantern was of much service to me. It threw its light back on the path, or sidewalk, for many yards. It showed me where to walk, and it showed me where not to walk, if I wished to keep out of the mire.

I felt thankful to the boy who was thus of so much use to me in lighting my way, while he knew nothing about the good he was doing.

He went along, not thinking of me—hardly knowing that I was behind him; and yet he was rendering me a very kind service.

I could not help thinking what a happy thing it would be, if all the boys and girls, and all the men and women who have the privileges of the gospel, were well-lighted Christian lanterns! How much good would they do, which is now left undone! We are not so much lanterns in what we say, as in what we do. It is the quiet but real influence of a good example, that is a light to lighten others. A very young child may be a very useful lantern. A small lantern, well lighted, is of much service; while a very large lantern, without any light, is of no use. And who knows how many the light will reach and benefit? Now, children, do not be dark lanterns, or such as give no light; but, as you pass along through life, at home, or in school, or in the street, or wherever you are, show that you love the truth, and that you seek, by God's grace, to walk as you are taught in his holy word. Show this in your lives. Show it by a cheerful, loving, honest walk with your companions. Never be afraid to let others see that you love God, and desire to do what is right in his sight. If thus you live, many will be benefited, and will bless you. Some may follow in the path of your light whom you know not, nor ever shall know, until you meet them in the world of glory above. Let your light so shine before your fellows, that they may see your good works, and 'glorify your Father who is in heaven.'

FOOTPRINTS OF LOVE.

LIFE beareth many footprints
On the golden sands of time;
Footprints of high and noble deeds,
And, alas! of many a crime.

Footprints of kings and warriors,
Of the conquerors of earth;
Footprints of busy little feet
Gathering around the hearth.

Footprints of stern, high daring,
And of deeds as soft and mild;
But the sweetest footprints I have seen,
Were those of a little child.

The little steps went in
A dungeon wall'd around;
They went, with gathered flowers, to cheer
A prisoner chained and bound.

The little voice was heard
In whispers soft and low,
And the little hand was gently laid
On a dark and troubled brow.

And trembling words lisp'd forth
The Saviour's precious name,
Till o'er that captive's sullen mood
Repentant feeling came.

And the little steps went out,
But the footprints long remained;
Remained, too, in the softened heart
Of that prisoner bound and chained.

Footprints they are in time;
But not in time alone:
Eternity, in living light,
Those blessed steps will own.

Then, little one, go thou
And do some loving thing;
Leave footprints on the sands of time,
Whence blessed fruits may spring.

—Anon.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

JOHN XVI. 33.

HERE are four special points: the peace, the tribulation, the victory, the cheer. It is Christ himself who is the speaker of these words. He speaks them to us. Let us listen.

I. The peace.—Peace is the great Bible subject; the burden of God's messages to man. Peace on earth, peace with God, the peace of conscious reconciliation. But it is not so much 'peace with God' that is here referred to, as 'the peace of God;' not the peace obtained by receiving the embassy of peace, the reconciliation, but the peace of the reconciled soul. Into this region of peace reconciliation is the entrance. Here no wrath can reach us, no storm can ruffle us, no terror can appal us. We are 'kept in perfect peace.' The peace of God rules in our hearts, and is perpetual sunshine,—like an island of bright verdure in the midst of a stormy sea. It is peace in Christ; not out of Him, nor apart from Him, but IN Him. It flows out of Him to us; or rather, we are in Him, and so get that peace. We get it by means of his words, 'These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace.' His words are the words of peace. The soul that listens to these words drinks in the peace; or, we may say, breathes the air of peace. Look at his words: 'Let not your heart be troubled;' 'In my Father's house are many mansions;' 'the Father coming in and abiding;' the love of the Father; the little while; the coming joy. Yes, every word is loaded with peace, his own peace, the Father's peace, the Spirit's peace, the peace of heaven—peace even here on earth, where all is trouble and disquiet.

II. The tribulation.—Though not of the world, we are in it still. We are partakers of its sorrows, though not of its sins; and besides, the men of the world hate us and trouble us, as they hated and troubled our Master. So that we have tribulation both in and from the world. The prince and god of this world is against us, and assails us on every side, as the old serpent, the tempter, the roaring lion, the ruler of the darkness of this world. Our separation from it, and nonconformity to it, make it the more hostile. It will not let us alone. It is a waste howling wilderness; a land of storms, and barrenness, and enemies, and thorns and briars. The law of the church's present state is 'tribulation.' 'Through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom.' 'These are they which came out of great tribulation.' There is the weakness of this 'vile body,' weariness, vexation, disappointment, bereavement, breaking of ties, farewells and partings, bodily diseases, pain, affliction, poverty, loss, disaster, straitened circumstances, persecutions, coldness, hatred, the sneer and taunt,—of these things the world is full. Its atmosphere is impregnated with evil, and sadness, and gloom. Thus has it been from the beginning. We see it in Abel, Noah, Joseph, Moses, David, Jeremiah, and all the saints. It is the church's portion here. It was the portion of her Head. He was 'a man of sorrows.' And all this not because of inconsistency, but consistency! The more we are unlike the world, the more it hates us; the more we are like the Lord, the more will the world persecute us. The Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent cannot agree or love. Hence we must come out from it, stand aloof, whatever may be the consequences. And this nonconformity—this quarrel between us and the world—only makes us long more for the day of the great advent. Tribulation makes us long for the coming; death makes us long for resurrection; weariness makes us long for rest; partings make us long for meetings. Thus we 'look for and hasten unto the coming of the day of God,'—the ending of the sorrow, the beginning of the joy.

III. The victory.—'I have overcome the world.' It is a powerful world, but not all-powerful. It has been fought with, and overcome. One greater than it, or than its prince, has come and vanquished it. The world did its utmost in this battle, but the Son of God prevailed. The Seed of the woman bruised the serpent's head. Noah condemned the world, but Christ overcame it. It has now no longer any power left to it but what He permits. He overcame it both by weakness and by strength. He slew death by dying; He conquered Satan, the god of this world, by allowing Satan to conquer Him. He did it alone. None could help Him in such a battle. Yet the victory was complete, final, and irreversible. He is the Conqueror; and, as the Conqueror, has led captivity captive. When He comes again, this victory will be manifested. Now we only know it by faith. God has proclaimed the victory of his Son, both in heaven and earth, but the world believes it not. Yet the victory was great and glorious. It was a victory which decided the long battle between heaven and hell, between God and Satan, between the church and the spiritual wickedness in high places.

IV. The cheer.—'Be of good cheer,' or courage. Be not afraid of the world, or its prince, or its tribulations.

(1.) It is a conquered world.—Not in its full strength, or flushed with victory; but routed, discomfited. Even at its strongest it had but creature strength; and 'who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die?' It is now creature-weakness—a broken world. 'Be of good cheer.'

(2.) It is conquered for you.—The Victor fought your fight, and won your victory. The world is his foe and yours. As both, He fought and won. He was 'a leader and commander to the people,' the 'Captain of your salvation.' It was you He had in view when He was fighting. He will make you more than conquerors. 'Be of good cheer.'

(3.) It is conquered by Christ.—Conquered by your Saviour, your Friend. The Conqueror is almighty, and his victory has been acknowledged by the Father. It was Jesus who fought and won. 'Be of good cheer.'

Not merely do not yield to despondency, like Elijah and Jonah, but 'rejoice and be exceeding glad.' Be cheerful in days of darkness. You have still a battle, which you must fight cheerfully and hopefully. It is 'that which is behind of Christ's battle;' the last relics of the fight. Fight and yield not. 'Love not the world,' but contend against it. Be faithful to death. The promise is to him that overcometh.

MISSIONS TO THE HEATHEN.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

Acts xi. 19-26.

THE spring or fountain of such missions is in the heart of God: 'God so loved the world;' the warrant and obligation of them is in the command of Christ, 'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel;' but the real, immediate cause of them is the power of the Holy Ghost working in the hearts of believers, and constraining them to declare to their perishing fellow-men what they themselves have seen, and tasted, and handled of the word of life. We see this here. It is strange how prone men, even good men, are to form plans for God, according to which they think that He should conduct his work. The Lord had said distinctly and repeatedly to his apostles, that they should begin preaching the gospel in Jerusalem, and then go on to Judea, Samaria, and the ends of the earth. But they did not rightly consider and obey their marching orders. They did begin at Jerusalem, and for a time were greatly blessed. Multitudes were turned to the Lord. But here they stopped. They made no attempt to go out into Judea, and on to foreign lands. They seem to have thought that their work was first to subdue Jerusalem the capital; and when that was completely converted, then they could think of ulterior measures. They did not understand, what they afterwards knew and acknowledged, that God's design with the world at present is only 'to take out of it a people for his name.' They might have learned this from the conduct of their Master, who never stayed long in any place; but went from town to town, from village to village, putting aside urgent requests to remain, by saying, 'I must preach the gospel to other cities also, for therefore am I sent.' He acted like the angler, who goes along the river bank giving a cast here and a cast there, and so making trial of many miles. Yet how much of the old mistake remains among ourselves! When we press the claims of the heathen, we are often met with the remark: There are plenty of heathens at home; first convert them, and then go after those who are abroad.

Another error into which these good men fell was this: they thought the Gentiles could not become Christians without first becoming Jews,—proselytes of the gate, as it was called; they must submit to the law of Moses, and so pass on to the fuller light and liberty of the gospel. In this way they, unwittingly I am sure, put a bar of their own in God's open door; and so, if they had been permitted, they would have greatly checked and hindered the work of salvation. Is there not a solemn warning for us here? These men had the fulness of the Spirit, and yet they have not comprehended the generous, liberal sentiments of their Master; they have not understood his words, when at Jacob's well He said, 'The hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father.' The Spirit does not drive or force men to receive the truth. He leads or guides, and only increases his light as they are able and willing to bear it. How is it with ourselves in this respect? Are we stinting and hindering our progress in knowledge and usefulness by our prejudices and party spirit?

But see here how God acts when man's plans are opposed to his own. He overrules and sets aside man's plans, and goes on in his own way and prospers it. The Lord wishes to guide his people with his eye; but when they will not thus learn and obey, then He has recourse to the bit and bridle, the staff and rod. And so here; the church has been staying at home, regardless of its Master's command, and the wants of a perishing world. The Lord lets Satan loose, and He stirs up persecution. Stephen, a man evidently ahead of his time, and having deeper insight into the Lord's mind than the others, is the first to fall. His blood only stirs up a desire for more. A fierce and general persecution ensues. These forerunners of the Popish inquisitors force their way into private dwellings, and hale men and women to prison and to death. But what was the consequence? 'Now they which were scattered abroad, upon the persecution that arose about Stephen, travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word to none but unto the Jews only.' Ah! Satan, you have destroyed yourself. There was one fire at Jerusalem, a growing fire, and you hated it.

You thought, if you could scatter it, the whole would go out. You said, These men, continuing together, kindle and inflame one another; but separate, they will cool and languish away. You have scattered them; but see the result. Formerly you had but one fire to watch; now you have many. The one fire was stationary; the many fires are moving hither and thither, burning and blazing as they go. Light a torch, and hold it up, it will burn slowly; but run with it through the air, and it will blaze fiercely. And so with these men; they were simple members of the church, they had no official rank or standing, and when left undisturbed at Jerusalem, they were quiet and orderly, perhaps never thought of preaching, but left that to the apostles. But when driven out, leaving all, and fleeing for their life, they seem, according to Christ's promise, to have got the hundred-fold. The Comforter came upon them in power, as the Spirit of testimony; they could not contain themselves; they must tell what they had seen, and heard, and felt, of the grace of Christ; and so they went everywhere preaching the word. At first they confined their labours to the bounds prescribed by the ecclesiastical rules and traditions of the day. They spoke only to the Jews. But the Spirit of God cannot be confined by man's orders and arrangements. These God-made missionaries soon felt their hearts on fire as they saw the valley of dry bones,—the old darkness and desolations of heathendom. And so they began to offer Christ and eternal life to the Gentiles just as they were, without any condition or preparatory work. It was the fulfilment of the old promises, the accomplishment of Christ's command.

'And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus.' Their subject was good,—Christ Jesus; their help was mighty,—'the hand of the Lord was with them.' This is equivalent to the Spirit of the Lord. The expressions seem interchangeable in Scripture. In Matthew, Christ says, 'If I by the Spirit of God cast out devils;' and in Luke the parallel passage is, 'If I by the finger of God cast out devils.' The hand or Spirit of the Lord was with these preachers, and so a great number believed and turned to the Lord. It was God's seal of approval on their bold step of breaking out of the rut of human routine. This, I think, settles the question about the lawfulness of lay preaching. The Lord is Sovereign. He can call and qualify whom He will. Amos says, 'I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was a herdman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit. And the Lord took me as I followed the flock, and the Lord said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel.' And so it is still; the Lord sends and prospers whom He will. We should not be jealous of the lay preacher, as if he were encroaching on the work of the regular ministry. There is room for both; their work is different. The one is the pioneer and planter, the other waters and builds up. We need them both. Rules which are good and useful in ordinary times, should yield a little in extraordinary times. When the river of God is in flood, we should not be surprised or alarmed if here and there it overflows its banks. Alas! the waters too soon return to their usual shrunken channels, and we have to cry, 'Turn again our captivity as the streams of the south.' We should seek to cultivate a large, open, liberal spirit, knowing that we have to do with a wonderful and wonder-working God, who often surprises his people with the greatness and riches of his grace.

But there is another thought here. It is this: Good men, when they come to know God's way, fall in with it, and heartily help it on. Tidings of what had occurred at Antioch reached the ears of the church at Jerusalem. Doubtless it would at first startle and alarm them. This was not their way of acting. It was done without their orders, and was not according to rule. It was quite unprecedented. We know how they took the Apostle Peter to task for receiving the Gentile Cornelius into the church, and their objections were only overcome by God's unequivocal ordering and approval of the matter. There would be more numerous and more serious objections in the case of Antioch. These preachers were plain, unauthorized men, and it was not one Gentile, known, honoured, and beloved, like Cornelius, that was received into the church: it was a great number of unknown Gentiles, of all classes and character. In this perplexity they adopted the wisest course—they determined to send and inquire on the spot. This was right. As long as we stand aloof, and are influenced by mere report and hearsay, we are sure to be misled and governed by prejudice and idle fancies. Said Nathanael to Philip, as he pointed to Christ, 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?' Philip's answer was the right one, 'Come and see.' Nathanael obeyed, and became an enthusiastic follower of the Lord. The church selected Barnabas to be their emissary, and the choice was a wise one. He himself had been originally a man of Cyprus, and so would be regarded with confidence by the preachers, some of whom were his own countrymen. He was also much esteemed and respected at Jerusalem as a hearty, devoted Christian. At the beginning he had sold his landed possessions, and distributed the price among his poorer brethren. I suppose he was a man of grave, reverend aspect, for the heathen at Lystra compared him to Jupiter, the chief of their gods. Doubtless he would come to Antioch with a measure of anxiety and suspicion. But all his fears and surmisings were at once and happily dispelled. 'Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord.' It is a remarkable expression—seen the grace of God; but it is a right one. The root of grace is invisible; but the fruit is visible, and can be tasted and examined. Many things show the existence and presence of the grace of God when it is or has been strongly at work. The seriousness, earnest attention, insatiable hunger for the word; the crowding to the house of God; the solemn, fervent prayers; the sweet, universal singing; the joy and thankfulness; the love and interest in one another's welfare, separation from the world, holiness of life and conversation, liberality up to and even beyond their means,—such things irresistibly produce the conviction, God is here. Barnabas saw these things; he recognised and acknowledged the grace of God; he was glad, and encouraged them to go on as they had begun. You are right; go on, persevere, abide in Christ, abide with Christ. Cleave to Him with full purpose of heart. Religion is mainly a thing of the heart; it is choosing and receiving Christ, and then holding Him firmly fast. Observe the reason that is given for Barnabas's so readily falling in with a way of working so different from that to which he has been accustomed. It is said, 'For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith.' Evil beings see a work of grace with fear and dislike. Satan trembles and gnashes his teeth at it. To him it is discomfiture and loss. And so his people and servants. It troubles them; they cannot tell to what it will grow. Even well-disposed people sometimes look on with suspicion. They see the mistakes and peculiarities of those who are engaged in it, and they anticipate only evil. But all good and enlightened beings in heaven and earth rejoice.

Barnabas was a good man, and so he was glad when he came into the midst of this busy harvest-field and heard the vintage songs. He did not call the work in question because it had not been begun and carried on by men regularly ordained. He encouraged them, and he looked out for suitable help in the present interesting circumstances. The excitement and toil of a revival time, most pleasant indeed, is yet very exhausting, and breaks down both the body and mind of those who are long engaged in it. Thus the work of God often comes to an end, like a fire that has burned itself out, and the subsequent operation of gathering up and securing the fruit is neglected. Barnabas, always disinterested, felt that Saul of Tarsus was just the man for this emergency. He had introduced him to the church when all stood aloof and suspected him. Now he introduces him to what was to be his future life-work, as the apostle of the Gentiles. He takes a long journey to find him, brings him to Antioch, and there they labour side by side, watering what had been sown and planted, and building up believers in holiness and hope. God greatly blessed their united efforts. 'For a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people.' Hitherto believers in Christ had been regarded as a kind of Jewish sect; now they get a new, and honourable, and descriptive name,—Christians. The church at Antioch prospered; and soon, like a full well, it overflowed, and became the mother and centre of missions to the east and west, and even to the end of the world.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XVIII.—MRS. MAXWELL.

ON entering upon a district for the first time, some visitors have been very conscious of a sort of instinct prompting them to call at one door in preference to another. Instinct I may call this feeling, as it would be difficult, and perhaps at the time impossible, to assign any reason for such preference. A case in point, illustrative of this principle, now occurs to me.

I had just entered upon a new field of labour, without any previous knowledge of the people. And one day, on going into one of its largest tenements, that undefinable sort of feeling came most markedly into operation.

On the first floor not a door seemed to have the least attraction. On the second it was much the same; but on the third there was one at which I could knock without the least hesitation.

It was opened by one having the appearance of a washerwoman—such she was in reality. As she was very communicative, I soon learned from her that all the tenants, without exception, were Roman Catholics, and that hers was the only door at which I could have called without meeting insult. Then, by way of confirming her statements, she pointed to a small placard above her fireplace, put there by order of the priest, forbidding all Catholics to receive any of the Protestant visitors into their houses. 'And sure,' she added, 'it would not have been good for you to have gone to any of the others, for they are great Catholics.' Then she related several instances of gross insult, offered shortly before, to Protestant visitors.

After leaving this woman, as I wished not only to test the truth of her statements, but also the correctness of the impression before mentioned, I called at another door.

A very good-looking woman, apparently about thirty, answered to my knock. Her beauty was not at all of a sentimental type; yet the luxuriant fair hair, clear complexion and features, to which smiles and good humour seemed perfectly natural, made a very agreeable impression.

Ere I had time to speak, she had apparently comprehended that I was one of the detested Protestant visitors, and immediately the smiles and good-humoured expression gave place to the scowl of a demon. Seldom had I seen a change so sudden, and never an expression so dark as when this poor woman hissed through her set teeth—

'So you are come to speak to me about religion, are you? Then I would just as soon hear the devil speaking. Ay,' she continued, with increasing vehemence, 'and were your minister to come to speak about religion, it would be the devil himself speaking,' etc.

I had no wish to push the experiment any further; so I could only, with a sigh of pity, leave this poor woman to her sad delusion.

To this pretty marked case of instinctive prompting, perhaps I may be allowed to add another, as it brought me acquainted with the subject of the following sketch.

Only a few days after the incident now related, I visited another tenement in the same street. And led, somewhat in the same way, I found myself in the house of a most exquisite specimen of Pharisaic pride—one who did not scruple to call herself the only respectable woman in the whole place.

From that good woman I had in a very few minutes the bad character of all her neighbours. After listening until I had heard sufficient for my own purposes, I interrupted her by saying:

'And you, of course, will be doing all you can to improve them?'

'Me have anything to do with them? No! I would not enter one of their doors; I would not even speak to them.'

I do not know that the rest of our conversation is worth relating; but while Mrs. Talkative made some bitter remarks about her neighbour on the opposite side of the floor, I had again that undefinable sort of impression that that woman was the very one I should visit. Accordingly, the only answer I made to the remarks was, that I intended to call upon her.

'There would be no use doing that,' she said, very emphatically, 'for she's a perfect Puseyite—just the next thing to a Roman Catholic. An' there's lots o' her ain kin' o' ladies come about her.'

As I could not agree with Mrs. Talkative as to the uselessness of calling upon her neighbour, I went straight to her door. And certainly her appearance was very different from the ideal I had been led to form of her.

Her face was far from being unpleasant, despite its very sallow complexion, and abstracted, melancholy expression. But her manner was so sad and hopeless, that I felt sure some sad story was connected with her past life; very aptly I thought the lines might be applied to her:

> 'Some suffering in her memory seemed fixed,
> Too deep for words, . . . .
> In that corroding secrecy that gnaws the heart.'

For some time she was very distant, and evidently under considerable restraint; but at length some words which I used, trifling enough in themselves, seemed to penetrate the crust that had gathered on her heart. And opening her eyes wide upon me, she asked:

'Are you not one of the ladies of St. ——'s?'

'No. I belong to the —— church.'

'So did I once,' she said, with a deep sigh.

'And you are not in connection with it now?'

'No. I belong to no church,' she said, abstractedly.

'I understood you went to St. ——'s?' I said, after some minutes' silence.

'No. I have been once or twice; but I am not going back.' After another considerable pause, she added, 'But some of the ladies come here and try hard to induce me.'

Gradually she became more and more communicative, until I had most of her early history. Her parents died while she was yet very young, and left her to the care of an aunt, who trained her very carefully.

'I did love my aunt,' she said; 'and I loved my Bible, and the church, and everything good, until I met in with Ned,' her husband.

But I need not pursue the dark story further than to say that too soon he succeeded in leading her upon one of the > 'Thousand paths that slope the way to crime.'

Although her religion had been but a thing of form, still her habits of church-going, etc., were so confirmed, that the abrupt breaking-up of them all caused her no little uneasiness. But by and by her spirit got into such a state of quiescence, that she could not only neglect duty with impunity, but also listen to the blasphemous speeches of her infidel husband with a degree of pleasure.

But the dark sovereign Death was commissioned at length to touch the only sensitive cord of her petrified heart, and by one ruthless stroke he broke up for ever its unholy quiet.

Her favourite child died, and with his death commenced a process by which her heart was not only cleansed from the rank crop of festering loathsome weeds that sprang from the poisoned germs infidelity had planted there, but it was also opened to the power which, once admitted, rectifies and renovates the whole inner being.

Then the good seed, fraught with life, was planted, and bore a rich harvest—a consistent life, redolent of all the wealth of holy love, and wise and prudent conduct. I can only, however, give you a very meagre outline of the important change.

Her little boy was unbaptized; and as there existed in her half-awakened mind much of that vague superstitious regard to baptism which connected salvation with the observance of the rite, the thought came upon her with overwhelming horror, that her child was lost through her culpable neglect.

The rest of her children being also unbaptized, she felt constrained, she said, to do something to obtain this privilege for them. 'Shame prevented me going back to my own church; so, in a sort of desperation, I went to St. ——'s, and got them all baptized, and that was a sort of salve to my troubled conscience. But I did not like their ways at all. It was for my children's sake I went. I never meant to join with them.'

On my next visit I found her in a very different mind; scarcely a word would she speak. Knowing, however, so much of her past history, I had little difficulty in speaking to her.

On subsequent visits it was much the same. Generally she sat in silence, and listened quite apathetically to what was said. I had almost begun to think that she had a positive dislike to me; yet, as she did not forbid my visits, I continued to call upon her.

On one occasion she did not speak at all, but sat looking into the fire all the time I remained. 'What is the use,' I could not help asking myself, 'of going longer to that woman? It seems a perfect waste of time. Certainly I shall not call again in a hurry.' And I think at least two months had elapsed ere I did so.

By that time what a change was apparent! When she opened the door, and saw who was there, a smile of inexpressible loveliness lighted up her countenance, as she exclaimed,

'Come away, I been so longing for you to rejoice with me, for I have found the Saviour! What an ungrateful woman,' she said, almost in the same breath, 'you must have thought me! I do not know how you bore with me so long.'

'I used to be angry,' she said, at another time, 'at you for coming, and at myself for telling you so much of my past history. I felt that I had given you power over me. And sometimes, when you made it evident that my religion had never been anything but a mere form, and I could not deny it, I hated you. I felt stript of my last shred of self-righteousness. I was hardly aware how I clung to my past goodness as some ground of hope till you took it away.'

Then she related the struggle she underwent after my last visit. But at length she was enabled, heart-sore and weary as she was with the burden of sin, to cast herself, a weeping penitent, at the feet of Jesus, and found rest and peace.

'There is no light so good for showing the reality of religion as the light of one's own heart,' it has been said. And in this light the change expressed by Mrs. Maxwell was already making itself very manifest. According to the quaint lines of Herbert:

> 'Her mind's sweetness was having its operation,
> Upon her person, clothes, and habitation.'

Her house formerly had a close, fusty sort of smell, and though not actually in a filthy condition, was untidy and comfortless. It could not well be otherwise; for, after her more necessary duties were done, she sat about listlessly doing nothing. It was so, at least, always when I happened to call.

Now it was very different; her heart seemed full of new life and energy, which manifested itself on all around. The windows were open. The air consequently was fresh and sweet. Everything was orderly. She had been sewing before I went in, and a few minutes after she resumed her seam.

The history of that seam was interesting. It was a shirt for her husband. The material had been purchased with money she had saved by denying herself the use of tea, and some other things not absolutely necessary.

'He laughs at me,' she said, raising her beaming countenance to mine; 'so I must take some way of making him feel that religion is not a vain thing, but that it does really make me better.'

Her religion did truly make her better. Her character was no longer a problem to solve, but a living epistle that could easily be read. Often, while observing the variety of ways by which her new life and energy were carried into action, have I thought of the lines:

> 'With me no melancholy void,
> No moment lingers unemployed,
> Or misimproved below.
> The weariness of life is gone,
> Who live to serve their God alone,
> And only Jesus know.'

While duty was being thus scrupulously attended to, a sort of difficulty arose. She had a great desire for prayer,—continued prayer; but with her newly-awakened consciousness of responsibility, she could not command sufficient time throughout the day for this purpose, and do all that she felt necessary for her husband and children's comfort.

But 'where there is a will there is also a way,' it has been truly said. So her difficulty was easily obviated by rising an hour earlier in the morning, and spending it exclusively in prayer. Thus she was enabled to combine most beautifully the practical and devotional in her daily life,

> 'And serve with Martha's careful hands,
> And Mary's loving heart.'

I found her remarkably happy one day. 'Oh,' she said, while tears of joy were streaming down her cheeks, 'I am so happy. I never could have believed that I would feel anything like this—that I could be so happy on earth. I have been praying for some time that the Lord would show me myself; but I can see nothing but Him.'

'I had so many things to ask you,' she said one day; 'but I thought you would wonder at my ignorance. Two of them I already understand—the meaning of the expressions, "free grace," and "in bondage." I'm sure I know what free grace means by experience, and also what it means to be "free."'

The near prospect of death tries the reality of one's religion. Mrs. Maxwell stood this test also beautifully.

For many weary months she lay on a bed of suffering, under the very shadow of death. So far as her body was concerned, it was a spectacle of sadness; but the element of joy was not wanting,—unutterable comfort filled her soul. Of the way her mind was sometimes exercised, I give a specimen in her own words.

'I was lying one day very helpless, and in great pain. I could do nothing for myself, but just cry, "Lord, help me, help me." And always as I cried I seemed to hear the response, "I will help thee, I will help thee." Then a dark thought came in. "Where is the help, then?" unbelief said; "it isn't come yet." "But it will come," I said, resolutely; "it will come." Still the questioning went on. "But if the help does not come, how is this promise to be fulfilled?" "Well," I said, almost angry, "if the pain is not taken away, I'll get grace to bear it, and that will be all the same."

'Then I fell into a kind of muse about Paul, how he prayed three times that the thorn might be removed. And the dark thought came in again about God not taking it away when he was so earnest. But when I had mused a good while, I saw through it all. I just seemed to hear the Lord Jesus saying, "Never mind the thorn, Paul, never mind it. Just let it remain there; it will do you good, and I will give you grace to bear it."'

After her recovery, she seemed fuller than ever of practical compassion and quenchless love for the souls of her husband and children; and patiently and prayerfully did she seek their spiritual welfare.

By this time her husband's opposition had settled down into a kind of pleasant scoffing.

'I can easily bear that,' she would say. 'It would be a poor religion that could not stand a laugh.'

I have sometimes been surprised also at her adroitness in turning the point of his scoffing cavils against himself, and often completely silence him. The finale of one conversation is worth relating.

'If you were dying to-night, Ned, where do you think you would go?'

'Oh, not to hell, surely,' he said, laughing. 'All the ill that I've done has been sufficiently punished already.'

'Could you expect to go to heaven, living as you do?'

'Perhaps hell is quite as good. What sort of place do you think it is, eh?'

'I do not think much about it, Ned. But I know this, it would be hell enough for me to live for ever with my sins unsubdued, and a consciousness of God's mercy slighted.'

I remember, while she was speaking to me one day on the subject nearest her heart—the salvation of her husband and children,—that she lifted up her eyes, over which the tears were brimming, and said, with a manner altogether indescribable, 'I must have them—I must have them.' This, however, was not said with any air of bravado, as if her prayers would certainly secure their salvation. Her meaning seemed rather to be, that if she, so unlikely a subject for grace, had found mercy, there could be no doubt but they would also.

For this object she still labours and prays. And who can but join in the wish that her faith may have the ample reward of hearing from the Saviour those words of love and mercy, 'Oh, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt?'

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER VI.

IT was some days before Dora had quite recovered from her fright and bruises, and was permitted to join Johnny in the schoolroom. Mike Donovan was handsomely rewarded for his kindness by Mr. Harley; and though Dora had either lost or been robbed of her 7s. 6d. during the scuffle in the court, yet she entreated that a message and trifling present should be sent to Bet through Mike, a request that her uncle, after a little consideration, complied with. Mrs. Harley held a long conversation with Dora on almsgiving; and Dora, taught by experience, the more easily understood how impossible it would be for a little girl to fully practise what was a grown-up person's duty and privilege. 'Until you are old enough to judge for yourself,' said Mrs. Harley, 'you must let others, who are more competent, and can really advise you for the best, guide you in such matters. In the house be as secret in doing good as you please; but out of the house always consult me, or any one else you like better, my darling; and be assured that you shall never be thwarted or denied doing what is right and proper for you to do.'

Dora kissed her aunt, and promised her that she should know everything she wanted to do for the future; and, from that day, Dora never heard a word to remind her of her unfortunate visit, unless by a question in fun from her cousins, about Bet or Mike. Of Mike, the children soon understood they should know a good deal; for, one afternoon, old nurse came into the nursery with some strong materials for clothing in her arms, and having deposited them on the table, inquired who was going to help her make clothes for the little Donovans?

'Oh, nurse,' cried Dora, 'is it for Mike's children?'

'Yes,' replied old nurse; 'I've been to see them, and they've hardly a whole garment to cover them. I never see'd such a set out in my born days. He's been out of work a long time, from having had the fever, which has left him as weak as a rat, and his wife's a poor sickly creature; and 'tis all dirt and starvation with them.'

'The fever!' said the other nurse with a sort of shudder.

'Yes; but 'twas four months ago. He was in the fever hospital a good while. There's no danger now, or I shouldn't have come in here; don't 'e believe it,' answered old nurse, looking very wise.

Dora, Johnny, and Agnes gathered round old nurse to see what was to be made for the little Donovans; even Guy scrambled over the floor to the table to help in his tiny way, by pulling about the various articles; and when Constance and Tom came home from school, they became equally interested in what was going on for Mike's children.

Old nurse had to describe each of them; and, seeing they were eight in number, it took her up a long time, and she had to promise that when she went again to see them, she would inquire all their names, for she could only remember Pat, Biddy, Mikey, Katy, and Polly the baby.

'Pat must be the short for Patrick,' observed Tom, as they talked over the names, 'and Mikey, Michael. There's a boy at our school named Michael, and when we want to tease him we call him Mike or Mikey; and doesn't he fire up when we do! But I cannot think what Biddy is the short of. I do not think it's a boy's name, is it, Nursey Grannam?' Nursey Grannam was Tom's favourite sobriquet for old nurse.

'No, Master Tom, in my young days it was the short for Bridget, and I expect 'tis the same in my old ones; one don't hear that name very often.'

'Bridget! Bridget!' shouted the children; 'how ugly!'

'I should think it was! I was sure 'twas a girl's name, because it was ugly. Wasn't the little girl ugly, too?' inquired Tom.

'For shame, Master Tom. Haven't I, and haven't your dear mamma and papa, told you over and over again, that nothing which God makes is ugly; 'tis our wicked tempers that can only make us ugly; and little Biddy, if she'd had a clean face, was one of the prettiest creatures I ever set eyes on,' said old nurse. 'She had eyes as blue as the sky, and curly hair all over her head, and only wanted washing and feeding up to be a real beauty of a child.'

'Was Pat a real beauty?' asked Tom, ironically.

'Not to look at,' replied old nurse, gravely; 'but, to my mind, he was more than beautiful.'

'More than beautiful!' re-echoed the children.

'Yes,' she answered; 'for, but for his wages, all the rest of his family must have gone into the house—the poorhouse I mean. The boy is only fourteen years old, and he works night and day to get a few pence. He is employed at the bone factory, and earns three shillings a week, that is sixpence a day, and then the foreman gives him another shilling a week and a bit of supper for helping him with something or other in the evening. Sometimes, his mother told me, he gets a job on Saturday afternoons when the factory is closed, and brings home another sixpence or a shilling, poor child! And his wages, with their parish pay, is all they've had a long while. And now the pay is stopped, because Mike is got well, and unless he can get work soon they must all starve, or go into the house; for Pat's four or five shillings a week won't go far with ten hungry mouths, I can tell you.'

The Harleys all at once simultaneously discovered that they had finished tea, and, clustering together in one of the nursery windows, a long confab ensued, which ended in a general rush from the room, and a speedy return to it again, when a strange jingling of money and a great deal of whispering took place. The result of their conference was made known to old nurse by Tom, who placed in her hand six shillings, begging her to see the Donovans very soon, and give them the money. Old nurse took the money, and promised the children it should be given to Mike's wife when Mr. Harley thought best; for, she said, Mr. Harley was going to try and get work for Mike, and the children, delighted at her intelligence, ran off to their play. Mr. Harley not only tried, but succeeded in obtaining employment for Mike Donovan; indeed, Mr. Harley had not been so much in earnest about anything for several years, and his medical man augured well for him from it.

Mrs. Harley had dreaded lest he should suffer from a relapse of his complaint, after the shock he had sustained about Dora. Instead of that, he had been much better, and had never rested in his endeavours until he had secured work for Mike.

Mr. Harley's illness had commenced at the death of Dora's father, to which sad occurrence he constantly accused himself of being accessory. The brothers had been out shooting together, when, accidentally, Mr. Harley's gun went off, lodging its contents in his brother William's back. Every effort was used to prolong life; but the spine was so injured that medical aid was unavailing, and in three days William Harley died. From that time Mr. Harley had sunk into a deep melancholy, from which he appeared totally unable to rouse himself. Dora's arrival and admission into his household had diverted his mind from his sad reflections for a brief period, but he soon relapsed into his old state again. But when Dora was lost—his brother's child—the precious little one whom he had innocently deprived of father and protector,—all his feelings and energies were enlisted on her behalf, and he realized that in her safety was his happiness. Then, when she was found, there was her restorer to be rewarded and put into a way of getting his bread, which again took Mr. Harley out of himself; and his doctor said that Mrs. Harley must try to find something constantly to employ his mind, that he might not fall back again into the morbid state in which he had rem long. Dora came to the rescue, just as Mr. Harley had come to the conclusion that he had done all that had to be done, and must have a little quiet, by suggesting, 'Would it not be nice for good Pat to learn some trade?'

Her proposition met with his immediate approval; and the evening after it had been made, Pat was requested to wait upon Mr. Harley, that he might discover what the boy would like to be. All the elder children managed to get a peep at Pat from over the banisters, as he went into their papa's study; having coaxed the servant who opened the door to ring the upstair bell when he arrived.

When Pat first saw Mr. Harley, it was some minutes before he could summon up courage to answer any questions audibly; but after a little while he managed to stammer forth, he'd 'like to be a smith, and make horse-shoes, and blow the bellows.'

Mr. Harley told him if he were a good boy, a smith he should be; and the next day set about inquiring for a respectable master to apprentice him to.

Mr. Harley's improved health enabled Mrs. Harley to spend more time with her children; and Johnny and Dora could boast of delightful hours passed with mamma and auntie, after Miss Mills left them. Little Agnes began to learn to read at mamma's knee, and would sit as still as a mouse whilst she talked or read to Johnny and Dora. One afternoon, Mrs. Harley had been reading from 'sermons for children' about the love of Jesus in coming down from heaven to die for little boys and girls as well as grown-up men and women, when Johnny wept so violently, that, as soon as she had finished the sermon, she asked him why he cried so much, when he had heard it often before.

'Oh, mamma!' sobbed Johnny, hiding his face against her, 'I never knew before that Jesus died for me.'

Mrs. Harley let him weep on; for she knew that the same blessed Spirit which had opened her child's heart to sorrow over his sinful nature, would speedily turn his sorrow into joy. Taught by God's Holy Spirit, Johnny had made the all-important discovery,—that great discovery by which alone we can look up to God and call Him Father,—that great discovery which many many anxious seekers have been years and years in making, and which many, to their misery, never try to make, until, too late, they stand in the presence of Jesus, no longer their Saviour, but their Judge.

Happy little Johnny! early led by the Good Shepherd into the green pastures, and early taught what kings and sages would have given worlds, had they possessed them, to know.

CHAPTER VII.

AGAIN the weeks slipped by, and Pat Donovan was apprenticed to a most respectable smith, giving fair promise of doing well. Mr. Harley having seen father and son employed, became so interested in Mike's younger children, that he turned his thoughts upon getting them to attend schools, and begged his wife and old nurse to procure them decent clothing as speedily as possible, that they might be enabled to do so. He also went out regularly every evening for a drive, taking two or three of his own children with him; and the neighbours began to talk about Mr. Harley's beginning to look as he did before his poor brother's death. The very house appeared more cheerful through his improved health; for frequently young voices were heard in the staircase and hall, and young faces were seen peeping out of the lower windows. These alterations were gradually and quietly made; yet made they were, until it became a rule for the six children to go down to their papa's room as soon as they had finished tea in the nursery. Dora and Johnny often spent their after-dinner hour in the study together; for where one was to be found, the other was sure not to be far distant. The children were preparing to go down, as usual, one October evening, when nurse called to Johnny, who had been dancing on the tips of his toes, to 'wait a minute,' whilst she finished Aggie, to have his hair re-brushed before he went.

'I can do it, nursey,' cried Johnny, rushing off to a chest of drawers, upon which a looking-glass stood, and clambering up on the baby's chair to see himself; but before nurse could prevent or stop him, the chair tipped, and he fell over on his head. He was picked up quite insensible, and remained so for some minutes, to the horror and fright of the servants and Mrs. Harley, who had been instantly sent for, and who could scarcely believe it possible that such a slight fall could have produced such a serious result. The doctor having arrived, Johnny was undressed and put to bed, with orders for him to be kept very quiet, and to be constantly watched, as he was suffering from slight concussion of the brain, and might have a convulsive fit at any moment. Doctor Reed told old nurse that he should not have thought so seriously of the accident, had not Johnny been such a fragile, sensitive child; but he sadly feared the shock would be too much for him, and that he would sink beneath it.

In the night, whilst they watched beside Johnny, the doctor's fears came true; and the poor little fellow was seized with convulsions, which lasted for a long time, never leaving him until he was quite exhausted, and lay like a little dead thing. The sorrow of the household can easily be conceived, when it became known that Johnny, the sunbeam and pet of all, was dangerously ill, and perhaps would never recover. Tom crept off to his bedroom whenever he heard Johnny's name mentioned; and when he came out again, the red rims round his eyes told plainly what he had been doing; whilst Constance, when at home, clung to nurse, and entreated to be let stay with her in the nursery. Dora sat in one corner of Johnny's bedroom, pale and silent, only an occasional sob attesting her deep feelings. She was so still and quiet, that no one thought of taking any notice of her, except to make her go into the nursery at meal times, or to bed at night; but often, in the dead of night, a little white-draped figure stole into Johnny's room, and begged and prayed the nurse, watching beside his cot, to let her stay a 'wee bit' with her.

A week passed by, and Johnny still continued very ill; for seldom a day went by without his having a fit or two. He was quite sensible between them, and would sit pillowed up for a few minutes together, and talk to those about him. Dora and papa were the first he called for when he came to himself, and they were never far off.

Johnny's seventh birthday was drawing very near, and he remembered it, and wanted to know what his brother, sisters, and cousin were making for him. Alas! poor children, they had scarcely thought about it, and knew not what to answer; but Mrs. Harley said there would be little presents ready for him when the time came, and told them she would give them money to purchase some. But Tom would not hear of buying a gift for Johnny, and worked hard to finish a pretty ship against the day, whilst Constance and Dora made the flags and sails, and dressed some tiny dolls as sailors for it; and many tears were shed, and many sighs escaped their breasts, over their work for Johnny.

The tenth day after the accident arrived, and it wanted but one more to Johnny's birthday. The doctors had pronounced him decidedly better, and spoke more hopefully of the future. The evening drew on, and when Johnny was asleep, the children placed the little ship, rigged and manned, just where he could see it when he waked; then, kissing his wasted hand as it lay without the coverlet, silently withdrew. About midnight Johnny woke, and spied the little vessel; then calling for Dora, who heard him in a moment, and bounded to his side, he told her to thank Tom and Conny for it in the morning, and say he thought it 'very pretty.' 'And Dora,' he said, throwing his arms round her neck, 'kiss "Pearl" for me when you go to Aunt Jenny's, and tell dear cooky that I have never forgot her, because she was so very kind to me. And oh! please, Dora, love Jesus, and mind and come to Johnny, and bring papa with you, Dora. I am very sleepy now; good night, Dora, good night!' And the little arms unclasped, and he dozed off. Dora crept back to her bed, and cried herself to sleep, she felt so very sad and miserable. When she next woke, she heard strange voices in the inner room, and she saw people moving about; and sitting up in her bed listening, she heard some one say, 'It is over;' and then there was such a dreadful cry, that her heart ceased beating for a moment or two. Why were they crying if the fit was over? They ought to be glad, and not weep, or make a noise, she thought; and, slipping out of bed, she stole to the open door and peeped in. She could not make it out at all; for the doctors were there, and her uncle and aunt were there, and both of the nurses, and her aunt was crying bitterly—oh, so bitterly! but there was no sound in Johnny's cot, and she could see that he was fast asleep, with the little ship by his side.

'Why do you weep, auntie?' she whispered, as she crept to her side.

Mr. and Mrs. Harley started at her voice; and Mr. Harley, taking her into his arms, tremulously replied, 'Because God has sent for Johnny.'

'But he is asleep, uncle?' questioned Dora.

'Yes, asleep in Jesus.'

She knew all then; and, hiding her face on her uncle's bosom, the strong man and the little child wept together. Mr. Harley carried her down to the study with him, and sitting on his knee, her head still resting against him, they mourned in silence—a silence only broken by a suppressed sob from Mrs. Harley, as she lay upon the sofa in the same room with them. The day had begun to break when old nurse came to see after Dora, and to propose carrying her to sleep with Constance; but she cried 'Oh no, no!' and clung closer to her uncle.

'You will catch your death, Miss Dora; you've nought on but your bed-gown,' pleaded nurse.

'Oh, let me stay! let me stay!' entreated Dora.

'Let her remain,' interposed Mr. Harley.

'And bring a pillow and blankets down here, nurse,' said Mrs. Harley, getting up off the sofa.

Nurse brought the pillow and blankets, and made a little bed upon the sofa, on which Mr. Harley placed Dora, and covering her tenderly up, bade her try and go to sleep. Then going back to his chair, Dora saw her aunt take a low seat by his side, leaning her head against his arm; and as she heard her whisper, 'My Johnny's birthday on earth angels will keep in heaven,' she fell asleep.

(To be continued.)

THE DARK MOUNTAINS.

WHERE are these? Are they a myth, a mere figure of speech, or is the graphic phrase descriptive of reality? Have they ever been explored, and can any good be said of them?

Some discoveries have been made which establish their real situation, and their peculiar character, in terms sufficiently explicit for pilgrims and sojourners in the earth. Let me tell my fellow-travellers, in their passage to the other world, to beware of these formidable mountains of unbelief, irreligion, peril, and despair.

There is an old map, which we cannot too often consult, which well defines the situation of these singular ranges, and very clearly describes them. According to this authority, they lie in the enemy's land, far out in the wilderness, distant from the holy city, remote from the vineyard of the Lord, as well as from the better country—far away from the Sun of Righteousness; so that, from base to summit, they are all, and always, enveloped in a pall of darkness—never illumined by the light of grace or of glory. The wanderer from God can tell us something about these dreary regions, where in other days he roamed, when living as he listed. If now reclaimed, he regards with shame his former unprofitable life. With many a shudder he recalls the perils and perplexities that continually met him, as he stumbled over those rough and slippery heights, venturing farther and farther into the thick gloom of those fearful mountains; cut off from virtue and from God, far from the light of truth and holiness, and verging on to the regions of utter and perpetual darkness! He can never adequately thank the Good Shepherd for his timely arrest and gracious rescue. But where one such prodigal is recovered, how many grow more wild and hardened, and ultimately meet the doom of sons of perdition! So it was with Cain and Esau, with Saul, Ahab, and Judas, and multitudes since their day.

How strong the delusion that leads mortals thus astray! These mountains, as dimly seen from a distance, and by the untrustworthy eye of sense, are invested with illusory charms. Their obscure summits are wonderfully alluring to hearts alienated from the life of God. And for a season the fascination has all the power of reality. On a nearer approach, the testimony of personal experience begins to dispel the enchantment. Ere he is aware, the heedless one becomes entangled in a labyrinth, which he cannot safely traverse, and from which he is not likely to emerge. Darkness is upon him, and grows ever more intense. The dense chilling shadows wrap their lengthening folds around him. The voices of his late gay companions no longer please him. They are all alike erring, helpless, and lost, groping their uncertain way down to the regions of the dead—to the blackness of darkness for ever!

This wonderfully impressive picture of the career and end of the godless, an inspired pen has drawn. You will find it in the writing of an ancient seer, in which the author describes the condition and peril of those who seek to live without God in the world. In his description he sketches the dark mountains so vividly, that the words are like the touches of a painter, and we seem to see the little candle of the wicked burning very low, and getting dimmer still, until finally it goes out in obscure darkness, and the wretched wanderers plunge on amidst the gross darkness of the shadow of death; bewildered, imperilled, and ready to perish, yet tripping desperately on, stumbling along the dangerous passes of these dark mountains,—imagery so suggestive of all that is alarming, calamitous, and retributive, in the case of those who, departing from God, are themselves finally abandoned of Him! Behold the despisers, how they wonder and perish!

Contemplating this solemn delineation by the prophet of the Lord, we think at once of benighted heathen, dwelling in earth's dark places, sitting debased and hopeless amidst the heavy shadows of error, superstition, and cruel crime, and all their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death. It seems, too, a faithful description of the godless worldling, in the terrible night of his sorrows, uncheered by the light of faith or the promise of mercy; when his props give way, and his heart is crushed beneath that sorrow of the world which worketh death. It is likewise an apt picture of the dying unbeliever, bidding a last reluctant adieu to the light of this world, and descending with trembling steps, uncomforted and hopeless, into the darkness of the grave, which to him is darkness that may be felt, because unrelieved by the light of a blessed immortality. And oh, how accurate a mirror it is of the perpetual unrest of the eternally lost! Dark indeed are the mountains over which they stumble, in the fruitless quest of a blessing. In that lone land of deep despair, all hope is blotted out.

'Silence, and solitude, and gloom,
In those forgetful realms appear.'

Ah! if we wish our dark days to be cheered by an auspicious and undying brightness, and the grave, disarmed of its terrors, to be graciously illuminated, and the unseen world appear to us a shining shore, we must keep near the Sun of Righteousness, and walk in the light of God,—a light which will never pale, but will outshine every eclipse; waxing stronger and still brighter as we near that perfect day, when the shadows will all be gone, and we shall awake in the likeness of Immanuel, amidst the kindling glories of the resurrection.—Rev. J. E. Nassau.

ODD BUT USEFUL FRAGMENTS.—No. I.

MEN look at the faults of others with a telescope; at their own with the same instrument reversed, or not at all.

It is dangerous for one to climb his family-tree too high, for he is very apt to get among dead and decayed branches.

Disappointments feed and nourish us in the desert places of life, as the ravens did the prophet in the wilderness.

The man who walks 'a thousand miles in a thousand hours,' is more generally admired than he who walks uprightly threescore years and ten.

Commune often with yourself. No doubt, you might commune with much wiser persons, but with none more profitably.

It would be well if we had less medicine, and more cures; less profession, and more piety; less law, and more justice.

Precept and example, like the blades of a pair of scissors, are admirably adapted to their end when conjoined; separated, they lose the greater portion of their utility.

It is with the warning voices of our souls as with the tones of nature around us; often inaudible in the glare of the day, they are heard distinctly in the darkness.

It is only those who have done nothing, who fancy they can do everything.

Fancy runs most furiously when a guilty conscience drives it.

Very few persons have sense enough to despise the praise of a fool.

The memory should be a storehouse, not a lumber-room.

No man has a right to do as he pleases, except when he pleases to do right.

You may gather a rich harvest of knowledge by reading; but thought is the winnowing machine.

Keep the horrors at arm's length. Never turn a blessing round, to see whether it has a dark side to it.

Show a haughty man that you do not look up to him, and he will not feel that he can look down upon you.

Days are lost in lamentations over the loss of days.

One rose upon a bush, though but a little one, and though not yet blown, bears that which proves it to be a true rose-tree.

All men who do anything, must endure a depreciation of their efforts. It is the dirt which their chariot wheels throw up.

There is a Gaelic proverb: 'If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes.'

One is much less sensible of cold on a bright day than a cloudy one: thus the sunshine of cheerfulness and hope will lighten every trouble.

Our customs and habits are like the ruts in roads; the wheels of life settle into them, and we jog along through the mire, because it is too much trouble to get out of them.

Unreal religion is the curse of the age. A heavy curse it is.

Perjury is nothing thought of in our day among religious men. They sign articles which they don't believe.

Religion is not a thing which spends itself. It is like a river, which widens continually, and is never so broad or so deep as at its mouth, where it rolls into the ocean of eternity.

If you have great talents, industry will improve them; if moderate abilities, industry will supply their deficiencies. Nothing is denied to well-directed labour; nothing is ever to be attained without it.

A man might frame and let loose a star to roll in its orbit, and yet not have done so memorable a thing before God, as he who lets go a golden-orbed thought to roll through the generations of time.

In this age of speed, when we travel thirty miles an hour, are we less impatient to be at the end of our journey than when we travelled ten? In this age of cheapness, are we more satisfied with our bargains, or more benevolent with our surplus, than formerly?

A good man is kinder to his enemy than bad men are to their friends.

He who puts a bad construction upon a good act, reveals his own wickedness at heart.

Every heart has a secret drawer, the spring of which is only known to the owner.

Happiness grows at our own firesides, and is not to be picked in the stranger's gardens.

The pleasantest things in the world are pleasant thoughts; and the greatest art in life is to have as many of them as possible.

It is little troubles that wear the heart out. It is easier to throw a bomb-shell a mile than a feather—even with artillery.

There is a tendency in all untutored minds, and not in them alone, to consider everything profound that is obscure.

Children always turn toward the light. Oh that grown-up people in this would become like little children!

Ritualism is not religion. It is simply worldliness and love of pleasure assuming a more religious form than in the theatre or the public-house. It is the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life.

THE SABBATH.

ONCE more the day of rest returns,
Once more my spirit in me burns,
And pants to see the Lord.
Yes, Lord, I long to see Thee nigh;
I long to fix my ravish'd eye
Upon the Triune God.

My feet shall tread the house of prayer:
Oh, let me find my Saviour there,
And feast upon his love!
Oh, Jesus! let thy Spirit rest
And breathe upon my clay-cold breast,
And warm it from above!

G. B. C.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

ROM. v. 2.

LET us note here—(1) The grace; (2) The introduction into it; (3) The abiding, or standing; (4) The rejoicing.

I. The grace.—It is here called 'this grace,'—a well-known, most suitable, and sufficient grace, or free love; the free love of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. This is 'the true grace of God;' free love in the heart of God to the ungodly, to the unloving and unloveable. This grace, or free love, is absolute and unconditional; considering not our deservings or qualifications, but simply our need. It looks at us not as good, but as evil; not as sensible, but insensible; not as penitent, but impenitent; not as good in any sense or degree, but as wholly evil. It is not created or awakened by our amendments, or good feelings, or love, or prayer, or regeneration. It regards us simply as sinners, ungodly, needing God's favour and help. It is this free love that begins, carries on, and consummates a sinner's deliverance. The knowledge of this divine free love is life eternal. Out of this fountain, ever full and flowing, there come to us pardon, and joy, and health, and consolation, and light. He that knows this free love, knows that which saves him, and draws him into happy fellowship with God. He that knows it not, is still afar off; the child of darkness, and the worshipper of an unknown God. We can neither be happy nor holy till we know it. It is the good news of God's free love that we preach. This is 'the ministry of the reconciliation;' this is our mission and commission, to 'testify the gospel of the grace of God,' and to tell that it is 'by his mercy that He saves us;' to speak of 'the exceeding riches of the grace of God.'

II. The access, or introduction.—We do not create or awaken this free love by any goodness or qualification of our own. It exists independent of these. Nor did Christ, by his coming and death, create that love. This love existed before; it was this that sent Christ. 'God so loved the world, that He gave his Son.' Yet, without Christ, this love could never have reached us. It would have been a distant and inaccessible well, a spring shut up, a fountain sealed. It is through Him that this free love has found its way to us. He brings it to us, and us to it. He gives access, and entrance, and introduction; for the word implies all these. It is used elsewhere to signify the bringing or introducing one person to another (Luke ix. 41; Acts xvi. 20); and is used not simply in reference to the grace of God, but to God himself (1 Peter iii. 18; Eph. ii. 18, iii. 12). Our outward or objective Introducer and introduction is Christ himself; our inward or subjective introduction and introducer is faith. Jesus brings us to the Father and the Father's grace, but He does so by producing faith in us. Without, or apart from Christ, the grace cannot come to us; and without faith, Christ and we are kept at a distance from each other. God has given us his true testimony, both as to his grace and as to his Son; and we, in believing that testimony, become connected with both. The grace is deposited in Christ for us; and we, in coming to Him, get the grace that is in Him. The grace that is in Him, He has received for men, even for the rebellious; and this was the grace which He manifested when here on earth, both in his words and deeds. He was the gracious One, and, as such, the representative of the Father. We go to Him to get his own and the Father's grace—the free love of Godhead.

III. The standing, or abiding.—In this grace, or free love, we have stood since we were introduced into it; and in it we are standing, and shall stand. 'We stand in it!' This is a believing man's true position. He takes his stand on the free love of God. This raises him up and holds him up; keeps him from fainting, or falling, or sliding. This free love is to him—(1) abiding peace, (2) abiding strength, (3) abiding security. This free love is to him—(1) sunshine, (2) rain, (3) food, (4) water, (5) medicine, (6) wine. At this well he stands and drinks, in this sun he basks, to this storehouse he comes for everything. Have we used this free love as we ought? Are we using it constantly? Do we use it for strengthening our faith, for quickening our daily life, for increasing our holiness, for dispelling our doubts, for ministering consolation? In the constant recognition of this love, there is material for a close walk with God, and for a useful, zealous life. Are we thus employing it? Are we using it pure and undiluted; LOVE—true, free, unmingled, unmerited love? Or are we diluting it,—polluting it, by mingling something of our own with it; making it less pure, and heavenly, and generous; less absolutely, and unconditionally, and entirely free? Let us remember how much our stedfastness and progress depend on our constant recognising of and living on this free love. Apart from it, all is weakness, bondage, darkness, and instability. O free love of God, what a fountain of life and strength thou art to the weary, helpless sinner!

IV. The rejoicing.—This grace is not merely stability for us, but joy, and hope, and glory. Standing in this grace, we are filled with joy. This joy comes not merely from the past and present, but from the future; not merely from the knowledge that we are beloved of God, but from the knowledge of what that love is to do for us hereafter. We rejoice because our future is filled with hope—the hope of the glory of God. Joy comes, then, from hope; hope from the God of love; hope sure and stedfast; hope that maketh not ashamed; everlasting hope. Glory is ours in prospect—the glory of God; and so great is it, that we reckon that the sufferings of this life are not worthy to be compared with the glory to be revealed—the 'exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' It is the glory of the new heavens and earth, the glory of resurrection, the glory of the kingdom, the very glory of Christ. And it is all ours, simply as those who have known and believed this free love of God. Hence the apostle's prayer, 'The God of (the) hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing.' Take these lessons:

1. Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus.—It is on this we plant our feet; it is this that makes us strong. Love is our strength.

2. Rejoice in the Lord.—Ours should be a full and constant gladness; for, both before and behind, we are compassed about with that which gladdens.

3. Abound in hope.—It is bright, blessed, and glorious. It is the hope of reigning with Christ. It will sustain and sanctify. It will animate and cheer. Thus do we glorify the God of hope.

THE BELIEVER REALIZING HIS CONDITION, AND RESPONDING TO GOD'S CLAIMS.

BY THE REV. JOHN COX, IPSWICH.

HOW much failure has there been among God's people in all ages, for want of realizing the condition in which God has placed them! This failure has been seen in the lack of a suitable response to God's claims. I go no further back than the former dispensation. We hear the God of Israel saying respecting his privileged people: 'What could have been done more to my vineyard that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?' (Isa. v. 4.) Similar expressions are found throughout the prophets, proving the truth of what Moses foretold: 'Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful, and hast forgotten God that formed thee' (Deut. xxxii. 18). When 'the prophet like unto Moses,' even Him 'who was Son over his own house,' appeared; by his searching parables of the 'vineyard and husbandmen,' and 'the barren fig-tree,' He taught the same saddening fact. On this account Israel was broken off from their good olive-tree, and the Gentiles were grafted in. But these have not continued in God's goodness, and the threatening hangs over them, soon, it may be, to be executed: 'Thou also shalt be cut off.'

All this proves that external privileges and national advantages must be accounted for, and that corporate responsibility is a very solemn thing. Hitherto every dispensation has failed through the sin of man; but the time is coming when, in one nation at least, it shall be proved that God can and will give the grace of stability. Israel shall be 'a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation.' God's law shall be written in their hearts, and they shall not depart from Him; and then they shall not be plucked up nor thrown down any more for ever. They will then appreciate their blessed condition, perfectly respond to God's claims, and diligently teach all other nations the ways of the Lord.

At the present time there is a 'remnant of Israel according to the election of grace,' and 'God is also gathering out from the Gentiles a people for his name.' These are all one in Christ Jesus. To them He is 'all,' and He is 'all, in all.' They enter into this blessed condition, and respond to the same in proportion as they know this, and live on Him, and live by Him, as He lived by the Father. But as regards even these, it is too much a day of feebleness of faith and lack of joy, because there is not enough of separateness from the world around, and communion with the world above. 'Come out, and be separate;' 'Seek the things that are above,' are words that must be acted upon, if we would be happy in the Lord, and strong for the Lord. There is ample provision in the offices and undertakings of the Holy Spirit to bring all this about; and if the heaven-provided prayers of God's word are believingly used, we shall prove that the Spirit of the Lord is not straitened. (See Ps. cxliii. 8, li. 12; Eph. i. 17, 19, iii. 14, 21; 2 Thess. i. 11, 12, iii. 5; Rom. xv. 13.)

It is profitable to go back to 'the beginning of the gospel,' not only to find the pure stream of truth flowing unpolluted by human additions, but to see how plentifully Christians then drank of these waters, and how (like the few tried men of Gideon's army) they were so strengthened as to be ready for all God had for them to bear and to do. We now propose thus to go back to the fountain, and to meditate awhile on that grand description which the apostle gives of primitive Christianity in 2 Cor. v. 16–18: 'Wherefore, henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more. Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation.' These words are preceded by, and are an inference from, other equally remarkable utterances, in which the apostle defends his conduct as an apostle of Christ, and accounts for it by a glorious exhibition of the gospel of God.

Festus was not the only one who thought Paul 'beside himself.' But the fact was, 'much learning,' even the study of the science of redeeming love, had made him a sober enthusiast, —a man whose enthusiasm was a strong, calm, fervent passion. 'The love of Christ constrained him.' There is no sight, out of heaven, more beautiful than an honest, wise, loving, persevering enthusiast in such a cause as this. The word 'constrained,' we are told, is the same word as the Lord uses in Luke xii. 50: 'How am I straitened!' As the Lord Jesus was bound up, heart and soul, with his great work, and carried on to its glorious consummation, as by a wave of infinite love; so was Paul bound to the cause of Christ, and carried onward, through all manner of trials, to the most self-denying labours, by the love of Christ. He saw that love, as displayed throughout his life, on the cross, and upon the throne, as the greatest of all facts, and felt it to be an almighty motive power. Nothing is so strong as love; nothing so prompts to action, or so carries through difficulties. As if he had said, 'I, every day and hour, constantly and habitually judge and recollect that I owe my soul's eternal salvation to the love of Christ in dying for me; and thus judging, I feel myself irresistibly, but most sweetly, carried forward to all holy exercises, and in every act and work of evangelical obedience.'

The words, 'because we thus judge,' have a reference to what comes after: 'That if one died for all, then were all dead.' These few emphatic words have often been misinterpreted, and so their bearing on the connection has been lost sight of. 'One died for all,' has been supposed by some to teach that Christ died alike for all men; and the words, 'Then were all dead,' have been cited to prove that all mankind by nature were dead in sin. But let the words be read as follows: 'If one,' i.e. the representative, 'died for all,' i.e. the represented, 'then all the represented died,' i.e. expiated their sins; or, more literally: 'If one died on behalf of all, then did the whole die.' 'If one died for all, then all died: all for whom Christ died, died in Him; his death was their death.' We do not doubt but that the death of Jesus had in it an infinite efficacy, and that it furnishes a ground for inviting all men to look unto Him and be saved. We believe that its bearing upon God's government opens a way for the expression of God's kindness towards MAN as man (John iii. 16, 17; Titus ii. 11, iii. 4; Luke ii. 14; 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6); but we believe also that there was a special design in Christ's death, which those only may appropriate who believe in Jesus. They have a right to identify themselves with Him in all He did on earth, and all He is in heaven. The discovery and enjoyment of this magnifies and endears his love, and makes it become a personal inheritance and mighty motive power. We must view ourselves by faith one with Jesus judicially, in order to become one with Him practically. If we reckon ourselves judged, condemned, justified in the righteous Surety, raised and blessed in the new covenant Head, we shall aim to imitate Him, who is the Servant of the Father, in loving service, and in the spirit of sonship. As He lived, and ever lives, to the glory of the Father, so shall we desire 'to live not to ourselves, but to Him who died for us, and rose again.' Having received a life growing out of his death, there will be life instead of death; in other words, having found salvation, there will be dedication as an effect. The old way of 'walking after the course of this world,' and of living to ourselves—which is indeed really a 'death in trespasses and sins,'—will be brought to an end, and a new life, growing out of new motives, hopes, and aims, will succeed. Thus, the new condition being realized, God's claims are responded to.

This great change, this renouncement of the old life, not only refers to sin and worldliness, but also to religiousness; to everything, in short, with which God has no sympathy. 'Henceforth know we no man after the flesh.' The term 'flesh' is often used by Paul to set forth the religiousness in which he formerly gloried, and in which so many were still glorying (Phil. iii. 3, 4).

He 'had no confidence in the flesh;' he 'counted it all but loss.' He constantly withstood all who contended for it (Gal. ii. 14, vi. 12). He therefore proceeds to say, 'Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet henceforth know we Him no more.' Paul did not undervalue the incarnation of Christ, but earnestly taught its vast importance (Rom. i. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 8). He did not doubt but that Christ, in his resurrection, took up again the very same body that was buried, and that He carried it up to the throne of God. These points were not questioned. He is here referring to Jewish hopes of a Messiah, and to low or restricted views of Him by those Christians who were hampered by Jewish prejudices. The Messiah he preached was a spiritual and glorified one—a Messiah for the world, as he goes on to teach (vers. 19, 20), and not merely a Messiah for the Jews. As if he had said, 'We are advanced above that way and means of the knowledge of Christ, by the fleshly ordinances of the Old Testament. And we know Him not according to that bodily presence of his, which his disciples enjoyed in the days of his flesh. We have attained somewhat above that also. We have his presence with us by his Spirit. We have a clearer view of his glory than we could have had by beholding Him in the flesh. This is our spiritual posture and condition. We are past the knowledge of Him according to the flesh; we cannot attain or receive the sight of Him in glory; but "the life which we now live in the flesh is by the faith of the Son of God."' The apostle then proceeds to apply this to, and to show its bearing upon, true believers—i.e. those before described as having 'died with Christ, and risen with Him,' and so being one with Him. 'Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things have passed away; behold, all things are become new.' Paul was continually teaching Christians to estimate themselves, as regards their condition and prospects, by what Christ was for them in heaven. While he ever taught that Christ's obedience unto death is the meritorious cause of their justification, and that here is their title to an eternal inheritance of life (Rom. v. 12-21), yet he would have them regard the exaltation and priestly life of Christ in heaven as bringing them into, and sustaining them in, a life of oneness with Jesus, and as securing them unto the enjoyment of eternal life in resurrection glory. To the former of these he now refers, and shows what a powerful and practical effect it should constantly have upon them. If we are not to know men after the flesh, as regards earthly honours, and riches, and fleshly religion; if we are not 'to know Christ after the flesh,' but are to rise above Jewish expectations, and even above apostolic experience during 'the days of his flesh,'—then surely we must not know ourselves after the flesh. We must not 'mind the things of the flesh, but those of the Spirit;' we must 'make no provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lust thereof;' but must 'put on the Lord Jesus Christ,' and thus act agreeably with our new condition, and in conformity to our glorified Head and Saviour.

The argument of the apostle will appear the more forcible if we rightly understand the words, 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature,' and see the bearing of the word 'therefore,' connecting as it does what he had said about Christ, with what he is now saying about 'the man in Christ.'

The expression in our translation, 'He is a new creature,' is generally considered not to convey the full and true meaning of the apostle. The idea it seems to suggest is that of regeneration or conversion. But is not this included in the preceding words, 'If any man be in Christ?' The words which follow, 'Old things have passed away; behold, all things are become new,' are also supposed to set forth the moral effects which follow upon regeneration. It is quite true that in regeneration a new life is imparted; it is also true that, wherever that new life is, a great and blessed change will take place in the character and conduct; but is this the teaching of the Holy Spirit here? We think not. Who of the regenerated people of God ever found that at their regeneration, or even years after, 'old things are passed away, and all things are become new?' Have not many sincere souls been stumbled by these words having been thus applied, and been led to fear that they are not renewed at all, because they do not prove 'all things to be new,' as regards inward experience and outward habits.

Our translators evidently were not satisfied with the rendering of the text, and have put in the margin, 'Let him be a new creature.' This also is a blessed thought, and a proper argument, quite in agreement with many exhortations in other epistles; but is it the mind of the Spirit in this text? Do not the words mean, that the man in Christ is 'a new creation,' or 'is in a new creation?' He is both. He is associated with that glorious Person spoken of as 'the new thing in the earth,' and who, as a reward for his service and sufferings on earth, is in heaven the head and foundation of a new creation, and who will at last say, 'Behold, I make all things new.' Some read the text, 'There is to him a new creation.' These renderings, though varied, are not opposed; they take nothing away from what our version states, and do not at all lower the moral force of the words, but rather show the ground of, and reason for all the practical results called for. Adam, standing in innocence on his own foundation, was a living soul, 'innocent and intelligent,' with Paradise all around him. Every believer is in Christ; he has in him a new man, 'created in righteousness and true holiness' (Eph. iv. 24); and around him is a new creation, suited to his new life, containing all spiritual blessings for him to enjoy; and all this in connection with millions who, like himself, are the trophies of redeeming love and the workmanship of the renewing Spirit. He has a new standing, new character, new condition, new employment, and new prospects. As represented by and united to Christ, he no longer belongs to those old things which are under judgment, and which must pass away in a storm of wrath, however man may adorn them, and give them grand new names; but he belongs to the new creation; he already bears its impress, and has a title to all its glories, though as yet he is in the world where the old things still are, and though, in his own experience, he sadly feels that he has an old nature which has lustings after them, and requires to be continually watched and mortified (Rom. viii. 12, 13). Therefore the apostle, after that beautiful description of the new condition and hopes of the Christian, in Col. iii. 1–4, immediately adds, 'Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth.' In Rom. vi. 1–11, he exhibits the believer, in the new creation, as having died and risen with Christ—freed, justified from sin, living unto God; and bids him reckon himself thus dead and alive; and then adds various exhortations to mortify sin—keep it from reigning—to yield himself to God, and to be devoted and diligent in service. His argument here, as elsewhere, substantially is: 'Realize your blessed condition, if you would respond to God's claims; be quite sure that your citizenship is in heaven, then you will live above the world, live for Christ, and look for Him to come to change your yet unredeemed body (Rom. viii. 23), and fashion it like unto his glorious body.'

'Finish, then, thy new creation,
Pure and spotless let it be;
Let us see our whole salvation
Perfectly restored in Thee.'

The word 'therefore' is the connecting link between what the apostle had said in verses 15, 16, and what we have just contemplated as regards the privileges and hopes of God's people. As if he had said, 'Would you understand why I know no man after the flesh, no, nor Christ himself? It is because I am a new creation, and am in a new creation. I have had a new principle wrought in me, by which my thoughts and affections are turned in another direction, even toward those spiritual and eternal realities which God hath revealed to me by his Spirit, and which come to me through my union with Christ in death and resurrection, and my oneness with Him as the glorified Head of the new creation. My former thoughts and hopes have perished, as is the case with a man when he dies (Ps. cxlvi. 3). I am now born into this new creation, and henceforth would act as one who belongs to that which is heavenly and eternal.'

Having taken this survey, the apostle rises exultingly to the great Source of all: 'All things are of God.' He rejoices in the blessed fact that he had realized in his own soul the power of Christ's work in bringing him to God: 'Who hath reconciled us unto himself by Jesus Christ;' and then surveys, with wondering, trembling joy, 'the grace given unto him to preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ:' 'He hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.' He thus teaches us that we should not only seek to respond to God's claims, as regards communion with God and separation from evil, but also by consecration to his service, in diligently publishing that salvation which is so precious to us, and has been so powerful in us. And the more its preciousness is realized and its power felt, the more earnest shall we be to make known the method of reconciliation to sinners, and 'to build up one another in our most holy faith.' But into the wonders and glories of this verse we must not now attempt to enter.

Passing over the remaining part of this chapter, in which the gospel that Paul preached among the Gentiles is so fully and freely set forth, we just quote the first verse of the sixth chapter, which ought never to have been separated from the fifth: 'We then, as workers together with God, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.' Paul besought sinners to be reconciled, with somewhat of the earnestness of Him who wept over Jerusalem; and he besought saints to be devoted and diligent, with somewhat of the affection of Him who, in the upper room, spent those hours which bordered so closely on his great agony, in calling upon his beloved followers to be fruit-bearing branches in Him, the true vine. 'Receive not,' he says, 'this grace in vain,' or resultlessly. 'If ye have died with Christ, and risen with Him, seek those things that are above. Live for Him who died for you, and rose again.' Ah! it is sad to think how feeble and how fitful has been our response to God's loving claims. Surely it would be otherwise if there was a deeper and more constant realization of our present blessed condition, and of the love which gave birth to it. Then let us 'continue in the grace of God;' 'cleave to the Lord with purpose of heart;' 'abide in Him,' the true vine; 'continue in his love;' that so, when He speaks to us, by way of requirement, we may, like the true children of Abraham, respond as he did: 'Behold, here I am;' and then, like him, follow out simply the Lord's biddings, without procrastination or questioning. And what a matter of joyful hope is it, that, when the new creation shall be finished, the response will be perfect and perpetual, because then the motive power will be fully and constantly realized! Then love will be that in the new creation, that gravitation now is in the material universe; and the oft-repeated prayer shall be gloriously answered: 'Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, even as it is done in heaven.' No failure will follow upon this consummation; no tempter will be able to break this chain of harmony. Surely the expectation of this should have a powerful influence now. 'Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as He is pure.'

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER XI.

TWO CHILDISH VISITORS: A SLAVE AND A BRIDE.

WHEN we got home, I found waiting at our door two men with white turbans, and a little girl of six or seven years old, neatly clad, standing meekly, with hands folded and downcast eyes.

They were shopkeepers—Moslems, of course,—and came to offer us the child for sale. She was a slave, not long arrived from Egypt with others. She could not understand any Arabic. I tried to speak to her, and got only a sly glance or two in return.

The Moslems, mistaking my interest in the poor child, began vehemently to recommend her. 'She was healthy, strong, clever; would only cost fifteen hundred piastres' (less than £15).

But Walter told them that English people cannot have slaves; that by English law we should be punished if we bought a human being.

'But, Walter, could not we buy the poor child, in order to set her free? And then I would teach her: she looks a nice little thing.'

'I am afraid that would still be contrary to law, Emily; but we can ask Mr. Wells. I will go with you to-morrow morning to inquire.'

Scarcely had the men led her away, before Um Habeeb, my former servant, made her appearance, bringing her child-bride to visit me. She was hardly larger or older-looking than the little slave girl. But what a difference between them otherwise! The one subdued and sad, the other very conscious that she was the admiration, not only of her mother, but of Katrina and Constantine, and, I dare say she thought of me also. Little puss! she was blazing in embroidery and gold. She came to kiss my hand. Her baby fingers were ornamented with rings; there were bracelets upon her wrists, a necklace round her neck; there were jewels and chains on her tiny turban, a gold embossed plate at the top of her tarboosh, and down her back hung scores of glittering coins among the braids of her hair. Her skirt was of light green silk, and her jacket of violet cloth, stiff with gold embroidery. Could this be the daughter of our old servant, who had been too poor to afford herself a pair of shoes more than once a year? It certainly was Safieh, the very little girl who used to come in wretched cotton garments, not unfrequently in tatters, to play for half an hour beside her mother. Um Habeeb saw my astonishment, and began to tell how Safieh had found a very good husband.

'El Hurmdulillah Elias, my son-in-law, is a clever tailor. He works with Girgi, the best tailor in the town, and soon, Inshallah, he will have a shop of his own. This jacket is his own embroidering. He made her three full suits; and altogether he spent seven thousand piastres (nearly £70) on her clothes and on her jewels. Perhaps he would have spent less; but I would not consent, until he promised her as much as Yessuf, the stone mason, gave to the sister of Elias, for they were married the same night.'

'I hope Safieh will make a good useful wife,' said I, rather puzzled as to what could be said about so infantile a bride.

'Inshallah, under thy favour, O lady!'

'Can she sew nicely?'

'She cannot sew yet.'

'Then I suppose she can prepare and cook her husband's supper?'

'Inshallah, she will do all these things in time. But at present, is she not a child? I cook, and wash, and do all these things; she will learn (under thy favour), when she is a little older.'

After a few not more interesting remarks, during which the child sat shyly playing with the tips of her henna-stained fingers, they kissed my hand and took leave. Just without the door stood a stupid-looking man, of perhaps six-and-twenty, meanly dressed in cotton clothes. Constantine astonished me by saying that he was Elias, the husband of my little visitor.

'That man the child's husband! How could Um Habeeb give her child to so old a man?'

Constantine said, 'It is our a'adeh, lady; but he is a good husband. Her fortune is very good to get such a one.'

---

CHAPTER XII.

JEWISH FESTIVALS.—PRIDE AND PREJUDICE.

THE Jewish autumnal fasts and feasts were almost ended. . . . Sarah had not come to our house at all since the fast of the New Year—Tenemos mo'aid—'we have festival tide,' was her reason. Ten days after New Year comes the great fast of Atonement; and four days after that, begins the feast of Tabernacles, or ingathering, like Passover—at the time of full moon.

Walter was invited by our old acquaintance, Rabbi Raphael, to be present at the synagogue service. I should gladly have gone also, but was not very well.

The windows were all open. The stars were almost quenched in the splendour of the moonbeams, by the light of which Constantine was actually reading as he sat in the court.

My attention was divided between a letter I was writing to England, on the all-important subject of a box to be packed and sent out speedily to Jerusalem, with wedding dresses, orange flowers, and ornaments for an iced cake, which I had resolved should be made here by the united efforts of Khâsah, the baker, and myself. My attention was divided between that and the exquisite beauty of the moonlight, shed over the great mosque, its matchless dome, the cypresses, palms, and minarets, so placed between the mosque and our house as to form one group. The scene was so enchanting, that I could not sit still many moments at a time, but felt constrained to get up every now and then, to gaze and listen to the stillness; so different from the grand days of Jewish history, when Solomon and the assembled nation had celebrated the dedication of the temple, and prolonged the feast of Tabernacles 'yet other seven days.' Different even from the more affecting occasion—at the building of the second house,—when Nehemiah and Ezra comforted the weeping people, and exhorted them to keep the feast with gladness, to 'eat the fat and drink the sweet, and send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared.'

The transition was easy to the still future celebration, of which Zechariah speaks — that great feast of ingathering, when the Passover shall be no more needed, by reason of its Antitype, the great Passover, having been already once offered; and when the dispensation, which was begun at the feast of first-fruits (that Pentecost when Peter first put in the sickle to reap his Master's harvest) shall have for ever passed away. Oh! which among us all shall be present at that ingathering—that harvest-home of the nations?

There was a solemn fitness in the cycle of the Jewish festivals here, in their home in the Land of Promise, which one entirely loses in other countries.

. . . . . .

I had been, I know not how long, at the window, when suddenly there was a sound overhead, as of hundreds and thousands of birds flying, and uttering, as they flew, the peculiar snapping cry of the beecatcher. I went to my terrace and looked up. The sky was perfectly clear, and even blue; I could see every star, but the birds were invisible; yet, there it was—that sound, distinct and unmistakeable! Thousands of beecatchers were certainly flying not very high up between me and the sky. They were migrating for the winter. I have often since heard that same sound on an autumnal night; but never succeeded in seeing the little creatures, though I strained my eyes to the uttermost.

Walter soon came home. He had been much interested by the synagogue service. All the synagogues had been crowded with people in their holiday dress. Of course, no women visible, they being in their own gallery above.

'But, they tell me, Emily, that the great day will be at the end—on the last day of the feast—and have invited us to be there.'

'Just the very thing I wished. How is it, Walter, that people are so separated from each other here in Jerusalem? Here we have been living more than two years, and yet we have seen very little of real Oriental life. What do we know about the Jewish quarter? There must be touching histories, strange characters, all the workings of a living people, in that crowded Jewish quarter; but what do we know of it? We are looking as people do at pictures—we see scenes passing before us, but our life in no way seems to mingle with theirs, to become part of one great stream. How is it? And it is just as bad with the Christians, the Greeks, Armenians, Latins, and with the Moslems. I feel as people do in a dream—for ever expecting the person one is looking at to open his lips and speak, and when he does, and you actually see the lips move, not a sound comes forth—you hear nothing.'

'I have felt all this, Emily, and fretted at it, and thought that want of language was the cause—that as soon as we learnt one or two of the languages, we should get a little nearer. But I don't know, we are not getting much nearer yet. Another thing has struck me. Many of these people have one common mother tongue; but are they any nearer to each other? To take up your comparison. Do the streams of Greek-Arab, and Latin-Arab, and Armenian-Arab life intermingle? I see that they do not,—that they are almost as distinct and separate from each other, as they all are from the Jewish and Moslem-Arab speaking natives. We must go deeper for the cause than language. It must be religion that separates them. Not so much religion, as religious customs and usages. Among the Christians this must be the reason. The Greek is fasting while the Latin is feasting; the one goes by one calendar, the other by a different one; the one reveres one set of saints, the other another. They never can unite in observances common to all. I am inclined to think that the laws about eating and drinking have a good deal to do with this separation. How can people be cordial, who never meet at a social rejoicing? It is not for nothing that the common Arabic word for stomach is heart. I am sure the way to most hearts is through the stomach, let men say what they will.'

'Of course. You are right about the Jews; they can't eat with other people. But the Christians and Moslems?'

'It is the same thing. And then, you know, they are all trained up from infancy to despise each other. The Jews have no other refuge; they can but repay scorn with scorn. You have noticed how even Abraham, every now and then, talks of "those Goyim!" and I was much struck by the Jews to-night in the synagogue—all happy, devoutly keeping their feast. It was evident that they thought themselves the people, and that they did not at that moment care, or even waste a thought upon all the Gentile dwellers in Jerusalem or Palestine, or even the whole earth. As to the Moslems, one has only to look at the insufferable pride in their carriage as they walk through the streets, and snuff up the air, to know why they don't associate with others.'

'Talking of these things, Walter, I was shocked to-day by Katrina. The Bait Jala woman, whom we saw last year in the olive groves, when we were with Mr. Anderson, came to sell me some olives. While she was in the kitchen, Katrina ostentatiously gathered up the silver spoons, and carried them into the dining-room, saying to me when she brought them: "It is better, Sitty; because the Bait Jala people have long hands" (are thieves). "Why, Katrina! the Bait Jala people are Christians like you." "God forbid! Like us? No, they are only Greeks." "Why, you wicked woman," I said, "the Greeks are Christians—they believe in the Messiah." She was not a bit ashamed, but laughed, and said: "They believe, yes; but not like us. Yes, they are Nassarah; but not good ones like us Latins."'

'Well, Emily, I can give you a pendant to that story. When I was at the Consulate this morning, an English traveller was there. He was leaving for Jaffa, having lived, during his stay in Jerusalem, at the Latin Casa Nuova. And having visited all the holy places—Bethlehem, St. John's, etc.,—he asked them to give him one of the printed certificates, such as they give to pilgrims, that he had been at these places. The monk gave it, and filled it up in due form, with the traveller's name and country, the date, and so on; but when he came to religion, he put a zero (0). "But," cried the traveller, "I have a religion. I belong to the English Church." "I cannot help that," said the monk, "we don't recognise that religion, it is null to us." I saw the paper, zero, and all!'

'How shameful!'

'Yes. But to come back to your subject, Emily. I do not despair of our getting nearer to many of these classes of people. As English, we have some advantages, and we can eat with them all; at any rate, they won't despise us, and I think we shall not despise them,—that is, always supposing that we live here any longer, as you will persist in believing, Emily. By-the-bye, I have written to Mr. Laughton, telling him to re-let those houses, and send us the money. The post goes the day after to-morrow, and we must also sign and return the other documents, in case my Uncle Bancroft insists upon selling Riverside.'

'Oh, don't sell it, Walter!'

'Not if we can help it, Emily. If we could separate ours from Mr. Bancroft's, we certainly would not; but in any case, we must send the needful documents to Mr. Laughton—we can trust him.'

'Yes, of course, we can trust him. But if anything were to happen to the papers?'

Mr. Laughton was trustee for the property left under my mother's will, and had been almost like a father to us. He was indeed entirely to be trusted. But, somehow, I felt misgivings as to sending such documents out of our own hands to so great a distance. But Walter repeated: 'We have no choice, Emily; and if we are obliged to sell Riverside, why, we must invest our money here in Palestine, and settle here as you and Rachel wish.' This was true. My uncle had the absolute right of sale, and we could not refuse to let our share go if he sold his. The documents empowering Mr. Laughton to effect the sale, if necessary, of our portion of Riverside, were duly signed by us both in the Consul's presence, and forwarded by the post. But to return.

'Now for something else, Emily. On my way to the synagogue I called at Abraham's. Rachel looked pale and fagged, and I made her promise to go out with me; and I have ordered the horses for eight o'clock—ours, and one for her.'

CHAPTER XIII.

RIDE TO BETHER.

BETHER was the place of our destination. We had never yet seen the Jewish ruins there, and Rachel was pleased at the idea of visiting a place so mournfully connected with the heroic efforts of her nation to cast off the Roman yoke.

We passed near the camp of the Turkish general, who had arrived a day or two ago, at the head of a force of regular cavalry. We had not before seen any regular Turkish force. They seemed in excellent condition, both man and beast, and well disciplined. Very pretty were their lances with fluttering scarlet pennons among the lines of green tents. They had brought a piece of cannon with them.

Rachel's first remark was: 'Oh, how dear water will become now, if so many men and horses have to drink every day.'

It was true, all those horses would drink a great deal of water. Rain was already late in coming, and the poor Jews were suffering much.

'We must hope that rain will soon fall.'

'Please God,' said she, 'Mr. Anderson is going to pray for it in church next Sunday. He told my father so; the well of En Rogel is dry.'

'Yes, Emily; I forgot to tell you, some of the gentlemen went down into it two days ago. It is more than a hundred feet deep, and they found the lowest part of the masonry is of immense old stones, like those of the temple. It is fed by a spring; but there are only a few inches of water now. Indeed, there must be great misery in the Jewish quarter. By-the-bye, Rachel, do you have to buy water?'

'Oh yes; for the last four months.'

'I am ashamed that it never occurred to us before. Emily, we must send over a couple of skins full every day from our well.'

'Thank you very much. My flowers are all dead for want of water—only the rose that you gave me lives. I water it a little every day; but it seemed a sin to give water to flowers when so many people are thirsty. An old Jewess comes every day and gets a cup of water from us.'

'Though she is a Jewess?'

'Yes; she is very poor. She used to know my father before; and he was once kind to her and helped her when her son was put in prison wrongfully; so she likes him still, and comes to see us. She says, the Jews can't be angry if she comes for water to drink: who can live without water?'

Near the Convent of the Cross, we found a party of the soldiers engaged in rifle practice; the echo of each discharge running down the valley and multiplying as it went.

In less than an hour we were enabled to judge of the effect of all these military demonstrations upon the peasantry. We found all the people at work in the fields carrying both guns and swords!

At St. Philip's fountain was a boy watering his goats—a ferocious-looking little fellow of about eight, with a brass-ferruled gun, considerably longer than himself, slung at his back.

Arrived at Bether, we found all labour suspended; all the men in their best clothes, looking very handsome, and swaggering about with guns, pistols, and yataghans, fresh sharpened.

'What's the matter?' cried Walter.

'We are waiting.'

'What for?'

'For our enemies. There is war between us and the Kaboo people.'

Each man wore over the left shoulder a belt of village make, with powder-horn at the end, and four tin cartridge-cases upon the breast. The enemy, belonging to a village half an hour distant, were cresting an opposite hill, and looking at us. Perhaps they thought we were come as reinforcements. However, our Bether friends, on catching sight of the others, slunk away.

Up at the village were none but old men, and women, and children. They told us that, eight days ago, the enemy had come to the crest of the Bether hill, and, shooting down into the village, killed two.

'But we killed one of them, the pigs, in return, and two Bait Jala people besides.'

'Why Bait Jala people?'

'They are allies of our enemies; they make one party, and fight for them. Hark! there is the Waw.'

Instantly there was a scuffling and a running. One or two, mere children of six or seven, snatched up rusty old guns, and dashed like goats up the rocks. Their mothers and sisters flinging their long blue sleeves behind their necks, and tucking up their gowns, flew in the same direction, uttering the same el-el-el-el-loo, as they ran.

'What is the Waw?' asked Walter of an old one-eyed man, who sat smoking, and cursing the enemy between each whiff.

'The Waw? that's the Waw—listen.'

We could hear at a distance a kind of wild cry uttered by the voices of many men, mingled with the screams and trilling of the women. The old man explained that it was the war-cry.

'Where do you get powder?'

'We make it. Here, Fatimah,' calling to a girl of about five, 'bring me my powder-horn.'

It was as much as the child could carry. The sheikh poured out some on the palm of his hand —coarse-looking stuff. Before we were aware, he had set fire to it by means of a spark from his pipe, to show how good it was. Rachel started back in alarm. She had been not a little nervous during the whole of this warlike conversation, and even I felt a little odd at hearing the continued shouts and an occasional musket-shot. But the old man laughed, and told us there would be no fighting here to-day. 'Hush! they are going off; there! don't you hear?' pointing to the eastwards. His hearing was as delicate as his horny hand was callous to pain. We could hear nothing. Presently he said: 'They are coming back. I knew there would be no fighting to-day.'

We asked him for a guide to the ruins above.

'I will guide you myself;' and, old as he was, he climbed the rugged path with wonderful agility. We soon had to dismount and lead our horses up the break-neck path; but the remains on the summit amply repaid our fatigue. Fragments of massive wall, lower courses of semicircular towers, jambs of door-posts, the scarping of the rock itself, the marks of the chisel or other tools still fresh, and, above all, the great trench cut deep in the solid rock upon the only side where an assault could possibly have been made. Above this, the fortified part rises in steep terraces to the top. The mould has, in course of so many centuries, been washed down in considerable quantity into the trench.

Rachel was delighted. 'Ah!' exclaimed she, drawing a long breath, 'our fathers were indeed mighty men of valour.'

'Their daughter must learn not to be so much afraid of gunpowder,' said I.

'That is only because it is the first time,' said she, and blushing, stopped, unwilling to remind Walter of the mischief his gun had once done. (One day his gun had gone off accidentally, and the shot had lodged in Rachel's foot.)

'Rachel felt as well as heard the first gun she ever saw, Emily. That is enough to alarm.'

'But if there were a cause,' said she energetically, and just the least little flash in her eye, —'if there were a cause, I should not be afraid of a gun or of anything else.'

'I am sure of it,' said Walter, well pleased. 'Timidity and mettle are not unseldom found together. An Arab lady would be flattered at being compared to a mare; and I have often noticed the timid look of the Pasha's Bedawy mare—that grey that he took from the sheikh of the Moab country; but how full of fire she is when ridden on the jereed course! I think she would run until she dropped down dead; and what nostrils and eyes she has!'

'That horse has just been stolen from the Pasha,' said Rachel.

'Stolen!—how?'

'Nathaniel's Arabic teacher told him this morning, that on the night of Monday the people of the sheikh beyond Jordan stole the mare out of the Pasha's stable, and let her down by ropes over the city wall, and took her away to the Arabs beyond Jordan.'

'To her owner. Well done, Bedaween, that was a bold stroke. What a risk they ran if the soldiers had heard them; and all for love of a mare! They deserve to have her.'

'Nathaniel says they tied rags on her hoofs to make her go quietly through the streets.'

Excellent! It ought to be a lesson to the Pasha how he seizes valuable horses.'

'Come, Walter, do look at this grand view here to the west.'

We looked down upon mountains enclosing a natural horseshoe amphitheatre, with the Mediterranean beyond, and two villages which, our guide said, were the headquarters of their enemy. I took a sketch. Walter and Rachel sat down and chatted. We then went down and lunched under the trees. The sheikh brought some cucumbers, grapes, Arab bread, olives, roasted eggs, and some clear spring water.

After we had feasted, as people do in the open air, where everything tastes fresh and sweet, and having given first payment and then backsheesh to the old man, we mounted our horses.

(To be continued.)

EARLY PROTESTANTISM.

III.—RENÉE, DUCHESS OF FERRARA.

AMONG the principalities existing in Italy at the dawn of the Reformation, none had risen more rapidly in importance than Ferrara. During the latter years of the fifteenth century, and the earlier ones of the sixteenth, not a few, whose names are memorable in history and literature, were attracted to its court by a splendour and a liberality of patronage which almost rivalled the pomp and munificence of the Medici. The family of Este was distinguished for several generations by its encouragement of artists and men of letters. The Dukes of Ferrara differed little, perhaps, from the other Italian rulers of their time, in the heavy burdens they laid upon their subjects; but some of them undoubtedly had the art of making these burdens seem lighter, by contributing to the enjoyment of those who bore them, and by raising the reputation of their duchy among the other states of Italy. Magnificent buildings, frequent festivals, and an extravagance of courtly splendour, had, no doubt, to be dearly paid for; but they were also the means of winning popularity with a people notable for their love of pleasure and display.

In common with all their countrymen, the Dukes of Ferrara had often suffered from the reckless ambition of the more powerful and turbulent spirits of their day, the perfidy of avaricious Pontiffs, and the strife of neighbouring states; but their capital had still been a refuge for poor scholars, and had not ceased to attract those whose fame had been already won. There came a time, however, when the house of Este was compelled to submit to what may be regarded as no common degradation. At the opening of the sixteenth century, the infamous Rodrigo Borgia, who had gained the Papal chair by his knowledge of the base means by which the 'sacred college' could be influenced, and occupied it under the title of Alexander VI., was exerting all his power to found a family, and connect it with the princely houses of Italy. His daughter Lucrezia, whose name has come down to us, with those of her father and brother, blackened with crimes too hideous and horrible for language to describe, was, at the date we speak of, a widow for the third time, at the age of twenty-five; and for her a new husband was proposed, in the person of Alphonso D'Este, the son and heir of the reigning Duke of Ferrara. Still young and beautiful, her personal attractions, and the power of her daringly unscrupulous family, would have formed strong inducements to such a union; but even in that dark age of the Papacy, the excesses of the woman who had made the Vatican a slough of pollution were things to shudder at, and the intended bridegroom and his father would gladly have escaped from such an alliance. But the power of the Papacy was not to be resisted. The investiture of the duchy had been conferred for some generations by the Holy See; and if the assurance of its being made perpetual did not suffice to wring from its rulers a consent to the marriage, the promise of a splendid dower, and of many special tokens of 'apostolic' favour, effected the purpose of the miscreant who wore the tiara. Lucrezia Borgia became the wife of Alphonso D'Este, rode into Ferrara at the head of a brilliant cavalcade of knights and dignitaries of the church, and, as some of her biographers assure us, lived a virtuous wife, and died lamented alike by her husband and his subjects.

Thirty years had not passed away, ere another marriage de convenance was arranged for the heir of Ferrara's dukedom; but although the bride was a king's daughter—the daughter of the powerful and politic Louis XII. of France,—no such reception awaited her as had been accorded to the bad and beautiful Lucrezia. Renëe of France had no personal charm to excite the enthusiasm of the populace. Her features were plain, her figure slightly deformed; and the graces which afterwards endeared her to so many hearts, could be seen by and known only to those who knew the beauty of her character—her high intelligence and her rare virtues. Gay as the court of Ferrara had been for generations, it could not be compared with that of France; and if Renëe had sought her enjoyments in pageantries and festivities, the change for her would have been indeed a dreary one. But her youth had been devoted to the culture of those rare powers of mind with which God had endowed her; and in the society of her kinswoman, Margaret of Navarre, she had early imbibed those opinions on religion and the state of the church, which were now beginning to agitate the minds of thinking men and women in almost every part of Europe. From the study of history, philosophy, and ancient literature, she had passed to that of theology; and while some of those who had accompanied her from France not only shared in her studies, but sympathized warmly in her opinions, she gradually drew around her at Ferrara a circle of accomplished and earnest men—some of the best minds of the age in which she lived. Wandering scholars were attracted by her reputation for learning, and the encouragement she held out to its professors; poets celebrated her virtues and the riches of her mind; and if she could not be said to possess the ardent affection of her husband, he at least respected and esteemed her; while a family of sons and daughters grew up promisingly around them. Clement Marot, the French song-writer, came with her to Ferrara, and held an official position in her household; Bernardo Tasso acted for a time as her secretary; and her daughter Leonora was destined, ere long, to be immortalized by the love, the sorrows, and the song of his more illustrious but hapless son, Torquato. There were others than scholars and poets, however, admitted to the literary society formed in the palace of the Duchess Renëe. The deeds and writings of the German reformers were becoming widely known in Italy; and they had struck a sympathetic chord in the minds of many good men, who had been earnestly longing for the dawn of a better day. Not a few of these were content to hope for such a change as would leave the 'unity' of the Romish Church untouched, and to dream of the possibility of reconciling its pretensions with the principles they had found in God's word. But there were others who had passed beyond such hopes and dreams, and who were prepared to risk all for their spiritual freedom and the purity of the faith. Of this latter class, some were in intimate fellowship with the duchess; and many sought refuge in Ferrara, secure of her sympathy and protection. One of these was no less notable a personage than John Calvin, who resided for more than a year in Ferrara under an assumed name, mingling in the literary society of the court, and greatly influencing the mind of Renëe. The duchy of the renowned and orthodox house of Este may thus be said to have become the nursery, if not the cradle, of the Reformation in Italy.

But such a state of things as this could not long escape the now active vigilance of the Church of Rome. The pestilent heresy which had already shaken the power of the Papacy in northern Europe, had begun to manifest itself, by alarming signs, in several parts of Italy. Defections from the church were becoming daily more frequent; but Rome could safely trust to the hereditary orthodoxy of Hercules D'Este; for already there existed a secret treaty, by which he had bound himself to aid the cause of the church, and to guard its interests in his duchy against the extending influence of Protestant doctrines. In direct defiance of this agreement, Renëe had encouraged the teachers of these doctrines, and her husband was at once called upon to take measures for the purification of his court. Prompt and zealous in the fulfilment of his duties as a faithful son of the Church, Duke Hercules commanded the instant dismissal of all those suspicious French men and French women who had accompanied his duchess to Ferrara. Madame Soubise, her governess, with her son and daughter, afterwards distinguished in the history of French Protestantism, were forthwith ordered to return to their native country; while Calvin and Marot, more dangerous characters, were sent under an escort to Bologna,—not, however, with such secrecy as to prevent Renëe from taking measures to effect their liberation on the way, and enable them to escape the grasp of the Papacy. But Ferrara was by no means purified from the taint of Protestantism. The duchess was henceforth an object of suspicion to her priest-led husband and his ghostly counsellors. But it was not in the palace alone that Protestant opinions found expression. In the university, and even in some of the churches, they had been covertly inculcated. And all over Italy their influence was being felt. Bernardius Ochino, the eloquent general of the Capuchins, had roused the popular mind from his pulpit at Venice and elsewhere, and been compelled to flee for his life; Celio Curio had been driven from city to city by the priestly enmity which his boldness had awakened; and even in Rome itself, and within the precincts of the Vatican, there were whispered suspicions of the growing heresy. To crush at once, and by the most relentless severity, these dangerous manifestations of re-awakening thought, Pope Paul III. had issued the bull which set at work the infernal machinery of the Inquisition; and the moody and merciless Caraffa—a priestly scion of a dark and cruel race—had been appointed to direct and apply it.

That Ferrara, almost a fief of the Holy See, should have been so deeply infected with the doctrines against which the Church was about to employ all her force, was, of course, a fact necessitating immediate action; and Duke Hercules was again and more seriously warned of the dangers which had been allowed to grow up within his palace and his capital. The Duchess Renëe was still found to be harbouring suspicious persons. The teachers of her children, the brothers Sinapi, Peregrino Morata, and his already celebrated daughter Olympia, were all persons of more than doubtful orthodoxy. If she still remained obstinate, it would be necessary to remove her children from her, and subject her to a salutary course of more decided discipline. Renëe did for a time resist. Convicted of allowing flesh meat to be brought to her table on Friday, it was resolved to seclude her in her own apartments, to send her daughters to a convent, and put her into the hands of the duke's confessor and spiritual director—a zealous and cunning Jesuit. The most approved means of dealing with an obstinate heretic were applied in the case of this lonely and afflicted wife and mother; and it would seem that, for a time at least, they produced the desired effect. The instincts of the maternal nature were, no doubt, strong enough to induce a show of obedience, which, in the eyes of the father confessor, was a manifest case of conversion; and, in process of time, Renëe was restored to her proper position and to her children, if not to the favour and confidence of her husband.

Meanwhile the Inquisition was doing its work. A strict search was made for heretics in all parts of Italy, and the Papal prisons at Rome and Bologna were beginning to be crowded with the victims of the Holy Office. The people of Naples had fiercely and successfully resisted the entrance of the inquisitors among them; but almost everywhere else the fell engines of spiritual despotism were doing their deadly work. Duke Hercules D'Este, as eager as ever to give proofs of his orthodoxy, had already put forth his hand, and seized a Protestant named Fannio, a native of one of the States of the Church, who had taken refuge within the territories of Ferrara. The captive was thrown into prison, loaded with chains, and remained there for nearly two years, visited and cheered by not a few who shared his opinions. That the prolongation of his life, and the comparative mildness of his imprisonment during that period, were in some degree owing to the influence of Renëe, can scarcely be doubted.

Fannio had previously been arrested and imprisoned, but had recanted at the agonized entreaties of his beloved wife. The recantation was only in words, however, and was speedily followed by a repentance which made the destined victim of the Church bolder than ever in his Protestantism. Strenuous efforts were made to save his life; and Duke Hercules, whose hands were yet unstained, would probably have been willing that his life should be spared. But vain were all attempts to rescue him from the iron grasp of the Inquisition; and Fannio was burned in the market-place of Ferrara, though not until his words to those who were permitted to visit him in prison, and the knowledge of his heroic endurance, had produced a powerful effect on the minds of many. Again the Duchess Renëe was subjected to the harshness of her husband and the persecution of the priests. Her servants were seized and imprisoned as heretics; her nephew, Henry II. of France, was urged to employ his influence in bringing her again within the pale of the Church; and, finally, a Dominican, of more than ordinary zeal and austerity, was appointed chief inquisitor at Ferrara, and spiritual guardian of its duchess. It was now that her firmness was most needed, and it was sorely tried. For a brief space her heroic spirit was shaken by the duke's unkindness, and the humiliations to which he allowed her to be subjected; but she ultimately triumphed.

At the death of her husband, Renëe returned to France, and became more zealous than ever in defending the persecuted Protestants, not only of that country, but of the Italian duchy in which she had passed nearly thirty years of struggle and suffering. Closely connected by family ties with the most violent of the persecutors, she braved the wrath even of her powerful son-in-law, the Duke of Guise, in order to protect the fugitives who sought refuge in her castle; and died in the full faith of the reformed doctrines, leaving an honoured memory, and a name which stands high in the list of those noble women, whom God made the instruments of defending and advancing the truth of the gospel.

THE DAY IS GONE.

SISTER, the day is gone!
The stars are gleaming in the distant sky,
Like spirits looking from their homes on high,
To see what man has done,
Through the long hours that now have passed away,
To join the cycles of an endless day.

Dear sister, come with me,
And let us kneel before our Father's throne;
For He will listen to each feeble tone,
Each humble plea
Will find acceptance in the ear of God,
Through Him who washed and saved us with his blood.

Come! for we need to pray:
These hearts of ours so oft are tempest-tossed,
We need to cling to that dear, sacred cross,
More closely every day.
There is no place our troubled souls may rest,
Save when we lean upon our Saviour's breast.

Sister! the future seems,
To our young hearts, so full of anxious fears,
That oftentimes we dread the coming years;
Just as, in troubled dreams,
We sometimes tremble lest our feet should slide
Over the brink into the angry tide.

But, darling, even then
We wake to find our fears are as the wind,
Which rushes by, but leaves no trace behind
In field or glen,
But the same flowers still blooming in the way,
Which cheered our hearts upon a former day.

And may it not be so
With all the fears that make us tremble now,
And cast their flitting shadows o'er the brow,
While on our way we go?
Let us rely upon his promise true;
There is an arm will lead us safely through.

And yet it is not strange
That many mingled thoughts our souls should move,
Of joy and sadness, hope, and fear, and love;
Or that our eyes should range
Through the wide future with an earnest gaze,
And almost fear its strongly-chequered ways.

For we are entering now
Upon the path of life; have thrown aside
Our childhood's mantle, and a deeper shade
Rests on the woman's brow;
Yet there are thoughts we never dreamed of then,
And who would wish to tread the path again?

Then, sister, let us pray—
Pray earnestly that we may live for Him,
Through our whole lives, until these eyes grow dim—
Until a brighter day
Shall dawn in glory on our raptured sight;
Until at last our weary feet may rest
In that blest home, where 'there shall be no night.'

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

LUKE XV. 20.

IT was hunger, not love, that drew the prodigal back to his father. There was no high nor disinterested motive in his return. He stayed away as long as he could; he only came back when he could not help himself. It was not the thought of his father, but of the plenty of his house, as contrasted with his own want, that led him out of the far country to seek his father's face. So with the sinner. It is want, misery, danger, not love, nor any noble motive, that lead him to seek the face of God. How foolish the thought of those who would shrink back from God, because they have not come to Him with a pure and disinterested motive!

But it is with the father that we have now specially to do. Here we have—(1) Paternal watchfulness and far-sightedness; (2) Paternal haste; (3) Paternal compassion; (4) Paternal tenderness; (5) Paternal reconciliation.

I. Paternal watchfulness and far-sightedness.—'When yet a great way off, his father saw him.' He had doubtless been watching: 'This man looketh out for sinners.' How quick-sighted is the paternal eye, made keen and clear by the yearnings of the paternal heart! The figure, seen thus far off, was no doubt very unlike his boy; it was one of rags, and filth, and disfigurement. Yet it is recognised. There is my son at last! Poor wanderer! God's eye is on you in your far land of famine. He has 'not forgotten;' He has his reasons for not coming out and taking you back by force, like the shepherd the sheep; for He wants your heart, and that cannot be won by force or gold: yet He is on the outlook for you, however far off you be.

II. Paternal haste.—'He ran.' The son was coming to him, yet he ran to meet him—eager to shorten the distance. He did not keep state or ceremony. He did not think of what might comport with dignity, or with offended authority; he did not wait, nor move slowly towards him; he ran—as if every inch of distance or moment of separation were intolerable. What eagerness to meet did that haste imply! What heedlessness of all ceremony! No fear of seeming too eager; no thought of thus encouraging sin, or making the prodigal think lightly of his wickedness. Haste was the best for the prodigal, as well as most congenial to his own feelings. What a rebuke does that word 'ran' furnish to those who think that a sinner can come to Christ too soon, can be reconciled too quickly! God runs, sinner, to you; will you not run to God? He makes haste; oh make you haste! He loves, He pities, He yearns and longs. He has no pleasure in your lingering, and He does not linger. He stretches out his hands to you, in the unutterable tenderness of his paternal and infinite heart.

III. Paternal compassion.—'He had compassion.' It would seem as if the pity were stirred up by what he saw. The nearer he came, the more he had compassion. The rags and filth, instead of repelling him, only awoke still more his pity. Instead of turning away from the loathsomeness, his paternal heart was moved by the sight of it. As we read that Jesus, when He saw the multitudes, was moved with compassion, so was it with the father here. Poor wanderer! you need not then try to hide your rags, or to hide your filth, or to try to make yourself more like what you were, in order to attract your Father. It is just that which you are which excites his compassion. Your wretchedness, ignorance, defilement, squalor, will be no obstacle. They awake his pity. Go to Him, then, just as you are, and see if his compassions are not infinite. Whoever and whatever you may be, He pities you. The tears of Jesus over Jerusalem are the expressions of that pity—sincere, and true, and deep. They are both divine and human—most thoroughly both. Paternal righteousness is not at variance with paternal compassion. If God were not so righteous, He could not be so compassionate. It is his righteousness that makes Him comprehend and feel for our woful condition as sinners. He is pitiful because He is righteous and holy.

IV. Paternal tenderness.—'He fell on his neck.' So was it when Jacob and Esau met, Joseph and Benjamin. Falling on another's neck is the expression of tender love,—love that, for the moment, cannot express itself in words, but buries its face (and with it past grief and present joy) out of sight on the neck of the beloved one. Ah, this is tender love! 'He fell on his neck.' It is the tender love of God. Yet all these manifestations of human love, these tokens of family endearment, are poor to express his unutterably earnest yet tender grace. In listening to God's gospel, we too often feel as if it were the mere intimation of his consent to our salvation—implying but a cold willingness to save us from hell. How much we mistake! His is true parental fondness, pity, tenderness, yearning; his is the eagerness to bless us which words cannot express. Yes, God is in earnest in his tender love.

V. Paternal reconciliation.—'He kissed him.' This is the completion of the whole—the consummated and manifested reconciliation. There is the kiss of affection, Jacob kissed Joseph's sons; the kiss of sorrow, when the disciples fell on Paul's neck and kissed him; the kiss of reconciliation, when Jacob and Esau kissed, and when righteousness and peace are said to kiss each other. How much is implied in that paternal kiss!—love, joy, pardon, pity, reconciliation. Thus God comes up to the sinner with the fulness of reconciliation in his heart. He does not stay to be entreated, or pleaded with, or persuaded. He hastens up to us, and embraces us in the fulness of his heart. Ah! this kiss is the seal of pardon to the prodigal; it is this kiss that He is longing to imprint now on your polluted lips. He comes up to you with the reconciliation of the cross; for He is 'reconciling the world to himself, not imputing unto men their trespasses.'

THE SONG OF TRIUMPH.

BY THE EDITOR.

ZEPH. III. 14, 15.

ERE Israel can take up this song of triumph, she must be in very different circumstances from her present ones. To bid her sing it now would be but to mock her. Her judgments are not taken away; her enemy is not cast out; her King is not in the midst of her; she sees evil. How can she sing a song like this,—scattered and peeled; wrath rolling over her, billow after billow, for 1800 years; outcast, homeless, kingless, friendless, and, as far as human calculations go, hopeless? But our text anticipates a wondrous change. It looks forward to a time when such a song shall be heard, even from the lips of scattered Israel. God himself here anticipates the joyful day of her return, restoration, and blessedness, making us feel how sure his promise stands, how unchanging his love, even to this disobedient, gainsaying people; for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

Observe, He calls her by three separate names of endearment—(1) 'Daughter of Zion;' (2) 'Israel;' (3) 'Daughter of Jerusalem;' and in so many expressions does He call on her to rejoice. She is to 'sing,' yea, to 'rejoice,' yea, to 'be glad with all her heart.' Thus God speaks of her as of a people still beloved, still unforgotten. He stretches out his arms to embrace her, as the father welcomed the returning prodigal. He looks at Israel sitting once more under her own vine and her own fig-tree, and, anticipating the time, He puts a new song into her mouth. He had often before called her to repentance, to confession, to mourning; but now He calls her to joy and singing; for 'the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away' (Isa. xxxv. 10). He enumerates the wonders He will do for her in that day: He will cast out her enemies; He, her King, shall be in the midst of her; and, as the consummation of the whole, she shall not see evil any more. All this He speaks of as done with his own hand. He who slew Egypt's first-born—He hath done it. He who bare them through the wilderness, as on eagles' wings, fed them with manna from heaven, and gave them water from the smitten rock—He hath done it. The Great Doer of all wonders is his name: the Doer of all Israel's wonders, from the Red Sea onward; wonders not only of power, but of grace—unmingled grace. His dealings are all free love, from first to last, with the ungodliest nation that ever provoked the eyes of his glory, that shed the blood of his beloved Son!

But this song of triumph is a song for the redeemed, pardoned sinner now; for one who is delivered from the wrath to come,—from the present evil world. It is the song of a saint—of a believing sinner; of one who has nothing to say for himself, but who can say this in regard to the dealings of the Lord: 'He hath taken away my judgments; I shall not see evil.' It is such a song of triumph as this that we are called upon to sing at a communion table. True, we have not yet entered into rest, in the full sense of the word: 'There remaineth a rest to the people of God.' Without are still fightings, and within are fears; our tears are not yet wiped away. But still, these blessings in which Israel shall rejoice in the latter day, are those in which faith rejoices now. Faith anticipates the new song, seats us with Christ in heavenly places, teaches us to say, 'We are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel' (Heb. xii. 22–24).

Let us notice four things in reference to this song.

I. The taking away of judgments.—This is the 'forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace;' or, as elsewhere expressed, 'no condemnation.' Up to the time when we tasted that the Lord was gracious, we were under judgment—judgment of the darkest kind. We were under the law, and it was armed with almighty powers against us. The wrath of an angry God, like a thunder-cloud, overhung us; it raged around us like a tempest, or as an earthquake heaving under our feet. Darker and sadder than Israel's was our condition. Then came the glad message: 'Believe, and be saved. Believe, and live.' We believed, and knew the meaning of the words: 'Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ' (Rom. v. 1). Through grace we believed, and entered into rest. The dark cloud passed, the storm died away; we could say, 'The Lord hath taken away my judgments.'

Here is our message to those who are yet under judgment. There is deliverance even for you. However dark and fearful the guilt that is pressing you down, there is deliverance. The same deliverance which believers in all ages have found, the deliverance which the jailer found, is still a deliverance for you—as free, as glorious as any has ever been. And the terms are the same; God has not raised his terms. Salvation is not more costly than before: there is no difference; it is free as ever. He that believeth shall enter into rest. God maketh his judgments to pass clean away.

II. Deliverance from enemies.—In the days of our unbelief we were in the hands of enemies; they kept us in chains. These were legion, and they surrounded us with their multitudes, so that escape or victory seemed impossible. Yet this has been achieved; deliverance has been sent us. Deliverance from the wrath to come, from the world, from the power of the flesh,—all these have been wrought for us. Our enemies are not yet clean swept off the battle-field, but they are driven back. In believing, we became identified with a conquering Lord, and victory was secure. Then the Lord began to cast out our enemies, to bruise Satan under our feet, and we received the sure pledge that we should be 'more than conquerors.' 'He hath cast out our enemies,' is now our exulting cry. 'Sin hath no more dominion over us.' 'Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory.' The Great Conqueror, in words which, while they show sympathy with our troubles, assure us also of victory, has said, 'In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.' In joining his ranks and following his banner, we are joining a Conqueror's ranks, we are following the banner of the King of kings,—of Him who has already smitten Satan, and overcome the world, and only waits the fulness of time to complete the victory, and sweep away every enemy. So that, though in one sense a communion table is a table prepared for us in the presence of our enemies, yet we can there sing, 'He hath cast out our enemies.' We are in their presence, yet we are conquerors over them. We find that at the table which reminds us of enemies all around; yet we are there reminded also that every enemy has been overcome by our Forerunner, and will soon be overcome by us.

III. We have the presence of our King.—He comes into the midst of us; nay, more, He and the Father come in (John xiv. 23). Thus we have the invisible presence of our King; He in us, and we in Him. When we first believed, He came in. He came as the Deliverer, as the King in his beauty; and He is now not far off, though invisible; He is yet nearer than any being of our earthly love. The King in his beauty—He on whom our eye rested, and in whom our souls rejoiced, while we first believed—is the same King on whom our eye is this day to rest, and our souls to rejoice, at his table. It needed no long persuasion to bring Him in; He came, glad to take his place within us. He had sought admission long in vain; but He found it at length. Many days and nights He stood outside, lifting up his voice; but at last He found admittance; and from that day to this we have had our King in the midst of us.

He is seeking admittance this day from those who have hitherto excluded Him. This is our message: who is there among you who will this day give Him admission? Young and old, admit the conquering King! Oh, sinner, lose not the present opportunity; admit Him! Ye that are young, admit Him! Ye who are aged, ripening for the grave, admit Him! Every one, admit Him now! He stands waiting to come in, pleading to be admitted, as your best portion for time and for eternity.

This promise of the King in the midst of us, we realize at his table. We believe that where two or three are gathered together, there He is. And this realizing of his presence now, is to us a pledge of that time, when He, our King—whom, not having seen, we love—shall more gloriously appear in the midst of us, as Head of his church and of a redeemed creation; for 'the tabernacle of God shall be with men.'

IV. We have everlasting security from evil.—From the time when we became acquainted with Him who is truly good, we might be said to be done with evil. When He removed our sins as far as the east is from the west, danger was at an end. Death could not overwhelm us, for we were one with Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. No weapon could prosper against us, no storm injure us; we were safe, whatever might befall. The heavens might be on fire, and the earth be dissolved; we were safe. Wars and rumours of wars might be heard around us; men's hearts failing them for fear; but we were safe. This promises complete safety, deliverance from evil! The words are often repeated elsewhere, 'no evil.' 'There shall no evil befall thee.' 'No evil shall happen to the just.' A wide word that—no evil! We are secure against evil. Conflicts may arise, but we are safe. Tribulation may come, but we are safe. Persecution, days of darkness may come, but we are safe. There may be convulsions of earth, shaking of nations, rocking of thrones, but we are safe. No evil! This is our security, our freedom. With evil, as evil, we are done for ever. All things now work together for our good. With evil, as discipline, we are not yet done; but come sorrow or joy, death or life, adversity or prosperity, the promise is sure, we shall not see evil. Even here we find this true; but how much truer will it be in the kingdom, when we stand on the sea of glass, where there can be no shipwreck, and sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb!

To us, then, as to Israel by anticipation, it can be said even now: 'Sing, O daughter of Zion; shout, O Israel; be glad and rejoice with all the heart, O daughter of Jerusalem. The Lord hath taken away thy judgments, He hath cast out thine enemy: the King of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee: thou shalt not see evil any more.' Of us, even now, all this is true; but how much more, when the walls of the New Jerusalem shall encompass us! Then, 'We shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on us, nor any heat. For the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed us, and shall lead us unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes' (Rev. vii. 16, 17).

As we pass through this land of strangers, let us sing; for it is said to us, 'Rejoice in the Lord always.' Let us triumph in Him, who triumphed for us. Let us glory in Him, who has gone up to the Father's right hand, and is crowned for us.

At present, much of our rejoicing must be in what is yet to come. We have now only the first-fruits of the Spirit, the earnest of our inheritance; but even this earnest is worthy of a new song. But a little while, and we shall sing this same song in that glory which it anticipates, when that which is perfect shall have come. Now, we see through a glass darkly; but then, face to face. Now, our voice is feeble; then, it will be clear and full. Now, our song is poor, and sadly jarring; then, it will be melodious—sweet as 'from blest voices uttering joy.' It is a song such as angels cannot sing—as even restored Israel cannot sing; such as we can hardly understand in this land of exile—a song of everlasting joy.

We sing it here, by the rivers of Babylon, in the defiled cities of earth; but soon we shall sing it in the New Jerusalem, by the river of life, clear as crystal. It is sweet to sing it here; it will be sweeter to sing it yonder, when we have entered on the glory that shall be revealed in us. It is a song of wondrous power, even when sung by the scattered handfuls of the little flock below; but how inconceivably majestic will be its power and grandeur, when it is sung by the whole multitude of the redeemed at once around the throne, and with Jesus in the midst of them, the Leader of the choir!

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA.

No. X.

'WITHOUT ME YE CAN DO NOTHING.'

WHAT a solemn and humbling announcement! This is naturally the first and most obvious thought that occurs to us when we read the words. But to me another thought always comes with them, distinct and apart from this, and that is the thought of their exceeding preciousness. Is it, can it be really true, that Thou, my blessed Saviour, hast so joined me to thyself, hast made the union between Thee and me so perfect and complete, that without Thee I can do nothing? Gracious Lord, with my whole heart I bless and praise Thee for the comforting and joyful assurance.

Mrs. Melville was from home; but the visitor who called at Elm Grove wished to see her little girl, and was therefore shown into the library, where Mildred was sitting playing with her doll.

'I suppose you are very lonely without your mother?' said Mrs. St. Clair, after talking to the child for a few minutes.

'Indeed I am,' answered Mildred; 'but papa allows me to sit here, where I can see her picture while I am playing about, and that is next best to seeing herself. There it is,' she added, pointing to a very lovely portrait, which hung in a recess between the windows; 'and as I cannot kiss mother, I kiss her picture the last thing I do every evening before I go to bed.' And she looked up lovingly at it as she spoke, as if she would like to do it now, as well as in the evening.

'But is it not too high for you to reach to?' asked Mrs. St. Clair.

'Oh yes,' answered the child, 'it is a great deal too high; but papa takes me up in his arms, and then I can reach it quite easily. It is so nice to be in his arms, and to feel that he is helping me, that I am very glad I am not taller.'

'And does he help you to do anything else?' said Mrs. St. Clair.

'Indeed he does,' replied Mildred, eagerly; 'he helps me to do quantities of things. Every day, when he is writing to mamma, he lets me write a little letter too. I could not do it by myself, but he holds my hand, and then—I do not know how—but it comes all right. And very often he lets me ride a little way with him on his horse.'

'But are you not afraid of falling off, and being hurt?'

The child looked up in amazement. 'How could I be afraid, when papa is holding me?' she said. 'I was not afraid even when something frightened the horse very much, and he almost galloped down the avenue; for I know that nothing could happen to me while papa's arm was round me. I used to wish I could always be a child,' she added, simply; 'I was so afraid that, when I was older, papa would not help me; but mamma told me that I need not be afraid of that, for that he was so wise and good, that there would always be plenty of things for him to help me about. I was so glad when she told me that, for I do not think I am ever half so happy as when papa is helping me!'

And is not the feeling of that little child just the feeling that we have, or ought to have, towards our heavenly Father, and towards our gracious Saviour? Would not the being independent of her father have been but another name for loneliness and sorrow to her loving heart? And surely it could be only want of love that would make us desire to be able to act independently of our Lord!

Even as regards this world, the way in which people speak of the pleasure of being independent, would seem very strange to me; but that I feel sure they speak of that which they do not know, and of a pleasure which they have never tasted. If they had, they would know how very soon it turned to pain. 'I can do exactly as I like,' said a lady to me one day, whose circumstances were what is usually called perfectly independent; 'I can do exactly as I please; but oh, it is so lonely! I get such a longing sometimes to be obliged to do something; to have some one to wish I would be home at such an hour, or would go out a little earlier or later! I do not think there is anything so lonely as being able to do exactly what one likes, without a reference to any one else.' Most thoroughly did I sympathize with and pity her, for the very thing that, I dare say, made her envied by many.

But, as I said before, I think it is a question of love. It would be most trying and most irksome to be dependent on those we disliked or disapproved of. But would a true-hearted, loving wife desire to be independent of her husband? Is it not one of her greatest joys that there is a sense in which it is true, that without him she can do nothing? And if God takes him from her, is it not one of the most bitter drops in her cup of sorrow, that she can no longer claim his help, or ask his advice, or consult his wishes about everything she does?

There are many lonely hearts on earth. Some are lonely from their independent position; others because those amongst whom their lot has been cast are strangers to that Saviour who is all in all to them; others, again, because it has pleased God to take from them the desire of their eyes. To all such, how precious our Lord's words must be, 'Without me ye can do nothing!'

Do not think of them as a mere abstract truth—a dry, uninteresting fact. You are lonely, very lonely, are you not? and your heart yearns for true companionship—to be associated with some one in what you do; to feel that some one you love, and who loves you, is ever ready to help and to co-operate with you?

May you not learn, from our Lord's words, that you have your wish, although it may be that you have not yet realized that you have? If we are doing anything with another person, that person must be very near us; and our Lord says, 'Without' (or apart from) 'me ye can do nothing.' Must He not, then, be close beside us? He is close,—a living, loving, sympathizing Saviour. Oh, believe, or rather (for you do believe it) realize the blessed truth, that He is beside you now, this very moment, at all times, and in all places. Accustom yourself to listen to his voice, and you shall hear it, alike amid the din and bustle of life, and in your loneliest hours. Lean upon his arm; whisper into the ear bowed down to hear you; look up and watch the guiding of his eye; ask his counsel, plead for his help, consult his wishes about everything you do, the least as well as the greatest. Can you be lonely, whatever your circumstances may be, if you thus live as you may live, and ought to live, in the constant and realized sense of your union with Christ?

Blessed Saviour! we pray Thee, press thine own words home to our hearts by thy Holy Spirit, and enable us to take and to enjoy all the comfort that is to be derived from the assurance that without Thee we can do nothing. Gracious Lord! Thou who knowest all things, knowest that we would not, even if we could.

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER VIII.

A FEW days after Johnny's funeral, the Harleys left Chelsea Place for two or three weeks by the seaside. It was late in the season to go to a watering-place; but the weather was unusually beautiful and mild, and Mrs. Harley thought it would be a far greater and more beneficial change for her husband and children than going to any inland part.

Dora had never seen the sea before, and for several days could not be tempted to go near it, saying, it made her sad with its mournful sounds; but, after a while, she would walk along the beach with her uncle, and talk about it and the poor men and the ships it had swallowed up. She seemed to look upon it with fear and suspicion, calling it 'the deceitful, cruel sea;' and no one could persuade her to venture on the sandy part of the beach unless her uncle was with her. This was a great disappointment to Tom, until he discovered a large pool of water amongst the rocks to float his ships in, and there Dora had no objection to go with him, attended by Mary; and, perched upon a rock hard by, would watch, or help him and Constance to play with them, until they were tired.

Dora's ninth birthday came round whilst she was at Seamouth; but it was rather a melancholy one, for all missed Johnny on the first feast-day after his death,—indeed, they appeared to feel his loss more that day than they had done since they had left home. Mr. and Mrs. Harley always dined with the children, if well, on birthdays, and they had determined to do so as usual; but when the hour arrived, Mr. Harley felt quite unequal to the effort, and Mrs. Harley became so anxious about him, that the elder children could not help observing it, and hastened through the meal to set her free. At tea, however, he made his appearance, but looking so pale and careworn, that it grieved them to see him; and when he wished them good night, and prayed God to bless them all, it was in a voice scarcely audible. For two days afterwards the children never saw him, for he hardly left his own rooms during that time, and never when they were at hand. This was a great trial for the little Harleys; for they had grown accustomed to his society, having enjoyed it so many weeks, and accordingly missed and lamented it very much. On the third day, Dora positively refused to accompany Tom and Constance to the great pool with the ships, saying, she must and would see Uncle Harley; and, after wasting a good deal of coaxing, they went off with Mary without her, wondering at her temerity. They had scarcely gone, when she heard her uncle's sitting-room door open, and, peeping over the banisters, she saw him go down the stairs to the dining-room; but he looked so sad, so very sad, that her courage failed her, and instead of running down after him, and throwing her arms about his neck, she crept back to her bedroom, and sitting down upon the floor with her face to the wall (her usual position when troubled), she wept bitterly. Old nurse and nurse were out with Agnes and Guy, so that she was quite alone, and likely to remain so; and there she sat, and thought, and cried for Johnny and her uncle, whom she was afraid to go to. Fortunately a housemaid entered the room unperceived by her, and noticing the poor child's tears and sobs, ran down stairs, and calling Mrs. Harley from the dining-room, told her of them. Mr. Harley overheard the conversation, and immediately forgetting himself in his anxiety about Dora, went up to her, and found her as the servant had described, sitting upon the floor, crying as if her heart would break.

'Dora, my darling,' said Mr. Harley, holding open his arms. 'What is it, my precious?'

'Oh uncle,' sobbed the child, springing up and throwing herself into them. 'Oh, I want Johnny, and I want you. I can't bear it. No, I can't bear it.'

'Bear what?' he inquired.

'Not to see you,' she replied, nestling closer to him.

'Is that the trouble?' he said, kindly, as he sat down and placed her on his knee. 'Did you want to see me so very much?' he asked, as he wiped the tears from her eyes.

'Yes, oh yes! ever so bad,' she whispered.

'Why, my darling?'

'Because Johnny is gone, and because I do love you; and Johnny said I must bring you with me to Jesus, and I cannot do that if I do not see you. Please do let me, uncle,' she pleaded, smiling through her tears.'

'You shall, Dora. With God's help you shall lead me to Johnny. I am but a little child on the heavenly road.'

A long silence ensued; for Dora was satisfied, and had nothing more to beg, but lay content in her uncle's arms, until her little breast had ceased to heave, and her sobs had quite subsided. Then Mrs. Harley came into the room, and proposed that she should bathe her eyes and face, and go for a short walk before dinner. Dora slipped off her uncle's knee, but looked wistfully at him as she prepared to comply with her aunt's wish.

'Yes,' he said, divining her thoughts, 'I will go with you; so make haste and get ready. Let me see which will be dressed first.'

She was not many minutes putting on her hat, mantle, and boots, and was soon waiting on the stairs outside her uncle's room. Her cheeks were still pale, and her eyes very watery; but her heart was light, and her spirit glad, for she felt she was trying to fulfil Johnny's dying request. Mrs. Harley was equally pleased; for Dora had been able to induce her uncle to do, what she had been in vain urging for the three past days—go out for a walk; and as she watched them pass down the garden, she thanked God for sending Dora into their household. She saw the influence the child held over him, and she prayed that that influence might deepen and increase for good. It was so important, in Mr. Harley's state, that he should be kept from his own melancholy thoughts, and she had been so distressed, the last few days, at seeing him falling back into his old condition, that a ray of hope was kindled anew in her breast when she heard him say that he would accompany Dora in her walk.

From that day, Dora had free access to her uncle, and was his constant companion in his strolls about Seamouth; and when the weather became too cold for sailing ships, Tom and Constance joined them, and the walks were considerably lengthened on their account. Shells were collected from the sea-shore, and cones from the woods, to be carried back to Lotsirl with them; and a special bag was made to contain curiosities for the little Donovans, to be delivered to them by old nurse, directly they got home.

Towards the end of November, the Harleys began to prepare for returning to Chelsea Place, and wonderful-shaped packets and packages were put up by the children; even Agnes had her own peculiar one, consisting of three gulls' feathers, a bone of the cuttle-fish, two large fir-cones, and some pebbles and bits of spar. Tom had a gull's egg amongst his treasures, which an old superannuated sailor, who lived in a cottage on the beach, had given him; and much Tom wished that it were spring instead of autumn, that he might search himself amongst the rocks for gulls' eggs. Indeed, he could not help prowling and prying about whenever he had an opportunity, hoping that he might light upon some extraordinary thing or other, to surprise the boys at school with; and a few days before he left Seamouth, he certainly did meet with an adventure that he was not likely to forget. His papa and mamma often allowed him to ramble about on the beach alone, or with sailor Jack, who, they had ascertained, was a trustworthy good old man; and he had one morning been clambering by himself upon the rocks, and, quite tired out, was preparing to return home, when he heard a sharp cry or scream.

'Oh, oh! Mr. Gull,' said Tom, gazing around him as he spoke; 'you're on the look-out for a squall, and so am I. I wonder where you are roosting;' and bounding upwards, from rock point to rock point, he gained a higher summit than he had hitherto reached. He was so sure that the gull was somewhere above him, for he could hear such a strange wailing noise every now and then, that he forgot all about being previously very tired, in the hopes of really finding a gull's nest. He was a brave, active boy, and was nothing daunted by the thought of facing a gull or two, should he come across them; and when he had reached the top of a large jutting-out rock, he began creeping on his hands and knees along a shelving sort of narrow path which seemed to connect it with the cliffs extending the whole length of the shore. As he cautiously made his way, peeping into every hole and crevice, the screaming and wailing began afresh, and he felt certain he was getting very near the noisy birds; but as he got nearer, and the crying became more and more distinct, he grew very nervous, for he could not help fancying the sound was more like that of a human voice than the cry of a bird. After rounding one more projection, he came suddenly upon a small plot of grass in front of a great hole or cavern, and there, crouched on the grass in front of the cavern, was a little black and scarlet thing; but it was no bird, for it was a little girl, and when Tom gave a jump, exclaiming, 'Oh my!' she raised her head, and throwing back the hood of her cloak, disclosed a very pale, miserable countenance, with a pair of red-rimmed, but brilliant dark eyes.

'Where did you come from?' inquired Tom, when he had somewhat recovered from his astonishment. 'From up there,' replied the child, pointing to the top of the cliffs.

'But how did you get here?' asked Tom, sitting down by her side to rest.

'I don't know,' she answered. 'I ran away, I did;' and she burst out crying.

'Ran away!' repeated Tom. Then adding, 'There, do not cry, I will take you home with me.' He tried to wipe away the tears from her eyes; but she drew away from him, saying:

'No, you must not take me home again. I hate them, I do. I wish I was dead, that I do;' and she clutched at her cloak convulsively.

'Where's your hat or bonnet?' inquired Tom, not seeing either at hand.

'I don't know—I don't care,' she replied pulling up some blades of grass and scattering them about. 'They'll send me to school now, I know they will. I wish I'd run the other way, I do.'

'What way?' asked Tom.

'Why, across the fields, and along the road. I'd have got to London, perhaps, that way.'

'To London!' echoed Tom, looking aghast.

'Yes,' she answered, nodding her head. 'I came here because I thought some ships would come along, and a good captain would take me over to my papa; but I can't get down to the beach, and no ships have gone by this morning, and I am very tired, and I am so afraid; so I had better go back, if you will please to take me, sir.'

'I will, if I can,' said Tom, wondering all the time how he should be able to do it. 'But won't they be very angry with you at home?' he asked.

'Yes; but I don't care. They'll send me to bed and talk away, and send me to school; but I don't care. I'll run away again. I don't care.'

Tom could not help thinking his little companion must be a very naughty girl, not to care for anybody or anything; for old nurse had early taught that 'Don't care' never comes to good, and he knew by heart the story of Tommy and Harry; but he suppressed his opinion, and merely asked her name.

'Madge Allen,' she replied, getting up from the grass. 'What is yours?'

'Thomas William Harley,' he answered.

'I like your name, sir,' she observed, 'and I like you very much indeed. And now, will you take me home?' and she prepared to go.

Tom saw the tears in her eyes, and he saw she was trembling all over, though she tossed her head and tried to look as if she did not care, as she endeavoured to follow him up the cliff; but when she reached a more dangerous point, where Tom could only lie down and stretch down his hand to help her up, her assumed composure failed her, and she sobbed aloud.

'Don't cry, don't be frightened,' said Tom encouragingly. 'Put your right foot in that little crevice, and your left in that—and now, give a long step—and here you are!' he cried, as he pulled her up to the rock on which he lay. 'Now the worst is done.' But the worst was not done, as they soon found out; for Tom, thinking it would be better to take her back by the way she said she came, found it a far more difficult and dangerous ascent than he supposed, and when the wind began to rise, and the clouds to gather black and heavy around them, he could not help wishing they were safe on the ground above. His wish would have soon been realized, but for Madge; she grew more and more afraid, and was so faint and weary that she could make no effort to quicken her steps, and when a tremendous peal of thunder sounded in her ears, she sat down, declaring she could go no farther.

It was some minutes before Tom could persuade her to try and get up a little farther, and it is doubtful if she could have taken many steps more, if timely help had not arrived in the form of a strong young man, who had been despatched by Mr. Harley to see after Tom, when he did not return home to dinner. The man had been accustomed to clambering the cliffs from a boy, so he speedily led them by a short safe path, known only to the most expert villagers; but long before they reached Mr. Harley's lodgings, Tom and Madge were wet to the skin, for the rain descended in torrents. Mr. and Mrs. Harley were surprised beyond measure when they saw two dripping children enter the garden, but they received them gladly; and having dismissed the man to the kitchen to dry himself, and Tom to his bedroom to change his clothes, Mrs. Harley took Madge into Constance's and Dora's room, and had her undressed and put into Constance's bed. As soon as the little stranger was comfortably settled in bed, Mrs. Harley inquired of her where she lived, that she might send a message assuring her friends of her safety.

Madge told her she lived at the Vale; but she need not send, for her Aunt Gay was gone with her cousins on a visit, and the servants had a party, and no one would miss her; a piece of information which proved perfectly correct, for, on Mrs. Harley's sending to the Vale, the servants were astonished at discovering that Miss Madge was not in the house. Mrs. Harley had told the messenger to say that the little girl was far too tired and poorly to be sent home that day, but she hoped she would be well enough to return the following morning. In the course of the afternoon, Madge informed Mrs. Harley that she ran away from the Vale immediately after she had finished breakfast, hoping to reach the beach before the ships sailed, and that she had tried to go down the rock way that nobody should see her and take her back; but she missed the path, and at last found herself where she could neither get up nor down. She said she knew it was very naughty to run away, but she did not care; nobody loved her, and she was very miserable; and then she burst out crying.

Mrs. Harley did not like to ask her any questions respecting her relatives, excepting the age of her cousins, to which Madge replied that they were grown-up, big women, and called her 'a little nuisance,' and 'a bore,' and were angry with her papa for sending her over to England to plague them. 'And I hate them—I do,' she cried, springing up in the bed, her eyes flashing with passion; 'and I will go back to papa in India, that I will.'

Mrs. Harley tried to soothe her, by telling her, if she loved her papa, and wished to please him, she would be good, and not say and do naughty things, but patiently remain where he had placed her. But Madge was not then inclined to listen to her advice, and, with a shrug of her shoulders, lay down again, solacing herself with her pet, 'I don't care.'

'She ought not to be a bad child,' observed Mrs. Harley to her husband, as they stood by her bed-side when she had fallen asleep. 'She has a pleasant face and noble brow, and her eyes are beautiful. Poor little creature! I fear she has fallen amongst those who cannot understand her.' Mrs. Harley's surmise was a true one; Mrs. and the Misses Gay did not understand Madge, for they considered her a regularly disagreeable, spoiled child. Nearly spoiled she had been by her fond father; but, until her arrival at the Vale, she had been anything but usually disagreeable. Colonel Allen had rather an objection to schools, and had begged Mrs. Gay to try and have Madge educated at home; a plan which gave great offence to the Misses Gay, and, through them, no arrangement had been made for carrying out his wish, though Madge had been with them three or four months; and, left to herself, disliked and unloved, she had grown reckless and desperate.

Madge was quite recovered from the effect of her fright and wetting when she awoke in the morning; and when she came down to breakfast, no one would have thought she was the naughty little girl of yesterday, from her appearance and manner. Her long tangled black hair was smooth and glossy, and the red rims round her large hazel eyes had quite disappeared, and she looked so bright in her scarlet and black plaid frock, sitting between Constance and Dora in their mourning ones, that Tom mentally compared her to a pretty robin redbreast. She told them her real name was Magdalene, but that everybody called her Madge, that she was ten years old, that her mamma was dead, and that nobody loved her but her papa and old Jenkins, papa's servant in India; and she said she 'loved them both—all that,' and she covered her heart with her hands as she described the extent of her affection.

Mrs. Harley became much interested in her as she talked and played about with the children, who were kept at home that morning to be with her until she should be sent for by her aunt.

They had finished dinner, when the sound of carriage wheels attracted their attention, and drew them to the window; and Madge, peeping over Tom's shoulder, murmured, 'It's Aunt Gay,' and quickly withdrew to a corner of the room, sitting down upon a hassock. Mrs. Harley noticed the expression on the child's face, which said as plainly as possible, 'There, my pleasure is over; but I don't care;' and it grieved her to see it. When she joined Mrs. Gay in the drawing-room, that lady thanked her very much for her great kindness to her naughty little niece, and begged that she would allow Madge to remain an hour or two longer with her, until she could send a carriage to take her back to the Vale. She said that she and her daughters were visiting in the neighbourhood, and they had determined not to return home until they had sent Madge off to a good strict school, for, keep her any longer they would not. Whilst Mrs. Gay was talking, and looking very angry, a sudden idea flashed through Mrs. Harley's brain, and asking Mrs. Gay to excuse her for a few minutes, she withdrew to communicate it to Mr. Harley. The result of that few minutes' conversation decided Madge Allen's future destination; for, on Mrs. Harley's returning to the drawing-room, she said that Mr. Harley had requested her to beg Mrs. Gay to allow Madge to continue with them the few days they should remain at Seamouth, and should Mrs. Gay be still unsettled about a school for her niece, they should be happy to take her to Lotsirl, and place her as a boarder at the establishment where Constance was being educated, until she could hear from Colonel Allen. Mrs. Gay was delighted, and thankfully accepted Mr. and Mrs. Harley's offer, saying, 'It was such a relief to her mind, to get rid of the troublesome, naughty child; if the school were good enough for Miss Harley, it was quite good enough for Madge,' and that her boxes should be sent to Mrs. Harley's that evening or the following morning. She positively refused to see Madge, and parted from Mrs. Harley with a profusion of thanks.

The children saw Mrs. Gay get into the carriage and drive off, and Madge made a rush to the window to be sure that she had done so; but before any of them could express their astonishment in words, Mrs. Harley stood in the doorway, and beckoned Madge out of the room. Madge turned white and red alternately, as Mrs. Harley told her gently, but firmly, what she and Mrs. Gay had decided upon for her; but when she heard that she was to remain with the Harleys until she went to school, where she should see Constance every day, she burst into tears, and looking very timidly at Mrs. Harley, said, 'I will be good, ma'am; indeed I will try now to be good.'

CHAPTER IX.

In a few days after Tom's adventure, the Harleys returned to Chelsea Place, taking Madge with them. Mr. and Mrs. Harley would fain have kept her a day or two longer before sending her to school, had they not considered it would have been rewarding her for being naughty, and running away from the Vale. They knew that she had been very unhappy there; but then, that was no reason why she should have acted wickedly; and the result of her conduct might have proved very serious, had not Tom discovered her before the storm commenced, for it was not probable the careless servants would have missed her until bedtime, when it would have been too late to have searched for her amongst the rocks, even if they had thought of doing so. Mrs. Harley, therefore, took her to school the morning after their arrival at Lotsirl, promising her, if she behaved properly, and her governess gave a good report of her, that she should always spend the monthly holiday at Chelsea Place, and that she would ask her aunt to allow her to pass the Christmas ones with them also.

Madge was delighted with the proposal, and pledged herself to be very tractable and good, a pledge which, to her praise, she faithfully redeemed, for her governess had not a fault to complain of, when the monthly holiday came round. She was naturally clever, though backward in her studies; but she determined to get on with her learning, and gave her whole mind to her lessons, so that, in a few weeks, her improvement was manifest. Her ambition was to be in the same class as Constance, who was but little more than a year older than herself; and she worked hard to attain her desire, though she knew some time must elapse ere she could realize it.

Mrs. Gay very willingly consented to her remaining with the Harleys during the Christmas vacation, which, being only for three weeks, passed far too rapidly to please most of the children. Madge's visit helped much to dispel the gloom which had gathered around the Harleys through Johnny's death; even Mr. Harley participated in the general feeling of love and pity towards the neglected high-spirited child. Only Dora stood aloof from her, and seemed to eye her with a degree of distrust, if not annoyance. A little root of bitterness was springing up in her young breast, one that she could feel, but did not rightly understand; it was that insidious, poisonous plant, jealousy.

From the day that Tom had discovered Madge, his affection appeared to have lessened for Dora; and she, too, quickly discovered it, and resented it by having as little to do with Madge as possible. It was so hard to hear Madge appealed to, and deliberated with by Tom, and to know, if she had not been there, he would have consulted her; and, at such times, poor Dora would slip away to her bedroom, and try to forget all about her vexation, by thinking of Johnny, and that he would not have acted so. Dora had been permitted to return to her own old bedroom upon coming back from Seamouth, and little Agnes slept in the inner room, that had been occupied by Johnny, which was a source of great comfort to Dora, who was very fond of her; and when not with her uncle, her happiest hours were now spent there, especially if she could coax Agnes to be her companion.

Tom, who was perfectly innocent of having grieved Dora, would occasionally wonder at her seeming indifference; but he was so absorbed with his shipbuilding and Madge, that he seldom thought of it many minutes together, and certainly not long enough to lead him to question her on the subject. Madge was also rather afraid of the reserved little girl, with the large eyes, sometimes blue, and sometimes all but black, so dark were they in colour, and could talk much better and more freely with any of the other children; so that she made no overtures of friendship, but rather shunned Dora's society. Dora could scarcely tell whether she was pleased or sorry when the Christmas holidays were over; she was pleased that Madge had returned to school on her own account, but she was sorry for all the rest of the family, for she saw how much they all liked her. It most decidedly had not been a pleasant three weeks to her, whatever it had been to her cousins; and she knew it was entirely her own fault, which made her anything but happy in her mind, and she felt she wanted her own dear mamma very badly to set her right. But the setting right soon came in a way and manner Dora did not expect. Tom had got out his books, and begun his exercise the evening after Madge went back to school, when he observed:

'How I do miss my robin! Oh dear me!'

'Your robin?' said Constance, looking up from her book. Dora also looked up, and her heart beat fast as Tom replied:

'Why, Madge to be sure; she's just like a robin redbreast, so bright and cheerful.'

'I'll tell her so to-morrow,' said Constance, laughing.

'You'd better not, Conny,' remarked Tom, growing very red in the face. 'Girls are always so stupid; they can't hear nothing but they will go and talk about it.'

'If they don't hear nothing, they cannot talk about it, Mr. Tom; so you are out there,' observed Constance, very provokingly.

'Well, tell if you like; she is the nicest, prettiest little girl I ever saw, and that's the real truth. She's just like a robin redbreast, and no mistake. What do you think, Dora?' he inquired.

Dora managed to mumble out something about she 'did not know,' which rather piqued Tom, who immediately replied:

'Then you ought to know; and I shall call you Dora Dull, if you do not keep your eyes open for the future.'

This remark was too much for Dora, whose heart and eyes were, alas! too open, and, with a look of mingled passion and sorrow, she sprang up and darted out of the room, never stopping until she had reached her own, when, shutting to the door, she flumped down on the floor with her face to the wall, and burst out crying.

It so happened that, just as Dora was rushing out of the schoolroom, her uncle was coming up the lower flight of stairs, and saw her dash up the upper ones, looking angrier than he had ever seen her look, and following her, he reopened the door, entering without being observed.

'Dora,' he said, after pausing a few moments, 'what are you angry about?'

Dora threw her pinafore over her face, but made no reply, though her sobs were perfectly audible.

'Dora, my child, get up,' said her uncle, helping to raise her from the floor. 'What is the matter?'

'Tom says, I'm Dora Dull,' sobbed Dora, still keeping the pinafore over her face.

'Surely that would not make you angry,' he remarked.

'No-o, no-o,' answered Dora, 'not if he loved me; but he does not now—no, he does not love me now.'

'Nonsense, Dora, that's a whim of yours. Tom is as fond of you as ever, no doubt, my child.'

'No, he is not—that he is not, he loves Madge best; he says so,' and Dora gave a deep sigh, which seemed to come from the bottom of her heart.

'Dora, my darling, you must not talk and feel like that, it is naughty of you,' said Mr. Harley, kindly.

'Yes, I know it is,' sobbed Dora. 'I'm very naughty bad, uncle—'tis just here, uncle;' and Dora dropped her pinafore, and laid her hand on her breast.

'Yes, I know it is, my dear,' replied her uncle. 'Let me tell you what is the matter with you, that you may ask God to cure you of it;' and he sat down, taking her on his knee.

'Now Dora,' he continued, 'what makes you think Tom loves Madge better than he does you?'

'Because he talks to her, and he says she is the nicest, prettiest little girl he ever saw, just like robin redbreast, uncle, and that I am Dora Dull. Oh dear! oh dear! I wish I were pretty too,' and she laid her head against her uncle, and began weeping afresh.

'How pretty would you wish to be, Dora?' he asked.

'As pretty as Madge, uncle,' she managed to reply.

'Why, my dear?' said her uncle.

'Because—because Tom would love me best; and I want him to, ever so much more than Madge; indeed, I do,' she whispered.

'Dora, my darling,' said Mr. Harley, 'do you know what sin it is called, when we desire wrongly what another person possesses, and cannot be happy without it?'

Dora was silent; but she gazed earnestly through her tears at her uncle.

'It is called envy, my darling; and dreadful things it leads to, if indulged in. And when we envy beauty, or anything else of another's, for the sake of taking their place, and being thought more of than they, it is jealousy. And oh! my precious child, it was envy and jealousy which caused Cain to kill his brother Abel. Strive therefore against it, as you would fly from the very gates of hell, for it is the devil's bait to lure you to destruction.'

Dora clung closer to her uncle, and wept faster and louder, as he showed her what was passing in her heart, and what it might lead to; and she begged him to tell her what to do that she might not grow so wicked, so very wicked.

'You must watch and pray against it now, my darling, whilst the seed is very small, ere it take deep root in your heart; for already you have proved that it has a root of bitterness.'

'Yes, oh yes!' she murmured; 'oh dear! oh dear!' Just then the conversation was interrupted by Tom's coming in search of Dora, having waited a long time expecting her to return, and finding she did not, he had come to see whether she was really angry with him, for he had not failed to notice the look she gave him as she left the room; but his father waved his hand for him to go away, and then kissing Dora, he bade her pray to God to teach her the good and the right way, and left her to see after Tom.

Tom was astounded when Mr. Harley told him that he feared he had not been as kind to Dora as he ought to have been, and promised that she should never have to complain of him again, for that he did love her, and would not vex her for all the world. And when he parted from his father, he went up to Dora, and putting his arms round her neck, whispered in her ear, 'Why, you're a downright silly Dora! Madge is my dear friend; but you are my little cousin sister Dora, and you always will be sister Dora.'

Dora wiped away her tears, and descended to the schoolroom smiling and happy with Tom. The seedling root of bitterness had been wrenched out from her heart by prayer and love, as it ever will be, if we use the weapons provided for us by the Captain of our salvation, Jesus the Lord.

(To be continued.)

SALVATION AS A FREE GIFT.

I ONCE found myself in company with a party of friends in the gallery of a small village church, listening to a discourse from a coloured minister, or rather exhorter. After some preliminary exercises, a grey-headed man, evidently quite a patriarchal personage, arose, and announced as his subject, 'The History of Dives and Lazarus,' which he proceeded to explain and enforce.

One illustration he used was so full of quaint simplicity, and at the same time so adapted to express the idea he meant to convey, that it struck me forcibly. He was trying to show how a sinner should accept the gospel offers of salvation.

'Suppose,' said he, 'any of you wanted a coat, and should go to a white gentleman to purchase one. Well, he has one that exactly fits you, and in all respects is just what you need. You ask the price; but, when told, find you have not enough money, and shake your head.

'"No, massa, I am too poor, must go without," and turn away.

'But he says, "I know you cannot pay me, and I have concluded to give it to you: will you have it?"

'What would you do in that case?—stop to hem and haw, and say, "Oh, he's just laughing at me; he don't mean it?" No such thing. There is not one of you who would not take the coat, and say—

'"Yes, massa, and thank you too."

'Now, my dear friends, God's salvation is offered you as freely as that; why won't you take it as freely? You are lost, undone sinners, and feel that you need a covering from his wrath. If you would keep his holy law blameless, you might purchase it by good works; but ah! you are all full of sin, and that continually. Prayer and tears are worthless. You are poor indeed; and if this is all your dependence, I don't wonder that you are turning off in despair. But stop—look here—God speaks now, and offers you the perfect robe of Christian righteousness, that will cover all your sins, and fit all your wants, and say that you may have it "without money and without price." Oh, brethren, my dear brethren, do take God's word for it, and thankfully accept his free gift.'

What impression the words had on the old man's coloured auditors, I cannot tell; but as our group left the church, one of the ladies remarked to another:

'What a strange idea that was about the coat!'

'My dear friend,' was the reply, 'it suited my state of mind, rough and unpolished as it was, better than all Dr. ——'s elaborate and eloquent arguments this morning. I am so glad that I came here. This is the way I have been despairingly seeking for years. How simple! How plain! Free grace alone! Yes, I will take God at his word.

"Nothing in my hands I bring,
Simply to thy cross I cling."

Miscellaneous.

The Wave of Life.

'Whither, thou turbid wave?
Whither, with so much haste,
As if a thief wert thou?'
'I am the Wave of Life,
Stained with my margin's dust;
From the struggle and the strife
Of the narrow stream I fly
To the sea's immensity,
To wash from me the slime
Of the muddy banks of Time.'

—From the German of Tiedge.

The Prayer.—A young lady was taking a pleasant walk one summer day in a deeply shaded woodland, and, being weary, sat down to rest on a secluded mossy bank, near the summit of a hill. Presently she heard a voice, as of one engaged in earnest conversation; and, on advancing a step or two, she saw good Mr. M—— coming leisurely up the hill, the reins hanging loosely over his horse's neck. 'What can he be talking about so earnestly to himself?' she thought; but directly she heard the voice of prayer; and the words which God's providence caused to be especially impressed upon her mind were these: 'O Lord, have mercy upon the dear youth of this place.' The good old man rode on; but the voice of prayer was heard, after he had disappeared from her view, in the leafy depths of the forest. The young lady was struck with the thought: 'Is this the way Christians go about the town, and mingle with the world? Do they pray thus for our souls? I have hardly ever prayed for my own.' From that day she began to pray, and became the first-fruits of a glorious revival.

Parental Discipline.—A recent writer, alluding to the prevalence of crime among boys, very properly asserts that one of the main causes of the decline of morality, is the decay of parental discipline. The family circle, the domestic hearth, is the true fountain of purity or corruption to public morals. Most people become what they are made at home. They go forth into the world, to act out the character they have formed in the first fourteen years of their lives.

The Opera.—When I think that music too is condemned to be mad, and to burn herself upon such a funeral-pile, your celestial opera-house grows dark and infernal to me. Behind its glitter stalks the shadow of eternal death. Through it, too, I look not up into the divine eye, as Richter has it, but down into the bottomless eye-socket; not upward towards God, heaven, and the home of truth, but too truly downward, towards falsity, vanity, and the dwelling-place of everlasting despair.—Carlyle.

Wealth.—Wealth is given to Christians, not to be expended in costly raiment, extravagant equipage, and luxurious living, but to be employed freely in the service of the Master. 'Freely ye have received, freely give.'

The Soul.

The mind hath no horizon.
It looks beyond the eye, and seeks for mind
In all it sees, or all it sees o'erruling.

—J. Montgomery.

The Over-sanguine.

And yet I do bethink me of the proverb,
Praise not the day before the evening come.

—Schiller.

Wonders of Creation.—The cheese-mite is an animal of middling size in existence; in other words, there are creatures as much smaller than it as there are larger. This is not strictly correct. The largest animal known is the Rorqual (Balænoptera boops), which is about 100 feet in length. The smallest is the Twilight Monad above mentioned, whose dimensions are $\frac{1}{15000}$th of an inch! It is evident that the middle term between these extremes is one-third of an inch, which is about the length of the common house-fly—which may be therefore considered as an animal of medium size in creation.

Naked come, Naked go.—Alexander the Great, being upon his deathbed, commanded that, when he was carried forth to his grave, his hands should not be wrapped, as was usual, in the cere-cloths, but should be left outside the bier, that all men might see them, and see that they were empty

The World's Friendships.—One morning I found him quite alone. He bade me remark this. 'Formerly,' he said, 'when I was young, scarcely any one passed my door, men or women, without calling to see me. To-day, from that window, I observe them all go by, as formerly, but they enter no more.'—Guizot on Lord Holland.

Be Consistent.—Oh the inconsistencies of professing Christians! Cards at eight, family worship at ten! A ball one night, a prayer-meeting the next! A psalm or hymn one hour, some silly song of folly the next! This week the theatre or opera, next week the communion table! When will those who name the name of Christ learn to avoid even the appearance of evil, as well as to depart from all iniquity?

The Cost of Experience.—Experience is a blessed thing, but it is one of the dearest of all commodities. It is only to be purchased by time, and toil, and failure, and sorrow, and anxiety, and strength. Perhaps the last is one of the costliest of all the items. Suppose you have got the experience of thirty years, your strength to make use of that experience is not what it was. Experience comes in, but strength goes out. Yes, experience is good, but very costly.

Trust and Distrust.—When I rise from my knees, uncertain as to whether God will hear my cries, then I am blaspheming the name of Him who is merciful and gracious; when I rise from my knees confident of an answer (not because of what I am, but of what He is), then I am glorifying his name.

Orators.—Those orators who give us much noise and many words, but little argument and less wit, and who are most loud where they are the least lucid, should take a lesson from the great volume of nature. She often gives us the lightning, even without the thunder, but never the thunder without the lightning.

Conscience.—Conscience, be it ever so little a worm while we live, grows suddenly to a serpent on the deathbed.—Anon.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

LUKE VI. 19.

JESUS is here the centre of a great crowd from all parts of Palestine. They have heard of Him, and they flock to Him. His words and deeds attract them. He has what they want; so they gather round Him. The scene teaches us such lessons as the following:

I. There is health in Jesus.—He came from heaven with all the health of heaven in Him; health, like sunshine, flowing out irrepressibly; health of every kind; health without measure; health inexhaustible. The balm of the mountains of Gilead might wither down and die out; this heavenly balm could not. It was like the leaves of the tree of life, never falling, ever growing, and ever green. The physicians of Gilead died, till none was left; this Physician dies not. He is the ever-living Christ, the Son of God. All health, and skill, and kindness are to be found in Him; for not only is He perfect man, but very God; nay, and the fulness of the healing Spirit, without measure, dwells in Him.

II. There is sickness in us.—We are sick, nigh unto death; sick in body, sick in soul; 'the whole head sick, the whole heart faint;' our wound incurable by man; our hurt grievous. It is sickness pervading our whole system; sickness accompanied with pain and weakness, with sorrow, and sadness, and heaviness of spirit. It prostrates the body and clouds the mind. We may cover it over, but it is still there. We may soothe with anodynes, and administer sleeping-draughts, but the disease is unremoved. We may deaden or drown the pain in worldliness, or business, or vanity, or lust; but the mortal malady is still working in every part. O deadly disease of sin! what a world hast thou made here!—what an hospital, a lazar-house, a city of the plague! O pains of earth! not temporary or occasional, but constant and abiding; forerunners of the eternal pain, the eternal sickness, the eternal agony and woe.

III. Contact with Jesus heals.—The medicine must be taken; the Physician's hand must touch us; we must, in some way or other, come within the circle where the divine virtue is flowing out. It is indeed the Holy Spirit that applies the remedy; but He does so by bringing us within this healing circle, by making us touch Him who is the divine treasure-house of health. There was no healing for Israel without looking at the brazen serpent; so there is no healing for us without the look, the touch that brings us into contact with Jesus. It is not a clasping or embracing, but a touching; a touching even the hem of his garment; a coming within his shadow, as in the case of Peter. Such is the resistless efficacy, the irrepressible virtue that is lodged in Him! And as we are healed by touching, so our health is continued by our continuing to touch. It is to be a constant touching, a lifetime's contact; nay, an eternal contact. Thus is our new health begun and prolonged. Does this seem a hard thing? A hard thing to be always in communication with Jesus; to be always under the shadow of the tree of life; to be always on the brink of the crystal river of the New Jerusalem! If some think it hard, they show that all is yet wrong with them, and that it is sheer necessity and force that is bringing them to entertain the thought of contact with Jesus at all. Should we call it a hard thing to be daily obliged to breathe the fresh air and bask in the glorious sunshine? Is it a hard thing to be obliged to eat, that we may be fed; or to sleep, that we may be refreshed? Is it a hard thing for the friend to be in company with the friend, or the parent with the child? Is there not among multitudes, who call Jesus Saviour, a feeling that they would rather only use Him in times of great necessity, but at other times have the fellowship of every one in preference to Him? But the disease that brings us to Him, keeps us at his side. There is no health away from Him, neither is there joy. We came for the cure of our pain, but we find this only a small part of what we obtain from Him. We find all in Him, and so we hold Him fast, and will not let Him go. It is our very life, our very joy, to remain in contact with Him.

IV. This health and this contact are free to us.—There is no fence around Him to keep us off, no guard to forbid or warn us away. Any one, every one may come at once and be healed. It is the sick, not the whole, that He invites. It is the leper, the palsied, the fevered, the blind, the lame, the deaf, the devil-possessed, that He bids welcome to. On every side we may approach Him. At any time and in any way we may come. Whatever be the length or the deadliness of our disease, we may come. The Physician is divinely skilful, the medicine is free, the cure is certain.

Health for sick humanity! medicine for a diseased world! a Physician for a dying race!—such are the messages which we bring; all of them overflowing with God's great love to sinners—to sinners simply as such. The depths of divine compassion are infinite, so are its heights. God's pitying love takes in the worst sinner that ever breathed the air of earth. Wide as earth, wide as the bounds of sin, wide as the evil of human hearts, wide as heaven, wide as his own infinite heart,—such is the pitying love of God.

Wilt thou, then, be made whole? This is the question which the Lord puts to us, and puts with all earnestness and compassion. Dying sinner! the God who made thee pities thee, yearns over thee. The Saviour, who, when here, went about curing all manner of sicknesses, is still working the works which He wrought on earth. His hands are full of health, and He stretches them out to thee! What are thy diseases, then, however deadly, when He undertakes to deal with them? One touch of his makes them vanish away. Touch, and be healed!

ALL FULNESS.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

'It pleased the Father, that in Him should all fulness dwell.'—Col. i. 19.

WHAT 'fulness is this? It needs an explanation. There is a divine fulness, a fulness of Godhead, which dwells originally, inherently, eternally in the glorious, blessed God. It is a fulness of power, wisdom, goodness, righteousness, life, and light. This is the fountain of all that exists; it has filled the universe with goodly, holy, happy creatures; and it is still fulness, unwearied, unexhausted, as at the first. We know not all that it has done; we know not all that it will yet do. This fulness belongs to Christ equally with the Father and the Spirit. In the next chapter we are told of this: 'For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.' In this chapter we find Him exercising this divine fulness, as Creator and Preserver of all: 'For by Him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by Him, and for Him: and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist.' We should think more of this: it would strengthen our faith; it would make us rise from nature, not merely up to nature's God, but up to our dear Redeemer and elder Brother; it would help us to realize the greatness of the sacrifice which He made, and the greatness of the love He must have felt for us, when He left this fulness of divine power and all-sufficiency, and descended to a state of creaturehood and dependence.

But it needed another fulness than this in order to redeem and save fallen man. Christ's original divine fulness could make man in God's image, and crown him with glory and honour; but, after he had sinned, Christ, simply as God, could only have carried into execution the sentence of the broken law, and said, 'Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire.' In order to save us from this, He had to work out and acquire for himself a new kind of fulness, which is called the mediatorial fulness, because it fills up the breach between God and man; it satisfies the claims of offended God, and supplies the wants of ruined man; it brings them together again in perfect and everlasting peace and friendship. For this purpose, though He was the great God, He humbled himself, made himself of no reputation, was born of a woman, made under the law. He wrought righteousness, glorified God on earth, endured the sharpness of death, and rose again to glory. By this work of perfect obedience, even unto death, Christ brought in and acquired a new kind of fulness, unknown in the universe before. It is a fulness of atonement, of righteousness, forgiveness, peace, life, light, and grace. In virtue of this fulness, which Christ, as his righteous Servant, has introduced, the holy God can now righteously quicken dead souls, give them repentance, justify them, make them accepted in the Beloved, sanctify them, make them fruitful, guide them and keep them through life, bring them to glory, raise them from the grave, and make them perfectly blessed for ever. This is the fulness which is here spoken of. It is called 'all the fulness,' because it contains all that is connected with salvation, all the grace that the individual sinner needs, and all the grace which the whole family, the whole body requires. It is the beginning, the progress, and the perfection of the new creation.

This fulness dwells in Christ. It is this that gives Him the pre-eminence among his fellows, his brethren. All godly saved men have grace according to their measure; but in them it is never fulness; it is always imperfect; it is changeable; they cannot impart or communicate it to others. The best must say, 'Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; I am only pressing on.' The best are, at some time or other, found faulty and lacking, even in the good things in which they seem most to excel. The best cannot supply the wants of their fellows; they must say to their nearest and dearest, 'Not so, lest there be not enough for us and for you.' But in Christ there is fulness, always fulness; it is never exhausted, diminished, or wearied. It dwells in Him; it is ever ready, morning, noon, and night—'a very present help in time of trouble.' He gives it freely, abundantly, unceasingly, to all that ask, however many they are, and however great and varied their wants. He says, 'Come unto me, and rest;' 'Come unto me, and drink;' 'Commit thy way to me, and I will direct thy steps.' You never think of Him aright, till you see Him by faith, thus full, overflowing, and ready to respond to every supplicant. It is this that makes Him 'the chief of ten thousand;' 'the Brother born for adversity;' 'the Lamb, as it were slain, in the midst of the throne, having seven horns and seven eyes.' It is this that fits Him to be the Days-man, making and maintaining peace for ever; it is this that makes Him the Captain of salvation, bringing many sons to glory. He is saying at this moment, 'Look unto me, and be saved.' Look, I beseech you, till you are made from the heart to cry, 'Yes, I am saved. "Surely in the Lord have I righteousness and strength." They are in Him, but yet they are mine, as really and beneficially mine as if I had them in my own possession and in my own control; for He ministers them to me seasonably, sufficiently, unfailingly.'

'It pleased the Father, that in Christ should all the fulness dwell.' There are many reasons for this. It is his right and due. He brought in the fulness by his obedience unto death, and therefore He is worthy to be God's Steward over it, even as Joseph was set over the granaries of Egypt. 'Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity; therefore God, thy God, hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.' But, again, He is the fittest to dispense the treasures; for He is ever near the sufferers, He has had experience of their miseries, He knows the burden of sin, the power of temptation, the hidings of God's face, and so He hastens to succour them in their distress. But, again, this puts honour upon Him, for all salvation comes from Him through faith; and thus every deliverance, restoration, supply, produces a fresh sense of indebtedness, and stirs up a new song of praise to Him who saveth from death. But, more than this, it knits the Head and the members together in love; for his heart is drawn out to them in supplying their many wants, and their hearts are drawn out to Him by the benefits they are constantly receiving.

This arrangement of putting all the fulness into Christ pleases the Father: does it please you? Are you willing to live a life of faith upon the Son of God; a life of constant, entire dependence; a new-creaturely life? Have you learned to say—

> 'I am a poor sinner, and nothing at all,
> But Jesus Christ is my all in all?'

Do you begin to see a beauty, sweetness, desirableness in this arrangement, which makes you rejoice and thank God for it? Do you say, 'It is safe for me. I find, every hour, how frail and fickle I am, how soon I lose received grace. It passes in the using, amid the tear and wear of life. But, when I am cold, and weak, and dark, I know where to go to obtain a fresh supply, and He does not upbraid me; He only chides me for not coming sooner, not coming oftener.' What unsearchable riches, what boundless possibilities, are here put within our reach! 'He who believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.' His name, through faith in his name, is as mighty as ever to make poor sinners like us peaceful, patient, fruitful, happy. Lord, greatly increase our faith, that we may be filled with all the fulness of God.

Friend, keep up constant, uninterrupted communion with Christ. Stop in the midst of your busiest, happiest moments, to renew your fellowship with Him. Thus you will grow regularly, abundantly; will bear fruit at all seasons; will be carried sweetly, comfortably through duties and trials. You will walk in light, and have much fellowship of divine love.

THE STORY OF A HYMN.

IN passing leisurely up some valley, we alight, perhaps, on a huge boulder, whose size and figure attract us strangely, compelling us to linger and examine. It is rugged and seamed, yet not the less interesting on that account. It stands before us 'moss'd with age,' time-worn and weather-wasted, nestling in its own débris, just the very rock on which one loves to sit and muse. It contains no record of its parentage, no date of its emigration, and no record of the scenes it has witnessed, or of the storms that have beaten on its massive front. Whence has it come? and how has it found its way to this solitude? Did it descend from yon neighbouring crags? or, clasped in ice, has it travelled many a mile, floating over ridges and across plains, till it has settled down in this strange land? We feel such an interest in the old rock, that we cannot help putting such questions: very impatient for, though hardly counting upon, an answer.

It is with some such feelings that we turn over and over again this old Scottish 'Broadside' that lies upon our table. About one foot in length by eight inches in breath, in small type, without 'leads,' in three columns; it contains a hymn of sixty stanzas, common measure, like many of the old ballads, and like most of the Scottish Psalms. Its title is given in large letters: 'THE NEW JERUSALEM;' and its third column finishes with Finis, in due form. It is without date; but one might guess it to be about 160 years old. It is embrowned with age as well as soiled with use; and its ragged edges intimate the freedom as well as the frequency with which it has been 'thumbed' by more than one generation. The 'hard hand' of the northern peasant has been upon it, when, perhaps, going a-field at early dawn, or, at even, teaching it to his children round the hearth, as that which their fathers sang in the city prison, or at Cameron's grave, or on 'Peden's Knowe,' or on Eckford Moss, or on the Moors of Fenwick, or amid the 'Hopes' and 'Cleuchs' of Meggatdale.

This ballad-hymn begins with words which have gone over the breadth and length of the land, till every cottage-roof has echoed them:

'O mother dear Jerusalem!
When shall I come to thee?
When shall my sorrows have an end,
Thy joys when shall I see?

O happy harbour of God's saints!
O sweet and pleasant soil!
In thee no sorrow may be found,
No grief, no care, no toil!'

Whence has this noble plant come from? What is its pedigree? What story has it to tell? Like the boulder we spoke of, it has for generations been embedded in Scottish soil. But has it always been there? No; not always. We can trace it backwards to England. From England we can trace it backward to a more southern region. It has traversed seas, it has crossed mountains, it has drifted over plains to the spot where we find it.

Wodrow, in his Life of David Dickson, minister of Irvine, in the middle of the seventeenth century, ascribes the hymn to that man of God, who, in his hours of leisure, used to solace himself with song. Here, however, he is incorrect. That Dickson revised it and sent it out in the shape in which we find it in the 'Broadsides,' is, we think, certain. He was evidently the editor of the Scottish versions of it; and to him Scotland owes much for putting into the lips of her sons, for generations, a song so sweet and holy, —a song which threw a fragrance over her hills, which, even to this day, is not only remembered but felt.

But the hymn is not Dickson's, nor is it of Scottish origin. We can trace it out of Scotland, and show that it existed in England nearly half a century before the minister of Irvine gave it to Scotland.

Much about the same time that it became known in the north, it seems to have been going abroad through the south, though in a briefer form. In the year 1693, the Rev. W. Burkitt, the well-known expositor, published a small thin volume of prayers and hymns. Among the latter we find the hymn, reduced, however, to eight stanzas, and very much the same as Mr. Montgomery gives in his Christian Psalmist, or Dr. Williams in his Collection.

In 1692, John Hall published a small volume, entitled Jacob's Ladder, in which the hymn is given at considerable length. Its heading is 'The Soul's breathing after her Heavenly Country,' and consists of twenty stanzas. This edition resembles, in several respects, that of Dickson. It begins—

'Jerusalem, my happy home,
O that I were in thee!
O that my woes were at an end,
Thy joys that I might see!'

During the earlier part of the seventeenth century (between 1610 and 1660), we find no traces of the hymn. William Drummond of Hawthornden, and others also, have given us translations of the Latin mediæval hymn, 'Urbs Jerusalem Beata;'* but it is quite distinct in sentiment, tone, and language, from the other class of hymns whose history we are tracing out. The keynote is altogether different. In these Latin hymns the tone is quite jubilant,—full of exultation, because of something already come, or just on its way. In the others, the prevailing sentiment is plaintive, longing for something which still seems afar off.

It is not till we come to the beginning of the seventeenth century that we get trace of our hymn again. In the year 1601 was published a small quarto of forty-five pages, entitled The Song of Mary the Mother of Christ.'† It contains two poems on the 'Heavenly Jerusalem,' the one consisting of fifty-two four-line stanzas, the other of nineteen four-line stanzas. The latter we strongly suspect to be the very hymn in question. We have not been able to cast eyes on the volume in spite of every effort. It is not in the British Museum, nor in the Bodleian. The longer hymn in it is remarkably like the one we are in quest of, and must have been quarried from the same deposit, or composed by the same hand. Most of it is given at length in the Parker Society Collection of Poetry, vol. ii. p. 427.‡ It thus begins:—

'My thirsty soule desires her drought,
At heavenly fountaines to refresh;
My prysoned minde would fayne be out
Of chaynes and fetters of the flesh.

She looketh up unto the state
From whence she downe by sin did slide;
She mournes the more the good she lost;
For present ill she doth abide.

She longs from rough and dangerous seas,
To harbour in the haven of blisse;
When safely anchor at her ease,
And store of sweet contentment is.

From banishment she more and more
Desires to see her country deare;
She sits and sends her sighes before,
Her joys and treasures all be there.'

To any one who will read the hymn from beginning to end, the similarity will be quite apparent, and the common fountain-head will seem equally certain. This, however, will be made more manifest as we proceed.

About three or four years ago our attention

* Drummond translated also the 'Dies Iræ.' It would be curious to gather together the various translations of that old hymn. They are far more numerous than is generally supposed. I may add, that Drummond translated a considerable number of the old Latin hymns.

† See Brydges' Censura Literaria, vol. ii.

‡ The reader will find it in full in The New Jerusalem; a Hymn of the Olden Time, published by Johnstone and Hunter, Edinburgh.

was called to a manuscript in the British Museum, said to contain the hymn in question, and, moreover, affirmed to establish a Popish origin for it. the manuscript is numbered 15,225, and is lettered on the back 'Queen Elizabeth,' though internal evidence shows it to belong to James.*

That manuscript seems to be the scrap-book of some Popish gentleman about 1617 or 1618, and is of a miscellaneous nature, containing several old and well-known pieces printed in the Paradise of daintie Devises, many years before. It contains, at full length, the hymn printed in part by the Parker Society, with this commencing stanza:

'Hierusalem! thy joyes divine,
Noe joyes may be compared to them;
Noe people blessed soe as thine;
Noe cittie like Hierusalem.'

Its title is 'A Prisoner's Songe,' after which, by way of motto, and separate from the rest of the hymn, comes the verse already quoted, 'My thirstie soule,' etc.

Along with this there is another hymn quite in the same tone, and containing many like expressions and figures. It has no title, but runs thus:

'Amounte, my soule, from earth a while,
Sore up with wings of love,
To see where saints and angels dwell
With God in bliss above.

. . . . . .

Hierusalem the place is calld,
Most sumptuous to behold,
The place with pretious stones is walld,
And streetes are paved with gold.

The gates with pretious pearles are framed,
There rubies do abound;
The pretious pearles that can be named,
Are there in plenty found.

Amidst the streetes the well of life,
With golden streames doth flowe;
Upon whose banks the tree of life
In statelie sort doth growe.'

Thus the hymn runs on for fifty-four stanzas, all of them, or almost all of them, quite parallel with the other hymn we have described. It contains one or two fierce lines against 'rude and railing heretikes,' as well as against 'persecuting potentates;' and it is evidently the composition of some of those Romanists who, during the reigns both of Elizabeth and James, were imprisoned for their Jesuitical intrigues.

But in this manuscript there is a third hymn which has only this heading, 'A Song by F. B. P. to the tune of Diana.' It is evidently the original of our hymn, being in most respects quite identical. We only give a verse:

'Hierusalem! my happy home!
When shall I come to thee?
When shall my sorrows have an end,
Thy joys when shall I see?'

It then goes on precisely like Dickson's, in most places word for word, so far as it goes. It contains, however, only twenty-six stanzas.

It is strange to find three such hymns in one manuscript volume, and all of them anonymous. The first is sometimes ascribed to Breton; but this is doubtful. The style is more like that of Southwell;* but he was executed in 1595, and the volume in which it was printed was not published till 1601. It is evident, however, that they must have been, at least to a certain extent, the work of Romanists, to what extent will immediately appear.

In going over these various pieces, one begins to draw the conclusion that they must have had a common origin. That they all sprang out of the last two chapters of the Apocalypse is obvious enough; but this is not all. There is clearly some one piece or poem on which they are modelled; which poem, though itself founded on the Apocalypse, had drawn together kindred passages, and embodied peculiar expressions and figures, which are preserved in all the different hymns.

We have already remarked that we do not consider them as having any real affinity with the hymns in the Breviary which refer to Jerusalem. But there is a hymn of Hildebert, in the beginning of the twelfth century, which comes much nearer to them:

'Me receptet Syon illa
Syon, David urbs tranquilla,' etc.

Just about the same time there is the hymn of Bernard of Clugny: 'Laus patriæ cælestis,' in which there is considerable resemblance to our hymn. Then, farther back, there is the hymn of Damiani, which is generally ascribed to Augustine, and is often printed among his Meditations. This is, perhaps, the likest of all the Latin pieces to our hymn. Were it not for overstretching our limits we should gladly cite a few lines; but we must refer our readers to the original itself.†

Strange to say, however, these Latin hymns resemble the English ones in this, that they give rise to the suspicion of a common fount. There are expressions and figures common to all of them; and they are on the same chord. We have been at some pains to trace out these expressions, and we have discovered most of them in Augustine, scattered throughout his works. Some, for instance, of Hildebert's lines are word for word from Augustine ('De spiritu et anima'). This raises the question, Is not Augustine the real fountain-head of all the hymns, Latin and English? Such we have no doubt is the case; and if the reader has a copy of his Meditations at hand, and will turn to chapter xxv., he will find the whole of David Dickson's hymn, and the greater part of all the rest. He will find the same allusions, the same figures, the same passages of Scripture; he will find all but the Popish references to the Virgin and the saints, etc., which were thrust upon the original by the versifier or versifiers in England in the end of the sixteenth century. Thus the original of the hymn has nothing in it of Popery or superstition; and it is very evident that while David Dickson had before him the English version or versions formerly referred to, he had specially Augustine's chapter in his eye; for, while he has more than doubled the length of the English hymn, he has taken all his additions from Augustine, making his version a more exact translation of that father than any of the preceding hymns had been.

* We counted some five or six allusions to James as then reigning, besides references to events in his reign, such as the execution of John Thulis in 1616. This is evidently the Thulis whose name occurs in Calderwood, along with one F. Barth-Pere. We mention this last name because of its curious coincidence with the initials in the manuscript hymn, and because it shows that the P. in the manuscript stands for Pere. (Calderwood's Hist. vol. v. p. 194.)

* See Southwell's Epistle of Comfort to the Priests, etc., where there is a passage in prose descriptive of the New Jerusalem.

† See Königsfeld's Lateinische Hymnen, p. 22; and Daniel, Thesaurus, vol. i., p. 116. All these Latin hymns are collected in the volume referred to before—The New Jerusalem.

Here, then, we bring our researches to a close. We wish that space had allowed us to be somewhat minuter in details, and more abundant in extracts. But we have sketched the story of the old hymn, and our readers can go into details for themselves. We found the rugged old boulder upon the 'sandy hillocks of Irvine;' and we have traced its journeyings backward for no inconsiderable way. We have traced it from Scotland to England, from England to France, crossing hill and dale. From France we have traced it to the shores of Africa, floated over the Mediterranean in the folios of a Latin father, having taken just about a thousand years in the passage between Hippo and Irvine. A long period, we may think, yet not by any means injurious either to the fragrance or the vigour of the hymn; nay, rather, by such a venerable age, imparting a mellow tenderness and solemnity which a less antiquity would have failed to give.

It is soothing to the soul to stroll along the Ayrshire strand, with the rustling 'bent' or the grey sand underfoot, the broad ocean in front, Arran rising in abrupt majesty from its bosom, the sun sinking down behind its island-hills, and sending out a burst of radiance, as if it would splinter the obstructing peaks of Goatfell; it is soothing at such an hour, and in such a scene, to sing to the ocean-solitude words which, two hundred years ago, had been sung to the same ocean:

'Jerusalem, Jerusalem,
Would God I were in thee!
Oh that my sorrows had an end,
Thy joys that I might see!'

and, while singing, to hear the sound of a more distant and venerable voice from the shores of the Mediterranean, uttering the same words, and breathing out the same melody: 'O Jerusalem my mother, holy city of God, dearest spouse of Christ; thee my heart loves; for thy beauty my soul longs with excessive desire! How fair, how glorious, how noble, art thou! Altogether beautiful; there is no spot in thee! . . . Happy should my soul for ever be, if I might be thought worthy to behold thy glory, thy blessedness, thy comeliness, thy gates, and walls, and streets, thy many mansions, thy thrice noble citizens, and thy mighty King in his beauty. For thy walls are of precious stones, thy gates of the most excellent pearls, thy streets of purest gold, in which a joyful Allelujah, without ceasing, is sung. Thy many mansions are founded upon square stones, built up with sapphires, covered in with golden tiles, into which no one enters save the clean; no defilement dwells in thee. . . . There charity reigns full and perfect, because God is there all in all. Him without end they see; and in always seeing Him they beam with his love. They love and praise, they praise and love. Their whole employment is the praise of God, without end, without flagging, without toil. Happy were I,—yes, truly and eternally happy, if, after this frail body is dissolved, I might be deemed worthy to hear those songs of heavenly melody which are sung to the praise of the Eternal King, by these citizens of the upper country and the bands of blessed souls. Fortunate were I, and too blessed, if I were deemed worthy to sing those songs, and to stand in the presence of my King, my God, my Captain, and to behold Him in his glory, as He has condescended to promise, saying, "Father, I will that they whom Thou hast given me be with me where I am," etc.; and again, "If any man serve me, let him follow me," etc.; and again, "He who loves me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him."'

H. B.

WHAT LUTHER LOVED.

LUTHER, when studying, always had his dog lying at his feet—a dog he had brought from Wartburg, and of which he was very fond. An ivory crucifix stood at the table before him. He worked at his desk for days together, without going out; but when fatigued, and the ideas began to stagnate, he took his guitar with him to the porch, and there executed some musical fantasy (for he was a skilful musician), when the ideas would flow upon him as fresh as flowers after a summer's rain. Music was his invariable solace at such times. Indeed, Luther did not hesitate to say that, after theology, music was the first of arts. 'Music,' said he, 'is the art of the prophets; it is the only other art which, like theology, can calm the agitation of the soul, and put the devil to flight.' Next to music, if not before it, Luther loved children and flowers. That great gnarled man had a heart as tender as a woman's.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

MARTYR'S HYMN.

Words by Horatius Bonar, D.D. Hindostanee Melody.

Met. 82 = ♩
Treble.
Alto.
Tenor.
Bass.
Accomp
1. There was glad - ness in Zi - on, her stan - dard was
2. There is mourn - ing in Zi - on, her stan - dard is
1. There was glad - ness in Zi - on, her stan - dard was fly - ing, Free o - ver her bat - tle - ments, glo - rious and ly - ing De - filed in the dust, to the spoil - er a fly - ing, Free o - ver her bat - tle - ments, glo - rious and

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

gay; All fair as the morn - ing shone forth her a-prey; And now there is wail - ing, and sor - row pre-gay; All fair as the morn - ing shone forth her a-
-dorn - ing, And fear - ful to foes was her god - ly ar - ray.
-vail - ing, For the best of her chil - dren are weed - ed a - way.
-dorn - ing, And fear - ful to foes was her god - ly ar - ray.

The good have been taken, their place is forsaken;
The man and the maiden, the green and the grey:
The voice of the weepers wails over the sleepers,
The martyrs of Scotland that now are away!

The hue of her waters is crimson'd with slaughters,
The blood of the martyrs has redden'd the clay;
And dark desolation broods over the nations,
For the faithful are perished, the good are away;

On the mountains of heather they slumber together;
On the wastes of the moorland their bodies decay;
How sound is their sleeping, how safe is their keeping,
Though far from their kindred they moulder away.

Their blessings shall hover, their children to cover,
Like the cloud of the desert, by night and by day;
Oh, never to perish, their names let us cherish,
The martyrs of Scotland that now are away!

DIARY OF A COVENANTER.

GENUINE autobiographies have almost always some kind of value; but when written in times of historical interest, and by persons who suffered persecution for their faith, such writings cannot fail to deserve attention. They cast light on the modes of thought of their day; they reveal, often almost unintentionally, matters unnoticed by historians; and when written by those whose simple truthfulness is apparent on every page, they may be accepted not only as faithful pictures of individual characters, but as types of a large class, trained under similar teaching, and influenced by similar circumstances.

A set of memoirs is before us, written by different members of a family of Presbyterians, during the reigns of Charles II. and James II. They reveal glimpses both of the inner life and the outward history of the writers; and though there is little of the picturesque or romantic in the story of their lowly lives, and little of anything like literary talent in their simple narratives, they have the charm of being true, and, as such, afford a useful study. When we contrast those times with our own, we may well ask ourselves, if our own faith would be found as stedfast as theirs were it tried as severely. In reading their lives, we find that the sorely persecuted Christians of those days were deeply in earnest. They thought less of hardships than of their inward conflicts; and, in the same way, the deliverances for which they give thanks to God are often rather those of the spirit than of the body,—'soul refreshings' from some verse of Scripture brought seasonably to mind, and 'discoveries of the Lord's kindness,' which filled their hearts with joy, and more than made up for all their trials.

Without pausing to discuss further the peculiar aspect of their religious life, or the means by which it was sustained in those hard times, we proceed to enable our readers to examine it for themselves, by presenting them with extracts from some of those old writings, connected by just so much of narrative as will explain them. And the first of our memoirs is that of James Nimmo. He commences his history by giving some account of his ancestors, who had been for several generations possessed of lands in the parish of Bathgate, Linlithgowshire. James was born in 1654, and educated, first at the parish school of Bathgate, and afterwards at that of Stirling, where he was boarded with a good master, and remained till he was seventeen years of age, when being, as he tells us, 'resolved not to follow my book, I began to think of some other way of bestowing myself in some employment, and at length, by Greenyard's and my father's advice and consent, it was resolved upon to bind me with a relation, one Matthew Cumming, merchant in Glasgow. But when this, by all rational means, was essayed, and we went there, by a very small matter it misgave, and my father called me home to himself; and then the Dutch war falling out with England, he had no will to let me go abroad, in which I think the merciful hand of God may be seen by considering his chart of providences with me since.'

John therefore remained at home, assisting his father in farming; but though an only son, he was treated with great severity, and his life seems to have been far from happy. He scarcely mentions his mother, who was one of the Munes of Rowallan; and from all he says of his father's house, we should think that it was not from the influences of his home that he received his religious impressions, for he seemed to have met with little sympathy there. In 1676 he had a severe fever, and at that time he mentions the visit of Mr. William Crichton ('our outed minister'), as having for a time produced some impression on his mind; but still he remained in great ignorance of the way of salvation till the following circumstance occurred.

'Some nights thereafter, Mr. James Donaldson, an outed minister, was at Whytlaw, about half a mile distance, who was to exercise privately; to which place, though mighty low in body and unfit for travel, I went. And their ordinary in reading fell to be 1 Samuel xxiii., where he spoke how David sought several times counsel of the Lord what to do, and it is still said, "The Lord answered him;" and so he held out, that as David then sought counsel, so ought we still in everything we are concerned in. And although the Lord did not answer now by an audible voice, yet to them that could win singly and seriously to seek Him for counsel, He could bear home with clear and convincing efficacy upon their spirits the answer of their requests, and make them as firmly to believe it as if He spoke with an audible voice. Which expressions, being so evidently cleared from the word, I thought belonged to my case, and was made to believe it was so, and that there was ground for me yet to plead with the Lord. So, returning home some more settled in mind, I began again to seek Him by prayer. And some nights after, being in great distress and straitenedness in my mind, and like to sink, it pleased the Lord powerfully to dart in that Scripture (Matt. ix. 2), when the man sick of the palsy was brought to Him, and was borne, and could not go, and Christ said, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee." This was made very suitable to my case. I could do nothing for myself more than the poor man in the palsy. I then got some view of the blessed covenant of redemption, and it came with such efficacy that all my discouragements were gone, and my fears of wrath gone, and intimations of his free love and pardon made known with much light, life, and inexpressible sweetness and joy in my soul; so that I wan to much freedom, admiring the freeness and richness of his grace and mercy, so that I could never express what I found, but was made to praise again and again, and rejoice in Him. I thought there was not any in that case but myself, and that I could not live long; and then being supplied with secret strength and light from himself, I wan step by step still to see more and more of my own vileness, and was made to abhor and detest myself because of sin, but still made to exalt Him for owning such a miserable wretch as I was. And I wan more and more to see my own wants, and to plead for supply from Him, and sweetly to believe that He heard my requests, and sensibly answered the same. He made my heart delight in his laws and in all his ways, and bless Him that I was not cast into hell long since; yea, although He should yet cast me there, I had ground to justify Him, considering my deservings, and love Him for what He had done to my soul. And many a sweet blink of his favour in prayer and meditation was I trysted with, and with strong resolutions coming in my mind to be for Him, and being inexpressibly supported in this way.'

This happy state continued for a time; but at last, he says, 'I began too much to idolize what I had attained, and look too much to my own strength,' the effects of which were soon seen in loss of peace and much inward distress, which was made more bitter by the unkind conduct of his father.

'Now, about the month of June 1677, there was to be a rendezvous of our militia troop, and upon the same day some ministers had appointed a public fast in the fields, whereat I was desirous to be. But being formerly for some time the rider of the militia horse kept by my father (as baillie and factor for Boghall), he was against my going to the said fast. But I accidentally meeting with an old servant of my father's, and telling him I was unwilling to go to the rendezvous, having a resolution to go somewhere else, he offered for some consideration to go for me, which I easily consented to; but my father was displeased, fearing the other man would spoil the horse; but I was intent, and went to the fast. Mr. William Gilchrist, one of the ministers, did preface upon the 4th verse of the xliii. of Genesis, anent Joseph and his brethren; how his brothers were pressing their father Jacob to send Benjamin, their younger brother, to Joseph, because he had said, "Ye shall not see my face, except ye bring your brother with you." And so the minister said, that if we did desire to see the Lord's face that day, we behoved to bring Christ our Brother with us, for the Lord was saying no less to us this day than Joseph did to his brethren, "Ye shall not see my face except your Brother Jesus be with you." The which did stick to me; but word of a party of the enemies coming, the meeting was dissolved, though it was a mistake. So, being dismissed, and I coming home, the next day being in the fields my alone, and my Bible with me, my heart being affected with the preface the former day, I was reading that Scripture again, at which time in the reading thereof the Lord broke into my soul with such light, life, and joy, in the discovery of Christ, the God-man and Mediator, in whom the Father was well pleased (and no acceptance without Him), and Christ intimating, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me," by whom, and through whose merits alone ye can find access and acceptance.

'Now here I must observe that in all my former trouble and outgate, I still wanted that free and full discovery of Christ, in his nature and offices, particularly as our Brother and only Mediator. . . . . So in many things this was as a second law work and conversion, and clearer light and confirmation.'

Events now took place which were to affect the whole course of James Nimmo's future life, and to subject him for many years to banishment and constant danger. He thus describes the rising in arms of the Covenanters in Avondale, and their success at Drumclog, where Claverhouse at the head of his own troop of horses, and two companies of dragoons, attacked a conventicle assembled for worship, and received a signal defeat.

'Now, in the beginning of June this year 1679, Clavers and his troops coming against a field meeting of the oppressed Presbyterians on the Sabbath-day, the people being still in fears, severals went to the meeting in their arms, in case of attacks, rather to defend themselves than be taken, and either hanged or banished as slaves, and did, upon the enemy's approach, go out to defend themselves, where several of the enemy were killed, and so the men were necessitate to keep in arms for their defence; and friends from several places coming to their aid, they increased to some thousands, and resolved, if possible, to free themselves of their heavy bondage.'

He then describes his own share in this war; and heavy indeed must have been the oppression which induced so quiet and peace-loving a man to take up arms, and engage in so hopeless a struggle.

'I having resolved, when the Lord intimated mercy to my soul, that if ever the Lord called for service at my hand, I would venture my all for Him; and seeing that the party now in arms owned to be for the Lord's cause, I judged myself obliged to own and assist them, and accordingly went, without any discouragement from my father, who by this was become much more kindly to me. But when I came, I was not half an hour there until I feared the Lord was not with them, seeing no authority in discipline. And being ten days with them, I observed I could never get liberty in secret, which made me, with other things, fear the issue, perceiving much division among those that should have guided the rest. However, upon June 22d, we were broke by the enemy and wholly dispersed, and many killed and taken; myself, by the merciful hand of God, safely brought off, though for some time I was in the place of greatest danger, and a cannon ball killed a horse under a man hard by me. Oft has that word been sweet to me, that "He was a cover to me in the day of battle." So I stayed hiddenly, sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, in much hazard. About three days after we were broke, an alarm came where I was that a party of the enemy was coming. It being in the night time, I was made to rise, and go to a corn-field and hide myself; when in the morning, getting myself somewhat composed, desired to address myself to the Lord by prayer, and therein He fully did satisfy my mind that we were broke, and that it was not yet time, nor were we meet for deliverance; and considering the divisions amongst them, I was made to bless the Lord we were broke, rather than we should have destroyed one another.'

This fatal defeat, known as the battle of Bothwell Brig, was the end of the insurrection; but to James Nimmo it was the beginning of troubles.

'I was often made to lie in cold barns that winter; yet I enjoyed much pleasant quietness in my mind, though cold, and bad diet, and not timely, did affect my body. And in the spring thereafter, I used to come home early, and direct my father's servants to their work, and retire again to the fields, having still a watchful eye, and under fear of the enemy; and at night I went to some retired place, and lay sometimes in one barn, and sometimes in another.

'One night, lying down in a little barn, belonging to an old, honest servant of my father's, I found myself very weary, and my body distressed, and therefore resolved that, if it pleased the Lord to give me rest, I would lie a while longer than my ordinary next morning, which I did. And it was a merciful providence; for the old servant, having been at the head of his own yard, where he could easily see my father's house, coming in by the end of his barn, met his wife, and says to her (so as I heard), "Alas! for I fear James is taken; for there is a party of horsemen on his father's green!" for he knew not but that I was gone early as I used. The which I hearing, immediately rose, and came out, which made them glad. So I, casting off my coat, put on a cotter man's, and went to a moss hard by, and wrought among peats, I knew not for whom. The enemy came by and by again, after they had missed me and rifled my father's house. They passed and repassed to several houses by the moss in my view, and I busy working in the cotter man's coat, and so they missed me, at which I was glad, and desired to bless the Lord for inclining me to lie so long in bed, and determining me where to go and work for my safety when I rose. And though they got some of my clothes, which they took with them, they missed the substance.'

He now resolved, if possible, to escape to Holland, and took leave of his parents, intending to sail by a ship, the mate of which was one of his relations. But on going to Bo'ness for this purpose, he found that the wind did not serve to sail, and was disappointed for that day, which gave him an opportunity of going to see his 'outed minister,' Mr. William Crighton, at Ballancrieff. Here he met the Lady Park Hay, from Morayshire, who, on hearing of his intention, persuaded him to alter his course, and to go north with her husband, the Laird of Park, to take charge of his affairs as chamberlain in his estates in Moray.

'Upon the 24th August 1680, having caused Park buy me a horse, I came to Edinburgh, and on the morrow crossed the ferry and came to Kirkcaldy, Pathhead, and on the Sabbath, being the 28th, I was unexpectedly trysted with sermon by Mr. John Moncrieff, in a barn there, on Obadiah, wherein I got much satisfaction. After sermon I retired to the fields, where the Lord helped me to pour out my heart before Him with weeping and supplication for many things, both in behalf of myself, the church, my parents, and other friends left behind me, and to plead as to my guiding and assistance where I was going; and I hope He who gave me a heart to plead with Him, at that time, also heard my requests.

. . . . September 4, 1680, we took journey, and the 8th we came to Inshork, Park's house in Moray. . . . And it pleased the Lord to give me favour in the sight of all I had to do with, and made those I was to stay with more tender of me than my father and mother, the which was very encouraging to me, and my mind was much calmed, and made the more to serve the Lord with rejoicing and gladness of heart.'

In Moray James became acquainted with a man greatly esteemed in the church, Mr. Thomas Hogg, formerly minister of Kiltearn, whom he describes as 'that signally holy man of God, who was a true father in our Israel, and to whom all that feared the Lord had a great deference; yea, enemies themselves. He being not only endowed with much of the mind of God, but also with much of a clear judgment, and a solid sound mind, and albeit courteous to all; yet he would not omit with authority to reprove sin in any, but with such gaining wisdom that all feared him. The godly loved him, and enemies could find nothing against him, except in the matters of his God,—therein he would not yield a hoof,—and yet managed with that respect and discretion towards his enemies that often they were made to admire him; for, in his Master's concerns, he spoke as one having authority, yet without the least evidence of rancour or irritation.'

James Nimmo remained with Park till December 1681, when he left him, finding that he had 'no freedom to engage with cesses, and militia, and in paying kirkmen,' which his position as overseer required him to do. The payment of cess was a tax particularly distasteful to the Presbyterians of those days, as it was levied for the express purpose of keeping up troops to coerce their own party. He now entered into an engagement with Brodie of Lethen, to manage his affairs, and thus describes his entrance into his new home: 'The night I went there, being under some weights, my ordinary reading was Ps. xxxvii., and I met with some comfort from it, and the more that the laird that night caused sing a part of that psalm. Yet, partly through weights in my mind, and partly by unacquaintedness in the family, I was somewhat cast down, and attained to little freedom therefrom for some weeks.'

His friends in Moray now strongly recommended James to take to himself a wife. They even took the trouble to select one for him, and pointed out 'one Elizabeth Brodie, a gentlewoman of good friends, and truly pious,' a character well borne out, both by her life and her own writings. She was of the family of Brodie of Brodie, a cousin of Brodie of Lethen; and it speaks well for the estimation in which James Nimmo was held, that he met with nothing but kindness from her relations. He made a journey to the south, at great risk, to consult his father, and finding him 'not refractive,' and the lady herself being 'not refractive,' the matter was at last settled. Her father was dead, but her friends, 'Brodie, Lethen, Windyhills, and Maine, with her eldest brother John, and Milltown,' held a meeting with him to arrange the contract, and it was subscribed. 'But a difficulty arose anent our being proclaimed at the church by the Episcopal precentor, the which to do neither of us had freedom for; and after trying of several outed ministers to marry us without proclamation, they refused out of fear of danger. Yet blessed Mr. Hogg, though under bond to answer the king's council when called, condescended to do it, seeing others had refused, and appointed Monday morning, December 4th, for that end, where I advertised some godly friends to be witnesses, where at Mr. Hogg's own house it was solemnized, and the Lord evidenced his presence to the conviction of severals. . . . Now, having been married privately, both for our own, and blessed Mr. Hogg's own safety, after taking a small refreshment with him, we parted and went home, . . . . and continued living at a distance, upon the former reason, for some months.'

James had foreseen the difficulties attendant on his marriage, and our readers may be glad to be spared the perusal of the many pages of his diary, which are filled with his anxieties and misgivings on this subject. This makes it the more wonderful that his friends, and especially 'blessed Mr. Hogg,' should have so strongly urged him to matrimony, which was certainly not in accordance with the advice of St. Paul in times of persecution. Elizabeth Brodie proved an excellent wife, however, and bore her part nobly in the trials of their lot, both at home and during their subsequent years of exile abroad, as we may perhaps have an opportunity of illustrating by extracts from her diary, which forms the counterpart of that of her husband.

About this time a fresh impulse seemed to be given to the persecution, and as Nimmo's principles were well known, he was no longer safe in Moray. In this, as in all his concerns, he recognised a hand beyond that of man. 'It seemed the Lord did see a need be to force me out of that place, to which my affections were several ways engaged; but both friends' fear of themselves and of me, made them wish me out of it, for Giddy Mackenzie, with his company of foot, was coming north to put the laws, which were iniquitous, to vigorous execution by military force.

'I desired to plead the Lord would clear up my way, and thought I wan to some submission to his will, to go wherever He called me, if He would go with me. But oh! there is often a flaw in our faith, and in our submission. I desired to lay out several plans before Him; but still no clearness where to go, but only to himself to rely, plead, and wait.

'On Wednesday the 11th March 1683, I went east to Pluscardine again' (where his wife lived), 'and in some few days after met with several things, as it were, forcing me from that place. First, two of Giddy Mackenzie's sentinels were coming to my mother-in-law's house, and a boy came running in and told it. I was suddenly advertised thereof, and coming down stairs I put on the boy's bonnet, and slipt out towards ane auld abbacie that was hard by, and when I was there I thought fit to slip into an old vault, and deliberate what to do. I was but a little there till the two soldiers came to the door of that same vault, and righted the works of their muskets; but that place of the vault was dark where I was, that they saw not me, but I them, and I put my hand upon my cravat lest it had appeared white and discovered me. But they went away, and in a little thereafter a servant-maid of my mother-in-law's came to the door where I was, and I called to her, and asked where the soldiers were. She told me they were gone into a change-house. I desired her quickly to be gone, and in a little I resolved to go out, and walked straight forward from the house, and I was hardly well out till the soldiers came after me. But I resolved to keep them at some distance, and walked forward about a mile, they still coming after me. At length I cast a hill betwixt them and me, and returned another way.

'The thing that made me more concerned at this time was, some days before, blessed Mr. Hogg had sent his godly servant, William Balloch, seven or eight miles express to desire me to take care of myself, for my Lord Doune, and Kilravock, with some others, being at a ball in Kilravock House, Doune was heard by the servant that was serving them to swear, that if I was in Moray, he would secure me in prison, which I was not willing of seeing. Then there was nothing for me but death or sinful compliance.'

Soon after this he left Moray. But we reserve the account of his journey south, and other adventures, to a future chapter.

A SUBLIME FAITH.

FAITH rests with confidence on the word of God, assured that his promises cannot fail. When one has right views of the divine character, he feels that he could sooner doubt his own existence than doubt the promises of God. The Bible itself furnishes no finer illustration of a sublime faith, than the following reply of a poor Scotch woman to Rev. John Brown of Haddington.

Mr. Brown had been pressing her with hard questions, to test her knowledge of the Scriptures, and the strength and depth of her piety. At last he asked, 'Janet, what if God, after all He has done, should break his promise, and drop you into hell?' The poor woman promptly replied: 'Let Him do e'en as He likes. If He does, He'll lose mair than I do!'

It would be hard for any one to go beyond this in right conceptions of the faithfulness of God.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

ACTS II. 36–38.

THIS is part of the first sermon preached under the Christian dispensation. It was preached by Peter, who, some seven weeks before, had thrice denied the Lord; not by John, the beloved disciple. It was preached in Jerusalem, not far from the spot where the Lord was crucified. It was preached to those who had slain Him. It was preached immediately after a remarkable outpouring of the Spirit, and by one full of the Spirit. It is strangely calm and unimpassioned; no exaggerated description, no strong language, no sensation. It is a simple narrative about Jesus. He who spoke it manifestly trusted to some power beyond his own to give effect to it; to something in the simple facts themselves to work the end desired. He spoke as a witness and a reprover, not as an orator or a logician. Yet, as for its simplicity, so for its effects, it is one of the most marvellous sermons ever preached. A child could understand it, yet three thousand men were overwhelmed by it. It is a true specimen of preaching or speaking in the Holy Ghost. Such should our preaching be. This would keep us 'abreast of the age;' this would meet the infidel, and confound him; this would be better than eloquence, or science, or the enticing words of man's wisdom. This would do the work of God.

The three verses which we have read bring before us—(1) The crucified One; (2) The crucifiers; (3) The connection between the latter and the former both for evil and good.

I. The crucified One.—Let us note concerning this—

(1.) Who He was.—'That same Jesus.' Yes, Jesus of Nazareth; He who was born at Bethlehem, who went about doing and speaking only good.

(2.) What was done to Him.—He was betrayed, tried, condemned, crucified, slain. All hatred was displayed to Him, all shame poured upon Him; the vilest and most terrible of deaths was inflicted on Him.

(3.) By whom was this done?—By 'his own;' by 'Israel,' the house of Israel—the Jews of Jerusalem. Not merely by Romans or Gentiles, but Jews—by them who ought to have been foremost to welcome Him.

(4.) What God has made Him.—'Both Lord and Christ.' 'The stone which the builders rejected, has been made the head of the corner.' 'Both Lord and Christ!' All that the prophets predicted concerning the Seed of the woman; all that Israel was expecting; all that could be comprehended of power, and dignity, and authority, and glory, and excellency, in these two names, are given by God to this same Jesus. Whatever man may think of Him, God's thoughts of Him are of the highest kind. Whatever Israel may do to Him, to show hatred and contempt, God treats Him as infinitely worthy of all honour in earth and heaven.

II. The crucifiers.—They were, as we have seen, 'the house of Israel;' but this is not the point to which I ask your attention here. They are accused of an awful crime. They had deliberately united to crucify—

(1.) An innocent man.—One who had done nothing amiss; one against whom no charge was substantiated; one whom their own law would have acquitted of having done anything worthy of death.

(2.) A good man.—A bad man may be, in respect of certain charges, quite innocent; but this man was more. He was righteous, and He was good; He had said and done nothing but what was good all his life. His had been a life of pure and holy love.

(3.) A prophet.—One of their own rulers had confessed Him as 'a teacher sent from God;' and his whole life proclaimed Him a prophet, greater in word and deed than any of their ancient ones.

(4.) The Lord of glory.—The Son of God, in the truest sense of the expression; Son of the Highest; equal with God; truly divine.

(5.) Their own Messiah.—The very Christ whom their prophets predicted; whom they and their fathers had been expecting; their King and Lord.

They were thus not merely murderers, but no ordinary ones; criminals in the highest and darkest sense; their hands red with innocent blood—the blood of their own Messiah, the blood of God!

III. The connection between the Crucified and the crucifiers for evil and for good.

(1.) For evil.—For condemnation. It was this that they felt so awfully when the apostle had stated the simple facts. (1) 'They were pricked in their heart;' (2) They cried out, 'What shall we do?' A full sense of their awful criminality flashed through them. They were murderers; the worst murderers the world ever saw; the murderers of their Lord and Christ. Then, indeed, condemnation, infinite condemnation, was theirs. They had, perhaps, not actually nailed Him to the tree, but they had concurred in the deed. They were guilty of his blood, and they did not seek to deny it. So is every sinner a concurrent in this infinite murder. This is God's charge against us: 'Ye slew my Son.'

(2.) For good.—This connection for evil might be disannulled, and a new one formed. An opportunity was to be given for disavowing their deed; and that disavowal was not only to disconnect them with all the evil they had incurred, but was to connect them with all the good which Messiah came to bring. They would then be treated by God as if they had welcomed Him from the first. Not only would they receive remission of sins, but also the gift of the Holy Ghost. 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' Believe in Him, and thou shalt receive the Spirit, and with Him all present and eternal blessing.

SAUL'S MELANCHOLY AND DAVID'S MUSIC.*

THE melancholy of the king naturally lay like a dark pall over the souls of all the courtiers, yea, spread its sorrowful, gloomy shadow even over the surrounding neighbourhood. 'In the light of a king's countenance,' says Solomon, 'is life; but the wrath of the king is a messenger of death.' The truth of this latter saying was now felt throughout almost the whole land. The royal servants advised this and that for the purpose of trying to set free from his dismal state of mind their high lord, whose palace was now more like a dull chamber of sorrow than the proud residence of a monarch. The accustomed scenes of revelry, shows, banquets, spectacles, dancing, and such like, are denied to the servants. Then at last there occurred to them, as one would say, a 'happy thought.' They appeared before their master, and said to him, 'Behold now, an evil spirit from God troubleth thee. Let our lord now command thy servants, which are before thee, to seek out a man who is a cunning player on an harp: and it shall come to pass, when the evil spirit from God is upon thee, that he shall play with his hand, and thou shalt be well.'

What a saying was this! Does not the penetration of these people who, in forming a judgment regarding the melancholy of their master, did not look at the surface, but descended into the depths of the matter, excite our surprise? Are we not astonished at the far-reaching enlightenment which they here manifest in their knowledge of the existence of a world of fallen spirits, whom Jehovah is wont to make use of, not seldom, for putting to trial his own people, as well as for visiting with punishment the wicked? Must we not conclude that they were indeed already acquainted with the book of Job, and that it was a constituent part of their holy canonical books? An Israelite adhered to his Bible under all circumstances, even when he was destitute of spiritual life, and his conduct was condemned by it. The testimonies of Moses and the prophets were to him in the last resort decisive oracular sayings; and he would have been filled with amazement if any one had ventured to call in question or to deny anything testified in his sacred book; so deeply rooted in the seed of Abraham was faith in the divine origin and infallible authority of the Scriptures,—a faith which it was all the easier for the Israelites to entertain, inasmuch as they were constant ear and eye-witnesses of the power and the signs by which God, at one time here, and at another time there, gave testimony to the seers and prophets, who were the instruments of his revelations. What we further wonder at, in the courtiers of King Saul, is, first, the clearness with which they recognised demoniacal agency in the disconsolate condition of their master; then the frankness, combined, indeed, with the deepest respectfulness, with which they, regardless of the consequences which might arise to them from such a step, announced their opinion of his case, which was by no means flattering to him; and, finally, the suitableness of the counsel which they felt themselves constrained to give to him. They recommend to him the power of music as a means for relieving his mind, but with a wise discriminating judgment regarding its character. There was, indeed, no lack of musicians at the court at Gibeah; but they appear to have been devoid of the qualifications which were at this time needed. The servants knew well the power of music to produce, according to its kind and quality, not less the most depraved than the holiest impressions. Music can unfetter the most destructive passions; but it can also, at least for a time, tame and mitigate the wildest storms of the human heart. Whatever noble impulses, unobserved and slumbering, may lie concealed within the breast of man, may be aroused by music, and brought forth into the light of day; but, at the same time, it may also stir the vilest passions in the lower regions of human nature, and accelerate their maturity in action. The music which the servants of the king thought of was not that which pleases the world, and which only opens the door to unclean spirits, but such as, animated by a nobler inspiration, might insensibly elevate the soul by its harmonious melody, as on angel's wings, towards heaven. They thought of the harp, then the most solemn instrument of music, and on the melodies which were wont to sound forth in the sanctuary at the time of the sacred festivals of Israel. And when the king, as if in a waking dream, entered into the proposal of his well-meaning servants, and said to them,

* From David the King of Israel. By F. W. KRUMMACHER, D.D. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. Interesting, fresh, and graphic, like the other works of the author of Elijah the Tishbite.

'Provide me a man that can play well on the harp, and bring him to me,' one of them remarked, 'Behold, I have seen a son of Jesse the Bethlehemite, that is cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person, and the Lord is with him.' Welcome information this! He who communicated it proved himself hereby to be a man of understanding, in that he placed in the foreground those qualities of the musician he recommended, which he believed would at once secure the favour of the king; but, on the contrary, that which was to him the chief matter, and by which he principally expected the deliverance of the king from the demon of dejection, viz. the piety of the harper, and the fact that God was with him, he mentioned last, as if it had been a trivial circumstance. It is, indeed, greatly to be desired that they who are called to the office of seeking to heal diseased souls, and to help into the right path those who have erred from the ways of morality, should not only possess piety, but also other mental endowments, such as are held in estimation by the world; and that it could be said of them, they are people of understanding and intelligence, men of mind and heart, thoroughly educated, and of great experience. This would facilitate their intercourse with those whom, however much they need counsel and consolation, an ignorant recoil from all serious religion has hitherto estranged from the gospel. Yet it happens, not seldom, that even to such persons, after all the world's expedients for obtaining deliverance from deeply-rooted sorrow that has fallen upon them have been found to be only mockery, religion will be recommended as the last remedy, though it may be reluctantly, by their own like-minded associates; and that they will then, as if in despair, and not without painful self-restraint, acting on their advice, give directions to have a preacher, or some God-fearing man, who is at the same time respected by them because of his pure human virtues, brought to them. And how frequently has the gospel, in such circumstances, proved itself to be a 'power of God,' which is perfectly able to destroy every influence which holds the soul in thraldom; and there has substantially, though with more lasting results, been frequently repeated what we here to-day see happen at the court at Gibeah!

How it was that the royal servant became acquainted with the young harper at Bethlehem, then only nineteen years of age, we are not informed. But it is clear, from what he said to the king, that he was himself a God-fearing man; and such men are wont, especially in those times in which, as was then the case, the word of God is precious in the land, to meet with those who are of like mind with them. On the report of this servant, messengers were sent immediately to Jesse, to convey to him, in the name of the king, the command, 'Send me thy son David, who is with the sheep.' We may conceive how this would surprise Jesse. David was then in the fields with his father's flocks. The remembrance of his former anointing by Samuel still lingered in his soul as a silent, and to him yet unexplained, secret. In childlike freedom from care he there played on his harp, and sang songs of praise and of homage to the Lord, and left it wholly in his hands to guide and order his future steps. But now, without any intimation of its purpose, he is suddenly summoned home. Obedient to his father's will, he led his sheep away, and when he came to him, learned, not perhaps without surprise, yet at the same time with the equanimity of one who in simplicity confides in a divine providence guiding all things, for what purpose he had been sent for. Prepared for any service to his king, he declared himself ready to follow the messenger to Gibeah. Jesse also ventured not to interpose any hindrance. Preparations for his journey are immediately made. According to oriental custom, which permits not any one to approach a throne without a gift in his hands, Jesse made ready a mule, loaded it with bread and a bottle of wine, and added a young kid of the goats; and with these homage-gifts for his prince, corresponding to the simple habits of the times, he dismissed his beloved Benjamin, amid heartfelt and pious benedictions.

David at length reaches Gibeah, carrying his harp hanging on his shoulder band, and is immediately introduced to the king. Here now they stand opposite each other—the one like the clear shining of the sun in spring, the other like a black thunder cloud, ominous of evil; the one full of blooming, hopeful life, the other enveloped in dark gloom arising from the realm of death. The king said to him, 'Play to me.' David bowed his head, and obeyed; and so sweet and grandly solemn was the music which flowed from the strings of his harp, that the clouded brow of the king began visibly to brighten, and the stern features of his countenance strangely to become relaxed and mild. It was a song without words, whose soothing melody then fell upon the ear of the king. Words corresponding to the music would have effected the contrary result to that which was aimed at, and might even have increased the ill temper of the king. There are even yet men enough of his sort,—persons without faith, yea, at variance both with God and the world, whom solemn music is able most powerfully to delight, and in whom it awakens, at least for the time, dispositions which border on devotion and piety, while yet the words which correspond to the sacred melody would produce in them the very opposite effect. What is manifest from this, but that in the soul of such persons the last point at which they may be touched by that which is sacred, has not yet wholly decayed away? Let them be on their guard, however, lest by constant striving against the thoughts which, unspoken, echo forth from the harmonies with which they are delighted and refreshed, the last string in their soul on which the heavenly breath gently sounds may at length break asunder, and their aversion to the heavenly message finally terminate in a decided and incurable opposition to all that comes down from above.

The sounds from David's harp had, for the moment at least, wrought a true miracle. To the no little joy of those about him, the king breathed more calmly, and appeared milder and more serene than they had for a long time beheld him. And often again, when the old melancholy began to gather like a cloud around his soul, the harp-music of the shepherd youth obtained the same happy result. Is it a wonder that Saul loved the young harper? He sent to Jesse, saying, 'Let David, I pray thee, stand before me, for he hath found favour in my sight;' yea, so far did the favour of Saul extend, that he received the Bethlehemite into the number of his pages and armour-bearers. The history further informs us, that 'when the evil spirit from God' (i.e. the spirit that, by the mysterious judicial permission of God, laid hold on him) 'was upon Saul, that David took an harp, and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him.' These last words surprise us. 'Did the music,' we ask, 'banish the demon?' Not so; but the higher frame of mind into which the king was brought by it sufficed to limit at least the sphere of the operation of the evil spirit within him; while a full, clear, conscious life of faith on the part of Saul, would have altogether destroyed the power of the wicked one. Besides, the silent intercessions which David sent up to heaven on the wings of the music of his harp must have contributed not a little to the results with which his melodies were crowned. It appeared to be God's purpose in sending David to the king to afford to him a new and a last means of grace. He must become conscious of what a man of childlike piety, such as David, is able, by the help of God, to do against all the powers of darkness; and, in the way of such an experience, he ought himself to have been won to a life of piety. But, alas! all the efforts to deliver the unhappy man were fruitless. His heart hardened itself more and more.

One of our great secular poets has imagined what an elevating, yea, sanctifying power, may dwell in a God-consecrated music. He represents the hero of his poem as saved from an assault of darkest thoughts by harmonies of a sacred choir sounding out from a neighbouring cathedral into his chamber. But the poet did not understand the rich harmonious music before which the power of all evil spirits must yield, not for a passing moment only, but for ever. This is the music of the holy gospel, for which, however, there must first be created in the heart of him who would listen to it the faculty of hearing, which can only be done by means of repentance and an awakened consciousness of the need of salvation. There cannot be heard in heaven or on earth any music more powerful to pacify and elevate, than that which sounds forth from the spiritual harps of the evangelists and apostles. Here we may listen to melodious notes, which will overpower and make silent every discord within us.

Let us, in conclusion, not overlook the adorable wisdom of God in the circumstance that he brought David so early near to the throne which he was at an after period to ascend. Then he had an opportunity of obtaining an unprejudiced view of court life in its most diverse aspects, and of learning the numberless dangers to which all are exposed who breathe its atmosphere. The system of lies and deceit, of pretence and hypocrisy, which is wont to surround the 'gods of the earth,' unveiled itself to his view, and instilled into him, for his whole future life, a deep-rooted dislike to courtier-life, with its abounding flattery and eye-service, and a decided love for honourable and faithful counsel and service, even though it might be the less polished. At the same time, the case of Saul strengthened him, in a most wonderful manner, in the conviction, that the popular opinion that a royal crown raises its possessor to the summit of all earthly happiness is only a delusion, and that, on the contrary, the fear of God, as 'the beginning of wisdom,' is the only secure foundation of all true happiness, whether in the palace or in the peasant's cottage.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XIX.—ALLEN LINDSAY.

THE subject of the following sketch was a respectable tradesman; a plain, matter-of-fact man, with a character for skill and integrity, which gained him a ready preference among employers.

A great lover of home he also was, and no wonder, for in addition to the industrial habits and admirable system of economy to be found in his, there were also, in no very stinted proportion, those qualities of mind and heart which add so immensely to the enjoyment of life. Preserved from that taciturnity into which habitual association so often lazily retreats, something like exuberance of spirit on the one side, and acidity of temper on the other, was softened down by the sobering cares and soothing duties of domestic life. Home was indeed to Allen Lindsay

'The sweetest, dearest place in all the earth,' and one to which, after the toils of the day were over, he gladly hurried; for, amidst its moral charms, its cheerful, tender lovingness, with, to him at least, the pleasing concomitant-noise of infantive merriment, he realized a little Goshen of his own, quite impervious to the gloom of the cold, dark world without.

But how true the saying, 'That from the very heart of gladness sadness suddenly springs!' So, in the lapse of a very few years, a dark shadow crossed this picture of domestic bliss, which, as it lengthened and deepened, only added to its pathos and beauty. Instead now of a healthy and happy husband, going out in the early morning to his welcome toil, there is a delicate woman rising up a long time before day, to secure a few quiet hours for the closest application to some remunerating labour.

This was necessary, for their carefully hoarded savings are now expended, and she must do something to eke out the small allowance which they received weekly from a 'friendly society,' and her time throughout the day, except occasional snatches, is wholly taken up in attending to her sick husband and children.

But how willingly are these attentions rendered! Ah, could she only hope that he would be spared to live on with her, even as he is, what a happy woman would she be, despite all the labour which that would entail upon her! It seemed also as if the very thought of this premature breaking-up of youthful health and vigour touched some strange heart-chord, when they allowed themselves to realize it, for, as by mutual consent, all allusions to it were laid aside. The arrangement was a happy one. The determination to hope actually produced a measure of it, which sweetened to a great extent the present of their existence.

Every careful observer of human nature must mark its tendency to put off the concerns of the soul and its interests for eternity to a more convenient season; and perhaps, as it appears in dim perspective through a long vista of happy, thoughtless years, there is no season considered better suited for such a purpose than a sick or death-bed; and how tenaciously people do hold this delusive idea, despite the better experience of the many who have proved its fallacy!

With much that was admirable in his character, Allen Lindsay was one of these postponers. Life had not been dull and tasteless to him; on the contrary, it had afforded much real enjoyment. But these earthly joys were now passing from his trembling hand, and his heart felt dreary and desolate as the rocky channel of a dried-up mountain stream. Little wonder, for all that pertained to a future state were only cold, dull abstractions to him.

When I first saw Allen Lindsay, although a deep under-current of fear existed in his mind as to his state of health, he still clung to hope. To a merely cursory observer, his appearance would indicate nothing but the most manly triumph over suffering and calamity; but one more observant could not fail to mark his convulsive clinging to life.

That he might longer enjoy the society of those he loved, was not the only reason for this. But affliction, through the blessing of God, had already begun a curative process. He was deeply convinced that he had squandered on created objects the affections which should have been supremely centred on God. With light enough to perceive that a great change was needed, he also deeply felt that the restless days and sleepless nights now appointed him were not the best time for its accomplishment.

Memory does not willingly let slip the facts of such a case as Allen Lindsay's, or let die the thoughts and feelings engendered by it; yet for accuracy's sake, I would now refer to the notes taken in passing, during the many months I continued to visit him.

28th March 186—.—Called to-day on a young man who has been ill for some time. Had no previous knowledge of his character or circumstances. Tried to elicit data for a profitable conversation, but found him far from communicative; a shrewd expression, also, on his thoughtful countenance made me aware that he was not one to be put off with the mere commonplaces of religious talk; so felt somewhat at a loss, until the following suggestion came to the rescue: 'There sits a young man on whom death has unmistakeably set his seal. Beside him sit his wife and several young children. He is not now, and has not for a considerable time, been able to work for them; may not his mind be burdened with the thought of how they are to be provided for?'

Turning this suggestion to use, I spoke in a general way on the providence of God, how wonderfully He often provided for his creatures in times of trial. Then mentioned several instances of this which had come under my own observation. I could perceive that my remarks were relished, and that I had succeeded to some extent in gaining his confidence. On leaving, I was cordially invited back when he returned from ———, where he was going for a little change.

During subsequent visits, he continued to be very cautious and reserved in speaking of his feelings, or rather of anything that led to remarks on his own spiritual state as an individual. Still he talked pretty freely of his ideas and opinions of religious subjects in general; on which occasions I always made a point of agreeing with him when I possibly could, yet I did not scruple, when his opinions were either defective or erroneous, to criticise pretty freely. This led to many lengthy conversations, which in a certain way were useful, as, by drawing him out more and more, they gave me a tolerably clear insight as to his real character.

From his peculiar turn of mind, I had no alternative but take this roundabout mode of getting at his heart; it would have been worse than useless to have hurried the matter. But, happily, a little incident occurred, which completely broke up all reserves, and laid open his whole heart to me.

At a little prayer-meeting which, at my suggestion, he had attended for some time, the gentleman who addressed it one evening took as the basis of his remarks the words, 'Our Father' (Matt. vi. 9). As Allen went out that evening I noticed a look of intense anguish on his countenance. In a few minutes I followed him home, and found him completely broken down. The long pent-up feelings of his soul were freely venting themselves in such expressions as, 'Oh, if I could just say that—if I only could know God to be my Father!' But then, as his heart was so hard, and as he had no faith, he could not see that there was much hope for him.

How easy it is, when one's eyes are glazed over with a film of earthliness, for the mind to sport itself with mere opinions on religious matters! But when God deals with the sinner, when the terrors of his broken law and despised authority take hold of him, it requires realities to satisfy it. So it was now with Allen; often did he cry out in the bitterness of his spirit, 'Nothing will do with me now but to feel and know the reality of these things.'

So deeply aroused was he, that it was no longer in the power of any earthly friend to convey false hope to his wounded spirit. Conscience was scrutinizing his past life too closely, and thundering in his ears the threatenings of the broken law too incessantly, to admit of any consolation but such as flows from the believing reception of salvation by grace. A relation one day being very much pleased with something he was saying, would have him to believe that he was all right.

'Ah, no!' replied Allen, 'that is only theory, I do not feel what I was saying. Devils can do as much as that.'

He continued for a long time in this slough of despond: worse and worse he constantly became in his own estimation, notwithstanding all his efforts to the contrary. That he had been kept from external sin, made, as he thought, his case all the more desperate. His hardness he believed so great that no power could melt him down. How he groaned under one part of the curse which is but too little realized—the want of love!

While in this state of mind one of his children died; and very bitterly indeed did the poor fellow feel this blow, though he received it in meek submission. Only a few days had elapsed ere he seemed to take positive pleasure in the thought that, as he phrased it, 'his Tommy was now an angel in heaven, singing the praises of God.'

From the time of this death his earnestness much increased.

'Wouldn't I like,' he used to say, 'to get beside my two boys! It would be sad for them to be in heaven and their father in hell.'

His mental anguish at length became extreme. I had been with him a considerable time one day, and was on my road away when he called me back. When I asked him what he wanted, he took my hand, and drawing me close to him, said:

'I must tell you again that I'm in darkness, I have no light,—will you mind that? I'm in anguish, terrible anguish. What a dreadful thing it is to be lost!' Then he completely broke down and wept convulsively.

After becoming somewhat composed, he told me that he thought God had given him up to hardness of heart; that there was no hope for him; that he did not think these desires for salvation came from God.

'Have you ever had such feelings before?' I inquired.

'Never.'

'Do you think you've had any hand in the raising of them yourself?'

'No! I used to try and feel in earnest, and make myself distressed about my soul, but I could not.'

'Well, then, if you are given up of God, and have no hand in raising these feelings yourself, is it likely Satan would?'

He sat staring at me as if his eyes would start from their deep pores, while shade after shade of strong emotion passed over his emaciated countenance.

'——,' he said, grasping both my hands firmly 'in the presence of the living God do not deceive me, a dying man. Do you believe that the Spirit of God is working with me?'

'I do.'

Relaxing his grasp, he threw himself back on his pillow, saying as he did so, 'Lord Jesus, reveal thyself to me quickly.'

His state of mind continued much the same, except that his despair (never of that nature which proudly determines, but the agony of a soul which could see no legitimate ground for hope) was changed into an agony of desire and fear also, lest, to use his own words, 'the door should be shut before he got in.'

Early one morning he sent for me; he was in great distress. When I entered the room, as if fearing that I would suppose he was putting undue confidence in me, he said:

'Don't think, ——, that I am putting my trust in you. I know that it is God alone that can save my soul; but you help me, and that is why I sent for you.'

Some time after, he said, 'Up till this time I have always had some thought about my wife and children—thinking how they were to do—sorry to leave them; but now I care for nothing but just how to find the living God.'

'Then, Allen,' I replied, 'the crisis has come. God has promised to be found in the day that He is searched for with all the heart. I am sure He will be faithful to that promise; so I will leave you to-night in the confident expectation of soon seeing you rejoicing in God your Saviour.'

Through the night his distress continued equally great.

'Oh, my Sabbaths! my Sabbaths! how I have broken my Sabbaths!' he cried in anguish.

At another time he said, 'Oh, auntie, if I had my time to begin again, I would be like the man in the Bible who said, "As for me and my house, I will serve the Lord." I would not put off my time as I have done. Oh, to have pardon and God's favour! There is nothing else worth living for.'

'I must have a kirk now,' he said. 'And you, Liz,' addressing his wife, 'will read a chapter.'

When that was done, he gave out the hymn, 'The hour of my departure's come.'

Those about him were so overcome that they could not sing. But he insisted that they should 'sing and not cry, for there was no use crying.' He then engaged in prayer for a long time. His wife, poor creature, said to me afterwards, that she never thought Allen could pray like that.

Very early in the morning his distress was so great that he asked his wife to run for me, and gave the most peremptory orders not to come without me.

Fearful of alarming us, she did not knock loud enough to make herself heard, so, of course, did return without me, and he was very much disappointed. But it was all well arranged; for the time had now come that the Lord saw fittest for speaking peace to his troubled heart.

He turned away his face from them, and lay a long time without speaking. His wife getting anxious, said:

'You are very quiet, Allen. Will ye no speak to me?'

'Never mind me just now,' he replied. 'I am going through a dark valley.'

'Is it hard to go through?'

'No! The Lord is with me.'

'Will ye no try and sleep a little?'

'Oh no!' was the rejoinder. 'My time is too precious. I've been a great sinner, and I may pass the door yet.'

'Are you getting through, Allen?' she again inquired, after some little interval.

'Yes,' he replied, 'a good bit. I do not understand it, but there were two bridges. I have got over one; but as yet I do not see how I am to get over the other. But I see Jesus on it, and two little boys.'

'Do you think you will get to Jesus, Allen?'

'Yes, I am going to Jesus; and oh, how I will sing hallelujah with my two boys! Willn't that that be lovely? I'll be looking down upon you with your two. Do you not think it was kind of the Lord to take Tommy? He saw it would be too much for you to struggle for three.'

He then began to describe to her the horror of mind he was in when lying so quiet. 'But,' said he, 'I got to Jesus, and I got light, and I've got a new heart. I am not in the least afraid to die now.'

Shortly after, he said, 'I am wearying for ——. Will you send for her?' When I entered the room, he addressed me thus: 'Now, ——, you are come, and you must not leave me again till my dissolution. I know it will put you about to stay with me; but it will be the last time.'

After assuring him of my willingness to remain, and seeing how happy he looked, I asked how it was with him now.

'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' was his joyful response. 'It is all peace, peace, peace. This,' he added, with increasing energy, 'is just what I've been seeking all the time, and tried to make myself to feel, but could not. God alone has done this.'

Passing over much that is interesting, I notice briefly what occurred a few hours before his death. Several of his old shopmates came to say farewell. And how earnestly he entreated them to turn to God! With one in particular he pleaded not to put off till a death-bed.

'Mind,' said he, 'church-going won't do here; respectability won't do here; nothing but the reality.'

To one of them, who was very young, he bade a very kindly farewell, then urged him most earnestly to seek the Lord in the days of his youth, and not put off as he had done.

Then he called for his little boys, kissed them fondly, and bade them be good boys, fear God, and obey their mother, and begin at once to prepare for meeting him in heaven.

'Lizzie,' he then said, holding out his arms to his wife. And while she wept on his breast, in that last embrace, as if her heart would burst, not a muscle of his face moved—he had done with earth.

After she became somewhat composed, he besought her to begin at once to seek the Lord, and not put off—no, not for an hour.

'But what is to come of me, Allen? What will we do?'

'As for the boys,' he replied, 'they will soon forget me, so I leave them to the Lord. He will take care of them. I'm vexed to leave you; but the Lord will look after and provide for you if you do your duty. And, Liz, you must begin at once to prepare. It would be a terrible thing if you were on the left hand. See that you do not put off as I have done. Mind it's a terrible thing when it comes to a death-bed, and it would be still more terrible for you to be lost. Just begin directly.'

'Have you nothing to say to me?' I asked, some time after.

'No,' he said, smiling, 'nothing but just to thank you for all the good you have done me. And you will carry my dying love to Mr. ——, and Mr. ——, and thank them for their kindness.'

After so much speaking he became very much exhausted, and was to all appearance dying; but he rallied again, and became so happy, that for a considerable time we all seemed to breathe the atmosphere of heaven.

During that time I remember saying that I thought that description which we have of heaven in the twenty-second of Revelations very beautiful, and quoted part of it.

When I came to the words, 'And there shall be no more care,' he made some beautiful remarks, which I cannot remember, and then he laughed an indescribable sort of laugh. His heart seemed so full of joy that he could not help it.

'You may well laugh, Allen,' I said, 'with such a glorious prospect before you.'

'Ay,' he replied, with another laugh, 'and a whole eternity of it.'

'Auntie,' he said, a few minutes before his death, 'I am dying in peace—peace with everybody, and peace with God.'

During his last, long struggle, he kept my hands clasped in his. But at length the firm grasp relaxed, and doubtless his disembodied spirit found itself for ever at rest in the everlasting arms of love and mercy.

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER X.

IN the spring Tom was sent to Lotsirl College, which was situated but a short distance from Chelsea Place, and, much to his parents' gratification, he took a good place in the middle school. Mr. Harley's spirits continued to improve, and he entered more fully into his children's studies and pursuits than he had hitherto done. Johnny was still the frequent subject of thought and conversation; but the Harleys had learned to look upon him as one removed to a higher and happier sphere of existence, and could therefore talk of him without useless regrets, and anticipate the time when, through a Saviour's love, they might be re-united. Johnny lived in heaven, and they lived upon earth; and earth, they knew, was God's appointed road to heaven, if they walked in the steps of his Son Jesus, who had trodden the path before them, and had promised to be with them and guide them if they asked Him.

The Donovans began to lift up their heads, and triumph over poverty and dirt. Old nurse no longer complained, on returning from going to see them, 'that they'd scarcely a rag to cover them, and that she could not find a seat fit to sit down upon,' for they had three rooms all to themselves, instead of one, and, consequently, could keep their sitting-room clean and tidy; whilst the children, being decently clothed, no longer made mud pies in the gutter before the door, but went to schools—the elder ones to the national school, and the young ones to the infant. They were the funniest, merriest little grigs that could be possibly met with. Excepting Kathleen, they had all curly sandy-coloured hair, light, round blue eyes, fair but freckled skins, with cheeks like roses, and mouths that seemed to be always laughing. Kathleen had dark blue eyes like her mother's, and dark brown wavy hair, with a timid gentle expression, unlike her rattling brothers and sisters, and loved her book more than fun and play. Pat's master gave him a capital character for a steady hard-working lad, and one who would be sure to make his way in the world; and Mike Donovan kept his situation and thus drove the wolf (hunger) from his household. Kathleen was sometimes sent for to come to Chelsea Place, Mrs. Harley having taken a marked liking to her for Johnny's sake; and the little girl would gaze with wonder and delight upon the young Harleys, as they clustered around her, and questioned her about her brothers and sisters at home.

Madge continued to improve: she was rather imperious and dictatorial, but very affectionate and generous, and her governess thought that in due time she would get over her managing propensities, for she really strove to do so. Glowing were the monthly letters, despatched by her to her father, of the kindness she met with at school and in Chelsea Place; and such Miss Hughes (her governess) and Mr. and Mrs. Harley discovered them to be, from the letters of thanks sent to them from Colonel Allen—letters from and to parents being the only ones Miss Hughes permitted her young ladies to receive or write without first seeing them. Easter arrived, and Madge was duly invited to spend the Easter holidays with the Harleys; Mrs. Gay having again most willingly given her consent to the plan. Indeed, she appeared relieved at having the child taken off her hands, not that she really disliked children, but that she could not bear the trouble they involved upon herself or family. She was very well off, and, with her daughters, led an indolent luxurious life, which a high-spirited petted child somewhat disturbed; therefore Madge was voted to be a 'little nuisance,' and the getting so well rid of her became the source of much comfort to them.

Madge was overjoyed at the prospect of spending another whole week with her kind friends; and Dora, sorry for her past misgivings and conduct, determined to make it all up by unremitting attentions to their little visitor. But when a case from India arrived for Madge at Chelsea Place, containing presents for herself and friends, and amongst them a beautiful little box for Dora, Dora was so overcome by the thought of Madge's kindness, when she had felt so unkindly to her, that she begged Madge not to give it her just then, for she did not deserve it, and she ran away crying.

Madge ran after her and overtook her just by her bedroom, and catching hold of her, tried to make her take the box, saying:

'It was papa sent it you, Dora—my own dear papa in India; and you must have it, indeed you must.'

'But I had not ought to have it, Madge, because—because,' sobbed Dora, 'I did not love you then.'

'When?' asked Madge, with some surprise.

'Why, when you were here last. I thought naughty thoughts of you, Madge,' replied penitent Dora.

'But I did not know them, Dora; and I was afraid of you, because you were so quiet and good.'

'Not good—no, not good,' said Dora, with the tears in her eyes; 'for I thought Tom loved you better than me, and I could not bear it then.'

'Well, I did not know it, Dora. Please take the box, and let us kiss and be friends. Tom always will love you, he says he does ever so much.'

'Oh yes, Madge, he told me I was to be his sister, and you are to be his friend. Won't it be nice?' and Dora held up her lips to kiss Madge.

The two children then returned to the room in which the case of pretty things was being unpacked, Dora carrying her own beautiful little box. Wonderful things were taken out of that case from India—so lovely, that as Madge unfastened the wraps around them, and displayed them to the eager lookers-on, 'Splendid!' 'Beautiful!' and 'Real elegant!' resounded on every side. There were two exquisite workboxes of sandal-wood, inlaid with ivory, mother-of-pearl, and other beautiful woods, one for Mrs. Harley, the other for Miss Hughes, and a large, handsomely carved set of chessmen for Mr. Harley. Then there were puzzles and queer, funny-looking toys for Agnes and Guy, with a box just like Dora's, for Constance, and a tiny set of ivory chessmen for Tom, besides numerous odds and ends pushed into the corners of the case; and there was a square paper box with pictures on it, labelled for Mrs. Gay, which contained a splendid shawl, and which Madge said was the only thing she wished had not come, for she did not want to give it Aunt Gay. But Mrs. Harley told her, she must try and remember that little people were often very troublesome, especially to elderly persons unaccustomed to them; so Madge grew silent, and gave Mrs. Harley the square box to take care of until it could be sent to Seamouth. Guy was so delighted with a large elephant, with its black Mahout (driver), that he toddled about from one to the other, crying, 'Pety ittle back man, all de way from Inda, for Duy.' And Agnes, seated on the ground, in vain endeavoured to count the number of round boxes enclosed in a good-sized globe, nearly as large as a cocoa-nut. 'Another! and another! and another!' she kept on calling; for, as fast as one was opened, she found another within it. All were pleased with Colonel Allen's remembrances; and Madge, with glowing cheeks and glistening eyes, told nurse and the young Harleys that she thought her papa was 'a king of a man,' and upon being questioned for why, replied, 'Because he gave, like a king, beautiful things to good kind people, just like King Solomon gave presents to the Queen of Sheba.'

'But the Queen of Sheba gave gifts to Solomon,' interposed Tom.

'Yes,' interrupted Madge; 'and your mamma has given gifts to my papa, for she has taken care of his naughty little girl, and tries to make her good and wise; so your mamma shall be a queen, and my papa shall be King Solomon.'

'And what is my papa to be?' inquired Tom.

'Oh! let me see; I'd quite forgotten about him,' said Madge. 'Why, if Mrs. Harley is a queen, of course Mr. Harley is a king.'

'Oh! oh! oh!' laughed Tom; 'then papa is King Harley the First, and we are the princes and princesses. I do you honour, your highness,' said Tom, making a mock bow to Constance, who just then came into the room. 'I beg to congratulate you on your newly-discovered dignity.'

'Don't be stupid, Tom,' replied Constance, thinking he was ridiculing her. 'I wonder a big boy like you are not ashamed to be always playing the mountebank; I am sure I should, if I were you.'

'Oh yes, of course, you would; princesses never could turn somersaults like this; if they would, 'twould put their curls out of place,' and Tom turned heels over head, bringing himself up bang against Mary, who was carrying a tray full of tea-things across the room.

'Why, Master Tom!' cried Mary, clutching the tray, whilst half the cups and saucers startled off it on to the floor. 'Just see what you have been and gone and done. Oh my! if there isn't three cups and two saucers gone to smash, and the milk all upset, just where a body didn't want it, and that's over my new gown. I wonder you ain't ashamed on yourself.'

Tom, astonished at the unexpected and unfortunate result of his somersault, and sobered into reason, looked very sorry for his misadventure, and tried to console Mary, by representing that a drop of milk could not much hurt; but Mary indignantly refuted his arguments by maintaining that milk always did grease, and always would grease, if there was any goodness in it, and she liked things in their proper places, and the place of milk was in a jug basin, or a body's cup of tea, and not about their clothes. Old nurse also chimed in, and lectured Tom roundly, until he promised that he would look before he took another leap; and then the milk-jug having been replenished, and the cups and saucers replaced, the nursery party sat down to tea.

(To be continued.)

Readings for the Young.

NELLY'S PRAYER.

DEAR children, have you learned how graciously Jesus answers the prayers of even the little ones? If He has taught you this himself, there is no need that I should give you proofs of it; but some of us larger children go on and on, making endless mistakes, and suffering bitter losses, from not having learned the easy remedy.

The other day a Christian mother, whose heart rejoices at every sign that her flock of little ones is led by the Good Shepherd, told me that one of her little girls had learned a lesson in a prayer that she would never forget. She came in from school greatly irritated, saying that she never wanted teachers to disappoint and tease her. After her first excited feeling had spent itself, her father said to her quietly, 'Nelly, did you ever try praying for your teacher, to see if God would not make her more gentle?'

'Why, no, father,' said the little girl.

'Well,' said he, 'try that, and see how things get on to-morrow.'

He said no more, but watched the end; and the next day Nelly came bounding into the house, as she had not done for many a day, saying, 'Oh father, you were right; you don't know how good Miss K—— was to me to-day! I have had such a happy day!'

'Well, my little girl,' said the father, 'God has many ways of answering our prayers; and I suspect that one way He took to answer you, was to make you more obedient and studious.'

She had not thought of this before; but now began looking back over the day, and then, in sweet simplicity, said, 'Yes, father, I think that was so. I loved to study to-day, my heart was so happy.'

Many days after, she said to him, as he came in at nightfall, 'Dear father, I never shall forget again to ask God for everything I want; for since that day my teacher has been so changed!'

'Yes,' said the glad father, 'and my little girl is changed too.'

Christ knew, when He was teaching that lesson, that it would bear its fruits; that every day some want would come up that He could satisfy; and in his generous love, He longed to have that young heart come to Him and be comforted.—The Witness.

THE CHILD'S JOURNEY.

A LITTLE fair-haired child once started early in the morning on a long, long journey.

She entered a wood, whose tall, old trees seemed to her to touch the sky, and went singing on her way, rejoicing in the fragrant breath of the flowers, as they lifted up their bright faces, offering sweet incense to the sun.

But she did not pluck them, for she loved all things, and did not wish to see one of these bright children of God uprooted, to die. And while she journeyed on, the sun mounted higher and higher in the heavens, and it was noon. She saw, at a short distance, a bright little stream of water, and hastened to satisfy her thirst and rest awhile in the shade. But suddenly she stopped, and tears of pity filled her eyes as she saw a wounded dove lying on the ground, breathing its life away.

Carefully she lifted it from the ground, and carried it under the trees. But her gentle care came too late, for the little eyes grew filmy, and the claws stiff: the little dove was dead!

She laid it in a little nest, which she had fashioned from the green grass, and washed the crimson spots from its breast. And as she bent over the spring, her image was reflected in it; and, behold, it was not the image of a fair-haired child, but that of a lovely woman, with the same sweet love for all God's creatures beaming from her eyes.

And then she went on, for her journey was not yet done.

And when she saw little children wishing for some one to love them, she would say, 'I love you, come with me,' and would take them in her arms, and tell them about Jesus.

And on she went, until, in the place of her loveliness, were grey hairs and faltering steps: she was growing old. But a beautiful soul shone from her eyes, and her heart was still full of love. And can we not all do the same? When we see 'one of these little ones' waiting for love, can we not tell them about the wonderful love of Jesus? And then when we cross 'over the river,' we shall hear Christ say, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me.'

DOES IT TELL ABOUT JESUS?

MR. BLISS, an agent of the American Bible Society, wrote from Turkey: 'A book hawker, whose work is mostly among the Turks, spends an hour or two every day at a stand near the Seraskier's Tower, at Constantinople. Not long since, while offering his books from this stand to the crowd passing by, a Turkish lady timidly approached, and, taking up a Bible, asked in regard to its teachings. Not quite satisfied with the answer, she asked that she might take it to a Turk, sitting at a little distance, that he might read it, and tell her about its contents. She was allowed to do so. The Turk took the Bible, and looking at it for a few minutes, said, "This is no book for you. It is not one of our books; it is one of the infidel books." "But," replied the woman, "whom does it tell about?" "That is no concern of yours; it is an infidel book," said the Turk. "But does it tell about Jesus Christ?" asked the woman. The Turk again opened the Bible, and read various portions, without making any reply. The woman again asked, "Does it tell of Jesus Christ?" The Turk said, "Yes; but why do you wish to know?" She replied, "If it is the book that tells about Jesus Christ, I wish to buy it." "Can you read?" asked the Turk. "No; but I can get some one to read it to me." She then took the Bible, and returned to the bookseller, purchased it, and bore it away, as a most precious treasure, to her home.'

THE BOY'S RESOLVE.

I WOULD like to have ruddy cheeks, and bright eyes, and strong limbs. But they say that strong drink dims the eye, and whitens the cheek, and enfeebles the frame; therefore I will not drink at all.

I would like to have a clear mind, so that I may be able to think on great things, and serve God, and do good to others, and prepare to die. But they say that strong drink clouds the mind, and often destroys it; therefore I will not drink at all.

I would like to have a peaceful heart, and a quiet conscience, so that I may be happy while I am here. But they say that strong drink fills many a heart with misery, and implants in many a conscience a sting; therefore I will not drink at all.

I would like to have a quiet home, and happy fireside, where I could rejoice with loving brothers, and sisters, and parents. But they say that strong drink makes ten thousand homes wretched and miserable; therefore I will not drink at all.

I would like to go to heaven when I die, that I may dwell with Jesus in glory for ever. But they say that strong drink keeps many from entering into heaven, and casts them down to hell; therefore I will not drink at all.

A MISTAKEN IDEA.

'MOTHER,' said Jane Wiley, 'is Robert Wickes a Christian?'

'I hope he is. I believe he is. He is very young to join the church; but his pastor and friends thought he gave good evidence of being a Christian. Why do you ask the question?'

'Because he plays with the other boys every day when school is out.'

'Does he play like a Christian, or like a wicked boy?'

'I don't know, mother. I only know that he plays with the other boys.'

Jane thought a Christian must always be very sober, if not sad. Her idea was a mistaken one. God wishes us to be happy. He is as willing that children should play as their parents are. He requires them to play as Christians,—that is, that they avoid all wickedness in playing.

GOT TO JESUS.

DEAR children, I want to tell you of a little boy who went to the Sabbath school with which I am connected. As I was going out one day last winter, when there were many awakened ones asking, 'What must I do to be saved?' a little boy, nine or ten years old, put into my hand a slip of paper a couple of inches long, which I have carefully preserved. As children were in the habit of handing me papers in this way, I did not read it till I got home. I then found upon it, written in a very crooked manner, these words, 'Mr. Wells, I've got to Jesus! I've got to Jesus!' I don't know who the boy was; I never could find out; but he had found the sum and substance of the whole gospel. That little boy had got to Jesus.

A CHILD'S THOUGHT.

A LITTLE girl was one night under the starry sky, intently meditating upon the glories of the heavens. At last, looking up to the sky, she said, 'Father, I have been thinking if the wrong side of heaven is so beautiful, what will the right side be!'

CATCHING THE SUNBEAM.

TIRED of playing, tired of toy,
Little Johnnie, our two-year boy,
With his bright blue eyes and golden hair,
Sat on the floor by his mother's chair.

'Twas just as the day was beginning to die;
And the sun, ere descending the western sky,
Threw a parting glance through the open door,
In a golden beam upon the floor.

Quickly he seized his little white hat,
And scrambling away as fast as a cat,
He held it firmly upon the floor,
So that the beam should escape no more.

Clapping his hands with joyous glee,
While his laugh rippled out so merrily,
He looked with beaming face into mine,
Saying, 'Auntie, I've caught the shine!'

ODD AND USEFUL FRAGMENTS.—No. II.

FROM THE GERMAN AND ITALIAN.

COUNSELS.

Honour the old,
Send the young to school;
Question the wise,
Bear with the fool.

SECRETS.

The secret of two is the secret of God.
The secret of three soon travels abroad.

THE SHEDDER OF BLOOD.

The man who bathes his hand in blood,
Must wash it white in ceaseless tears;
No more for him the happy mood;
Ever for him the anguished years.

PURITY.

Like the wanderer's foot on snow,
Ever be my lot;
Leaving the trace of the path I go,
But staining not.

WASTED VOICES.

Prodigal praise at the dead man's tomb,
Is the nightingale's song in the deaf man's room.

A PRINCE'S MOTTO.

Better lose land and people both,
Than stain the name with a broken oath.

THE MELODY OF PRAYER.

There is, in all eternity,
No music half so sweet,
As when man's bosom fervently
Bounds forth its God to meet.

SILK AND GOLD.

With gold fill a sack up to the tie,
The sack is not turned into silk thereby.

SAND AND MARBLE.

To-day you scrawl along the sand,
To be o'erwhelmed by the next wave,
What yesterday, on marble grand,
You should have striven to engrave.

THE RESTLESS HEART.

A millstone and a human heart
Drive round, and round, and round.
If they have nothing else to grind,
They must themselves be ground.

THE HERO AND THE COWARD.

More victory gains the brave man's glance,
Than the coward's longest, strongest lance.

APOSTLES.

Twelve apostles Christ's standard bore;
Those bearing the devil's are many a score.

DUTY AT HOME.

Your house and your court, if you sweep through and through,
You find work for all your best besoms to do.

LIFE AND DEATH.

In dying, all death ceases;
Life lost, our life increases.

LOVE IMMORTAL.

A mother's love is never cold;
A mother's love is never old;
A mother's love is ever true;
A mother's love is nine times new.

CONSOLATION.

Yes, He your bitter grief shall still!
Think not, too young am I;
For he who dies as God doth will,
Is old enough to die.

THE DIVIDED HEART.

God crowneth no divided heart;
Oh, hallow to Him all thy life!

SOLITUDE.

The more thou deemest thyself alone,
The further thou art from solitude.
Thy devil will come, if thy angel has flown;
Thy angel, if thou thy fiend hast subdued.

REVERENCE.

Honour the old man's hair of snow,
If thou would'st thyself the old man grow.

OFFICIAL RELIGION.

For every egg they the master give,
The king's servants rob the peasant of two;
And sometimes they rob the peasant of ten,
And give the lord the shells to chew.

RECOMPENSE.

The mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small;
Though with patience He stands waiting,
With exactness grinds He all.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

Rev. iii. 21.

Three persons are set before us here: the warrior, the conqueror, the king; or, using another figure, we have—(1) The battle; (2) The victory; (3) The reward.

I. The battle.—Common life in this world is a warfare, and hence even worldly men speak and write of 'the battle of life;' much more the Christian's life. It is warfare out and out, for all here is hostile. It is called the good fight, the fight of faith, the good warfare.

(1.) It is inner warfare.—The seventh of the Romans is the description of this; the battle between faith and unbelief, between the spirit and the flesh. This warfare is private, solitary; with no eye upon the warrior; fought in the closet, on the knees, with the Bible as his weapon; not uncertainly, nor as one that beateth the air.

(2.) It is outer warfare.—The enemies are legion: the world, with all its enmities, snares, pomps, pleasures; Satan, with his principalities and powers,—both of these in combination, hating, persecuting, attacking. This is 'the great fight of afflictions' (Heb. x. 32). Thus it is so far public—before men. 'We are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men.'

(3.) It is daily warfare.—It is not one great battle, but a multitude; constant warring—no intermission and no discharge in this war. The enemy wearies not, ceases not; nor must we. We wake to warfare each morning, and go out to warfare each day. Everywhere we find the enemy posted, sometimes openly, sometimes in ambush. It is life-long, and it is daily.

(4.) It is warfare not fought with human arms.—'The weapons of our warfare are not carnal.' We do not war after the flesh. It is in divine strength; with the sword of the Spirit; clothed in the whole armour of God. It begins when we believe. Faith, instead of being the end, is the beginning of conflict. Ours is 'the good fight of faith.'

(5.) It is warfare in which we are sharers with Christ.—He first fought the good fight, as the Captain of our salvation, the Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle. The inner warfare, indeed, was not his, but all the rest was. He fought, when here, the same battles as we; and it is into his warfare that we are called to enter. His battle on earth was ours, and our battle now on earth is his. Let us fight it, with this remembrance and encouragement. We fight along with Paul, but we also fight along with Christ.

II. The victory.—Here it is spoken of as one great final victory, but in reality it is a multitude. As are the battles, so are the victories. There may be occasional defeats, wounds, losing ground, but the tide of victory rolls steadily onward. Inner and outer warfare ends in victory; 'we are made more than conquerors through Him that loved us.' He fought, and overcame, and He leads us on to victory: 'Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world.' The brunt of the battle has fallen on Him; He has routed the host; and it is with a conquered foe that we have to do. Sin, hell, death, the world, the devil, He has vanquished; and He is now leading us on to victory. Seven times, in these chapters, do we hear the glorious words, 'To him that overcometh.' Each church had its battle and its victory—even Laodicea; so has each individual. No one can fight another's battle, or win another's victory; each for himself. Each has his own battle and his own victory. Fight, then, and overcome; overcome daily; nor faint till the long series of battles and victory is summed up in the one great final triumph—the triumph of each saint, and of the whole church of God.

III. The reward.—In these epistles seven rewards are promised—a peculiar reward to each. To Ephesus, the tree of life; to Smyrna, deliverance from the second death; to Pergamos, the hidden manna and the white stone; to Thyatira, dominion and the morning star; to Sardis, the white raiment; to Philadelphia, to be a pillar, and to receive the new name; to Laodicea, a seat on Christ's throne. Each according to his peculiar battle and victory. In Laodicea there are warriors and conquerors; few, perhaps, but still some—some whose faith remained stedfast ('this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith'), raising them out of lukewarmness and worldliness. To these there is a brilliant hope presented—a seat upon Christ's throne. In Laodicean times, and a Laodicean church, be faithful and true.

(1.) A throne.—Not salvation merely, or life, but higher than these—glory, honour, dominion, and power. From being the lowest here, they are made the highest hereafter. Even out of Laodicea there come God's kings and priests—heirs of the throne.

(2.) Christ's throne.—He has a seat on the Father's throne as the reward of his victory; we have a seat on his as the reward of ours. He shares with us his crown and throne. We are made 'joint-heirs' with Him. He is on the Father's throne just now; He will shortly be upon his own. To a seat with Him we look forward; and, cheered by this hope, we fight the good fight of faith. We are sharers or 'partakers with Christ' in all things. We share his battles, his victories, his rewards, his cross, his crown.

Let us look forward, then, as well as backward. All the promises to these churches bid us look forward. Amid toil, conflict, weariness, sorrow, backsliding, we have a hope. Let us hold it fast, let us use it constantly. In the midst of Laodicean lukewarmness, here is something to stimulate and rouse. When our hands hang down, let us think upon the throne,—the throne, and Him who gives it,—the throne, and Him who sits on it, and shares it with us. It will be glorious enough to compensate for hardship and conflict now. It may soon be here; we know not how soon. Events are rushing on: Antichrist is waxing strong; Israel is preparing to return; wars are rising; departures from the faith are multiplying; the gospel is going forth as a witness. The King is on his way. 'Behold, the Bridegroom cometh!' Let us watch, and be ready.

THE WISE.

BY THE EDITOR.

DAN. XII. 3.

THERE are two classes described here, with their two separate rewards. They are, in some respects, distinct from each other, yet so far the same.

Both are wise, and both are heirs of an eternal glory—a glory such 'as eye hath not seen,' though it may be set forth to our faith under the likeness of things that are visible to the eye, —such as the sun, or the stars, or the sky. Both, too, are of earth,—not angels, but men of flesh and blood like ourselves; men once fallen, dark, hateful, like those among whom an apostle classes himself, when he says, 'We ourselves were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures.' Both had been lifted up out of the horrible pit, and taken from the miry clay,—children of wrath and death, even as others; once wholly evil, but now 'washed, and sanctified, and justified.'

Both, then, are described as wise; but then, the one class are only wise for themselves; their wisdom delivers their own souls; they are wise unto salvation. The other class go beyond this. They are wise for others. They use their wisdom in making others wise. Their life is not merely the life of the wise, but of the useful. They 'turn many to righteousness.' They do not live in vain. They are specimens of the meaning of that blessed text, 'He that winneth souls is wise.'

Corresponding to the two classes, there are two kinds of rewards, the one more glorious than the other, though both unutterably glorious and equally eternal. The wise shine as the brightness of the sky—the clear, transparent, unchanging blue of the firmament above us; they that use their wisdom for turning many to righteousness, shine more conspicuously, more brilliantly still, like the stars in that fair azure, —the stars that change not, dim not, pale not, 'for ever and ever.'

Truly blessed must it be to belong to either of these classes,—specially for those whose rightful portion is 'the blackness of darkness for ever.' For to both there is given an 'eternal weight of glory.' But still there is a difference, and that difference is worthy of our notice. Just as we are taught to covet the best gifts, so are we to seek the weightiest glory as an inheritance. Just as Paul pressed forward in his course, not merely 'lest he should be a castaway,' but if that by any means he might attain unto the resurrection from the dead; so are we to give all diligence in pressing forward on this path of true and divine ambition.

Let us, then, consider these two classes: (1) The wise; (2) They who turn their wisdom to account in turning others to righteousness;—with their rewards.

I. The wise.—Not, of course, the wise of this world. Their wisdom is foolishness. The world by wisdom knows not God. No man has wisdom by nature—every man is, in truth, a born fool; and if he thinks himself to be otherwise, he must learn to become a fool, that he may be wise. Even among those who name the name of Christ, some are found who are not wise. There were five foolish virgins: how much more among the men of this present evil world is this folly to be found! Regarding this wisdom, let us inquire—

1. What it is.—It is not the knowledge of the things or works of God that is wisdom; it is the knowledge of God himself—the true God —that very Jehovah which the Bible reveals—that holy Being, that gracious, loving One, that God only wise, in whom we live, and move, and have our being. To know Him, is to be wise; not to know Him, is to be wrapt in the mists of ignorance and folly. Increase in the knowledge of God, is increase of wisdom; to know Him fully, is the perfection of all wisdom.

2. Where it is to be found.—In Him whose name is 'the Word made flesh.' Not only is He made unto us wisdom, but He is 'the wisdom of God.' In Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. There may be fragments of it elsewhere; but in Him is all its fulness, and that fulness infinite. It is in Him alone that the whole compass of divine wisdom is seen. In his wondrous person we have the embodiment of infinite wisdom; in his mighty work we have the exemplification of all wisdom. And He is himself the God only wise; incarnate wisdom—wisdom all gathered together, and exhibited in the form of manhood. He is presented to us both as the possessor of all wisdom, and as, in the constitution of his person, and the development of his offices and work, the exhibition of all wisdom. So that to know Him, and to know the Father's meaning in Him, is to become truly wise.

3. How it is to be got.—By coming to this divine treasure-house. Acquaintanceship, companionship with Him, is the secret of all wisdom. In two ways do we get this wisdom out of Him—actively and passively. We are made wise by Him as our Teacher, and also as the object or subject in whom are contained all the lessons and all the truths that we require to know. All needed knowledge is wrapt up in Him—in Him personally, as the great Immanuel. Would you, then, be wise—truly, eternally wise? Make his unsearchable riches your study. God's counsel is just this, 'Know Christ;' even as his own is, 'Learn of me.' Do you want to know God? Go to Him who is the representative of Godhead. Do you want the great things of eternity? Go to the Son of God; He will teach you, for He is the Eternal One. Do you want to know the wondrous things of heaven? Go to the Incarnate Word; He will show you them, for He came down from heaven. Do you want to know the infinite love of Jehovah? Go to this only-begotten Son; He will tell you of it, and make you to feel it in all its boundlessness. Do you want to know what holiness is? Go to Him; He is the Holy One. Do you want to know what power is? Go to Him who is the Almighty One, in the full form of man. Do you want to know what life is? Go to Him who is the resurrection and the life. He will reveal it to you. Know Christ, and you know all you need to know. If you lack wisdom, go to Him; He will make you wise.

4. When is this wisdom to be had?—Not after long years of study, with broken health, it may be, and enfeebled mind. God's teaching is as efficacious as it is skilful, needing no tedious process. The great subject of all his teaching (Christ Jesus) is so divinely simple, that the intellect is not tasked or overborne; and the whole vast store of wisdom is gathered to one single point, and concentrated in a person. And though progress in this wisdom may be said to be truly illimitable, so that day by day we receive it more abundantly; yet, in the simple knowledge of this glorious Person, there pours in at once into the soul such a burst of heavenly radiance, that without delay, without labour, without months of painful study, we become truly wise. Yesterday how dark, to-day how full of light, in opening the eye to look on Him who is the soul's true light! Yesterday how foolish and ignorant, to-day how strangely wise; wise beyond the ancients; wise unto salvation; wise for eternity!

5. By whom is this wisdom to be had?—By all who need it. Not by the deserving or the qualified, but by the needy, the ignorant. Previous instruction and fitness are not asked for. The greatness of previous ignorance and unteachableness is no hindrance. For He who is at once our Teacher and our Lesson, is He who has 'compassion on the ignorant;' to whom the Lord God has given the tongue of the learned, that he should know to speak a word in season to the weary.

It is thus, then, that we become wise—though born like a wild ass's colt—through the knowledge of Him who is 'the power of God and the wisdom of God.' 'Wise in Christ' is the expression which the Holy Spirit uses; and it is to be thus truly wise in Him that his love invites us. Pitying our ignorance—an ignorance in which all sorrow and ruin are wrapt up—He asks us to become wise; He offers to teach us; He presents us with the glorious lesson. How blessed to be wise! (See Prov. ii. 1–6, iii. 13–18, iv. 5–12, viii. 1.)

But this will be seen more when we look at the reward of the wise hereafter: 'They shall shine as the brightness of the firmament,'—just as it is elsewhere written, 'The wise shall inherit glory.'

The glory of the wise hereafter is thus likened to the glory of the blue sky above us. And what a sky is that, which has bent over us its fair circle since this world began! Take it as the sky of morning or noonday, or sunset or midnight, how excellent is its splendour! Take it as the fresh blue of spring, or the clear blue of summer, or the soft blue of autumn, or the deep blue of winter,—how perfect is its beauty! Clouds have overspread its face, but it comes forth undimmed. The smoke of earth's cities has darkened it, yet it remains unstained. Age has not wrinkled it, storms have not rent it, changes have not altered it. There it bends over us this day as it bent at first,—as blue as ever, as bright as when God pronounced it good.

And such is the glory which the wise shall inherit. 'They shall shine as the brightness of the firmament,' with a splendour incorruptible, undefiled, unfading, eternal; a splendour of the fairest, purest kind; a splendour altogether unearthly; a splendour holy, divine. For just as these skies bear no trace of their connection with the polluted earth, taking on none of its stains or dimness; so these wise ones, these children of the resurrection, shall so shine forth in their immortal beauty, as if they had never been sons of earth at all, but always sons of heaven. 'It doth not yet appear what they shall be;' for this is a night of cloud and tempest, during which the sky is hidden. But when these clouds pass off, and these storms are laid to rest, and the new heavens and earth appear, then shall these heirs of glory shine forth, not merely with the brightness of these old heavens of ours, but with the still fairer, holier, gladder brightness of the new heavens, under whose canopy they shall then rejoice.

How suitable this wisdom and this glory,—this wisdom now, this glory hereafter! How vast that glory, though eye hath not seen it! How precious must that wisdom be, through which such a glory is reached! And how simply, how freely is that glory obtained, when all the purchase or preparation is, that we be WISE! To be foolish, is to be the heirs of shame; partakers of 'the blackness of darkness for ever!' To be wise, is to inherit glory—a glory which, at the least, is 'an exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' To be wise, is not merely to enter into peace here with the God of glory, and to be delivered from the wrath to come—the shame and everlasting contempt which are in reserve for the foolish; but to be wise is to secure a crown; to have in us that earnest of the Spirit, whereby we are sealed unto the day of redemption—the day when 'Christ, who is our life, shall appear,' and we 'shall shine as the brightness of the firmament.'

What attraction in such a promise, such a hope as this! To shine as the brightness of the firmament, and that for ever! To be ourselves, as it were, God's glorious heaven, receiving and reflecting his holy light, without a break, or flaw, or change! To be ourselves the celestial arch of unfading azure, when, as one blessed band of ransomed men, we shall be brought up into the clouds, to meet our Lord in the air! Is there not in this something fitted, not only to elevate and sanctify those who are already possessors of the hope, but to attract those that are not? What glory, what blessedness, what heavenly splendour might be yours! All in simply knowing Him, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge! Know Him! learn of Him! Be wise in Him, and without price, or toil, or effort, or waiting, all that glory is yours!

(To be continued.)

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER XIV.

COLD WEATHER—TELLING LIES.

RAIN came at last. The climate suddenly changed, and instead of summer we had, if not winter, at least very cool autumn. The mornings were sharp, almost frosty. The crowds had disappeared from the Jaffa gate; it was too cold for either camels or men to sleep there at night. All the grapes, and all the winter stores of wheat and barley, charcoal and wood, had been brought into the city; as well the immense convoys for Greek, Latin, and Armenian convents, as half dozens or dozens of camel loads for private houses.

The poor people, not being able to buy in this manner, are obliged to supply their daily wants as best they can, at the exorbitant prices charged by the shopkeepers in the city. Within doors, though fires were not yet needed, winter clothing was necessary; and Katrina appeared in her crimson coat the morning after our first night's heavy rain. This coat—I scarcely know what else to call it—is a straight garment, very much the shape of a sack, open down the front from the neck; but a seam forms the shoulders, and there is a hole on each side for the arms. It reaches to the knees. These garments are made of good home-spun and home-dyed wool, and woven at Bethlehem; and their rich red contrasts finely with the blue linen kamees worn underneath. Walter was not a little pleased to see her in it; for some of the women in one of his pictures were attired in this way, and he wanted to finish them.

Of course everybody rejoiced in the rain, and we rejoiced in the clear English-feeling mornings, which put life and vigour into us. But poor Sarah looked miserable in the white sheet and print dress, all patched and worn as it was. I gave her a little money to get some warmer clothing; and next time she came, she had on a skirt of some sort of woollen stuff, and a cloth jacket lined with fur. How delighted and thankful she was, poor thing!

Katrina was perhaps at heart as good-natured, but she was much rougher to Sarah than my old Helaneh had been. She neither smoked nor took snuff, and so there was no opportunity for friendly interchange of pipe or snuff-box.

However, Sarah was, as a Jewess, well accustomed to rough words, and did not mind them as long as she was tolerably well treated. But this morning, one of the palettes of Walter's colour-box was found lying broken in the kitchen. I asked who had done it. Katrina, who was in a very ill temper, and had been scolding all the morning, replied sulkily, 'Nobody breaks things here but that accursed Jewess' (Sarah had broken a dish before).

'Did Sarah break this, or not?'

'Certainly; how can she have any barakeh (blessing) in anything?'

When Sarah came, I asked her how it was that she had not told me of the broken palette.

'Senora, I did not break it. It was lying broken when I left this yesterday evening. By my life, and the life of my child, it was!'

'Don't swear, Sarah; but tell me truly, did you break it, or not?'

'No, Senora, Constantine saw me come in, and I showed it to him.'

Constantine was called.

'Did Sarah break this?'

'No, lady, it was broken when she came; that is the truth.'

'Who broke it?'

'I know not.'

'Did you break it, Katrina?'

'I?—no, by the life of my eyes!'

'Don't swear; people who tell the truth don't need to swear.'

'You told me that Sarah broke it.'

Katrina laughed, and said, 'She broke the dish; why should she not break this also?'

'But you told me a lie; you said she broke it.'

Again she laughed. 'O lady, thou knowest the manner of us fellahheen; it is our a'adeh (custom) to tell lies.'

'And where is your honour?'

'We have none, we are fellahheen—behaim (beasts).'

'Don't you know what the Angiel (the gospel) says about lies?'

'The Angiel!' and she laughed again, and drew the corner of her veil before her mouth. 'I'm a hhamarah (donkey); what should I know of Angiel?'

At this moment Haj Omar came in.

'What's all this stir?' Then seeing me: 'Good morning, Sitty.'

Constantine gave a sly look at the groom, and said, 'Katrina witnessed that the Jewess broke this plate.'

'She lieth; I broke it, and thou sawest me, O Constantine.'

I turned to Constantine: 'You said you did not know who broke it; do you also tell lies?'

'Sitty, I was afraid; I brought it here to be washed, and Haj Omar took it up and it broke.'

Before I could speak, Haj Omar said: 'I broke it, lady, and that is the truth; but should Constantine always speak truth? Is it not said, "A man without lies, is like meat without salt?" Who is there except the Ingleez who don't tell lies?'

'The Ingleez don't tell lies, because God has forbidden in his book; and if you will tell lies, I must send you out of the house.'

The groom went away whistling a low whistle. Katrina laughed again; but Constantine seemed a little ashamed, and said, 'Truly lies are bad things.' Sarah picked up the pieces of the palette, saying she knew a Morocco Jew who could 'sew' them together.

By and by, I took an opportunity of asking Katrina if she would like to hear some of the Angiel, of which she knew so deplorably little. She seemed pleased, and would come to my room of an evening, and sit on the mat at my feet, while I tried to read some of the Arabic Testament to her. Sometimes she did not seem to understand, at others she would repeat after me, or help me by correcting my pronunciation, or by putting in a word; and sometimes she would supplement the gospel narrative, especially about our Saviour's birth, by Bethlehem histories, which I now wish I had noted down.

Not only were the days become cold and dull, but the nights were dark and blustering. Clouds were gathering for the winter storms. The former rain had fallen, the fields had been ploughed, corn was springing up, and the wild, melancholy piping of the plover resounded along the lonely valleys, as Walter and I walked briskly towards the Jaffa gate one boisterous evening. We met Mr. Benson, the surgeon, in the gateway.

'You are late, Benson.'

'Yes, I have had a patient on my hands till this moment; and now I want a mouthful of fresh air.'

'No lack of fresh air to-night. There must be rain if this wind continues.'

'The barometer is falling fast. Miss Russell, have you any objection to turn again? Your conversation will add double virtue to the effects of the fresh air; for the solitude outside Jerusalem is rather depressing on a gloomy evening like this.'

We turned back, and Mr. Benson and Walter arranged a plover-shooting expedition, which was to come off the first favourable morning.

'How lovely and sad those few almond blossoms look down in the valley yonder, Miss Russell! Not the last rose of summer, but the first early blossoms, too delicate for the rough weather that is coming. This wind will soon scatter them among the rocks.'

'I was just contrasting them with the crocuses, which are quite as delicate in colour, perhaps more so; but yet they look warm and comfortable, peeping up among the rough clods and stones in the ploughed fields.'

'I have not seen any crocuses yet, except a splendid yellow one, almost as large as a tulip, which Richards found near Bethany yesterday.'

'Are they out already? It was later last year when I found some of them.'

'The rain came earlier this year, and they say we are going to have a sharp winter. By-the-bye, Russell, look to your bolts and bars, for they say the thieves are making a fine harvest these dark nights, to make up, I suppose, for the bad times under the last Pasha, when no one but himself was allowed a chance for making money.'

'I never heard of thieves in Jerusalem, Mr. Benson.'

'I hope you may do no more than hear of them, Miss Russell; but there have been several robberies in the Christian and Jewish quarters. They say that the chief of the police is at the bottom of them all.'

'What! that cowardly rascal who was killing the thieves on the plain the day we went to Adullam?'

'Yes; the same—Ibrahim Aga. The Jews say they have recognised his slaves among the housebreakers; but they are afraid to tell, for fear of being murdered.'

'Poor creatures! But do you really think there is any fear of them paying us Europeans a visit, Mr. Benson?'

'No, I don't; at least they will be shy of meddling with English, I think.'

---

CHAPTER XV.

ROBBERY AT GERSHON THE PEDLAR'S.

THE very next morning Sarah came to me, crying and lamenting.

'Woe is me, Senora, we are undone! The Moros have entered our room in the night, and have taken away Gershon's pack, and all that was in it.'

'What Moros, Sarah?'

'The thieves, the robbers, and murderers, Senora. We are undone! we are undone!'

'What was there in his pack, Sarah? Don't cry for a few yards of calico and print.'

'But they belonged to a merchant—to a Christian. They are not paid for, ahi di me! He will put my son into prison; and then, how shall his children get bread? And besides, in his pack—'

She burst into a flood of tears, and could say no more.

'Be comforted, Sarah, we will not let Gershon be put into prison for this, even if we should pay the merchant for the stuff.'

'May God give you and your brother all good. But that is not the worst—oh! it is much worse than that. My son brought home an old dress last night, belonging to a Moslem woman. She gave it him in pledge for a new turbooch that she had not money to pay for; it was not worth eighty piastres. But in it—oh! what shall we do! what shall we do!—in the pocket of the old thing Gershon found a necklace of pearls, worth at least ten thousand piastres; and he knew the pearls again, for he had often seen them on the neck of Ibrahim Aga's wife, the head of the police.'

'Pearls worth ten thousand piastres in the pocket of an old gown! Can that be true, Sarah?'

'Alas! alas! it is true, and we are ruined—we are undone.'

'Was the owner of the dress the wife of Ibrahim Aga?'

'No, Senora; she is not his wife, she is the wife of an Egyptian. Who knows how she came by the pearls? There are very bad people among these Moros; may they be cut off! Gershon was afraid to take them back last night, for, said he, "Who knows how she came by them; and it is sunset, and her husband will be at home, and if he finds them in my hand, he may kill me, for he will say I have been sent (which God forbid) to his wife with a bribe, for she is a handsome woman; but she is also a wicked woman, for these are the pearls of Ibrahim Aga's wife." And so he waited till this morning to go and carry back the gown and the pearls; and now they are stolen—woe is me! woe is me! they have been stolen.'

And she burst into uncontrollable weeping. Poor Sarah! she was indeed in great trouble, and I could not help seeing that this might become a very serious business.

'Where is Gershon?'

'He is gone to the Consul's, for he is very much afraid.'

'Be comforted, Sarah; perhaps the thieves will be found. Did he not see any of them?' An expression of terror came over her face.

'How could he see them, Senora? Do thieves let themselves be seen?'

'Sarah! you saw them yourself.' I know not why, the thought struck me that she had seen them. She shook from head to foot.

'Senora, how should I see them? Do thieves let themselves be seen?'

I now felt convinced that she had seen them, but was afraid to say so.

'But I have not told you all, Senora. There was also a ring in my son's bundle which belonged to the Consul's dragoman, and it also is gone; and Gershon is more afraid of this than all, for the Consul will be angry with him, and then, O Senora, who will help us? Alas! we are undone! we are undone!'

'And this ring—was it valuable too?'

'More than five thousand piastres, Senora. The dragoman is going to marry his daughter, and he gave the ring to my son to place with old Rubeno the Sarrâf, in security for a sum of money for the expenses of the marriage. And now they will say that my son has stolen both the pearls and the ring. Woe is me! woe is me! my son Gershon, who always had clean hands, and a heart as pure as a diamond!' and she beat upon her breast, and cried bitterly.

Poor old woman! I could not bear to see her distress; and yet what was to be done? I tried to comfort her, but it was of no use. The certainty that the things had been stolen, and that her poor honest Gershon would be accused of the robbery, and worse still, that his credit would be gone, that no one would trust him again, were all she could think of. At last it occurred to me that my brother and I would go to the Consul, and tell him that we knew Gershon to be an honest man, and unlikely to have stolen the jewels, and that his own account of the robbery was probably the true one. I told her so, and desired first to see Gershon himself.

This calmed her a little; and kissing my hands fervently, she besought us for God's sake to help them in this unfortunate business.

Gershon came. He had been with the Consul, who had taken down his account of the robbery, and sent his chief dragoman to the Pasha claiming search to be made for the goods, and punishment of the thieves. Gershon had told Mrs. Wells the whole story of the pearls and of the ring. Mr. Wells had written that down too, and so far reassured poor, trembling Gershon as to tell him he would not treat him as a thief until it was proved he had stolen, and as yet no one had so much as accused him of anything.

Gershon had also seen the Consul's dragoman, to whom the ring belonged. He told us, with tears of gratitude in his eyes, that that person fully believed his story, and would not prosecute him for the ring. Nay, more, he had said he would not even demand the value of it from him at present, but would assist him in every way to find out the thieves. 'The time for the marriage of his daughter is not yet,' he says, and 'perhaps before it comes, we may get the ring back.'

'That must be the Consul's Jewish dragoman, Rabbi Beehon Ariyeh,' said Walter; 'that is noble of him. I know the Jews are kind to each other; but this is a fine instance of forbearance.'

We now questioned Gershon about the robbery. It was about one hour before dawn that he was disturbed by hearing a sound on his terrace, and in another moment, a fellahh, with face bound up in a Bedawa scarf, came into the room with a huge club in his hand. Gershon was afraid to move lest he should be killed; his terror was lest his wife or children should awake while the robber was there, and thus bring destruction upon them all. The man crept about the room, and finally drew out of a cupboard the only thing of value poor Gershon had, excepting his bundle, namely, a roll of Damascus silk, which he was going to sell on the morrow to the Consul's dragoman for his daughter's wedding-dress. The thief seemed not to have noticed Gershon's bundle, which was under his head, and was going out of the room, when other footsteps were heard, and three more men crept in—two negroes and one a townsman, an Arab; and Gershon said the first thief looked surprised, but made them a sign. Gershon saw that they were not of his gang. The townsman pulled the other's beard, laughed, and made a sign of silence, putting his hand upon his own mouth, and then by way of threat he drew his hand across his own throat; the other nodded, but seemed considering how he might get off with his booty. He spied the bundle under Gershon's head, and pulled it away. Gershon pretended all the while to be snoring violently. Fortunately his face was covered with a handkerchief on account of the mosquitoes; but through a hole he saw his bundle handed over to the townsman, who passed it to one of the slaves, and they all went off as quietly as they had come over the roofs of the neighbours' houses. 'Blessed be the Lord of the world for sending a deep sleep upon my family, so that they did not awake, and by crying out bring death upon us all!'

'But your mother, Sarah, was awake,' said I, wishing to ascertain if my guess was correct, that she had seen, and was afraid to tell, who were the thieves.

Gershon started and became very pale, and large drops of perspiration burst out upon his forehead. 'They all slept, Senora. Bendieho el Dio! had one of them moved, we had been as dead men.'

'But Sarah saw the thieves.'

'Has she said so?' said he, almost gasping.

'No; but I am sure that she has seen them; and it is best to tell the Consul so, and let them be caught and punished. You also must have recognised him if your mother did. Was it the townsman?'

'I did not say there was a townsman,' said Gershon, terrified.

'But you did,' said Walter. 'Come with me, Gershon, and tell the Consul all you know, that the robbers may be punished.'

He wrung his hands in extremity of distress. 'Woe is me! my days will be cut off.' Then turning suddenly to Walter, he caught his feet and kissed them, and entreated that for God's sake he would not repeat what he had said to the Consul, or to any one else.

'But why not? Let the thief be caught; it is your duty, Gershon.'

'Oh, Senora, I shall be killed. There are very bad people among those Moros. I am in great fear; my soul is become as water, it is melted within me;' and he sank down on the nearest chair.

Though much puzzled, yet, out of pity to the poor man's terror, we promised that for the present we would say nothing about his and Sarah's having seen the thieves; and he went home a pitiable object of terror, shivering and shaking as if he were the robber instead of the robbed.

CHAPTER XVI.

A MUSICAL EVENING.

We went to the Consulate in the evening to speak for Gershon's character. Mr. Wells, however, was not at all inclined to charge him with the theft of the ring and the pearls.

'As far as I can judge at present, there is truth in his story; and it is just like the Jews to let themselves be robbed for fear of worse. Only the other day, a Siloam peasant, one of the water-carriers, walked into the room of Rabbi Beehon Ariyeh, my dragoman, and carried away his fur-lined coat before his eyes. He was afraid to move or to cry out, though it was broad daylight, and merely asked the thief what he wanted with his coat.'

'I will bring it back next Wednesday,' replied he, and decamped.

'Of course he did not bring it back?'

'Certainly not. But Rabbi Ariyeh would not hear of making search for the thief, for fear of revenge in case we punished him. I much fear that this will be the case now; that if we do trace Gershon's thieves, he will drop the prosecution for fear of consequences.'

'Is there real danger, then?'

'I think not. If an example or two were to be made, we should hear no more of this. I wish an Englishman's house were robbed for once, that we might give the rogues a lesson, either at the moment or afterwards. But they are too cunning to meddle with any of us; and they know the poor, timid Jews only too well to be afraid of their punishing them.'

Mrs. Wells insisted upon our remaining to finish the evening with her; adding archly, 'I can promise you some music to-night, for I expect a friend of yours who will help me to entertain you.'

And a few minutes afterwards, Rachel entered the room, all smiles and blushes, at the surprise of finding us there; and while Mrs. Wells was greeting her, I overheard Mr. Wells congratulating Walter. 'The news did not reach us till yesterday, strange to say, for I find it has been a Jerusalem topic much longer. She is a charming creature; and if you love music, you are indeed fortunate. I have seldom met a more decided musical genius.'

It was many months since we had had opportunity of hearing Rachel play. Oh, how much I missed my own English pianoforte, both for Walter's sake and for my own!

It was a treat when Mrs. Wells, with her clear ringing touch, gave us some of the delicious airs of Bellini. Walter's eyes took in the delight, as well as his ears; for he watched the influence of the music upon Rachel's countenance, as I had done the first time that she, then almost a child, had discovered her musical susceptibilities here in this very room.

How many things had happened since then! how events had unfolded themselves! how she had improved, altered, and developed! only in simple artlessness and in affectionate warmth, she was just the same as ever.

The effect of the music played over her expressive features as the breeze upon the face of the water: now lightly, just ruffling the surface in playful ripples; now this feeling, now that touched, passed over, touched again. Here deeply stirred in short quick waves, there in long, even undulations; the whole mind subdued, swayed, and borne along easily, without effort. But there was no demonstration of interest; she simply sat and listened, and as simply felt; and was, unknown to herself, under a spell till Mrs. Wells suddenly ceased, when she gave an involuntary sigh.

'Now come and help me, Rachel. She always plays better when I begin first, just to awake her musical senses,' said Mrs. Wells. 'I don't mean that they are ever quite asleep, you know.'

They played music of all kinds, from the intense poetical conceptions of Rachel's countryman, Mendelssohn, to the brilliant fancies of Rossini, the pathetic delicacy of some of Walter's Italian favourites, the graceful imaginings of Haydn, and the grandeur of Corelli and Handel.

'Mr. Wells is never satisfied without some of Handel,' said his wife, as she turned, after finishing some duets from 'Israel in Egypt.'

'No, I am old-fashioned. He was my mother's favourite; and all the others come short of my ideas of a complete musician. They are not broad and deep enough; they don't rise high enough. Handel is the only one that seems to me to have grasped music as a whole, in its range from exquisite delicacy or pathos, to majesty, grandeur, sublimity. Ah! Miss Rachel, if ever you go to England, there is something in store for you,—the great performances of that prince of composers.'

Walter's eye kindled with delight at the thought of taking Rachel to hear these. She stood listening just as she had risen from the piano, flushed, but with a serious expression upon her face, that seemed to say, 'Music is not a thing to be trifled with!' I was reminded of an Arab proverb quoted to me one evening, as we had stood looking at the exquisite emerald hues of a broad field of springing corn in the slanting rays of sunlight, which poured down the valley of Rephaim, 'Verily, green is a bit of paradise;' and I thought, 'Verily, music is a bit of heaven.'

But music is scarcely music without singing, and I begged for a little singing. Mr. Wells had a good tenor voice, and we sung together, and two hours passed swiftly away. Midnight came ere we were aware.

We took Rachel home to her own door, and then walked quietly down the silent streets. Even the dogs forgot to bark. There was not a sound to disturb the repose of the splendid moonlight, streaming down the long vistas of the arched bazaars, casting intense shadows from the buttresses of the old Templar buildings, rounding off the outlines of the domes over the Holy Sepulchre, giving fresh grace to the slender minarets; and at last, as we drew near home, bringing out the loved features of Olivet, not in brilliancy—for there half the moonlight seemed to be absorbed into the mountain,—but grave and softened, as beseemed its venerable outlines.

Just as we reached our door, a wail rose upon the still air. There was death in one of the houses not far off,—we knew not in which, nor whether the passing spirit was that of a child or of a grown-up person. Alas! it was not likely to be that of a Christian. Again the wail rose, more keen and thrilling in its anguish. Indescribably solemn was this voice, which told of the presence of death in the silent hours of the night.

How often since then have I heard the death-wail in the city of Jerusalem,—despairing, hopeless, void, utterly void of the hope which Christianity can give to mourners by the death-bed! Many spirits have passed away for ever from the homes in Jerusalem, since first we heard that death-wail. Some were strangers and pilgrims from far-off lands, others were gathered to the dust of their ancestors; but oh! how very few were laid to sleep 'in sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection!'

How very, very few, had ever heard of the things which could give hope and peace in their last hours! I have often wondered whether, among the multitudes of travellers who come to Jerusalem, any reflect upon the condition in which, when they depart to their happy country, they leave the thousands of dwellers in the Holy City, living, dying in ignorance of all that blesses their own lives, and can give comfort to their own death.

(To be continued.)

THE SABBATH SNOW-STORM.

LET me help you to improve a Sabbath snow-storm. Let me take my text from to-day.

1. Did you ever search out how much is said in the Bible about ice, and snow, and hail, and cold, and wintry storms? Did you ever make it one of the ways of rendering Sabbath pleasant to your children? to sit down with them, and set their nimble fingers and memories to work to cull from the word of God, and particularly from the Old Testament, allusions to these things? Did you ever make the hour short to them, by gathering together all the use that the Bible has made of this season of the year? You will be surprised yourselves to see how much there is in it, and how exquisitely beautiful a part it is.

While you are doing that, you may be led to extend your investigation. And if you do, you will find that the Old Testament furnishes the most complete and sublime manual of natural religion yet known. I refer to the habit of deducing religious duties from grounds of nature or constitution, in distinction from conventional or ecclesiastical authority. The Old Testament may be compared to Esau's garments. It smells of the fields all the way through. It is the simplest of books; and it carries back duties to the fact of creative nature, in a way that no other religious book does that I know of.

It attaches a profound moral significance to all the phenomena of nature. Admit that the Old Testament is not technically scientific. It could not be, and answer the purposes of practical instruction. It is better than that; for the teachers of the Old Testament, by assuming poetic diction, assumed a universal language. Reason changes with knowledge; but the imagination is constant. Poetry that includes truth in itself is universal, perpetual, and applicable to every age of the world; while more exact technical statements are obliged to be formed by every generation. Thus it is that the Psalms, Isaiah, Habakkuk, could be read by a devout Comté, or a pious Tyndale, as well as by one of the most spiritual of the mystics.

These Old Testament Scriptures are alone, absolutely, in ancient literature, in regarding the globe as of any higher value than mechanical worth. You may look in vain through oriental literature to find any intimation that it is of any higher value than that, though you will find much descant on gardens and flowers in their relation to love. The Orient did not believe that God had made this world, and that it had in it signs, and hints, and indications of his mind. The Greek literature has almost nothing of nature in it. In the main, it is the product of the human mind. For all of anything that is in it, the world might have been ignorant that there was a physical globe. And that which was true of the Greek literature, was almost as true of the Roman; for although in Roman literature there were treatises that touched on agriculture, yet the Latin tongue leaves the great natural world almost untouched and unthought of. And that which was true of the Greek literature and the Roman literature, was also true of the mediæval literature. And it is one of the signs of coming health, that Cowper, and the schools that followed him, have become so largely imbued with the moral aspects and uses of nature. But the Old Testament, which still is our model, stood up ages and ages ago, and proclaimed, 'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork.' There is not its like anywhere.

2. Did you ever consider what were some of the elements of beauty in the seasons, and particularly in winter? The whole year is but the four movements of one grand symphony. Nor can I regard the solemn preparations for winter without feelings for which I have no name, and which cannot fashion themselves into any form of expression. The falling of the leaves; the silence of the birds that have been singing all summer long, as now they gather themselves together in groups covering the fences, and filling the orchards, in dumb fellowship; the recession of light shortening the day; the colder winds beginning to come by whirls, modulated to melancholy in all their sounds; the hints of frost; the quick yielding of tender things that do not know how to make battle for their life, but that, in their weakness and sweetness, fold themselves to death at the first summons, as if it were easier to die than to live; and then the stout fight made by other things—by chrysanthemums, by sweet alyssums, by white oaks, and by the glorious old evergreen tree, which is the only thing that is able to hold out, and carry green banners through the whole year,—did you ever watch these things in autumn, without a solemn sympathy? without a feeling of something touched in you deeper than you can explain by words?

Then come the days of peace. The ground is covered with snow. The plough at last is free. All growth ceases. The insects that vexed you, or that amused themselves, are gone. All nature rests. This long night of winter is to me a most solemn night. Man takes his night out of every twenty-four hours; and vegetation needs to sleep as much as men. And as through all the spring, and summer, and autumn, they sleep not, but work perpetually, God gives them a rest-period of months together; and Winter is its name. And forests and orchards sleep, or nearly sleep, taking their rest in larger measure and at longer intervals than man takes his. And I know not how one can reflect upon these things, and not have moral feelings awakened within him.

Then come the elements of beauty. The brilliant days of winter are not surpassed by any days. The forms of hills are never so clear cut as at times they are during this season. There are days when it seems as though the earth were carved in marble before your eyes. There never was such beauty of form as is presented by the sprays, the branches, the limbs of the trees in the field, or of the shrubbery that surrounds one's dwelling in winter. Then there is the beauty of the snow; of the pictures of ice frescoed on the walks and on the windows, which in design and execution are enough to throw any Rembrandt into despair; of the crystals that robe the trees with gorgeous splendour. And who can behold all these elements of beauty, and not have some effect produced upon him?

Then there is a beauty of storms—a solemnity of beauty that tends to sober the light-hearted and frivolous. For my part, I am very much in sympathy with the Scandinavians, whose theology was rude and turbulent, because they lived in the countries of the far north, where the most soul-stirring influences were storms and tempests. They read of God in these. And I never stand and look at the murky air and the infinite particles that, falling from the clouds, are caught by the fierce wind, and swept hither and thither through wide circuits, that I am not lifted up toward Him that is full of power and full of grace, though He is invisible, and his works are mysterious.

Finally come the signs of ending winter—beautiful still, and to the very last. The recession of darkness, the advance of light, the lengthening of days both ways, snows more infrequent, thawings more and more continuous, the emergence of the ground from its long sleep and covering, tokens of growth in the ruddy forms of the tree-tops; and, last of all, who ever forgets that thrill, on some bright day, such as the trumpet gives to the sleeping soldier, except that it addresses itself to the taste and to the affections, and not to the battle feelings, when the first blue-bird carols out of the tree, when the first sparrow appears, when the first meadow-lark comes, when the first robin greets the vision? I mark down in my calendar the days of the coming of the first birds. They are days of rich experience. Beautiful as the winter was, impressive as it was, instructive as it was, glad as I was to see it, happy as I was in much of it, there is a sense of triumph and ecstasy as it is driven away, and the earth comes forth again in the garb of spring, and God sends his birds to sing pæans of victory.

Thus much through the imagination; for this is mostly an appeal to the imagination.

3. Let us now pass to some considerations of the effects which winter works in the way of political economy. It may perhaps seem strange to you that I should say that God has made the winter in the nature of a church, organized, and ordained, and fixed in sky and earth. The lowest condition of man is that in which he lives for the present only, and so by the senses. The very first step of civilisation is that which compels a human being to begin to act for a future period; to begin to act for himself in another and invisible condition—that is, in a future day.

Now, in the growing latitudes, there is in every man's year a period of from two to five months in which he can gather nothing from the ground, although the hunter and the fisher may gather something from wood and water. The majority of men in such latitudes are under circumstances in which they are instructed that eight months of the year must be employed in providing for the other four months. In other words, God says to every man, by the voice of cold, by the voice of hunger, by the scourge of necessity, 'Have faith, and learn to have it. Believe in things that you cannot see. Provide in the present for the future.' Every need is cast in such a mould as to be a school in which men are compelled to civilise themselves.

From this results, first, foresight; for what is foresight but the first germinant element of faith itself? It is the use of the upper faculties, in distinction from the lower. Living by sight is living by the senses; and living by faith is living by the higher reason, or forelooking, or foresight. Although it is in a rude form, foresight is the first-fruit of winter in the year.

Then, next, this foresight must be conjoined with self-denial. What is self-denial? It is doing or not doing something with reference to a higher future good. Every man is by nature willing to do easy things; but there stands a stern necessity for men to form the habit of being willing to do things now that are not easy, for the sake of benefits which will be realized by and by; to forego enjoyments in the present for the sake of experiencing enjoyments in the future.

Next is joined to these the eminently moralizing element of frugality and carefulness, which leads to considerateness and reflectiveness of every part of life, making a man divide his time and use it discreetly, under the laws and canons of just reason.

Frugality and carefulness, with foresight and self-denial, are results of being obliged to provide in two-thirds of the year for one-third of the year.

To these are added industry and zeal therein. A methodized industry, that shall give employment to the faculties steadily from day to day, is one of the most civilising and one of the most moralizing of all the influences that can be brought to bear upon a man.

How multitudinous are the results of that provision by which God compels men to lay up during some months of the year those things which are needed during the other months! and how beneficent is that provision, since it lays the foundation in men for a religious character!

These things are fixed in the very constitution of nature. When we look upon nature, and trace it, we say, 'How much better is summer than winter!' but we must remember that winter is the cause of making summer an instrument of moral education to mankind. This will appear still further on.

4. I wish to speak of the great blessings that winter produces in domestic affairs. In summer the family is more or less scattered. Men live out of doors largely during the hot season. This has its advantages, but it leaves out important elements. I may go so far as to say that no nation ever had the family in so rich a state as the Anglo-Saxon nation. A nation without a winter in their year never had a family institution, according to our ideas of a family institution; and if they ever do have, it will be because it is framed and fashioned where there is a winter, and then transmitted by sympathy or example. The Teutonic races are marked in the power and the blessings of domestic institutions.

But see how this is. Winters in our northern latitudes shut in men from much journeying. They make it impossible for them to find their pleasures out of doors. The nights are long; and though they may be occasionally irradiated by social gatherings, yet, in the main, parents and children are in the house by themselves. And they learn to love each other. And living in an atmosphere of love, which exists nowhere else so purely and so beneficently as in the family, they are saturated by it, and ripened in it. And industries there thrive under the best conditions. There, as part provision against ennui or indolence, are readings and games. And so it comes to pass, that, from being shut up during three or four months of the year in the house, we get a family institution that stands out more prominently than that of any other nation. And it all comes from the circumstances of the structure of the year in the climate in which we happen to live.

Go farther south; go to Italy, or middle Europe, where the people spend their time more out of doors than indoors, and you will find that the family changes in the proportion in which you go north or south, and that it is outdoorness or indoorness that makes families as we understand them, or families as more southern nations understand them.

And as for me, I thank God for every wintry storm that drives men into the house, and keeps them there, and makes them live together. I thank God for the necessity that there is of providing for winter all through the summer. I thank God for the influences of winter in developing an economy that brings out the affections of our natures, and makes the heart deep, and sanctifies the reason. If winter did no more than accomplish these things, independent of its natural results, it would be a blessing for which we could never praise God enough.

There is one other relation which I may mention while I am on this subject, and then I will let you take a trial of winter again. I mean the relation of this season to health. My belief is, that man is a unit, and that, when you separate body and soul, you do that which God never did, and which you cannot do with any more safety to a true philosophy than to the life of an individual. Man must be considered, in this state of being, as a body and a soul tempered together; and no analysis can separate them properly. And where a man is rugged, strong, and healthy in body, he is apt to be rugged, strong, and healthy in reason, conscience, and the affections. Where men are comparatively enervate in body, where their bones are soft, and their muscles are relaxed, and their nerves are weak, you will find that their minds are feeble.

Now vigour comes with cold, or with that necessity for exertion which cold inspires. There is tonic in it. It is invigorating.

Civic energy will be found to reside largely in those regions where cold comes. We all know what has made New England what she is. It is not the depth of her summer, but the depth of her winter. It is not her heats, but her colds. It is true that many die in that section; but it is just as true that those who are not killed are fit to live. It is true that many there are carried away by consumption; but it is just as true that it is owing to a want of knowledge with regard to proper clothing and the best methods of heating houses. The mortality there may be diminished to almost any extext by enlightenment on these points.

There can be no question, if men be not pushed too far into winter, if winter be not too long, that this recurrence of the cold season of the year brings up the conditions of physical mankind. While it is teaching, as I have said, various civic, and social, and moral truths, it is also giving to man a gun-carriage on which he can carry the mighty artillery of the mind. For a man that has a big mind and a puny body is like a fifteen-inch gun without any carriage, or with one that is so poor, that at every discharge it is knocked into a heap.

It is well to praise the godlike qualities of the mind; but a man that has a mind and no body is like a candle without a candlestick to support it.

Therefore there is in the simple circumstance of winter a display of the wisdom of Providence. We see it in the vigour of the body. We see it in the hardihood that it inspires.

I will tell you where legislators, and schoolmasters, and leading merchants, and men of power are to come from. They are to come from those regions where, during four months of the year, men's breaths freeze. It is men that come from these regions that are to give the law. You may rebel, you may shudder, you may reason and speculate as much as you please; but it is true. God was up in this world before any of you; and He made his laws to suit himself; and one of those laws is, that where winter is just long enough, and not too long, there shall be the strongest conditions of manhood, the highest state of society, and the purest developments of morality.

Then do not curse storms. Remember that they are symbols of nature. Do not forget that there is a wide reach to these symbols. And bear in mind that, much as is taught in the Bible, the Bible is not the only medium through which God has instructed mankind. The Bible is but like a signboard, a finger-point, saying, 'Look into the heavens and the earth, where God still gives instructions to those that would hear them.'

One word more. I see, coming up upon the earth, a mist filled with all forms of fear; and, to my terror, I see, as distinctly as though I were a prophet, that the tendency is to pantheism or atheism, and that it means to literalize nature, to denude it of order, and to give us bones and chemical elements, and nothing else. Against this terrible tendency, that will make life drear, that will make the soul a desert, that will make religion apocalyptic, and that will make all of man's hopes as a dream when one waketh—against this I set, as a cure and a remedy, the habit of cultivating poetic associations with all the phenomena of nature. Morning, noon, and night, cold and heat, winter and summer, the fertile fields and the barren sands, the surging sea and the sounding storm, all that there is in the round year, may say something to you higher than of themselves. Their voice may seem to be some echo from the spirit land; may bring some thought of the boundless realms of immortality; may wake in you some feelings that will not be satisfied with the alembic or measurer's rule; may make nature say to you, from day to day, 'God is Father, ye are his children; and life and immortality are bright beyond, because Christ has brought them to light.'—Beecher.

THE FIRST LIE RECORDED IN GOD'S BOOK OF TRUTH.

'And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die.'—GEN. iii. 4.

'GOD cannot lie.' The faithful and true witness testifies, 'Thy word is truth.' Yet God hath recorded many lies in his word; and we may with truth say, that every lie ever spoken is written down by Him. He does this because He is a holy God and a just judge.

A liar is a moral antipodes to God. A lie is an offence against God's omniscience. Its language is, 'Tush! doth God see, and is there knowledge in the Most High?' What a world of lies has this been in all ages! what an awful judgment scene will close its career! Then all unrepentant 'liars must have their part in the lake of fire,' with Satan, who was a liar from the beginning.

The above text contains the first recorded lie. It was a bold one, in direct contradiction of God. Yet it was believed and acted on. But mark, it was prefaced by a subtle question, conveying an insinuation, and it was wrapped up in a charge against God, and compliment to the creature; and these were calculated to produce discontent and to foster pride.

It was a murderous lie. Received into the heart, it became a swift and powerful poison, and has spread death through the ocean of human life.

The great truth of the gospel, 'that whosoever believeth on Christ shall not perish, but have eternal life,' is the only thing that can save from the consequences of this one lie. This can expel the poison, and restore to the soul a better life than Satan took away.

But we may be quite sure that the great enemy will labour hard to prevent the souls he hath ruined from receiving the remedy. He tells the multitude, 'Ye shall not surely die,' if ye reject the gospel. Go your way to your farms, your merchandise, your enjoyments, your scientific pursuits, and sensual pleasures. God will not punish you with everlasting destruction. He tells the concerned and anxious soul, There is time enough yet—enjoy the world awhile; or else, 'There is no hope for such as you.' Let us all beware of Satan's 'not,' and simply trust the immutable 'shall' of a faithful God.

LATE SNOWDROPS.

WHY droop ye so,
Pale children of the tempest and the snow—
The first-fruits of the spring,
Feathers just fallen from her flying wing?
Do ye regret
The star-crown that the frost about you set,
Or are ye jealous of the violet?
Lift up your heads;
For now bright summer at a distance treads,
And through the arches dark,
Where grow the dank, cool mosses on the bark,
And from the thickets, where the ringdoves meet,
We hear the echoes of her hastening feet.
Poor falterers! ye can but vainly wait,
So simple-hearted, in such virgin guise,
With modest, downcast eyes,
Patient and trembling, at her golden gate.
We love you none the less—
Rather the more—for ye come out alone;
Ye are our friends when all the rest are gone;
And timidly our lonely feet caress,
Even as they
That do not in the winter fall away.
Love such as yours,
That through the sharp times of the frost endures,
And changes not, for all the changing skies,
We are too slow to prize.
Yet we will not forget
The pale sweet face, with early tear-drops wet,
Lifted to ours,
Because of finer flowers.
E'en now ye droop and die,
And take your simple farewell of the sky;
E'en now your weary heads
Lie here and there upon the mossy beds;
No summer-air
Shall bring your blossoms back where once they were;
No autumn-rain
Shall ever waken you to life again;
Your very trace shall pass,
And vanish like a shadow from the grass:
Yet shall your memory live—
The rather for the solace that ye give,
Making our hearts glad with the thought of spring,
When earth can spare no other living thing;
And when, next year, amid the fallen snow,
We see you, where before ye used to grow,
Ye shall come back as they
That have been absent only for a day.

—Weedon.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

HEB. XI. 24–26.

MOSES had everything to bind him to Egypt, to Pharaoh, to Pharaoh's house; ties of silk, chains of gold; natural affection, gratitude, learning, pleasure, love of ease, pomp, splendour, riches; everything that the flesh desires, that the intellect covets, and that the world contains. For what was there in the world, of glory, pleasure, learning, pomp, and power, that were not to be found in Egypt?

Yet he broke every tie; he came out; he separated himself; he ceased to touch the unclean thing; he flung aside the riches of Egypt, and trampled on the crown of Pharaoh.

What prompted this severance? Was he a disappointed man? Had his life been a failure? Had Egypt used him coldly? Was there no prospect of rising in it? Had its pleasures run dry, or its riches failed? No. These were not his reasons. But he had met with something better than all these. It was this which disentangled his feet, and which broke the bonds.

Yet that which had come across his path was not a new thing. As an Israelite, he had known it long; but now his eyes had been opened to see it aright. Nor was it a noble thing or honourable in the eyes of men. It was known as a reproach—a matter of scorn. It is called 'the reproach of Christ,' or the reproach attaching to all who held Israel's hope of a coming Messiah. This hope was a mockery and a derision to all in Egypt. Yet it was this derided hope which Moses took hold of, 'preferring it to all the treasures of Egypt.'

This was, if not Moses' conversion, at least the turning-point in his life, when he was compelled to make an open choice. We know not what was the occasion, but it brought matters to a crisis. It compelled him to decide for Jehovah or for Osiris, for Christ or for the false worship of the Egyptian temples. It was faith that led him and enabled him to make the choice; faith that saw through the falsehoods of heathen idolatry, and the vanities of human pleasure and learning; faith that saw the realities of divine truth and joy, as centred in Him who, even when seen afar off, was 'the way, and the truth, and the life.'

What, then, does faith accomplish for us? and how? and when?

As to the when, we may answer, the moment that it comes into action by the power of the Holy Ghost. In its state of death, or dormancy, it effects nothing, whatever its words or professions may be. Has the when in your life come yet, O man? or is it still a futurity, an uncertainty? When art thou to believe, and to act upon what thou believest?

As to the how, we answer, it 'is the substance of things hoped for.' It is thus that it operates. It gives to the future its proper magnitude, to the present its proper littleness, to the heavenly things their true fulness, to the earthly their true emptiness. It sets all things on their right basis, and represents everything in its true proportions.

As to the what, the answers are endless. What is there that faith cannot do? It does everything for us. But the special thing noted in our text, is the change of choice and estimate.

I. His change of choice.—He chooses affliction and oppression. He chooses degradation and hardship. He chooses them deliberately, joyfully, and not by compulsion. He chooses his company, 'the people of God,' as distinguished from Egypt and from earth. With them he casts in his lot, for better or for worse. In making this choice, he has to reject what the world calls pleasure—the pleasures—the short-lived pleasures of sin. From them he turns away. They are worthless and unenduring, as well as evil. He had once chosen them; now he chooses them not.

II. His change of estimate.—'Esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches.' Faith alters the value of everything to us. That value in itself is incapable of change, but to us it is altered. What we once esteemed, we esteem no more; what we disesteemed, we now prize, and honour, and love. Faith applies new tests to everything, and finds dross in what it counted gold, and gold in what it counted dross. It changes our estimate—

(1) Of sin; (2) Of self; (3) Of righteousness; (4) Of Scripture; (5) Of God; (6) Of Christ; (7) Of earth; (8) Of heaven. The aspect of all these things is altered to us. They are not what they were to us, and we are not what we were to them. We no longer call evil good, and good evil.

Or, to use another figure, faith is the great unveiler. It takes off the mask, or veil, or covering from every object, and shows them to us as they are. There are two kinds of veils, or masks, on everything here—bright and dark. The former hides deformity, and makes objects appear fairer than they are; the latter hides beauty, and makes objects appear uncomely. Faith removes both of these. It takes off the bright veil—(1) From earthly pleasure; (2) From worldly riches; (3) From human learning; (4) Royal glory. It shows us the dark interior, the hollowness of all these. It does not misrepresent them or belie them, but simply removes the unreal attractions which deceived and misled us. It does not under-estimate, yet it does not over-estimate. It takes off the dark veil—(1) From Christ, and shows Him to us as 'altogether lovely;' (2) From holiness, and shows us what a blessed thing it is to be holy; (3) From the kingdom to come, and shows us what a recompense of reward it is—how infinitely better than this present evil world; (4) From the church of God, showing us what a glory belongs to her, though it doth not now appear what she shall be; (5) From reproach and affliction, showing us how good it is to be afflicted; how honourable to be reproached for Christ, and as He was.

Thus faith works. It does wonders in us, and for us, and through us. It separates us from the world. It brings us out of the haunts of vanity; it leads us out of the ball-room, and the theatre, and the gay party; it shows us better riches, better pleasures, and a brighter glory than the world contains.

ANOTHER GOSPEL.*

THE Bible tells us there is one perfect and complete atonement, namely that made by Jesus upwards of eighteen centuries ago, upon a cross erected in Judea, by them that hated and persecuted Him unto the death. What He then and there did, extends its efficacy into the remotest ages of the world. 'His blood,' in the language of Scripture, 'cleanseth from all sin.' There is no sin from which it will not cleanse; there is no sinner upon earth to whom it is not available. Any system which professes to dispense with this distinctive fact in Christianity, or to dissolve it in the subtleties of a transcendental philosophy, or to reason it away as a thing improbable, introduces necessarily another gospel. And any system that places side by side with it an atonement offered by man, or professes to reiterate and continue this atonement offered once for all upon the cross, or to make expiation on a table which they call an altar, by a man whom they miscall a priest, so far introduces another gospel, and is an apostasy or departure from the faith once delivered to the saints.

There is only one perfect righteousness by which we are justified in the sight of God. The law remains undiluted and unrepealed; it demands as the condition of our having a right to heaven, or being delivered from the penal consequences of sin, that we shall perfectly keep it, which no human being ever did or ever can; for 'it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps,' much less to keep perfect God's holy law. If, then, we have not observed it, if we cannot keep it, is there any one that God has accepted who has kept it for us? We read that 'He that knew no sin was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God by Him.' Luther well defined this doctrine of justification by faith in the righteousness of Christ alone, as the article of a standing or a falling church. The grand provision of the gospel is not reparation accomplished in us, or reparation to the law accomplished by us; but a perfect righteousness provided for us, offered to us, unto all, and upon all that believe. If this be fact, to hold that any penances we can perform, any tortures prescribed by a priest or otherwise that we endure, any toils that we may go through, any sums we choose to give, any sacrifices we make, are contributions to our title to heaven, is to dislodge the sovereign supremacy of this great truth, and to introduce another gospel.

There is one only way to heaven. That way is neither a church, nor a chapel, nor a priest, nor a prelate, nor a pope. Christ says, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life.' And the church, whatever branch of it it may be, is not to proclaim itself the way, and to say, 'You cannot be saved except by this church;' but it is to witness to Christ as the Way, and to say, 'Look to Him; walk ye in it.' It is easy to find a way to the Creator. One can scarcely look upon the opening buds of spring, or up to the starry sky, or to the structure of our own frame, without seeing a Creator. And it is very easy to find a way to the Legislator; but when you have found your way to Him, it is to the burning fire and the sound of words that even Moses could not endure. But this way is a way to the Father, to our Father. And, thank God, there are no rocks to be cloven, no mountains to be rent, no firths to be spanned, no oceans to be traversed. It is nigh thee, even at the door. The great Pacific of time, and the great Atlantic of eternity, are united and made one. Jesus Christ is the way from earth's deepest descent upward to heaven's highest throne. It matters not how near you go to it. If you are not on it, you are not in the way to heaven. It is not uncharitableness, it is not bigotry; it is love, and faithfulness, and truth, to say there is but one way to heaven; that way not the monopoly of any church upon earth, but the proclamation of the great guide-book, the Bible—Jesus Christ, the Way, the Truth, and the Life. It was an awful and blasphemous pretension, when the Pope, in a recent Allocution, told the assembled cardinals and prelates of Rome, 'I am the way, the truth, and the life.' And yet when he did so, he did exactly as becomes the vice-Christ. For I may tell you ANTI-CHRIST does not mean one opposed to Christ; it means one who takes the place of Christ.

It is not another in the right sense, but another in the wrong sense of the word, which seeks to put away good works. It is the apostle of justification by faith alone in the atonement of Christ alone who uses with great emphasis the words, 'Do we then make void the law? God forbid; yea, rather we establish the law.' What are good works? Fruits fragrant with love. What is the fulfilling of the law? 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy strength, and with all thy mind.' What does a man, therefore, mean to say who wishes to be absolved from the privilege of doing good? He wishes to be absolved from loving God. A man that does not wish to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God, is a man that does not wish to love God.

* From Ritualism, the Highway to Rome. By Dr. J. CUMMING. London: J. Nisbet and Co.

What is Romanism? Another or a corrupt gospel. It retains all the truths of Christianity, and boasts that it is therefore scriptural, apostolic, divine; but instantly appends to them all the doctrines and traditions which overlay the living truths, darken and utterly destroy them. Hence the creed of Pius the Fourth begins with the Nicene Creed—a creed composed in A.D. 325; a most beautiful and scriptural creed as any Protestant could subscribe. But after it has quoted the Articles of the Nicene Creed, it then adds other thirteen Articles, which thirteen Articles constitute the distinctive tenets of the Roman Catholic Church. Romanism is another gospel. It is the word of God made void by the traditions of men; it is Christ superseded by the false Christ, the Antichrist. It is the sacrament turned into an atoning sacrifice; it is the minister perverted into a sacrificing priest; it is the leading and precious truths of Protestant Christianity, which is the Christianity of the Bible, perverted and overlaid, till the truths that save become the errors that destroy; and men, losing the light of the stars of heaven, grope onward by the guide-posts of the earth.

What is Ritualism, as it is called? It is the thing Romanism in all its intensity, while they that teach it and practise it disavow the name. It is Romanism without the name, and I must add, without the splendid consistency of Romanism. The Roman Catholic system is a huge consistency—a piece of perfect mosaic, well fastened, complete and compact; but Ritualism is an inconsistency, and not only an inconsistency—it is the scandalous spectacle of men who have subscribed a Protestant creed, and repeat the prayers of a Protestant liturgy, introducing, and practising, and exhibiting the most entire conformity to Roman Catholic rites, usages, and superstition. Ritualism is Romanism badly done. A priest performs perfectly; he is 'to the manner born;' he has been brought up to it; and he is not hampered by his conscience whispering to him, This is a Protestant place of worship. He is in his own place, and on his own ground. But a Ritualist minister must be awkward, because conscience must always remind him, This place and that teaching are not in harmony. This place was built by Latimer, and Ridley, and Cranmer; and that preaching is the very thing for disavowing which they were burned at the stake. Hence, Ritualism is Romanism badly done. The Ritualist minister is a Roman Catholic priest not up to his business, doing the thing awkwardly. The way they swing the censer is awkward; the way they genuflect is awkward; the way they elevate the host is awkward: they cannot do any of these well. It is not their business.

What is Rationalism? Another gospel, and a gospel very prevalent in the present day. It is the gospel of Christ brought down and laid upon the Procrustes bed of a spurious philosophy; the gospel adapted to the philosophy, not the philosophy adapted to the gospel. It is retaining the name of Christianity, and undermining it. Romanism adds what is human to what is divine, and corrupts the Bible; Rationalism subtracts what is divine from the Bible, and leaves it deprived of its most glorious and distinctive truths. The three—Rationalism, Ritualism, and Romanism—all looking with side-glances at each other, in order to deceive you, when they come to compare notes, and to trace each other's history, and ancestry, and objects, and aims, they find they are sisters. Rationalism batters down the walls of the citadel, what Archbishop Manning calls 'the fortress of heresy' in this country; Ritualism plants flowers and scatters perfumes by the wayside, and performs many genuflexions, and displays beautiful colours, and emblazoned banners, amid Gregorian music, making the highway to Rome attractive; and Romanism marches in, and takes possession of the fortress.

'If we, or an angel from heaven.' Here is the practical lesson for us to learn. The apostle puts a case hypothetically. He says, 'If we.' What we? We just returned from the gates of Damascus; we, who have just recovered our sight, after being struck down with the excess of glory; if we, who have been up in the third heaven, and seen sights that words cannot express; if we, who have preached the gospel amid trials and perils by land, and perils by sea, and perils among false brethren,—'If we,' an apostle, 'preach to you any other gospel,' what are you to do? Do not burn him—that is the attribute of Rome; do not malign him—that is wicked and unhallowed; but give him a wide berth, if I may use a sea phrase; keep him at a distance from you, and you as far off as you can possibly keep yourself from him. If it is just possible that an apostle may preach another gospel, is it uncharitable or illogical to infer that an apostle's successor may preach another gospel, and that we are not discourteous if we treat the apostle's successor as the apostle bids us treat himself if he were left to preach to us another gospel? But secondly, this passage implies that there may be great moral excellence allied to error. 'If we,' the apostle, 'or an angel from heaven.' If he had said an angel from hell (for Satan is transformed into an angel of light); if he had said Satan, one could easily feel the force of it. But he says, 'Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you.' Now what does this imply? It implies that moral worth may be allied on the side of immensely destructive errors. The devil is a master strategist; he has had the experience of six thousand years in carrying on his warfare. He never selects a morally bad man to teach great errors. Read ecclesiastical history, and you will find that the worst errors that have been broached in the church have not been broached by laymen even, or by bad and immoral priests, but generally by men remarkable for the high tone of their moral character, and for their unimpeachable and consistent conduct before the church and the world. Therefore we are warned not to think the teaching must be true because the man's life is moral. An angel from heaven is the highest exponent of celestial morality. But more than that, it implies also that there will be great genius. The apostle says, 'If we have the tongue of angels:' that means great eloquence. The devil will never employ a very bad speaker to teach and preach deadly error. He will select the best instruments for the work he wishes to accomplish. And we may therefore expect that not only will the successors, as they assume to be, of the apostles, but that men holy as angels, or with the tongues of angels, and eloquent only as angels can be, will one day preach another gospel. No wonder that the Saviour says, 'So that, if it were possible, they should deceive the very elect.'

What is the use of telling us, 'If an apostle or an angel from heaven preach to you another gospel,' if we have no means of ascertaining what the gospel is? The apostle himself tells us: 'If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received;' and in the other verse, 'Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you.' In the one case, it is what we have preached; in the other case, it is what ye have received. Now where do we find what the apostle preached? In this book. Where do we find what ye have received? In this book. What is, therefore, the teaching of this text? That we are to test an apostle's successor's teaching, the teaching of an angel from heaven, not by their moral worth, not by the greatness of their eloquence, but by its conformity or nonconformity to what is written in this inspired book.

(To be continued.)

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER XI.

FOUR years slipped quickly and happily by with the young Harleys, and few were the changes that had taken place amongst them. True, they had grown taller and stouter, and the elder ones could be no longer called children, for Tom prided himself upon being five feet eight inches high, and Constance was as tall as her mamma; even Dora felt rather piqued if designated 'little,' declaring she was the same height as Madge Allen, who was but a wee bit shorter than Constance. Nurse had married and gone to live in the country, and old nurse still reigned supreme in the nursery, with Mary to assist her. Agnes had become a most loveable child, and more of a companion to Dora than Constance, being her constant associate, sharing with her the schoolroom by day, and sleeping in Johnny's inner room at night.

Tom continued at Lotsirl College, but as a pupil in the first division or upper school, instead of the middle one. He was just the same impetuous, straightforward, honourable lad as when first introduced to the reader's notice; rather fond of over much fun, as Doctor Cote frequently told him, when a practical joke got him into occasional trouble. Constance remained a daily pupil at Miss Hughes', Mr. and Mrs. Harley considering it was better for her to mix with girls of her own age, as she was naturally proud of her own attainments, and needed to find that there were others equal, if not superior, to herself abroad, if not at home. Madge Allen had worked her way bravely, and was in the same class with Constance, her four years at school having greatly improved her; even her Aunt Gay allowing that she really had turned out better than she ever thought she would. Mr. Harley's spirits were very much better, and his fits of melancholy were few and far between, never excluding Dora from his presence; for at all times she was a welcome visitor to his rooms, and when he was indisposed, assisted her aunt in waiting on him.

The fourth midsummer was drawing speedily near, and again Madge Allen was expected to pass her holidays at Chelsea Place. Colonel Allen had written, saying he hoped to return soon to England, and should settle down at Lotsirl if the place agreed with him; but the exact period of his coming back was not quite decided on. Tom was working very hard, spending his lesson hours in his papa's study, that he might meet with fewer hindrances, and all looked bright and prosperous with the Harleys; when suddenly—so suddenly, that they could scarcely believe the reality of the visitation—adversity overtook them, and riches made themselves wings and flew away. A joint-stock concern, in which Mr. Harley had invested the greater part of his property, had failed, and he woke one morning to discover that he was twenty thousand pounds poorer than he believed himself to be the previous night.

Mr. Harley was thoroughly overcome with the intelligence; but Mrs. Harley cared less for the money than the effect the losing of it might have upon her husband. With a calmness scarcely to be supposed, she set herself immediately to the task of retrenching expenditure. She gathered Dora, Agnes, Tom, and Constance around her, telling them of their change in circumstances, and that henceforth each must assist the other, as there would be no longer servants to wait upon them, and that she hoped they would all let papa see that it was not having all their wants supplied which made them happy, but the pleasure of belonging to one family, and being united in the bonds of love. The first thought that entered the young Harleys' minds, and found utterance after their mamma's sad communication, was:

'Oh! must we leave Chelsea Place, mamma?'

'No, my dears, not at present, certainly. It is our own house, and that, with some money settled on me at my marriage, God has mercifully spared to us.'

'So you see, my dears,' she said cheerfully, 'we have much to be thankful for. Many, I fear, who had money in the same concern as papa, will perhaps be left totally destitute, whilst we have supplies for what is needful, but not for luxuries. So now, run away, I must have a talk with old nurse before dismissing those whom I have no longer a right to retain.' Constance, Dora, and Agnes, immediately complied; but Tom lingered behind, until they had left the room: then going up to his mother, he threw his arms round her neck, whispering:

'Tell me all, mamma; is it very bad?'

'Bad for you, my boy, not for us,' she replied, as she returned his embrace.

'But for papa?'

'Not if we can let him see it does not make us unhappy.'

Tom could not trust himself to say more; for that odd, choking ball that he had complained of to Dora years before rose in his throat; so, giving his mother another kiss and hug, he darted off. Later in the day, Tom was closeted a good while with Doctor Cote; and when he emerged from the master's sanctum, determination was more legibly stamped upon his face than it had ever been before. From the time of that conversation, Tom rose with the sun, and went to bed as late as he possibly could, depriving himself of all amusements; a short walk with his father being all the recreation he permitted himself. Evidently, Tom had an object in view, which needed all his energy and powers of mind to attain.

Old nurse was at first greatly distressed, when Mrs. Harley informed her of their reverse of fortune; but she declared her day's work was not nigh done, and so her dear lady should find, and that nought but death should part them in this world. 'I have eat of your bread and drank of your cup this many a year,' she said. 'I have nursed you and yours from the birth. You are all on ye like my own flesh and blood; and I have but one wish in the world, and that is, to have some one of ye by me when I close my eyes on this world. You and I, Mrs. Harley, mustn't part; 'twould kill me outright.'

Mrs. Harley had foreseen that her faithful old nurse would find it hard to leave her; but she had had no idea that her attachment would be so decidedly expressed. It had been a great relief to her mind to remember that old nurse was provided for by her own excellent father, who, when he died, had left her thirty pounds a year for her life; and that provision, with what she might have saved, Mrs. Harley knew would amply procure for her the comforts she might require in her old age. But when nurse determined to share with them in their weal or woe, Mrs. Harley burst into tears, and sinking into a chair, gave vent to her pent-up feelings by having a good cry.

'Don't ye do it—dont'e cry, my own dear Mrs. Harley,' sobbed the old woman, whose tears dropped on her mistress as she bent over and tried to console her. 'I can mind Guy, and mend the clothes, and wash up tea-things and glasses, and help tend the door. Oh! there's lots of strength in me yet; come, do let me see you look like my own dear lady. The Lord is for us, and who can be against us, praised be his holy name, Amen!'

'Amen,' repeated Mrs. Harley, as she strove to regain her wonted composure.

In the meanwhile, Dora, Constance, and Agnes were consulting together what they could do to help mamma and papa; they had yet to learn that their doing and helping would consist in faithfully performing small duties—the little things of life, in which the true happiness of home must ever consist. Dora soon crept off to her uncle's room, and was speedily admitted; one great comfort to Mr. Harley, in his trouble, being the thought that Dora's property was safe, it having remained where her father had placed it before his death.

'Where are the rest?' he inquired, as she stood by his side, with her hand lying in his.

'Constance is looking over her lessons, and Agnes is playing with Guy. Tom was with aunt when she sent us away. I don't know where he is now.'

'My poor boy!' groaned Mr. Harley. 'There's no college for you now.'

'No college, uncle? Will not Tom be able to go to school?'—school coming quite under Dora's idea of her aunt's necessaries.

'Yes, to Lotsirl for a time, Dora; but not to Oxford or Cambridge, when he leaves Lotsirl,' explained Mr. Harley.

'Never mind, uncle,' said Dora encouragingly, 'Tom will do without. He is our brave old Tom, and we could not get on without him a bit. He will be best here.'

Mr. Harley smiled, as Dora applied the term

'old' to Tom, who was but a little past sixteen, and then sighed to think how soon Tom's battle in life must begin.

'Please do not sigh, uncle,' whispered Dora, putting her arms round his neck. 'Tom is very clever, and they say clever people always get on. And oh! dear uncle, we'd rather have Tom than all the money in the world; would not we?'

Dora had unconsciously touched the right spring, and instantly her uncle recognised the hand of love and mercy, which, whilst taking away one blessing, had left so many behind. 'Oh,' he thought, 'had God taken my children and left me my money, what would have become of me and my dear wife!' And to the surprise of Dora, he rose from his chair, and taking a little braided cap, which he frequently wore when alone, from off his head, said fervently, 'I thank Thee, O Lord, for all the mercies Thou hast vouchsafed to me and mine.' Then, turning to Dora, he bade her find Tom and send him to him; but Tom was not to be found, for he had gone to school.

Universal regret was expressed by the servants as Mrs. Harley gave them a month's notice, but said she would wish them to leave at the end of a week, as she was desirous of entering upon her new arrangements as speedily as possible, and that she had no doubt that they would have no difficulty, with their good characters, in getting situations quickly. Mary begged to be allowed to stay, saying she was willing to turn her hand to anything if Mrs. Harley would but try her; and, by nurse's advice, she was retained as house and parlour maid, a good plain cook or general servant having to be engaged as her companion in the kitchen.

At the end of a week the changes had been made in Mr. Harley's household, and Mrs. Harley found herself mistress of two servants instead of six; old nurse being looked upon as a friend, not a domestic. As nurse had said, 'there was plenty of work in her yet,' and so she proved; for it is doubtful if all would have been arranged so comfortably and easily had she not been able to manage matters for Mrs. Harley until she got accustomed to the alterations. Guy nearly always spent his mornings in the schoolroom, and it was decided that for the future he was always to do so, that nurse might have the mornings to assist below stairs. Instead of two sets of meals, it was agreed that Mr. and Mrs. Harley should take theirs with and at the same time as the children—a plan which considerably lessened the work for the servants, and gave great satisfaction to the young people, who thought it so nice to have mamma and papa with them. But for the shade of anxiety on Mrs. Harley's face, and more frequent fits of depression on Mr. Harley's part, it would have scarcely been known there had been a change at 6, Chelsea Place, so speedily and noiselessly had it been effected.

CHAPTER XII.

At first the young Harleys fully expected to find some manifest difference in their manner of living, extending to the food they ate. Loss of money, or want of money, entailed poverty; and poverty, in their sight, was the deprivation of food and clothing. Mrs. Harley had told them, that God had mercifully spared to them a sufficiency for needful things; but then they could not tell what were really necessaries, and, for some days after they had been acquainted with Mr. Harley's misfortune, they anxiously watched to discover what were the unnecessary requirements which had to be relinquished. However, when they found that they had the same good plain food, and that the difference to them consisted in having less pocket-money, and seeing fewer servants around, they soon recovered their spirits, and went about the house as cheerful and happy as of old. Sometimes they had to be reminded that they must be careful not to increase the labour of the servants by carelessness, and that they must think, and wait upon themselves as much as possible.

These hints sank deep into Dora's mind, and she pondered over them, wondering what she could really do to make herself useful. After breakfast was schooltime until twelve o'clock; but then she had a full hour before breakfast for play, lessons being learned over-night: so Dora thought she might as well devote that hour to household duties, and thus help nurse and Mary. She had no idea that one sort of work was more proper for her than another; but having watched Mary one morning busy in the stairs, she determined to fill her place the next. So, rising a little earlier to have plenty of time, she managed to get a large apron of nurse's, which wrapped her round, and tying a coloured handkerchief over her head, she popped into Constance's room to show herself.

'Oh, Dora!' cried Constance, 'what a funny creature you do look! What are you going about?'

'House-work. Auntie said we must make ourselves useful; so I am going to help Mary.'

'Oh, do wait a minute for me, and get me a handkerchief and apron; there's a dear! It will be such fun.'

'I cannot stay now, or I shall not get my work done before breakfast, Conny,' replied Dora; 'you shall help me another day;' and off she darted.

It was not long before she had procured from the housemaid's cupboard, a brush and dust-pan, and was on her knees busily engaged brushing the stair carpet. And hard work she found it; for, not understanding how to use the brush, she scrubbed and rubbed too heavily, thereby occasioning unnecessary fatigue, and enveloping herself in a cloud of dust. Nothing daunted, she worked away with right good will, until a voice behind her said:

'Why, bless my heart, who's this?'

'Only me, nursey,' she answered, springing up, revealing to nurse a very hot, dusty face.

'Why, Miss Dora, what in the world are you thinking about? Jump up, I wouldn't that your aunt and uncle should see you for a sovereign—that I would not.'

'Why, it's no harm, nurse,' pleaded Dora.

'No, 'tis no harm; but 'tis not proper for a young lady like you, when there's servants to do it.'

'But auntie said you had all so much to do, and that we must be thoughtful and considerate, and help where we could; and so, you see, I thought I could manage the stairs every morning before breakfast for Mary.'

'Manage the stairs! Don't you let me catch you at them again, Miss Dora.'

'Don't be cross, nursey,' cried Dora, throwing her arms round the old woman's neck; 'I did not mean wrong.'

'I'll be bound you did not,' replied nurse, 'you are too good a girl for that. But you must not do those sort of jobs again; they are not fit for young ladies, especially you, Miss Dora.'

'Why especially me?' inquired Dora, opening her eyes.

'Because, my dear, you will have plenty of money some day, to pay servants to do them.'

'Plenty of money, nurse?'

'Yes, Miss Dora, when you are a young woman.'

'More than Tom, and Constance, and Agnes?'

'More than all of them put together.'

'Then why does not uncle use some of it, and keep on the servants, nursey, and let us be just like we were before he lost his money?'

'Because it is your money, not his, my dear; and it would not be right of him to touch it.'

Dora gave up the brush and dust-pan to nurse, and slowly returned to her room. Nurse's information had given her anything but pleasure. She did not want to be rich, she thought, unless uncle could have some of it. She'd rather be poor and useful. Besides, what would Constance and Tom say? She'd ask Uncle Bennett about it, when he came to Lotsirl. Perhaps he would be able to tell her how to get some of the money, to give Uncle Harley now. It would be so long before she would be a woman, and she did not want to be one either; no, she would rather be a young girl, and live with Uncle and Aunt Harley, and be poor like them. And Dora washed her face and hands, and brushed her hair, with a sore feeling about her heart—an uncomfortable something, which she could not define.

Uncle and Aunt Bennett had rented a house for a few weeks close to Chelsea Place, and were expected very soon to take possession of it. Mr. Bennett had spent a day at Lotsirl, after Mr. Harley's loss, and had then promised, as soon as his wife was well enough to bear a change, to take up his residence for a short period near them; and to this visit all the Harleys were anxiously looking forward. Mr. Harley particularly wished to consult with his brother-in-law about Dora. Up to the time of his misfortune, he had never touched the handsome allowance made for her maintenance and education, but had let it accumulate so as to increase her principal, when she should come of age, arguing that he had unhappily deprived her of her natural protector, and ought, therefore, as far as possible, to supply his brother's place, by letting her share in all the privileges of his own family. But now that his circumstances were reversed, he felt that he must henceforth receive the appointed salary if she remained with him; and he was not certain whether she ought to do so, now that his style of living was so altered. The thought of Dora's passing into other hands, caused Mr. and Mrs. Harley intense sorrow; yet they both had doubts whether the young girl, who would have more than £20,000 when she came of age, should be brought up in the quiet manner they were then obliged to adopt. To Mr. Bennett they both looked for advice and counsel, and by his decision had determined to abide.

Dora, perfectly unconscious of what was depending upon Uncle Bennett's visit, had, with her cousins, been counting the days for his arrival, and had that morning discovered another reason for wishing him to come to Lotsirl. Had she had the faintest idea of what importance his opinion would be to her, she would have been most miserable, and would have wished that she had been born without any money at all. It was in a very uncomfortable mood Dora betook herself to the study to see after Tom, who, she knew, would be preparing his lessons there. She did so want to tell him what nurse had said, and hear whether he knew anything about it; but when she entered the room, all thoughts of self vanished, as she saw Tom brooding over his books with a wet towel bound round his head.

'Oh Tom! dear Tom! what is the matter?' she exclaimed as she sprang to his side.

'Only that my head seems ready to split, Dora, and my brow throbs and burns so, that I thought a cold pad might do me good. You know mamma puts them on papa, when his head aches.'

'Yes,' replied Dora; 'but Tom?'

'What, little Wisdom?' he inquired, as he noticed her anxious face.

'Why, I do think you are killing yourself with those horrid books. Oh! please, do put them aside a bit.'

'I cannot for a few days longer. The examination will soon be over, and then I am entirely at the disposal of the sagacious owl, and robin redbreast.'

'Now, Tom,' said Dora, laying her hand upon his mouth. 'I won't be called an owl, for I am not a bit wise; but I do love you, and it worries me to see you make yourself ill. I will tell Madge how unkind you are. You will mind robin, if you do not me;' and Dora's eyes glistened rather more than usual.

Tom saw that tears were there, and drawing her closer to him, said in a kind though serious voice:

'Listen, Dora: before papa lost his money, I was working in hopes of winning a prize; since then, I have been working to win honour, and that honour is the stepping-stone to fortune. You would not hinder me, would you?'

'Oh no, no, Tom,' she cried, as she kissed him; 'not if it will not kill you, or make you bad,' she added, anxiously looking into his face, which was pale enough to justify her concern about him.

'Now run along, turtle dove, as you will not be designated owl. The breakfast-bell will ring in a few minutes, and I have not nearly finished my lessons.'

Dora turned aside, but not to leave the room; for she went and sat at the study window, apparently occupied with a book, but mentally calculating the advantages and disadvantages connected with the possession of money, or fortune, as Tom styled it; and her thoughts were anything but satisfactory. It was not until the first bell rang that Tom observed she was in the room, when he remarked, as he opened the door to leave it, 'Come along, Dora. Doves only coo and look melancholy; but owls meditate and reflect. You must be called owl after all.'

CHAPTER XIII.

In the course of a few days Mr. and Mrs. Bennett arrived at Lotsirl, to the delight of the Harleys, and more especially to Mr. Harley and Dora, who could not be reconciled to nurse's information about her having money. She had found no opportunity of holding communication with Tom on the subject, for he seemed to be busier than ever, and to Constance she could seldom open her heart. But when she saw Mr. Bennett enter the schoolroom, she knew that relief was near at hand; and it was with her brightest smile she gave him a welcome.

'Oh! Uncle Bennett,' she cried, as a short time after she met him crossing the hall; 'I have wanted you ever so badly this long while. I am so glad you are here at last. I do so want to talk to you about something very particular.'

'Very particular, Dora? What?—a real secret, or business affairs?' inquired Mr. Bennett, pretending to look very mystified.

'Now I will not have you laugh. Please don't,' said Dora imploringly, 'because it is about something which worries me very much.'

'Worries you, my child? Christians must not have them; they have a panacea against all worries. Let us step in here, and talk over this little fox which is eating the tender grapes. He must be cast out, or the Master's young plant will be seriously injured. We shall be as quiet as we please in here;' and Mr. Bennett threw open the dining-room door as he spoke.

'Uncle,' said Dora, as she seated herself beside him on the sofa, 'is it true that I shall have money some day?'

'Yes, my dear, most certainly,' he replied.

'Then is it not mine now?' she inquired.

'It is yours, and yet not yours,—that is, you cannot do anything with it until you are of age,' he explained, instantly divining Dora's thoughts.

'Until I am of age! Why, that is when I am twenty-one, is it not?'

'Yes.'

'And I am only a little over thirteen,' she sighed. 'More than seven years for me to wait. Oh dear! I am so sorry;' and she leaned wearily against Mr. Bennett's shoulder.

'Tell me what it is that grieves you, Dora, or what you wish to do,' he said kindly.

'Oh, uncle,' she replied, 'I did not know until lately that I had money; and nurse told me of it, and told me the same as you have done, that I should have it when I am a young woman. But, oh, uncle, I want it now. I want to give it to Uncle Harley, and to help Tom; for he is killing himself with those horrid books, because he says, honours lead to fortune, and you know fortune is money. It is so hard, so very hard. I'd rather not have had any.'

'You must not say that, Dora. You will find it, if used rightly, a source of much comfort. It is so pleasant to have it in one's power to do good to others; and the feeling you have already anticipated, in desiring to assist your uncle and cousin. The non-fulfilment of that desire, which you are now grieving for, is the constant experience of the generous heart without means. My dear child, money is a blessing, not an evil; it is the abuse or ill-using of it that makes it a curse to the possessor.'

'But, dear Uncle Bennett, I do so wish I could have it now.'

'Dora—

> "Not what we wish, but what we want,
> Do Thou, O Lord, supply:
> The good unasked in mercy grant;
> The ill, though asked, deny," must be the prayer of the Christian. Our Lord has constant reason to say to each of us, "Ye know not what ye ask." Besides, my dear child, if you could give your uncle all your money, I am sure he would never take it; it would not be right of him to do so. And as for Tom,—boys are more likely to succeed in life who work their way, than those who are born with a silver spoon in their mouths.'

'A silver spoon, uncle!' said Dora, smiling through her tears.

'Yes, "Born with a silver spoon" is an old saying, synonymous with inheriting riches.'

'But, uncle, Tom was born with a silver spoon in his mouth, though some way or other it has dropped out again,' laughed Dora, amused with the simile.

'Well, never mind, Dora; most likely he will pick up a golden one in its place.'

'Oh, do you think it?' inquired Dora, rejoiced at the idea.

'Yes; for he is a noble boy.'

'Isn't he?' said Dora, drawing herself up. 'Madge and I think him beautiful.'

'What! the East Indian lassie? But beautiful is not the proper epithet for a boy; handsome, or noble, or brave, sounds better, does it not?'

'Perhaps it does. But it seems to me that beautiful is best, because, as Madge says, he looks so much lovelier when he is talking or listening; he is not a bit the same as when quiet; lots of boys are handsomer then. But it is when he is excited or interested that he is really beautiful. Handsome people are always handsome people, and Tom is not that. Madge and I think he has got a beautiful soul, and that it peeps out of his eyes into his face when he is talking.'

Whatever Tom's soul might be, as it looked out from his eyes upon the beholder, Mr. Bennett had no doubt in his own mind as to what Dora's was, whilst sounding the praises of her cousin. Certainly the once little brown thing, with a nose like nobody else's, had a charm peculiar to herself, which, when exercised, there was no resisting.

Dora, in her delight at meeting with some one who admired Tom, had nearly forgotten the previous theme of conversation, and was imperceptibly gliding into other family matters, when her attention, and that of her uncle, was arrested by the sound of many voices and feet outside the house.

'Whatever can it be!' exclaimed Dora, rushing to one of the windows, followed by Mr. Bennett. 'See, uncle, what a lot of boys are coming to the door! And oh! pray do look; why, they have got Tom upon their shoulders. What can it be? Oh, he is not hurt, is he?' And she turned white at the very thought.

'Hurt! no, my child. But we will go and see what the hubbub means.' And Mr. Bennett went into the hall, accompanied by Dora, and opened the street door; but as he did so, his ears were assailed with such a din that he was nearly ready to shut it again.

> 'See, the conquering hero comes!
> Sound the trumpets, beat the drums,' sang, or rather shouted, two or three youths at the top of their voices; whilst one, with his hands rounded, roo-too-rooed through them, and another supplemented a drum by banging away on his neighbour's back, who, finding the process more provocative of mirth than conducive to comfort, at a smarter twirl or bang expostulated with the performer, crying out, 'Easy, Lawrence! I say you are coming it too strong on a fellow. I am very happy to make myself useful in a good cause; but I have cogent reasons for protesting against being turned into a musical instrument.'

'Put me down! put me down!' called Tom to a couple of long-legged lads who were carrying him on their shoulders. 'Don't be stupids, Gregg and Thompson! Do not you see my uncle is at the door? Let a fellow get down.'

'We hasten to obey your majesty's commands,' replied the lads, going up two of the steps under the portico, and then kneeling each upon one knee so as to place Tom's feet upon the upper step, they deposited him safely at his father's door.

'Three cheers for Tom Harley! and three cheers for Lotsirl College! and three-times-three for its founder, Johanan Bullum! and then we will go, boys!' shouted the leader; when instantly such an hip-hip-hurrahing arose in Chelsea Place as probably never arose before. The noise brought Mr. and Mrs. Harley into the hall, though they were not visible to the boisterous group without, who, having cheered until they were tired, and shaken Tom's hand and arm until he was tired, at last departed. The door had no sooner closed than Tom darted past his uncle and Dora, and throwing his arms round his mother's neck, cried:

'I've done it!—yes, I've done it, my own dear mother!'

'What, my boy?' inquired Mrs. Harley, pale with emotion.

'Gained an exhibition,' replied Tom tremulously.

'An exhibition!' exclaimed Mr. Harley, possessing himself of one of Tom's hands. 'Honours?'

'Yes,' answered Tom, releasing his mother from his embrace. 'Forty pounds a year until I have finished my education.'

It was quite true. Tom Harley had gained one of three exhibitions to be awarded that midsummer. He had worked hard all the half-year; but it was not until his father's loss that he had set his mind wholly to attaining such an important reward and assistance. Then he had consulted Dr. Cote; and having ascertained that the doctor thought he had a chance of winning if he made the most of his time and opportunities, he had studied unremittingly, and that day had heard the result of his labours.

'Not quite killed, Miss sagacious birdie,' whispered Tom to Dora. 'But I must go and fetch Constance. The boys brought me home without consulting me as to prior engagements. Will not Madge be pleased?'

'Yes; and she is to return with Constance this afternoon. They break up to-day. Do make haste and fetch them. They will think you are never coming. And, Tom, I am so glad about you.'

'Exhibitioner, cavalier, harlequin, cousin teaser, Jack-of-all-trades, and master of none, am I, the redoubtable Tom Harley of Chelsea Place, Lotsirl! and as such I bid thee farewell, sage bird of Minerva, my own dear coz.' And off Tom darted to call for his sister, whose school was not far from the college; for he had been in the habit of accompanying Constance to and from school, ever since the number of servants had been reduced at home, Mrs. Harley never liking her to go alone. Tom amused himself by assuming a very doleful, woe-begone face as he returned with Madge and Constance; and so well did he counterfeit disappointment, that they fully made up their minds he had been one of the unsuccessful competitors at the college for prizes. Once or twice he sighed so deeply, that Madge could not help casting a sympathizing glance at him, and hid her own prize under her mantle, lest seeing it should add to his painful reflections and annoyance. She was so very sorry for him—and so, indeed, was Constance—that they scarcely spoke at all; and when they did ask any question, mischievous Tom only replied in monosyllables. It was not until they reached home, and Dora, who had been watching from the dining-room window for their arrival, threw open the door, demanding if they had 'heard the news,' that matters came to an explanation.

'Hush, Dora!' said Madge. 'How can you? Poor Tom! I am so sorry.'

'And so am I,' chimed in Constance.

'Sorry!' exclaimed Dora, her eyes sparkling, and her face beaming with delight. 'Why, I am so glad, that I do not know what to do. You are joking about being sorry.' At that moment Dora caught a glimpse of Tom's countenance, and saw by its expression that he had been hoaxing them; and, unable to contain her joy, she cried, 'Why, Tom is second boy at the college. Only Mr. Pearce is above him. He has won forty pounds a year for I do not know how long;' and Dora concluded by clapping her hands, and dancing round and round the hall; whilst Tom, fairly detected, dashed upstairs, and favoured them with an apologetical harangue from the window-sill, between some flower-pots, wherein he declared that, 'being a public character, he must be allowed a licence denied to private individuals, and be treated with a deference due to his—' position, he would have added; but just at that moment his feet slipped, and down he came, in anything but a triumphant posture, on the landing.

'Well done, Tom!' 'Consequence rewarded!' and 'Pride must have a fall!' exclaimed his listeners, running, however, to his rescue. But before they could get to him, he had risen from the floor, and making them a most polite bow, had darted off, leaving them to have their laugh to themselves.

Mr. and Mrs. Harley were not only delighted, but astonished, at Tom's success. They considered him intelligent and clever, but not particularly so; and they had not had the faintest idea at what he was aiming. Indeed, so impressed was Mr. Harley with the idea that Tom would never distinguish himself in literary attainments, that Mrs. Harley had had some difficulty in persuading him to retain his classical books, which at the time of Johnny's death he had packed up, and purposed getting rid of, saying, 'He had no one left him that they would be of use to;' and when Mrs. Harley mentioned Tom, he said, 'Oh no, he would never appreciate them; only Johnny would have done it.' However, she coaxed him into waiting to see what Guy would prove to be; and, after all, Tom had turned out worthy of them. Forty pounds a year, and the chance of a scholarship at Cambridge, was, independent of the surprise, a just cause of rejoicing to the Harleys; and Tom never felt happier in his life than when his father grasped his hand, saying:

'God bless you, my son. You have made me a proud father this day.'

Tom was a general favourite at school, as his manner of bringing home proved. The two other exhibitions having been gained by boarders, the day-boys thought they had a perfect right to testify their satisfaction at one of their number having been victorious, by a triumphal procession, in which Tom, as we have already seen, was the most conspicuous person, chaired, or rather borne on Gregg's and Thompson's shoulders. Out of 250 boys, or rather out of the 100 in the first division, or upper-school, the day-boys could at last boast that one of their number had come out in honours; for it was generally cast at them, by way of reproach, 'that day-boys let the boarders jump over their heads, and run away with the laurels.' Now it had been shown that 'where there's a will there's a way;' and the attainment of honour depends not upon place, but person.

(To be continued.)

CHRISTIAN CONSISTENCY.*

IN exhorting others, we are rather inclined to attack in detail those numberless infirmities which still cleave to the children of God, and by laying bare their self-delusions, convince them of the defects of their spiritual walk. Such exhortations may not be without their use. But I think that it would be far more profitable to go at once to the cause of all these spiritual maladies, by pointing out the radical defect in the Christianity of many amongst us. This defect is, the lack of habitual communion with the Lord Jesus, and by Him with the Father. For often, alas! we are contented with the inward testimony that we are resting on Jesus for eternal life, and that we have passed from death unto life. But we do not habitually walk in the light; nor are we habitually, as the branch abiding in the vine, drawing life and strength from it every moment. We are as a man who might have an excellent friend whom he would visit occasionally, but could dispense with his society in everyday life; doing many things without seeking his advice, or depending on his support.

Yes, let us acknowledge that it is this constant presence of the Lord which is wanting to us, and therefore we are weak. We are strong when we can say with David, 'I have set the Lord always before me: because He is on my right hand, I shall not be moved.'

We often speak in severe terms of the unbelieving and self-righteous; but are we not ourselves practically unbelievers when we spend part of our time far from the Lord, and very much as worldlings would do who are without God and without Christ in the world? Faith is in the heart and not in the head, and so likewise is the heart the seat of unbelief. 'The fool hath said in his heart that there is no God.' And we, my brethren, in our hearts we forsake the Saviour, and are unbelieving towards Him, when we can live at such a distance from Him for the greater part of our time. And is it not really self-righteousness to say, to do, to purpose so many things without seeking counsel from Him, our Counsellor, our Life, our Strength? What should we think of a person who should say, 'You are everything to me; I can do nothing without you,' and who nevertheless would scarcely ever consult us, or in any way ask our aid? We should say that the confidence expressed in us was nothing worth. And yet this is what we do with the Lord Jesus. We say fine things to Him in our prayers about our weakness, our trust in his promises, our need of his help, and the happiness we enjoy in hoping in and resting on Him. We ask Him to be always with us; and yet, soon after having thus prayed, we seem to have forgotten it all, and go on our way without taking Jesus with us; we leave Him, as it were, in a corner, to be sought out by us at certain periods which we call our seasons of prayer and meditation.

* A letter of PASTOR ROCHAT of Rolle, Canton de Vaud.

This is a miserable case; yet it is, I fear, but too common among Christians, though not in the same degree with all. Are there not even some who can pray, join in public prayer, speak to Jesus, and hear affecting sermons, without being in heart-communion with Jesus? Alas! how many things may be done, even in the kingdom of God, out of communion with Him who is the Life! And on this account have they little or nothing of that power of the Spirit, which is to be obtained only by a living intercourse with Him who gives the Spirit. It is no wonder that, in this condition, we dwell in the midst of abundant means, like the dead seated at a feast; or that passing impressions only should be received, to vanish as the morning dew; or if God does bestow some grace, it should either minister to pride, or be used to maintain a particular opinion, and thereby promote divisions among the brethren.

If Christians lived in habitual communion with the Saviour, the gift of grace already possessed by them would be maintained in humility of mind; their joy and strength increased, and themselves preserved from those sad contrasts between their prayers and their words and actions.

It is a common saying, 'Tell me your company, and I will tell you what you are.' This maxim is eminently true of the Christian. What he is, depends entirely on the degree of his acquaintance with the Saviour. Living habitually with Jesus, little by little one is transformed into 'the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.' Looking unto Him habitually, peace and joy would continue; for it is written, 'They looked unto Him, and were lightened, and their faces were not ashamed.' If nourished habitually by the body and blood of Christ, we could not but have life in our souls. Were the love of Christ constantly realized, we should find in that love a wondrous strength that would in a manner carry us through all difficulties. When habitually friends with the Lord, we cannot but be friendly with his children. The heart is enlarged in communion with Jesus. It learns to love all that is of Christ, and not to narrow its affections within the limits of this or that system.

Whence, then, is it that we have so little of this habitual communion with the Saviour, precious in itself, and strengthening to our souls? Certainly it is our own fault, and not his, who wills that we should have life, and that more abundantly, and who urges upon us to abide in Him, that we may bring forth much fruit. Several causes in us are opposed to this intimate communion with the Lord.

First of all is unbelief. Truth is much more in our heads as a system than as a reality. Now we cannot be in communion with an idea or with a system, but with a living person. The remedy for this evil is to ask more of that faith which is 'the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.' If Jesus is really living in the midst of us by the power of the Spirit, we shall know the truth of that promise, 'Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world;' and, his presence realized, it will be easy to live in fellowship with Him.

Another cause of our failure in communion with the Saviour is self-righteousness. We do not know how to live with Him and go to Him just as we are. It almost seems as if we were on ceremony, and could not venture freely to tell Him our wants; openly confess to Him our sins; live with Him just as we are every moment; introduce Him into all our affairs; make Him the all and in all of our life,—in one word, to make Him our friend and confidant in all things and at all times. I think we are still under bondage, and therefore do not 'serve Him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before Him, all the days of our life' (Luke i. 74, 75). The remedy for this evil is to consider in the word the goodness of the Lord, and the gracious familiarity which He permits to his own, and to ask of Him more of the spirit of adoption.

Another obstacle to communion is the want of uprightness. We fear the presence of God because it condemns sin. It is a fearful thing to say, but it is nevertheless true. We must put the finger on the wound, and not hide it. An evil acknowledged is already half cured. We have only to draw near to God, and to ask of Him a true heart, which He never will refuse. 'Good and upright is the Lord, therefore will He teach sinners in the way. The meek will He guide in judgment; the meek will He teach his way.'

Finally, there is this obstacle to communion with the Lord—the little care we take to avoid those things which separate from Him. For example, a multitude of words, an increase of worldly affairs, needless agitations, quarrels at home and abroad, etc. Then we do not enough seek communion with the Lord by reading the Scriptures, by prayer and that intercourse with the brethren to which the Lord has promised life and blessing for evermore.

I conclude, my brethren, in saying to you and myself, 'Let us ask, and we shall receive.'

Miscellaneous.

The Sea of Galilee.

Fair Sea of Galilee!
How have I longed to tread thy sacred shore,
To trace his footprints, who so meekly bore
My sins upon the tree!

Thy clear blue waters lie
So placid 'mid thy hills and mountain height,
Reflecting on their surface, calm and bright,
The burning sunset sky!

Remembrance brings to me
Such wondrous scenes at this still twilight hour.
Rapt in deep thought, I feel their mystic power,
And God Incarnate see!

Upon thy stormy wave
He walks in majesty divine. His voice
So moves his faithless ones, that they rejoice
In his dread power to save!

The mighty works He wrought,
When resting by thy side, I feel and see;
While every tree and flower declares to me,
The grace and truth He brought.

Fair Sea of Galilee!
Thy shores were hallowed by his sacred feet;
So that, in scenes and memories so sweet,
I feel Him near to me.

Go on, Sir, go on!—Arago says, in his Autobiography, that his master in mathematics was a word or two of advice, which he found in the binding of one of his text-books. Puzzled and discouraged by the difficulties he met with in his early studies, he was almost ready to give over the pursuit. Some words which he found on the waste-leaf, used to stiffen the cover of his paper-bound text-book, caught his eye, and interested him. 'Impelled,' he says, 'by an indefinable curiosity, I dampened the cover of the book, and carefully unrolled the leaf, to see what was on the other side. It proved to be a short letter from D'Alembert to a young person disheartened, like myself, by the difficulties of mathematical study, and who had written to him for counsel. "Go on, sir, go on!" was the counsel which D'Alembert gave him; "the difficulties you meet will resolve themselves as you advance. Proceed, and light will dawn and shine with increased clearness on your path." That maxim,' says Arago, 'was my greatest master in mathematics.' Following out these simple words, 'Go on, sir, go on!' made him the first astronomical mathematician of his age. What Christians it would make of us! What heroes of faith, what sages in holy wisdom, should we become, just by acting out that maxim, 'Go on, sir, go on!'

'The Lord Liveth.'—There dwelt in the east of Scotland a pious clergyman, who had presided for a number of years over a small but respectable congregation. In the midst of his active career of usefulness, he was suddenly removed by death, leaving behind him a wife and a number of helpless children. The small stipend allowed him by his congregation had been barely sufficient to meet the current expenses of his family; and at his death no visible means were left for their support. The death of her husband preyed deeply upon the heart of the poor afflicted widow; while the dark prospect which the future presented filled her mind with the most gloomy apprehensions. By her lonely fireside she sat—the morning after her sad bereavement—lamenting her forlorn and destitute condition, when her little son, a boy of five years of age, entered the room. Seeing the deep distress of his mother, he stole softly to her side, and, placing his little hand in hers, looked wistfully into her face, and said, 'Mother, mother, is God dead?' Soft as the gentle whisper of an angel did the simple accent of the dear boy fall upon the ear of the disconsolate and almost heart-broken mother. A gleam of heavenly radiance lighted up, for a moment, her pale features. Then snatching up her little boy, and pressing him fondly to her bosom, she exclaimed: 'No, no, my son, God is not dead; He lives, and has promised to be a Father to the fatherless—a Husband to the widow. His promises are sure and stedfast, and upon them I will firmly and implicitly rely.' Her tears were dried, and her murmurings for ever hushed. The event proved that her confidence was not misplaced. The congregation over which her husband had worthily presided, generously settled upon her a handsome annuity, by which she was enabled to support her family, not only comfortably, but genteelly. The talents of her sons, as they advanced in years, soon brought them into notice, and finally procured them high and honourable stations in society.

A Powerful and Universal Idol.—Those who worship gold in a world so corrupt as this we live in, have at least one thing to plead in defence of their idolatry—the power of their idol. It is true that, like other idols, it can neither move, see, hear, feel, nor understand; but, unlike other idols, it has often communicated all these powers to those who had them not, and annihilated them in those who had. This idol can boast of two peculiarities: it is worshipped in all climates, without a single temple; and by all classes, without a single hypocrite.

Authors.—Some authors write nonsense in a clear style, and others sense in an obscure one. Some can reason without being able to persuade; others can persuade without being able to reason. Some dive so deep that they descend into darkness, and others soar so high that they give us no light. Some, in a vain attempt to be cutting and dry, give us only that which is cut and dried. We should labour, therefore, to treat with ease of things that are difficult; with familiarity of things that are novel; and with perspicuity of things that are profound.

The Flower Fadeth.

Yes, beautiful, alas! like this cold flower,
That proudly glances on the frosty pane.
Short is the violet's, short the cowslip's spring;
The frost-flowers live far longer. Cold as they
The beautiful should be, that they may share
The splendour of the light without the heat.
For else the sun of life must soon dissolve
The hard, cold, shining pearls to liquid tears,
And tears flow fast away.

—Atterbom (Swedish).

All Flesh is Grass.

All things are dying round us; days and hours,
A multitudinous troop, are passing on.

—Alford.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Cor. vii. 22.

A Christian is one who is 'called;' not by self or man, but by God. The voice that calls him is almighty, irresistible. He must needs obey. He is born 'of the will of God.'

He is called 'in the Lord.' This refers not so much to his being called by the Lord, as to his being called to be 'in the Lord.' Christ in him, and he in Christ—this is his standing. As once he was 'in the world,' and in himself, so now he is 'in the Lord.'

He is not of any one nation. He may be a Jew or a Gentile; a Greek or a Roman; a barbarian, a Scythian, an African, an Indian, or a Briton. His nationality is not of earth; his citizenship is in heaven.

He is not of any special condition or rank. He may be a servant or a master, a peasant or a monarch, a merchant or a ploughman, a man of learning or a half-witted beggar.

Yet these two things are common to each: he is 'called,' and he is 'in the Lord.' The other things connected with him are unessential and unenduring. These two only are important, and abiding, and eternal.

Keeping this in mind, the apostle takes up the two great conditions of society in his day—master and slave—in order to bring out the true and high bearing of Christianity on these. If you be a servant, what then? if a master, what then? These are the two questions he answers.

The answers to these two questions are contained in these two statements: a Christian is the Lord's freeman; a Christian is Christ's servant. Let us look at each of these in turn.

I. A Christian is the Lord's freeman.—This expression means the following things:

(1.) He was once a slave.—He was not born free. He did not free himself. He was like Israel in Egypt.

(2.) He was set free by the Lord.—The name of his liberator is a glorious one; one betokening power and authority. His former masters were sin, the flesh, the devil. From these this mighty Lord hath set him free.

(3.) As a freeman, he still belongs to Christ.—Nay, he belongs more to Him than ever; more to Him than to his former masters. A new tie has been formed between him and the Lord,—the tie of liberty, the tie of love, the tie of gratitude.

(4.) His life is one of liberty.—There is no return to bondage. All is the joy of freedom; Christ's own freedom; true, divine, heavenly liberty; liberty in every part; perfect throughout.

(5.) His is liberty which earthly service cannot affect.—He may be a slave or a prisoner; he is still the Lord's freeman. Hands, and feet, and body may be in chains; he is as free as ever. No earthly bondage can intermeddle with or neutralize the heavenly and eternal liberty.

But how and when does all this begin? In what way is it carried on? The answer to this may be given in the following three passages:

(1.) 'Ye are bought with a price.'—A ransom has been paid for our liberation; and the spring of all our liberty comes from this ransom. Christ hath redeemed us. 'We are redeemed, not with corruptible things, but with the precious blood of Christ.'

(2.) 'If the Son make you free, ye shall be free indeed.'—Our liberty is the direct work of the Son of God. He unbinds us and disimprisons us. He became a bondman for us. He took our chains and prison, that we might have his liberty.

(3.) 'The truth shall make you free.'—The truth revealed in Christ contains in it all liberating elements and ingredients. It is fitted to neutralize and undo all that made us slaves. And from the moment that we know it, we are free! Our belief of this glorious liberating truth sets us at full liberty.

II. A Christian is Christ's servant.—Freed from one service, which is bondage, he enters another, which is liberty. Though free, he is a servant; free because a servant; a servant because free! Such is the wonderful yet happy contradiction. As Messiah is the Father's Servant, come to do his will, so are we Messiah's servants, engaged to do his will; to bear our cross in following Him; to do his work in all things.

Thus we are both freemen and servants; truly both. And we begin our liberty and our service at the same time and in the same way. That truth which sets us free, introduces us into service. The two, so far from being incompatible, are harmonious and helpful to each other.

If we are Christ's servants, then we wear his livery; we dwell in his house; we do his work; we fix our eye on Him; we merge our wills in his; we get his wages, his reward, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' Let us, then, realize and act out both our freemanship and our service, faithfully and fully; at all times, all places, all conditions. Freemen, yet servants always; servants, yet freemen always!

Let us close with the apostolic use of this truth. Are we masters? Let us remember we are Christ's servants, and only masters under Him: let this keep us humble and kind. We have a good, kind Master: let us be good and kind. Are we servants? Let not this trouble us or make us fretful. We are the Lord's freemen. That makes up for all. Though we were chained, imprisoned, exiled, like Paul at Rome, or John in Patmos, we are free. Nothing on earth can interfere with this privilege, or rob us of this honour. We are free indeed. Ours is glorious liberty.

THE WISE.

BY THE EDITOR.

(Continued from p. 507.)

II. THEY that turn many to righteousness.—The expression, 'turning many to righteousness,' recalls such passages as these: 'He walked with me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity' (Mal. ii. 6). 'If they had stood in my counsel, and had caused my people to hear my words, then they should have turned them from their evil way, and from the evil of their doings' (Jer. xxiii. 22). 'Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto Thee' (Ps. li. 13). 'He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins' (Jas. v. 20).

Such passages as these show us the following things, in reference to this turning of the wicked from his wickedness:—

1. God's desire is, that they should be turned to righteousness. Not their remaining in sin, but their coming out of it—this is his desire: not that they should die, but live; not that they should be lost, but saved. Hence his vehement assertion regarding himself: 'I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked;' and hence his urgent appeal and expostulation: 'Turn ye, turn ye! for why will ye die?'

2. The stress which God lays on this. The manner in which it is introduced in our text, in connection with the glorious reward, shows the stress which God lays upon it. It is a mighty thing in his eyes. The gathering up yon stray leaf, which the winds are tossing to and fro, soon to fling into the devouring fire; the plucking of yon brand from the burning; the bringing back yon stray sheep from its weary wanderings; the receiving yon returning prodigal, though perhaps the most worthless that ever sought refuge beneath the paternal roof,—these, whatever they may appear to man, are great things in the eyes of God!

3. God expects that his saints should aim at this. He would have them be mindful of their own deliverance, and spend their delivered life in saving others. He assumes that men, who have found their way back to his love, should seek to win others to it, as they have been won; that those who have been made wise in Christ should, with all their might and zeal, aim at making others partakers of like blessed wisdom. It would be so strange, so inconsistent, to be otherwise! What! shall we be saved, and not seek to save? Shall we be blessed, and not seek to bless? Shall we see men plunging into woe, and not seek to win them to blessedness? Shall we see men becoming more and more children of darkness, nay, preparing for the blackness of darkness for ever, and not make one effort to make them children of light, who shall shine hereafter as the brightness of the firmament?

4. God will honour this; for 'they that turn many to righteousness, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.' There is glory for all the saved, but special glory for those who have been the instruments of saving others. There is a reward for all the wise, but a special reward for those who have used their wisdom for turning many to righteousness. And evidently with this feeling it was that the apostle said to the Thessalonians: 'What is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? for ye are our glory and joy;' and to Timothy: 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.' There is a recompense for every deed done for God, for every sacrifice incurred. There is, too, a reward for leading on the redeemed ones in their path, feeding Christ's sheep; but here the special reward is for turning men to righteousness. The saving of the lost is, in God's sight, so momentous and so blessed, that He singles it out here for particular mention, as something in which He greatly delights—something which He will abundantly honour.

And the word many gives yet deeper meaning to this truth. For it is as if it were said: 'In proportion to the number saved by you, shall be the weight and brilliance of your crown. One soul saved by you from death will bring addition to your recompense, and many will yet more largely enhance it—each added soul being an added jewel in your crown.'

These, surely, are thoughts fitted to rouse us —those of us who profess to be saved. Do we look upon the unsaved as God regards them? Do we yearn over them as He yearns and longs? Passing through our streets, is pity for the unsaved, that pass and repass us on every side, uppermost in our minds? Or, standing on some height which commands our town, as Olivet did Jerusalem, and looking down upon its inhabitants, is it mere admiration for the beauty of the scene that fills us, or is it compassion for the multitudes of the impenitent that rises within us, drawing, if not tears from our eyes, at least the deep-breathed prayer from the heart: 'Lord, convert this town! Lord, save these lost ones! by all means save some!'

This of itself would make life worth living for; this would make us willing to bear the grief, to face the storms, to wage the war of this sore-tried life on earth. To save a soul from death; to turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to pour the joy of heaven into a heart that was fast filling with the torment of hell; to snatch an immortal spirit from the hands of the destroyer; nay, to save not one—many; to have not one, but many; to snatch not one, but many; ah! this is surely worth living for, worth suffering for; this is surely of itself the recompense of a thousand sorrows!

But when, above and beyond this, there is provided for us a special and glorious reward; when, apart from the joy of saving a lost one, there is the blessedness of a brighter crown and a higher throne; ah! surely there is something to quicken the deadest, to warm the coldest; something to encourage and stimulate the most desponding; something to make us shake off all sloth, and selfishness, and love of ease, and to resolve that we shall not rest till, through the blessing of the mighty God, we have turned many to righteousness.

But let us look at the special reward here promised: 'They that turn many to righteousness, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.' To shine as the firmament itself, is the recompense of the wise; but to shine as the STARS in that firmament, is the reward of those who have so made use of that wisdom as to turn many to righteousness.

The stars stand out from the firmament,—apparently set in it, part of it, and yet distinct from it,—shining out of it in their sparkling beauty; so are these blessed ones. They belong to the one company of the redeemed, yet they stand out from it, as honoured with a peculiar honour; shining out in the midst as more glorious and more resplendent—stars in the bright blue of heaven.

The stars are not all of the same magnitude. 'One star differeth from another star in glory.' One just faintly twinkles, hardly distinguishable from the blue ocean on which it floats; others shine out in clear, mild beauty; others sparkle forth in yet more dazzling effulgence—bright gems of midnight, which the eye ever loves to look upon. So is it with these honoured ones among the wise. To all is given a star-like glory; but each is different. Some are brighter, some are fainter; some sparkle with greater, others with less intensity.

The stars fade not. They move in their ordered courses, yet they change not. Their light is not exhausted, their glow is not dimmed. They do not wither like the flowers of earth, nor pass away like the rainbow of the sky. They have shone for ages, they are shining still, and they shall shine for ever; and if any change shall pass upon them, it will be to render them yet more purely brilliant, in the day when this old firmament shall be cleansed, and all its orbs put on new lustre. So shall it be with these rewarded, honoured ones among the wise. They shall shine for ever. They cannot grow dim. When they shall rise in the resurrection, they shall put on that glorious lustre, that celestial brilliance, which they shall wear throughout eternity.

And as the stars are beyond the reach of earth's defilement, unpolluted and unstained, so shall it be with these righteous. Pollution cannot touch them. Sin cannot reach them. They are eternally holy, unchangeable, pure,—like Him who lighted up their radiance, and made them in his own image, pure and holy.

How excellent the glory! how rich the reward! To be God's stars for the universe, and, as his stars, to shine in his firmament for ever! To be set by his own hand in his own heavens; his gems of sparkling light, sending forth, throughout all space, his blessed radiance,—ah! this is unutterable glory. Having helped to light up dark souls here, in this dark world; to be made God's lights for the universe, his everlasting stars,—ah! this is a prize worthy of ambition; a prize, for the obtaining of which we may well sacrifice, and suffer, and toil; spending, and being spent; counting not even our life dear to us, if that we may succeed in turning many to righteousness; and taking our place as stars in God's heaven hereafter, when the Lord appears to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe. Blessed to be wise, but more blessed to use that wisdom for turning others to righteousness. It will be glorious to form part of God's wondrous firmament—to be but a fragment of its happy blue; but it will be more glorious still to 'shine as the stars for ever and ever.'

REMEMBER ELI.

BY THE REV. A. A. BONAR, GLASGOW.

THERE is a report in heaven, as well as among us, that many of you are guilty of your children's blood. It is believed that many of you allow your children to perish miserably. We wish you to inquire whether or not you be really chargeable with this fearful crime.

You know that every minister and elder has a twofold account to give at the judgment-seat of Christ; and so has every father and mother. One of these accounts is to be regarding their their own souls; and the other is to be regarding how they attended to those under their care. This last account will be as strict as the first; for one of the holy prophets declares that there is an unutterable woe lying upon those who 'feed themselves, and do not feed the flock' (Ezek. xxxiv. 2). Now, parents, you 'feed yourselves' and fall under this woe, when you are content with getting meat, and drink, and clothing, while you let your children become a prey to wolves, that is, to wicked companions, bad example, temptations to sinful amusements and pleasure, by which their souls are ruined for ever.

Oh, remember you have to give an account for your own souls! and that will be fearful enough, and sad enough! God will open the great book of judgment, and turn to the page wherein your sins are written. His bright light will shine on the page, and you will be forced to come up the steps of the judgment-seat, and read what is written against you. Your conscience will testify that every word is true; and the devil will be a witness, for he led you into the mire; and holy angels will declare how they saw and shuddered at your sin; and many of your neighbours will be brought up to tell how you and they sinned together; and God himself will speak and declare it to be all true! Oh, how awful is the prospect! You will on that day be damned, if all these things are found in the book. But there is another account even after all this is done, namely, the account you have to give for your children,—for each of your children, and each of their sins! You will be reckoned guilty of their sins, if you did not check them; you will be accounted chargeable with their follies and vices, if you agreed to let them go on in what way they pleased (1 Sam. iii. 13). And who will be the witnesses against you here? Will it be conscience? and the devil? and your neighbour? and the Holy God? Yes, but in addition, your own little children! Your own children will face you at the judgment-seat, and condemn you. Alas! their agonized looks, their tears, their cries, their gnashing of teeth, will then awaken your conscience, and you will be proved before the universe to be murderers of your own children's souls!

The mother of a little girl used to teach her to pray, but only at times that suited her own convenience. One day this little girl looked in her mother's face, and said, 'Mother, when I die, and go to heaven, and God Almighty asks me, "Did your mother teach you to pray?" I will tell Him, Yes, except on washing-days.' Was not this a case where the child seemed already to be beginning her office as witness against her parent's sin? But there was another girl, whose history was far more awful. She had once cared about her soul, and sought a Saviour, till her father led her away back to the world and its sins. In the course of a year after he had succeeded in making his daughter thoughtless and gay, a rapid fever attacked her. She called for her father in her last moments, fixed her eye on him, and was able to utter, 'Father, last year I would have sought Christ; but now, father, your child is—' She had not time to finish the sentence, death arrested her; but, oh! what a witness she will be when she meets him again, and reproaches him with having ruined her soul! There is a hymn which has often struck us as being very solemn and alarming,—a hymn that represents lost children upbraiding their parents. They are crying from the lowest hell, telling their parents that if they had taken an interest in their souls, they would never have come into that place of torment.

'Father, weep with shame and rueing,
Weep, for thy child's undoing,
'For the days when I was young,
And no prayer was taught my tongue—
I ran the world's race well,
And find my portion, hell!

Weep, mother, weep; but know
'Twill not shorten endless woe!
Weep, my lost spirit's fate,
But know thy tears too late!
Had they sooner fallen,—well,
I had not wept in hell!'

O parents! are any of you already stained with this crimson guilt? Have any of you cause to fear that you have sent some of your children to hell by your conduct? Or have you reason to fear lest you have set them on the way, although they are still alive? Up, and flee to the city of refuge! You are like the ancient manslayers (Num. xxxv.); the avenger of blood is at your heels! There is no remission for your sin, except in the blood of Jesus. And Jesus has made so full and ample an atonement that, on the ground of it, even a murderer of souls may be forgiven. Manasseh was a murderer of souls; and he was forgiven through this precious blood (2 Chron. xxxiii.). You, too, may be forgiven, if your blood-stained conscience be washed in the precious blood of the Lamb. Your souls may now be sore vexed and ill at ease; your peace may be broken up, and remorse may have well nigh begun that gnawing which shall never end; but hearken to the words that bring you good tidings: 'The chastisement of our peace was laid upon Him' (Isa. liii. 5).

We know, that if you would bathe in the blood of Him who 'his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree,' then would your souls be delivered from the oppressive and intolerable thought of the past; and you would be refreshed in the future by the glorious prospect of bringing those that remain to the same Saviour that redeemed you. It is true, you may feel like the South Sea murderers of their children, who, on being awakened and taught the power of the blood of Christ, even then found the consciousness of that sin—the murder of their children—the last which they could bring to the atoning blood. Some lamented in agony over seven, others over seventeen or twenty, whom they had destroyed. Yet even these did at last find their souls cleansed in that full, deep fountain. And you may find the same. You will then be like pardoned Manasseh, who, when justified from all things, by bathing in the ocean of Immanuel's blood, could walk at evening round Zion, and look down into the very valley of Hinnom—the black, gloomy valley where he had made so many of his children pass through the fire to Moloch,—and still retain his peace with God, and say, 'Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died' (Rom. viii. 34). If you would thus try the power of Christ's sacrifice to purify your guilty conscience, you would soon care for and yearn over your children's souls. You would discover their guilt, and perceive their danger, and you would long to see them saved and made 'accepted in the Beloved.' We know, also, in regard to those of you that have sought Christ for yourselves, but have not been sufficiently careful to fulfil your baptismal promise, and comply with the demand of the Lord, by bringing your children to Christ,—we know that the cause is to be found in your meagre views and most inadequate feelings of the Saviour's glorious work. Your sense of the heinousness of the sin which it purges away is so dull, and your apprehension of its infinitely urgent necessity and overwhelming grace is so dim, that your languid feelings are not stirred, though your offspring are living in the open neglect of the great salvation. Were you to die in your present unfaithfulness to your family, and be saved yourselves, 'so as by fire,' you would need to take an eternal farewell of your children. Like Eli, you might be saved; but your feelings on reaching glory would be like his. No doubt he learned in heaven what he dreaded to think upon on earth, that his sons, Hophni and Phinehas, were cast away as brands for the burning; and now all that he could do, as he stood before the throne—himself saved, but none of his offspring—was first to adore the sovereign grace that had led himself to wash in the blood of the Lamb that removed even that sin of crimson and scarlet dye, and next, to join the hallelujahs of the company that were praising the righteous wrath of their God against the lost souls of Hophni and Phinehas, while they saw the smoke of their torment rising up for ever and ever (Rev. xix. 3).

Bearing these solemn truths in mind, hear us when we propose to you that your children should be sent to the SABBATH SCHOOL.

1. You that care about your own and your children's souls. We believe you are seeking out the best means of benefiting those under your care. We therefore do no more than ask you to consider whether or not it would be useful to send your children to our schools. If other circumstances are suitable, then your example might influence some of your neighbours; and by your attention to your children in preparing them at home for the Sabbath school, you would have the satisfaction of seeing your children become a pattern to others.

2. You that care about your children, though you are not yourselves converted. We know that this is no uncommon case; even infidels have wished their children to know Christ. Now, if you feel that you yourselves have got no change of heart, we entreat you to send your children to the Sabbath school. There, by the blessing of God, they may be led to Christ. The teacher's whole aim is to bring them to the cross of Christ, to carry them to the Shepherd who gave his life for the sheep, and to bathe them in the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. But if you allow them to spend Sabbath evening, and perhaps all the day too, in whatever manner they please, you may expect soon to hear them uttering oaths, and be grieved by their profanity, their contempt for the ordinances of God, their filthy and foolish deeds, and other signs of a hardened heart. But oh! if they were saved, you would be freed at the great day from the reproach of their ruin. And perhaps they might even carry home salvation to you. What if they should lead you by the hand to Jesus? What if your experience should be that of a parent, who said, 'I was thirty years old before I knew that I had a soul. But one of our boys went out on a Sabbath to play, and was brought in with his ankle-bone out of joint. Next Sabbath, another of the boys got himself lamed. I resolved to send them to school to be out of the way. It was there that they learned, and I learned through them, that I had a soul.'

3. You that care neither for your own nor your children's souls. Whether you care or not, still it is true that there is a Saviour standing with open arms, saying, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not' (Mark x. 14). Will you allow us to be kind to them, and lead them to this Saviour? You would wish them to be obedient, to be well-behaved, to be useful; you would not wish to see them grow up to be thieves, drunkards, and pests to society. Let us, then, try what we can to lead them to Christ. Do not hinder us from showing kindness to your children. We entreat you not to be unmerciful to their souls. Let not your eye be evil toward the children of your own bowels. Would you wish that any of them should yet curse the day that ever they were born in your house, and had you for their parent?

And now that we have ended our few words of expostulation, we must say to those of you who agree to put your children under our care for a few hours on Sabbath, that we do not in any degree free you from the obligations you yourselves are under to attend to their souls.

No; we cannot take upon us your responsibility, which became yours at your children's birth, and was sealed on you at their baptism. We cannot stand in your place in the judgment-day. You must yourselves at home watch over them, pray for them and with them, help them in their lessons for their classes, and speak to them on their returning home, as anxiously as if we had never said a word. We offer only to help you. It will prove your more sure condemnation at last, if it be the case that strangers cared more for your children's souls than you yourselves do, —the father that begat them, and the mother that bore them. But, oh, how blessed, if, led by the Holy Spirit yourselves, you become the means of leading your children to Jesus! We will stand by, rejoicing to hear you say, 'Behold, Lord, I and the children whom Thou hast given me!'

THERE AND HERE.

'There remaineth therefore a rest' (the keeping of a Sabbath) 'for the people of God.'—Heb. iv. 9.

Preaching from these words, Matthew Henry says: ''Tis good to be here, but better to be there; for, 1. Here we are at a distance from God, there we are brought near Him; now absent from the Lord, then present. Here we have a Sabbath now and then in the camp, there a constant one in the court. Here boarded at school, there fetched home to our Father's house.

'2. Here we are in the dark and under a veil; but there we shall see all things clearly. Here we inquire in God's temple; but after all our inquiries, our discoveries are short and defective: we know but in part. The word we read and hear is in many places obscure to us. But there the veil will be rent, doubts resolved: we shall see all things clearly.

'3. Here we are dull—defective in our best performances; but there we shall be all light, and love as well as light. Now we cannot do good as we should; are disturbed by vain thoughts, distractions. Sabbath work is done by halves, through the vanity of our minds and the infirmity of our flesh. The body is a clog. But there will be no corrupt nature, no body of sin, no body of flesh, no flaws in our work.

'4. Here we are often disquieted and in sorrow. We have other work to do besides that of joy and praise. We repent now in tears, hang our harps on the willow trees; we go mourning; enemies mock at our Sabbaths,—our spiritual enemies (Lam. i. 7). But there will be nothing but joy and praise: all pleasant.

'5. Here we lose a great deal of our Sabbath time unavoidably; but there will be none lost in heaven. We lose a great deal in the morning in sleep; but from the morning of the resurrection we shall never sleep, nor need it;—in dressing; but there always dressed;—in going to the assembly; but there going no more out;—in bodily refreshments; no eating or drinking there.

'6. Here our Sabbath assemblies are but small and mixed; but there full and perfectly pure. Here we meet with a few, the doors shut for fear of the Jews—those of our own neighbourhood; but in heaven all, from east and west. Here, those of our own age and day; there, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Here there are spots; none there: all saints, and all the saints, and saints made perfect—no unclean person or thing; a perfect concert and not a jarring string.

'7. Sabbaths here are but signs; that Sabbath is the substance, and has in it all the thing signified. God gave his Sabbaths for signs, tokens of his favour; but in heaven He gives his favour itself, the full communication of it. It is but a typical rest we have here; that is a real rest, a Sabbath indeed.

'8. Sabbaths here have nights at the end of them, and week-days to come after them; but that is an everlasting Sabbath. As Christ is a priest, so heaven is a Sabbath, that has no successor. That rest is perpetual, and we shall never return to our toil; that work is continual, and we shall never return to our sleep or inactivity.'

Blessed prospect! But by every one beholding it, the inquiry should be addressed to his own soul, 'Will that prospect be realized by me?'

THE NIGHT IS FAR SPENT.

Rom. xiii. 11, 12.

Christians, wake! no more be sleeping,
Up! and let us watch be keeping;
Far spent is the night of weeping,
And the day is near at hand!

Nearer than when we believed,
And the grace of God received,
And from bondage were relieved,
Our desired salvation is.

Up! iniquity's abounding,
Danger is our path surrounding,
And the cry will soon be sounding,
Lo! the Bridegroom cometh now!

Many cold in love are growing;
Many from the faith are going.
Let our love and zeal be glowing;
Let us ever ready stand!

Worldliness and sin eschewing,
Trustfully our path pursuing,
And our work appointed doing,
Let us at our posts be found!

Up! and instant be in praying,
Faithful unto Jesus staying,
Faint not though He be delaying,—
He will surely come at last!

Patiently may we await Him,
Joyfully go forth to meet Him,
And with loud hosannas greet Him,
When He comes to take us home!

—John Kelly.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

THE BATTLE SONG OF THE CHURCH.

Words by Horatius Bonar, D.D.

With vigour. Met. 96 = ♩

Treble.
Alto.
Tenor.
Bass.
Accomp.
1. Fear not the foe, thou flock of God, Fear not the sword, the
2. Come, cheer thee to the toil and fight; 'Tis God, thy God, de-
1. Fear not the foe, thou flock of God, Fear not the sword, the spear, the rod, Fear not the foe! Fear not the foe!
-fends the right; He leads thee on, He leads thee on,
spear, the rod, Fear not the foe! Fear not the foe!

He fights in vain who fights with thee; Soon shalt thou see his
His sword shall scat - ter ev' - ry foe, His shield shall ward off
He fights in vain who fights with thee; Soon shalt thou see his ff
ar - mies flee, Him - self laid low, Him - self laid low. - -
ff
ev - 'ry blow;—The crown is won, The crown is won. - -
ff
ar - mies flee, Him - self laid low, Him - self laid low. - - ff
ff

His is the battle, His the power,
His is the triumph in that hour;
In Him be strong.
So round thy brow the wreath shall twine,
So shall the victory be thine,
And thine the song.

Not long the sigh, the toil, the sweat,
Not long the fight-day's wasting heat;
The shadows come.
Slack not thy weapon in the fight;
Courage! for God defends the right;
Strike home! strike home!

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER XVII.

STOLEN PEARLS SENT BACK.

GERSHON'S fears came true. He was summoned to the Consulate to answer to the charge of having stolen the pearl necklace.

Little Yakovieo came running, pale and breathless, to tell me that his father had been taken to the Consulate, and that he would surely be put in prison; 'and it was not my father who stole the pearls, Senora, it was that wicked Ibrahim Aga.'

'Ibrahim Aga! How do you know, child?'

The same expression of fear came over his face that I had seen upon the faces of Sarah and Gershon; but it was far less, and he seemed to think more how his father was to be defended from the charge of theft.

He came up close to me, and whispered, 'Senora, don't tell any one, for I am afraid. Ibrahim Aga is a bad man; he will kill me if he hears it. But I was not asleep, I saw him give the slave my father's bundle.'

Just then Sarah came in; she was in great misery about her son. She thought his fate was sealed; for, had he not had the pearls? and were they not missing? and they now asked not ten, but thirty thousand piastres as their value.

Walter advised me to tell his grandmother what the boy had told us. I did so, and now every other idea seemed lost in terror. It was easy to perceive that the child was right, that Ibrahim Aga was the very man whom Sarah had also seen. But she would not pronounce his name, would not admit that she had seen him; but upbraided the child for his folly—in having spoken out what he knew—so bitterly that the poor boy shrunk into a corner, hid his face, and cried as if his heart would break. 'Why make mischief for ourselves? When God—blessed be He!—sends us affliction, shall we not bear it? Why, thou foolish child, why wast thou not dumb? Why shouldest thou bring the wrath of that accursed man—may his name be blotted out!—upon thy father's head?'

At last I got her to listen to me, and to admit that this man was indeed Ibrahim Aga, chief of the police.

'Of course,' cried Walter; 'did not Benson tell us that that fellow and his slaves were suspected of the robberies going on? How came I to forget it? But Mr. Wells ought instantly to be informed.' On hearing that Walter was going to tell the Consul, Sarah wept, she entreated, fell at his feet, and supplicated that he would not do so.

'Try and get her to understand, Emily, if Mr. Wells is not told, I don't see how her son can be cleared.'

I got her to understand this. But she said that, some years ago, a poor Jew had offended this terrible Ibrahim Aga, and he had disappeared and had never since been heard of; and she was afraid for her son's life, if robbery should be brought home to the chief of the police through his means.

'But thirty thousand piastres, Sarah! how will your son ever pay that? He will be imprisoned all his life, and that will be as bad for you.'

At last we got her to consent to our telling the whole to Mr. Wells under the seal of secrecy, and asking his advice as to what ought to be done.

At the Consulate we found the trial of the case was going on. There was Gershon standing, pale and trembling, before the Consul, who was surrounded by his secretaries and dragomans. I was glad to catch a glimpse of Abraham's face among them; for I thought his ready wit would have discerned the truth of Gershon's story, and his kind feelings would be certainly enlisted on his behalf. I also saw a woman standing closely veiled near the door, with bright yellow silk trousers peeping below her white sheet. She must be the woman in whose gown pocket the pearls were. Beside her was a coarse-featured, one-eyed man, in a great big turban,—her husband, I suppose. Walter went into the court, I upstairs to Mrs. Wells.

In about an hour my brother joined us, looking grave. 'It is a most distressing case; they have proved beyond all doubt that the pearls were in the dress when given to Gershon, and they want to make him responsible for their value. He, of course, says the gown was stolen from him; but can he prove that?'

'But if he did not know that they were in the pocket. People don't give pearls worth ten thousand piastres as security for a tarboosh worth fifty or a hundred.'

'That is about the best point in the whole case, Mrs. Wells; and I think Mr. Wells means to consider it, judging by his cross-examination of the woman's two slaves. Her husband knew nothing about the pearls—had never heard of them before.'

'Strange!'

A kawass here brought up a note from Rabbi Abraham: 'Dear Mr. Walter, will you be bail for this poor man? Why shall he be put in prison as a thief, when he himself is the one robbed?'

'Yes, I will,' cried Walter. 'Gershon put in prison,'—and he added, in a low tone, to me, 'in the power of the villain who has robbed him!—no, not if I can prevent it.'

The Consul and my brother came up in quarter of an hour.

'Matters have taken a curious turn, Miss Russell. Your brother's kindness is not needed. Just as I was about to take his security for Gershon, a black slave whispered something to the woman who claims the pearls. She clapped her hands, and exclaimed, 'El Hamdulillah! the pearls are found.'

'Found!'

'Yes,' cried the slave, 'found. I was crossing the terrace of my master's house, and something fell at my feet. It was the dress of my mistress, and in the pocket of it were the pearls.' Then she came close and whispered something more in her mistress's ear.

The husband stood with open mouth; but the wife thanked me, and prepared to leave the court, followed by her slaves.

'How very extraordinary!' said Mrs. Wells. 'Where is Gershon?'

'We left him down-stairs stupefied, and, I thought, not pleased, as he ought to be. Perhaps he was bewildered. But, Mr. Russell, there is some mystery in the case. The husband did not know his wife had any such pearls; he could not describe them; he could not tell their value, nor where she got them, nor how long she had had them. I don't believe one word of the woman's tale about her sister; and altogether they seem to be a bad set. Gershon's story, too, about the robbery was not so clear to-day as before.'

'I had almost forgotten,' said Walter, 'the business that brought me here;' then taking Mr. Wells' promise of secrecy, as Sarah had desired, he told him who the robber really was.

The Consul became very grave indeed. 'That explains everything, even about the pearls. They belong to his wife, you say. Yes, yes, I see now why the case was stopped. Ibrahim Aga is a very bad man. No wonder the poor Jew is not pleased. If that fellow should suspect that he saw him, he has good reason to fear. This being so, I will grant the request for a guard to sleep in Gershon's house for a few nights.'

'Did you expect to discover the robbery, Mr. Wells?'

'I had not much hope, and now I have little or none, even supposing that Gershon allows me to proceed. But he will stop the case, now that the pearls are brought back. And I think he will be wise. Had he any chance of convicting that scoundrel, it would be otherwise; but as it is, he had better drop it.'

'And the ring?'

'True, there is the ring. But the owner has not put in his claim.'

These words passed as Mr. Wells conducted me down-stairs to the door. Abraham was standing there, and overheard the last, and said, 'If the owner does not claim his ring, why shall any one else do it for him?'

CHAPTER XVIII.

CHRISTMAS SQUABBLES AT BETHLEHEM.

THE cold wintry weather, which had threatened us before Christmas, passed off again; and, like last year and the year before, Christmas-tide was remarkable for the beauty of its spring-like weather: green grass everywhere, brought out by the former rains; warm sunshine; gentle breezes; and clear, sparkling, yet not frosty nights. Abraham, and Rachel, and Nathaniel, with Judah and Miriam (happy couple that they were!), came, and made our Christmas party; and it was a very peaceful and happy day. Again, like last year, Walter and I rode, after service, to the hill, whence we could get a view of Bethlehem; and this time we looked upon it with the feeling—and a sad feeling it was—that ere long we must look our last upon its dear hills; that by next Christmas we should be far away in a distant land.

But Bethlehem was not at peace within itself. Bitter strife and hatred were rife among both priests and people, instead of peace and goodwill towards men. A few weeks before, the Greek and Latin monks had had a serious fray in the very sanctuary. Blows had been exchanged. The populace had heard of the fight, and rushed in, to take their part on either side; but they were expelled by the monks, who closed the doors, and fought it out among themselves, with such weapons as came to hand—bars of wood, and wax tapers from the altars. When all was over, the silver star, with Latin inscription, which marked the very spot of our Saviour's birth, was gone—taken, 'stolen,' as Katrina, with all the vehemence of Latin partisanship, told me,—'stolen by the accursed Greeks (may their great-grandfather's grandfather be burnt!), in order that they may put a new one, and make the place theirs; and they have been bribing the Kadi, and he has given a sentence in their favour (may their house be destroyed!).'

All this had happened only a few weeks ago.

We now met the Turkish Pasha and his soldiers returning to Jerusalem. They had spent the night in Bethlehem, in order to prevent the Christians from a fresh, and perhaps murderous outbreak, at the midnight mass on Christmas eve.

Mr. Wells' dragoman came up soon afterwards, and told us all had passed off quietly, and that the French Consul had referred the dispute about the right of replacing the star to Constantinople. 'But,' he added, 'we' (Latins) 'are obliged to keep watch night and day; for if not, the Greeks would insert a star of their own, which they have got ready, in place of ours, and then we could not remove it again.'

'But,' said Walter, 'would it not be better to let the Greeks put their star there?'

The dragoman looked shocked at the sacrilegious idea. 'The Greeks put their star in our holiest sanctuary! Santa Maria! that could not be.'

'But would it not be better than fighting over the birthplace of our Redeemer? What must the unbelieving Moslems think of Christianity when they see such doings?'

CHAPTER XIX.

RAIN AND SNOW—KEDRON FLOWING.

THUS Christmas passed, and January came, and with it winter—real winter, cold and severe, but very welcome, for the sake of the crops, and the trees, and the household cisterns.

A violent wind-storm was followed by heavy rains; and, in a day or two, the rain turned to hail, and that again to snow; and Jerusalem, and the mountains which stand round about her, were robed in a white and spotless mantle—beautiful in the grey morning light, or in the bright noonday sun; and yet more beautiful by night, when the moon shed her rays upon city and mountains, valleys and plains.

At the end of a week came more rain and more snow, and then a thunderstorm. In this country thunder-storms do not come in summer, but in winter. Lightnings in the north are a sure precursor of rain.

Very grand were the broad flashes of light over the snow-clad city, and grander still the pealing echoes of the thunder, as they rolled over Jerusalem, reverberating from mountain to mountain—multiplying as they ran down the valleys, faint and fainter, until the last distant sound was lost—swallowed up by a fresh burst overhead; while yet more brilliant lightning flashed over minaret, and mosque, and the domes of the houses.

For a few hours the sky became clear, and we thought the rain and snow were over. Our cistern was nearly full. It would certainly be quite full as soon as the masses of snow upon the terraces had melted. But there was more rain in store for us. The wind rose again, blowing from the west, and swiftly bringing up clouds from the Mediterranean. Down came the rain again.

'Very good! very good!' cried Katrina.

'El Hamdulillah!' echoed the groom. 'There has been no such rain since Ibrahim Pasha.'

'There will be plenty of olives this year,' said she (Katrina had some olive-trees of her own at Bethlehem).

'There will be plenty of everything,' replied he. 'This is a year of blessing. Praised be the Creator of heaven and earth!'

It poured all that evening, and the snow began to melt, and to be washed away; and it poured all night; and when day dawned, it was pouring still.

Before I was half dressed, Katrina was at my door, her red coat drawn up over her head. She cried out—saluting me with the form used on New Year's day, or in great feasts—'Sitty! Sitty! may you have a happy year! Beer Eyoob has overflowed. Here, here is the water! The Fellahheen have brought it!'

What had not happened during ten or eleven years before, had now occurred. The water had suddenly risen to the top of the deep shaft at the well of Beer Eyoob, and was overflowing in a stream down the Kedron valley; and parties of the Siloam peasantry were carrying fantastic little black and red jars of the water in triumph from house to house of the city.

Of course, everybody gave them a backsheesh; for was it not Sennet khair—'a year of good'—a year such as only comes once in eleven years or more? We gladly gave our backsheesh, drank some of the water, and put the rest in a bottle, as memorial. It was almost the colour of milk, but sweet in taste, and, when settled, was excellent.

The rough fellows who had brought it cried joyously, as Katrina had done, 'May you have a happy year!' from under the thick, brown-striped aba (mantle), which, covering head, turban, and all, seemed to keep out the pelting rain as well as any mackintosh could.

Besides their usual linen garment, they had on large jackets made of sheepskins, the fleecy side turned inwards; but their feet and legs were bare, and yet they did not seem to mind a bit, as they waded through the half-melted snow and mud, for the drenching rain was kept off by their upper garments.

The news that Beer Eyoob had overflowed, seemed to be a signal for every one to break loose from the imprisonment which the last ten days' rain and snow had caused; and, in spite of the still pouring rain, to hurry about, congratulating their friends and each other upon the blessed year of plenty that was before us. There was general rejoicing in the midst of the pelting rain; but women, in their miserable white sheets, were fain to stay and rejoice in-doors.

We had scarcely done breakfast, before Abraham came in to tell the news; and, finding we had heard it, to ask Walter to go down with him, and see the stream flowing.

'Why, you will be wet through! Don't go yet, Walter; it may clear up later.'

'But I am not wet through,' cried Abraham, 'and I have been there already.'

'All the way down to Siloam, in this rain?'

'Yes, to see the river; and many people have been there. The Consul was there before me; and I met the Kadi as I was coming back. Everybody goes: why not? Beer Eyoob has not overflowed since Ibrahim Pasha's time.'

Walter went, and Haj Omar would not stay behind; and Constantine went. I told Katrina she must stay at least till the others came back; but I had no sooner seated myself at my work, than she also disappeared; and I was left alone in the house, to listen to the pattering of the rain, and reflect upon the rejoicing there will one day be in this land, when all the ancient springs burst forth, and the dry stony channels are once more musical with the sound of rippling streams.

Walter came back very wet indeed. He shook himself before entering the room, and yet the water ran plentifully down his mackintosh, and to the ground; while he told me that I must go also, as soon as the weather had mended a little.

'Everybody, great and small—all Jerusalem will be there. Already the road is lined with people going and coming—on foot and on horseback; and by to-morrow it will be a sight worth seeing.'

'Is there much water?'

'A good deal. The deep shaft of 120 feet is suddenly filled, and a spring has broken out lower down the valley.'

In the afternoon, the steady rain changed to heavy showers; and I went with my brother, and saw the brooklet bubbling, and boiling, and making haste to escape and wander among the olive-trees in the valley below. But it was too showery for us to follow it that night, much as we wished to see what became of it. Next day—oh, what a beautiful day it was! The sun shone bright, and the birds sang: only patches of snow were left in sheltered spots, to remind us of the cold. A light south breeze was blowing, just enough to stir the scarlet anemones, and give the highest possible effect to their dazzling brilliancy as they waved in the sunshine. And the eyebright, and speedwell, and crocuses, and forget-me-not, and star of Bethlehem, blossomed upon every bank. Rooks cawed overhead, and jays chattered among the trees. Larks ran on before us, and sprang up singing from under our feet. And down in the warm valley of Hinnom the goldfinches fluttered from spray to spray among the almond flowers, and joined the rosy-tinted cyclamens, that blushed and bloomed among the rocks, in proclaiming that winter was 'over and gone;' that henceforth the fields were to rejoice, and the husbandmen to be glad. And in truth the husbandmen were glad; and were out with their oxen ploughing the terraced mountain-sides, and sowing corn, while their wives and children were busy, in the gardens down in the green valley, planting vegetables, or gathering the earliest lettuces, spinach, salads, radishes, cabbages, and cauliflowers, for the Jerusalem market. Oh, what cauliflowers I saw that season! (Siloam is famous for its cauliflowers. All the steep slopes of Ophel and of Zion are planted with forests of cauliflowers, having immense leaves, and heads delicate, close, and white as snow. I saw a man one day carrying one single enormous cauliflower over his shoulder. The stem was considerably thicker than his arm. The head of another, which I measured, was more than thirteen inches in diameter.)

But I must not forget our visit to Beer Eyoob. We had done as all the world was doing—taken a luncheon out for a picnic by the water's side. Abraham, and Rachel, and her brother were to meet us there, and help us to enjoy the day, and to eat our dates and almonds, walnuts and oranges. (The markets were full of Jaffa oranges and sweet lemons.)

What a scene it was at the Kedron! All ranks and all ages of people enjoying themselves,—the Pasha and his suite; the Kadi; the chief rabbi, and all his learned men; Consul and janizaries; Latin monks, and Greek bishops, and black-robed Armenians, and the Syrian bishop; dervishes, negro slaves, and soldiers; peasants and children, seated on carpets and mats, enjoying pipes and coffee, sherbets and sweetmeats; riding, walking, running, playing! What a Babel of tongues! What a variety of costumes and colours—moving or at rest among the trees and the water: companies of white-sheeted women, screaming their shrill note of pleasure; the neighing of gaily dressed horses, tied up to the trees; the laughter of the children, dabbling in the water, making miniature mills of reeds across the runnels, or cascades over large stones; sturdy peasant women chatting to each other across the valley, while they sat barelegged in the stream, beating out and washing blue-dyed garments upon flat stones in the course of the merry brook; itinerant sellers of sweetmeats crying out their wares by poetical names, such as, 'Rest to the throat,' 'Gazelles' hoofs,' sugared almonds, toasted melon seeds, fruits, nuts, and cakes; coffee-makers, with temporary kitchens, built of two or three stones; and men with gay-cut glass narghiles of various colours, ranged in rows, to tempt the smokers. Oh, it was a sight not easily forgotten!

There was fun, too, among the children; and actually, in one place, a group of sturdy young Greek pilgrims were playing at leap-frog—unmindful of the hindrance occasioned by their clumsy, full cotton trousers.

(To be continued.)

LEANING ON THE BELOVED.

TRAVELLING life's wilderness,
Ofttimes in deep distress,
One there is near to bless;
Lean, then, on Him.

He will make dark days bright;
Walk, then, by faith, not sight;
Make it thy chief delight
To lean on Him.

When all seems dark and drear,
Or all is bright and clear,
Strive, strive to feel Him near,
And lean on Him.

Earth, and each earthly thing,
But transient joy can bring;
Cling, then, to Jesus cling,
And lean on Him.

When flesh and heart shall fail,
Treading death's awful vale,
With Him thou shalt prevail:
Lean, then, on Him.

When life's last day is o'er,
Safe on the heavenly shore,
We shall for evermore
Live, live with Him.

C. E. H.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 JOHN IV. 1–3.

Do these words not suit us well in these last days? Do they not seem almost as if written for us, on whom the ends of the world are come? For are not evil men and seducers waxing worse and worse? Are not the subtleties and sophistries of error more plausible and delusive than ever? Do we not need to be ever on our guard, lest we be insensibly and imperceptibly led captive by Satan at his will? As at the first, so at the last, shall the false prophets go forth; and the unclean spirits, like frogs, shall do their work of gathering together the nations to the battle of the great day of God Almighty.

How tenderly does John begin his warning! 'Beloved,' or beloved ones! He speaks as a father; he speaks as the Master himself, in his words and tones. Ah! this is love, which we too seldom feel or manifest.

How mildly does he frame his warning! 'Believe not every spirit.' These spirits of error went forth in his days, each one with a doctrine, each one with an interpretation. Their number was legion. They came claiming to be believed. They had reason, or revelation, or antiquity, or intuition, or learning on their side. 'Believe not every spirit,' says the apostle. 'Be on your guard. Give not your faith at once or implicitly to any one, however urgent his claims, however plausible his creed. It is a solemn thing to believe! It is no matter of taste, or logic, or poetry, or custom; it is something which appeals to the conscience, to the seat of responsibility, to the innermost part of man's soul; it is something which connects us with a coming judgment.'

He speaks of error as connected with some evil spirit; of all lies as originating in the father of lies, and propagated by his emissaries. They hatch them, suggest them, ornament them, present them in every seductive shape. From the day of Adam to our own, this has been the case. Error is Satan's delight; the weapon with which he works, the bait with which he seduces, the poison with which he ruins the soul.

'Try the spirits,' says the apostle. 'Put them to the proof; see whether they bear marks of having come from God. Do not reject unreasonably, or without evidence. Bring them to the test; prove all things. For the danger is great, seeing many false prophets are gone out into the world. They are many! They are spread wide and far. They work wisely and cautiously. They come as near the truth as possible. It is error that they whisper, but it sounds like truth; error from a thousand voices, all of them seeking to mislead, all of them from hell!'

In opposition to these false spirits, we have the Spirit of God—the Holy Ghost. It is He who can alone enable us to discern these, and to overcome. For this end is He given. He is the Spirit of truth; and, as such, he exposes error, and delivers us from it. It is to Him, and not to reason, or science, or intellect, that we are to look for success in opposing falsehood, and in maintaining and witnessing for the truth. He is the Spirit of Christ; and, as such, He specially bears witness to Christ. Where is this true witness-bearing, this confession that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh? We are assured that the Spirit which teaches this is the Spirit of God: 'Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God.' But then, on the other hand, 'every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God.' Here, then, is the test, the divine touchstone; that which separates the true from the false.

It is round the person and work of Christ that all true testimony gathers; and it is against these that all false testimony is directed. This is God's citadel; his Zion; the key of the whole position; the one centre and fortress of religion. Minor truths and minor errors there are; not unimportant either; but it is here that the true and false meet and do battle. All is subordinate to this. The constitution of Christ's person, and the construction or nature of his work—these are the alpha and omega of Scripture; the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. Error elsewhere is injurious, error here is fatal. In vain men cry, 'Ecce homo,' Behold the man, if the man they point to is not the 'Word made flesh,' the very Christ of God.

All error here is antichristian—essentially antichristian. 'This is that spirit of Antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world.' Let us not tamper with error, nor palliate it, nor excuse its propagators, as men of earnest spirit and noble intellect. They may be antichristian for all that; they may be Judases. Let us stand in awe in these days, and shun each departure from the truth. Let us hold fast that which we have received. Let us not be carried away by what is called 'liberality,' or 'breadth,' or 'freshness,' or 'large views;' nor let us be afraid of what is called 'bigotry' and 'narrow-mindedness.' Let us cleave to the divine testimony, in all its completeness, as to the Christ of God; for Christ is all, and in all. Each jot and tittle of his name let us prize, let us reverence; each part of his work let us cleave to, as our anchor, our hope, our joy.

Listen to the Lord's own questions regarding himself:—

1. 'Whom do MEN say that I am?'—Their opinions are no guide, no authority; but it is sometimes needful to know what they say.

2. 'Whom do YE say that I am?'—Ye who profess to know me—ye my disciples?—ye who know the Scriptures?

3. 'What think ye of Christ?'—What is He to you? Are your thoughts of Him right, true, high, scriptural? Do they bring peace into your soul? All true thoughts of Christ are fraught with peace; and if peace has not come in, there must be something wrong in your thoughts concerning Him.

ANOTHER GOSPEL.*

(Continued from p. 519.)

NO miracles, the most stupendous and brilliant, could convince me that what God has written is untrue, and that what man devises must be the truth of God; therefore, let signs and miracles be wrought, they never can prove to me that this book is false. On the strongest evidence, on the clearest and most incontrovertible proofs, I am satisfied that from Genesis to Revelation we have, in the language of man, the inspiration of the Almighty, and having that, I am satisfied to cleave to the Bible. The Prayer Book, the Thirty-nine Articles, the Confession of Faith, hymn-books, and everything of the kind, occupy beside it a humble place. This alone must be exalted as the book that is above all books,—as it is emphatically called, 'The Book,' because there is no other book in the world to match it, or be compared with it. To introduce another gospel is a great crime, it is a great sin. If you were to change the light upon the sea-coast by which vessels steer, how many shipwrecks would there be! If you were to mingle with the waters that the metropolis drinks deadly poison, what a crime would it be! But if God has told us that we are saved through the truth, and by the knowledge of the truth, then, I do say, it is at our peril that we accept anything that controverts that truth, or that we refuse to test by an appeal to the Bible all that pretends to be truth, or that we forget for one moment the Saviour's admonition, 'Search the Scriptures.' 'What say the Scriptures?'

It is a very important line of thought, that we cannot deny one essential doctrine of evangelical Christianity without impinging on and injuring all other truths besides. You may deny a specific ecclesiastical polity, and yet not touch a single vital truth. You may prefer or you may repudiate a liturgy, and yet hold and practise prayer in spirit and in truth. But if you touch or refuse an essential truth, you instantly affect all the essential truths of Christianity. Circumstantial truths must always be distinguished from essential ones. The one is the wine, the other is the cup, either of gold, or silver, or earthenware, that contains it; the one is the thing, the other is the drapery or the embellishment of the thing; the one is the foundation, the other an ornament, or a pillar, or a buttress, subsidiary to the work of the complete and perfect temple. When, therefore, we come to essential truths we leave the class of the circumstantial, about which men may agree to differ, and deal with a class of truths, each of which so depends upon the other, that the rejection of one becomes either the rejection or the deterioration of the whole. And, indeed, analogy might show this. Remove a limb from the body, and all the physical economy is more or less affected by the loss; extinguish one of the seven colours, and the pure light that shines upon the page is pure light no more; put out the sun, and the whole is darkness. Were you to extinguish, if it were possible, the tiniest orb that shines in the infinitude of space, the whole balance of our great mundane economy would be disturbed. Now, if this be so in these things, it is more in reference to the great truths of Christianity. Let me give you instances. Take the atheist; his creed involves the rejection of all the truths of Christianity. Blot out the sun, no flower retains its tints, the sea loses its fluidity. It is a capital error; it is the loss, not of a subsidiary stone, but of the key-stone of the arch. There is conscience and no law, a creature and no Creator; the world has no Maker; and, of course, the Bible has no Divine Author. Take up, therefore, the crotchet of the atheist, his miserable and freezing crotchet, and all Christianity necessarily falls with it. Repudiate the Bible, and then all its doctrines go,—all its hopes, its promises, its joys, its motives go. You are on a stormy sea without a chart, without a compass. You are creatures without a Creator; orphans without a father; strangers, pilgrims, and sojourners, and no prospect of a happy and blessed home. Reject the overruling providence of God, and see how that affects innumerable doctrines of Christianity. If God does not rule, reign, control, withhold, give, then I receive mercies for which I need not praise Him; then in the midst of afflictions I need not pray to Him; then chance regulates the world; then incidents may plunge me in everlasting ruin. In short, deny or repudiate God in orbs and in atoms, God in the movement of an angel and in the fall of a sparrow, God in all that is exquisitely minute and in all that is magnificently great, and you are involved in endless confusion; and there is scarcely a duty, privilege, or belief instilled in the gospel that you must not consistently repudiate. To go a step farther, reject, for instance, the sovereignty of God in his own arrangement of things, and what confusion would that introduce! Then one man may sway Him to do this, another man may sway Him to do that; and were God to listen to the conflicting desires of mankind, the whole world would be in confusion. One man prays for rain, another for sunshine; one for health, another for money. If God were to lay aside his own sovereignty—arranging for what He sees to be best for his glory, and most for our good,—the whole moral management of the world would be chaos, and half the Bible would be inexplicable. Reject the doctrine of human responsibility, and see what it involves. If we are not responsible for our deeds, then law has no authority, its penalties need not alarm us, promises need not cheer us. If we have no responsibility, we are mere automata, moved by a force without us; mere machines, not rational and reflecting beings; and law, promise, precept, penalty, are of no value. But let us come to the more distinctive doctrines of Christianity, and let me assume that you reject that doctrine that lies at the very root of the Christian system,—the entire depravity and alienation of the human heart. I do not mean to say that every man is equally depraved; but that every man by nature has a heart so far gone wrong, that unless it be completely regenerated by the Holy Spirit of God, it never can beat in the atmosphere, light, and sunshine of heaven. If you deny the great doctrine of human depravity, what follows? That man is not dead in trespasses and in sins; that he is not so far gone that it needs the Deity to change him; it is not necessary that he should be born again; he may be patched up, or he may be reformed and improved; he does not need to be revolutionized or regenerated. The sacraments may purify him, the priest's absolution may forgive him; management or diplomacy may put him right, and replace him in paradise. And if he be not utterly depraved, we do not need the Spirit's work within us; for we can do for ourselves what it is his great function to achieve, and replace our own hearts where they should be. This great truth seems to me to lie at the very foundation of the Christian economy; for if it be not true, the interposition of the cross was a work of supererogation; unless our fall was so deep as to be irretrievable by human power, Christ's descent to redeem us was uncalled for. Nothing short of an infinite ruin warrants an infinite interposition. Deny that man is thoroughly fallen, helpless, without God, without Christ, without hope in the world, and you may justly deny that Christ is God, or that He made an atonement. Deny the immortality of the soul, and the whole condition of man is altered. Then you need not live in the prospect of eternity; you need not act as for a future world; you must sow so as to reap now; you must toil so as to be rewarded now. And if you can set a creature afloat upon this world with the belief that he has no existence in the world to come, fears and hopes, sacrifices and duties, bright prospects and terrible penalties, are all vain words idly wasted upon one who has no relationship to that futurity, in relation to which they can play a part or be called into action. Again, deny the deity of our blessed Lord, and what must follow? That He made no atonement. A creature needed atonement for itself; it could not, by the very necessity of the case, make an atonement for another. If Christ were the highest angel in glory, or, as the Arian believes Him to be, the highest creature that ever came from the hand of God, He was utterly incompetent to make an atonement; because, as a creature, He owed to God all man could give; and when He had given all, He had only done that which it was his duty to do. A mere creature, therefore, cannot give merit to others, as he has none to spare; he cannot die for others, as he has no call nor commission to do so. If Christ were the loftiest creature in the universe of God, infinitely and unspeakably innocent, it would have been as great injustice on the part of God to doom that creature to die for me, as it would have been to admit the guiltiest sinner into the realms of glory. For what is God's law? Perfect holiness is perfect happiness; and of this there must be no infraction. What is the counterpart of that law? Sin is infinite and endless misery. Now, to make a perfectly holy creature suffer, and be thus unhappy, is as inconsistent with God's law as to make a sinful creature rejoice and be happy in heaven for ever. And, therefore, by the very law of God's own moral government, an innocent and spotless creature never could have been doomed to suffer; and if he had suffered, he could not have borne and exhausted our curse; and if he had obeyed, he never could have wrought out an excess of righteousness available for others, seeing all that he did and wrought was already mortgaged to God.

*From Ritualism, the Highway to Rome. By Dr. J. CUMMING. London: J. Nisbet and Co.

A Socinian Christ and a Socinian gospel follow. And then what a transformation takes place in the whole of what we believe! The Bible becomes the mere expository of the Decalogue; Calvary is constructed from the ruins of Sinai; the gospel is a directory for the healthy, not a pharmacopœia for the diseased; the pulpit is a desk from which cold lessons are snowed down, and from which no glad tidings of a glorious deliverance are made to thrill the anxious and the waiting heart; the whole New Testament is a second edition of the Law; man is helpless, but there is no strength for him; dying, but there is no life. You show the dead how to walk; you show the sick how to enjoy themselves; you teach the helpless how they are to go forth into the world and be strong; but you do not give life, you do not impart strength; your whole system is a system of direction to them that are well, not a system of prescription and remedy for the sick and the dying.

Suppose you deny the necessity of the Holy Spirit's work, the result must be that you can change your own heart, believe in Christ in your own strength, and fit yourself for heaven in virtue of your own exertions. If I understand the gospel, it is that in Christ's death I have a right to heaven; in the Spirit's work I receive a fitness for heaven; but if it needs God to redeem me, and needs God to sanctify me, how can I for one moment deny the necessity of the Spirit's divine work within me, without denying the necessity of the Saviour's divine work without me? It is a terrible proof of the fall of poor man that it needs God to persuade him to believe that Christ died for him; that it needs a divine work within him to convince him that a divine righteousness was wrought for him and without him. And if you deny that you must be born again by the Holy Spirit, then you may seat yourself in the realms of glory, you may fit yourself for the companionship of the redeemed, and you may stand before the throne with the palm of victory in your hand; and whilst you give the chief praise to Him that redeemed you, there will be an undernote of ceaseless praise to yourself for fitting you for the place you are to occupy in heaven for ever.

Take now the converse of this idea, and suppose, not that you do not need the Spirit, but that the Spirit's work supersedes your own doing, then what will be the result? You lie listless, waiting for a miracle that God has not promised; you cease to sow, because you cannot guarantee the harvest; you cease to labour, because you cannot make sure the results. Whereas, on opening the sacred page, we find that the two things are so intimately associated, that any failure on either side is a failure of all man's hopes and prospects. If, for instance, the husbandman do not sow the seed in spring, and weed the soil, he will have no harvest. On the other hand, if God do not give the sunshine, the showers, and the element of fertility to the soil, man will have no harvest. It is so arranged, that sow and till as man please, he will have no harvest without God's blessing; and it is so ordered that, even if God's blessing were given, unless man sow and till, there will be no harvest. It is the same in the Christian system. If you think that God must do all,—that you may not pray, nor read, nor study, nor think,—you make the sovereignty of God the grave of the responsibility of man. If, on the other hand, you think that you can do all, and that you need not the Spirit's aid, then you exalt man's merit to an equality with God, and you give to a creature the glory that belongs exclusively to Him.

Suppose that the Bible is not the complete rule of faith, and then see where you are landed. You must ask the priest for the taper of his tradition, or you must appeal to the commentary of man to eke out the imperfect communication of God. Once give way to the admission that the Bible, as it is, is not the complete and perfect rule of Christian faith and of Christian conduct, and in that admission you open the door to all the pretensions, the superstitions, and blasphemies of Hildebrand and the popes of the middle ages. Take a wrong notion of the minister of the gospel, assume that he is a priest, a sacrificing priest, and not simply a preacher of the truth, and what does that land you in? If the minister of the gospel be a sacrificing priest, then he must have a sacrifice to offer; then Christ's sacrifice is not complete; he must have an altar on which to offer it; then a communion-table is not sufficient; then Christ's once-shed blood does not cleanse from all sin; then Christ's once-offered sacrifice is not enough. Admit the one corrupting element, and it goes like a ploughshare through all the great truths of the gospel of Christ; or, rather, saps like a deadly poison the great and precious elements of the kingdom of heaven.

We thus see that the way to introduce another gospel, which is not another, is to admit or connive at one single deadly error that touches the fundamental and essential truths of the gospel of Christ. The moment you admit one great error into your creed, you have admitted a human element into contact with a divine one; and as no man can serve two masters, one or other will gain the ascendancy. Wherever, for instance, tradition has been admitted as coeval with inspired scriptural truth, the result has been, not the maintenance of their equality, but the gradual growth of one into absolute ascendancy, and the gradual depression of the other. And when we remember what the human heart is, we know that if a corrupting principle and a deeply; and I could not but think, as I did ponder, what a marvellously clever adversary Satan is! Before you had learned to know the Lord Jesus as your Saviour, how hard that adversary tried to persuade you that you did not need a Saviour! You need a Saviour! Why, what harm had you ever done? Of course, you were not quite perfect—no one was; but then, God was merciful. Your own Bible told you that; at all events, you need not think about such things now; it would be quite time enough when you were dying, or at least when you were tired of the world, and had had all the enjoyment that you could.

But he failed. You did not believe him; you did come to Jesus, and in his precious blood all your sins were washed away. And now, as Satan could not make you believe that you were too good to require a Saviour, he is trying to make you believe that, if you were really a child of God, you would be different from what you are.

And am I right in supposing your trouble to be this? You know many persons who have been deeply tried and chastened of God; you have seen that the discipline was greatly blessed, and then removed. The lesson that the trial was sent to teach was learned, and therefore the trial was taken away. You have been greatly tried—tried, too, in various ways—tried for years; therefore your trials cannot be accomplishing the purpose for which they were sent. And far, far more sorrowful to you than even the trials themselves, heavy though they may be, is the thought that you have not learnt your lesson, and that, for this reason, God cannot stay his chastening hand. You can truly say, that although flesh and heart do sometimes shrink from the prolonged suffering, yet that you are not weary of God's correction, but are sad and disappointed because you need its continuance—because you are so slow a learner in the school of which God himself is the Teacher.

Will you think me unkind or unsympathizing if I venture to say that you remind me of a merry-hearted little boy, who, one wet winter's afternoon, got tired of playing by himself, and could not go to the nursery, for little sister was fast asleep; so he went to look for his mother, and asked her to read him a story.

She was too busy, however; so he had to run away, and amuse himself as best he could. 'I wish I could read for myself,' he said, 'and then I should have plenty to amuse me, and should not care how many wet days there were.' So he determined that he would ask his mother to teach him.

Accordingly, as soon as he saw her disengaged, he said:

'Mother, I would like to learn to read; will you teach me, please?'

'Most willingly, darling,' she replied. 'Bring me the box of letters out of the lower shelf in the cabinet, and I will give you your first lesson this very moment.'

Off he trotted for the letters, and most attentively did he learn the first three, which were all that his mother would teach him then; but so anxious was he to master them all, that in a few days he knew them perfectly.

In great delight, he got a book from which his mother had been in the habit of reading him stories, and, sitting down in his little chair, he thought how nice it was to be able to read. But alas! when he opened the book, he found that, although he knew every letter perfectly, he could not read. He tried page after page, but in vain; and, greatly puzzled and disappointed, he hastened to find his mother, and said in dismay—

'Oh, mother, why can't I read? I know every one of my letters.'

His mother could hardly help laughing; but his grief was so real, that she checked herself, and, stroking his long curls, she said, gently and tenderly:

'But, my child, knowing your letters is only the first lesson in learning to read. You must now learn how to make the letters into words, and then how to make the words into sentences.'

'And when I know how to read, shall I have anything else to learn?' he asked, thoughtfully.

'Yes, indeed, dear,' replied his mother, 'you will have a great many other things to learn.'

'But will they be as difficult as learning to read?' he asked.

'I am afraid they will be more difficult,' was her answer; 'for the easiest lessons are always taught first. You will be obliged to learn a great many things that you could not learn until you know how to read. You will have to learn spelling, and history, and geography, and French, and Latin, and Greek, and—'

But here the child interrupted her, saying, 'I do not think I will mind learning to read, mother. I will go and play with my toys. I think play is nicer than reading.'

His mother allowed him to go; but afterwards she was sorry she had done so, as his letters were forgotten as quickly as they had been learnt. And in another year it was necessary that he should learn them; so he had all the trouble over again; and besides, as he had many other things to do at the same time, he did not learn them with nearly as much ease as he had done at first.

Now, in one way, at all events, are you not somewhat like that little boy? Have you not thought that you were to learn all your lessons in a few days, and that then you were not to have any further trouble?—that in one lesson, and that a short one, your will was to be conformed to the will of God; your patience to have her perfect work; your faith to be unassailable by any of the fiery darts of the wicked one; your love, and peace, and joy to abound; selfishness to be utterly eradicated; pride to be for ever rooted out, and meekness, and gentleness, and humility to take its place?

If such was your expectation, no wonder that you are grieved and disappointed; although, I think, quite as unreasonably so as the foolish little child, who thought that, when he knew his letters, he would know how to read. And was he stupid, or idle, or naughty, or careless, because he did not? Did his mother blame him, or punish him? Oh no; she only told him his mistake, and knew that he would understand all about it when he was a little older. Do not, then, make your heart sad, when God would not have it sad; nor imagine that, because the trials of others have been removed, while yours are still left, that therefore they are not accomplishing the purpose for which they have been sent.

An earthly father does not give all his children exactly the same education. If one of his sons is to be a clergyman, and another a doctor, and another a barrister, he does not train them in the same way; they do not learn the same lessons, nor study the same books. The course of reading which is absolutely essential to the barrister, would be useless to the clergyman; while for him to follow the medical student in his daily walks through the hospital, would be waste of time.

And it is just so with our heavenly Father. He knows, and He alone, the work that He has prepared, and the place that He has assigned, for each one of his children, both here and hereafter. To train and educate them to accomplish that work, and to fill that position, is his great object in all his dealings with them. He knows exactly the character and disposition of each. He knows what needs to be cultivated, and what corrected, and what changed, and what rooted out. He knows, too, the exact means by which his purposes may best be accomplished. Very gently, and patiently, and wisely is his training carried on. He is never in a hurry, never impatient, never makes a mistake. Earthly fathers are sometimes in such a hurry to push their children forward, that they press them too much, and give them lessons beyond their capacity; and then, how often either mind or body gives way!

But God, as I said before, never makes a mistake. He never gives any of his children a lesson which would be too difficult for them to learn, if only they would seek the promised and freely given help of the Holy Spirit. Gently and gradually He leads them on. He never gives to feeble faith the lesson which it would require great faith to learn, or lays a burden too heavy to be carried on the shoulders of the feeblest of his flock.

Do not, then, doubt his wisdom in arranging, or his power in carrying out his purposes towards you, any more than you would doubt his love. Look back for a moment on his past dealings with you, and try if you cannot see that your heavy and prolonged trial has in some measure been blessed. Have you not learned more of God's faithfulness and love? Can you not trust Him more simply than you used to do? Do you not try more continually and more watchfully to subdue your impatience and irritability? Do you not earnestly desire that his whole will should be accomplished in you? And do you not feel that you could thank Him, though it might be with tearful eye and bleeding heart, for any sorrow that would draw you closer to Him, and be the means of conforming you to the image of his dear Son?

If humbly, but truthfully, you can in any measure answer these questions in the affirmative, will you not 'thank God, and take courage,' knowing full well that 'it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of his good pleasure?' (Phil. ii. 13.)

May not these be the very lessons that God has as yet intended your trials to teach you? It may be, indeed, that you have only learned your letters; but you will not any longer be discouraged by finding that you have more to learn. You will not, like the little child, forget what you have learnt, and ask God not to teach you any more. Oh no. I am sure your heart's prayer is, 'That which I see not, teach Thou me' (Job xxxiv. 32). God may be trying you now in a way that you feel you could not have borne a few years ago. But if so, surely it is not necessarily a sign that you have not profited by the lighter one. May it not rather be, that, through his grace given unto you, you have so thoroughly learned the easier lesson, that you may now be given a more difficult one? We do not teach a child to spell until he knows his letters; nor arithmetic, until he knows his figures.

If heavy trials, and long-continued ones, were a proof that those to whom they are sent are not profiting by them, what shall we say to the great apostle of the Gentiles? There is not any one, except our blessed Lord, whose history is given to us in the Bible, whose trials appear to have been so great and incessant as those of St. Paul. Read his own enumeration of them: 'In stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness' (2 Cor. xi. 23–27). And greater, perhaps, than any of these, was what he called 'the messenger of Satan,' that 'thorn in the flesh,' which he so often and so earnestly prayed to have removed, and which yet was left.

Are we, therefore, to suppose that St. Paul was not, as you express it, learning the lessons which God intended those trials to teach him? God forbid! you exclaim, and I echo your words. No; he needed those great and varied trials to fit him for his work, and to conform him to the image of his Saviour; and you need your trials for the very same purpose—to fit you for your work, small and unimportant as it may appear, and to conform you to the likeness of Him, who 'has left us an example that we should follow his steps.'

It is never wise to judge of God's dealings with other people by his dealings with us. There is so much of every one's history known only to God and to themselves, that those who seem to us to be exempt from trial may yet be suffering from one so severe, that our more apparent one would perhaps sink into insignificance beside it. The great thing is for each of us to yield ourselves up entirely to God. Our chief desire should be, 'that He would fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power; that the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in us, and we in Him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Thess. i. 11, 12). How this is to be accomplished, we may safely leave to Him who has formed us for his glory, and who has declared that we 'shall show forth his praise' (Isa. xliii. 21).

We read in the Bible that we 'must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God' (Acts xiv. 22). Will you, then, be disheartened or discouraged because much tribulation is your portion? Those who have a race to run, and a prize to win, are not trained in a day, but are obliged to undergo a long and trying discipline. After the first day's lesson is over, would it be reasonable for one of them to say to the master, under whose instruction he had placed himself, 'To-day's lesson has been lost, because, if I ran for the prize now, I would not win?'

Would not the master say to him, 'Have patience; to-day's lesson is not lost; it will strengthen you to do more to-morrow; and to-morrow's lesson will help you onward still?'

Our God often teaches many lessons at the same time, and by the same trial. Patience, submission, and trust may be some of the lessons He is teaching you simultaneously now,—just as we do not wait to teach a child geography until he knows history perfectly, or French until he knows history. Of one thing, at all events, you may be quite certain—that prolonged, or varied, or heavy trials are not a proof, at least necessarily a proof, that you are not profiting by them. It is the branch that beareth not fruit that is taken away, while the 'branch that beareth fruit is purged,' or pruned, 'that it may bring forth more fruit' (John xv. 2). And when the Great Husbandman asks us not to be weary of his correction, He does not say, for it is not painful, or, for you are not profiting by it, but, 'For whom the Lord loveth He correcteth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth' (Prov. iii. 11, 12). Oh, surely these words were written by Him 'who knoweth our frame, and remembereth that we are dust!' (Ps. ciii. 14.)

Do not, then, as I said before, be disheartened or discouraged, even though you may 'be in heaviness through manifold temptations' (1 Pet. i. 7); for these temptations are sent 'that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ.'

Remember that it is not only the more precious the jewel, the more carefully it is cut and polished; but that even what does not possess any intrinsic value of its own, becomes of importance if it is to have a place in the palace of a king. It must not have the smallest flaw, the slightest defect or imperfection. And if you are to have a place, not merely in the palace, but in the very crown of the King of kings, can you marvel that you need much cutting, and much polishing, before you are fit for such an honour?

It is not by looking at yourself, or by trying to scrutinize the effect of God's dealings with you, that the object of those dealings is accomplished. No. It is while you are looking, not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen, that your afflictions are 'working for you a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory' (1 Cor. iv. 17, 18). It is while you are beholding with open, or unveiled face, 'the glory of the Lord,' that you 'are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord' (2 Cor. iv. 18).

Very dim and very imperfect is that wondrous change as yet; but, when you 'awake' on the resurrection morning, 'you shall be satisfied' with your Saviour's likeness in you (Ps. xvii. 15). You 'shall be like Him,' for the blessed reason that you 'shall see Him as He is' (1 John iii. 2), 'not through a glass darkly, but face to face' (1 Cor. xiii. 12), in all the perfection of his beauty and his glory.

WHY SINNERS DO NOT COME TO CHRIST.

TO come to Christ, is to be willing to be saved by Christ in his own way; which is, to be saved freely, at once, and completely. It is to be willing to receive Christ as the gift of God, and to receive, without money and without price, all that Christ has to give; and then, as an evidence and proof of this, to be willing to serve Christ, and to be found among those who love Him and live to Him. It is to leave the wrong side, and go over to the right side; to go from self to Christ; from the law to the gospel; from living for time, to living for eternity; from seeking a portion in this world, to laying up treasure in heaven. Reader, are you willing thus to go to Christ? When He was on earth, He laid much stress upon willingness. He said of some: 'I would, but ye would not.' 'Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life.' It is the same now. Few are really willing to go to Christ.

Let us inquire into the reason for this. There are many reasons; but all have one root, and that a very bad one. Let us search out these reasons, and, as we do so, seek to go down to the root of them. It is a root bearing gall and wormwood, as thousands have found to their eternal sorrow. But first let us see what are not the reasons. It is not because there are no sinners to go. The world is full of people who need Christ, though they do not want Him nor desire Him. Lost sinners are everywhere, who must go down to the pit, unless they and Christ are brought together.

It is not because they are not invited. Every one who hears the gospel is as much called on to come to Christ, as though an angel from heaven called out his name, and mentioned the place where he lives. It is not because there is such a crowd at Christ's door, that there is no hope of getting near or getting in; for the voice is still sounding, 'Yet there is room.' It is not because others have tried, and not succeeded; for thousands, who have truly gone to Christ, are crying out to others, 'COME! COME!' It is not because another day will do as well; for the Holy Ghost says, 'To-day;' and the finger of God points to the word 'NOW,' written very large. It is not because the sinner can find any real excuse for not coming at once; for if he never comes, he will be 'without excuse' in the day of God. What, then, are the reasons why sinners do not come to Christ?

Some think that Christ will not receive them. Satan tells them so; and they listen to this great liar, rather than to Christ, the true Witness, who says, 'Him that cometh, I will in no wise cast out.' What can be said or done to overcome this evil thought? Let me entreat such to think where Christ has already come to, that so He might be able to say, 'Come unto me.' He came into the world. He came to poverty, sorrow, temptation, to pain, shame, death, and the grave, that He might say 'Come' to you. He has gone to heaven. God has raised Him to his throne, that from it He might say, 'Come!' with mighty emphasis. Oh! do you not think He means what He says, and that He can do what He promises? There ought to be no doubt about this, and so there ought to be no delay. Let there, then, be soul motion towards Christ at once. Go with all your ill deservings; confess all your unworthiness, and you shall find that 'He is able, He is willing;' yea, that He will be delighted to save such as you.

Some do not go to Christ, because they love something else best. They love sin, and do not wish to part with it. They would like Christ to save them at last from God's wrath, but not to save them now from their sins. But this cannot be; nor should any one wish it. Just think, O lover of sin, what it is you love, and who it is you refuse. You love sin, which is the vilest and ugliest thing that can be named; sin that God hates; sin which makes hell what it is; sin which breeds the worm that never dies,—you love that, and you neglect, yea, hate Christ, whom God loves, whom heaven adores, who is everything that is lovely! Is this wise? Will this bear to be thought upon on a dying bed? What will you think of this, if you should die in your sins? and you will, if you go on loving them. Hark! there is a voice now saying, 'Will you leave your sins, and go to Christ?' What will you say to this question? Which will you choose,—poison or health; a hellish serpent or a heavenly Friend,—oh! which?

Some do not come to Christ, because they have something else to do first. Christ tells us of one who had bought a farm, another who had bought some cattle, and a third who had married a wife. All wanted to do something, or enjoy something, just then, before they obeyed God; and so each one said, 'I cannot come.'

Thus it is now: a worldly spirit is one of the greatest hindrances to real decision for Christ. Care quenches conviction; the thorns choke the word; earth outbids heaven. But can riches, or social enjoyment, or business, or science, save the soul? Can they heal its wounds, or satisfy its desires, or furnish a fountain to wash it, a robe to clothe it, or a Spirit to renew it, or a friend to comfort it? Ah no! Besides, you will be able to attend to all lawful things best by coming to Christ first. You will then cease to love sinful things, and you will love lawful things only, as much as you ought. You will be a better parent, husband, wife, child, master, servant, by coming to Christ. Your earthly blessings will then be sanctified. You will have the Holy Spirit to help your infirmities and to strengthen your weakness. You will live for the good of others, because you will live to the glory of God, if you really come to Christ. But if you will not come to Christ till you have got what you call 'just enough of this world,' or have gained the position you want to rise to, you will never come at all. Your heart will get so encased with care, and steeped in the love of this world, that all feeling will die out of you. Conscience will be silent and powerless, until it is roused into eternal activity, just as you enter eternity, and have to leave all behind. Then will conscience shout to your despairing soul, 'Thou fool! whose shall those things be that thou hast provided?'

Some say that they cannot come to Christ, because of their many cares and sorrows. Their poverty and trying circumstances hinder them. This is the very reason why you should come. Other doors of comfort and hope are shut against you; but this one door of happiness and hope stands wide open. Come, ye that are heavy laden, bring all your cares, sins, and sorrows, your perplexities and burdens, to this loving, almighty Saviour. He will take you in, and, having saved you, will help you to bear your burdens. Because you have poverty on earth, is that a good reason why you should put from you heavenly riches? Because you are shut out from human kindness, will you shut yourself out from heavenly love? Because others are unkind to you, will you be cruel to your own soul? The things which you bring as excuses for not coming, are all reasons why you should come, and come now. Yes, come now; 'tis madness to delay. You say that you mean to come some time: why not at once? You do not mean, you say, to perish; but you will, if you stay away from Christ. See that youth, down by the sea-side, picking up shells. The tide is fast rising, and will soon cover the path by which he came down; so that, unless he can climb up these rocks, which no one ever did climb, he will be drowned. Some one sees his danger, and cries, 'Run for your life; there is not a moment to spare!' He listens, he looks, he heeds, for he sees his danger; but not one moment too soon. It is a run for life; it is a rush through breakers almost too strong for him.

But he gets through. Breathless he stands on the shore, and says, 'If I had stopped to pick up a few more shells, I should have been now a corpse beneath yon waves!' Take warning, and 'flee from the wrath to come.' Fly to Jesus. He still says, 'Come.' Obey the call, and you shall not only escape, but enter upon a new state, possess a new heart, be called by a new name, and at last be found in the 'new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.'

'WHAT DO I WANT?'

SOME years ago a young lady of Boston presented herself to an evangelical pastor, proposing publicly to profess her faith in Christ. The suggestion greatly surprised him, as all her family were noted for their adherence to what he regarded as 'another gospel,' and for their consequent aversion to strict Bible views of human sinfulness and divine redemption. He was anxious to know the true state of her mind; and the way being thus prepared, she unreservedly gave him a record of her religious life.

'I was taught from early childhood to think much of the natural goodness of the human heart, and of the almost angelic purity to which a soul, trained under refining domestic and social influences, might attain even in this life. That every heart, or, indeed, that any heart was wholly depraved, and needed a divine influence to purify and save it, I was taught to disbelieve and deny. I was told to love God as my Creator and Father, who loved me, and gave me all my blessings, and I supposed that I did so.

'Jesus I was taught to love as the best and most perfect man that ever lived, who came to set the world an example of spotless purity, teaching the sublimest and most ennobling faith, and dying to prove that faith and that life sincere. All this seemed beautiful to me, and though it did not touch my heart deeply, yet it won my admiring regard, and I was satisfied with God, and with Christ, and with myself.

'But a year ago the trial of such a religion came upon me with great suddenness. My mother, whom I loved almost to idolatry, was seized with a violent illness. She was conscious of death's approach, and distressed in view of it. At her request a clergyman was sent for, and as none of our own ministers could be procured without too much delay, an evangelical pastor was brought to her bedside to pray with her.

'To his inquiry, "What shall I ask of the Lord for you?" her only and agitated reply was, "That my sins may be forgiven, if possible."

'Oh, I shall never forget that prayer—never! At first I was wholly incredulous of the idea that my mother could be a sinner. She had always seemed to me so nearly perfect, that it had been the height of my ambition to resemble her; and the thought of prayer for her, as wicked and needing forgiveness, shocked and repelled me.

'But as the minister knelt and made confession, on her behalf, of the sins which had justly called the wrath of God upon a human soul, my eyes were opened. I saw that no outward morality could meet the requirements of that divine law, which reached to the thoughts and intents of the heart. I saw that God justly claimed the perfect obedience of his creatures, and that failing in this obedience, all were under its righteous penalty. Then I felt that I, still more than my mother, needed to pray for pardon.

'But my heart was full of bitterness instead of penitence. And now that the Divine Being, whom I had supposed I loved, had interfered with my happiness, and taken from me my darling mother, I was conscious of hard and rebellious feelings towards Him. This in turn increased my sense of guilt and condemnation; for I knew that He was holy, just, and good. So I became as miserable and wretched as I was sinful.

'My friends gently chid me for my extreme and long-continued depression, which they supposed arose from my great bereavement, and tried to persuade me to seek relief in social recreations. Even my minister advised me to "go out more with my young friends, and take more cheerful views of life, lest I should become morbid."

'None of these attempts gave me any comfort; for the trouble was between God and my own soul, and until there was peace with Him, there could be no peace for me.

'I was thinking one day of my miserable state of mind, and contrasting it with the careless ease of my life hitherto, when it suddenly occurred to me whether my previous tranquillity, after which I sometimes yearned, was not based upon error, and so worthless and unsound. Certainly my religious training had been defective in one particular, I was sure. It had not imparted those estimates and convictions of sin which I now saw and felt to be true. Might there not be other and grave deficiencies? How could I know?

'I would not go to any clergyman; my ministers had led me wrong, and I distrusted them. But there was the Bible, that must be true. I would try to learn the truth at the fountain-head. I took the blessed book in my hand, and then stopped to ask myself, "What do I want?" "Pardon and peace," was the instant answer of my soul. Then I thought, as God only can give me what I want, I will ask Him to help me search his own word.

'I did so humbly and earnestly, and sat down to read the Bible as I had never read it before. And oh! what light and truth I found in every page! Especially that great central truth—a Divine Redeemer,—how it flashed into my poor dark nature, showing me depths of ingratitude and baseness unseen hitherto! How it illumined with love and pity the face of my offended God and Father! how it placed a rock beneath my sliding feet, and outstretched arms for my weary head and aching heart!

'The death of Christ as an atonement for sin was the only and all-sufficient guarantee of the pardon and peace of which I was in perishing need. His blood to answer the law's demands on my behalf; his Spirit to do what no human training or power can accomplish in renewing a sinful heart; his promised grace to lead me home to heaven,—all, all stood revealed in the gospel, and was sealed by the Holy Ghost, as I humbly trust, to my salvation.

'Now I love the Lord for what He is, and for what He has done for me; and I want to testify that love by confessing Him before men, hoping that He will at last confess me before his Father and the holy angels.' E. N. H.

SINGULAR INCIDENT.

A REGIMENT of French soldiers, on their march to the Crimea, halted for some days at Toulon, in the south of France. While there, a colporteur came among them. A young soldier, pretending to be much moved by the good man's exhortations, asked for a copy, which was of course given to him. The soldier and his comrades roared with laughter, telling the poor colporteur that it was all a joke; but the soldier refused to return the book, saying, 'It would do to light his pipe with.' The colporteur replied, 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God!'

Fifteen months afterwards, the same colporteur stopped for a night at an inn more than three hundred miles from Toulon. The landlady was in great distress, having just lost her son, of whom she spoke in terms of the most tender affection. He conversed with her for a few moments, when she withdrew; but soon returned, bringing a little book, which her deceased son had left to her as his precious legacy.

It was much mutilated, many pages having been torn out. But on the inside of the cover, written in large letters, was the following inscription: 'Received at Toulon, on the ——, 1855. Despised at first, and badly used; but afterwards read, believed, and made the instrument of my salvation. J. L., fusilier of the 4th company of the — regiment of the line.'

From the condition of the little volume, it was plain that the young soldier had made use of the missing leaves to light his pipe, as he had boasted he should. But, as he related to his mother, this work of destruction was stopped on the evening before a battle, in which his regiment was to occupy the perilous post of the advanced guard. He stated that at this juncture serious thoughts came into his mind in a very strange manner; and all on a sudden the words of the man whom he had tricked out of the book, came to his recollection like a thunder clap: 'It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God!' 'And if I should fall into his hands?' This thought hunted him, he said, without intermission, the whole of the night; and, in consequence, as soon as it became light in the morning, he took from his knapsack the book which appeared to have become his accuser. The verses which he had read in the dim grey light of that morning had been brought home to his heart by the Holy Spirit. In the battle which ensued he was severely wounded. Old things had passed away, and he had now realized the truth of the faithful saying, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life.'

After removal from one hospital to another, he was brought back to his home about six weeks before the visit of the colporteur. The mutilated Testament was scarcely ever out of his hand during his waking moments. It was the only one he ever possessed—perhaps the only one in his native village. His mouth was full of tender entreaties that his dear mother and friends might embrace Christ and his salvation. To his very last breath he ceased not to exhort them all to accept God's offered mercy in Jesus, and not to run the risk of falling, in an unconverted state, 'into the hands of the living God.'

AN HOUR OF TRIAL AND CONFLICT.

WEARY and faint, where shall I lay my head?
On whom but Christ! whose arm of love outspread,
Invites me to return, and seek his face,
Assur'd He still will prove a hiding-place—
A covert from the storm—a sure retreat—
A refuge from the angry waves that beat
Against my feeble bark, whose every sail
Is rent and torn, and which each passing gale
Well-nigh o'erwhelms beneath the raging deep,
Whose fierce, tempestuous surges furious sweep
Out of deep waters! Lord, to Thee I cry;
In infinite compassion bend thine eye;
Oh! save me from the floods that round me roll,
And threaten to engulph my trembling soul.

G. B. C.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'If these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out.'—LUKE XIX. 40.

THE meaning of this passage is briefly this: 'Christ must have praise somewhere; if not at one place, and by one class, then assuredly at another, and by another. Rather than that He should not have this, a miracle would be wrought, and the stones made to cry out.'

Christ must have praise. Why?

I. Because it is his due.—It is due to his person. He is Son of God, and Son of man; the possessor of all created and all uncreated excellence; the centre of every divine and every human perfection. Praise is his due, his right, his lawful and necessary claim. It is due to Him as the Word made flesh, as Messiah, as the King that cometh in the name of the Lord. It is due to his work and office. He comes as the revealer of the Father, and the Father's will; the executor of the Father's purpose; the object of the Father's love; the doer of the mighty work, in which the Father was to be glorified, and peace made, and love carried out to the sinner in a righteous way.

II. Because it is the Father's purpose.—That purpose is, that Christ should be praised; that He should receive honour, and glory, and blessing. The Father presents Him to us as the great object of universal praise. He says, 'Let all the angels of God worship Him;' let all men worship Him; let creation worship Him; let this earth worship Him—even its stones. For such a purpose,—concentrating all praise on Jesus,—He must have infinitely wise reasons, even though we did not see them. But what has been made known concerning the person and work of Messiah, shows how infinitely reasonable and glorious that purpose is.

There are some who dislike this praise and this purpose. Such were the Pharisees. Not the 'publicans and sinners.' Self-righteousness,—a self-justifying, self-exalting religion,—is the most opposed to the praise of Christ. The professors of it hate such praise. They cannot bear to hear it from others, far less to give it themselves. The voice of praise calls forth their enmity. There are others who are simply silent. They are engrossed with other things, or indifferent. They do not trouble themselves about the matter. They close their lips and their ears. Does either of these classes describe any here? Are there some disregarding the Father's purpose, and giving no praise to Him whom He delighteth to honour? What! neither praise nor love? neither homage nor obedience?

Now, what will this refusal, this silence, this anger do?

1. It will not profit themselves.—It will not make them happier. It will not secure any favour or honour for them. It will not forward their prospects for eternity. It will not avail them in the day of wrath, or serve them at the judgment-seat.

2. It will not lessen Christ's honour.—He will still deserve the honour, though they refuse to give it. He will still be the infinitely lovable, infinitely glorious One, possessed of the 'name that is above every name.'

3. It will not silence others.—Heaven will still praise Him, the redeemed will still praise Him. His enemies may be dumb, but that will not silence angels. It will not close one lip, nor cause one tongue to falter.

4. It will not hinder the fulfilment of the Father's purpose.—That purpose shall stand, whoever may resist. If these be silent, the stones shall immediately cry out. If one will not praise Him, another shall. He must have praise; and that praise shall never sink lower than a certain amount. If it should do so, from the silence of those who were expected to praise Him, others, even the unlikeliest—even the dead creation, the stones,—will cry out; cry out in praise, and cry out against the wretched men who have refused the honour. God's purpose concerning Christ, and the praise due to Him, shall be carried out to the uttermost, both in time and eternity, both in earth and heaven. That purpose is even now unfolding itself. Christ is glorified, even here. There are some that praise Him, in every kingdom, and out of every kindred; and every new soul gathered in adds to the song of praise. All earth shall yet praise Him. Creation's universal song of praise shall begin when He returns, in his glory, to make all things new. All heaven praises, and shall praise Him. Every angel glorifies Him. The host of heaven ascribe blessing to the Lamb. Nay, all the universe shall yet praise Him. Everything that hath breath and being shall praise Him. Sun, moon, and stars shall praise Him, throughout the widest space!

Are you praising Him, brethren,—by lip and life, by word and deed; helping others to praise Him,—gathering in the unpraising ones of earth, that they may praise Him?

Will you praise Him, O men? You who have praised self, the creature, the world,—'nature,' as you call it,—will you now begin to praise Him, who is infinitely worthy of all your praise and love?

THE BELIEVER'S PORTION.

BY THE REV. JOHN MILNE, PERTH.

1 Cor. iii. 21-23.

GOD'S children are minors here. They have not yet come to their inheritance and everlasting possession. They should have an onward, upward, heavenward look. But Paul in this place, speaking by the Spirit, says that there is a sense in which God's children have a portion even now, and even here. The heir of a large property stands in a very different relation to that property from what other men do. He can look upon it, and say, 'This is mine; really, inalienably mine, though I have not yet entered on the full enjoyment of it.' And so the apostle here says, 'All things are yours;' now yours, already yours. Does this sound paradoxical? does it seem contradicted by fact and daily experience? Let us see. Let us take a few items or samples of the believer's present portion.

'Paul, Apollos, Cephas, are yours.' The Corinthian Christians had been quarrelling about the comparative merits, and gifts, and usefulness of their different ministers. They had been saying, 'I am of Paul, and I of Apollos.' The apostle seeks to raise them above this narrow, carnal view of things. He says, 'They are all yours; all the ministers and means of grace are yours; they are all intended for the growth, comfort, and edification of that body of which you are members, and for the work and glory of Him who is your Head and Husband. They are all your servants for Jesus' sake, and therefore you should feel a hearty interest in them all; you should pray for their welfare, and rejoice in their success. They are all earthen vessels, compassed about with infirmity, and all needing sympathy and support. They are men of different gifts, different ranks; they have different parts to fill, and different spheres to occupy; some to plough, some to sow, some to plant, some to water: but they are all serving Christ, and so serving you; all seeking to promote his joy, and so to promote your joy; all seeking to complete his fulness, and so to complete your fulness. He holds them all in his right hand, and prays that their faith may not fail.' Should not you hold them all up in the arms of faith and love, and pray that they may be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, and that they may get grace to quit them like men in the day of battle? Is not this the right state of feeling, this large Christian l'esprit de corps? There should be no rivalry, no setting of man over against man. We should be thankful that the church has so many to do her work and seek her welfare. Our heart's desire should be, that they may be all more and more endued with power by the Holy Ghost. Is it not true, that we never know our personal interest in the means of grace till we believe on Christ? we never know their value, power, and sweetness? But when we come to Him, then the Bible becomes ours, the Sabbath ours, the house of God ours, the ministers ours. We say, 'They are God's mouth to me; they search me, find me, speak to my heart.'

The world is yours. The apostle to the Romans says, that Abraham was heir of the world; and so are all who have his faith. 'The meek shall inherit the earth.' But even now, children of God, the world is yours. You alone make the right use of it. It is your path to glory; it is your nursery, your training-place, your working-place, where you lay up treasures in heaven, and where you ripen, and go home. It is your body's quiet resting-place, till the Master comes. It is for your sakes that the world is spared, kept up, and blessed. When the waters of the deluge lay upon the earth, God remembered Noah, and removed them away. When Sodom was to be destroyed, the angels could do nothing till Lot was in safety. And so the world will remain till all God's children have left it. All that is going on in the world is overruled for the good of the church, and of individual believers. Its vicissitudes and changes, trials and sorrows, are all turned into means of grace. Even its external aspect has a new meaning and power, when a man is born again. The child of God looks upon it, and says, 'It is all my Father's. "The heavens declare his glory, and the firmament shows his handiwork."'

Life is yours. It is an opportunity of serving, enjoying, and spreading the knowledge of your Lord. Till men come to Christ, life is wasted, lost, spent on vanity. Paul calls it 'loss,' 'dross,' 'dung.' It has all to be blotted out and forgiven. Hence, when a child of God is asked how old he is, he dates his life from the time of his second birth. He in a manner envies those who were in Christ before him. It is then that real life begins; all before is but vain show.

Death is yours. When God's children die, they are at rest; they have done with their trials, toils, and sorrows; better still, they have done with their sins. They go to Christ, which is great gain. They are perhaps enabled to glorify God in their dying hour: friends are encouraged by the grace they manifest; and some, who were thoughtless, are led to seek the Lord. Sometimes their memoirs are published, as in the case of R. M'Cheyne, by a congenial spirit, and far more are benefited by their death than even by their life.

Things present are yours. They all work together for your good. Even those things that, for the moment, seem contrary and hostile, soon change their character, and become friendly and helpful, so that we glory in tribulations also. We are the slaves of things present till we believe: then we change places, through Christ; we become the masters, and they the servants. They minister to us. They chip, and smooth, and polish the stones for the everlasting temple.

Things to come are yours. The elder Brother has gone to take possession for you. He says, 'I go to prepare a place for you.' The new heavens and new earth are for you. The whole creation is bound up with you; it cannot be renewed and glorified without you. It is 'waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God.' But even now you have the good of things to come. You feed on the promises, you taste the earnests, you live under the power of the unseen world. Thus you see that grace changes all things; it makes all things yours.

Objections.—Yes, I know there are objections, for I have felt them myself. You say, 'Is there not some juggle here? are you not coming over us, and mystifying us with plausible words?' Let us think of a case or two. Perhaps you say, 'I am a helpless invalid. I can never attend the public means of grace, and no minister ever comes to see me.' I do not justify this state of things; I mourn that it should ever occur. But, neglected, overlooked child of God, go up by faith, and join your elder Brother in his watch-tower on high, and you will at once see that ministers and means of grace are working for you; they are helping and comforting your companions in distress. You will rejoice in their joy, and will return comforted to your solitary lot, feeling that, though you are forgotten by man, you are not forgotten by God; and that, meanwhile, the cause nearest and dearest to your heart is advancing to its blessed consummation.

The world.—You say, 'I have little beyond bread and water.' Well, but you have God's blessing; and you can say, 'The Lord is my Shepherd.' You cannot tell how far your poor, needy condition may be the basket of silver, in which your golden apples of grace and contentment appear to the greatest advantage, and preach a continual sermon to those around you. The world is yours, through the want of it.

Life.—'How,' says the believing, bereaved parent—'how is this the property of my little one; taken away in the bud, when it has scarcely begun to live?' But, sorrowing one, it has lived long enough to be a part of the world, which God has loved; to be a member of Adam's fallen race, and so capable of the great salvation. But another says, 'I have lived—lived long; but such a life!—ceaseless infirmity and pain.' Friend, remember that 'these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, are working for you a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.'

Death.—We sometimes think this hard to account for. In our haste and ignorance, we perhaps venture to call it mysterious, premature, —taken away in the beginning of days, in the promise of usefulness, when most needed. But we are bad judges. There is a depth of meaning in that word, 'Taken away from the evil to come!' Perhaps it might have been well for Hezekiah if he had not lived to tarnish the beauty of his early days. 'Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints,'—the time, the manner, the place. Let us leave it with Him, and say, 'Just and true are thy judgments; yea, our God is merciful.'

Friend, are you in Christ? then all things are yours. Are you out of Christ? then you are poor indeed. But come to Him at once, just as you are, and then you will be rich, now and for ever!

RECOLLECTIONS OF HOME MISSION WORK.

BY A LADY VISITOR.

NO. XX.—MRS. M'INTOSH.

ON the side of a noble hill, overlooking a narrow Highland glen,—beautiful as ever poet or romancer dreamt of,—stands a little cottage, which, judging from appearances, has not been built during the last two centuries.

It is inhabited by an old woman and her daughter. Simple-minded the old lady is, perfectly ignorant of all conventionalisms. Little wonder, when she has never been beyond sight of her native hills! Simple-minded did I say she was? Well, yes—yet no, also; for though untutored in anything like art, her unsophisticated spirit had long since burst all the trammels that would have fixed her status—spiritually and intellectually at least—little higher than a mountain zoophyte.

Without the least apparent consciousness of the fact, in her character has been manifested all the elements of a heroine. Very nobly, indeed, and very successfully also, has she done battle with poverty, ignorance, and Romanism. And just as, when the fight is over, the master of the hard-won field, with honest pride, directs attention to this point, where some favourite manœuvre was successfully carried out; or to that other, where, perhaps, some well-timed impromptu helped so greatly towards the general rout,—so this fine old character, mistress of herself and of circumstances, takes the greatest pleasure in speaking—not ostentatiously, however—of the victories she has won, and of the grace which has made her more than conqueror.

Her library, in early life, consisted almost solely of a Bible, and a history of the world, printed in 1611. A rare old book the last was, with descriptions of places, histories of nations and individuals, explanations of natural phenomena, etc., sufficiently grotesque in the light of modern discoveries.

One day, while we were having an interesting talk on the training of children, I questioned the correctness of some of her statements, and wished to know the source of her information. Without saying a word, she left the room, and in a few minutes returned with a ponderous volume—the old history before mentioned.

Laying it on the table, she said, in a manner perfectly inimitable—

'Ay, the like o' you, that reads lots o' books, maun come upon gey queer things!'

Evidently it had not occurred to her to question the correctness of her old informer; but, reasoning from what she found in it, concluded that I, having read so many more books than she, must have come upon things still more extraordinary than those to which she had just given utterance. She also expressed a wish to know some of them.

As her own system of training had been successful under great disadvantages, and supposing, from her peculiar character, that it would be original also, I wished to draw her out on that subject. I endeavoured, therefore, to turn the conversation from the queer things read, to the equally queer things seen and experienced in every-day life.

In order to accomplish my purpose, I had, of course, to contribute my own quota. And as it may not be amiss that others should know something of the way in which much of the young life, in many of our large towns and cities, is nurtured, I may, before proceeding with Mrs. M'Intosh and her interesting history, state a few of the facts related to her, as coming under my own observation.

In the Saturday Review of July 30, 1859, it is stated that, about a century before that date, the proportion of children that died in London workhouses was twenty-three out of every twenty-four.

Fearful carnage this! and yet, less fearful is it to see these precious, beautiful beings waste and die, than to see them continuing to exist under such conditions of life as are to be found in the homes of the vicious.

Not many visitors but have seen enough to understand and sympathize with Mrs. Wightman, when, after describing a visit to the home of a drunkard, she says, in reference to the children:

'May God forgive me, if, in the agony of my soul, I have knelt down on the floor beside them, and prayed that they might never more waken!'

How often do we find the fountain of infant life poisoned by the use of spirituous liquors! Instead of the physical beauty and strength, intellectual power, and that infinite, priceless capability of virtue and happiness, which might be developed, there is one foul, seething mass of suffering, disease, and death!

How abnormal such circumstances, when, despite the pain of seeing young children die, a hearty 'Thank God!' is often elicited, when one and another of the helpless victims escape the still more dreadful infliction of life under such conditions!

I remember being requested by Dr. —— to look after a poor woman and her twin children. She was a drunkard; and the miserable condition under which these beautiful children made their debût on the stage of life is indescribable. Much was done to ameliorate; but it was of little use, while the mother remained what she was.

At length death came, and released one of the little sufferers. The other lingered on a few weeks, and, during that time, presented a most curious phenomenon. Its little countenance began gradually to assume all the appearance of old age. Deep wrinkles marked its forehead. Its cheeks became wasted and hollow, while its features set into that peculiar style, where nose and chin come into close proximity. The babe of eight weeks presented all the appearance of an old man of eighty years, though only in miniature. It was a painful sight; and death never seemed so beautiful as when it released that little sufferer.

Unhappily, this was no solitary instance. In the same street lived a woman, who 'brought up,' as she termed it, the children of a daughter, who travelled about with her husband hawking. One after another of the little ones wasted and died; the third one was ill when I called to see the grandmother.

That day she was sitting feeding it with a beverage smelling strongly of whisky; and in a little time I found out that a mixture of whisky and sweet milk was the only thing she gave it.

I endeavoured to convince her that it was hurtful to the child, and that it was most probably the cause of its extreme irritability and puny appearance. But no; she was not to be moved from her own opinion, that this mixture was the best possible thing it could have. So, in a little time, it also escaped away, to meet its little brothers in a better world.

From a multitude of other cases, I select only one other, as it shows how very surely the seeds of drunkenness and death are sown by giving spirits to young children. It is that of Anthony Lannigan, an Irish boy, who died, about eight years of age, a confirmed drunkard.

'Tony,' as his mother called him, had been ill for a considerable time, and was quite confined to bed when I called to see him. His home was a little attic, in one of the dingy closes in ——. In a small recess or closet of the large room stood his little bed, extremely clean and neat, though everything about it denoted great poverty.

He was very much wasted. Bushy black hair, and small keen eyes of the same colour, contrasted strangely with an almost infantile set of features of marbly paleness.

His mother received me in true Irish fashion. Many a blessing did her voluble tongue invoke on my head for coming to see her Tony.

'Here, Tony, my darlint! Here's a lady come to see you, aroon! to tell you all the beautiful things about heaven and the Saviour. But it's meself that's glad to see you,' etc.

Tony took all this very quietly. Except a side-long glance from his cunning-looking eye, he seemed quite imperturbable. There seemed to me a sad lack of the freshness and simplicity of childhood about him, although I did not then know how sin had withered and made old the heart in his little breast.

At his mother's request, he repeated to me several hymns, such as 'The Happy Land,' and 'Rest for the Weary,' etc. And most touching it was to see the little creature lying so helpless, and hear him repeat them, in a sweet, tinkling, though rather high-set tone of voice. And I did hope, with the friend who wished me to call upon them, that the Holy Spirit, in the deep sanctuary of his heart, had breathed the breath of life, and that he had really become a living soul.

To some of his mother's questions, he replied in a sharp, formal sort of manner; but seemed much interested when heaven was spoken of. His conceptions of its happiness I found to be very gross, however, when I began to converse a little with him. Still, when I reflected that the mother of this child had, until recently, been a Roman Catholic, and so could have given him but very little correct teaching, I felt quite disposed to acquiesce in the opinion of my friend, that he was an interesting little fellow.

By this thought, and his youth, I was thrown off my guard to a great extent. I am sure, had I seen in a grown-up person half the suspicious-looking circumstances, I would have been inclined to set him down a rank hypocrite.

It seemed a sort of wasting or consumption that was his complaint. He was allowed, by Dr. ——, a certain amount of spirits daily; and as they were very poor, I often left a little money to help in getting it.

I could not help beginning to notice that it went extremely soon. I knew the mother did not drink, so was puzzled to account for this. My uneasiness was also increased by finding out that Dr. —— not only ordered so much spirits daily, but also supplied it; and that another lady, who also visited them, left money for the same purpose.

On my next visit, knowing that Miss —— had given some money recently, I did not, as usual, leave them anything. This was a great disappointment to Tony. The little fury behaved in such a way to his mother, for not acting her part better, that she resolved, whatever the consequences were, that she would no longer conceal his real character.

When I called again, the mother was remarkably quiet; neither did she come into the recess all the time I spoke to Tony as usual. But when I was ready to come away, she did so. An extraordinary look passed between the mother and child; but she turned away from him quickly, and said to me—

'I cannot but tell you, alanna, though it crushes me to the earth to do it, that my Tony, the child of my heart, is a drunkard!' Then, spreading her hands upon her face, she wept, as if in agony.

For several minutes there was unbroken silence. I looked at the child; while he, in turn, lay gazing at his mother, with a look of intense malignity.

'Can that be possible?'

'Yes, it is quite true. My Tony, seven times dearer than the soul within, would sell the shirt off his back for whisky! Oh, it's my heart that's sore, sore! Many's the tear I've shed to meself for my soul's darlint!'

It would lengthen this little narrative too much, to relate all that passed at this painful interview. But the substance of what I learned, was that, after her husband's death, she had to go out washing, etc., to provide for herself and children. As Tony was but a baby, the woman with whom he was left in charge had given him drink, to keep him quiet, make him sleep, etc. Thus the poor child became its victim. Gradually enough, perhaps, this deadly work was done. And though probably taken at the first with reluctance, his desire for the destructive draught had now become insatiable.

The mother went on to tell me how he had raged, and sworn, and screamed at such a rate, as brought in the neighbours to see what was the matter; and but for their interference, she would have been compelled to go and pawn the last dress that she had, to get drink for him, as I had left no money.

For the truth of her account, she referred me to any of the neighbours; and from them I afterwards learned that he swore in the most appalling manner at his mother always when a visitor left without giving money, as he thought it was owing to her not having acted her part better.

During the time his mother gave me this dismal account, Tony lay perfectly still. I sat down again beside his little bed, and, taking his hand, I said—

'Poor child! this is very sad.' He looked very indifferent. 'Do you know that I am very sorry for you?'

'You are angry,' he said.

'No, I'm not angry; but you were very angry just now—weren't you?' He did not speak. 'And if I had not been here, you would have cursed your mother again.' His little frame shook, but still he did not speak. 'Now, I'm not angry at all, but sorry for you; and I must tell you why I am so. You remember the pretty little hymn, that you sometimes repeat to me—

"Around the throne of God in heaven?"

and you remember, too, that part which says—

"What brought them to that world above,
That heaven so bright and fair;
Where all is peace, and joy, and love:
What brought these children there?
Because the Saviour shed his blood,
To wash away their sin:
Bathed in that pure and precious flood,
Behold them white and clean?'

Well, I am afraid, Tony, that unless you become a very different boy, you will not be permitted to join that happy band.'

'Is that for the drink?' he inquired.

'Not so much for the drink, Tony,—for I think that bad woman, who gave it to you when a baby, and made you like it before you knew that it was wrong, is far more to blame than you; but it is for the way you behave to your mother, and the bad things you do to her. Now, you know she loves you very much; and since God took your father away, she has had to work very hard, to get clothes and food for you, and a home to live in. And what return are you making? Why, you curse her, and do all the bad things you can to her, when she won't tell lies, and sell her clothes, to get drink for you. I do not think it possible, therefore, that a little boy who does that, can get into a place "where all is peace, and joy, and love;" so I am sorry for you,' etc.

It would be tedious to relate more, perhaps; so I merely state, that any little improvement, during the few months that he lived, was always followed by a corresponding relapse.

At last death came; not lovingly. Hatred, hypocrisy, and sin had long darkened his little face; and deeper and deeper grew the ghastly imprint, as it gained its dread victory. It is a fearful thing thus to wait and watch for its approach, when there is no light of hope around the dying pillow! Poor Tony! his last words were such as no one would wish to hear repeated.

Such a death teaches important lessons. May the relation of it incline some heart to commiserate the suffering myriads of little children, and do something also to help in sealing up the terrible vampire in its grave, which now stalks abroad so widely, sucking the life's blood of so many helpless ones!

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE eight weeks' holidays were drawing rapidly to a close, for the summer vacation was always a long one, and Madge was beginning with some regret to anticipate a speedy return to school; not but she was very happy when there, but then it was so delightful to visit in Chelsea Place, that she found it hard work to say good-bye, and go back to lessons and school discipline. Tom had already resumed evening studies, and Mr. and Mrs. Bennett were talking of returning to Leighton. All was in a transition state, and an unusual degree of excitement manifested itself amongst the usually quiet Harleys. Mr. Harley had been for some weeks inquiring after some occupation, considering he ought to be doing something for his family; but he had been invariably unsuccessful, a result which his relatives fully expected, though they did not like to discourage him by hinting it. Mr. Bennett had taken the young Harleys one day to see the Donovans, and Tom was gone out for a walk with his father; and the two sisters, Mrs. Bennett and Mrs. Harley, had at last a long morning to themselves. They went over the large old house together, and held a protracted conversation with nurse about domestic affairs, and then they returned to the dining-room, and sitting side by side, talked of those that were gone, and those God had spared to them, making themselves the link between the living and the dead. Truly they had had their sorrows; but like the plant which yields a pleasing perfume beneath the bruising hand or foot, so they, beneath the chastening hand of the Almighty, had been enabled to produce some of the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and could testify that, in the midst of affliction, God's comforts had refreshed their souls. It was a melancholy pleasure to those loving sisters and mothers to speak of those little ones—whose feet should never more patter in their earthly homes, and whose gladsome voices should never again sound like music in their ears—as living in the presence of the Lord, uniting their lisping praises with the songs of angels, and archangels, and all the company of heaven, in honour of the children's Saviour and Friend. And though tears trickled down their cheeks, and they clasped each other's hand more tightly, yet the mutual language of their soul was, It is well. They had been so occupied in conversation that neither Mrs. Bennett nor her sister had heard a carriage stop outside; and it was not until Mary had opened the dining-room door, and given to Mrs. Harley a card, that they became aware of the presence of a stranger.

'Colonel Allen!' exclaimed Mrs. Harley, rising and extending her hand; 'what an unexpected pleasure!'

The Colonel assured her it was one he had been long anticipating, and which he was delighted to realize; and that it was gratifying to meet with a kindly welcome after a twenty-one years' absence, though it came from persons he had never seen before. He then heard that Madge was expected to return every minute, and apologizing to Mrs. Harley for withdrawing to one of the windows, he stationed himself there to watch for her arrival.

He was a slight-made man, of middle height, with grizzled or iron-grey hair, and black eyes and eyebrows, with a countenance denoting extreme kindness, yet decision of character. And as he stood at the window, now glancing from it, and now addressing himself to the ladies, they thought they had seldom met with a more prepossessing face. A quarter of an hour, or perhaps more, elapsed before Mr. Bennett and his young companions made their appearance, when Mary, who had been instructed by her mistress, informed Madge that some one wanted to see her in the dining-room.

'Do wait, Conny and Dora,' she whispered, 'I shall not be many minutes in there; no one of any consequence can want me,' and in she went. But when she saw a thin, dark gentleman come from the window to meet her, she gave a great bound, and throwing her arms around him, screamed out, 'It's papa! my own papa!'

Constance and the rest of the party hearing Madge's scream of delight, could not withstand the temptation of taking a peep at the Colonel; but the keen black eyes discovered them instantly, and holding Madge with one arm, he stretched out the other, saying, 'Come all of you; Madge's father must know you all, and love you for her sake.' They needed no second invitation, but gathered round him, shaking his hand; and Guy put up his rosy lips, crying, 'Kiss me, please, I love Madge very much, indeed I do,' which set them all laughing. Madge's first inquiry was, after she had recovered a little from her surprise, and found herself alone with her father (Mrs. Harley having taken all away with her when she left the room)—

'Where is dear old Jenkins, papa?'

'Oh, I left him in London for the present, in charge of the baggage.'

'But you will bring him down here, will you not?'

'Yes, when my plans are a little settled.'

'And oh, papa, do you know—have you had my last letter?'

'I have not received any since the early part of May; the rest have crossed me on the road, my dear.'

'Then you have not heard good Mr. Harley has lost nearly all his money. And brave Tom (the one who found me when I ran away) is working his way in the world. And nearly all the servants are sent away; and Mr. and Mrs. Harley have their meals with us; and all is so changed, except that they are kinder than ever, and I am happier than ever.'

'Do you really mean Mr. Harley has been unfortunate?'

'He has lost nearly all his money. But I do not think he calls himself unfortunate since Tom gained the exhibition.'

'Exhibition, Madge?'

'Yes, Tom gained honours at school,—a sort of prize, papa; only it is a money prize, not a book. Why, it is forty pounds a year. But I have a prize of my own, and you must see it; such a beauty, papa!' and off she darted to fetch it, leaving Colonel Allen to reflect on the changes and chances in this mortal life.

When Madge returned, she was accompanied by Mr. Harley, who cordially greeted the Colonel, and after a short conversation, invited him to make their house his present home, if he did not object to their quiet mode of life.

The Colonel thankfully accepted his invitation for a few days; and Madge, delighted beyond measure, ran off to the schoolroom to communicate the pleasing intelligence, Mr. Harley and her father remaining together in the dining-room. The affection and unity of purpose which pervaded the Harley household, most strongly impressed the Colonel's mind.

Accustomed to command, and to be implicitly obeyed, he knew little or nothing of that 'spirit which works by love;' and when the few days of his visit had come to an end, he felt irresistibly drawn towards Madge's friends, and wished that his lot had been cast among them. This wish having been confided to Mr. Bennett, that gentleman entered most fully into it, and drew from the Colonel the secret desire of his heart, which was that he and his old servant, Jenkins, might be received at Chelsea Place as one of the Harley family, and continue with them for at least the coming winter. 'If I am a disagreeable member, they can expel me,' he said. 'But if they will give me houseroom, Mr. Bennett, I shall consider myself under lasting obligations. Money is no object, nor is fashionable society either; I care for neither. All I wish is a quiet home near my child; and surely, if happiness is to be found, it is here, beneath the roof of these excellent people.'

The Harleys required some little time to consider the Colonel's proposal; but promised they would let him know in a few days; and having taken Madge back to school, he returned to London, to await their decision. Mr. and Mrs. Bennett were so much in favour of the Colonel's plan, that they soon won Mrs. Harley over to their way of thinking; and she, readily foreseeing the benefit a sensible companion might prove to her husband, endeavoured all she could to induce him to give his consent. But for the first day or two he would scarcely hear of it; but having met with another repulse in his efforts to obtain employment, he at last agreed to the proposition, feeling that the Colonel's handsome allowance would materially lessen his wife's anxiety about domestic matters, and the Colonel was accordingly written to, and invited to winter at Chelsea Place. In less than a week Colonel Allen and Jenkins arrived, and another female servant was added to Mrs. Harley's household, such an addition being perfectly necessary and consistent with the new arrangement; and once more the anxious expression disappeared from the pale, patient face of Mrs. Harley, as she realized that now she should be able, without effort, to make two ends meet.

As to Jenkins, he had not been a couple of days in the house, before he had ingratiated himself with all the family. He studied old nurse's comfort in everything, played with Guy and Agnes, answered the door-bell, assisted in waiting at table, and made himself not only generally useful, but a general favourite with all parties.

CHAPTER XV.

Colonel Allen's regular habits were a source of much comfort to the Harleys; and his society proved most beneficial to Mr. Harley, who thoroughly enjoyed his company, and not unfrequently accompanied him in his walks; and it was always with a feeling of gratitude and relief Mrs. Harley saw them start together on an exploring expedition. Tom continued to work hard, determined if possible to keep the position at college which he had attained the previous half. It was no small honour to be second boy at Lotsirl College, and so Tom and all his friends knew; but Dora, in her love and anxiety for Tom's welfare, desired for him a higher, nobler position than any earthly distinction could confer. She longed to know that he was ranked amongst the nobility of heaven, with a good hope which none can take away.

'Oh, Tom,' she said one day, when she could bear her uncertainty about him no longer, 'do you love God?'

'Love God, Dora! Of course I try to love Him,' replied Tom, astonished at her question.

'Try, Tom! Don't you really know whether you do or not?'

'Do you, Dora?'

'Oh yes,' and Dora's face attested she spoke the truth.

'But how can I really know?' asked Tom.

'How do you know whether you love aunt, or uncle, or me?'

'Why, of course I know that, Dora. I could not help loving those who love me. There, run along, little coz. I want to prepare some Greek for to-morrow.'

'Oh, Tom, do answer me,' pleaded Dora.

'But I cannot, Dora. What can I say? I really do not know whether I love God as you mean. Certainly I do not as I do mamma, and papa, and you.'

'Oh, Tom, I am so sorry,' said Dora, with a deep sigh. 'And you so clever and high at college.'

'Whatever does that matter, in connection with religion?' inquired Tom, rather impatiently.

'Oh, it makes it so much the worse,' she replied; 'for Jesus says, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"' And Dora, without further comment, left the room.

In vain Tom turned over his books, and sought to understand the subject he was endeavouring to prepare, after Dora had gone, but he could not. Her pained look, her solemn words, kept rising in his mind. She was quite right, he thought; if he loved God he ought to know it, and he felt the knowledge was one of the greatest importance to him. How dreadful would it be, to be approved by man, and disapproved by God; honoured and exalted upon earth, but the gates of heaven closed upon him; and Tom shuddered at the very idea! He was inclined to be angry with Dora for having disturbed his peace of mind, knowing that allowances might be made for the ignorant; but henceforth his would be wilful ignorance, and, continuing in such a state, there could be no extenuation. With Tom it was a case of must, or duty. It was, no love to God here, no heaven hereafter; and he had yet to learn the force of the apostle and evangelist's words, 'We love Him because He first loved us.' He had to be taught that the argument he had used to prove to Dora why he loved his parents and herself, were equally applicable to his right appreciation of his love to God. It was a long time before Tom could settle into his studies that evening, for he had to contend with the difficulties arising from a disturbed mind, and divided attention, and he had scarcely concluded them when the bell rang for reading and prayers. He fancied Dora seemed to shun him when he entered the room, for she went and sat by Colonel Allen; but when family worship was over, and they were dispersing for the night, she put her arms around his neck, as he stooped to kiss her, and whispered, 'Dear Tom, "God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us,"' and before he could make any reply she was gone. But he had looked into her eyes—those eyes which he and Madge were wont to tease her about, calling them chameleon,—and there was such an expression of tenderness and affection in them, that he chided himself for having doubted her kindly feeling towards him for a moment.

'"God commendeth his love towards us,"' repeated Tom, when alone in his room; 'that is, He would recommend it to our notice. He would have us think of it as worthy of our consideration,' continued Tom. 'It is strange I should never have thought of it before. Surely the love of God ought not to need recommendation. One sees it everywhere.' But do you feel it? something within him seemed to ask. And Tom was obliged to acknowledge to himself that he did not; and it was with more lowly views of his own nature, and more exalted ideas of God's condescension to man, that he bent before the throne of grace, and prayed to be led into all truth. Early instructed in the gospel, he knew by the hearing of the ear the wondrous scheme of man's redemption, and its marvellous fulfilment in the Son of God; but he had yet to learn what little Johnny had been so divinely taught. He had not a doubt that Jesus had died; but he was not able to say, 'He died for me;' and in that appropriating 'for me' alone the love is found which links the sinner to the Saviour. A sore struggle was going on in Tom's heart; for the great enemy of souls uses all his devices to ensnare and keep the youthful captive in his net. The strong man which keepeth the city yieldeth not until a stronger than he hath come; but Tom, from a child, had heard of one 'mighty to save,' and betook himself at once to Him who saveth 'to the uttermost.' Mighty to save, and mighty to hear, is our great High Priest, Jesus, who hath passed into heaven, and there intercedes for all who come unto Him; and so Dora felt that night, as, slipping out of bed when nurse had taken away the light, she pleaded for Cousin Tom in prayer and supplication. Hers was the faith which availeth much; for it was the simple, confiding trust of a child, pouring out its wishes and wants to a loving parent, knowing that only what was hurtful would be denied.

Days, weeks, and more than a month passed by, and Tom and Dora continued praying. He did not know his little cousin was constant in prayer for him, for no allusion had afterwards been made to her conversation by either. Tom was always so busy with his books, that, unless Dora purposely sought him in the study, she seldom saw him alone. Besides, she had so much to occupy her own time, now that she was getting older, that she had not much leisure. What with practising music for Signor Piozzi, French for Madame Giroux, drawing for Mr. White, German for Mademoiselle Lineau, and general information for Miss Mills, she could ill afford to be idle. She was intelligent and industrious, but not nearly so clever as her cousin Constance; and, consequently, the acquiring knowledge was far more difficult to her. As to music, whilst learning of Miss Mills, she loved it dearly; but when she became a pupil of Signor Piozzi, she all but hated it. The talented, impetuous Italian but little understood the thoughtful, sensitive child he had to teach, and by his restlessness and impatience made her literally dread his lessons. She tried to please him, and endeavoured to learn her pieces correctly; but when the time came for her to play them before him, she invariably made a number of mistakes, eliciting such shrugs of the shoulders, such shakes of the head, and such exclamations in broken English, that, had she dared, she would have rushed out of the room and left the hasty foreigner to himself or Miss Mills. How glad she was that his lesson came only twice in a week, and lasted but an hour; and how often she determined that, when she was grown up, she would never touch a piano again! Dora was sitting one autumn afternoon, about six or seven weeks after her talk with Tom, listlessly leaning out of the open window, hoping thereby to cool her burning face, and calm her ruffled spirit. It had been a bad afternoon with her, for Signor Piozzi had gone off in a pet with her, saying, 'Ah! you English, you are so—why, insensato;' and Miss Mills had said, 'Really, Dora, you are getting very stupid,' and poor Dora felt she had been judged harshly, for she had erred from fear, not stupidity; and she wished the signor and the piano at the antipodes. She had sat a long time seeing nothing, and caring for nothing externally, but internally thinking over her grievances, when she heard her name called; and, looking up, she saw Tom standing a short distance from her.

'Oh, Tom!' she cried, springing up, 'I am so glad to see you. I want you or somebody very much. I am all wrong this afternoon.'

'Little sister,' he said, so tenderly that it hardly seemed kind but teasing Cousin Tom's voice, 'and I wanted you;' and he held open his arms towards her.

'Oh, did you?' she exclaimed, bounding forwards, and laying her fevered cheek against him. 'Dear Tom, do talk to me. I do not feel happy as I used to before Signor Piozzi used to come. I wish he would not come again, or I could be as clever as you or Constance.'

'Dora,' replied Tom, 'you are better than clever to me. You have been my monitor and best friend. You have tried to lead me to God. Dora darling, I can say now, I love God.'

'Is it true?' questioned Dora, raising her eyes inquiringly towards him.

'Yes, Dora. I hope henceforth to be able to say, "I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me"' (Gal. ii. 20).

Dora's heart was too full to give utterance to her feelings; she could only rest her head upon Tom's breast, and weep for very joy. After a little while she grew calmer, and she and Tom went and sat in the open window, when he observed:

'I do not want any one just yet to know my secret, Dora. I am so afraid I shall say or do something wrong, which the boys or people will cast at me, if they know what I have told you. I do not mind being laughed at, and called Methodist, canty, or too good, at school; but I should be very vexed if, in my love of fun, I should disgrace my religious profession. Therefore, Dora, you will not tell any one until I give you leave, will you?'

'Oh no, Tom; but I am so glad for you, Tom. Dear old Tom!' and Dora stroked his hand affectionately.

'It seems to me cowardly to be ashamed to tell what I feel. How I wish I had never teased poor Moore so at school! I, with the rest, used to think it was mean of him when he would not join in our tricks; and we used to call him "No pluck," and "Fear-doctor," and "Canty," and all sorts of ridiculous names; but he never got angry and said unkind things again. He was one of the best-hearted of the first class boys, I can tell you, Dora, though we teased and used him so badly. Many and many a can of water have I helped to pour on him when he has been reading one of his good books behind the shed in the play-ground. He used to get there to be quiet; and we had to climb on the roof to do it. But he never told of us, though he knew it was 200 lines imposition for any one that got there. I understand now what helped him to bear with us, and I wish I had known it then.'

'Cannot you tell him now how sorry you are, Tom?'

'No, Dora; he is gone away. He left last half. Doctor said he was the noblest boy in the school; and during the five years he had been with him, he had never been in disgrace.'

'What was his name, Tom, that I may remember him sometimes, when Signor Piozzi is cross with me for not trying when I do try?'

'Walter Moore.'

'Poor Walter! I will try and be patient like you, and will ask God to make me so;' and the flush having faded from Dora's cheek, and her bright spirit having regained its wonted cheerfulness, she tripped off to arrange her hair, which she had pushed off her face, at first in annoyance, and later from excitement, and had so sadly disarranged, that Tom declared her head looked as if it had 'been drawn through a gooseberry bush.' As she left the room, she turned round to have one more good look at Tom, who was still standing by the window, and, unable to restrain her feelings, she called out, 'Tom, you are real beautiful now, because you are a Christian; for God loves you, and you love God; and, oh, I never was so happy!' and then away she ran.

(To be continued.)

PRAY ON.

I HAD a brother once, now more than a brother. He was wild, wayward, reckless. Elder brother as he was, and the natural guide of a younger, I could not look to him for an example of good. He loved the wine-cup, he loved the paths of folly and sensual pleasure. When a boy—for God showed his great mercy to me in calling me early to a knowledge of himself—I used to pray for him often, with agony of soul. But on he went in his career of folly and sin, a burden and a grief to his parents.

We grew up to manhood. Still prayer seemed unavailing. He had intelligence, ability. He might have been a useful, a happy, and a distinguished man. But he clung to his idols. At times, indeed, there was reflection, remorse, and a feeble effort to break away from his chains; but this soon passed, and he was as before.

Prayer followed him still—the prayers and tears of a believing mother, whose heart swelled well-nigh unto breaking. But apparently there was no answer. He became a wanderer, went to sea, roamed in foreign lands. What he suffered we never knew. He returned destitute, wretched, a mere wreck of his former self; returned to a widowed mother, for our father had passed away. For a time he reformed, and hope again sprang up, alas! too soon to be dashed. His old habits resumed their wonted power.

Once more he goes forth; now to the distant west. Years pass—years of anxiety. Our loved mother, whose prayers, and patience, and hope never ceased, in a ripe old age goes to her gracious reward, her prayers unanswered, her hopes unrealized. But they were all laid up before God. Time in its ceaseless course rolls on. More than sixty winters whiten the head of that brother. Increasing infirmities warn him of the approaching end; yet he lives on without God, he turns in anger from every gospel appeal.

The ocean rolls between us; but on a foreign shore, to which God in his providence has called me, my heart anxiously turns to the loved ones in my native land. Shall that brother descend to the grave having no interest in the Great Redeemer? Shall he in the great day be the only one of this family circle who has no crown to cast at his feet? It seems like hoping against hope, yet prayer in his behalf ceases not. Letters come, the seals are eagerly broken. What do I read? Is it possible? Is prayer, after so many years of patient waiting, indeed answered? Yes, that brother, so long, so very long a wanderer, sits at the feet of Jesus, clothed and in his right mind.

Hope deferred makes the heart sick; but when, after years of waiting, hope is realized, what joy fills the soul! It is not always so. Henry Martyn, when he gained that on which, during years of toil, his heart had been set, and appeared as senior wrangler in the university, exclaimed, 'I obtained the object of my highest wishes, and found I had grasped a shadow.' But a shadow is not what I grasp. Enduring as eternity is this joy that fills my heart. A brother born into the kingdom of God; a brother made an heir, a joint-heir with Christ. Kingdoms may fall, cities may become desolate, earth may pass away, but his song of praise shall never cease. O my soul, magnify the Lord, who is indeed the hearer of prayer! Rejoice, for your joy no man taketh from you. Poverty may come, toil may come, change may come, sickness may come, death may come; but this joy remains, eternal as Jesus Christ himself, the author and finisher of our faith.

A. W. H.

THE VOLUNTARY SUFFERER.

'I hid not my face from shame and spitting.'—Isa. l. 6.

Here we have wanton barbarity, willing surrender, and a gracious design. In order to have our minds properly impressed with the 'grace of our Lord Jesus Christ,' as displayed in this act, and that our expectations from this grace might be very large, we should consider who it is that speaks of himself thus. How frequently does the word 'I' occur in this description! There is no egotism in using it, no exaggeration in the description He gives; there could not be, for his person is infinite, and his sufferings unexampled. Just listen to some other testimonies where the word occurs: 'I that speak unto thee, am He;' 'Before Abraham was, I am;' 'Thou deaf and dumb spirit, I charge thee come out of him, and enter no more into him;' 'Young man, I say unto thee, Arise;' 'I am the Good Shepherd;' 'I am the true vine;' 'I am the Bread of Life;' 'I am the Son of God;' and yet 'I hid not my face from shame and spitting.' That face in which God's glory shines, that face before which the heavens and earth shall flee away, was spit upon! He who lay in the bosom of the Father was spit upon, and He hid not his face from it! He might have hidden it among the blazing array of twelve legions of angels; but He would not. And why not? His own answer is, 'How then should the Scripture be fulfilled?' Jesus was an intelligent, voluntary, sublime, and vicarious sufferer. He knew all that should come upon Him; met all with unshrinking courage; exercised all graces while He suffered; and did all for the sake of others. How willing will He be to save, who was so willing to suffer! What honour and happiness will He bestow on those for whom He bore such shame! This it was that sustained Him: 'For the joy set before Him He endured the cross, He despised the shame.' He solaced his soul with God's promises, and with the prospect of coming glory. While He stood silent before mocking Herod, vacillating Pilate, and the envious priests, He was revolving over in his mind the wondrous words written by Isaiah, yea, fulfilling them, and giving to every syllable form and substance. Thus, with steady faith and undimmed hope, He walked through his great sea of sorrow, working out a complete salvation, and leaving us a perfect example. While we rest alone on Him for life, let us be willing to suffer for his sake, and not hide ourselves from anything whereby He may be glorified.

'The Lord of love on Calvary,
A meek and suffering stranger,
Upraised to heaven his languid eye
In nature's hour of danger.
For man He bore the weight of woe,
For man He gave his blood to flow,
And met God's righteous anger.

The Lord of love, the Lord of might,
The King of all created,
Shall back return to claim his right,
On clouds of glory seated,
With trumpet sound, and angel's song,
And hallelujahs loud and long,'
O'er death and hell defeated.'

THE REASONABLE REQUEST.

'Thy hands have made me, and fashioned me: give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments.'—Ps. cxix. 73.

The Psalmist is here intelligently considering himself, and devoutly recognising God's hand in his own existence, preservation, and circumstances. This was frequently the habit of holy men. While they surveyed all creation, they did not overlook themselves. Thus it was with Job (x. 8–12) and David (Ps. cxxxix. 13, 14). It is well to think of the mercy and mystery connected with our existence. To trace the union of mind and matter, and especially to think of our capabilities, immortality, and responsibility, is most reasonable and useful. But all should be done devotionally. 'He hath made us, and not we ourselves;' therefore 'let us kneel before the Lord our Maker.' This fact is forgotten by most. The workmanship of God deny or doubt his existence; and many who allow it, 'honour Him not as God, neither are they thankful.'

But the Psalmist saw something more in himself than mere creatureship. He saw himself ruined and defiled by sin, which, like a deep and dreadful die, had saturated his nature. God had not left him, but had introduced a new life into his soul, and thus remade him. He was God's workmanship in the highest sense.

The proof of this is seen in the soul's turning to God in trustful love and earnest prayer. It is the new creature which cries, 'Give me understanding,' etc. Here is an appreciation of God's words, by which the soul was begotten to a new life, and by which the new life was nourished. Here is a desire to apprehend its meaning, and to yield to its requirements. A degree of darkness yet remained, but there was docility and desire; and where these are, everything good must be. God loves the spirit of little children, and will attend to the prayer of faith. Such shall possess the mercies and know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven.

'High throned on heaven's eternal hill,
In number, weight, and measure still Thou sweetly ordereth all that is;
And yet Thou deign'dst to come to me,
And guide my steps, that I with Thee
Enthroned may reign in endless bliss.'

---

WHERE ARE THE MORALISTS?

The word of God divides mankind into two classes, which it designates by different names,—as saints and sinners, the righteous and the wicked, the just and the unjust, the good and the bad.

Those whom men call moralists, and whom they regard as occupying ground midway between the above-named classes, God, who sees the hidden recesses of the heart, and knows what is in man, places among the wicked. Men will be so divided throughout time, and in eternity.

If any one wishes to see a beautiful illustration of this truth, let him read carefully the first psalm.

It seems wonderful how any one can receive it as the inspired word of God, and believe either in the existence of a third class, or in the doctrine of universal salvation. Its closing verses are: 'Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous. For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous; but the way of the ungodly shall perish.'

If further illustration is needed, see the various representations of the scene on the judgment day, as given in the New Testament. That found in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew is, perhaps, as plain as any. Its concluding words are: 'And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal.' But two classes—then and for ever.

Let all remember, then, that while men are called moralists because of the correctness of their external conduct, that God regards them as sinners—'children of wrath, even as others,' and 'condemned already.'

There is no safety where there is no union with Christ by a living faith. He that is in Christ, has a principle of life in him that will distinguish him, in time and through eternity, as a child of God. He that remains out of Christ is now, and will be for ever, condemned as a sinner and enemy of God.

Reader, trust not in morality, so called. Rest not until you have found Christ, and have eternal life begun in you.

'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him' (John iii. 36).

G. K. M.

THE NESS GLEN.

How sweet the glen down which the torrent roars,
And classic Doon its infant fury pours!
Aloft, on either side, the rocks uprear
The bloom and beauty of the smiling year—
Magnificence of foliage shooting high,
To meet the bending glory of the sky;
Green rhododendron, pine and mountain fern,
The blended meek and bold, the sweet and stern,
The meadow queen's autumnal fragrance shed,
With scent of thyme and mint from heather bed.
The wood-ruff wraps the elm, and, bending o'er
Its cliff, the willow hides the torrent's roar.
The fretted water rushes to the cool
Seclusion of a lily-shaded pool,
Then rests awhile, then eddies forth in might,
To wage with breeze and rock a foamy fight.

Sweet Ness, in Scotland's days of trial past,
Amid thy bracken shelter from the blast,
Our covenant heroes found, who stood the strife
For Scotland's cause, and for the word of life.
Their nest-like hiding-place the mirrored moon
Gladdened, from quiet depths of glassy Doon;
And as they gazed, they thought of holy spheres,
Where sun nor moon should guide the rolling years.

Where shoots the crag from yon pine-feathered steep,
Has guardian angel watched the martyr's sleep,
And blessed him, as his soul arose in dream,
Beyond the rushing wind, the roar of stream,
The bay of blood-hound, and the crouching spy,
The smouldering cottage of his infancy.
To Eden's fields, life's river and its tree,
His eyes again the lost and loved ones see.
But hark! the hunter's shout, the felon stroke;
The tortured body leaps from rock to rock;
Till free from pain, with suffering heart at rest,
From Doon's low bank the spirit joins the blest.

Sweet Glen of Ness, I might imagine thee
Emblem of life, in scenes afar that be
From crowd and tumult, where the soul, shut in
From outward strife, encounters shapes of sin,—
Passion and error, pride and scorn of rules,
Life's linns and quicksands, crags and gloomy pools;
By keen remorse youth's headlong fury rent,
By pain and shame impetuous folly pent,
Till the soul, sad with fruitless sorrow, seeks
A glimpse of heaven from life-secluded creeks.
Nor seeks in vain. Its path of torture past,
Faith guides its course to hallowed calm at last.

What cleft the rock, and clothed with lithe festoon,
Thicket and furzy copse, thy cradle, Doon?
What force thy granite barriers burst asunder,
And made thy infant couch a beauteous wonder?
What eye beholds and guides thy torrent o'er
The booming cliffs to Ayr's resounding shore?
Watches the humming bee, the heather bell,
The life that stirs the pool and clothes the fell?
The hand, the eye of Him who comes to reign
With martyrs on thy craggy margin slain;
With saints whose ashes sleep beneath the cairn
On Wardlaw's brow, or wilds of drear Carsphairn;
The slain at Airsmoss, and the men whose blood
Bedewed Drumclog, and crimsoned Irvine's flood.

—G. Paulin.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

'The fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.'—1 Cor. i. 9.

God's faithfulness is our resting-place. His true and unchanging love is our security. From first to last it is with a 'faithful' God that we have to do. The Eternal God is our refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms. There is none like the God of Jeshurun,—'the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness nor shadow of turning.'

It is this faithful God who calls us, saves us, blesses us, keeps us. It is He who begins the good work in us, and 'will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ.' He 'will keep what we have committed to Him.'

This calling of his is often referred to. That which He calls us out of is noted: 'Who hath called you out of darkness' (1 Pet. ii. 9). That to which He calls us is also noted: 'Called unto liberty' (Gal. v. 13); 'called to glory' (2 Pet. i. 3); 'called you unto his kingdom and glory' (1 Thess. ii. 12). That by which He calls us is also noted: 'Called by grace' (Gal. i. 15); 'called by our gospel' (2 Thess. ii. 14). But, in the passage before us, it is simply said that we are called into 'the fellowship of his Son.' What does this mean?

'Fellowship' does not mean friendship, or converse, or sympathy; it means 'partnership'—sharing what belongs to others: 'All that I have is thine.' Thus the word is used Luke v. 10: 'Which were partners with Simon.' There is not merely partaking of something as the gift, but sharing, as common property, what another possesses. It is business partnership, family partnership, filial partnership, conjugal partnership, the partnership of adoption or heritage. Our text embraces all these, when it speaks of our being called to 'the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ;' just as, in the Hebrews, it is said that we 'are made partakers of Christ.' So that intercourse with Christ is only part of the boundless privilege which fellowship implies.

Let us consider this fellowship, or partnership with Christ, in the following aspects:—

I. Partnership with Him in what He was.—He was crucified, He died, was buried, rose again. In all these we have part. Not that we helped Him to do his work and to bear his cross; not that we were joint-sinbearers, assisting Him to save us. In all this He was alone—suffering the wrath alone. But still we are said to be crucified with Him, to have died with Him, to be buried with Him, to have risen with Him. One cross, one death, one grave, one resurrection. Such is our fellowship with Him, that God looks on us as one with Him in all these things; treats us as having passed through what He did, as if we had actually paid the eternal penalty, and were entitled to the eternal righteousness. In believing, we enter on this partnership, and into all the benefits of his death and resurrection. As one with Him, all these are ours.

II. Partnership with Him in what He is.—He has not only risen, but He has ascended; He has been seated on the throne of the Majesty in the heavens. We share this present dignity; for we are said to be seated with Him in heavenly places, and are treated by God as such. His ascension is ours, his dignity and glory are ours. We are still, no doubt, here on earth; but we are called to feel, and act, and live as those who are already at the right hand of God. Simple forgiveness is not all our portion. We are raised higher than this; raised into high favour with God, and made to share in the fulness which belongs to Christ, as the risen, and ascended, and glorified Son of man. Besides all this, we share his name, and are called 'sons of God.' We share the Father's love: 'That the love wherewith Thou hast loved me may be in them.' We share his offices: we are prophets, priests, and kings; heirs of God, and joint-heirs of Christ Jesus.

III. Partnership with Him in what He shall be.—Much of his glory is yet in reserve; for now we see not yet all things put under Him. The day of glory and dominion; the day of the crown, and the throne, and the royal robe, is coming; and in all that we are to have fellowship with Him, as one with Him, members of his body, sharing the glory of the Head; as the bride of Christ, sharing the glory of the Bridegroom; one with Him in all this honour throughout eternity.

Thus, then, there is complete fellowship with Christ. It is to this that we are called by a faithful God; and is it not a high and glorious calling,—fellowship in his cross, his grave, his resurrection, his throne, his glory? All this faith secures to us; and of all this the Holy Spirit bears witness to us. Believing, we are reconciled, saved, accepted, blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus.

Let us understand our calling,—what it makes us now, what it shall make us hereafter; for 'it doth not yet appear what we shall be.' Oneness with the Son of God is the key to all this mystery, the root of all this blessing.

Let us walk worthy of it, as men who really believe it; happy, holy, unworldly, zealous, generous, loving. Let us carry the consciousness of our calling into everything, great or small; into business, daily life, recreations, reading, conversation, everything; maintaining our true position before men; manifesting our proper character; letting the world know our prospects; and doing nothing inconsistent with what we profess to be now, and with what we shall be when the Lord comes.

THE CHRISTIAN'S RULE OF LIFE.*

'Being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ.'—1 Cor. ix. 21.

IN this expression, St. Paul describes the exact condition of a true believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. He introduces it, as a parenthesis, in the midst of a discourse upon the freedom which he claimed in his ministry of the gospel. He declares his cheerful conformity to the various habits and prejudices of those to whom he ministered, that he might be made the instrument of winning them to Christ; so that, though he was wholly free from the authority of men, yet he willingly submitted himself to their customs and desires, that he might gain the more. But he would not have this varying compliance with the feelings of others, in things indifferent, construed into a neglect, on his part, of the unvarying authority and law of God, as if he were without any abiding rule in this relation.

He felt himself entirely free from all those appointments and precepts, which had been given to his nation, that had been fulfilled and ended in Christ. But to the permanent precepts of holiness, which God had proclaimed in connection with these, he could not be indifferent. They were written in his heart with a divine power. They governed his conduct with an unceasing constraint. His joyful acceptance of the hopes and promises of the gospel, had confirmed and increased the power of these precepts over his heart. He was 'not without law to God,' because he was 'under the law to Christ.' The Saviour whom he served, and in whom he had his whole relation to God, had renewed for him the same perfect standard of obedience, and had added new and more powerful motives to lead him to love and regard it. He thus describes the condition of every believer,—entire and everlasting freedom from the law, as a dispensation of condemnation and death; but everlasting and delightful subjection to the law, as a rule of conformity to Christ, leading to entire love to God, and universal love to men for his sake. The great salvation of the Lord Jesus, though it is founded upon a perfect satisfaction of the law, in all its penalties and precepts, as a righteousness for man, adopts all the holy commandments of the law, as the rule of life and conduct, for those who have accepted this righteousness, and been made partakers of this salvation.

This is the condition of every justified man. He has been delivered from the bondage of the law. He is made free from its denunciations. It has no penalties to demand of him, and no judgments to inflict upon him. It has no longer dominion over him. He is not under the law. He is in possession of a divine righteousness, through the gift of grace, which meets all its claims, and sets him free from its power for ever. But he is not without law in his relation to God. He has been placed under a new dispensation, which furnishes new obligations to a holy obedience to God, presents new motives to this obedience, and gives him new power to put them into actual effect. He is under the law to Christ, who has bought him with a price, and perpetuated and confirmed upon him every divine commandment. The motives to obedience are changed; the influence and effects of this obedience are also changed; but the rule of holiness remains the same; and, in the same conformity to it, he 'glorifies God in his body, and his spirit, which are his.'

The man who has truly embraced the gospel of the Lord Jesus, has cast out all dependence upon his own obedience, and rests his whole hope of justification before God upon the perfect righteousness of his divinely appointed Saviour. He does not expect to earn a single hour of peace or glory by his own holiness of character. The obedience in which he trusts, and in which he envelopes himself by faith, was long since finished. He cannot add an iota of merit to that great offering which has been, once for all, made for his soul, and which has perfected his title and his hope for ever. The inheritance has been given him by promise, through grace; and he labours, and strives, and obeys, from love and gratitude to Him who hath bestowed it, and that he may become prepared and capable for the enjoyment of that glory, for which he is apprehended of Christ Jesus. But as his rule of character—as the governing standard of his life—the law hath dominion over him so long as he liveth. By its precepts he is led to bring forth fruits of holiness unto God. And perfectly righteous as he is, in the imputed righteousness of his Lord, he labours to become increasingly holy in the spirit and character of his mind, that he may honour Him who hath chosen him to be his servant.

* Lectures on the Law and the Gospel. By Dr. Tyng. Edinburgh: D. Grant. 1867.

To this view of the divine law I desire now to call your attention. It is the perfect rule of life to every believer in the Lord Jesus; governing him, as the declaration of his Saviour's will; and made, by the renewing of the Holy Spirit, the standard of his choice, and the path in which he delights to walk. In the work of justification, our own obedience forms no part. Our righteousness, and the righteousness of Christ our Lord, are opposites here. We have renounced the one, that we may gain the other. We are taught to 'count all things loss, that we may win Christ, and be found in Him, not having our own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness of God by faith.' We are accepted in his obedience alone. We are thus accepted, when with our hearts we believe in Him. But being accepted, and having 'obtained access through Him into this grace wherein we stand, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God,' the precepts of God's holy law become the rule of our life; we are made ready and able to say, 'O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day.'

The divine law is the believer's rule of life. It is the perfect and unalterable standard, to which his character is to become conformed. In itself it is perfectly excellent and holy. It is a description and transcript of the character and perfections of the Creator himself. A conformity to its precepts is an attainment of the pure and holy image of God. Righteousness is an entire fulfilment of these precepts. Holiness is a conformity to the image of God, in which they are thus embodied. And though man can never have this perfect righteousness in himself, the believer increasingly attains this holiness—this conformity to the perfect image, after which he is renewed by the Spirit of God. The one principle which fulfils this law, and marks this divine image, is love. 'Love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love.' The more we gain this love to God, and this love to others, for his sake, the more are we conformed to his image, and the more fully do we honour and obey Him. 'Hereby shall all men know that ye are my disciples,' saith the Lord Jesus, 'that ye love one another, as I have loved you.' This holy requirement of love—entire and unlimited love—was laid upon man by his Creator, as it was laid upon every other intelligent creature that He formed. No change in man's circumstances or condition could ever alter the holy and perfect standard which God had thus set up before him. Whatever station we might occupy in the scale of intelligent being, it must be everywhere equally our duty to maintain, and cultivate, and exercise this disposition of universal love. The obligation to this could not be set aside, without authorizing that destruction of the image of God which sin accomplishes, and robbing God of the glory which is his due. When we have been delivered from the condemnation of sin, and are partakers of the mercies of God in the gospel, and a new heart, 'under the law to Christ,' has been given to us, the constraint of this obligation to universal love is immeasurably increased, by the vast privileges which redemption has bestowed, and the exalted motives which it has furnished. No being in the universe has received such benefits from God, as a sinner who has been ransomed by the blood of his dear Son. No being, therefore, is under such obligations to love God with all his powers, and with an unceasing, everlasting love. This love God requires of us according to the blessings we have received; and the gospel, which brings his greatest blessing, his unspeakable gift to man, places this standard before us with new authority. According to its principles, we are to serve God in newness of spirit. In conformity to its pattern, we are to be renewed from day to day. By this increasing conformity, we become more and more like God, and prepared for his kingdom. And though we are forgiven and accepted in Christ our Lord alone, the holy law is still our rule; and the freeness of pardon and the fulness of our salvation make us to love it, and to strive to follow it yet more earnestly. The standard is unchanged; but we have received that love for its holiness, which casts out all fear of its judgments, and urges and enables us to render the very obedience which, before, we had neither the wish nor the ability to present.

MISS RUSSELL'S THIRD YEAR IN JERUSALEM.

(A SEQUEL TO HOME IN THE HOLY LAND.)

CHAPTER XX.

THE STOLEN RING FOUND.

WE wandered about, meeting all our acquaintances, exchanging greetings, coming at every step upon some fresh group, more picturesque and lively than the rest.

But our special friends were nowhere to be seen. Amongst a set of little boys I recognised Sarah's grandson, Yakoveio; and not far off were Sarah and other Jewesses; and Gershon was there also, with another young Jew, arranging narghiles and coffee for passers-by.

'How ill and altered he looks, Emily! I should scarcely have known him again.'

'His mother told me that he is in constant dread of something happening to him, on account of that robbery affair.'

'But nothing has happened?'

'Not yet. I suppose nothing will happen, unless that dreadful Ibraham Aga knows that he was seen by them that night.'

'Hush, Emily! there he is.'

'What! that man on the bay horse, with the splendid crimson and silver trappings?'

'Yes, that's the man. Look! he has turned.'

It was the same sallow, cruel, cowardly face which had haunted my feverish dreams that day at Adullam.

'A pretty fellow to be chief of the police!'

'I suppose, on the principle of set a thief to catch a thief. A man with such a face is capable of anything.'

He passed us, and dismounted not far from where the Pasha was sitting. We went on; and at last, in a retired nook, beyond the last of the pleasure-taking groups, found Rachel and her father and brother.

Constantine had, by their direction, spread out our little feast there, under the shade of a jutting rock; and we all sat down—with the infant Kedron babbling at our feet—happy as exquisite weather and dear companionship could make us. The being in the open air gives a quickened sense of life, which I had formerly felt when we lived in tents in the summer, and now whenever—as we not unfrequently did—Walter and I took our luncheon, and spent several hours at a time out of doors; for Walter had still many sketches which he wished to take, and his time was getting short.

Abraham led the subject of our conversation to England. He often did so of late. This was natural, as being the future home of his dear daughter. But most of his nation have a special love and regard for England. He longed to see it.

'But you must go first and prepare for me, Rachel; then, when all is ready, I will come and see you.'

Nathaniel, who had been very silent and pensive ever since his brother's death, looked up eagerly, but said nothing.

'You want to go to England too, Nathaniel?'

'Oh yes, Mr. Walter, to learn; not to stay, but to learn; and I will come back here.' Then, with a sudden burst, he exclaimed: 'Oh do take me to England with you! I can serve you; I can do everything you want; but if I stay here, how shall I learn?'

In his eagerness he had risen up, and clasped his hands, and looked as if his very life depended upon the answer he was to get.

'You go to England, Nathaniel!' said his father; 'where could you live?'

'With Mr. Walter. I will do everything for him—everything; and then I can learn. Oh yes! Oh, Mr. Walter, who will teach me if you go, and leave me here?'

He rushed away to hide a burst of tears. Rachel was scarcely less excited than her brother, but could see difficulties in the way better than he could.

'You have not told me,' presently said Abraham, sighing, 'how my boy gets on in his learning. I can see that he is diligent.'

'Indeed, he is doing extremely well,' said Walter; 'and I have thought much about this very point. It would be a great pity for him to stop now, for want of a teacher. He has a decided taste for mathematics. In fact, he knows almost as much as I can teach him; for I always cared more for painting than for Euclid; and in Latin I think him as well up as most boys of his age. He has got on very fast.'

'He thinks of nothing else,' said Rachel. 'He says Mr. Wa—. He says (correcting herself, and colouring; for Walter had made a compact with her for dropping the Mr., and she had not yet courage to call him by his name) you shall never be ashamed of your scholar. I should be very sorry if he were to forget what you have taught him.'

'No fear of that,' cried Walter, rising to bring the boy back; for he had scarcely tasted the refreshments, and it was almost time to begin our walk home, as we intended going round by the Valley of Jehoshaphat, in search of some unusually large anemones which grew in the upper bed of the Kedron.

In walking back, Abraham and I had a little more conversation about Nathaniel's going to England, and found he desired it almost as much as the boy himself.

'He is determined to continue his studies; and I am afraid, when you are gone, if we can find no other teacher, he will go to the Latin Convent, like young Isaac.'

'Isaac gone to the Latins?'

'Yes; he says he must study. He will not be a Latin, he says; but they have promised to send him to Rome to study; and when he has learned all, he will leave them, and be what he likes.'

'Where is he now?'

'In the convent, employed at the printing-press. Oh, my dear lady, you English are too slow here! Why do you not have a printing-press also? Why don't you have schools and colleges?'

'People don't think they are needed.'

'You will see if other people say so. You know the Latins have now a new Patriarch.'

'I heard so.'

'I saw him come in the week before last. It was a grand sight. All the Latins were there from Bethlehem, and Jerusalem, and Jaffa; all their Consuls and Vice-Consuls in uniform. The Sardinian wore a most beautiful scarlet uniform; for they say he calls his king the King of Jerusalem (what a foolishness that is!). And there came people from the Pasha, and soldiers, and firing of guns. And in the street, before the Casa Nuova, the Patriarch put on the most splendid robes, and a crown with diamonds and jewels; and the priests had their robes, and candles, and incense in gold and silver vessels, and a kind of tabernacle, or—I don't know the name—like what brides stand under in the Jewish marriages.'

'A canopy. That must have been over the Host.'

'I don't know what that is either. They had a vessel under it, of gold and diamonds; and they sang and prayed, and then went into the church.'

'Did you go into the church?'

'I never go into their churches. Perhaps they might do with me as they did with Judah. The Patriarch looks very clever. He has a fine gold-coloured beard, and eyes like two stars; and they say he knows Hebrew, and all the languages. He was living in Persia before; and now he will do many new things here,—make schools and—'

Abraham suddenly stopped, and, darting forward, exclaimed: 'My ring!—the ring that I gave to Gershon!' and he laid hold of the bridle of a horse, which I at once saw was the one Ibrahim Aga had been riding. A man, with his back to us, was in the act of mounting, and had laid his right hand on the saddle to raise himself. Abraham caught the sparkle of a ring on the little finger, sprang forward, and claimed it.

The man was Ibrahim Aga himself; and I never shall forget the look he turned upon us, livid and distorted with rage, as Abraham made him understand that he wanted the ring from his finger. He was about to kick him off—and laid his hand upon the hilt of his sword; but Abraham cried, 'Ingleezy; I belong to the English Consul.'

The Aga muttered curses between his teeth, and again endeavoured to mount his horse. But Abraham held the bridle fast. The Aga called upon his slave, an immense brawny fellow, to dash him aside. I ran after Walter, who, not knowing what had happened, was walking leisurely on with Rachel. As I overtook them, Mr. Wells met us. I was so glad, for he had his two janissaries with him; and we hastened back, just as the black slave had succeeded in wrenching the bridle from Abraham.

This all happened near the little building over the spring of Bir Eyoob. Most of the people were gone, for it was nearly sunset; and the rest were hurrying home with their mats and stools. As we came up, Gershon was passing with the young Jew whom we had seen in the morning; they also were carrying home their narghiles and tobacco.

Poor fellow! how his countenance changed as he caught sight of our group, even before he had time to hear a syllable of what was passing! I thought he would have sunk to the ground with terror.

Mr. Wells, and his kawasses and the rest, filled up the road, so that Gershon could not get by, as he would fain have done; but he shrunk back as far as he could, without losing the words spoken, in which he evidently took painful interest. Rachel and I drew aside, and sat on a rock; but we could hear all that was said.

'It must be my mother's ring,' said she; 'father lost it about six weeks ago. Oh, I shall be so glad if it is found; he has been so sad about it.'

Then Abraham was the dragoman who had so handsomely refrained from making Gershon responsible for the stolen ring! It was not Rabbi Beehor Ariyeh after all; and he wanted to raise money upon it for the marriage of his daughter. Poor fellow! he wanted to fit out his Rachel suitably, though it should cost him the ring of his lost wife. Now I see why Gershon would not tell us whose the ring was.

By the time Mr. Wells got up to the place, the chief of the police had assumed a blustering tone, and demanded satisfaction for his honour. Abraham had insulted him, and he must have justice.

'Sir,' said Abraham sturdily, 'I saw my own ring that I have lost upon his finger this moment. I can swear it is my ring. It has a ruby, almost as large as a quarter of a piastre, and four good diamonds; and I know the work of the gold. It was my ring on his right hand.'

The Aga burst out: 'Thou accursed infidel! I have no ring on my right hand; and on my left I have only this signet, given me by our lord the Pasha.' As he spoke, he stretched out his hand. The ring had disappeared.

'Sir, he has taken it off. Perhaps it is in his pocket. I saw it—my ring. It has my wife's name, in Hebrew, inside—Esther Malcah. She gave it me the day we were betrothed.'

'I have no power to arrest this man, Abraham,' said Mr. Wells, 'though I believe what you say. I can only send immediately to the Pasha, and ask to have him searched; but he must not know that I am doing so.' Then turning to Ibraham Aga, who was impatiently handling his horse's silken bridle, the Consul said, 'This is my dragoman, and he accuses you of having his ring. I must bring the matter before his Excellency, and he will decide.'

'What can he decide, O Bek?' said the Aga, smiling scornfully; 'can your dragoman bring witnesses that I have had his ring? El Hamdulillah! by our law, nothing can be done without witnesses;' and making a deferential salaam to Mr. Wells, and scowling at Abraham, he was about to vault on his horse, but missed his footing, and instead of reaching the saddle, came to his feet again with a jerk. Nathaniel screamed out, 'There it is, father!' dashed forward, and, picking up a ring from under the horse's feet, gave it to his father, who, exclaiming, 'I knew he had it!' handed the ring to Mr. Wells. 'Now, sir, look inside, and see if it is not as I said. Her name is inside it.'

At this moment, turning round, Abraham for the first time spied Gershon, who, forgetting his fear in the interest of the scene, had come a little nearer.

'You here, Gershon! Say, is not that the ring which I gave you, and which was stolen that night with the pearls?'

The Aga turned round also, and for the first time saw Gershon, who had instinctively got behind his back the moment Abraham addressed him.

Rage, and fear, and diabolical expressions were in the Aga's face. 'What hast thou to say, thou Jewish dog?'

Gershon summoned up all his strength, and, addressing Mr. Wells, said, 'This is the ring which was stolen from me: that is the truth; and it was your dragoman who gave it into my hands, as I have already told your honour.'

'Then how dost thou dare to say I had it?' thundered the Aga to Abraham.

'Because I saw it in thy hand,' repeated Abraham determinedly.

'Say no more at present,' interfered Mr. Wells.

'Speak, O Jew,' once more roared the Aga, 'or I will tear thy soul out of thy body! Who stole this ring from thee? or to whom didst thou sell it, thou lying defrauder of other men's goods?'

'I sold it to no one, my lord. It was stolen from my chamber one night, with all my goods, when I was asleep,' said Gershon.

'It is a lie! If it was stolen, why didst thou not come to me? Am I not the chief of the police? El-Hamdulillah! no one can steal without my finding him out. Say who were the thieves, if there be truth in thy mouth! and if not, thou shalt rot in prison till thou dost!'

'My lord,' gasped Gershon, 'I was asleep; I cannot say who were the thieves; and I did not seek my lord's help, because I am an Ingleezy,* and I went to my Consul (may God lengthen his days!).'

A marked change came over the expression of the Aga's face when he heard the word Ingleezy. At first fear was visible, but it was soon replaced by audacity.

'Thou art under the English Consul! It is well for thee, or thy lying tongue should have been cut out this night!' Then, turning to Mr. Wells, he said, very respectfully, 'If this be the ring of your Excellency's dragoman, let him keep it. I can prove where I bought it as soon as your Excellency desires. But as for myself, I can recover the ten thousand piastres which I paid to the goldsmith who sold it me.'

'My dragoman,' replied the Consul dryly, 'shall certainly keep the ring, for it bears an inscription and marks which are sufficient proof that it is his; for the rest, we shall see, Inshallah, another day.'

The slave led his master's horse to a little distance, where he mounted; and, digging his shovel stirrups furiously into the poor beast's sides, he galloped madly up Mount Moriah, reckless of the steep and dangerous path. We all went home, meditating upon the strange event, and its probable consequences. Mr. Wells, at Gershon's entreaty, sent a kawass to see him safe to his abode in the Jewish quarter.

I thought that Ibrahim Aga appeared not to have suspected Gershon; but I was afraid to talk about so dangerous a subject until Walter and I should be alone. But I could hear my brother rebuking Abraham for his intended outlay on wedding garments, at such a costly sacrifice; and Abraham turned the conversation to the chief of the police, and his having possession of the ring.

'It will be an interesting thing to know how he came by it. I should like to know which of his robber partners, or policemen, was obliged to give it him, for leave to go and steal more rings and more pearls!'

'No doubt it would be interesting,' said Walter; and so the conversation dropped.

But why was it that the pearls had been returned to their owner? Here was a riddle that would surely attract Abraham's attention. Well—poor Gershon's secret would be safe with him.

* Gershon was a British subject, his father having been a Gibraltar Jew.

CHAPTER XXI.

LATIN AND GREEK SERVANTS—MORE ABOUT IBRAHIM AGA.

STRANGE to say, the rule of the new Latin Patriarch was felt in our little household. Katrina came in when I was just finishing my weekly accounts with Constantine, and stood leaning against the door, as was her wont when she had anything particular to say, one corner of her veil across her mouth, because Walter happened to come into the room for something. Constantine lingered to hear what she was going to say, putting the chairs right, and dusting the sideboard for the third time.

'Well, Katrina!'

'Sitti! may God give you a good morning! Our Patriarch has sent for us Bethlehemites who serve in English houses, and has ordered us to leave, because the Ingleez are all farmason (freemasons), and have no religion.'

'And will you leave my service?'

She laughed her usual little short laugh. 'I shall not leave. The Ingleez are not farmason; and the rais (president) of our convent says the Patriarch has no business to order about Bethlehemites. We are not under him; we are under the convent.'

'Then why do you tell me about it?'

'That you may know, Sitti, that I am not chaff, to be blown about by every wind. I like you and Walter Bey—may God lengthen your day!—and I shall not leave you until the rais of our convent tells me. There is much stir between the Patriarch and the convents. He is very clever—shâter kateer—the Patriarch, and there is much stir already. The monks won't allow him to have the money that comes from Frank countries for them. Why should they? And the new Austrian Consul is for the convents, and says he will send back the boxes of dollars to his country, rather than let the Patriarch touch them; but the French Consul helps the Patriarch.'

The old story, thought I,—strife between seculars and regulars; and so it really proved. The Patriarch and monks had entered upon a long contest, which, for aught I know, is still undecided. However, I dismissed Katrina to her duties. By and by I heard her and Constantine and Haj Omar discussing the same subject.

'A nice Patriarch is yours, Katrina, to meddle with servants! That is not the way ours does,' began Constantine.

'Don't talk of what you don't understand, boy! Your religion is one thing, ours is another. Our Patriarch is very clever, and ten times handsomer than the old man the Greek Patriarch.'

'Then if he is so clever, why don't the convents obey him?'

'The convents—may God build them up!—do obey him; only in the affairs of their own money they won't. Is it not their own?'

Haj Omar laid down the spur that he was polishing. 'So long as they can hide the purse from him, they won't obey him more than they like,—Sahheb el Mâl—Sahheb el Kuwah' (Keeper of purse—Keeper of power).

'What was the use of his coming, if his sect don't submit to him in all things? El Hamdulillah! our Patriarch is somebody. His white beard is respected,' said Constantine saucily.

'Thou child of little sense! is not the beard of our Patriarch respected also? Thou speaker of mixed-up words! El Hamdulillah! our Patriarch has a strong hand. Has not the Pasha already put three men into prison to please him; and do not the Consuls kiss his hand in the church?'

'I don't understand you and your Patriarch,' replied Constantine, unwilling to let Katrina have the last word. 'You obey him, and you don't obey him.'

'Clean thy knives and spoons then. We understand our own affairs: be thou modest, and mind thine own!'

Before Constantine could make the angry reply which was on his lips, a knock came to the door, and in walked Mr. Andersen. Since his return to Jerusalem we had seen very little of him. He was always busy. Walter had called upon him; but I had only once seen him (except in church), when he called upon us on New Year's day, in conformity with the usage, by which everybody calls on everybody to wish them a happy year.

'First, Miss Russell, I have a message for you from Mary. She sends you her love; and if you wish it, you are to divide that root of iris in her garden, and take part of it.'

'The one with the dark green and brown velvet blossoms? Oh, thank you! It is such a curious flower. I should much like to have one of them. How are she and Mrs. Andersen?'

'Thank you, well; but they find the long English winter very severe and gloomy, after our winters here. Though we have real winters here as to cold, they only last a few days at a time. However, to-day and yesterday have been very keen.'

'Yes,' said Walter. 'I saw thick ice this morning as I came from church.'

'I don't remember so severe a winter as this in Jerusalem, either for frost or snow,' remarked Mr. Andersen, 'or for abundance of rain; and it appears to have been general over the country. The Turkish postman was drowned the week before last in attempting to cross the Damoor, near Sidon; and the little bridge over the Aujah, near Ramlah, has been carried away. Even in this neighbourhood the torrents have risen high. Mr. Benson found that at Kuloniah the water has been at least eight feet high.'

'And yet our English postman contrived to get safely here.'

'He knows the best paths—over the mountains instead of the flooded plains.'

Mr. Andersen had come to inform us that Nathaniel was one of the candidates for the next confirmation, and to inquire about his improvement in learning. He had scarcely left us before Sarah came to tell me something about her son Gershon and Ibrahim Aga.

Gershon was walking in a street leading towards the Jewish quarter, when, under a dark archway, he suddenly met the chief of the police with a slave. Ibrahim Aga sent the slave to a distance, and began by asking Gershon if it was true that he was a British subject.

'"My lord heard me say so in the Consul's presence. It is truth, and the Consul always protects me."

'"Well, Jew," said the Aga, "I have somewhat to say to thee. Thou wast prudent in the matter of the pearls and the ring. It is well; for if not, no Consul could have delivered thee out of my hand. Beware, if my wife asks thee where the pearls were found, that thou tell her nothing. She is about to send for thee to buy some silk; but beware, I tell thee again;" and the Aga went his way. Gershon is more puzzled than ever. The Aga spoke in a friendly way; but he is such a bad man, that makes me more afraid. And how did he know that my son knew the pearls belonged to his own wife? Were they not found in the dress of the wife of the Egyptian? And he said nothing about the night of the robbery. My son thinks he suspects that he saw him that night, but is afraid to ask, now he knows he belongs to the English Consulate.'

'Well, well, Sarah, the best way is to think no more about it. If Ibrahim Aga is afraid to ask Gershon, so much the better for you; and if anything else should happen, why, you have the Consul to go to.'

'Bendisho el Dio for that! They were bad days for the Jews before the English Consul came to live in Jerusalem. May the Queen of England live for ever.'

I could not help wishing that Gershon could at once charge this dreadful Ibrahim Aga with the robbery, and have him punished; but he had no witnesses. Neither his own word nor that of his mother would avail in a Turkish court against a Moslem. He was powerless, poor fellow!

CHAPTER XXII.

MISS BRANDON'S ARRIVAL.

One morning early a letter was put into my hands by one of the Consul's kawasses. It was from Jaffa, from Miss Brandon. She had arrived. Our account of the manner of life in Jerusalem had reassured her friends; and they had consented to her making trial for herself.

'I ought to go and fetch her up, Emily. It will never do to let her come alone.'

'No, certainly. And take my saddle with you for her use.'

Rover was ordered out of the stable, his hoofs examined, his shoes freshly nailed. Saddle-bags were filled with provisions for the way, a quiet pony chosen, on which Constantine could ride down, and Miss Brandon ride up, if she had no better animal; and by one hour after noon Walter rode off, purposing to sleep in Ramlah that night, and to be in Jaffa after sunrise next day.

Katrina and I had plenty to do arranging the room for our guest to occupy. We had not a spare bed-room, so I gave her mine, and took Walter's for myself, making up a temporary bed—removable by day—for him in the painting alias dining-room. Certainly the oriental fashion is very convenient, by which any number of unexpected guests may be accommodated at five minutes' notice. There is no preparation of bed-rooms and dressing-rooms. Some of the pile of mattresses and coverlets kept stored up in a recess for such emergencies is unrolled at night, and laid down on the floor of the reception-room for each guest. In the morning the slaves come in, roll up the beds, put them back into the curtained recess, and all is done. It is true the day-clothes are not put off in such cases, and the process of the toilette is reduced to a simple washing of face and hands at day-break in the morning.

Miss Brandon arrived safe and well, though fatigued by what she called 'that terrible road from Jaffa.' We had become accustomed to riding up hill and down dale, and almost forgot that there could be any use for better roads in the world.

She was too tired the first evening to do more than give me a few particulars about old friends in England, who had charged her with messages to us. Yet, weary as she was, the view from my terrace riveted her to the spot. She stood gazing at the city, rising tier above tier to the top of Zion, the domes of the Sepulchre Church, the castle, the battlements, the minarets, our own church, and the country beyond.

'I had no idea our church was so far advanced!'

'Yes, it is all but finished. The roof came from England many months ago. Is it not beautiful?'

'Beautiful! It takes me by surprise to see our own church there on the very crest of Mount Zion, though I remember I heard it before. It is so different seeing for one's-self.'

The sun was already set; and though it had been hot by day, yet the evening was keen and chill.

'I must not allow you to stay any longer here. It is too cold.'

'Oh! a little longer. This is such a view!'

'But you will see it better to-morrow. You know you are going to stay in Jerusalem.'

'Yes, I am going to stay in Jerusalem. Oh! how glad I am!' And she burst into tears.

I had observed that she was strongly excited, and under the influence of almost overpowering emotions, when first I met her at the door of our house. Her eyes had filled, and her lip quivered when I said, 'Welcome to Jerusalem, welcome to the Holy City!' and she had only kept back her feelings with an effort. However, she recovered herself, and said seriously:

'Yes, thank God, I am going to stay in Jerusalem; and you will tell me what there is for me to do.'

'Not to-night at any rate.'

I left her a moment, and going into my room, closed the window blind, and shut out the view of Olivet. She was weary, and had had excitement enough, and would lose nothing by seeing that spot first by the light of the rising sun.

Next morning we all met at the breakfast table. Miss Brandon was full of life and energy; but still, I could see, weary.

'Did you open your window this morning?' I asked.

'Surely. I am always an early riser; and here one would not lose a moment of the delights of the dawning or sunrise; and I longed to see if my guess by moonlight last night was correct.'

'Did you not sleep last night? The moon is late in rising,' asked Walter.

'Does any one sleep the first night in Jerusalem, Mr. Russell? I don't think it would be possible. However, I did sleep a little before daybreak; then the muezzin woke me. What a crowd of new feelings and ideas come over one! I feel as if I were in a dream, and as if we ought not to be sitting here drinking coffee, and eating bread and butter, as if it were England. It is almost profane.'

'One must eat in Jerusalem as well as everywhere else upon earth,' replied my brother, smiling; 'and after I had been here a while, I found unspeakable comfort in the discovery that our deepest and best feelings are not incompatible with the needs and incidents of daily life.'

'But at first they must jar; at least one thinks they must.'

'You recognised the Mount of Olives, Miss Brandon?'

'Oh, yes! That is one comfort in coming to the Holy Land; one knows it already. I felt as if I were looking at an old friend, seen very, very long ago in childhood, of whom my recollections have grown misty. But there is more solemnity about it than I expected, perhaps because I saw it first by that strange pathetic light which the waning moon always sheds.'

'You have seen it also by daylight?'

'Oh, yes! by the first dawn of morning. I was very impatient to see it, and got up as soon as there was a streak of light in the sky, and then watched the sun rise—the first sunrise in Jerusalem!' And again her eyes filled.

'But not your last. And now, Miss Brandon, we are going to have the pleasure, for the first time in our lives, of showing a friend all these interesting places in holy ground—that is, as soon as you are rested. By this evening a little walk would refresh you.'

'Thank you, that it would. But now you are going to tell me what there is for me to do in Jerusalem. I have not forgotten that part of your letter. You said we should talk over that when we met in the Holy City.'

'And so we will, I hope; but not until you have seen something for yourself. And I must ask first, what do you wish to do here?'

'Something for the Jews, of course.'

'If it is not impertinent, Miss Brandon, I should like to ask you why "of course?"'

'Simply because Christians owe a debt of gratitude to the Jews; and until it has been paid, every one who can, ought to do something for them. Do the other sects in Jerusalem do anything for them,—I mean Greeks, Armenians, or Latins?'

'No, certainly not. The Greeks hate them; the Armenians forget that there is such a people; and the Latins—I think they might be willing to receive proselytes; but they don't give themselves any trouble about them.'

'All the more need for us to do what we can. Are they accessible?'

'As far as I have tried, I have found them so—allowing for the great differences of manners and languages.'

'Now, then, please keep your word, and tell me what is there particularly needing doing, that a woman could with propriety undertake.'

'Ask me this day four weeks, Miss Brandon.'

'Why?'

'Because then you will have had time to see a little of what is being done here already. Besides, there is so very much to be said, it will never do to begin until you are rested.'

'This is too bad, when I am so impatient; but if you won't tell me, I suppose I must be content for four weeks.'

'You are not bound to wait four weeks before you make up your own mind, if you see sufficient reason, without my opinion. You know—'

'I understand,' said she, half amused and half vexed; 'and meanwhile, Mr. Russell, will you not let me see your picture? Your uncle has talked to me so much about it. He and your cousin Ralph are most impatient for your arrival in England.'

'And my sister is at least equally anxious that we should remain here.'

'I cannot bear the thought of leaving Jerusalem.'

'But all your old friends—don't you care to see them?'

'Surely. It is not that; but one becomes so attached to Jerusalem. It has been a real home to me. Where shall we go this afternoon?'

'If it is not too far, let us go where we can obtain a view of the Garden of Gethsemane. I wish not to crowd things together, but to take them one at a time, they are so overpoweringly interesting.'

We went in the afternoon by the Damascus Gate, along the quiet path under the great pine-tree, at the north-east corner of the city, and thus round to Moriah; and there we sat down on the edge of the steep descent opposite to the Mount of Olives, and looking down at Gethsemane.

Very little was said. We were unwilling to disturb the thoughts of our friend, brought, for the first time in her life, face to face with the very valley, rocks, and mountains, bound up for ever with the history of our Saviour's passion.

Walter left us for a while. When he came back, we walked quietly home.

The next day was taken up in receiving visits. The arrival of another resident was a great event in our little community; and, according to custom, all the old settlers came to bid the newcomer welcome.

After that, my brother and I conducted our friend leisurely, as she desired, to see the places in and around Jerusalem. The streets were already thronged with pilgrims, for Lent was begun; and Miss Brandon was as much interested as I could wish, by the ever-varying groups, of all imaginable costumes, complexions, features, and expressions, and by the wondrous variety of languages.

Being the Feast of Purim, we paid visits to our Jewish friends, the widow Tarragon and her family, and met there an old brother-in-law and his wife. He spoke Portuguese, and she Morocco Arabic. He was aged, with snow-white beard, but full of fun and humour. She was pretty, good-natured, and stout.

Our hostess brought in a tambourine-player for our entertainment, and also a performer (in beard and oriental dress) on a good European violin. He sat cross-legged on the floor, with his tambourine accompanier, and one who sung.

They played, with spirit enough, a most extraordinary mixture of tunes, Hebrew and Arab—'God Save the Queen,' the 'Vienna Anthem,' the 'Parisienne,' and 'Marseillaise.' The court was soon filled with auditors, and several beggars, to whom paras were given. There was variety enough of character and costume; and Walter could not resist sketching one tall, gaunt old man—a Jew, like the rest—in wretched flowing robe of dirty white; a cloth for head-dress, kept on, over his streaming locks, by a handkerchief, in the manner of the Bedaween, by a cord; a long, dirty, white beard, thin face, and pursed-up lips. Near him stood some pretty young girls, with kohh'led eyes and rouged cheeks, and plenty of spangles, flowers, and coins. Then came the youngest son of the house (a baby in arms at our first visit), and danced before us, to the great admiration of his mother and the bystanders.

We also visited Rabbi Raphael, and his interesting wife and children.

'How very sweet the expression of her face is!' was Miss Brandon's remark, after we had left. 'I cannot tell you how these young women and girls interested me. How their faces lighted up when you spoke to them in their own language! Is it difficult? for I must learn it. I know German, and a little Hebrew, but have never tried Spanish. But I must be able to speak to those young creatures in their own tongue.'

'I think no language is difficult, when one lives among those who speak it constantly. If you could persuade Sarah to be your servant when we leave Jerusalem, you would soon pick it up.'

'I hope you will leave me the legacy of all your servants. I shall be most fortunate in getting them ready trained.'

'I will speak to them; but our groom is engaged by the Consul.'

'I shall not want a groom; a good donkey is my utmost ambition.'

'Oh! I am sorry. I had so hoped you would have taken my dear little horse Zareef. Mr. Wells is going to buy Walter's Rover; and I don't want to sell mine to a stranger.'

'I am sorry too; but a donkey will be quite enough for me at present.'

Miss Brandon knew of Walter's engagement, and was very desirous of seeing Rachel. I fancied that she had doubts whether a young girl, brought up in Jerusalem, could possibly make a suitable wife for my brother. It was therefore no small pleasure to me to see the glance of surprise which passed over Miss Brandon's face when Rachel entered the room. Even before she knew who it was, the sweet expression of the intelligent face won her heart; and during every moment of her stay, I was delighted to see that Miss Brandon became more and more charmed with my future sister.

'Indeed,' said Miss Brandon, as soon as the door closed, and she was gone, 'I congratulate you with all my heart. She is a lovely creature. I must see more of her, while there is time. Have you fixed the day for the wedding?'

'Not quite; but it is to be some time in April. I suppose, not before Easter.'

'Why, Easter is scarcely a month hence; and are we to lose you so soon as that?'

'Easter will be on the 23d. I believe my brother intends to leave for England at the end of April or the beginning of May.'

Time was indeed running short. How many things there were to be thought of and done in these few weeks! I had not counted them before. I had felt unwilling to look the truth in the face, and know exactly how many weeks and days were left to us here in Jerusalem; but now they had been numbered. How was everything to be got into them?

There was a sketch from my window to be finished; another to be taken from my terrace; flowers, from a dozen favourite spots, to be gathered and pressed; farewell rides to be taken. How would it be possible to do all this within six, or at most seven, short weeks? How should we be able to leave Jerusalem at all? I would not think of this, but turned to the multifarious tasks which must be got through. What a relief it is to have much to do, when one does not want to think! Had I had my own room, I should have now and then given way. I should, at least, have sat down a few minutes, in the early morning, at my dear east window, or walked a little bit up and down on my terrace before going to bed at night; but Miss Brandon had my room. I could not but have given it up to her, and she enjoyed it much. But to me it was the beginning of separation—the beginning of the breaking up I so much dreaded.

'Work, work! I won't think any more!'

ADORATION AND ANTICIPATION.

'O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come.'—Ps. lxv. 2.

THE first verse of this psalm seems to intimate that God had heard the prayers of Zion, and that 'praise was now waiting' there for Him to accept. It also shows that those who offered private and acceptable prayer were now ready to perform their vows. The people of God were thus led to consider God with much delight under that character in which He had recently displayed himself, and to anticipate the time when all should know Him, and come to Him as the God who heareth prayer. Then will be revealed the threefold glorious sight of God attracting, man attracted, and the church adoring.

God is the Hearer and Answerer of prayer. This is a glorious and gracious title, specially dear to his people. He has taken many names suited to encourage prayer, and this one is peculiarly so. Prayer is the heart having to do with God; laying hold of his names, pleading his promises, appealing to his perfections and character. It is asking, seeking, pleading, desiring. We should believe that prayer will be profitable to us, and prevailing with God; that God will notice and answer our petitions. While we thus think of prayer, we should praise God for his gracious revelation of himself as 'the hearer of prayer.' 'O Thou that hearest prayer,' is the language of adoration. Next we have anticipation. Only a few really pray now. The majority are prayerless and godless; but it will not be so always. There is a time coming when all the world will be worshippers, and when all will come to God with fervent prayer and grateful praise. For there is a period coming when God's names, attributes, and relationships shall be exhibited and known, and then men will worship Him. They who know will trust, they who trust will worship. God's favour will then be the centre of all hearts, and the element of all the souls He has created; man will no longer stray away from God, in sullen pride and lofty independence, but will, with a lowly and dependent heart, rest in Him. Long has God been saying, Come; but few have regarded. Then will be heard the loud response from millions of hearts, wondering at God's grace, at their own wretchedness, at their own tendencies and desires, at the blessed prospect before them: 'Behold, we come unto Thee, for Thou art the Lord our God!'

In this wondrous revolution there will be seen an answer to the prayers of the church, which in all ages has been crying, 'Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.'

CHRIST'S ESTIMATE OF A MAN.

'How much, then, is a man better than a sheep?'—MATT. xii. 12.

THE Lord Jesus often makes use of sheep as an illustration. Man wandering from God, sought by mercy, and restored to favour and holiness, is set forth by sheep.

Here the Lord is defending himself against the Pharisees, who were waiting to accuse Him as a breaker of the Sabbath, if He should determine to cure a man with a withered hand. The Lord proves that it was lawful to lift a poor sheep out of a pit on a Sabbath day, and argues from thence that it was lawful to do good on the Sabbath day; and as relieving the poor sufferer was doing good, it was right and proper to cure him. On another occasion He said, 'Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound these eighteen years, be loosed from her bond on the Sabbath day?' It was not right to defer that good till the morrow which could be done that very day. While thus defending himself with consummate wisdom, the Saviour taught a most important lesson. He shows his estimate of man. Ah! how highly He prized man; what a value He set upon him! He knew the worth of man's soul and man's body—what the one could become by regeneration, and the other by resurrection. His words imply that there was really no comparison. 'How much, then?' as if He had said, Who can reckon it? All the flocks of earth would not weigh in value so much as one man. The Saviour's actions tell the value He sets on man. Let his life of love, and death of sorrow, tell his estimate.

Let us mourn over the sad fact, that in all ages and places man has been deemed of less value than animals, and the land they tread on. A few cattle stolen, or a little land taken, has often led to bloody wars, in which thousands of men have been slain. And still trade and commerce treat men often but as a machine. Let us seek to enter into the estimate of Christ, and henceforth love man, labour for man, and seek by every means to save souls from death.

HONOUR PUT ON PRAYER.

'As he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered.'—LUKE ix. 29.

WONDROUS are the changes in the human countenance, as the soul is affected from around, beneath, and above. How lovely, how hideous, how almost angelic or demoniacal, have the varying features become! The Lord Jesus was a real man, but without sin. The prince of this world (He saith) findeth nothing in me. There was no sea of bad passions in his soul for the wind of temptation to act upon. Out of his heart nothing proceeded that could produce a word or look from which angels would turn away. No; they loved to gaze on that calm, loving, sorrowful face, and to trace in it everything lovely mirrored forth. On that face also paternal Deity loved ever to look. The circumstances and temptations around Him did indeed draw out his pity, his sorrow, and even his anger; but all was righteous and good.

To all influences from above his soul ever responded; its whole surface was ever turned Godward; there was in Him no obliqueness, and therefore He ever reflected the glory of God. But while He always shone in moral beauty, only once while here did his holy face emit rays of external glory. This was when He was in the mount of communion with God. Thus it had been with Moses before Him, and thus it was with Stephen after Him; and in both cases there was communion with God. But Jesus excels both these, and all others, in everything. 'Jesus prayed.' In so doing He exercised all graces. Jesus was transfigured, and thus for a short time He anticipated his glory, and began to shine as Stephen and Paul saw Him, and as we who believe hope to see Him ere long.

THE TRUE STANDARD OF DRESS.

WE are always excessive when we sacrifice the higher beauty to attain the lower one. A woman who will sacrifice domestic affection, conscience, self-respect, honour, to love of dress, we all agree, loves dress too much. She loses the true and higher beauty of womanhood for the lower beauty of gems, and flowers, and colours. A girl who sacrifices to dress all her time, all her strength, all her money, to the neglect of the cultivation of her mind and heart, and to the neglect of the claims of others on her helpfulness, is sacrificing the higher to the lower beauty.

In fine, girls, you may try yourself by this standard. You love to dress too much when you care more for your outward adornings than for your inward dispositions; when it afflicts you more to have torn your dress than to have lost your temper; when you are much more troubled by an ill-fitting gown than by a neglected duty; when you are less concerned at having made an unjust comment, or spread a scandalous report, than at having worn a passee bonnet; when you are less troubled at the thought of being found at the last great feast without the wedding garment, than at being found at the party to-night in the fashion of last year. No Christian woman, as I view it, ought to give such attention to her dress as to allow it to take up all of three important things, viz. all her time, all her strength, all her money. Whoever does this lives not the Christian, but the Pagan life—worships not at the Christian's altar of our Lord Jesus, but at the shrine of the lower Venus of Corinth and Rome.—Mrs. Stowe.

THE LARGE WISH.

'This also we wish, even your perfection.'—2 Cor. xiii. 9.

The word 'perfection' is used in several senses in God's word. Sometimes it refers to the conscience, as in Heb. x., and describes the removal of guilt by the blood of Christ. It also refers to love. Thus John speaks of 'perfect love which casteth out fear' (1 John iv.). More frequently it means completeness of Christian character, or the possession of all the graces of the Holy Spirit. Hence Peter desires that the God of all grace would make the saints perfect. So Paul, Heb. xiii. 21, and elsewhere. The word in the Old Testament generally signifies sincerity or uprightness, in opposition to hypocrisy. The text before us in 2 Cor. xiii. has been rendered 'reformation or restoration,' and we are told the word signifies 'the restoring of a dislocated limb to its place or use in the body.' Besides all these, there is another meaning of the word, viz. absolute perfection, or the absence of all evil, and the presence of all good. Paul, in Phil. iii., desired this, and followed after it, but said that he had not yet attained it. Still he speaks of himself and others as already 'perfect.' And here is another sense of the word, in which it signifies a matured or instructed Christian, as distinguished from a novice, or a partially ignorant one. Under these different aspects we should contemplate 'perfection,'—aim at all that is attainable here, and desire and hope for full perfection hereafter.

Some Christians, who are eminent for gifts, are deficient as regards a maturity of Christian experience,—a combination of the various graces, and acting harmoniously with other saints. See then what we should pray for, and aim to promote in each other. At the same time, let each one seek it for himself. Paul showed his sincerity toward the saints, by watchfulness over himself, by his earnest prayers for them, and by the kind, forbearing, yet faithful way in which he dealt with those who needed restoring.

HEAVEN.

A living divine says, 'When I was a boy, I thought of heaven as a great shining city, with vast walls, and domes, and spires, and with nobody in it except white tenuous angels, who were strangers to me. By and by my little brother died; and I thought of a great city, with walls, and domes, and spires, and a flock of cold, unknown angels, and one little fellow that I was acquainted with. He was the only one I knew in that time. Then another brother died, and there were two that I knew. Then my acquaintances began to die, and the flock continually grew. But it was not till I had sent one of my little children to his grandparent—God—that I began to think I had got a little in myself. A second went, a third went, a fourth went; and by that time I had so many acquaintances in heaven, that I did not see any more walls, and domes, and spires. I began to think of the residents of the celestial city. And now there have so many of my acquaintances gone there, that it sometimes seems to me that I know more in heaven than I do on earth.'

THESE ARE THE TRUE SAYINGS OF GOD.

Sure the record, Christ has come!
Rich, for us became He poor.
O my soul, then know his love;
Love Him, love Him, more and more!

Sure the record, Christ has died!
Bearing on the cross our sin;
Is not this the gate of life?
Son of Adam, enter in.

Sure the record, Christ is risen!
He hath broken every chain;
Silent stands the empty tomb,
Never to be filled again.

Sure the promise, Christ will come!
Though the promise lingers still.
Heavy seems the wing of time,
Weary with the weight of ill.

Signs are mustering everywhere,
And the world is growing old;
Love is low, and faith is dull;
Truth and right are bought and sold!

Then when men are heedless grown,
And the virgins slumber all;
When iniquity abounds,
Then He cometh, Judge of all!

Cometh He to raise his own,
Wipe the tear from every eye;
Cometh He to right the wrong,
Trodden truth to lift on high.

To dethrone the lie of lies,
Each dark falsehood to destroy;
To begin the age of light,
Earth's long-sighed for Sabbath joy.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

JOHN XII. 35, 36.

THE Speaker here was one who knew what light was, what it could do, where it was to be found, and how terrible it must be to be without it. He had come from the land of light, where there was no darkness, and where all were walking in the light. In that home of light there were angels of light, and spirits of light. All sons of light! He speaks, therefore, with authority; and we know that his words are true.

I. The light.—Light is that which shows or reveals all objects, as darkness is that which hides. Our earthly sun reveals to us daily man and the things of man; the heavenly Sun reveals to us God and the things of God. Christ is himself that light. He is both the light and the sun. As the life, He is the light. 'The life is the light of men.' He is the light of the world, the true light, beside which all other lights are false and unreal. That which shines from his face, from his works, from his words, from his cross, is light. 'We look to Him, and are lightened.' He reveals the Father, the Father's love, the Father's righteousness, the Father's character; all the riches of his grace; and we, opening our eyes to take in this light, are thereby enlightened. That which shines into us is 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ.' Light for a dark world! light for a dark soul!—this is our message.

II. The Light with us.—The first gleam of it came in the first promise. After that the rays multiplied. But still 'the Light' had not come. But when 'the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us,' then it came. It remained here in human form for thirty-three years. It is still, though impersonally, 'with us;' and it will yet be more gloriously with us when He comes again. After Jesus had spoken of the light being with them, He withdrew himself,—to show that his presence was the light, and to show the difference between light and darkness, his presence and his absence. Yes, the light is with us still. In a sense it is withdrawn, yet still with us; still in our world; still shining in its brightness out of the testimony concerning 'the Light' left us in the Gospels. There the true light still shineth. We may withdraw from it, but it never withdraws from us. We may shut our eyes and our windows, but the light still shineth. 'God is light,' 'God is love,' is still the burden of that testimony. The light is not far off, nor clouded, but nigh and clear; not starlight nor moonlight, but sunlight—pure, bright, and gladdening. O dark world! when wilt thou let in the light? O dark soul! O child of darkness! when wilt thou be enlightened?

III. The 'little while' of light.—The special 'little while' referred to here, was that of our Lord's presence on earth,—a blessed little while indeed! He so near, so gracious, so willing to bless! But there are other little whiles. Jerusalem had her little while. Israel had her little while. The churches have all had, or are having, their little while. The nations have had, or are having, their little while. Each congregation has its little while. Each soul has its little while. A little while of the gospel; a little while of invitations from God; a little while of Sabbaths, and sermons, and sacraments, and providences,—and all is done. The light departs. O man, what has the light done for you? How hast thou been dealing with it? Hast thou let it in, or shut it out? Thy little while of light may soon be at an end. The night cometh! The eternal darkness is at hand! Jesus is coming, but not with light; only with darkness to the despisers of the light!

IV. The rising of the light.—'Walking' is here a general expression for the whole of a man's life, in all its actings, and changes, and movements. Our Lord's meaning is, 'Use this light for whatever you do, so long as you have it: do everything in your daily life in this light.' Use this light, then, is the Lord's message to us.

(1.) Believe in the light.—Receive the Father's testimony to this light; to its genuineness, its excellency, its divinity, its suitableness, its varied qualities and fitnesses to meet the wants of a child of darkness. Believe in this light, and believe in no other. The light of reason, intellect, literature, science, will do nothing for your soul. At best it is but starlight, 'distinct, but distant; clear, but oh, how cold!' Still oftener is it the meteor, or the lightning, or the volcano, or the taper, or the spark, of your own kindling. Believe in this heavenly and divine light. It will suffice. There is no darkness too dense for it, either within you or without. There is light for the darkness. God proclaims his testimony concerning this true light. Receive that testimony; and, in receiving it, receive the light. It wants admission into you.

(2.) Become children of the light.—He into whom the light enters, becomes a child of light. The light rests on him, surrounds him, abides with him, dwells in him, pervades him. It guides him, heals him, comforts and cheers him, purifies him, assimilates him to itself. He becomes, in all senses, a child of light and of the day. He becomes also a light to others—a light to the world. And, walking in the light, he is not only filled with holy gladness, but he shines; his light shines; the dark world is the better for his being in it. He shines in his daily walk and public life. He is, in his own way and measure, what 'the Light' was when here—a 'light of the world.'

V. The refusal to use the light.—This may be called neglect, or delay, or hatred, or rejection; still it is refusal to make use of the light. It is preference of the darkness to the light; it is preference of the works of darkness to the works of light. It is something positive and wilful, whatever men may say. No man remains in darkness for lack of light, but because of his own shutting out the light. This refusal to make use of the light, leads to stumbling, to straying, to complete mistaking of the way, and losing the destination. It leads to this now; it ends in this more terribly. For the withdrawal of the light is at hand. The darkness comes,—the deep, the eternal darkness,—in which men, who have rejected the light, shall stumble and wander for ever. Oh these eternal stumblings! these everlasting wanderings! Oh these dark mountains, on which the sinner's feet shall stumble! Oh that gross darkness, that blackness of darkness, which is to be the sinner's portion and dwelling-place for ever! Night without morning! everlasting midnight!

THE UNANSWERED PRAYER OF MOSES.

BY THE REV. A. A. BONAR, GLASGOW.

DEUT. III. 24-27.

WHATSOEVER things were written aforetime were written for our learning' (1 Cor. x.; Rom. xv. 4). This prayer is one of those things, and none of the least,—the only time when Moses speaks much of himself. He was in his 120th year, and Israel in the fortieth year of wandering, when he so prayed. The event referred to in the prayer occurred, perhaps, about a year and a half before, viz. the angry, unbelieving smiting of the rock the second time. We said this is the only time when Moses tells of a thing wholly personal in its details. The Spirit guided him to do so, because the case is so fitted to yield us instruction.

I. Here is a saint calling to remembrance his past sin.—'Let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon.' That sad day at the rock (Num. xx. 12), and the chastisement threatened, are in his mind. Aaron had fallen under it, dying on Mount Hor: is Moses also to find the sentence executed?

Think who it is who prays—one who was every way singular and favoured of God. Every period of his life had been peculiar. The first period of forty years (for his life may be divided into periods of three forties) begins with Moses in peril, but hid; and again in peril on the Nile: a breeze may ruffle it, and overthrow the bulrush ark, or a crocodile swallow up the babe. But help comes—royal help—the king's own daughter. Then the king himself furnishes a nurse, a home, protection, education. In spite of himself, Pharaoh yields to the bridle of God in his mouth, and his palace is the college where this most formidable of the Hebrews (had he been known) was taught the wisdom of Egypt, the art of war, the policy of state. He is sent to no college; Egypt's wise men are sent by Pharaoh to him. His bitterest foe is his best teacher. And on some occasion he was offered to be made 'son' by adoption,—offered virtually a crown, and treasures suitable. But (perhaps looking out at the palace window) he points to the smoking furnaces, and prefers affliction therein with the people of God, to the 'pleasures of sin.' But now a second forty years begin. Moses is in flight again! See, he hastes over the desert sands toward Midian, often looking behind over his shoulder, in dread of the pursuing foe. And for forty years he does nothing but tend sheep! God sends him thither to learn humility. He who was fit to be a king, to govern a kingdom, to lead armies, who had the wisdom of Egypt,—lo! he does nothing for forty years but tend a flock, discover the best pastures, find out the wells that are longest full! Perhaps now he learned most of his meekness. This was his Nazareth-time of obscurity, and he was learning to obey. But it ends at last, and ends with miracle—the bush burning. And then his third forty years begin. They begin with flight; but it is not like the former flights. Moses has moved earth and heaven, and rolled thunders o'er Egypt and its gods; and is now marching forth at the head of a nation, cleaving his way through the depths of the Red Sea! With fiery column blazing over them, as their peculiar ensign, they march as on dry land through the deep, and next morning stand on the sloping shore, to gaze on the level wave, shone upon by the risen sun, the tomb of Pharaoh and his host. Ever onward, from that day, this man of God never rose at morning but over his head the ensign unfurled was the miraculous cloud; nor ever lay down to rest without the guardian fiery column. Nor had they journeyed many days ere, at his word, the food which they needed came from heaven, and the water from the rock. Miracles attended them all their journey through. This man moved amid miracles; and so intimate is he in holy familiarity with his God, that forty days and nights are twice spent alone with Jehovah on the mountain-top, a screen of fire, consuming fire, guarding the presence-chamber, so that no man but Moses might approach. At last, forth he comes, with his face shining, too bright for mortal eye. Yet, as if all this were too little, and as if the Lord would return the visit of his friend, when Moses is in peril, lo! Jehovah drives his chariot up to his tent-door, the pillar-cloud descending, and talking with him (Ex. xxxiii. 9, 10). This is but a sample. But what a man is this man of God! What scenes he has passed through! What a favoured saint! His God has done to him more than to any before him, or almost any since.

This, then, is the man who here prays over that sad sin (Num. xx. 12). It was but one; the first public sin of his life; the first time his meekness had failed these thirty-eight years, though every day tried by such a people! Yet even this one sin, in the case of this favoured man, see how it is chastised! Moses being now near the land, and the time for Israel passing in at hand, is often anticipating their entrance in. He sees the land from the spot where he is: 'Yonder hills are in the country promised to our fathers; yonder palms wave over it; this breeze, so cooling, brings the fragrance from its flowers; and only let me pass this Jordan, now in view, and, after all this wilderness-trial, I stand there!' He goes alone; the venerable man, his hair white with the snows of 120 winters, falls prostrate, prays under some bush or palm, at the foot of Nebo: 'O Lord God . . . I beseech Thee let me go over.' But no sooner is the prayer done, than a voice is heard, not whispering through the trees, but from heaven: 'Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter.'

Ah! how holy is the Lord! 'Our God is a consuming fire!' (Heb. xii. 29.) He burns up sin wherever it is found. And though He means to pardon this sin, yet He must express his abhorrence of it. Sin in Moses is equally vile with sin in a devil. He must bear the chastisement; he must go halting to his grave.

Moses feels this is just, and complains not. He does not try to balance the present sin by recounting past services; nor to cover it, by referring to the fact that this is the first of its kind for thirty-eight years, in public, and that in meekness he hitherto had been most exemplary. No; this would be to try to blot out sin by former holiness—a subtle and perilous attempt for the conscience. Moses submits. Nor is there any trace of sullenness in his submission. Nay, rather, after this he speaks more highly of the land than ever: 'A land of brooks of water, of fountains, and depths that spring out of their valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil-olives and honey' (Deut. viii. 7, 8). 'A land flowing with milk and honey.'

Do any of you try to soften the blow, and to blunt the edge of conviction, when you do fall into some sin,—it may be some sudden ebullition of temper, some burst of old nature, something that your family or your friends feel and know? Do you say, 'Oh, it is but occasional—very rare; and, in the main, I am very different, and it is soon over?' Our God admits no such apology; our God does not pardon on such grounds. A black spot looks all the blacker on white snow. Oh that you had Moses' submissive tenderness of conscience! Who can tell how far your slow progress in grace arises from this once yielding to sin? Can it be that you are pursued by the chastisement?

Elsewhere we are taught by Miriam's sin (Num. xii.), to-day by the sin of Moses. And, unbeliever, where shall you appear, if God's own escape not sore chastisement? Oh the abhorrence God has of sin! The God of Moses and of Jacob will pursue you to the uttermost. 'If they whose judgment it was not to drink of the cup have assuredly drank of it, shall you go unpunished?' (Jer. xlix. 12.)

II. A saint casting behind his back past experiences.—This is seen in his prayer. His prayer refers to no one of the things that made him different from other men,—to none of his attainments, none of his privileges, none of his services, none of his sufferings and self-denials. It is grounded exclusively on the revealed character of his God: 'Thou hast begun to show me thy greatness and might.' He brings up to view just two things, viz. God's power to save, and the tokens of his willingness to use that power. The revelation of 'power, mighty works, mighty hand,' and these 'begun to be shown,' furnished a sufficient plea. If so, surely now to us the fuller revelation of the heart and hand of our God, in the face of Jesus, may furnish what is irresistible! Therein is the warrant. 'Take encouragement in prayer from God only.'

Moses does not (yet who would have wondered if he had?) speak of his fellowship with God, nor quote God's own testimonial: 'Faithful in all my house' (Num. xii. 7); 'Face to face I speak with him.' He does not urge: 'Lord, remember I gave up the treasures of Egypt for Thee. Lord, once Thou offeredst to make me a nation, and cut off all the people, and I refused; and now am I, the preserver of the spared nation, not to go in?' He omits all such pleas; self would have been in them; and the plea of God's power and willingness is enough.

Believer, you err egregiously if ever you resort to services, experiences, and sacrifices for God, to embolden you to ask and expect. 'Forget the things behind.' Come afresh every time on the strength of the warrant, 'Able to save . . . all that come unto God by Him.' Draw ever from the original fountain, Christ. 'Hold fast the beginning of your confidence to the end.'

But, further, Moses here may teach the inquirer. You think you could come if you had previously felt faith, and had attained somewhat.

This is self-righteousness—seeking a ground of encouragement in self. Ask Moses, and he will direct you. He will say, 'I had the experience of 120 years; but I laid all away—threw all behind me—and came in the strength of the warrant, Jehovah's name. Do you the same. You, indeed, have no such experiences to throw aside; but all the more readily, therefore, you may stand on a level with me here. I divested myself of all, and came as a sinner whose eye saw encouragement enough in God himself.'

Again; Moses condemns the excuses of the careless. You pretend to be waiting till you are fit to go. But you ought to go now, at once, on the ground of what God is, not what you are. In your pretended reasons for not going, you are wholly mistaken. A man that really comes, comes as Moses did, eyeing Jehovah's name. Why not do so now? Why turn thine eye elsewhere? Ah! why so unwilling to look on Him? There you would find all your warrant. Well, this is your condemnation, that you, all unfit in yourself, will not take fitness from Him.

III. A saint made still more a saint, and gaining his end, by having his will thwarted.—'I pray Thee, let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon. But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter. Get thee up into the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes: for thou shalt not go over this Jordan' (Deut. iii. 25–27). By the refusal of God to grant his prayer, he was benefited and prepared for glory, as well as blest at present. There is much of flesh and nature in many of our prayers; hence, no wonder they are refused.

'We, ignorant of ourselves,
Beg often our own harms,
Which the wise powers deny us for our good;'

and so

'We find profit by losing of our prayers.'

So spoke one of our poets, and it is all true. As Peter afterwards (John xxi. 20, 21) was refused his request, not only though loved, but because so loved.

We may wonder, indeed, why Moses urged his suit, after the positive declaration in Num. xx. 12. Perhaps he thought that that threatening extended only to his leadership, and that, possibly, he might go into Canaan on foot—a deposed leader. Or, like Hezekiah afterwards (Isa. xxxviii. 3–5), perhaps he felt, 'My God is so fertile in resources, so marvellous, it may be He has some way of taking his stroke from me; the threatening may be conditional.' But, at all events, he prayed, and was met by a peremptory refusal. Probably, till that moment, not he only, but all Israel to a man, thought it desirable that his prayer should be granted.

God was wiser far. By this treatment He greatly benefited Moses, and in this treatment He graciously discovered much of himself.

1. He thereby kept Moses on the proper ground of justification. After so many favours, and such holy intimacy with God, none was ever so apt (except Paul, who had been in the third heaven) to be exalted above measure. Need there was of a thorn in the flesh. Here it is: Moses is made to feel himself a sinner as others, needing the same righteousness as others. As he died, the hills on the other side Jordan stare him in the face; and so from Pisgah he sees what, in the very hour of death, causes him to betake himself solely to the righteousness set forth in the sacrifices and the ordinances which God caused him to appoint. Dying Moses would feel, 'But for my sin, I would have been dying yonder!' Thus it may have been with some of us. We were prescribing the answer that must come to our prayer,—the life of a dear Christian friend given back; or the eyesight of a friend threatened with blindness; the blow of adversity in regard to property warded off. But no. God did otherwise. Your self-importance got a blow. Had you been heard, perhaps you would have been ready to say, 'Now I am favoured above others.' Spiritual pride would have come in, and you have slid off the true Rock. But by rejecting your prayer, God made you feel yourself a commonplace, undeserving sinner; and you were glad to look again to the only justifying righteousness; for you saw clearly that there was no merit in you.

2. He thereby deepened his sanctification. For nothing helps on our holiness more than breaking the neck of self-will. Moses now, perhaps, got a finishing touch given to his meekness. 'Not my will' any more, 'but thine!' So you, believer? Perhaps everybody agreed with you in desiring the object; and yet no—the Lord's will is best, and you are best in acquiescing.

3. The Lord, nevertheless, at the same time, discovered his gracious character yet more, by doing all this in such a way as was fitted to give least pain. For He softened the pain of the refusal by giving a glimpse of the very land: '"Get thee up to the top of Nebo." Look westward—to where such scenes are to be witnessed at Messiah's First and Second Coming, Jerusalem and its hills. Look north, to that "goodly mountain." Look to south and east, and see the length and breadth of the whole glorious land' (ver. 27). Has not the Lord often done the like? After some denial, some rejected prayer, some cross-providence, has He not, at the communion table, or in a text of Scripture, or while you prayed and waited on Him, given a lifting up of his face, or some earnest of glory, that filled you with joy unspeakable?

4. But more: He filled his hands with present duty, that there might be no time for morbid reflection and regret: 'Charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him: for he shall go over before this people, and he shall cause them to inherit the land which thou shalt see' (ver. 28). 'Spend your time in instructing and training him.' You have felt this too? Duty was waiting on you—forced almost on you—all, by his kind arrangement, to divert your mind, and give you much to occupy and engross you, till the end should arrive.

5. Yet more—to complete all. About 1500 years after this time, Moses was actually on 'that goodly mountain, Lebanon,' if not in the land.* On that memorable Transfiguration-night,—when Israel's Saviour was come, and when he might see Him, not only as 'Man of sorrows' toiling up the hill, but as 'the King in his beauty,'—Moses was there. He saw the goodly mountain to best advantage; saw it at its best time, lighted up with glory, as it is yet to be when again its King returns. On that memorable night, when Moses returned with Elijah in the bright cloud, with what rapture would he say, 'Elijah, Elijah, let us praise Him! My cup runneth over. He once denied my prayer, and thereby blessed me with manifold blessings on earth; and now, lo! He has added at last the very wish of my heart!' And so when you whose friend was snatched from you, or whose friend's distress was not removed, in spite of all your prayers—when you at length stand in glory with Him, at his appearing and kingdom, you shall look back and see how He blest you fully—ever sending you back to the Justifying One, and ever carrying on your sanctification. And then, you shall add to all, 'He has made my cup run over! My friend is here in resurrection-beauty. No more separation now! my every wish is full!' For assuredly the sample given on the Transfiguration-hill shall be fulfilled in the kingdom in ten thousand instances.

Now, to sum up all—

1. Believers, see what blessing prayer brings! What a cluster of blessings! and all this attending even prayer unanswered, as it seemed! Blessing now, and hereafter too, when the golden vials are held up, 'full of incense' (Rev. v. 8). Even your unanswered prayers for the conversion of friends yield a large harvest.

But, when speaking of unanswered prayer for others, let us make no mistake. The prayer of faith, and the prayer of a man of faith, are not necessarily the same. The man of faith has unbounded confidence in the Lord's resources of love, grace, good-will, power; but the thing he is asking may not be a matter of faith—that is, not a thing directly promised in the word. And so it may turn out that this thing which the man of faith prayed for is denied to him; there being reasons, hid from our view, why God should so do. We must carefully distinguish between a man of faith expecting a blessing on the ground of a direct promise, and a man of faith expecting the blessing on the ground of a deep-wrought persuasion in his own mind, or because of a strong hope and desire, as in the case of Moses. If I pray for particular sins, 'that they may not have dominion over me,' or for victory over Satan and the world, or for God's presence with me in trouble, and in conflict with enemies, I have a warrant for saying it shall be done; and so I pray the prayer of faith. In James v. 15, the person who prayed had got some intimation (such as was common in apostolic days) that God wished to heal the sick man. If, however, I have no statement in the word to ground my request upon, and no intimation from God, my prayer is not the prayer of faith. But, on the other hand, the Lord often goes beyond his promise, when we are exercising faith in his Godhead-power and grace. He does not bind himself to go beyond the terms of his promise; but when, on the ground of encouraging statements as to his good-will, in all matters that concern his people, as well as on the ground of his infinite love, we ask such a thing as the conversion of a particular person, the Lord may give what we ask. Still, the answer, in this case, is not the result of a special promise, and so is not properly the answer to a prayer of faith. It is, however, like the Lord's reply to the Syrophenician woman: 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt;' and as when He said to the centurion: 'As thou hast believed, so be it unto thee.' He referred to the centurion's faith in his unlimited Godhead-power, not to his faith in any particular promise regarding that special case. The Holy Ghost often stirs up such prayers as the Syrophenician's and the centurion's in the heart of God's people. There are also hundreds of cases, in which it pleases Him to answer us, while praying for our friends, though our request is not grounded on any plain promise; for He can say, if it please Him: 'Be it unto thee as thou wilt, and according to thine appeal to my general love and power.' At the same time, there are often cases of unanswered prayer, and they all belong to this class: they are cases for which no positive promise or statement of the word could be pleaded, and in which the Lord saw wise reasons for saying, 'Nay; speak to me no more of this matter.' Yet all the while the praying one is a gainer by his prayer.

* If the Transfiguration-hill were Tabor, he was in the land; but it was possibly Hermon, a spur of Lebanon, and beyond Jordan.

2. Unsaved men, if Moses' one sin made it a righteous thing in God to deny his request, and that, too, though the sin itself was forgiven; who are you to hope for acceptance on a deathbed, by uttering, 'Lord, have mercy on me!' and getting friends to do so too? The Lord may remind you of this scene, or may say, from amid the accumulated heap of calls, invitations, warnings, 'Let it suffice; speak to me no more of this matter;' and you never shall see that 'good land!' Take up the warrant now: 'O Lord, Thou hast begun to show thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand: for what God is there in heaven or in earth that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might?' Plead his power and willingness in Jesus. Use this plea now; otherwise you may yet see 'Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and the prophets,' go into the kingdom, but yourself cast out, left to weeping and gnashing of teeth in outer darkness!

THE TEMPTATIONS OF RICHES.

'Now Jehoshaphat had riches and honour in abundance, and joined affinity with Ahab.'—2 CHRON. xviii. 1.

JEHOSHAPHAT had in his father Asa an example and a beacon; much to encourage, and much to warn, might be gathered from his sire's history. Jehoshaphat began well, and God blessed him. He sought first the honour of God, and the good of his people, and all things were added to him. 'He had riches and honour in abundance;' but, alas! he did not (like Paul) 'know how to abound.' No circumstances in which God places us, should lead to our abandonment of first principles. To use all for God, to be separated from evil, and to make no friendship with God's enemies, are first principles in all ages, and for all characters.

But Jehoshaphat, when he became rich, joined affinity with Ahab. How very unlike, the moral character and religious habits of these two kings! Although near neighbours geographically, they were moral antipodes. Morally and spiritually they had nothing in common. Yet Ahab could appreciate Jehoshaphat's honour and riches, and because of them welcomed his proffered friendship.

But what a crop of mischief grew from this small seed! The friendship of the parents brought about a marriage between their children, and the ultimate result was, that the royal house of Judah was all but exterminated. 'Beware of the friendship of the world,' is written in large characters on this history.

But is there not some connection between the two things mentioned in this verse—i.e. the riches possessed, and the union formed? Had Jehoshaphat remained poor, probably he had never joined affinity with Ahab. Poverty has many trials; but it prevents many evils. Perhaps the secret motive in the good king of Judah was desire of display. This was the sin by which Hezekiah afterwards fell. Let us watch against it.

THE QUIET YEAR.

IT came with soft and gentle tread,
A light was on its brow;
A wreath of mercies round its head,
Which it has left me now.

Softly it passed from winter's snow
To spring's delightful hours;
And still its voice was kind and low,
Its hands were full of flowers.

When summer came, all glowing up
With sound of nature's hymn,
The year still fill'd my ample cup
With blessings to the brim.

Through autumn's ripeness and decays,
With even step it went,
And gave to the soon short'ning days
The lustre of content.

'Tis well, O gentle, placid year,
Thy history to recall,
While still upon my list'ning ear
Thy parting footsteps fall!

All praise to Him who, day by day,
Commission'd thee to bring
Tokens of love, which on my way
Sent me forth carolling.

The years of sorrow gone before
I never may forget;
And oftentimes I ponder o'er
Their deeper lessons yet.

But now my Father's hand has given
The months without a tear;
I lift a grateful song to heaven
For this my quiet year.

E. A. W.

The Treasury Hymnal.

The hymns are selected from Dr. Bonar's "Hymns of Faith and Hope." The Letter-note Method of musical notation, by permission of Messrs. Colville & Bentley, is introduced as a help to young singers.

HE LIVETH LONG WHO LIVETH WELL.

Words by HORATIUS BONAR, D.D. Music from BEETHOVEN.

Met. 96 = ♩
TREBLE.
ALTO.
TENOR.
BASS.
ACCOMP.
1. He liv - eth long who liv - eth well! All o - ther
2. He liv - eth long who liv - eth well! All else is
1. He liv - eth long who liv - eth well! All o - ther life is short and vain; He liv - eth long - est be - ing flung a - way; He liv - eth long - est
life is short and vain; He liv - eth long - est

 The letter is placed to the right when the note is sharpened, and to the left when it is flattened.

who can tell Of liv - ing most for heav'n - ly who can tell Of true things tru - ly done each who can tell Of liv - ing most for heav'n - ly
1st. time.
2nd. time.
gain.
gain.
day.
day.
gain.
gain.

Waste not thy being ; back to Him,
Who freely gave it, freely give,
Else is that being but a dream,
'Tis but to be, and not to live.

Be wise, and use thy wisdom well ;
Who wisdom speaks must live it too ;
He is the wisest who can tell
How first he lived, then spoke, the true.

Be what thou seemest ; live thy creed ;
Hold up to earth the torch divine ;
Be what thou prayest to be made ;
Let the great Master's steps be thine.

Fill up each hour with what will last ;
Buy up the moments as they go ;
The life above, when this is past,
Is the ripe fruit of life below.

Sow truth if thou the truth wouldst reap ;
Who sows the false shall reap the vain ;
Erect and sound thy conscience keep ;
From hollow words and deeds refrain.

Sow love, and taste its fruitage pure ;
Sow peace, and reap its harvest bright ;
Sow sunbeams on the rock and moor,
And find a harvest-home of light.

The Harleys of Chelsea Place.

CHAPTER XVI.

TOM continued to persevere, not only in his studies, but in endeavouring to walk in the good and the right way; and as the weeks slipped by, there was a degree of solidity manifested in his conduct hitherto unknown. Not but he was the same bright, joyous youth; for true religion tends to cheerfulness, not to depression of spirits; and wherever gloom and melancholy are constantly evinced in a believer, we may be quite sure that there is something wrong with him, bodily or mentally. God's service is perfect freedom; and where there is freedom there should be joy and peace. Doctor Cote was much pleased with Tom's evidently increasing steadiness, his impetuosity of character having caused him much anxiety; for what are talents, if from the slightest cause they can be used for evil to the possessor, rather than good? and such will they ever be, if the owner has no internal power to resist external influences. Tom's companions considered him getting a little too straight-backed when he would not stoop to some of their wild pranks; but, on the whole, voted him a first-rater and a brick.

But perhaps the most marked change in Tom was seen in his behaviour to Constance, whom it had been the delight of his life to make fun of. For a long time he had felt that ridicule is not the kindest or best way of showing persons their failings; but now that he had enrolled himself amongst the servants of the meek and lowly Jesus, he knew that it was decidedly wrong, and determined, with the Holy Spirit's aid, to take up his cross daily and deny himself. And a cross indeed it was to Tom; for it is no light matter for a hasty, impulsive person to set a watch over his tongue, and keep guard over his lips, lest a slighting, if not unkind remark escape him; and such he proved to be the case. But he strove to overcome; and strong in the strength of Him who is more than conqueror, he generally prevailed.

At first, Constance could not understand why Tom was so much more gentle and forbearing when she was in one of her high and mighty moods; and instead of addressing her as 'Your majesty,' or 'Major Magnificat,' either took no notice or called her Conny as usual; but after a while, she supposed that the reason he was so changed was that he had grown older, and thought it unmanly for a youth of just seventeen to be so light and frivolous. However, she was very much pleased, and tried to show him she was, by many little attentions which she would not have condescended to, before the alteration in his manner to her. Dora saw all and noted all, and though four years his junior, read his mind like an open book; indeed there never had been any concealments between them, and they were less likely than ever to occur now that they rejoiced in the same hope, tried to walk in the same way, and looked to the same end.

Christmas came and Christmas went, and the happy holiday family which had gathered at 6, Chelsea Place, again returned to school and school duties. Mrs. Harley had proposed that Madge should be a day-pupil, like Constance, at Miss Hughes', thinking the Colonel would like to have her in the same house with himself; but he had wisdom to refuse, saying he felt it would be better for Madge to continue a weekly boarder at school; for though capable of governing a regiment of soldiers, his past experience had proved that he was incapable of managing an only child. So Madge continued with Miss Hughes, perfectly happy at having dear papa so near, that she could always be with him from Saturdays to Mondays. Dora was also made happy, by Signor Piozzi's lessons being discontinued; Miss Mills having represented to Mr. and Mrs. Harley how useless, if not injurious, they were to her nervous and excitable pupil.

At midsummer, another triumph awaited the Harleys; for Tom actually obtained a scholarship (there being two attached to Lotsirl College), which entitled him to finish his education at Cambridge. Tom had never swerved from his earliest desire of being a barrister; and now that he saw his way made straight before him, his thankfulness was unbounded. It was therefore decided that Tom should enter at St. John's, Cambridge, the following October, and Uncle and Aunt Bennett came from Leighton to spend a few weeks at Lotsirl, to see and advise with him. Mr. Bennett had been a solicitor; indeed he still was the elder partner in the firm of Bennett, Hipper, and Son, at Leighton, though he had little or nothing to do in the business department. After the death of his children he had gradually withdrawn himself from a profession uncongenial to his tastes, and given himself more entirely to works of charity and love than he could have done had they lived and needed to be provided for. How Dora longed to tell Uncle Bennett that Cousin Tom loved God, no one can have any idea, unless they know by experience the soul's happiness in the love of Christ.

A few days before Tom went to Cambridge, Mrs. Harley determined to have a long talk with Tom about the necessity of being decided for Christ, if he would be truly happy for time and eternity. She had observed, with much thankfulness, how much more thoughtful and steady he had been for the last six or eight months; but she dreaded the influence of ungodly companions upon one as impetuous as he was, and could only lift up her heart to Him who knoweth the secret yearnings of his children, and pray that her boy might be preserved from the snares of the world, the flesh, and the devil. Her heart nearly failed her when she reached Tom's room; but when he opened the door in answer to her gentle tap, she was encouraged by the bright smile which welcomed her.

'My son,' she said, as she sat down, and he leaned over the back of her chair, his head nearly resting on her shoulder, 'your father and I are so anxious about you. We desire that you should never forget that you are not your own, but bought with a price, even the blood of the Son of God, and that you should show by your life whose you are, and whom you serve. You will soon be leaving us, and will have to mix with those who will laugh at and despise that which from your infancy you have been taught to love and revere. My boy, my precious boy, never deny by word or deed the Lord your Redeemer.'

'I desire not to do so, mamma. I desire to be his faithful servant to my life's end.'

'I believe you do now, my dear child. I believe that you would be ashamed to be considered anything else than a Christian youth; but oh, Tom, I am so afraid of you. I do so sadly fear when you go out from amongst us, lest you should be tempted to forget the solemn subject on which we are now talking. You are so hasty and easily led, and are consequently so liable to err, that I can only pray that a strength not your own will be vouchsafed to you in your time of temptation and need.'

Tom's head quite touched his mother's shoulder, nay, it seemed to rest upon it, as he whispered:

'Mother dear, I can say now from the bottom of my heart,

"No goodness, Lord, no strength have I,
I live upon a Saviour's grace;
Nor would I less dependent be,
Nor would I seek a higher place."'

'Tom!' cried Mrs. Harley, with a joyful voice, 'how long have you been able to say that?'

'Nearly eight months, mamma. Dora made me seek until I found for myself that God loved me, a headstrong, wilful boy, who cared not to love Him.'

Mrs. Harley was thoroughly overcome, and wept aloud for some minutes, when Tom said:

'Speak to me, mamma, do not weep; it saddens me to see tears flow from your eyes.'

'I weep for joy,' she replied. 'Oh, I have been so anxious, and so doubtful about you, Tom. I had quite forgotten that the Lord has hidden servants in the midst of much seeming worldliness and inconsistency. But why did you not tell me before?'

'I was afraid, mamma.'

'Afraid, Tom! afraid of me, your mother!' and a pained look flitted over her pale, patient face.

'Not in that way, mamma,' explained Tom, hastily, as he bent over her and kissed her. 'I could tell you all my heart, my own dear mother. But I was so afraid I should be constantly doing wrong; for I am so careless, and I knew it would fret you more if you thought I was a servant of God when I fell. Oh, mamma, I have been so afraid lest I should offend my Lord and Saviour lately, and yet I have not had courage to declare myself on his side. Sometimes I think I should have been happier, and better able to have resisted temptation, had I boldly professed "whose I am and whom I serve," for very often right seemed wrong to me. But I have determined to take my stand on my Master's side, and with grace to help, I will be his to death.'

'Does Dora know?' inquired Mrs. Harley.

'Yes, she is the only one that does, except yourself now. I bound her to secrecy.'

'Darling Dora! our little messenger of mercy, going about noiselessly doing good. Surely she is the blessing of the house. But I must tell your father, Tom, he will rejoice that his first-born has given himself to God.'

'As you please, mamma. But oh! do not tell every one. I am so afraid lest I should do something or other that might bring disgrace upon my profession, and give the world cause to doubt my sincerity.'

'Only your father shall hear it from me, Tom. But be not afraid, my son. "Greater is He that is for us than all that are against us." Wonderfully has God brought good out of evil for us. Your uncle's sad death paralysed all your father's energies, nearly affecting his reason. Then your aunt died, and little Dora came to be one of our household; with her came peace and comfort. Gradually her loving influence upon your father has been a blessing, and the gloom which had gathered over him is fast passing away; and now she has led you to the feet of Him from whom she derives all the love she so freely gives to others. God does indeed "move in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform." Oh that we would trust Him more implicitly! To his everlasting mercies I commend you, my child, and may you find that He is "a strong tower whereunto you can always resort from the face of your enemies." God Almighty bless you, Tom, and keep you in all your ways! I must leave you now, for I expect papa will be wanting me.'

Tom watched his mother from over the bannisters go down to his father's room, and saw that the look of joy which his communication had conjured upon her face, still lingered there; and he inwardly prayed that nothing on his part might ever cast a shade on that beloved countenance.

He then went down to the schoolroom, where he found Colonel Allen relating a famous tiger hunt to Guy and Agnes, who, with open eyes and breathless interest, listened to his story.

As he saw Tom enter, he looked up and observed, 'It looks as if it had been a good day to you, my boy.' And Tom, with manifest feeling, replied, 'It has, sir.'

'That is right,' observed the old Colonel. 'You will find, if you stick to your colours, that all your days will be good, for he who serves God serves a good Master. I only wish I had been as true to my God as I have been to my queen and country; my past would be pleasanter to look back upon, and my future to look forward to. But I thank my God there is a place in his kingdom for the penitent deserter, as well as the faithful soldier. Glory be to his name!' and he lowered his arm reverently, as if dropping the point of his sword in a military salute.

CHAPTER XVII.

MR. BENNETT accompanied Tom to Cambridge, to see him comfortably settled into his rooms, and to make necessary arrangements. Colonel Allen begged to be allowed to help in a pecuniary way; but Tom, with many thanks, refused his kindness, saying, 'What others had done could be done again; and he was determined to make his own way, with God's blessing, in the world.' Mr. Bennett had insisted upon paying for the furniture in his college rooms, and that was all the assistance he would accept. But the Colonel would not be quite set aside, and coaxed and came over Mrs. Harley to slip amongst Tom's books and clothing, many useful, if not really valuable presents.

Oh that packing for Tom!—dear Tom! How many tears were shed and laughs had over it! The Colonel presided over the book department, and Mrs. Harley the linen; whilst old nurse, Dora, Constance, and Madge (for Madge was kept from school some days over her Michaelmas holiday, to be with Tom until he left), assisted in any way they could. Mr. Harley, Guy, and Agnes, did the walking part; for they wandered from room to room, every now and then bringing some little trifle of Tom's which they had found, and thought ought to go to the schoolroom, where the packing was conducted. Jenkins did the hammering and cording; and he and Pat Donovan, who came every evening after work whilst the bustle was going on, carried the cases down into the hall, where their rough exterior contrasted strangely with the marble stones and polished oaken furniture. Truly they looked out of place; and yet no one could bear to anticipate the day when they should be removed.

It was well that there was so much to be done, so many things to be remembered, and so many to keep each other's spirits up when they began to flag, or it would have been a melancholy time at 6, Chelsea Place, for the Harleys had never been parted before. Only Johnny had gone out from their midst, and him they had learned to miss, but not deplore; but Tom, high-spirited, noble Tom, was going away for more than two months, and involuntarily the question rose in each breast, What shall we do without him? Tom tried to be brave and not let them see what he felt at leaving them; but it was as much as he could do, and very often he made a dash off to his room to hide his emotion.

At last the day really came, the carriage was at the door, the heavier luggage had been previously sent on, and Mr. Harley, with the Colonel, had walked to the terminus to see Tom and Mr. Bennett off, when Tom gave a parting kiss, or shake of the hand, to all the inmates of his dear old home. Even Madge held up her blushing face and claimed a sister's right from Tom, whilst all followed him down the steps to the carriage door. But the last look and the last kiss was for his mother, though he retained one of Dora's hands within his own, and his last words, whispered in his loving parent's ear, were, 'Mamma, I will be a son that maketh not his mother ashamed.'

It was so strange and odd when Tom was gone that no one seemed to know what to do. Mrs. Harley had retired to her room, and no one liked to follow her there; and so the young Harleys, with Madge, gathered in the schoolroom, and with streaming eyes talked of dear old darling Tom, until the Colonel and Mr. Harley returned from seeing him off. Then the Colonel proposed that he should take the 'young fry,' as he designated the schoolroom party, away for a day's pleasure, and leave Mr. and Mrs. Harley to a little quiet, a proposal which was gladly assented to; and in less than an hour, the Colonel, accompanied by the five junior members of the family, departed by train for a neighbouring watering-place, where donkeys, brown bread, eggs, and cream were to be had in the greatest perfection. No person could have credited that the erect, reserved, commanding-looking officer, who paraded up and down Chelsea Place for half an hour every morning before breakfast, was the same merry, active, funny-spoken man who was throwing pebbles into the water, or racing after donkeys on the beach at Rockclift. And could Jenkins have beheld his master that day in that place, it is very doubtful whether he would have believed that his eyes told him true. Yet so it was; and the Colonel, upon his return to Lotsirl, informed Mrs. Harley that he had played the child all the day, and certainly he felt all the better for it.

In the course of two or three days Mr. Bennett returned from Cambridge, bringing with him very favourable reports of Tom, and towards the end of a week he and Aunt Jenny took leave of Lotsirl friends. Madge and Constance went back to school; and lessons were resumed in the schoolroom at Chelsea Place, under Miss Mills' direction. It was a long time before the Harleys could forget that Tom was gone; and constantly there were inquiries made for him, and, 'Where is Tom?' or, 'Run and tell Tom,' were frequently on the lips of Dora, Agnes, and Guy. But at last they grew accustomed to his absence, and took to counting the days until his return. Agnes had made a long strip of paper, marked with the days of the month until the 16th of December, when the Cambridge term ended; and every day she and Guy cut off the number of the previous one, and put them away to show Tom when he came home. Dora said little; but there is every reason to suppose she made private or mental calculations upon the flight of time, for she could always tell the exact number of days that would elapse before Cambridge term ended.

Then, when December arrived, and Tom was once more amongst them, what rejoicings took place, and with what delight Tom's cap and gown were handled and inspected! And then Tom was actually grown taller in the two months; and, as Agnes and Guy proclaimed aloud, 'had real brown whiskers coming, which made him look so mannish,' a piece of information which other quick eyes had detected beside Agnes's and Guy's, but the possessor of the eyes had forborne commenting upon. But when holidays commenced, then the joy was at its climax, for Madge and Constance could share with them in their enjoyment of Tom. And all agreed he was not a bit altered in himself, but was just the same dear Tom he had always been, only he was bigger, nicer looking, and, if possible, better than he used to be.

The four weeks' recess slipped quickly by, and again Tom returned to Cambridge; but the second parting was not like the first. There was no bitterness in it, for they knew all about where he was going to, even to the shape of his rooms and the furniture in them; and Tom had made pen-and-ink sketches of his gyp, bedmaker, the dean, and several other principal characters figuring in his domestic and scholastic life; so that they were tolerably well up in their individual appearances, and would talk about them as if they had seen or known them. Mrs. Spriggs, the bedmaker, was a source of much amusement to them; and many a hearty laugh they had over her, after Tom was gone, when they remembered some of the anecdotes connected with her public career.

Constance having completed her seventeenth year, was not to have returned to school after the holidays; but Miss Hughes begged so hard that she and Madge might not be separated, for they were of such benefit one to the other, and the Colonel was so earnest in his entreaties that the two girls should finish their education at the same time, that Mr. and Mrs. Harley consented for her to remain until midsummer, when Madge would leave school with her, a plan which Constance fully responded to. Indeed, latterly there had been a marked improvement visible in her, and she was far less high-minded, and more amenable to parental authority. She had learned to think long and seriously, and had striven hard against her ambitious desires and pride of heart; though, perhaps, the fact that Madge, who was a year younger than herself, and was quite her equal in attainments and accomplishments, had materially assisted in her gaining a truer estimate of her own position and acquirements.

CHAPTER XVIII.

We must now beg our readers to pass over five years, until Tom Harley had taken his B.A. degree at Cambridge, gone through the necessary examinations in London, and has once more returned to Lotsirl to live, but not at 6, Chelsea Place, for he has a house of his own, very near to it, however, and he is married to Robin Redbreast, Madge Allen. The Colonel still resides at Chelsea Place, that is, he sleeps there, for the greater part of his days are spent at Madge's. Guy is in the middle school at Lotsirl College, and is as much a favourite as his brother was before him. Agnes assists her mother in superintending domestic affairs, and makes herself generally useful. Constance has been married two years, and keeps her carriage; but it is not a yellow one with grey horses, but a very unpretending but pretty barouche, drawn by a pair of ponies, who know their way so well to Chelsea Place, that they always stop at No. 6 without any tightening of the reins by the driver; and most fine days Mrs. Harley accompanies her daughter for a drive.

But Dora; what has become of Dora? you ask.

Follow me to the study in Chelsea Place, and see and hear for yourself. The evening shadows are deepening and gathering there; but there is sufficient light to make two figures clearly visible. The one is Mr. Harley, sitting in his easy-chair; the other is Dora, on an ottoman at his feet, an open book lying upon her lap.

'Dora,' observed Mr. Harley, 'is there not some one tapping at the door?'

Another tap is heard, and to Dora's 'Come in,' a young girl enters, and, with a curtsey, says:

'Will it plaze ye, Miss Dora, to spare me an hour or two this evening?'

'Where to, Kathleen?' inquired Dora.

'I'm a-wanting to take a peep at Biddy's baby, Miss Dora. Pat 'll be seeing me home if ye plaze.'

'Well, then, you can go, Kathleen; but you had better inquire of my aunt whether you can do anything for her before you leave.'

'Sure and Miss Dora, she's gone with the Colonel an hour or more to Master Tom's—good luck to him.'

'Then you can go at once, Kathleen; and tell Mrs. Donovan to come up to me to-morrow morning. Don't you forget.'

'As if I'd be forgetting to tell mother that,' said Kathleen, as she closed the door upon Dora and her uncle. 'I'd be forgetting my own name before I'd forget your word, my darlint young missus.'

'Dora,' remarked Mr. Harley, after a short silence, 'I have been thinking over the past, and comparing it with the present, my darling, to-day, and I cannot quite understand how it is, but so it is, that we are so much happier since we have been poorer. Of course, I am not alluding to your circumstances, dear—they are unchanged—but to my own.'

Dora drew nearer to her uncle, and, taking one of his hands within her own, replied:

'Because, dear uncle, we were drawn closer to each other in adversity, and learned to help each other in the time of need. We realized that it was our privilege to be members one of another—acting, living, loving members,—and as such have proved that in

'Union is strength.'

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

1 Peter ii. 3.

The word, 'if so be,' does not imply uncertainty as to this tasting, as if it were still a doubtful thing, to a believing man, whether he had tasted that the Lord was gracious, or indeed whether He were gracious at all. It means rather, 'Since ye have tasted;' and assumes this as the beginning of their religious life, their Christian history.

The following points will bring out all this: (1) The Lord; (2) His graciousness; (3) Our tasting of this graciousness; (4) The effects produced on us by this.

I. The Lord.—It is the Lord Jesus. This is the common name for Him throughout the epistles. It is a name of honour and glory. In heaven his name is 'the Lamb,' for there is no danger of his being denied his honour there; on earth it is 'the Lord,' to keep before us his dignity and power. He is the Lord as truly as the Saviour. His graciousness, which we taste, is the graciousness of the Lord—the Lord of all—Lord of lords.

II. His graciousness.—It is his love, his tender love, or tender mercies to the sinner, that are here spoken of. He is gracious,—compassionate, loving, merciful, 'forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin.' We 'know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.' We see his graciousness in his incarnation, in his words and deeds of grace, in his cross and grave. All that He did, spake, suffered on earth, were declarations and proofs of his grace. He is 'full of grace and truth.' This is his character. We do not need to touch the question of whom this graciousness concerns; for it is of the gracious One and his character simply that the text speaks. What He is in himself, is the great question. He is the infinitely gracious one. This graciousness is free, infinite, unchangeable. This is the vessel of fulness out of which we drink. 'God is love;' Christ is gracious,—this is the core of the gospel.

III. Our tasting it.—The word 'tasting' is used in Scripture, both as to the evil and the good, the bitter and the sweet. Death is said to be 'tasted,' and so is the word of God; and so here is the graciousness of Christ. It means our thorough entering into the nature and properties of an object, whatever that may be. 'Taste and see that the Lord is good.' We taste that the Lord is gracious, when we relish and enjoy Him and his grace. This tasting is not something mysterious or unintelligible; it is the soul's appreciation of the love of Christ, in the reception of the record concerning Him. We feel our need, our poverty, our sin; and we feel in Christ something which precisely meets all these. We drink in the good news as the thirsty man drinks the water; we feed on them as the hungry man does on the bread; we relish them as the tongue the sweetness of the honey-comb. Christ is realized as precious, suitable, sufficient; specially in his grace, his free love. This is dearer to us than gold; sweeter than honey, or the honey-comb.

IV. The effects of this.—These are many, not one. This graciousness of the Lord thus filling us, and enjoyed by us, produces wonderful results in the soul.

(1.) It is life to us.—Its quickening effects are marvellous. It rouses us from depression and death, infusing heavenly life. Every feature of Christ is, in its measure and way, quickening, but specially his grace. For this is, above all others, that which a dead soul needs.

(2.) It is gladness to us.—No grace, no gladness; uncertain grace, uncertain gladness; scanty grace, scanty gladness. That there is such a thing as grace in God, is of itself cheering; that it has come down to us here on earth, is yet more so. That it has done so through such a channel as the Son of God; that this Son of God is himself infinitely gracious,—this is glad tidings to a sinner.

(3.) It is liberty to us.—No grace, no liberty; no knowledge of grace, no sense of liberty; uncertain grace, uncertain liberty. But this grace, so free, so sure, so boundless, is the breaking of all bonds. It sets the soul wholly and for ever free. The sight of such grace as there is in this gracious One, is deliverance from bondage and fear.

(4.) It is holiness.—It makes us holy men. We are not holy before we taste the grace, but become so by tasting it. It sanctifies, purifies, conforms us to the likeness of the gracious One. It leads us to lay aside all malice, and all guile, etc., and to desire the pure milk of the work. This is the result of the good news received, of the grace tasted. It transforms us into new men, according to the nature of the heavenly thing which we have tasted. The more and the longer we taste it, the more are we purified by it. It operates powerfully and gloriously. It is like sunrise chasing away the night; it is like early and latter rain, fertilizing and refreshing the ground,—making 'the wilderness and the solitary place to be glad, and the desert to rejoice and blossom as the rose.'

OUR HIGH PRIEST.

BY THE REV. J. J. BONAR, GREENOCK.

NUM. VI. 22-27; LEV. IX. 22-24.

WE shall consider these four points, as suggested by our text: The intercessor, whose hands are lifted up; the prayer which rises from his lips; the individuals in behalf of whom he pleads; and the success which crowns his advocacy.

I. We look, first, at the intercessor who is mentioned here.

1. It is Aaron that is appointed to use these words; and, in doing so, his manner was as follows: As priest, he has slain the sacrifice; and passing onwards from the brazen altar, in the outer court, he sprinkles with blood the mercy-seat in the holy of holies. Having put off the raiment of an ordinary priest, he robes himself in the garments of the high priest—so conspicuous for 'glory and for beauty,'—and again comes forth into the midst of the tabernacle. Elevated upon a platform, he there lifts up those hands which had borne the sacrifice; and whilst still the blood is on them, he offers, in hearing of all, the supplications we have read.

2. In this whole action, however, Aaron was the type of Jesus, our true High Priest; and all this ritual of benediction has its counterpart in 'the true tabernacle within the heavens.'

In 'the outer court'—even this world—Jesus has shed the blood of remission; and, carrying it within the veil, He has sprinkled the throne. Laying aside the raiment of humiliation, He is glorified with 'the glory which He had with the Father from before all worlds.' And as High Priest of the church, He is ready to bless. The time is not yet come when He shall draw the curtain of the sky, and be seen in the apparel of his unlimited majesty; and till then, the antitype is not closed. Nevertheless, even now, as waiting to befriend us, Jesus 'stands' in the presence of God 'for us.' He is raised upon an eminence; 'for He has ascended into the heavens,' and 'every eye can see Him.' Lo! too, his hands are spread out, pierced by the nails; and by this it is known to all that He has made atonement for the guilty. But, as He leans in this attitude over our world, Jesus pleads for us, whilst He commiserates; and, with like authority and tenderness, claims every blessing that his saints may need.

You remember that Jesus opened his ministry with blessing; for the fifth chapter of Matthew begins with, 'Blessed are the poor in spirit;' 'Blessed are the meek.' Then, if we turn to the twenty-fourth chapter of Luke, we can remark that, as his feet were rising from the Mount of Olives, on his return to the skies, He shed blessing from his lips anew. And, having sat down, He reigns to bless. The sacrificial priesthood of Aaron is merged in the royal priesthood of Melchisedec; and the blood of the altar has purchased the benediction of the throne.

3. Look past, then, the Aaron of our text, and see Jesus 'exalted at the Father's right hand.' Jesus cries, 'Father, bless!' Full of compassion and brotherhood, Jesus cries, 'Father, bless!' Pointing to the blood, wherewith He has washed the mercy-seat, Jesus cries, 'Father, bless!' Assured of the love that burns in the Father's heart, Jesus cries, 'Father, bless!'

This, this is He who must rise to our view when we meditate upon the words before us; and I beseech you to hear therein the voice of Jesus only. Carry your eye beyond that veil, over which the stars are shining, and ye will descry one like the Son of man. He lifts a censer in his hands; and these hands are cleft with wounds! He speaks; and oh! listen, for He is appealing to the Godhead. Over his own bleeding sacrifice Jesus pleads, and pleads for mercy, and pleads on our behalf!

II. We would now advert to the prayer Jesus offers. Jesus pleads above; but let us give heed to the import of his supplication; for his petitions are amazingly gracious, and suitable, and full.

The appeal is first to the Father; and it is an appeal for safety,—the terms being, 'Jehovah bless thee, and keep thee!' Everywhere, in Scripture, it is to the Father, we find, that the righteous are committed; and He is to be their Guardian, till the decree of their salvation is accomplished. We read in Eph. i. 3, 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us.' In Ps. cxxi. 5 we read, 'Jehovah is thy keeper: Jehovah shall preserve thy soul.' And in John xvii. 11 we read, 'Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom Thou hast given me.' It is, then, the Creator and Ruler of all; it is Jehovah who holds the sceptre, and regulates the universe; it is the God who ordained our being, and who made us; it is 'the Father' who comes before us in these passages, as fixing his sleepless eye on Israel, and laying under them the arms of his eternal power. To the same Father, accordingly, is it that Jesus commends the people of his heart. And the blessing He claims for us is also the same, even this, 'Keep them!'

Yes, it is safe keeping for them who have no strength, that He claims. It is protection from the hour when the elect one alights on earth, until his course is finished, that He claims. It is security against the paw of the bear, and the teeth of the lion, and the ferocity of the wolf, and the cunning of the adder, that He claims. It is deliverance from ten thousand ills, spiritual and common, known and unknown, that He claims. It is the supply of all help, and victory in every battle, that He claims!

Beloved, it is this that Jesus pleads for, when, as our High Priest, He cries, 'Jehovah bless them, and keep them!' By this petition He lodges, as it were, his sheep in the hands of Him, from whom 'none can pluck them;' and engages on their behalf all the perfections of Him from whom He received them as his heritage.

The prayer in our text is next an appeal to the Son, and an appeal for reconciliation; its tenor being this: 'Jehovah make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee.'

You ask, 'How can Christ appeal to himself?' But the explanation of this seeming contradiction lies in his twofold nature and capacity, as at once God and the God-man. In his character of God-man, He addresses himself as God. And this mode of expression is not found here only; but in Eph. v. 27 we read, 'That Christ might present the church unto himself.' And also in Acts iv. 29 we read, 'Lord, grant that signs be done, by the name of thy holy child Jesus.'

The High Priest, then, standing before the throne, not as God, but as man, exclaims, 'Make thy face to shine, and be gracious;' which is a prayer for reconciliation. 'Be gracious!' this is a cry for mercy, in behalf of them who were condemned; it is a cry for favour, in behalf of them whose guilt no merit of their own could expiate; it is a cry for pardon, in behalf of them who had no hope. 'Be gracious!' it is simply a cry for 'grace;' and a cry for grace, what means that, but 'love them?' Love them! Thou Judge whom they have offended! Love them! Thou Holy One, in whose image they were made! Love them! freely, for they have nothing to pay! Love them! though they be sinners; and love them because they are sinners! Love them! and they will not die! Love them! and let thy love be their everlasting portion!

This is the accent of the second petition in our text; and is it not sweet and comprehensive? In its bosom lie forgiveness, assurance, immortality. It is the lip of Jesus showing us what is in the heart of Jesus; and it makes it ours, beyond all risk. It secures us Jehovah's love without fail. It binds covenant grace to us, in all its energy, and for ever.

The next clause, 'Make his face to shine on thee,' conveys the idea of still higher blessing. 'Grace' is the fountain and the channel too. But here are the streams; and what streams! Jehovah looking on us, and not turning away! Jehovah reconciled to us, and making us his delight! Jehovah unfolding to us all his excellence, and seen without a cloud! Jehovah 'shining' over us, and pervading us with his glory!

Ah! beloved, angels have long walked in 'the light of Jehovah's countenance,' and beamed in its lustre. But Jesus now pleads with the Godhead to 'shine on us;' and at his voice, 'He who commanded the light to shine out of darkness hath shined in our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ.'

(To be continued.)

DIARY OF A COVENANTER.

CHAPTER II.

IT was with a sad heart that James Nimmo found himself obliged to leave Moray; and his journey was one of some anxiety, when he found whom he was to have for a fellow-traveller. 'On Saturday, crossing at Dundee, I was cast in company with one of the king's heralds, which was unpleasant to me. But I made the best of it I could; and when we lighted, though I could not drink so well, yet I was frank in paying, which pleased him. We were benighted at Kennoway, and after supper the herald said, he thought we might ride to Kirkcaldie next morning to hear sermon; and albeit, it stunned me to travel on Sabbath; yet, considering our quarters was hard at the kirk there, and I might be noticed if I went not, which I had not freedom to do, we might venture forward, and some gentle shift might be made. So I said to him, "Then let us clear our reckoning, that we have nothing to do on Sabbath morning but take our horses." He replied, "Then they will call us Whigs;" and I answered, "We would be soon up, and it was not fit then to trouble our hostess." And so we cleared, and next morning took our horses early. Now, I was feared for carnal discourse on the Lord's day, and so boarded him with some uncontroverted spiritual discourse, which did so take, and we felt to be so serious, that though we both had knowledge of the way, yet we went a considerable space out of it, before we noticed. Coming to Kirkcaldie Pathead, he said he had a brother lived there, and kept a change, and he thought we might breakfast there, and go from that to the kirk at Kirkcaldie. I was willing to light; but instead of a brother, as I expected, he was a brother messenger-at-arms only, which was yet more undesirable. But I carried it as pleasant as possible. After breakfast, I said I thought I was weary with travel, therefore would let the kirk alone for a day. He replied, "So would he." So, after a little, taking my Bible privately, and seeing a barn in the yard, I called for the key thereof, and went to it, and enjoyed myself in such duties as was most fit for that day, and wan to some seriousness in reading, prayer, and meditation; but alas! being too desirous to know my way, I began to be too peremptor with the Lord, and He withdrew and left Satan to buffet me, and to present to my mind as if I were a hanged man. I perceived it to be of Satan, and laboured to plead with the Lord to rebuke the temptation; but yet some tincture of it remained and begat some confusion in my mind.

'Upon Monday, the 23d, we went on our way to Kinghorn, where we crossed; and so soon as the boat touched at Leith, I went out in haste, and left my herald, and saw him no more.'

He arrived in Edinburgh on the 23d March 1683, and on the 30th April his wife arrived there also. But they had not been there a month when a strict search was made for him, and he was roused from sleep one night by his landlady, who told him that a party of the town guard were coming, and advised him to fly. 'After a little silence, I said, "No, I was in the hands of the Lord, and would abide there; but if I went to the street, I might fall into the hands of men." And the party coming to the next house, I hearing them, rose up, and putting my sword and wig in a kist, and there being only a thin partition between the party and me, I did see them with the lighted candles they had; but they could not see me in the dark. I did see them search so narrowly, and turn an old woman out of her bed, and then turned out the bedclothes also, and search under them. Then within a little they went off. . . . All this while, my mind was pretty composed; but when they were gone, and I in bed again, I fell a-trembling; that I might see my safety was of the Lord, and I had no strength in myself, but had need of continual supplies from Him.'

He now wished to escape to Holland; but the ports in Scotland were so strictly watched, that it was thought best for him to go from an English port. 'I got some letters of recommendation to some friends at Berwick, to desire them, if it were with their conveniency, to get me some recommendations to Newcastle, that I might take shipping there. Oh! to observe how wonderfully the Lord's ways are linked, through difficulties, tending to mercy and assured loving-kindness to his own! Oh to believe!'

'On Thursday, May 24th, 1683, taking my leave of wife and friends, no doubt with many thoughts of heart, considering the dangers of the time, and had but little money to leave with my wife, and little to take with me, I took my journey to Berwick, not knowing one foot of the way, and not having any that I had acquaintance with there.' However, he fell in with good companions—'two honest professors in my own circumstances,'—and on reaching Berwick, soon found friends. There he heard of the capture of Gordon of Earlston, and another Scotch gentleman, on board of a ship at Newcastle, in which they had embarked for Holland; so he was obliged to give up thoughts of escaping by that route, and as he had a friend who lived about two miles out of Berwick, he found it best to remain with him. In the meantime, his wife was suffering great anxiety on his account, being left alone in Edinburgh; and, as his plan for going to Holland had failed, he sent for her to join him, and they remained in the neighbourhood of Berwick for about sixteen months.

Here he fills his diary from day to day with very minute records of his spiritual state and experiences. We give the following as a specimen:—

'About the 18th of this month of August, I was made to see four things: First, There is seldom sound peace in the want of sound submission to the will of God. Secondly, Often tears are deceitful when the heart is not touched with a deep sense of sin. Thirdly, It's hard to keep grace in exercise among carnal friends and professors. Fourthly, That the sight of all these things was the return of prayer which had been made in my darkness; therefore, albeit we get not a sudden answer, yet there is ground to wait.'

He fails not to mention, as one of the advantages of his present abode, that he enjoyed the privilege of getting 'the key of the barn'—a small matter it may seem to those who live in large houses, but no light thing to him; for there alone could he find an opportunity to escape from the society of men, and hold communion with his God. After some months, he and his wife were cheered by the arrival of their much loved minister, Mr. Hogg, who, on being banished from Scotland, joined the little band of exiles at Berwick. While residing there, their eldest child, John, was born, an event accompanied with many mercies, which the father takes pleasure in recording. But, instead of following him here to his 'tenthly' division of the subject, we shall turn from James Nimmo's memoirs to the little time-worn volumes in which his wife records her experiences, and we shall see with what feelings Elizabeth Brodie looked on the prospect of being a parent.

'One night I was before the Lord in prayer; it was suggested to my mind, What if I was to be a mother of children? and oh, how terrible was reprobate children represented to me! I, as one in an ecstasy, was made to cry, "Elect seed or none! Elect seed or none!" And presently I wan to the faith of hearing, and was fully persuaded of hearing and acceptance.' The prayer was richly answered, though her faith was tried by long delays.

Their peace was interrupted by new alarms, owing to a search being made at Berwick. James describes their escape: 'One day there came certain word of a general search through the town. Accordingly, after dinner, the garrison began, and the ports were closed, and houses searched, and haylofts, and the hay in some overturned with great pains. They began at the next house to where Mr. Hogg and I were, and went round, so as our house was last—a mercy also. Mr. Hogg went to a private closet behind a hanging, and I went up to a little place made for doves, above a fore-stair, where I could only sit or lie, but not stand, to which only a deal (board) did lift and come down again so exactly as if made of purpose. And so we were in prison till they went the round of search; and against they came back to our house it was growing dark, and they much fatigued; and Mr. Henry Shell, our landlord and true friend, met them at the entry, and said he judged they were weary—Would they take a bottle of his ale or beer? To which they willingly agreed and accepted of.' It ended in the men's going away without any search, and the friendly landlord immediately 'came to Mr Hogg and me, and took us in his arms with as much joy as if he had got a prize, and said that all was over; and so we mercifully escaped them.'

We are inclined to wonder that they took so much trouble to apprehend a humble personage like James, who certainly was neither by position nor abilities likely to disturb the Government. But he held principles which admitted of no compromise, and refused the offer of liberty upon what he calls 'a sinful bond, which many took, acknowledging Bothwell Brig rebellion.' And now, from time to time, his heart was grieved by tidings that one after another of his friends had been taken. And when once taken, 'few wan clearly from them.' 'The Lord did let me see at this time, my life and all was in his hands, to kill or to save alive, to preserve or not. Not that it is not always so; but at this time it seemed He behoved either to save alive and preserve in a special manner, or else death and ruin, as to the things in the world, were at hand. . . . Upon Wednesday, November 5th, 1684, I got word that my father was taken and in prison for converse with me.' This was a terrible blow; his father had 'complied with the common course of defection,' and James had for some time feared that the Lord, against whom he had sinned through fear of man, would not defend him from trouble. His heart was earnestly drawn out in prayer that his affliction might be blessed to his father's soul. But the case seemed a very trying one, for the cause of the father's imprisonment was simply that certain letters from his son were found in his house; 'on which account he was guilty, by their law, in holding converse with his only son. Oh, hard law! So they carried him and all his papers and money, and brought him to Edinburgh; where, after reading the letters before the council, one of the Lords smiled and said to my father, "If ye had obeyed your son, you had not come here" (for in the end of each letter I had said, "read and burn"); "but although there be nothing in them against the king or us, yet ye are guilty of converse with your son, and therefore must go to prison." Because in some of them I had desired to leave his answer with Mrs. Ross or Mrs. Pyper, they were both forced to leave their houses, and fled to Berwick, where we were. Mrs. Pyper's house was so searched, that they looked under a scuttle for carrying coals, when one said, "She is little, but she cannot be there."'

Trifling as these details may seem, they give reality to the picture, and make us thankful that we live in days when men no longer hunt for traitors under old women's coal scuttles.

A proposal was at this time made, that James and his wife should join some of their friends who were going to settle in Carolina. According to his usual practice, he sought to know the will of God in the matter. The method constantly pursued by him and Elizabeth on such occasions, was to look for guidance by such verses of Scripture as were presented to their mind—a practice which seems to have been very common among those simple-hearted Christians. Their valued friend, Mr. Hogg, thought that they carried it too far, and we cannot do better than quote his warning to Elizabeth on a former occasion, a warning to which, however, she did not pay much attention. She writes, 'I was not willing to take my journey, because I had not particular clearness from the Lord, as I thought, and being pressed by outward providences, I knew not what to do. But at length, having converse with Mr. Thomas Hogg, I told him my scruple. He told me that folk behoved to be sober, and not to be too peremptor; and seeking Scriptures to know the Lord's mind might be my sin, and a ready way to be deluded, for Satan is ever busy on such occasions in some cases. "But," said he, "my practice is, first, I labour to have my mind brought to a ba'ance, that my affections have no sway to one thing more than to another. Then I labour to believe that I have to do with an infinite God who searches the heart; and believing Him to be such, I cry that He may make a right choice for me, and order his providence so that I may make a right choice. Then, after I have with singleness committed the matter to the Lord, I take the most reasonable way of the two, and go on softly, crying, 'Lord, stop me if Thou approve not;' so, though I use means, I wait for a stop, and so my dependence is still kept up."'

But James and his wife still adhered to their favourite way; and as he could get no 'clearness to go,' they gave up thoughts of Carolina.

We return to his narrative. 'About the beginning of February 1685 (King Charles dying upon the 7th of that month, without any knowledge of his sickness to us), about the tenth hour at night, the gates of Berwick, where we were, were shut, and proclamation made by tuck of drum, that none after such an hour should be out of their own houses, under pain of death; which begat a great and surprising consternation in most of the town, and many apprehended a massacre, for the governor and several officers were Popish. Ammunition was taken to the streets, and the whole garrison was in arms all night. When at supper, some came in, we desired them to take some meat; they insinuated they would never eat more. However, my wife and I took supper, and watched at the windows all night by turns. Then, next day, King James was proclaimed, and we were told Charles was dead. And so the fear of that was over for the time; but sad things were feared.'

Thus closed the reign of him who has been called 'the Merry Monarch.' In Scotland, where he first received his crown, men called the last years of that reign by the dark name of 'The killing times!'

As there was little hope of better times under his successor, James Nimmo, like many of his countrymen in similar circumstances, was now most anxious to escape abroad, but knew not how to get money; for though his father had been liberated from prison, he was debarred from intercourse with him by the severity of the laws. Here, however, he took encouragement from his peculiar use of a scriptural expression: 'The Lord gave me great ground of hope, yea, belief that He would make my father friendly, by bringing in that scripture with satisfaction to my soul, "He shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children" (Mal. iv. 6). And albeit it be spoken there in some respect to another, yet the Lord presented Jesus Christ so to me as more powerful than any to do so. I was made only to look to Him, and wait in the use of means. Indeed, so it came to pass, that when I sent to my father, albeit he seemed averse at first, yet at length was made willing, and did promise me some money, and I resolved, if the Lord would, to go abroad. Seeing we had now a professed Popish king, advancing that interest with all the cunning he could, and fearing the dreadful effects to follow, and Mr. Hogg being to go to London to see if there was any encouragement to go to Carolina, about the 8th April, I was resolving to go with Mr. Hogg to London, and was made to plead with and cry to the Lord for clearness, but could not get what was desired; yet, considering the thing so seemingly rational, I was in thought of going, and therefore made ready, but the Lord laid his hand upon my body that was much broken. . . . Shortly after, I did see great mercy from the Lord causing me to stay, though it was dark to me at the time, for, in a little after Mr. Hogg went, there was a great report of an invasion both to Scotland and England; and shortly after Mr. Hogg came to London, he was jaloused for a spy or trafficker for Monmouth, and the English oaths offered, and upon his refusing to take them both, he and his servant were taken to prison; which it is likely would have been my case if I had gone, which gave me cause to say, "His mercy endureth for ever!" Oh to be thankful!

'And now, by the aforesaid report of an invasion, all passages by sea and land were stopped, and so was my journey abroad at that time. . . .

'May 11th, 1685.—We got advice that Argyll was to land, or had landed in the West Highlands of Scotland, which would beget present trouble. Therefore I was advised to go out of Berwick if possible; and in taking some time apart to seek the Lord thereanent, He helped me to some earnestness with Him, and swayed my mind to leave that place, clearing me therein with that scripture with some life, "Escape for thy life" (Gen. xix. 17). . . . So I went from the town that same night, putting on all the courage I could to go through the guards, our landlord's son being with me, and so passed to Castlehill, our old quarters, and stayed there some days.

'One day, pleasantly inquiring at my spouse, whom the Lord had often made to be of one spirit and mind with me in the Lord's matters and our own, if she would let me go to Argyll; she said, "If the Lord cleared my way, why not?" which made me set some time apart, both to be concerned with that party, and to know my own duty; but got nothing but darkness.'

Soon after this he went towards Edinburgh; but staying for the night at Hartside, he was detained by news of the invasion. 'There came a daughter of the family from Edinburgh, and told me there was no winning in there, for all was in commotion and confusion, having heard that Argyll was landed with men and arms. Therefore advised me not to go, but entreated I would stay there till I advised what to do.' He was obliged to remain there 'hiddenly' for about a month, though he had been averse to it at first; for some of those he met there were 'wild in their principles.' However, 'the Lord made them both friendly and kindly; and I hope it was of the Lord, for He was kind to me in that place, and others were made to bless the Lord for my coming, saying the Lord made me useful to them, which was joy to my heart. Now before I went from this, Argyll was dispersed. And the Lord helped me to be concerned for the church and these lands at this time; for I was made to see sore and great evidences of the Lord's displeasure against us; albeit helped to fear Him, and hope in his mercy.'

Tidings reached him from his wife of the dangerous illness of his child, and this brought him back to Castlehill, near Berwick; for he could not enter the town. She joined him there, and the child recovered.

'Now we got certain advice that Argyll was prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, and so I stayed; and albeit it was a time of great confusion and trouble, yet the Lord was merciful in protecting, and now and then gave intimations of his kindness to my soul.'

Such consolation was the more needed, for soon after they heard of the failure of Monmouth's expedition, and the dispersion of his army, so that the hopes of those who aimed at the overthrow of James II.'s government were now completely crushed. Great cruelties followed the defeat of these two invasions; and seeing no hope of security for himself at home, Nimmo again turned his mind to going abroad. He went to Edinburgh on the last day of October, and having prepared the way for her, he wrote to his wife to join him. She came accordingly, with her child and servant; and having heard that Mr. Hogg had been set free, and had gone to Holland, they prepared to follow him there. 'An occasion offered for our transport by sea; but there was some fears to win fairly aboard and off. The ship was lying at Burntisland, and we went the first night to Leith, and took a passage-boat next day, some friends accompanying us. And when we came over, there was four of Argyll's captains in the house we went to that were in our own circumstances, viz. William Cleland, John Fullarton, James Bruce, and John Campbell, who were singing and making as merry as they could, that they might not be discovered. And so passing that day, the 23d of November, about eleven at night, we all went aboard. The greatest difficulty was our tender child's taking out to the cold sea air that time of night; however, blessed be God, we set sail without discovery.'

This offset must have been a moment of intense interest to them, and not less to Argyll's officers. Cleland and Fullarton had borne a distinguished part in the invasion; and it must have been hard work for them to sing and make merry at Burntisland, when they knew that, had they been discovered, their heads would soon have been fixed on the Tolbooth of Edinburgh along with that of their unfortunate chief. But a better fate awaited them; and thankful for the darkness of the long November night, they glided unseen down the Frith, passed the Bass Rock, where some of their less fortunate friends were confined, and out to the open sea.

Elizabath writes: 'We had a sweet passage, and the child was well all the time of the voyage till the last day. That morning the wind blew hard, with cold, and rain, and mist, which discouraged the seamen very sore—not so much the storms as the thick air. We could have no pilot, and the coast being dangerous, we thought to be driven back again. I was in distress, not so much for my own sickness, as for the child; his provision was near gone. But all this was but a threatening; for He wrought for us, and brought us to land that day, after we were thinking to go to sea. This He did to make us prize our mercy, that it was not all the time so.'

The voyage lasted ten days; and upon the 4th of December, after it was dark, James and Elizabeth landed safely at Rotterdam.

---

CHAPTER III.

EXILES flying for their lives are not given to indulge in description; and though Rotterdam must have presented much that was new and interesting to our Scottish wanderers, James and Elizabeth make no remarks; indeed, they were hardly, even there, out of danger. 'At our first landing things seemed very strange: the place seemed to have no security; for they were taking notice of all strangers.' There were divisions in the Scotch congregation, and Elizabeth was in great difficulty about joining them, especially as she had now a second child, James, for whom they desired baptism; but they took him to the Hague, where their friend Mr. Hogg baptized him,—'at which time was signal and observable power and presence of the Lord.'

James had formerly suffered from the fear of man; he was now in trouble from fear of want; and laments that 'the Lord, after I came to Holland, justly left me, in the first place, to the fear of straitness; and secondly, to know how sad it was to have rest from fears of men, and want intimations of the Lord's favour. . . . Then the Lord much strengthened me as to my fear of want, from Matt. vi. 25, "Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?" as also bringing several promises to my mind with strength and life.' He and his wife record various occasions on which money was brought to them as seasonably as unexpectedly, 'both for supply of our necessity, and to shame me out of unbelief.' He attempted to support his family by trading, but met with nothing but failure. 'Then I essayed somewhat else; but still all was refuges of lies. Faith and patience was to have the trial, and my weakness and the Lord's power and mercy was to be more discovered, and I made to wade in a labyrinth of difficulties, threatened with want, without sight of an outgate, and even in this place not without fear and danger from the enemy; for some were without order gripped, put aboard, sent for England, and there hanged. Some were murdered by enemies in that place where we were; some attacked by violence, with sword in hand, to be carried off; and they, defending themselves,—resisting force with force,—in wounds and blood, till the magistrates of Rotterdam took and imprisoned both till examined. Some of these attackers were in prison when the Prince of Orange came over, at the happy revolution. Sometimes there was a search procured by King James from the States; but they kindly gave some advertisement, that Scotch people might be on their guard,—as particularly, once for Sir James Stuart, who narrowly escaped by the importunity of worthy old Mrs. Hogg, in whose house he was, that he would go out, she having heard the search, which put us all in alarm, was to be that night. We had indeed some comfortable friends that were fled with us, and some that had their residence for good there, such as Mr. Russell, and Mr. Pyper's family; and it pleased the Lord to make two Dutch women kindly and beneficial, Mefrow Warbeck and her sister-in-law.'

The enforced idleness of his life of exile was very irksome to James; and he used to exercise himself by taking many a walk to and from the Hague, where Mr. Hogg lived, until that valued friend was induced, by offers of toleration at home, to return to Scotland. Elizabeth writes thus of the promised toleration, which was indeed brought about by James II. only with a view to introducing Popery into the land, by taking off the Roman Catholic disabilities:—

'Sept. 1687.—Having advice from Scotland of a toleration to the Presbyterians to preach the gospel, and that ministers were to be under such and such restrictions, one Sabbath-day, being under the sad impression of wrath hastening on that land, to wit, on Scotland, I being in prayer, I was at that—oh! what shall I say of its misery?—that passage in 2 Sam. xx. 9 was brought to my mind, where Joab said to Amasa, "Art thou in health, my brother?" and the church's case was presented to me in that posture of a designed murder against her.'

This is highly characteristic, both of the fears wrought by long oppression, and of the peculiar use of Scripture common in those days. And not less characteristic is the prayer with which she concludes her meditation: 'Lord, give faith and patience to undergo what trials may come in my way, or in the way of thine!'

She was soon to be tried in another way than by fear of persecution.

'May 1688.—We could get no house in Rotterdam, though we would have given double price. At length, after long tossing one day, my husband came in and said he would go no more to seek one. My spirit being rankled much at the providence, I went my alone, and looked up to the Lord. I got that word, "The prayer of the destitute He will in no ways refuse." My soul was comforted, my spirit calmed, and my mind contented to go into a little chamber which before I would not think on.'

She had not long to remain there, however. Her husband returned to Scotland, 'being trysted with an extraordinary storm in his voyage, and sore sea-sickness, which had almost cost his life.' And when he found that they might be in safety there, he wrote to her, leaving it to her own choice to come immediately, or not, as might seem best to her. Seeking simply to do what was right in the matter, she brought her case before the Lord, and, according to her husband's way of expressing it, 'she found clearness to venture if Providence concurred, . . . . and so she came home; and in discouragements by the way that scripture still came in her mind, "But I have all my confidence thy mercy set upon" (Ps. xiii. 5.)' On the fourth day of the voyage she landed at Borrowstounness with her faithful servant, Beatrige Wood, and her two children. About a month after her arrival she had a daughter [whom Mr. Hogg baptized], named Grizzel. We shall have occasion to become better acquainted with her, for she inherited fully the ready pen of her parents, and we may find her writings interesting.

James now writes:—'The Lord was many ways merciful to us at that time; and albeit I needed to be cautious as to my safety, yet there was not that violence of persecution, King James resolving on smooth methods for some time. I caused speak to some to see if my full liberty could be procured; but they durst not engage therein, and even some of my near relations refused to converse with me for fear of after trouble.

'But it pleased the Lord to open a wonderful door of deliverance himself, by that glorious providence of the Prince of Orange landing in England about 4th November that year, which freely loosed all our bonds as to that tyranny and oppression we had long groaned under. Let that day never be forgotten by all fearers of God, and good Protestants; for that was a day of the rejoicing of their hearts!'

He gives the following account of the state of Edinburgh during that winter:—

'Albeit all in England submitted to the prince; yet Duke Gordon, our Popish Governor of Edinburgh Castle, thought fit to hold out, which obliged the prince to bombard and cannonade the same. And we living in the Grassmarket, where we could hardly go out or in but in view of the castle, and they having killed some persons upon the street, friends were very pressing for our removing from thence. As also Captain Wallace kept out the Abbey (Holyrood) with the foot guards as long as he could, which worked the minds of severals against him, and particularly the college youths and prentices, with some others, who went down in a body to require his leaving the Abbey, which he refusing and they pressing forward, he caused fire on them some small cannon, with small shot, and killed and wounded many, which so exasperated the whole town, as well as the relations of boys killed and wounded, that the boys and others left called for assistance by beating of drums through the whole town, who next night went down, assisted by the magistrates and town guards, which obliged Captain Wallace to leave his post and flee. And the boys and youths entering, went immediately to the Abbey church, where King James had made much preparation for his idolatrous worship, and brought out all that was there, and burned and brake down the same; and then went to several other Papists' houses, and took what Popish books and trinkets they found there and burned the same also. For there was now a wonderful forwardness, and none durst oppose, for there had been fears of massacres formerly.' Thus did intolerance produce fruit after its own kind in the minds of those who had so long suffered from it.

The history of James Nimmo contains little else that can claim interest as belonging to the history of the country; but the reader may like to hear all that can be told of it. His friends, alarmed for their safety in Edinburgh, insisted on their leaving it; and they went to his father's house at Boghall, from which he had been an exile. Here he tells with pleasure that his gentle wife won the affections of that stern old father for whom he had so often prayed; so 'that in conference he was made with the tear in his eye to hear and acquiesce.' Still they were not happy there; they had gone to take refuge in that place only to please their friends, and against their own light, and they complain, 'We got not our wonted access in prayer; so that when the Lord gives light and peace, let them be tender of it that gets it, and let none be rash in advising to the contrary, or meddling to cross the light of others.'

He got an appointment under Government at Prestonpans, 'through the Lords Crawford and Cardross, who were my good friends,' and there he remained for about two years; but their stay there was saddened by much sickness, and the loss of one of their children, named Thomas, after 'blessed Mr. Hogg,'—'a verie pleasant child, anent whom his mother got some refreshing promises.'

They now took and furnished a house in Edinburgh; 'for to this time we had little or no plenishing except some feather beds'—a curious article of 'plenishing' for wanderers like them! After this he applied himself to trading, and prospered, so that he was, ere long, chosen to be one of the Town Council, and became town treasurer. Nor did he in his prosperity forget the God of his adversity; for, in 1700, we find him writing thus, and we shall give his own spelling, as a specimen of the rest of the manuscript, which will make the reader glad that it has been modernized hitherto:—'I began to have some litle competencie, and to plead with the Lord for a marcifull retreat from the throng of affaires, wherein the Lord hath hitherto helped me in all my concerns, to have ane tender regaird to the credit of the ghospell; and as I had been often desiring to bliss Him for restraining grace and preventing marcie, so also to plead for grace, wisdom, and prudence, meekness of spirit, and humbleness and lowliness of mind, and favor among those He trysted me among. And praise for ever to his blissed name, for He was not wanting to me, and I hope heard my requests; and I most say to his praise that sometimes when most throng in busines, He helped me to be in some measur fervent in spirit, in desiring to serve Him, and to eye his glorie. Blissed be his name, Hee and Hee only manadged afaires for me, and me in them, and often did let me see my own waiknes, and that He perfected his strainth therein, and often when throngest gave me most composednes of minde.'

He has again to record the loss of a child, at whose death he finds comfort in a verse brought seasonably to mind: 'The Lord made that sweet to me; this is a part of yr. first fruits to the Lord.'

His last entry in his memoirs is as follows:—'I atempted severall plans for to retire to a countrie life; but as yet could not setle, Providence one way or another still putting stops. I hope it is of the Lord, to whom I desire to look, plead for guiding, and waite for Him as I can in the use of all discovered means; for hitherto He has led and helped, and will yet help. For we kno not events; but all is known to Him.'

Extract from Elizabeth's diary:—

'August 6th, 1709.—The Lord removed to his eternal rest my precious yoke-fellow, being Saturday night, at seven o'clock. . . . He said, "My Lord seems to stand at a great distance, and as if He did not hear my prayer; but yet He heareth, for He is my God, my own God is He! These thirty-three years He has made me seek and serve Him, as my God and Father; and now though He hide his face I have no fear. I can say since my soul closed with Him by saving faith, I lay not down one night but that I saw a need of the blood of Christ to wash me from that day's particular guilt." At another time he said to a gentleman that came to visit him, "Sir James, I have been a man of many troubles; but when I look back on them all, I cannot pitch upon one that I dare this day say I wish it had not come in my way." His bodily distress was so great that he was not in case to speak much, but many times taking me by the hand, he said, "My dear, my dear" (he was pleased to say), "my sympathizing wife, the Lord in mercy put us together and He will in mercy part us, and it will not be long till you come where I am, even where Christ is."'

Extract from the diary of his daughter Grizzel Nimmo:—'In the summer of 1709 my father fell very ill of his health; and for a long time before his death I never set my eye on him but that word was brought to my mind, 2 Tim. iv. 6, "The time of my departure is at hand." . . . . Some time before his death, when any person asked him how he was, he would answer, "I am a ship at anchor; blow the wind as it will, I am safe, because I am fixed on the rock Christ; so, whether death or life, it's all one."

'He spake not much in his sickness; but all was the language of strong faith. His last words were these: "My Lord is now on his way; my Lord is coming with deliverance!" So, on the 6th of August 1709, it pleased the Lord to remove him from this weary wilderness to his eternal rest.'

'How many graves around us lie!
How many homes are in the sky!
Yes, for each saint doth God prepare
A place with care;
Thy home is waiting, brother, there!'

Readings for the Young.

CHARLIE WAINFLEET.

CHARLIE WAINFLEET was, perhaps, one of the most remarkable children I have ever known, and that's saying a good deal; for I am an old man—a very old man, some would say; and those dark locks, I used once to be so proud of, are now silvered by time. Yet I am a very happy old fellow, for I can still take pleasure in many of the enjoyments of others.

I am very fond of children, and the little people usually like me; and so by one of those mutual attractions it was that Charlie Wainfleet and myself became such firm friends.

Charlie was an odd, dreamy child, with large lustrous eyes, which sometimes glittered, and softened again, with an expression almost unearthly. The poor village folks used always to bless the lovely boy when he passed; and many a one have I heard exclaim, that he was 'too good' for this world!

My acquaintance with little Charlie began on this wise:—I was walking one day down the lane to our river, when I heard a young voice calling, 'Mary! Mary!' So I looked, and saw, at a little distance from me, a beautiful boy, of from six to eight years old. I asked him why he was calling. He told me he had come out with his nurse and little brother, and had wandered from them, to watch the water of the river ripple past. They had not noticed his absence, neither had he thought of them, till a few moments since, when he had lost his way; and after trying uselessly for some time to regain the right path, could not succeed in discovering it.

I found out where my little friend lived, and took him home. A few days after this I was out again, and met Charlie. He began to talk to me; and, in short, I soon became so fond of the child, that I asked him to come and see me. And, indeed, after his first shyness wore off, little Charlie would come very often, and spend an hour or two with me.

Things had gone on like this for a long time, when, some days having passed without any visit from Charlie, I called at his mother's house, and, on inquiry, found that the child was very ill; so I sent to Mrs. Wainfleet, to ask if I might see my little friend. Presently a scrap of paper was given me, with these words, traced in a baby hand:

'Do come to me. I am very ill, and they won't let me get up. I have such funny dreams.
'CHARLIE.'

So I went up into the child's room, and found him lying on a couch by the open window. When I entered the room, Charlie tried to raise himself, but fell back, too weak for the exertion.

His hand clasped that of his mother—a lady about twenty-four years of age, dressed in deep mourning, and wearing a widow's cap. I used to like to look at her sweet, pensive face in after days, for its loveable, gentle features; and the subdued, quiet melancholy reminded me of Charlie.

Well, when I entered the sick-room, Charlie and I chatted for some time (poor fellow! his voice had grown terribly weak since I had last heard it), his mother joining sometimes in the conversation, but very quietly and gently. She seemed fearful of too much exercising her child.

Soon she left us alone; and Charlie quite suddenly asked me, 'Do you ever think of heaven?' Now I am a cross-grained, queer old fellow, and a question of that kind takes one rather by surprise. However, I said, 'Of course, every one thinks of that sort of thing!'

So Charlie said, 'I must tell you a dream I had last night. I thought I was wandering by the river, and that it was getting dark. The sun was just going to rest, and a bright halo seemed spread over everything. I sat looking into the water, thinking of heaven, and wondering whether I should know papa when I went there.

'Suddenly there seemed to float in the air a crowd of fairy-like beings. I watched them for a long time; and then they seemed walking on a very bad and stony road. Some seemed almost faint with the long journey, and some of them fell and stumbled.

'As my eyes became still more accustomed to the sight, I saw that those who bravely tried to toil onwards, had in their hands bright golden rods, whose ends seemed to reach the sky. Round these rods was written, "Faith, Mercy, Truth, Hope, Charity, Love," and many other things. Some of the travellers dropped their rods when they had to cross a bad part of the road; and I noticed that, whenever they let go their rods, they fell and stumbled, and then some of those who had kept their staffs would come and help the fallen ones; and their rods seemed to gleam with a more glorious brightness each time they did any good deed, to help their fellow-travellers.

'In a short time they all disappeared in the distance, and I awoke; but the dream was so beautiful, so glorious, that I could not forget it.'

The child's dream I have put in my own words, as those who loved him less dearly than I did, might not understand his baby language. Surely he heard 'the clang of harp-strings, and angels from gold clouds beckoned to him like a brother!'

Another evening Charlie and I began to talk about the sun; and, after a few minutes' pause, the little fellow said, 'How happy the sun must feel at night!'

This remark rather puzzled me, but I did not say so; merely remarking, 'What makes you think so, Charlie?'

'Why, because it has done its duty all day long, and can therefore enjoy heaven more, when it goes to rest there.'

'Enjoy heaven, dear! What makes you think the sun goes back to heaven every night, my boy?'

'Because I think that God takes it back to heaven, that the joy it feels there may wash away the remembrance of all the wickedness and sin it has seen by day!'

I could not correct the boy; for the idea seemed too curious to me to be at once replied to. Indeed, I almost doubted whether I had heard aright. That this child, so innocent, so young and happy, should have worked out thoughts which would hardly have presented themselves to the imagination of us 'wiser' ones, amazed me. But I learnt many a lesson from that little fellow, that has made me, in my old age, a wiser and a happier man.

After a moment's pause, Charlie added, 'Mamma, I shall be with the sun to-night!' And, indeed, each minute seemed to find the boy weaker than the last; and, as the last ray of sunshine faded from the horizon, Charlie Wainfleet's gentle spirit floated upward to its God.—Louise M. Durrant.

PREACH TO THE CHILDREN.

'I have heard my father say, and well my father knew,
In it was meat for full-grown men, and milk for children too.'

THERE was an element in the discourses of the olden time, which the sermonizers of the present day, for the most part, wholly ignore. Those ancient men, of whom it is now so fashionable to speak slightingly, as men of iron mould and adamant heart, had in them some spring of tenderness, which kept alive an interest in the little people.

Passing by that species of pulpit eloquence which, in our day, offers hardly more than milk and water for the 'full-grown man,' how few of those sermons, which are worthy of being called food for the experienced disciple, have in them a single word for the little one! While the sheep are fed, the lambs are frisking about the meadow, or fast asleep beneath the summer sun. Do you not see them, ministers, from your high vantage-ground? Do you not detect the various expedients to which the children resort, to while away the weary hours,—the knotting of handkerchiefs; the intaglios wrought with pin-points on many a surface, better without such decoration; the restless watching of the clock; the small buffoonery of face-making; and at length—a relief to 'parents and all natural guardians'—as to the little head itself, the quiet and comfortable nap? You may say, 'Let them go to the Sabbath school—that is the place for children.' Yes; but it is not the only place, nor the best place. They should be early taught that they have a right in the temple, as well as in the porch. The little people should not be made to feel themselves a tribe apart, but should be taught their unity with the whole congregation. The lambs are as truly a portion of the flock as the fleece-laden sheep. Three minutes allotted to the children, in every sermon, surely would be little time to give them, when you reflect that the fast-flying hours and days are bringing them to be, almost before you are aware, the men and women, the fathers and mothers, of society! And were they sure that these few words were coming, their interest would be kept awake in watching for them; and so, by the way, they might pick up some seeds of truth intended for their elders, which yet should spring up in the good soil of the young heart, and grow, and bring forth fruit, to the glory of Him who loved the little children; which should add to the 'golden sheaves' you shall bear to the heavenly garner,—the tender and graceful beauty, and the delicate fragrance of the opening flower, or the just reddening bud.

Think of it, ye preachers of the word! Think of the great influence you would gain over this class of your people, by showing them that you understand and love them. Some of them will live to bless you here; many of them will be called early to Jesus. Will it not be a glad and precious greeting, when you also shall go through the gates of pearl, to hear the child-like voices singing around you, and joining in your welcome home?—to hear from the lips whence fell the command, 'Feed my lambs,' the blessed assurance, 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me?'

MY MOTHER'S HANDS.

SUCH beautiful, beautiful hands!
They're neither white nor small;
And you, I know, would scarcely think
That they were fair at all.
I've looked on hands whose form and hue
A sculptor's dream might be;
Yet are these aged, wrinkled hands,
Most beautiful to me.

Such beautiful, beautiful hands!
Though heart were weary and sad,
These patient hands kept toiling on,
That the children might be glad.
I almost weep, as, looking back
To childhood's distant day,
I think how these hands rested not,
When mine were at their play.

Such beautiful, beautiful hands!
They're growing feeble now;
For time and pain have left their mark
On hand, and heart, and brow.
Alas! alas! the nearing time,
And the sad, sad day to me,
When 'neath the daisies, out of sight,
These hands will folded be.

But oh! beyond this shadow-lamp,
Where all is bright and fair,
I know full well these dear old hands
Will palms of victory bear.
Where crystal streams, through endless years,
Flow over golden sands,
And where the old grow young again,
I'll clasp my mother's hands!

—Ellen Gates (American).

Miscellaneous.

'I Rise to seek the Light.'

I saw a little blade of grass,
Just peeping from the sod,
And asked it why it sought to pass
Beyond its parent clod?
It seemed to raise its timid head,
All sparkling, fresh, and bright,
And wondering at the question, said,
'I rise to seek the Light.'

I asked the eagle why his wing
To upward flight was given,
As if he spurned each earthly thing,
And knew no home but heaven?
He answered, as he fixed his gaze,
Undazzled at the sight,
Upon the sun's meridian blaze,
'I rise to seek the Light.'

I asked my soul, what means this thirst
For something yet beyond?
What means this eagerness to burst
From every earthly bond?
It answers (and I feel the glow
With fires more warm, more bright),
'All is too dull, too dark below;
I rise to seek the Light.' —Anon.

Fashionable Amusements.—The late Dr. Alexander gave some very pertinent reflections on the tendency of our age, and of human nature generally, to cross the border line which separates the world from the church, and engage in fashionable amusements. He says, 'The growing laxity of the age gives peculiar meaning to the exhortation, "Be not conformed to this world." The rule of most is corrupt and dangerous; it is to do as others do. The consequence is, mutual injury and perpetual declension in the church. You will find professors who, as they increase in wealth, constantly enlarge their licence. It requires a keen eye to discriminate between their pleasures and expenditures, and those of the ungodly. If they abstain from the theatre, they go freely to the opera; or, if they scruple at this, they linger at the midnight ball. The step is so easily taken, from apparently innocent dancing to that which is free, indiscreet, amorous, and licentious, that a tender conscience will find it safest to reject all. Apply, if you can, to such assemblages, however elegant and however common, the divine maxim, "Love not the world." That young communicant is near his fall, who is often asking how near he may go to the brink of sin, and yet be safe. Observe the families which have made this passage from ancient strictness to fashionable Christianity, and you will find their children, one by one, sliding away to looser forms of religion, if not to utter carelessness. The same principles apply to expenditures in dress, furniture, equipage, and luxurious living.'

Henry Tanner.—In the year 1748, George Whitefield had resolved to go to America, and had engaged his passage in a ship that was to sail from Portsmouth; but, as the captain afterwards refused to take him, 'for fear of his spoiling the sailors,' he was obliged to go to Plymouth. While staying there, he frequently preached; and an attempt having recently been made to murder him in his bed, much attention was excited, and many thousands flocked to hear him. While he was one day preaching, Mr. Tanner, who was at work as a shipbuilder at a distance, heard his voice, and resolved, with five or six of his companions, to go and drive him from the place where he stood, and for this purpose filled their pockets with stones. When, however, Mr. Tanner drew near, and heard Whitefield earnestly inviting sinners to Christ, he was filled with astonishment, his resolution failed him, and he went home with his mind deeply impressed. On the following evening he again attended, and heard Mr. Whitefield on the sin of those who crucified the Redeemer. After he had expatiated on their guilt, he appeared to look intently on Mr. Tanner, as he exclaimed with energy, 'Thou art the man!' These words powerfully affected Mr. Tanner; he felt his iniquities to be awfully great; he cried, 'God be merciful to me, a sinner!' and he was heard.

It is Well with the Child.—Bishop Leighton thus wrote to his sister's husband, on the death of a beloved child: 'I am glad of your health, and of the recovery of your little ones; but, indeed, it was a sharp stroke of a pen that told me your little Johnny was dead; and I felt it truly more than, to my remembrance, I did the death of any child in my lifetime. Sweet thing! and is he so quickly laid asleep? Happy he! Though we shall no more have the pleasure of his lisping and laughing, he shall have no more the pain of crying, nor of being sick, nor of dying; and hath wholly escaped the trouble of schooling, and all the sufferings of boys, and the riper and deeper griefs of upper years,—this poor life being all along nothing but a linked chain of many sorrows and of many deaths. Tell my dear sister she is now so much more akin to the other world, and this will be quickly passed to us all. John is but gone an hour or two sooner to bed, as children use to do, and we are undressing to follow. And the more we put off the love of the present world, and all things superfluous beforehand, we shall have the less to do when we lie down.'

Ritualism.—What is Ritualism but religious worldliness? It is not so much the church going into the world, as the world going into the church. By means of it men enjoy the world under a religious name and aspect. These ecclesiastical theatres,—these religious operas and operettas, the ritualistic churches,—are essentially worldly and sensuous. They are set up to gratify 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life.'

Amateur Concerts.—Under such titles as 'Amateur Concerts,' 'High-class Music,' advertisements now appear of oratorios or operas in churches. They are conducted partly by professional singers, and partly by amateur performers, ladies and gentlemen. They are begun and ended with prayer, and their proceeds are for religious purposes! Surely this is not worship; it is not praise.

The King of Terrors.—He who fears not death, will start at no shadows.—Greek.

How to do Good.—The best way to do good to ourselves, is to do it to others; the right way to gather, is to scatter.—Anon.

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

REV. XIX. 10.

JOHN was overpowered with the glory. It was but the glory of an angel, and the words were the words of an angel; but the glory and the words were those of one who had come from the presence of God. Perhaps he was like Peter on the mount; he wist not what he did and said. He forgets, for a moment, that it is written, 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God;' and he falls down at his feet to worship him. 'Stop!' cries the angel, 'don't worship me.' And if the holy men and women, to whom the idolatry of the Church of Rome is paid, could speak, they would say the same,—shrinking back horrified at the robbery of being made equal with God! But it is to the answer of the angel, and his declaration concerning himself, that I ask your attention.

'Who am I, that you should worship me? Am I God? No, I am thy fellow-servant; and shall the servants worship each other, and forget the Master? Nay; I am the fellow-servant of thy brethren, that keep the sayings of this book (Rev. xxii. 9). Nay, I am the fellow-servant of the prophets of old (i.e. the same angel who ministered to them). Nay, I am the fellow-servant of all who "hold the testimony of Jesus;" for "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy."'

Thus, then, we have a proclamation made to us as to the oneness of the whole Bible.

I. The oneness of the Testifier.—He is the one God. The sender of the testimony is the one Jehovah; the subject of the testimony is the one Jesus; the inspirer is the one Spirit. Through many lips He has spoken, by many pens He has written; but it is the mind, the will, the purpose, the revelation of the One God that is here.

II. The oneness of the messenger.—It is intimated here that it was one angel alone that was employed to communicate the testimony. He was sent to patriarchs and prophets of old, to apostles and brethren in later times. The instrument, or medium of communication, was a created being—an angel; but it was the same throughout.

III. The oneness of the testimony.—It is not many testimonies, but one; it is the word (not words) of God. It was given at sundry times and diverse manners; in fragments and portions, great and small; by many lips and pens; spread out over more than 4000 years (for it began in Paradise, and ended in Patmos); yet there is unity throughout, not discord or contradiction; marvellous unity, which can only be accounted for on the fact that there was in reality but one writer,—He to whom 'one day is as a thousand years;' and therefore the truths enunciated are the offspring of one mind, the thoughts of one heart. This testimony bore all upon one point, one person, one work, one kingdom. It was the testimony of Jesus—that is, it testified of Him from first to last; for Christ is the all and in all of prophecy, the all and in all of the Bible.

But let us consider the oneness of this testimony more in detail.

(1.) Its oneness as to the character of God.—His is one name throughout—Jehovah. He is the Holy One; righteous, good, true, hating the sin, loving the sinner. He is 'King eternal, immortal, and invisible;' infinite in all things; 'without variableness or shadow of turning.' It is the same good and gracious God that you meet with at man's creation, that you meet at the close of time; it is the same holy God that you find driving Adam out of Paradise, and bringing the deluge over the earth, that you find pouring out his vials on earth, and preparing his judgment for the sons of men.

(2.) Its oneness as to the character of man.—He was made upright, but he sought out many inventions. And since sin came in, we see him uniform in evil: a dark understanding, a rebellious will, a stony heart; full of sin; thinking evil, speaking evil, acting evil. God's testimony to man, throughout the Bible, is the same. Patriarch, and prophet, and apostle tell us the same thing about the evil of man, and the exceeding sinfulness of sin. It nowhere hides the sins of the good, nor does it exaggerate the crimes of the evil. It bears one unvarying and undeviating testimony to man and man's heart: 'Deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.'

(3.) Its oneness as to the way of salvation.—That salvation is described in many aspects, under many figures and types; yet it is but one salvation—one way to life for the sinner—God's free love, the great sacrifice, the sinner's faith. 'The just shall live by faith.' Salvation, free, complete, present, everlasting,—this is the announcement of Scripture from first to last.

(4.) Its oneness as to the Saviour.—He is the Seed of the woman, the Son of Abraham, the Seed of David, the Child of Mary. He is the Man with the bruised heel; finite, yet infinite; created, yet uncreated; dead, yet living for ever. Through his death life comes to us, through his blood cleansing comes. He is Jesus the Saviour, able to save to the uttermost; Messiah, the Sin-bearer, the Lamb of God. Every book of the Bible bears on this with marvellous concord.

(5.) Its oneness as to the church's hope.—It is resurrection, glory, a kingdom, and all connected with Messiah. 'Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints!' was Enoch's utterance at the beginning; and 'Behold, He cometh with clouds!' is John's at the close. One unvarying testimony to our eternal future.

(6.) Its oneness as to the sinner's doom.—Death! wrath! woe! a fearful judgment, and an endless hell! Throughout it is the same. It begins with, 'Thou shalt DIE!' it ends with, 'They were cast into the lake of fire, which is the second DEATH!'

OUR HIGH PRIEST.

BY THE REV. J. J. BONAR, GREENOCK.

(Continued from p. 590.)

THE other petition of our text is an appeal to the Holy Ghost, and an appeal for assurance,—running thus: 'Jehovah lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace.'

With the Holy Ghost are the treasures of wisdom, the gifts of faith, the endowments of holiness, the joys of grace. When He touches the heart, the rock melts. When He anoints the eye, the sight returns. When He breathes, all is life. Accordingly, having appealed to the Father, whose decree appoints, and to the Son, whose blood procures, the Representative of Israel now makes suit to the Spirit, whose grace applies salvation. And the request is, that the Holy Ghost would so bring home the work of redemption to the reconciled man, that the issue may be 'peace,' even assurance for ever!

'Lift up thy countenance,' it is likewise pleaded. And this is more than 'make thy face to shine;' for it implies, over and above everything else, consciousness and perpetuity. It is even asking that the sun should never withdraw his rays, and that the soul should always feel his warmth. 'Lift up his countenance, and give thee peace!' No peace, beloved, but what is 'given;' no peace but from God! 'Jehovah give thee peace!' But what peace? what peace? The peace of forgiveness, the peace of hope, the peace of God! What peace? Peace flowing from the cross, and which enters the heart, when it is washed in the blood of atonement! What peace? Peace such as Jesus bequeathed to his own, ere He left the world, and such as himself enjoys! What peace? Peace that the wicked never know—even peace with God! Peace that angels cannot know—even peace after the terrors of guilt! What peace? Peace that amounts to assurance; peace that cleanses, invigorates, and gladdens; peace that 'keeps the heart,' and 'passeth all understanding!'

Such is the threefold prayer of our text. This is the benediction of our High Priest, when in our name, and for our sakes,—as embodying and representing his elect,—He waves his glowing censer before the throne. And is this not 'gracious?'

Yes, gracious, most gracious. For what were we, that the whole Godhead should be moved for us—us, so indigent and abject? Yet Jesus would not be satisfied till He had taken all the perfection of God, and caused it to overshadow the poverty of man. How gracious! but not less authoritative. Not as a plaintiff, nor even as an advocate, does Jesus 'bless.' He 'blesses' as one who can say, 'I and the Father are one.' He 'blesses' as one who has laid down the price of all that He asks for. He 'blesses' as one having 'all power,' and whose arm shall accomplish what his heart desires. Yes, the benediction of our text is as much a pledge from Christ as an appeal to the Father, and is meant infallibly to convey what it so loudly claims.

III. Let us next inquire as to the individuals whom the Intercessor embraces in his prayer.

It is not on all the world the blessings of Jesus descend, but the seed of 'Israel.' Nor is it even all Israel who will share the benefit; for the people around Aaron were to say 'Amen,' and with their own hand take what was presented. Here, therefore, is both choice on the part of God, as indicated by the limitation to 'Israel;' and acceptance on the part of man, as involved in 'the Amen' which was given.

Mistake not, then, brethren, your real condition, and lose eternal life. As offered the blessings of salvation, without restriction or desert, ye may all claim the appellation and standing of 'Israel.' Yes, brethren, over the heads of all Jesus lifts up his hands, and is ready to command his benediction to rest upon the most obdurate, and undeserving, and guilty.

Mark, however, that though Jesus offers all this to each of you, He will compel no one to receive it. He does put it within your reach; but now the question is, Are you ready with your 'Amen?' Are you wishful to obtain what is held out? Has salvation any charm for you? Are you as anxious for eternal life as Jesus is willing to give it? When the High Priest exhibits all his blessings, will you re-echo his invitation? Is your 'Amen' sent up to the throne, along with the Days-man's prayer?

Brethren, if it be not so, then are ye determined to run an unblest, an unhallowed course; and not a hope gleams upon you from the future. But if, even now, you will bow the head, and accept the mercy of Jesus, yours, even to-day, will be every gift, and joy, and privilege, and blessing, which the divine fulness contains.

Yea, and to you who have been already blessed of Jesus, there are offered new and richer blessings. O house of Israel, man needs the whole Godhead! But the whole Godhead is yours. Reconciliation through the Son is needed; and that is yours. Joy in the Holy Ghost is needed; and that is yours. Shelter beneath the Father's wing is needed; and that is yours. Oh! you need much; but all that is needed is yours.

Yours, I say; but rather should I say thine; for, mark how sweetly personal is the style of our benediction. It is not, 'keep you;' it is not, be gracious unto you; it is not, give you peace. But it is, give 'thee' peace; keep 'thee;' be gracious unto 'thee.' The eye of Jesus descries each believer, as if there were none beside, and his lips pronounce their very name. His hand rests, with all its efficacy to bless, upon their individual head; and He never mistakes Manasseh for Ephraim. Oh, what tenderness there is in this, on the part of Jesus! And to every believing soul what comfort should it impart! Apt are we to think that what is meant for all, is not designed for us. But Jesus would wish us to understand that He views us all apart—as Jacob did his sons; and that, as with the blessings of the patriarch, the blessings of his purchase also are not vaguely for the family at large, but distinctly for each member in particular.

Oh, then, believer, claim thy share in the High Priest's benediction; and be confident that, whatever other name is on our Aaron's breastplate, thine, at least, is engraven there. It is important to know that God encompasses all Israel. But it is abounding consolation to feel that God is acquainted with my individual case; and that God will provide for my peculiar wants; and that God will have respect to my special temptations; and that at every step of my way, under every burden of my cares, amid every tumult of my fears, He will keep his arm around me,—as if even this most destitute, infirm, troubled, weary me were the only spirit in his universe to be cared for! Hear, then, O man of God, every promise as spoken to thee! Embrace every joy, as sent to thee; welcome every blessing, as designed for thee; and thou wilt be at once a happier, and stronger, and holier believer.

IV. We have but to notice, in the last place, the success of our interceding High Priest.

Pointing to the great oblation, Jesus has implored, for the sake of it, all the fulness of redemption in behalf of his chosen. But scarce has the Mediator cried 'Bless,' when a voice is heard saying, at ver. 27, 'I will bless them!' It is 'the Amen' of Him who sits upon the throne —'Father,' Son, and Holy Ghost—sealing the request of Him who pleaded in our name. And very full is this response of the Triune Godhead.

It indicates unqualified assent to all that has been asked. For, answers the Godhead to our Advocate, 'I will bless them,' and they shall want nothing that my love can bestow. But there is also fixed determination in this response; and it declares that nothing will turn aside the Godhead from its purpose. 'I will bless!' There is, besides, an accent of eagerness in the response; for scarce has the voice of Jesus ceased to cry 'Bless,' when the voice of the Trinity is heard replying, 'I will.' Then notice, lastly, that it is 'Jehovah himself' who makes known the answer. It is not to be left to the course of events; it shall not be entrusted to the arm of man; it shall not be confided to angels; but 'I' shall arise, says Jehovah, and by my own zeal bring help to Israel.

Had the response gone no further than this, it would have been wonderfully 'gracious.' But it is added, 'And they shall put my name upon the sons of Israel.' For Jehovah will not be satisfied until the believer, as the child of adoption, is proclaimed heir of God. To lose my own name, and receive that of another, implies a change in all my relations and all my prospects. I am henceforth unknown as to what I once was, and am only recognised according to the rank of him who has either made me his bride, or adopted me as his child. In like manner, when 'the name of God' is put on the believer, all is forgotten that relates to his lineage, and poverty, and meanness, until the very angels wonder at him as the adopted son, nay, the chosen spouse of Jehovah. His previous rank as a sinner is no more spoken of; but he is loved and ministered to, as one whom 'the King delighteth to honour.'

The promise, you thus perceive, abounds over the petition. All that was asked is vouchsafed, but more by far. Honour is added to mercy; blessing is crowned with dignity. And the believer can feel sure that every gift with which the hands of Jesus are filled, must be his!

Ye have been for a moment within the veil, and seen the High Priest before the throne. The sin-offering has been slain, the blood has been sprinkled, and yonder is our Aaron lifting up his hands towards the people, waiting to bless. He is exalted to bless, and He is pledged to bless, and He longs to bless. His hands are full of 'ascension-gifts;' He holds them up, so as to be seen of all; He stretches them over the walls of heaven, in his loving desire to bestow what we need. Let the thought, then, of a prevailing Advocate, and a propitious Godhead, be ever impressed upon your heart; and remember alike your privileges, your responsibility, and your hope.

Remember your privileges. God's people need all that God can bestow, to support them as they journey to their rest. They have no strength of their own, no joy in themselves. They must have Almightiness to sustain them, else they fall. They must have unerring Wisdom to guide them, else they miss their way. They must have boundless Love to gladden them, else they will be always sad. Ah! not one spiritual excellence can be ours, nor one spiritual feature; we cannot have spiritual thirst, nor spiritual satisfaction; we can have no spiritual tenderness, and no spiritual vigour, unless all is given us of God, through the mediation of our High Priest.

But lo! God is ready to 'bless;' and if we only commit ourselves to Him, we shall have all things. Art thou poor? art thou tempted? art thou sad? art thou anxious? art thou weary? Well, but be thy forebodings or thy trials what they may, place thyself under the uplifted hands of Jesus, and the voice of the Triune Godhead to thee is this, 'I will bless!'

What a Promiser! Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, mutually pledged to one another, and all pledged to us! What a promise! You are in a world of snares; but there is safe-keeping in the promise. Your sins are ever accusing you; but there is atonement in the promise. You toil along a wilderness; but there is comfort in the promise. You often deplore the shades of unbelief falling on your soul; but there is light in the promise. You are forgotten and despised; but there is glory in the promise. Saints of the Most High, we are travelling to our kingdom, under escort of the Godhead. And what more do we need, even 'in this cloudy and dark day?'

But there is the same mercy for unconverted ones. At this moment ye are without fruit, and without water—dissatisfied and unprofitable. For what has a soul to live on, that has not God to feed it? But grace is grace still; free as the air you breathe, and seeking entrance by every avenue. Only know that 'by faith we are justified,' and, putting the work of Jesus in room of your own works, ye shall be reconciled to God. Only believe what God tells us of Christ, and you are saved. You are under the uplifted hands of Jesus—the hands once nailed to the cross, but now filled with gifts. Only believe what the Spirit testifies of Jesus, and every blessing shall be yours. The everlasting righteousness is yours, and the irrevocable pardon is yours. Access to God at all times is yours, and the witness of the Holy Ghost. Assurance is yours; peace is yours; holy freedom is yours; and the likeness of God is yours. Only believe in the Son of God, and all the earnests of heaven are yours; all the foretastes of bliss are yours; and in a little—a very little while—the inheritance of the kingdom is yours!

But remember your responsibility, beloved of God. Ye are debtors to that God who has put his own name upon you; and He bids you walk as the sons and daughters of a King. Not less are ye debtors to all around; and even as Jesus has blessed you, He expects that you seek to bless others. Oh then, brethren of the cross, be resolved that God shall be glorified, and men blessed in you. Every sinner is a curse. But be ye a fountain of blessing. Be your holy example a blessing; be your many prayers a blessing; be your constant faith a blessing; be your meek and quiet tenderness a blessing. Be a blessing in the house; and be a blessing in every place; and be a blessing all the day long. To bless was the work of Christ on earth; to bless is his work in heaven. And for what else are you and I in the world, redeemed and new-born, but to bless it?

Remember, lastly, your hope. Jesus is still a Priest; but not the humbled, toiling, painful Levite whom we saw, in sweat and wounds, in the outer court. 'He is a Priest upon his throne,' and reigns in heaven to 'bless.' It was not, however, till Aaron came out from the holiest, arrayed in his garments of beauty, that he caused the people 'to shout for joy' (Lev. ix. 22–24) in the abundance of his blessings. Once more, therefore, Jesus shall appear from behind the veil, and lift up his hands over this desolate world, to bless it, amid the hallelujahs of earth and heaven, with the blessing which no curse shall ever impair.

Friends of the Bridegroom, cherish this hope. Soon shall that blue firmament be riven like the temple-veil, and Jesus comes forth! No thorns are on his brow; no reed is in his hand; no cast-off robes of faded purple hang from his shoulders; but He wears the diadem of 'many crowns;' and as Heir of earth, sets up his throne amid the very scenes where once He was put to shame!

Unbelieving man! what an hour shall this be to you! Jesus come; but with no cross—only a sword! Jesus come; but for overthrow and vengeance—no longer for mercy! Man! man! found in thy guilt when Jesus comes, thou shalt see, and turn pale, and wonder, and perish!

But, to the righteous, oh what a hope lies in the assurance, Jesus comes! He comes with blessing; and we shall be blessed with all that our souls can enjoy. He comes in glory; and we shall share his glory. He comes as a royal Priest—the true Melchisedec; and we shall be 'kings and priests' in his everlasting kingdom.

Sunny Thoughts for Clouded Hours.

BY ZAIDA.

No. XII.

OLD AGE.

THERE are some trials in which we long for sympathy, and of which we can speak freely to those around us, and in doing so find help and comfort. But there is one trial whose approach is sorely dreaded; a trial which, when it does come, is keenly felt, and yet one which is rarely spoken of by those suffering from it; and for which, were sympathy given uninvited, it would be deemed by many a personal affront or unkindness—I mean the trial of old age.

And is it not somewhat strange, that although almost every one wishes to live to be old, yet that, as passing years warn them that old age cannot be very far distant, they put the subject away as quickly as possible, and try to forget the disagreeable fact?

Some are morbidly sensitive to its approach; while, to others, the fact that they are old, really old, steals upon them with almost startling suddenness. You, for instance, you who are reading these pages, were for years, it may be, wondering why the lamp gave so much less good light than it used to do. Then books were printed in so much clearer a type, and people spoke so much more distinctly; and it must be the weather that makes you feel so much more tired after your day's work than you were formerly.

But one evening, as you are resting in your arm-chair, the truth flashes upon you, with an overwhelming conviction that it is the truth: you are growing old; nay, you are old. The infirmities of age are creeping fast upon you, and they will increase. It is not the lamp, or the indistinct print, or the weather—it is yourself. And there is no help for it. Doctors can do nothing for you; their prescriptions would be useless. All the skill of man could not prevent your being older to-day than you were yesterday, and to-morrow than you are to-day.

And this, you think sadly, this is the old age to which every one wishes to attain! This is the goal which we pity people for not reaching! This is the 'fine old age' which people think so much about when they are young! Ah! if they knew what it really was, and what it must inevitably bring with it, would they so ardently desire a long life for themselves or others?

But there is a point in trouble, beyond or beneath which the kindest friend is most kind when he does not venture to penetrate. And there may be a loneliness in your heart at this moment, which you would shrink from having unveiled, even to those who love you best.

Be it so. But though 'the heart knoweth its own bitterness' (Prov. xiv. 10), there is One besides who knows it also, even Him who 'knoweth your frame, and remembereth that you are dust' (Ps. ciii. 14). He who said to Moses of his persecuted people, 'I know their sorrows' (Ex. iii. 3), knows yours. There is not a shrinking fear of the future, nor an undefined dread of what that future may bring you to, but it is known to Him, who, though 'He telleth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names,' yet 'healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds' (Ps. cxlvii. 3, 4).

And has He not provided any comfort for you, under the circumstances which drew from the sweet Psalmist of Israel the plaintive cry, 'Leave me not in the time of old age: forsake me not when my strength faileth?' (Ps. lxxi. 9.) He has indeed. For, not content with the general assurance, 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee' (Heb. xiii. 5), He has added the especial promise, so touchingly adapted to your need: 'Even to old age I am He, and to hoar hairs will I carry you' (Isa. xlvi. 4). Oh! is there not inexpressible tenderness in the thought? Our God will do for his aged ones just what He does to his lambs: 'He shall gather them with his arm, and carry them in his bosom' (Isa. xl. 11). Blessed resting-place! Do not the words irresistibly remind us of that other promise: 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you?' (Isa. lxvi. 13.)

Do not, then, think so sadly of the trial of old age. He who has watched over you all your life through, will not fail you now. The eye of sense may indeed grow dim, but with the eye of faith you can look beyond the clouds, and 'see the King in his beauty, and behold the land that is very far off' (Isa. xxxiii. 17). And though the loving voices of those who tenderly minister to your wants, may sometimes fall unheeded on your deafened ear, and failing memory may seek in vain to recall the past, the still small voice of your Saviour shall cheer your lonely hours, and the Holy Ghost, the Comforter—He who delights in taking of the things of Jesus, and showing them to his people,—shall bring to your remembrance one precious promise after another, on which your weary heart may rest.

And more than this: He whose 'strength is made perfect in weakness' (2 Cor. xii. 9), and who can enable his people to 'glory even in tribulation' (Rom. v. 3), shall fill your heart with such full and blessed 'joy and peace in believing' (Rom. xv. 13), that you shall experience the truth of the poet's words, and thankfully exclaim:

'Nor does dull age, as worldlings say,
The heavenward flame annoy;
The Saviour cannot pass away,
And with Him lives our joy.

Ever the richest, tenderest glow,
Sets round the autumnal sun;
But there sight fails; no heart may know
The bliss when life is done.'

CONTINUAL GUIDANCE.

You tell me that you are sorely tried just now; that you are almost blind as to the future, and that the little you can see looks steep and rugged; that you have asked God to make your way plain, but that He has not done so; and that you are weary, and anxious, and perplexed.

Trying indeed I can well believe such a position to be, and yet not wholly trying; for, are you not exactly in the very circumstances in which you may venture to claim the fulfilment of that precious promise, which, as I think of you, seems so peculiarly suited to your case, that I almost feel as if I had never before really entered into, or understood its fulness and its beauty: 'I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them?' (Isa. xlii. 16.)

You are blind indeed, and not only blind, but the path that lies before you is new and untrodden. Humanly speaking, your past life was so different from that which now seems to lie before you, that neither experience nor habit can lessen your difficulties. Even a blind person can find his way tolerably well about the house in which he has long lived; but place him in one unknown and unfamiliar, and there would be not only difficulty but danger in allowing him to wander about alone. But consider your position at its worst—that you are not only blind, but are placed in an unknown path, is there not comfort, comfort deep and full, in the promise I have quoted, 'I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known?' Many a traveller has been lost amid the mountain passes of Switzerland from the negligence or ignorance of their guide; but they who follow the guidance of the Lord Jesus shall never perish. The path so new to you has all been trodden by Him: well He knows its dangers and his difficulties; well He knows your weakness and your weariness. Very gently and tenderly will He lead you along; often will He refresh you with a draught of the pure river of the water of life; and when the road is too steep or too rough for you to walk in, 'He will gather you with his arms, and carry you in his bosom' (Isa. xl. 11). When, therefore, He whispers, 'I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known,' will you not fearlessly entrust yourself to his guidance, saying—

'Forth into the darkness passing,
Nothing can I hear or see,
Save the hand outstretched to guide me,
And the voice that calls to me,
"I will bring the blind by pathways
That they knew not, nor have known;"
'Tis a way untried, untrodden,
But I shall not walk alone.

He who leads me knows the pathway,
Every step himself has planned,
Sees the end from the beginning.
Let me only see his hand,
I will walk into the darkness,
Shrink not, but with patience wait:
"Darkness shall be light before them.
And the crooked shall be straight?"'

Yes, not only will He guide you safely by a way you have not known, but as you follow Him and say, 'O Lord, I cannot see, vouchsafe me light,' He will answer by 'making darkness light before you, and crooked things straight.' If you follow Him closely, you shall find ere long that your perplexities have vanished, and difficulties, that seemed impossibilities, have been removed.

But though this were much, yet your loving heart feels that it would not be enough if, after having been led safely and tenderly over a rough and thorny path, your guide was to leave you. 'I am always glad,' said little Mabel, 'when we come to a steep hill, for then papa takes me up in his arms and carries me.' But, oh! none but those who have experienced it can tell the rest, and peace, and joy, that it is to have the Lord Jesus for a Guide; only they can tell how really He holds their hand, or carries them in the everlasting arms; only they can say that they would rather be led by Him along a rough path, than go alone along a smooth one. But do not fear. Little Mabel's father had often to leave her, deep and true as was his love, and great as was his joy in being with her; but in tender consideration to your heart's instinctive fear of losing Him, your Guide adds, 'These things will I do unto them,'—in addition to, or beside all this —'and not forsake them.' Oh no, in joy as in sorrow, in sunshine as in shade, you need a guide, and you shall have one, for elsewhere it is written, 'The Lord shall guide thee continually' (Isa. lviii. 11). Moment by moment your heart is saying, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do? where wilt Thou have me to go?' and, moment by moment, you are receiving an answer, sometimes by a glance of his eye (Ps. xxxii. 8); sometimes by the voice of his Spirit, saying, 'This is the way, walk ye in it' (Isa. xxx. 21); or yet again, by the mark of his footprints, for 'He has left us an example, that we should follow his steps' (1 Pet. ii. 21).

Would you, then, even if you could, have all your future so clearly and plainly marked out, that you would not need to have your Saviour as your Guide? Oh no, you would not like to walk alone, even if you could do so with safety; you would not like to have no need of prayer, no need to ask for counsel or advice from Him who is the Mighty Counsellor, and 'in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge' (Col. ii. 3). Rather you rejoice in the necessity that keeps the Lord Jesus ever beside you; you are glad to think that you perpetually require his help; for surely, if in his actual presence alone there is fulness of joy, our present measure of it must be exactly in proportion as we are enabled to realize that presence by faith. And He must be very near, and always near, in order to guide us continually, as He has so graciously promised to do. However dimly, then, you may see your way, or however beset with dangers and difficulties that way may be, will you not say with simple, childlike confidence and trust—

'Lead the way, Lord, where Thou pleasest,
Only keep me close to Thee,
Craving not to see the distant,
Well content that Thou dost see.
Have I not my all committed
To thy keeping long ago?
Knowing Him whom I have trusted,
More I do not seek to know.

Teach me still the priceless lesson:
"Walk by faith and not by sight;"
Give a childlike heart to trust Thee,
Waiting for the perfect light.
Every step in all the journey
Shall reveal thy care and love,
When with opened eyes I trace it
From the radiant heights above?'

'UNABLE TO DO ANYTHING.'

I cannot help thinking that you have made a serious and a sad mistake in supposing that, because you are laid aside by illness from the ordinary routine of duty and business, you are therefore, as you express it, 'unable to do anything for either God or man.'

It is true that we value a machine in proportion to the quantity of work which it accomplishes; but we do not love it, we are not grateful to it; it is a mere matter of business, that does not in any way touch our hearts; and the only thing we think of in reference to it is, how to get the greatest amount of work done, with the least possible trouble and expense.

But men and women are not machines, and I think we could hardly say anything more painful of any one, than that he did his work like a machine, and did not put his heart to it. However well he might do his work, you would hardly like to have him as your servant; you would rather have a person who did less work, but who did his best, who was continually thinking of how you would like it to be done; in fact, who did it, as the apostle says, 'heartily' (Col. iii. 23).

And you, I think, you can do a great deal for others, though not perhaps in the way you imagine. You cannot, indeed, bear another's burden by carrying it in your feeble hands; but are not the heaviest, the most crushing burdens, those that you may bear by carrying them in your heart, and lightening them by true and tender sympathy? You may not be able to prevent a friend suffering a grievous sorrow; but is it nothing to cheer him under it with words of love and hope? You may not be able to perform many acts of kindness for others; but may you not gladden those who perform them for you, by grateful thanks and keen appreciation? You may be wholly unable to visit the poor or the sick; but surely you may be amongst the 'blessed' ones who 'consider' them (Ps. xli. 1), while others can carry out the plans formed as the result of your considerations. Yes, there is a sense, a blessed sense, in which idleness and uselessness are as little appointed by God for his suffering people here, as in that 'happy land,' where they shall 'serve Him night and day in his temple' (Rev. vii. 15).

When Charlie Wellwood was quite a baby, he lost the use both of his hands and feet in a severe illness; he was in consequence utterly helpless, and continued to be so all his life. He could not dress himself, or feed himself, or even turn in bed without assistance. 'What a dreadful burden to his poor mother!' people used to say. But his mother did not think so. She had three sons and one daughter younger than Charlie; but he was her favourite amongst them all. Night and day she was never weary of attending him; and even after her husband's death, which took place when Charlie was about ten years old, and made a great change in her circumstances, she seemed only to cling to him the more.

No matter how worried she was, or how troubled, a few minutes with her helpless boy seemed to rest and cheer her in a way that nothing else did. He could never do anything for her, in one sense, not even run a message, and yet she used to say that he was such a help and comfort to her, that she did not know what she would do without him. The secret of it was that he loved her intensely; and this love made him wonderfully quick, helpless though he was himself, in helping her.

He had a tiny little room of his own, with a cheerful window, and there he used to lie all the day long on his bed, except occasionally, when he used to be well enough to be dressed, and put in an arm-chair for a few hours. He was marvellously patient, or rather, far more than patient, for he had indeed been 'strengthened with all might, according to his (God's) glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness' (Col. i. 11); so that his mother used to call him her lesson-book, and say that, whenever she was inclined to fret and murmur about anything, the thought of Charlie's patience would make her ashamed, he had so much more to bear than she had.

With the other children his influence was unbounded. The thought that it would grieve 'poor sick Charlie,' stopped many a quarrel, and made the little hands raised in anger fall again without the intended blow having been given. Every childish sorrow was confided to him; every plan for the future laid before him for advice. Even his mother hardly knew how much trouble she was saved, and how many quiet hours she enjoyed, through Charlie's power of amusing the children. His stories seemed inexhaustible; and he had a great gift of planning pleasures for others; while his gratitude for any little kindness shown to himself was most touching. And then he was so full of sympathy. He could be sorry for everything that made others sad; from the broken toy, or the cut finger of one of the children, to his mother's serious anxiety as to how she could best educate her boys. Nor was it only with sorrow that he could sympathize. He could 'rejoice with them that did rejoice,' as heartily as he could 'weep with them that weep' (Rom. xii. 15). Who was half so glad as Charlie if the day fixed for a holiday to be spent in the woods, or by the sea-side, was fine? Who rejoiced so much when one of his brothers gained the prize at school, or was considered the best hand at cricket in the whole neighbourhood? As he grew older he seemed wise beyond his years; so that Mrs. Wellwood used to say, that God had given him to her to take the place of the husband she had lost, while his brothers and sisters loved him with the most devoted affection.

His patience and cheerfulness were rewarded by the kindness and thoughtfulness of every one in the house. Even the strong, hardy boys, who hardly knew what it was to be sick, even for a day, would lower their voices, and go softly down stairs, not to disturb 'poor Charlie' if he had a bad headache. Eagerly were the first spring flowers watched for, that they might adorn Charlie's table; and the first ripe fruit was a treasure far too great for any one but him. In sorrow and in joy his room was the place where, as a matter of course, they all went to tell their tale. While his very helplessness, added to his power of identifying himself so thoroughly with all that concerned them, made them listen to advice or warning from him, that they would have scoffed at from any one else; and by being the confidant of all their school adventures, he saved them from many a trouble, and their mother from much anxiety and sorrow.

Thus things went on peacefully and happily, till Willie, the boy next in age to Charlie, was grown up, and got a situation of forty pounds a year, which was to be gradually increased. What riches this forty pounds seemed to him! and what wonderful plans were unfolded in strict secrecy to Charlie, as to how it was to be spent! After much deliberation as to whether the first quarter's salary would look best in a single note, or ten sovereigns, they decided that the note would look grandest; so it was arranged that Willie was to give it unbroken to his mother—the first money he had ever earned.

The three months seemed very long in coming to an end; but at length they passed, and when Willie came home on the evening of the quarter day, with pride and joy he gave the ten pounds to his mother, as they were all sitting in Charlie's room.

A ten pound note was a rarity in that house, and it was passed from one to another to be admired. Mrs. Wellwood was very unwilling to take it, though it gladdened her heart that Willie wanted her to do so; but he would take no refusal, so she was obliged to accept it. Great talk there was then as to how it was to be spent; for she was determined that, after one pound had been laid aside for the orphan society, as a thankoffering, the remainder should be shared amongst every one in the house. A print for Charlie was the first thing decided on, the only dissenting voice being his own, which, as Willie said, went for nothing; but before anything else could be arranged, he looked so flushed and weary that his mother sent every one away, and after settling him comfortably, said she would leave him quite alone for an hour or two, after all the excitement.

When she returned, she found him weeping bitterly, a thing so unusual, that she was quite alarmed, as, stooping down, and kissing him tenderly, she asked him what was the matter.

'Oh, mother,' he said, 'I cannot help it. It is breaking my heart to think that, as long as I live, I can never do anything for you. Oh! I wish I could get strong and well, that I might work for you like Willie.'

'My poor boy,' said his mother, while her own tears flowed fast, 'you must not say that you can never do anything for me. You surely do not measure the value of a child by the amount of money he may earn? Willie's ten pounds is very precious as a proof of his love, and self-denial, and steadiness; but who, under God, has been the means of making him what he is? Who dissuaded him from going to sea, when he would not listen to my advice, because he thought it was dictated by foolish and unreasonable fears? Who encouraged him to persevere in reading for his examination, when, in consequence of his long illness, he had lost so much time, as to make the possibility of his passing seem almost hopeless? Who checked his impetuous spirit, and fostered his diligence? Who so lovingly made him take the place and position of the eldest brother, to try the effect that the feeling of responsibility would have on his too volatile character, and with such a happy result? Oh, Charlie, if it was only for what you have been to him, and the other boys, and Minna, I would feel that you are the greatest blessing that I have. What you have been to me personally, I could never tell you. I do not know how I could have borne my heavy trials without your ready help. Your love and sympathy have cheered me through many a dark and cloudy day, while your cheerfulness has made me ashamed to murmur at my lesser privations. In fact, darling, you are so precious to me, that I am afraid you make me selfish. Very often, when I think of the others growing up, and having homes of their own, I cannot help thanking God that my sick boy will be with me always. I can never be lonely while I have you, my comfort and my resting-place; and I feel that if it had pleased God to have given you health and strength, you could hardly have been as great, and certainly not a greater blessing than you are, now that you are lying helpless on your sick-bed.'

Charlie was satisfied. It was only for the sake of the mother who had done so much for him, that the thought of his helplessness troubled him; and now that her cheering words had given him yet another proof of the truth of the words that 'all things work together for good to them that love God' (Rom. viii. 28), he was contented and happy.

But you say, 'My circumstances are not like Charlie's. I cannot do as he did.'

Certainly not. No two persons' circumstances are ever exactly similar; but surely we must believe that, in whatever position Charlie might have been placed, his loving heart, guided by 'the wisdom that cometh from above,' and which is so freely offered to all who wish for it (James iii. 17, and i. 5), would have found ways of being a help and comfort to those around him. For those who have 'a heart at leisure from itself to soothe and sympathize,' there will always be 'a work of lowly love to do.'

But, again, do you say, 'Even though I might be able to do something for those around, I do not see anything that I could do for God?'

Do you not? Then I think you have forgotten that in ministering to his people, we minister to Him. Has not He himself assured us that it is so, in these blessed words, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me!' (Matt. xxv. 45.) And, besides this, I think there is direct work for Him that may be done even on your sofa. The following anecdote will tell you of one kind. You will easily find others yourself.

Some time ago a clergyman went to see a great invalid, to whom 'wearisome nights,' and wearisome days too, had for years been 'appointed' (Job vii. 3). 'I was thinking of you as I came along,' he said kindly, as he sat down beside her, 'in connection with two verses that struck me very much this morning.'

The invalid looked up brightly, expecting that he would repeat some precious promise. But he did not. He read these words from the 147th Psalm: 'He delighteth not in the strength of the horse; He taketh not pleasure in the legs of a man. The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear Him, in them that hope in his mercy.'

'Now,' he continued, 'I think these verses ought to be full of comfort to you. I think the first plainly shows that in mere active work, as such, the Lord takes no pleasure. We may go all over the world, and seem to be very busy for Him, and yet He may not take any pleasure in what we do. Active work is indeed a great joy and a great privilege when we do it as God would have us, and when God would have us. But the next verse shows that, however set aside from active work, and however complete our incapacity for it may be, we may still do what will please the Lord, for "the Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear Him, in those that hope in his mercy."'

After speaking of fear as the fear of a loving child for a kind father, whom he fears to grieve or to offend, he went on: 'I believe we are apt to think of hope too exclusively as regards its effects on ourselves; but if I had promised to give you something that you would very much like to have, would it not be a great pleasure to me to know that you were watching for it, expecting it, thinking of it, hoping for it? And so, when God makes us a promise (we would not dare to use the expression, but that He does so himself), it gives Him pleasure when we hope for its fulfilment, for He "taketh pleasure in them that fear Him, in those that hope in his mercy."'

Very often did this thought bring joy and comfort to the invalid. I pray that it may do so now to you. Oh! never imagine that you cannot do anything for God, while, through the operation of his Holy Spirit, you can fear and you can hope. Cultivate these graces to the utmost, for surely angels, or archangels, could not desire a greater or more glorious service than that of giving pleasure to the Lord of heaven and earth.

HOW A RAGGED SCHOOL COMMENCED.

THE kitchen at Burton Parsonage excelled all the kitchens I ever saw. It was a delightful place. Such closets and presses; such snowy dressers and tables; such rows of glittering crockery; such a huge, hospitable-looking range, with roomy ovens, suggestive of all sorts of good things! Comfort gleamed from the shining brass knobs on the doors, flashed from the bright dish-covers that hung on the wall, laughed in the well-polished fender, and, in its joyous exuberance, went careering up the chimney in long tongues of flame.

This jolly old kitchen was lighted by one large mullioned window, broad, but low. Thriving pots of musk, two or three clumsy-looking cactuses, and a brisk little rose-tree ornamented the sill; whilst underneath ran a wide, cushioned seat. Near to the window stood a table; and on the Saturday morning of which I am writing, it was a very attractive table too. There was a bladder of lard, and a dish of delicious golden butter, and some seductive white jars. To think of the contents makes one's mouth water, after nineteen years! We will only hint, in passing, at 'strawberry jam' and 'lemon cheesecake.' There was a bowl of milk, and a wire basket of fresh eggs, and a basin of sugar; a pastry-board, and a rolling-pin—the latter in active operation. I think I see her now, that sweet lady, who, with the sleeves of her delicate print wrapper turned back, was so deftly using that rolling-pin. She was about fifty, and wore her soft, prematurely white hair drawn back from her noble brow. Her whole face was expressive of goodness and refinement. She was not one of your modern fine ladies, who are ashamed to know how potatoes look before they are cooked, and who fancy that the essence of ladyhood lies in utter ignorance of all domestic knowledge. Mrs. Grayson belonged to the old school. Dignified she always was; but there was also a spice of stateliness in her manner, which effectually checked any undue familiarity. No doubt you will think she pushed her domestic notions too far. 'Her husband' might be 'known in the gate' from the whiteness of his linen. No clergyman in the diocese, not even the bishop, could boast more spotless bands and collars, cravats and wristbands; but then she would never trust the 'getting up' of these important appendages to hired hands. Yet she did not put all her energies of body and mind into the starching of linen and the making of pies, though she was busy enough with the latter that same Saturday morning.

'Holloa, missus! doa yo want ony tins?'

'Dear me, child, how you startled me! You should knock at the door, and ask nicely, and then, perhaps, you would sell more tins. Now you must go out, and I will shut the door, and you must knock—so; then, when I open the door, you must say, 'If you please, do you want anything to-day?'

The child thus addressed was quite a little boy, not more than six or seven years of age. His clothing was scanty and ragged, and his hands and face were not scrupulously clean. He wore no hat, and his little head seemed a perfect mop of tangled curls, which lay on his shoulders when he lifted up to Mrs. Grayson's gaze those wonderful, confiding, childish blue eyes of his. He was so long in knocking, that Mrs. Grayson began to fear he had run away. Presently the silence was broken by a timid rat-tat, upon which the door was immediately opened.

'Please, missus, doa yo want anything in my way, think yo?'

Mrs. Grayson was so amused with his quaint, old-fashioned manner, as not to be able to reply directly. He eagerly continued—

'They's vary good uns, missus; real strong. These skewers, now, is real good skewers, and vary cheap: look at 'em!'

'Well, I think I must take these. How much do you ask for them?'

'Thrippence, missus; I can't take no less than that. I only gets a halfpenny for every bunch I sells.'

Whilst Mrs. Grayson was feeling in her pocket for coppers, she asked—

'What is your name, and where do you live?'

'Johnny, missus; and we live nowheres; we're on tramp.'

'Did you ever go to Sunday school?'

'Noa: what is't?'

'It is where kind people teach little boys and girls to read God's book—the Bible, you know—and where they are taught about God.'

'Whose him, missus?'

'Did you never hear about God, Johnny?'

'Not as I knows on.'

A look of sad yearning stole over Mrs. Grayson's countenance. The snowdrops had only twice bloomed above the little grave where her only son was buried. As she gazed at this little neglected boy, she pictured that other bright-haired, blue-eyed child, who had so early learned to lisp 'Our Father' with loving confidence. A thought entered her mind; and, being an impulsive woman, she acted upon it.

'Have you any mother, Johnny?'

'Yes, and a little sister—littler than me.'

'Well, now, to-morrow will be Sabbath. You ask mother to wash you well, and send you to me. You can come in the morning, about nine o'clock. We go to church at eleven; so, if you do not come early, you must wait till afternoon. Do you hear?'

'Yes, missus; I'll be sure and come.'

Mrs. Grayson finished her pie-making in a very pre-occupied state of mind. She afterwards went to a little room, and, shutting the door, unlocked a box, which contained many precious mementoes of her lost darling. She selected socks and shoes, a Holland blouse and belt, and a child's linen collar. With what loving, tender hands she starched and ironed that little collar! How carefully she arranged the bow of black ribbon in the button-hole! Her step was as light and her voice as cheerful as ever; but who could count those tears that fell silently as the dew? This mother's grief was no selfish, mawkish, sentimental emotion. It was a quiet, deep, fruitful, because a sanctified sorrow, which came upon her chastened heart like 'rain on the mown grass.' Her heart, instead of being a reservoir of concentrated affection, became a fountain, sending forth fertilizing streams of sympathy, of which many drank and were glad.

Sabbath morning came, but no Johnny. About three in the afternoon, when the servants had gone out, and the house was still, Mrs. Grayson spied her protégé creeping shyly along by the garden wall, as if half ashamed of being seen. She went into the kitchen, and opened the door for him.

'Well, Johnny, there's a good boy! What a nice clean face! Now, I'm going to make you a tidy little boy, whilst you stay with me.'

She then proceeded to invest him with socks and shoes, blouse and collar, talking to him the while. She found he had not come in the morning because his mother would not get up to wash him, or give him any breakfast. At length, in despair, he had gone to a good-natured neighbour, who had scrubbed him well all over.

'And did Mrs. Jones give you any breakfast?'

'No.'

'Have you had anything to eat to-day, Johnny?'

'No, missus. Mother was a-getting of it ready when I came off; but I was feared you'd think I wasn't coming.'

On learning this, Mrs. Grayson brought him a large cup of milk, and some bread. It made the tears come into her eyes to see how eagerly he ate it. He broke the bread in two pieces, and was putting one part into his ragged little pocket, when Mrs. Grayson asked—

'Why do you do that?'

'Oh, missus, it's for Lizzie; it's so good!'

'Eat all you want, my dear,' replied Mrs. Grayson, 'and I will give you some to take for Lizzie.'

When the meal was concluded, Mrs. Grayson felt some difficulty in commencing. She wished to offer prayer, but felt she must first explain who the Great Being was whose blessing they were about to ask. She began by asking Johnny if he liked flowers, and birds, and butterflies, and if he had ever seen the stars shining at night; and having interested him, she told him that God in heaven made them, and took care of them, and loved them; and that He loved Johnny, and wanted him to be a good boy, and love Him, and his dear Son Jesus Christ, for whose sake God was willing to forgive her and him everything they had ever done that was naughty; only they must try and not vex Him any more. She told him of God's presence; that his eye was on him then; that He could hear all she was saying to him.

'Can He see us now, missus?'

'Yes; He is everywhere.'

'Is He in this room?'

'Yes.'

'Is He in yon?' (pointing to a door that led into the scullery.)

'Yes.'

Sinking his voice to a whisper, he asked—

'May I go in and look?'

'Yes, you may go in; but you cannot see Him, though He can see you.'

Cautiously advancing on tiptoe, he peered into the scullery, and returned quite mystified to his teacher, saying—

'Tell Him to give o'er looking at me; I'd as lief He didn't!'

'But He is your friend, and loves you, and He wants to do you good; and how can He, if He doesn't look at you, to see what you need?'

'Wab'but I cannot see Him,' said Johnny, going back to the old difficulty.

Mrs. Grayson remembered Charlotte Elizabeth's attempt with her dumb boy, and resolved to take a leaf out of her book.

'You cannot see God, Johnny, until you die. Can you tell me what it is that moves that large tree in the garden?'

'Why, the wind, to be sure; it very nigh blowed me over as I was coming!'

'Can you see the wind, Johnny?'

'Noa; but I can feel it, though.'

'Well, God is like the wind. You cannot see Him, but you can learn to feel his presence, and rejoice in it.'

And so the lesson went on; and, at its close, Mrs. Grayson knelt in prayer, and Johnny, for the first time in his young life, bent his knee to Him who said, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'

The lesson being over, Mrs. Grayson proceeded to divest her pupil of his blouse and collar, telling him she would keep them for him till next Sabbath, if he would come again. She hardly liked to take off the socks and shoes, and send him out, in the keen March wind, with his little naked feet. Seeing her about to leave them on, Johnny said—

'Nay, you'd best take 'em off, missus; they'll very like go to "pop" if you don't.'

Mrs. Grayson thought so too; so off they came, and Johnny was soon trotting home,—made happy with a large piece of cake for himself, and another for 'Lizzie.' Week after week passed, till the spring brightened into summer, and each Sabbath found Johnny and Mrs. Grayson in the kitchen, reading and talking of Him who careth for the falling sparrow: how much more, then, for 'one of these little ones?'

At length, towards the close of July, the child called to say 'good-bye.' Teacher and scholar were sorry to part; but Mrs. Grayson was not surprised. Indeed, she rather wondered the family had remained so long in the place.

'I'm very much obliged to you for teaching me. If ever we come here again, I'll be sure to come and see you; and I'll not forget what you've said to me.'

And as he turned away, the sweet eyes looked wistfully back, and each saw the other through tears. And so Johnny turned sadly into the hot July sunshine; but, you may depend upon it, he did not forget the sweet lady at Burton Parsonage.

Again weeks passed away. Autumn's rich fruitage was gathered in, and the bleak winds of October had stripped the woods of their gorgeous robes. The dismal rains and sullen fogs of November had set in. The gloomier and darker it grew outside, the more cozy and inviting became that delightful old kitchen, as its well-polished furniture winked and glowed in the ruddy firelight.

Mrs. Grayson had been nodding for some time, as she sat by the drawing-room fire with a book in her hands, which she believed she was reading. She was thoroughly roused by the sudden entrance of her daughter, who exclaimed—

'Mamma, here's Johnny; and he's brought six more boys with him!'

It was quite true. When Mrs. Grayson reached the kitchen, there stood Johnny, with a face all smiles, and behind him half a dozen other lads, all bigger than himself, exhibiting different degrees of sheepishness, and all more or less astonished at their leader's daring in putting out his hand to shake hands with 'the lady.' With the exception of Johnny, none of them were very clean; and all were ragged, stockingless, and shoeless.

'Yo see I've comed back, missus, and I've brought these here six others. I thought, maybe, yo'd like to teach them what yo've taught me.'

'I am pleased to see you again, Johnny; and I shall be very glad to teach your friends, if they are willing to learn.'

Mrs. Grayson had a peculiar gift for dealing with children; and she soon had, in these little roughs, a most attentive class. After their departure, she thought long and prayerfully. Burton was a densely populated manufacturing town. There were hundreds of ragged, neglected children swarming its streets. Sabbath schools there were in abundance, but none for such wretched little outcasts as these. Thought led to earnest effort; and, before the first snow covered the tombstones in Burton churchyard, a room had been taken and fitted up, and a 'ragged school' formed, of which Johnny and his six friends were the first scholars. It is nineteen years ago, but the school still flourishes. It seldom numbers fewer than 200 in attendance; but it will not be till the last great day that the good accomplished can be fully estimated. Who will not be encouraged to 'sow by all waters?' Who will withhold the scattering hand in the morning, or restrain it in the evening, seeing we know not which shall prosper, this or that, or whether God will make 'both alike good?'

A CONFIDENT CLAIM TESTED.

IT was after a long and sore conflict with the enemy of souls and desponding thoughts, also after much earnest prayer, that the Psalmist came to a comfortable conclusion, and with much confidence laid his claim before God, saying, 'But I have trusted in thy mercy' (Ps. xiii. 5).

Scarcely anything is more common than for persons to put in some such claim as this. If we visit much the beds of sick and dying people, or speak to many in health, we shall be sure to find a very general acknowledgment of sin, and of hope in God's mercy. The reply often is: 'Yes, I do pray to God; I trust in his mercy; and I hope all will be right at last.'

Let us endeavour to bring some of those who put in this claim to the test of truth. It will be much better for persons to do this now, while opportunity is given for mistakes to be rectified, than to find out that all is indeed wrong, when it is too late to begin aright.

First comes a person who scarcely pays any regard to the externals of religion. He seldom enters any place of worship; spends the Lord's day in work, or sleep, or pleasure; yet he says, 'I am as good as many who make a great to do about religion. I do not believe that God made me to condemn me. He is a merciful God; and I will not think so ill of Him, as to suppose that He will cast me, or any of his creatures, in a place of misery for ever!' Such an one hopes in God's mercy without any warrant from his word; yea, in defiance of all its awful threatenings. There is the Bible, from which alone we can learn anything about God's mercy. That book speaks also very largely and plainly about future misery, and shows clearly the way of escape. The heavens, the earth, the sea, the forests, the sun, the stars, all say God is great and wise; but they are all silent as regards mercy toward sinners. But hark! the Bible speaks: 'Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return to the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him, and to our God, and He will abundantly pardon.' But it says also, that those who will not return to God, nor forsake their own thoughts, can have no interest in God's mercy, but 'shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.'

A second comes forward and says, 'I go to a place of worship regularly; I pay my way honestly, and occasionally do a kind turn for a neighbour; but I do not puzzle my head about the doctrines of the gospel, nor care to talk about religion. I think that all good-living, honest people are bound safe for heaven, and that only those who are very wicked and profane have any reason to fear. I do my best. God is merciful, and I have no fear.'

To such an one we say, 'What you speak of is well as far as it goes; but your hopes are altogether false. God's mercy will not help you, because you leave Christ out of your creed, and have not his blood in your conscience, nor his love in your heart. Be you sure that God has no mercy for those who despise Christ, unless they cease to do so. Only those who so feel their lost and miserable state, as to fly to Christ for safety and blessing, will be owned by a God of mercy. Ponder two scriptures: "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we may be saved." "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema"—that is, accursed, devoted to destruction.'

A third person speaks very fair indeed; but we must test him also by the touchstone of truth. 'It is true,' he says, 'that no one who overlooks Christ can be saved. Only his blood cleanseth from sin. I read my Bible; I know it well. Salvation is all of grace; our own works cannot save us.' True; but is yours a living faith? Does it produce love, and lead to holiness? What about your conduct? Have not many been stumbled by your loud talking and unholy walking? Your trust in God's mercy is as vain as the rest, for your religion is 'without fruit.' Read again the words of Jesus: 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven.' 'Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.'

A fourth comes, with the Bible in his hand, Christ in his heart, and holiness in his life. He says, '"I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord." I know no name but the name of Jesus. God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven me; and I desire now to walk in love, and to be an imitator of God. I renounce all my works; I rely only on Jesus. I desire to serve Him, and pant to be like Him. I can, through the teachings of the Holy Spirit, look up to God, and say to Him, and not merely before Him, "I have trusted in thy mercy."' Happy, favoured soul, you may safely add, 'My soul shall rejoice in thy salvation.' Such a truster is blessed now, and shall never be confounded; for it is written, 'Blessed are all they that trust in Him.' Leaning on God's mercy, as manifested in Christ, such an one may say, with a triumphant truster, 'I know whom I have trusted, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that I have committed to Him against that day.'

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

JOHN VII. 37.

HERE we note—(1) The time; (2) The place; (3) The Giver; (4) The gift; (5) The persons; (6) The love.

I. The time.—The last and great day of the Feast of Tabernacles, when Israel's joy was fullest—at least in appearance and expression; just when men would have thought there was least need of any other joy, and no propriety in diverting their minds from the scene before them; when many days of religious service would have seemed quite enough to fill them. Just then the voice is heard, and the message strikes on their ear, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.'

II. The place.—Jerusalem—the temple. What need of anything else than what that temple afforded? Was not David's experience still true, 'How amiable are thy tabernacles!' 'I was glad when they said to me?' Besides, the temple was now filled with crowds, and a scene was enacting in its courts of striking aspect. The Levite was now bringing in the water from Siloam in the golden pitcher, or pouring it on the sacrifice; and Israel was about to burst forth in one loud shout of joy. Imposing scene and place!

III. The Giver.—It is the Son of God who stands up in the midst of these ten thousands, with something in his hand for them—something which He counts worthy of their acceptance. The Giver is divine and heavenly; not merely a prophet or teacher sent from God, but the Son of God himself, who knew what they needed, and what He had to give; who saw into their hearts, had sounded their depths of emptiness, had measured the intensity of their thirst. He is himself God's gift, yet He is also Giver; the dispenser of a fulness which is absolutely infinite. To himself He turns their eye—here, as always elsewhere: 'Come unto me.' They were dealing with other things or persons; He bids them deal with himself. Feasts, altars, sacrifices, doctrines, ceremonies, were all in vain; they must deal with himself.

IV. The gift.—Living water; something wherewith to quench their thirst—the Holy Spirit. Here is a gift in Christ's hands for them; a divine gift from a divine Giver; a gift sufficient to fill the soul of the emptiest, to quench the thirst of the thirstiest; a gift not only great enough to fill them, but to overflow upon others; a gift personal, infinite, free. There are two gifts of God which stand aloft and alone in their priceless greatness—the gift of his Son, the gift of his Spirit; both of these presented to man, pressed upon him: 'If thou knewest the gift of God, thou wouldst have asked, and He would have given thee living water.'

V. The persons.—Who are they who need this living water? Not heathens, not profane and irreligious, but Jews,—religious Jews,—engaged in the worship of God, at one of their most joyful feasts. This is remarkable. In the fourth chapter, it is to the Samaritan that He presents the cup of living water. In the book of the Revelation, it is presented indiscriminately to all, Jew and Gentile; so also in the fifty-fifth of Isaiah. But here it is to the Jew—the religious Jew. He is the thirsty one; he needs living water. His rites, and feasts, and sacrifices cannot fill him nor quench his thirst. He has still a deep void within,—an intense thirst, which calls for something more spiritual and divine. It is not, then, to the idolatrous Pagan that the Lord speaks; not merely to the lover of pleasure or lust; the heedless sinner. It is to the men who frequent the sanctuary; who pray and praise outwardly; who go to the Lord's table. It is to them He speaks. Perhaps the thirstiest of our race are to be found among our so-called religious men; and I do not mean the hypocrite or Pharisee, but those who, with devout conscientiousness, attend to what are called religious duties in all their parts. They go through the whole round and routine of service, but they are not happy. They are still thirsty and weary. This external religiousness helps to pacify conscience, but it does not make them happy. Sabbath comes after Sabbath, and finds them in their place in the sanctuary; but they are not happy. It is a form or a performance; an empty vessel. They are just where they were. There are multitudes of such in our day, in our churches, at our communion tables. To them Jesus speaks: 'If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink.' Duties, ceremonies, etc., cannot make you happy. They are a weariness. They leave you often more thirsty than before. But deal with Jesus, as God's gift, as the dispenser of God's gift: you will find in Him the fountain of living water.

VI. The love.—It is all love, from first to last. In love Jesus stands up and speaks. In love He presents the full vessel of living water, and presses it to their parched lips. Here is the love that passeth knowledge; love yearning over unhappy man, and pitying his unhappiness. Come ye to the waters! Come, and quench your thirst! Come, and be full! Come, and be happy for evermore!

ELIJAH AND THE WIDOW OF ZAREPHATH.*

BY THE REV. H. T. HOWAT, LIVERPOOL.

1 KINGS xviii. 8-24.—B.C. 909 TO 907.

'IT came to pass that the brook dried.' There can be no doubt that the feelings of Elijah would be very peculiar as he saw the Cherith lessening day after day, while possibly the very name of the streamlet, which in the original Hebrew means 'drought,' only tended to deepen his sense of alarm.

A preliminary question arises. Could not the same God who had miraculously supplied the prophet with food, as miraculously have supplied him with water? Was the difficulty greater to make Cherith flow, than to make the voracious ravens Elijah's ministers? And yet blessings perpetuated too often become mere matters of course. There is a tendency in the very uniformity with which the sun rises, our pulses beat, and our lungs breathe, to beget a feeling of indifference and forgetfulness to the great Source of them all. All life is a miracle; new mercies and new mornings dawn together, and yet frequently it is only their privation that recalls the consciousness of their former presence. We have no right to say it was so with Elijah; it may be permitted, however, to suggest, whether, by the new surprise his Master had in store for him, He did not intend to test his faith—to ascertain whether it was to Cherith or to God he was trusting, to confirm his sense of dependence, and show that, without an ever-wakeful and working Providence, even an Elijah was nothing.

A second preliminary question is this, Why, when Elijah was to leave the Cherith, he was sent to Phœnicia, and not back to Israel? Apart from the danger, humanly speaking, of such a proceeding, and the new surprise of providence awaiting him in Phœnicia, reasons may be found in the sovereignty of God's grace; in his desire to strengthen the faith of one of his 'hidden ones;' to strengthen also the prophet's own faith, by the discovery amid Israel's degeneracy, and even in the headquarters of Baal, of one who was 'an Israelite indeed;' and to prove that both for this world and the next, living, dying, or dead, 'godliness is profitable unto all things.' It is a safe inference, we think, from the language of our blessed Lord (Luke iv. 26), that the widow of Zarephath was a true believer, not probably matured in faith, but still a believer, wherever, like her sister in the Gospels who successfully struggled with Christ, she had obtained the foundations of her faith. Phœnicia was the last place in the world to have found a worshipper of 'the Lord, the living God.' It was also the last place in the world to have found an Elijah. And yet both are here—the one 'a lily among thorns;' the other, in the quaint but fine thought of Lightfoot, 'the first apostle of the Gentiles.'

'Arise, get thee to Zarephath.' 'Servants rise,' says the proverb, 'when the bell rings,' and so Elijah obeys the call of God. Up to this point he had had no will of his own, and God did not intend he should have any. The prophet was like Israel in the wilderness: 'At the commandment of the Lord they rested in their tents, and at the commandment of the Lord they journeyed.' God was leading him by a way he knew not; and although, like Israel again, it might not be the shortest way, might not be the easiest way, might not apparently be the safest way, still it was the right way, and in the end was to lead to 'a city of habitation.'

Let us see Elijah on his journey. He takes his last look of the dry bed of the Cherith; of the rocky grot where, like Noah in the ark, the Lord had 'shut him in;' of his ravens, who, perched overhead, survey his movements with wondering eye. He is unburdened with equipage of travel. He throws around him his sheepskin mantle. He has a staff already, or improvises one from the forest before he leaves. He steps out to the open country again. Led by a heavenly instinct and impulse, he makes for the Jordan. He crosses it. He reaches the mountains of Gilboa, memorable as the scene of the death of Saul. Passing over their eastern ridge, he finds himself in the plain of Jezreel. It is suggestive of Jezebel's 'groves;' but God is his guide, and as he journeys, we fancy we hear him singing one of David's psalms, 'I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me.' And now he has arrived at the base of Carmel, the most beautiful mountain in Palestine, clothed to its very summit with perennial verdure, and destined so soon to play a very conspicuous part in the prophet's own history. From Carmel he passes to the shore of the Great Sea. He travels hopefully on. He is now at Accho or Ptolemais, where Paul tarried a day on his voyage to Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 7), and which, under the name of St. Jean D'Acre, has also a place in our own British story. From Accho, and still by the sea-shore, he reaches Tyre. In Tyre's busy streets, where are traders of all countries, no notice is taken of one solitary pilgrim, meanly clad compared with Tyre's sons of commerce and merchant princes. And so, weary and footsore, the lonely prophet continues his way till fifteen miles farther on, and at the gate of a small city on the coast road, he beholds, no doubt by a sign divinely communicated, 'a widow woman gathering of sticks.'

* From an excellent volume entitled, Elijah, the Desert Prophet. Edinburgh: Johnstone, Hunter, and Co.

Zarephath, the Sarepta of the New Testament, was situate midway between Tyre and Sidon, and, according to Calmet, was celebrated for refining metallic ores, the word itself literally signifying 'a place of smelting furnaces.' It is also thought by some that it was here the Syro-Phœnician woman of the Gospels had her daughter restored to life by our blessed Lord, when He 'went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon.' In the days of Jerome, the spot where Elijah met the 'widow woman' was marked by a tower, while over her house a church, termed τὸ χηρεῖον (from χηρεία, widowhood), was erected in the twelfth century by the Crusaders. It is still to be seen near the water's edge, and Elijah's chamber and the widow's kneading-trough are professedly pointed out. The modern representative of Zarephath is Surafend or Sarafand. It has somewhat changed its position in the course of centuries (and especially since the period of the Crusades) from the site of the old town or village—being now, according to Dean Stanley in his Sinai and Palestine, more on the top and slope of one of the hills the long line of which skirts the plain of Phœnicia, and 'conspicuous by the white domes of its many tombs of Mussulman saints.' The ruins of the ancient Zarephath, however, are still very considerable, and—strange association—are now being dug over, perhaps the twentieth time, for stone to build the barracks at Beyrout.*

On the first glance of his future hostess, who seems to have been an unconscious agent in the whole transaction, the prospects of Elijah did not look very bright. The 'gathering of sticks' told a sad tale of distress. This widow was a widow indeed. A strong trial of the prophet's faith it was to be dependent on a woman; a still stronger to be dependent on a widow; but the strongest and strangest of all, to be dependent on a widow whose circumstances were so humble that she had to search for fragments of fuel upon the public road, or perhaps fragments of drift-wood on the neighbouring beach. And yet, true faith thinks of God, not of circumstances. 'There is a lad here,' said the disciples, 'which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many?'—that was the language of doubt. 'I have no man,' said the invalid at Bethesda, 'when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool;' that was the language of doubt again. Both thought of circumstances, the circumstances in which they were placed. Elijah, however, thinks not of circumstances, but of the God of circumstances. Like Abraham, he staggers not at the promise through unbelief, but is strong in faith, giving glory to God. And so his faith triumphed. Mightier than any magician, it laid every doubt and fear in the dust; a 'thus saith the Lord' was enough; God had commanded the widow woman and commanded his servant Elijah as well; it mattered not how the support was to come; God could send it, and He would: 'If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove, and nothing shall be impossible unto you.'

It is the hour of the prophet's 'weakness.' He is faint and thirsty. The streams on his way from Cherith have all been dried up, so the first thing he asks is a cup of cold water. Encouraged by the readiness to help, 'Bring me also,' he says, 'I pray thee, a morsel of bread in thine hand.' But what a reply follows!—a reply in which we know not what arrests us most—the simplicity of the language, the extremity of the poverty, the depth of the distress, the affection of the mother, or the singularity of finding here a believer in God who can recognise his prophet: 'As the Lord thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but an handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruse: and, behold, I am gathering two sticks, that I may go in and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die.'

The whole story at this point is terribly touching. It had been a sad season in Zarephath, and indeed all over Phœnicia, where the drought and famine were long remembered. Menander, the Greek poet (B.C. 342), makes mention of both in recording the acts of Ethbaal, the king of Tyre, informing us that solemn prayers were offered by that monarch in the temples of Ashtaroth on their account; 'and when he made supplications for the descent of rain there came great thunders.'*

A sad season, however, in Phœnicia and Zare-

* Dr. Thomson in The Land and the Book (1863).

* See Josephus, Antiq. Book viii. chap. 13, sec. 2.

phath generally, it had been specially sad in the home of this 'widow woman,' her husband dead, and she left helpless with an only child—a comfort truly to her heart, but a great addition to her cares. She had struggled and striven in poverty and famine. But still the bloom was going from her boy's ruddy cheek, and her hopes that he might yet be to her in his father's place were apparently soon to be blighted. More piercingly than any words, his famished lips, and lustreless eye, and poor thin form had all been crying for bread, and she had scarcely any to give. It was enough to make a mother's senses reel; and if therefore now, by sore stinting and hard labour, she could give him one meal more, did not all humanity say, 'Provide first for your perishing, dying boy?'

It was nature,—the language of Nabal in another form, 'Shall I then take my bread, and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men whom I know not whence they be?' (1 Sam. xxv. 11.) But just in proportion as it was natural, it was dangerous, distrustful, and dishonouring to God. Possibly the best of us in a similar position would have done precisely the same. 'The seen and temporal' are close beside us; the unseen and eternal' are far away. Not this widow of Zarephath only, holds as first principle 'me and my son.' With far less excuse than she had, it is the world's main-spring of action, the pivot on which men are hourly turning round. And yet, taking lofty ground, without any blush for selfishness, trying her deeper still—like the Master in the days of his flesh: 'This He said to prove him, for He himself knew what He would do'—the travel-stained seer repeats his request, 'Make me a little cake first, and after make for thee and for thy son,' vowing that God—the God of them both—would take care of the domestic stores: 'for thus saith the Lord God of Israel, The barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day that the Lord sendeth rain upon the earth.'

It was indeed a trying moment. Many difficulties might have been started, and chief among them, why Elijah was in want at all, if he could so easily multiply the little remaining provision. 'Some sharp dame,' says Bishop Hall, 'would have taken up the prophet, and sent him away with an angry repulse.' But no, the widow of Zarephath stands the test; her confidence in God is no frail plank; it bears her up and through; she believes the 'Fear not' of the weary prophet; she can even look beyond the privations of her child; and, in a faith like Job's, can say as she kindles her 'two sticks' on the hearth, 'Though He slay us both, yet will I trust in Him.'

'And she went and did according to the saying of Elijah; and she, and he, and her house did eat many days.' We need not linger over the miracle, although its features are of the most astonishing character. The same power that multiplied the loaves and fishes on the shores of Galilee, could multiply with equal ease the particles of meal and the little drops of oil this 'widow woman' possessed in her home. With the Lord nothing is impossible. Believe in the fact of the miracle, and the rest may safely be left to God. The re-creation of the meal and oil from day to day for two years—the period, as we reckon it, Elijah remained in Zarephath—was indeed a very small matter, compared with the original creation of the world out of nothing. Admit the almighty energy of God, and you have a force which is infinite, and a force which is infinite admits of no limitation.

It is impossible, also, to fail to see here, nearly a thousand years before they were spoken, the fulfilment of these words of our blessed Lord: 'He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet's reward.' For two whole years the prophet's reward was received by this Sareptan widow. She was preserved in the midst of famine. We read not of luxuries enjoyed, but 'the barrel of meal wasted not, neither did the cruse of oil fail.' The widow's heart was singing aloud for joy. She had no anxiety about daily bread, for it came with the day, and there was enough for all. Her boy, too, was brightening up, and the old ruddy glow was coming back to cheeks no longer shrunken from want of food. Further still, and apart from his resurrection, was there not enjoyed by her, for two whole years, the teaching, example, and prayers of a man of God in her humble home? Were these not something? Would they be lost upon herself or her child, and could money have purchased them at that moment throughout the whole of Phœnicia? A good man's prayers, a good man's 'blessing,' are inestimable: 'And Jacob blessed Pharaoh.'

Words in Season.

BIBLE THOUGHTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

HEB. I. 3.

THERE is no difficulty in ascertaining who the 'He' is here. He is well described to us. He is the 'Son,' 'the heir of all things,' the 'Maker of the worlds,' the 'brightness of Jehovah's glory,' the 'express image of his person,' the 'upholder of all things.' Such is He! The 'Word made flesh;' 'the only-begotten of the Father,'—infinite, eternal, divine.

The special thing which this glorious One is described as doing, in our text, is 'purging our sins.' For this He descended, lived, died, and was buried. And this work is one which comes in between a glorious past and a glorious future—a brief but marvellous interruption or interposition. He, the Eternal Son, descends to do a work on earth; He does it in thirty-three years, and then reascends to eternal glory. Yet, ere He went, He could say, 'It is finished.'

We should be led to conclude, from his person, and character, and past eternal history, that the work He comes to do will be thoroughly well done; and we should no less conclude, from his subsequent history of exaltation and honour, that it had been fully and satisfactorily accomplished. His sitting down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, implies that He himself is satisfied, and that the Father is also satisfied. He is glorified because his work is done.

The work is that of purging our sins; and these He purged 'by himself.' Let us consider this. It is literally, 'Through himself He made purgation of our sins.'

I. A purgation or cleansing is needed.—The need of purgation arises from the existence of sin. It has come in as guilt and as evil. It has come in to defile us, to pollute our consciences, to render our persons unacceptable to God. It has made us filthy, so that God cannot approach us; and it has produced such a sense of filthiness, that we cannot approach God. Purgation, then, is needed, because of pollution. It is needed to satisfy God, and to satisfy us. So long as this defilement exists, there can be no approach to God, no intercourse, no peace of conscience, no safety; but distance, terror, isolation, like that of the leper; 'fearful looking for of judgment.' No service, no safety, no peace, no strength, no love without it. If our sins are not purged, we are yet in them, and they in us; God is yet angry with us, and we at enmity with God.

II. It must be sacrificial purgation.—The washing away of sin is something special and peculiar.

(1.) It is not indifference to sin, or forgetfulness of it, either on our part or that of God.—This cannot satisfy God, or relieve our consciences. Yet this is all the purgation which most betake themselves to!

(2.) It is not God's love to us.—God's love, in itself, cannot purge sin. It may and does lead to the adoption of measures for the purgation; but it must not be confounded with these. It cannot pacify the conscience.

(3.) It is purgation by pardon.—Our consciences cannot be purged without forgiveness. No pardon, no purgation. Where there is righteous pardon, there is true purgation.

(4.) It is purgation by priesthood.—The purging of the conscience is a priestly act. It is by priesthood that the relationship between us and God is established on its true footing. There must be priesthood in everything pertaining to the removal of sin; and this priesthood must be divine.

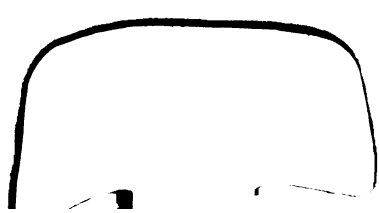
(5.) It is purgation by blood.—It is the blood that purges; the blood of the Lamb, the blood of the priest. This blood is the blood of the substitute. It purges because it is the life; and purgation can only come by the giving of life for life.

III. Christ himself has made this purgation by himself.—It is not merely that He purged our sins, but He did it by himself. He was High Priest, altar, temple, sacrifice. It was his own blood, his own death that did the work. That which He did on earth is our purgation; He wrought that thing which purges, pacifies, pardons. In consequence of it, it was a righteous thing in God to draw near to us, and a safe thing for us to draw near to God. God looks at it, and says, 'It is enough, I draw near;' we look at it, and say, 'It is enough, let us draw near.' All that sin, and guilt, and condemnation produced, of distance, displeasure, dread, are done away by this. The sacrifice has been offered; the blood has been shed; life has been given for life; it is finished. Not by our works of righteousness, but by the one work done by the Son of God we are saved, our sins are purged, our approach to God is provided for. Nothing more is needed to propitiate God, or to purge our conscience, than the sacrifice of Calvary. Without this, God would have remained unpropitiated, and the sinner's conscience unpurged, unpacified. Mark—

(1.) The love of God is here.—'Herein is love.' Love originated the propitiation. It is not, 'God gave his Son, that He might love the world;' but, 'God so loved the world, that He gave his Son.'

(2.) The open gate is here.—It is the blood that has rolled away the stone, and opened the gate; not love alone, but love working its way to us through the blood. The veil is rent. The flaming sword is removed or quenched.

(3.) The removal of dread is here.—It is not mere love that removes the distrust and terror. More than love is needed. The sacrifice presents that which is needed. Now we do not need to fly from God, nor dread Him as an enemy. Now He is both gracious and righteous, loving and holy. We need not be terrified at the mention of his name or law.

Here is the purging sacrifice. You are not actually purged till you believe; but here is the purging work. Receive God's testimony to its meaning, its nature, its efficacy, its power. It purges all who believe.


THE END.